Nick:

Looking forward to accessing your context/insights/outrage on reapportionment. As admitted yesterday, my background knowledge of the process is low (I do vote and like maps?).

One thing I can do is read. To that end, please feel free to forward along any essays, reports, cases that would help get-me-in-the-game. It's a BIG topic, but the realpolitik of my audience (Senate D members) will dictate initial digestible FAQ-like info that can be built upon as the process unfolds. Among my messaging targets (and likely order of convincing/teaching) are: 1) Minority Office Leadership/staff; 2) the four caucus members on the R-sub; 3) the remaining caucus members. I'm unsure if a caucus "plan" will emerge or if everyone will just be hanging out under the big tent doing their own thing. This makes it hard (impossible?) to strategize.

Also, was wondering . . . I know we've dug a hole with these first meetings, but would there be any value in creating queries/responses that we should have raised at yesterday's staff marching orders confab? Given that the staff directives were never publically posted and simply handed out at the meeting, seems like we could voice or submit issues/concerns either before or at the first sub-meetings. Yes, directives were accepted unanimously, but the process was slim-shady at best. Because all our folks were on the 'prevailing side,' would appear to fall within their rights to move for 'reconsideration of the question.'

Finally, any way to access your Florida Redistricting Primer presentation?

P.S. NYU for law school, right? One of the places we stay when visiting the city is a friend's place at 9th and 5th. Claudette's on the corner.
