To be Argued by:
NICHOLAS O. STEPHANOPOULOS
(Time Requested: 15 Minutes)

Supreme Court of the State of New York
Appellate Division – Second Department

Docket No.: 2024-11753

ORAL CLARKE, ROMANCE REED, GRACE PEREZ, PETER RAMON, ERNEST TIRADO and DOROTHY FLOURNOY, Plaintiffs-Appellants,

-against-

TOWN OF NEWBURGH and TOWN BOARD OF THE TOWN OF NEWBURGH,

Defendants-Respondents.

NEW YORK STATE OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,

Intervenor-Appellant.

BRIEF FOR PLAINTIFFS-APPELLANTS

ELECTION LAW CLINIC AT HARVARD LAW SCHOOL
Appellate Counsel
81 Main Street, Suite 400
White Plains, New York 10601
(617) 998-1010
rgreenwood@law.harvard.edu

Appellate Counsel to:

ABRAMS FENSTERMAN, LLP
Attorneys for Defendants-Appellants
81 Main Street, Suite 400
White Plains, New York 10601
(914) 607-7010
rspolzino@abramslaw.com

Orange County Clerk's Index No.: EF002460-2024

Table of Contents

Table of Contents i

Table of Authorities iii

Preliminary Statement 1

Issue Presented 1

Summary of Argument 2

Factual and Procedural Background 9

Legal Background 13

Standard of Review 17

Argument 18

I Defendants Lack Capacity to Challenge the NYVRA. 18

i. The Dilemma Exception Applies Only if Defendants Are Likely to Be Forced to Violate a Clear Constitutional Proscription. 19

ii. Defendants Are Virtually Certain Not to Be Forced to Violate a Clear Constitutional Proscription. 22

II The NYVRA Is Facially Constitutional. 28

i. The NYVRA Employs No Racial Classifications. 29

A. The Trial Court Failed to Identify Any Racial Classifications. 29

B. No Elements of the NYVRA Classify by Race. 36

ii. The NYVRA Is Narrowly Tailored to Preventing and Remedying Racial Discrimination in Voting. 42

A. The Supreme Court Wrongly Refused to Consider the State Interest Furthered by the NYVRA 42

B. The Supreme Court Wrongly Conducted Its Tailoring Analysis in the Abstract. 47

iii. The NYVRA's Partial Divergence from the Gingles Framework Is Constitutionally Irrelevant. 52

iv. The NYVRA Cannot Be Facially Nullified Because It Undeniably Has Lawful Applications. 57

III The Supreme Court Had No Authority to Consider, Let Alone Invalidate, NYVRA Provisions Not Relating to Vote Dilution. 58

Conclusion 59

Table of Authorities

Page(s)

Cases:

Abbott v. Perez,
585 U.S. 579 (2018) 35

Ala. Legis. Black Caucus v. Alabama (ALBC),
575 U.S. 254 (2015) 23, 28

Alexander v. S.C. State Conf. NAACP,
602 U.S. 1 (2024) 27, 28

Allen v. Milligan,
599 U.S. 1 (2023) ..... Passim

Bd. of Educ. of Mt. Sinai Union Free Sch. Dist. v. N.Y. State Teachers Ret. Sys., 60 F.3d 106 (2d Cir. 1995) 19

Blakeman v. James,
No.2:24-cv-1655, 2024 WL 3201671 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 4, 2024) 21

Bush v. Vera,
517 U.S. 952 (1996) 24-25

Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah,
508 U.S. 520 (1993) 48

City of Mobile v. Bolden,
446 U.S. 55 (1980) 46

City of New York v. State,
86 N.Y.2d 286 (1995) 18

Clerveaux v. E. Ramapo Cent. Sch. Dist.,
984 F.3d 213 (2d Cir. 2021) 45

Cnty. of Nassau v. State,
32 Misc.3d 709 (Sup. Ct., Albany County
[Michael C. Lynch, J.] 2011) 20, 25

Cohen v. State,
94 N.Y.2d 1 (1999) 57

Cooper v. Harris,
581 U.S. 285 (2017) 27

County of Nassau v. State of New York,
100 A.D.3d 1052 (3d Dep't 2012) 21

Crawford v. Board of Educ. of City of Los Angeles,
458 U.S. 527 (1982) 31

Gill v. Whitford,
585 U.S. 48 (2018) 41

Griggs v. Duke Power Co.,
401 U.S. 424 (1971) 33

Growe v. Emison,
507 U.S. 25 (1993) 49

Higginson v. Becerra,
786 F. App'x. 705 (9th Cir. 2019) 16, 25

Jeter v. Ellenville Cent. Sch. Dist.,
41 N.Y.2d 283 (1977) 19

Johnson v. California,
543 U.S. 499 (2005) 29

Johnson v. De Grandy,
512 U.S. 997 (1994) 53

Johnson v. DeSoto Cnty. Bd. of Comm'rs,
204 F.3d 1335 (11th Cir. 2000) 51

LaValle v. Hayden,
98 N.Y.2d 155 (2002) 17, 31

Mass. Bd. of Ret. v. Murgia,
427 U.S. 307 (1976) 30

Matter of Hearst Corp. v. Clyne,
50 N.Y.2d 707 (1980) 9, 59

McGowan v. Burstein,
71 N.Y.2d 729 (1988) 57

Merola v. Cuomo,
427 F. Supp. 3d 286 (N.D.N.Y. 2019) ..... Passim

Miller v. Johnson,
515 U.S. 900 (1995) 22

NAACP Spring Valley Branch v. E. Ramapo Cent. Sch. Dist.,
462 F. Supp. 3d 368 (S.D.N.Y. 2020) 46

Overstock.com, Inc. v. N.Y. State Dep't of Tax'n & Fin.,
20 N.Y.3d 586 (2013) 17

Parents Involved in Cmty. Schs. v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No.1,
551 U.S. 701 (2007) 6, 30

People v. Barton,
8 N.Y.3d 70 (2006) 48

People v. Foley,
94 N.Y.2d 668 (2000) 44

People v. Watts,
42 N.Y.3d 60 (2024) 43

Pico Neighborhood Ass'n. v. City of Santa Monica, 534 P.3d 54 (2023) 15, 40

Portugal v. Franklin Cnty.,
530 P.3d 994 (Wash. 2023) ..... Passim

Radogno v. Ill. State Bd. of Elections,
No. 1:11-cv-04884, 2011 WL 5025251 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 21, 2011) 16

Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd.,
520 U.S. 471 (1997) 40

Robinson v. Ardoin,
86 F.4th 574 (5th Cir. 2023) 41

Sanchez v. City of Modesto, 145 Cal. App. 4th 660 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006) ..... Passim

Sheehy v. Big Flats Cmty. Day, Inc.,
73 N.Y.2d 629 (1989) 43

Shelby County v. Holder,
570 U.S. 529 (2013) 45, 46

Singleton v. Allen,
2023 WL 6567895 (N.D. Ala. Oct. 5, 2023) 27, 33

Singleton v. Allen,
690 F. Supp. 3d 1226, 1317 (N.D. Ala. 2023) 41

South Carolina v. Katzenbach,
383 U.S. 301 (1966) 42

Students for Fair Admissions, Inc. v. President & Fellows of Harvard College (SFFA),
600 U.S. 181 (2023) 41, 42, 48

T.D. v. N.Y. State Off. of Mental Health,
91 N.Y.2d 860 (1997) 59

Tex. Dep't of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmty. Project, Inc., 576 U.S. 519 (2015) 30, 36

Thornburg v. Gingles,
478 U.S. 30 (1986) ..... Passim

Town of Huntington v. Huntington Branch, NAACP,
488 U.S. 15 (1988) 33

Town of Huntington v. Park Shore Country Day Camp of Dix Hills, Inc., 61 A.D.2d 1030 (2d Dep't 1978), aff'd, 47 N.Y.2d 61 (1979) 17

United States v. City of Eastpointe,
No. 4:17-CV-10079, 2019 WL 2647355 (E.D. Mich. June 26, 2019) 34

United States v. Village of Port Chester,
704 F. Supp. 2d 411 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) 45

Washington v. Davis,
426 U.S. 229 (1976) 33

White v. Regester,
412 U.S. 755 (1973) 33, 51

Wolpoff v. Cuomo,
80 N.Y.2d 70 (1992) 17

Yumori-Kaku v. City of Santa Clara,
59 Cal. App. 5th 385 (Cal. Ct. App. 2020) 16

Zimmer v. McKeithen,
485 F.2d 1297 (5th Cir. 1973) 14, 39, 51

Rules, Laws & Statutes:

52 U.S.C. § 10301(a) 36, 39, 43, 46

52 U.S.C. § 10303(b) 45

52 U.S.C. § 10310(c)(3).....36

Cal. Elec. Code § 14028(d).....46

Election Law § 17-200.....Passim

Election Law § 17-202.....2, 58

Election Law § 17-204.....5, 23, 36

Election Law § 17-206.....Passim

Election Law § 17-210.....2, 58

Election Law § 17-212.....2, 58

Election Law § 17-222.....52, 59

Additional Authorities:

Christopher S. Elmendorf, Racially Polarized Voting, 83 U. Chi. L. Rev. 587 (2016) 53

D. James Greiner, Ecological Inference in Voting Rights Disputes: Where Are We Now, and Where Do We Want to Be?, 47 Jurimetrics 115 (2007) 50

Jurisdictions Previously Covered by Section 5, U.S. Dep't of Justice (May 17, 2023), https://www.justice.gov/crt/jurisdictions-previously-covered-section-5 45

N.Y. Comm. Rpt. on S. 1046D (N.Y. May 20, 2022) 44

NYCLU & LDF, John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York 2 (2022), https://www.naacpldf.org/wp-content/uploads/NYVRA-White-Paper-NYCLU-LDF-March-2022.pdf 44

Pamela S. Karlan, Maps and Misreadings: The Role of Geographic Compactness in Racial Vote Dilution Litigation, 24 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 173 (1989) 55

Politi wins in Town of Newburgh, Mid-Hudson Times (Nov. 6, 2024), https://www.timeshudsonvalley.com/mid-hudson-times/mid-hudson-times/stories/politi-wins-in-town-of-newburgh,148151 7

Ruth M. Greenwood & Nicholas O. Stephanopoulos, Voting Rights Federalism, 73 Emory L.J. 299 (2023) 25

Section 2 Cases Database, Michigan Law Voting Rights Initiative (2024), https://voting.law.umich.edu/database/ (last accessed Nov. 25, 2024) 45

S. Rep. No. 97-417 (1982) 15, 39, 54

The Evolution of Section 2: Numbers and Trends, Michigan Law Voting Rights Initiative (2024), https://voting.law.umich.edu/findings/ 26

Preliminary Statement

In an action for relief under Election Law §17-206(2)(a)(b)(i), a provision of New York's John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act ("NYVRA"), Plaintiffs Oral Clarke, Romance Reed, Grace Perez, Peter Ramon, Ernest Tirado, and Dorothy Flournoy appeal from an order of the Supreme Court, Orange County (Maria S. Vazquez-Doles, J.), dated November 7, 2024, granting Defendants the Town of Newburgh's ("the Town" or "Newburgh") and the Town Board of the Town of Newburgh's ("the Town Board") motion for summary judgment, declaring the NYVRA facially unconstitutional, and dismissing Plaintiffs' complaint. NYSCEF-Doc-147 (Summ. J. Order) at 2.

Issue Presented

Issue: Like Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act ("federal VRA") as well as state voting rights acts ("state VRAs") across the country, the NYVRA prohibits vote dilution. Building on these voting rights laws, the NYVRA requires proof either that voting is racially polarized in a political subdivision or that the ability of protected class members to elect candidates of their choice is impaired, as well as a showing that a reasonable alternative policy would remedy the vote dilution. Election Law §17-206(2). Is the NYVRA facially unconstitutional in that its every conceivable application would violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution?

Answer: No.

Summary of Argument

Named for civil rights icon (and former Georgia congressman) John R. Lewis, the NYVRA is a landmark New York law that seeks to prevent "the denial or abridgment of the voting rights of members of" all racial and ethnic groups. Election Law §17-200. To this end, the law forbids voter suppression, vote dilution, and voter intimidation, id. §§17-206, 17-212, institutes a system of preclearance, id. §17-210, and directs that electoral rules be construed broadly to protect the franchise, id. §17-202. The NYVRA is one of a growing number of state VRAs enacted by states across the country. These laws provide safeguards for voting rights beyond those supplied by the federal VRA.

Prior to the Supreme Court's decision, courts nationwide had uniformly upheld the constitutionality of state VRAs. The question was an easy one since state VRAs neither classify by race nor require unlawful racial gerrymandering—but do further the vital state interest in stopping racial discrimination in voting. See, e.g., Portugal v. Franklin Cnty., 530 P.3d 994, 1011-12 (Wash. 2023); Sanchez v. City of Modesto, 145 Cal. App. 4th 660, 680-90 (Cal. Ct. App. 2006). In a brief ruling marred by legal errors, however, the Supreme Court shattered this consensus and decreed that the whole NYVRA—including a myriad of provisions not before it—violates the Equal Protection Clause of the federal Constitution. The Court thus ordered the NYVRA "stricken in its entirety from further enforcement and application." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 2.

The Supreme Court took this unprecedented step in an otherwise ordinary case. For decades, minority voters have challenged at-large electoral systems under the federal Constitution and the federal VRA because of their tendency to dilute minority representation. Numerous state VRAs now authorize plaintiffs to bring analogous claims under state law. When these suits succeed, federal and state courts routinely order jurisdictions to replace at-large electoral systems with single-member districts or alternative methods of election, without triggering strict scrutiny. See, e.g., Allen v. Milligan, 599 U.S. 1, 19 (2023) (noting that courts have applied this doctrine "in one ... case after another, to different kinds of electoral systems and to different jurisdictions in States all over the country").

Invoking the NYVRA's prohibition of vote dilution, Plaintiffs—all Black and Latino residents of Newburgh—objected to the Town's at-large system for electing the Town Board. Under this system, no Black or Latino individual has ever been elected to the Town Board, even though more than forty percent of the Town's population is Black or Latino. NYSCEF-Doc-72 (Pls.' Statement of Facts) ¶¶39, 42. The reason the Town's electoral system produces such glaring underrepresentation is that voting in the Town is highly racially polarized. Members of the white majority vote cohesively for certain Town Board candidates (who generally prevail), while Black and Latino voters jointly prefer other Town Board candidates (who universally lose). Id. ¶¶60-64. But this situation is easily rectifiable. If the Town were to switch to any number of other electoral systems, Black and Latino voters would, for the first time, be represented on the Town Board. Id. ¶¶74-79.

The Supreme Court went astray at the beginning of its analysis by allowing Defendants to pursue their facial challenge to the NYVRA. The Court acknowledged the general rule that municipalities and their governing bodies, as creatures of the State, may not attack the State's own laws. But the Court thought Defendants qualified for one of the exceptions to this rule because they "assert that if they are required to comply with the NYVRA ... it will require them to violate the Equal Protection Clause." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 12-13. To trigger this exception, however, it is not enough for a political subdivision merely to assert that it will be compelled to violate some constitutional provision. If it were, then every jurisdiction would make such a claim and the exception would swallow the rule. Instead, the exception applies only when the political subdivision pleads facts supporting its claim and, at the summary judgment stage, shows that a future constitutional violation is, at least, likely to occur. If the violation is "steps removed" and "speculative," then the general rule holds and the jurisdiction lacks capacity to sue. Merola v. Cuomo, 427 F. Supp. 3d 286, 293 (N.D.N.Y. 2019).

Here, the Supreme Court failed to subject Defendants' allusion to a future constitutional injury to any scrutiny at all. Had the Court examined this claim, it would have found it wholly implausible. Defendants' argument is that, if they are found liable under the NYVRA, they will be forced to design one or more districts that are illegal under federal racial-gerrymandering doctrine. But if liability does arise, and if Defendants are unwilling to cure the violation on their own, the NYVRA includes a precaution aimed at preventing the judicial imposition of unlawful districts. "[A]n appropriate remedy" should take into account whether "members of a protected class are geographically compact or concentrated." Election Law §17-206(2)(c)(viii). If these individuals are spatially dispersed, a court-ordered district should not zig and zag to take them in. The NYVRA also contemplates "alternative method[s] of election" as relief, id. §17-206(5)(a)(ii), such as "ranked-choice voting, cumulative voting, and limited voting," id. §17-204(3). These electoral systems cannot possibly be racial gerrymanders since they involve no district-drawing in the first place.

The Supreme Court's constitutional holding—that a law fighting racial discrimination in voting somehow offends the federal Equal Protection Clause—is still more problematic. The Court applied strict scrutiny to the NYVRA on the ground that it "classifies people according to their race, color and national origin." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 16. Remarkably, however, the Court never specified the statutory provision(s) it believed to be racial classifications. The Court did not name them because it could not have done so. The NYVRA refers to race-related concepts but nothing in it classifies by race. This would have been apparent had the Court mentioned the definition of a racial classification—another omission from its opinion. A racial classification is a provision that distributes burdens or benefits to individuals on the basis of their race. See, e.g., Parents Involved in Cmty. Schs. v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No.1, 551 U.S. 701, 720 (2007). No element of the NYVRA meets this definition because none allocates anything to individuals—as opposed to jurisdictions—and none hinges on anyone's race per se.

In support of its view that the NYVRA classifies by race, the Supreme Court stated that "[a] person can only seek relief on the basis of their race, color or national origin." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 16. But this description of the statute is incorrect. The law actually says that "[a]ny aggrieved person"—of any race—can bring a vote dilution claim. Election Law §17-206(4) (emphasis added). Moreover, if the Court meant that the NYVRA is subject to strict scrutiny because plaintiffs of the same race often (though hardly always) sue pursuant to it, this stance would threaten huge swaths of antidiscrimination law. Plaintiffs of the same race also typically bring claims under the federal VRA, state VRAs, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the Fair Housing Act, and many other antidiscrimination statutes. All these laws would be in danger under the Court's reasoning.

Even when the Supreme Court applied strict scrutiny to the NYVRA, it did so with a thumb on the scale. First, the Court refused to credit the indisputably compelling interest that motivates the statute: preventing racial discrimination in voting. The Court complained that it was "unable to find [this interest] within [the law's] text." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 17. But the NYVRA's very first section declares that the statute seeks to halt "the denial or abridgement of the voting rights of [protected class] members." Election Law §17-200. This "denial or abridgement" is a synonym for racial discrimination in voting. And even if the law were not so explicit, there is no drafting guide the Legislature must follow. A state interest must be considered even if it has to be inferred rather than copied verbatim. The Court also objected that liability may arise under the NYVRA without proof of past discrimination. NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 17-18. But this has no legal bearing. Past discrimination is not an element of a vote dilution claim under the federal VRA either. In fact, eliminating the need to show that the challenged practice "was adopted ... with the intent to discriminate against minority voters" was precisely why Congress amended Section 2 of the federal VRA in 1982. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 44 (1986).

Second, the Supreme Court's tailoring discussion was curious. Because the Court declined to recognize any state interest, it had to evaluate the NYVRA's fit in the abstract. The Court thus opined on the "breadth" of the statute's remedies, which did not seem "'narrow'" to the Court "in any sense of that word." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 20. But this is not how tailoring is assessed. The task requires identifying a state interest, and cannot be performed without doing so, since the issue is whether a law is too under- or over-inclusive in its promotion of that interest. If a court cannot think of an interest served by a law, the correct response is to terminate the inquiry—not to analyze the law's tailoring untethered from any goal the law might be trying to achieve.

And third, the Supreme Court mistakenly ascribed constitutional significance to the NYVRA's modest divergence from the Gingles framework that governs vote dilution claims under the federal VRA. Id. at 21-25. To know the Court was wrong, one merely has to read Gingles. The federal Constitution is never cited in the thirty-plus pages of the United States Reports in which the Gingles prongs are introduced. 478 U.S. at 42-74. This is because the U.S. Supreme Court adopted the first Gingles prong, in particular—the only one absent from the NYVRA—for a prudential, not a constitutional, reason. The Court thought that majority-minority districts would usually be the remedies in federal vote dilution cases, and it wanted to ensure that such districts could feasibly be created. Id. at 50 n.17. In any event, the NYVRA includes a requirement that functionally parallels the first Gingles prong. To establish liability, plaintiffs must prove that one or more alternative policies exist that would improve their representation relative to the status quo.

Finally, and most troublingly, the Supreme Court purported to invalidate the entire NYVRA. NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 2, 25. But the NYVRA is a sprawling statute with many different provisions, of which only one—the prohibition of vote dilution through an at-large method of election in Election Law §17-206(2)(b)(i)—is implicated in this case. The Court had no authority to address other aspects of the statute: the prohibitions of voter suppression and voter intimidation, the institution of preclearance, the construction of electoral rules, and so on. By nullifying all these elements with nary a word of explanation, the Court failed to heed the "fundamental principle of our jurisprudence that the power of a court ... is limited to[] determining the rights of persons which are actually controverted in a particular case pending before the tribunal." Matter of Hearst Corp. v. Clyne, 50 N.Y.2d 707, 713 (1980).

This Court should therefore reverse the Supreme Court's order, deny Defendants' motion for summary judgment, and remand this case for further proceedings on Plaintiffs' vote dilution claims.

Factual and Procedural Background

Plaintiffs are residents of, and registered voters in, the Town of Newburgh. NYSCEF-Doc-72 ¶¶1-18. Clarke, Reed, and Flournoy are Black; Perez, Ramon, and Tirado are Latino. Id. The Town is a political subdivision of the State of New York. Id. ¶19. The Town's governance authority is the Town Board, whose current members are Town Supervisor Gil Piaquadio and Board members Paul Ruggiero, Scott Manley, and Anthony LoBiondo. Id. ¶¶20-22. A vacant seat will be filled by Jim Politi, a white Republican who defeated a Black Democrat in a recent special election. Id. ¶23; see also Politi wins in Town of Newburgh, Mid-Hudson Times (Nov. 6, 2024), https://www.timeshudsonvalley.com/mid-hudson-times/mid-hudson-times/stories/politi-wins-in-town-of-newburgh,148151. Board members are elected through at-large elections. Id. ¶24.

On January 26, 2024, Plaintiffs sent a letter to the Town Clerk advising that the Town's at-large system of elections violated the NYVRA. Id. ¶27. On March 15, 2024, the Town Board adopted a resolution to investigate Plaintiffs' allegations. Id. ¶29. Because the Town Board's response did not satisfy Election Law §17-206(7), it did not trigger the NYVRA's "safe harbor" provisions, and Plaintiffs subsequently filed suit. NYSCEF-Doc-31. Defendants previously appealed the Supreme Court's denial of their motion to dismiss. Docket No. 2024-04378. That appeal was heard on October 1, 2024, and the parties are awaiting a decision from this Court.

The Black and Hispanic populations in the Town have grown significantly in recent decades. While they comprised only 6.6% of the population combined in 1980, at present, 15.4% identify as Black and 25.2% as Hispanic. NYSCEF-Doc-72

¶¶33-39. The Town's government has not adapted to reflect Newburgh's changing demographics. In particular, there has never been a Black or Hispanic member of the Town Board. Id. ¶42.

There is extensive evidence that the Town's at-large election system dilutes the electoral influence of Black and Hispanic voters. Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Matt Barreto, analyzed dozens of elections using court-approved techniques and reported a "clear, consistent, and statistically significant finding of racially polarized voting in the Town of Newburgh." Id. ¶¶48-64. Specifically, he found that "Latino and Black voters are cohesive in local elections for Town [Board]," but that these voters' preferred candidates "typically receive very low rates of support from white voters, who effectively block [them] from winning office." Id. Dr. Barreto also opined that various alternative election systems would provide Black and Hispanic voters with a reasonable opportunity to elect candidates of their choice. Id. ¶¶74-79. He identified multiple viable district plans that would improve Black and Hispanic voters' representation by their preferred candidates. Id. Defendants' rebuttal expert, Professor Brad Lockerbie, did not dispute Dr. Barreto's analysis and reached no conclusions regarding racially polarized voting. Id. ¶¶67-73.

There is a long history of discrimination in New York, Orange County, and the Town affecting Black and Hispanic residents. Id. ¶¶80-82. Black and Hispanic people were excluded from the housing market through restrictive covenants. Id.

¶33. They were excluded from the political process through English-literacy requirements, racial gerrymandering, a lack of Spanish-language information and interpreters, and other barriers. Id. ¶¶80-81. The consequences of this historical and ongoing discrimination are stark: on average, Black and Hispanic residents of the Town experience significantly worse outcomes than white residents across most socioeconomic indicators. Id. ¶¶91-96.

There have been numerous high-profile racial incidents within the Town. In 1992, members of the Ku Klux Klan and neo-Nazi groups hosted a rally at a local businessman's property. Id. ¶83. There was a counterprotest in the neighboring City of Newburgh, but no reported response in or by the Town. Id. In 2012, a Black Town employee filed a lawsuit alleging that his supervisors created a racially hostile work environment. Id. ¶¶87-90. The lawsuit quickly settled, and four years later, one of the employees named in the 2012 complaint was again accused of racial discrimination. Id. And after Orange County declared a state of emergency in 2023 due to the arrival of around sixty asylum seekers, elected officials promoted a story that these individuals were displacing homeless veterans at a local hotel, even though the story was fabricated (as the hotel's manager quickly confirmed). Id. ¶¶111-18. The Town later sued the hotel based on alleged zoning violations, arguing that housing "single male asylum seekers from the City of New York will result in potential disaster." Id.

The Town has been nonresponsive to the needs and interests of Black and Hispanic residents. The Town does not provide information to residents in Spanish, except for a notice regarding mosquito-borne viruses issued after this litigation commenced. Id. ¶41. Town officials supported expanding a power plant over the opposition of racial justice advocates who raised concerns about the environmental and health impacts on communities of color. Id. ¶¶104-110. And the Town has offered no justification for maintaining its at-large election system—a system widely adopted historically to reduce the political strength of minority voters—beyond its assertion that it "has relied on [at-large elections] since at least 1865." Id. ¶¶43-47.

Legal Background

"The essence of a [vote dilution] claim," the U.S. Supreme Court explained in Gingles, "is that a certain electoral law, practice, or structure interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by [voters of different races or ethnicities] to elect their preferred representatives." 478 U.S. at 47. Like Section 2 of the federal VRA, the NYVRA's prohibition of vote dilution, Election Law §17-206(2), directly targets the diminution of a protected class's electoral influence due to a specific electoral practice. Section 17-206(2) is broadly similar to Section 2 though it diverges from the federal model in certain particulars.

When a jurisdiction (like the Town) uses an at-large electoral system, the NYVRA authorizes two kinds of vote dilution claims. First, plaintiffs may show that the "voting patterns of members of the protected class within the political subdivision are racially polarized" from the voting patterns of other members of the electorate. Id. §17-206(2)(b)(i)(A). Social scientists rely on several techniques to measure racial polarization in voting, including King's ecological inference and ecological inference RxC. NYSCEF-Doc-72 ¶¶52-53. These methods generate estimates of the proportion of each racial or ethnic group that supported a given candidate in a given election. When members of the protected class vote cohesively for certain candidates, while other members of the electorate vote cohesively for other candidates, voting is racially polarized. See, e.g., Gingles, 478 U.S. at 52-74.

Second, instead or in addition, plaintiffs may show that, "under the totality of the circumstances, the ability of members of the protected class to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcome of elections is impaired." Election Law §17-206(2)(b)(i)(B). The "factors that may be considered," listed in the next subsection, focus on historical and ongoing racial discrimination both within and outside the political process. Id. §17-206(3). This list strongly resembles both the one used in vote dilution litigation under the federal Constitution, see, e.g., Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297, 1305 (5th Cir. 1973), and the one set forth by the U.S.

Senate in the crucial report that accompanied Section 2's revision in 1982, see S. Rep. No. 97-417, at 28-29 (1982).

Under either of these theories, plaintiffs must also prove that one or more reasonable alternative policies exist that would improve the protected class's representation relative to the status quo.[1] This element follows from the NYVRA's description of the "[p]rohibition against vote dilution." Election Law §17-206(2). A challenged practice only "ha[s] the effect" of "impairing" a protected class's electoral influence "as a result of vote dilution" if, under some other reasonable policy, the protected class would be better represented than it currently is. Id. §17-206(2)(a) (emphasis added). Construing the highly similar language of the California Voting Rights Act ("California VRA"), the California Supreme Court agreed that a vote dilution plaintiff "must identify a reasonable alternative voting practice to the existing ... system that will serve as the benchmark 'undiluted' voting practice." Pico Neighborhood Ass'n. v. City of Santa Monica, 534 P.3d 54, 65 (2023) (internal quotation marks omitted). This element, the court held, was required by the California VRA's use of the terms "impairs" and "dilution." Id. at 313-15. These terms are also part of—and pivotal to—the NYVRA. Election Law §17-206(2)(a).

[1] Defendants agree that this is an element of any vote dilution claim. NYSCEF-Doc-70 at 11, 21-24.

The NYVRA's reasonable-alternative-policy requirement plays the same role as Gingles's first prong. That prong asks whether the protected class is "sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district." 478 U.S. at 50. If so, then that hypothetical district is one plausible remedy for the protected class's dilution. Likewise, if the NYVRA's reasonable-alternative-policy requirement is satisfied, then at least one viable vote dilution remedy exists. Unlike Gingles's first prong, the NYVRA's reasonable-alternative-policy requirement itself does not mention compactness. But a separate provision states that "an appropriate remedy" should consider "whether members of a protected class are geographically compact or concentrated." Election Law §17-206(2)(c)(viii). Like Gingles's first prong, this clause discourages the remedial use of oddly-shaped districts that bring together far-flung protected class members.

Federal and state courts have uniformly held that state VRAs mirroring the NYVRA do not facially violate the federal Constitution. See, e.g., Higginson v. Becerra, 786 F. App'x. 705, 706-07 (9th Cir. 2019) (California VRA); Radogno v. Ill. State Bd. of Elections, No. 1:11-cv-04884, 2011 WL 5025251, at *8 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 21, 2011) (Illinois Voting Rights Act); Portugal, 530 P.3d at 1011-12 (Washington Voting Rights Act ("Washington VRA")); Yumori-Kaku v. City of Santa Clara, 59 Cal. App. 5th 385, 426-28 (Cal. Ct. App. 2020) (California VRA); Sanchez, 145 Cal. App. 4th at 680-90 (same). These courts have recognized that state VRAs do not classify by race and so are not subject to strict scrutiny. See, e.g., Sanchez, 145 Cal. App. 4th at 680-83. The courts have further explained that judicially mandated remedies for vote dilution are constitutional unless they are unlawfully racially-gerrymandered districts (in which case they may be challenged on an as-applied basis). See, e.g., id. at 688-90.

Standard of Review

"It is well settled that facial constitutional challenges are disfavored." Overstock.com, Inc. v. N.Y. State Dep't of Tax'n & Fin., 20 N.Y.3d 586, 593 (2013). "Legislative enactments enjoy a strong presumption of constitutionality," and "parties challenging a duly enacted statute face the initial burden of demonstrating the statute's invalidity beyond a reasonable doubt." LaValle v. Hayden, 98 N.Y.2d 155, 161 (2002) (internal quotation marks omitted). "Moreover, courts must avoid, if possible, interpreting a presumptively valid statute in a way that will needlessly render it unconstitutional." Id. Instead, courts may only declare a statute facially unconstitutional after "every reasonable mode of reconciliation of the statute with the Constitution has been resorted to, and reconciliation has been found impossible." Wolpoff v. Cuomo, 80 N.Y.2d 70, 78 (1992). The Supreme Court's constitutional ruling is a pure question of law reviewed de novo. Cf. Town of Huntington v. Park Shore Country Day Camp of Dix Hills, Inc., 61 A.D.2d 1030 (2d Dep't 1978), aff'd, 47 N.Y.2d 61 (1979).

Argument

I Defendants Lack Capacity to Challenge the NYVRA.

The Supreme Court should never have reached the merits of Defendants' facial constitutional challenge to the NYVRA. It is well-settled that "municipalities ... and their officers lack capacity to mount constitutional challenges to ... State legislation." City of New York v. State, 86 N.Y.2d 286, 289 (1995). The Court held that Defendants qualified for an exception to this rule based solely on their assertion that compliance with the NYVRA would force them to violate the federal Equal Protection Clause. A political subdivision's self-interested say-so, however, is not enough to trigger the so-called "dilemma exception." Rather, it must be likely that a jurisdiction will be compelled to violate a clear constitutional proscription if the jurisdiction is not allowed to proceed with its suit.

Here, it is highly implausible that Defendants will be ordered to draw unlawfully racially-gerrymandered districts because of this litigation. The NYVRA includes safeguards against this outcome. The statute also authorizes numerous remedies that cannot be racial gerrymanders. And in all state VRA cases to date, no losing jurisdiction has ever been obliged to racially gerrymander. Defendants never state why they would conduct illegal activity that, until now, every losing jurisdiction has managed to avoid.

i. The Dilemma Exception Applies Only if Defendants Are Likely to Be Forced to Violate a Clear Constitutional Proscription.

The Supreme Court began its capacity analysis on the right track by recognizing "the doctrine of no capacity to sue by municipal corporate bodies" like the Town. NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 11. But the Court misconstrued the exception to this rule that applies when "municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription." Jeter v. Ellenville Cent. Sch. Dist., 41 N.Y.2d 283, 287 (1977). In the Court's view, successfully invoking this exception requires nothing more than saying the right words. This understanding explains why the Court's discussion of the exception was so brief. The Court noted that "Defendants assert that if they are required to comply with the NYVRA ... it will require them to violate the Equal Protection Clause." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 12-13. The Court then immediately deemed the exception applicable. Id.

But the Court's conclusion was too hasty. To begin with, to invoke the dilemma exception properly, a party must plead the exception specifically and, more importantly, plead facts to support the claim. See, e.g., Bd. of Educ. of Mt. Sinai Union Free Sch. Dist. v. N.Y. State Teachers Ret. Sys., 60 F.3d 106, 112 (2d Cir. 1995). But Defendants neither pled the exception specifically nor identified any facts demonstrating that, if this case continues, they will have to choose between complying with a Court order and violating a constitutional proscription. NYSCEF-

Doc-34 at 26. This alone suffices to establish Defendants' incapacity to mount their facial constitutional challenge.

Under relevant precedent, moreover, the Supreme Court was required to evaluate Defendants' assertion, not simply to accept it at face value. One aspect of this evaluation should have been determining if the scenario imagined by Defendants is likely—or if, instead, it is "steps removed" and "speculative." Merola, 427 F. Supp. 3d at 293. In Merola, a county clerk challenged a law that expanded the forms of identification that could be used to obtain a driver's license. Id. at 289. The clerk argued that he had capacity to bring this suit because the law would compel him to violate New York's "prohibition against disenfranchisement." Id. at 293. If ineligible voters secured driver's licenses, and if these individuals later voted, then "watering down the vote with ineligible voters who fraudulently register [would] disenfranchise[] lawful voters." Id. at 293 n.7. Unlike the Supreme Court, the Merola court assessed the plausibility of this sequence of events and found it too unlikely to satisfy the dilemma exception. Id. at 293.

Relatedly, the Supreme Court should have scrutinized the substantive merits of Defendants' assertion. If the claim was "not persuasive" or "unconvincing," the Court should have applied the usual rule. Cnty. of Nassau v. State, 32 Misc.3d 709, 713-14 (Sup. Ct., Albany County [Michael C. Lynch, J.] 2011). In County of Nassau, a county objected to a law that required it to use certain electronic voting machines.

Id. The county maintained that this requirement would force it to violate New York's constitution. Id. Unlike the Supreme Court, the County of Nassau court carefully examined these supposedly looming constitutional infringements. Id. Concluding that New York's constitution would not, in fact, be breached, the court ruled that the county lacked capacity to sue. Id. The Appellate Division, Third Department, affirmed this judgment. County of Nassau v. State of New York, 100 A.D.3d 1052 (3d Dep't 2012).

The Supreme Court should further have considered the clarity of the relevant constitutional command. "New York courts have interpreted constitutional proscriptions to [mean] something expressly forbidden"—as opposed to something whose invalidity becomes evident only after extensive study. Blakeman v. James, No.2:24-cv-1655, 2024 WL 3201671, at *14 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 4, 2024) (emphasis added and cleaned up). In Blakeman, a county disputed a directive from the New York Attorney General to rescind a policy that barred transgender women from participating in certain sporting events on county property. Id. at *3. The county averred that it would violate the federal Equal Protection Clause if it had to abandon this policy because the county would then transgress "the constitutional rights of women as a protected class." Id. at *14. Reasoning that the Equal Protection Clause does not clearly (or even likely) suggest a violation in this situation, the court held that the county could not continue its suit. Id.

Under the case law on the dilemma exception, then, the Supreme Court should have addressed the likelihood that Defendants will be forced to draw unlawfully racially-gerrymandered districts, the substantive merits of this argument, and the clarity of racial-gerrymandering doctrine. But the Court did none of this. It merely cited Defendants' assertion of a future constitutional violation and held this claim sufficed to trigger the exception. This was a pure error of law that warrants reversal.

ii. Defendants Are Virtually Certain Not to Be Forced to Violate a Clear Constitutional Proscription.

Had the Supreme Court performed the requisite analysis, the inapplicability of the dilemma exception would have been apparent. Start with the likelihood that Defendants will be compelled to racially gerrymander in defiance of the federal Equal Protection Clause. For this unwelcome outcome to arise, the following things would have to happen: First, Defendants would need to be found liable for vote dilution. Second, they would need to be unable or unwilling to cure the dilution themselves. Third, the Court would need to select single-member districts as a remedy. And fourth, the Court would need to order the use of at least one unlawfully racially-gerrymandered district, that is, a district drawn predominantly and unjustifiably with a racial motive. See Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916 (1995). The sheer number of acts between the present and the potential future offense is enough to make that violation "steps removed" and "speculative." Merola, 427 F.

Supp. 3d at 293. Notably, this chain of events is substantially longer than the one deemed too implausible in Merola.

But the improbability of a future racial-gerrymandering violation here stems from more than the length of the causal chain. Focus on the chain's third step: the Supreme Court's choice of single-member districts as a remedy. To reiterate, the NYVRA explicitly contemplates remedies other than single-member districts, including ranked-choice voting, cumulative voting, and limited voting. See Election Law §§17-204(3), 17-206(5)(a)(ii). Plaintiffs' expert also studied ranked-choice voting and cumulative voting in the Newburgh context and determined that both systems would provide Black and Latino voters with an opportunity to elect candidates of their choice in Town Board elections. NYSCEF-Doc-72 ¶¶74, 78-79. These alternative methods of election cannot constitute unlawful racial gerrymandering because "[a] racial gerrymandering claim ... applies to the boundaries of individual districts." Ala. Legis. Black Caucus v. Alabama (ALBC), 575 U.S. 254, 262 (2015). It does not apply to an electoral system that involves no district-drawing at all.

To break the chain between the present and the potential future offense, then, all the Supreme Court would have to do is order an alternative method of election as a remedy. (Assuming the Court even got to that point after first finding liability and then being unsatisfied with any party's proposed relief.) But say the Court nevertheless decided to order the use of districts. Even at this fourth step in the chain, the odds of the Court requiring unlawfully racially-gerrymandered district(s) are exceedingly low. For one thing, Plaintiffs would not support such districts. Plaintiffs are keenly aware of the federal courts' racial-gerrymandering jurisprudence and would object at once to proposed remedial districts that prioritized race above traditional redistricting criteria. Not only are such districts presumptively illegal, they are also unnecessary to cure the vote dilution in the Town. Plaintiffs' expert submitted multiple maps of districts that comply with traditional criteria and would give Black and Latino voters an opportunity to elect candidates of their choice in Town Board elections. NYSCEF-Doc-72 ¶¶75-77.

Additionally, as flagged earlier, the NYVRA affirmatively discourages the imposition of remedial districts that might be unlawfully racially-gerrymandered. The law states that "whether members of a protected class are geographically compact or concentrated … may be a factor in determining an appropriate remedy." Election Law §17-206(2)(c)(viii). This language implies that, where minority members live close to one another, a reasonably shaped district encompassing this minority population is a viable remedy. But where minority members are not geographically clustered, a "bizarrely shaped" district winding hither and thither to find dispersed minority members is not a suitable cure. Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 979 (1996) (plurality opinion). The drawing of such a district, then, is overtly deterred by the NYVRA.

The efficacy of these precautions against racial gerrymandering is revealed by the impressive record of other state VRAs (which contain comparable provisions). Hundreds of political subdivisions have been required to switch from at-large elections to single-member districts under other state VRAs. See Ruth M. Greenwood & Nicholas O. Stephanopoulos, Voting Rights Federalism, 73 Emory L.J. 299, 329 (2023). Yet "not a single district created to remedy or avoid a [state VRA] violation has been found to be an illegal racial gerrymander." Id. In fact, only one suit has even alleged that any districts drawn because of state VRAs are unlawful, and it was dismissed due to its "fail[ure] to plausibly state that [the plaintiff] is a victim of racial gerrymandering." Higginson, 786 F. App'x at 706.

Defendants might respond that any remedy for their vote dilution would necessarily be unconstitutional. This response would indeed shorten the chain between the present and the potential future offense. But it would do so at the cost of becoming "not persuasive" and "unconvincing," Cnty. of Nassau, 32 Misc.3d at 713, and thus still not a valid basis for capacity to bring this challenge. Voting rights history again poses an insuperable obstacle for the categorical claim that any relief for vote dilution inherently violates the Equal Protection Clause. As just noted, hundreds of jurisdictions have been obliged to convert from at-large elections to single-member districts under other state VRAs. Hundreds more have been forced to do so under the federal Constitution and the federal VRA. See, e.g., The Evolution of Section 2: Numbers and Trends, Michigan Law Voting Rights Initiative (2024), https://voting.law.umich.edu/findings/. If Defendants' categorical theory were correct, then all of these conversions were unlawful because all of them took place due to legal claims that refer to race. In reality, though, no such conversion has been reversed simply because it was a cure for vote dilution. Courts have nullified vote dilution remedies only when they amounted to illegal racial gerrymanders. But as explained above, that prospect is remote here.

In case more evidence is needed against this categorical theory, the U.S. Supreme Court supplied it just last year. In Allen, the Court affirmed a federal district court's ruling that Alabama's congressional plan likely violated Section 2 of the federal VRA. Among other things, Alabama echoed Defendants by arguing that the federal Constitution "does not authorize race-based redistricting as a remedy for § 2 violations." 599 U.S. at 41. The Court emphatically rejected this claim. "[F]or the last four decades, this Court and the lower federal courts ... have authorized race-based redistricting as a remedy for state districting maps that violate § 2." Id. (emphasis added). Sure enough, on remand, what Defendants (wrongly) say is inherently unlawful is exactly what happened. Alabama was compelled to use a congressional plan that includes a second district in which Black voters have the opportunity to elect their preferred candidate. See Singleton v. Allen, Nos. 2:21-cv-1291-AMM, 2:21-cv-1530-AMM, 2023 WL 6567895, at *16 (N.D. Ala. Oct. 5, 2023).

Finally, recall that the exception to the no-capacity rule applies only when a constitutional proscription "expressly forbid[s]" an action "along the lines of 'no (blank) shall (blank).'" Merola, 427 F. Supp. 3d at 292. Compared to this archetype, racial-gerrymandering doctrine is highly opaque. To determine if race predominated over other factors, a court must consider a vast array of material: "direct evidence of legislative intent, circumstantial evidence of a district's shape and demographics, or a mix of both." Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 291 (2017) (internal quotation marks omitted). If a jurisdiction defends a district on the ground that its rationale was partisan, not racial, a plaintiff should (but does not need) to submit an alternative map showing that this partisan goal could have been achieved by districts with different racial compositions. See Alexander v. S.C. State Conf. NAACP, 602 U.S. 1, 34-35 (2024).

And when a court concludes that race did predominate in a district's design, the inquiry is still not over. This only means the district is subject to strict scrutiny and so presumptively unconstitutional. At this stage, the most common interests invoked by jurisdictions are compliance with Section 2 or Section 5 of the federal VRA. See, e.g., Cooper, 581 U.S. at 292. When one of these interests is proffered, a court asks whether a jurisdiction had a "strong basis in evidence" for believing that the federal VRA required its action. See, e.g., ALBC, 575 U.S. at 278. To decide a racial-gerrymandering case, then, a court must often master not just that body of law but also the equally complicated precedent interpreting the federal VRA. Little wonder the Court's last racial-gerrymandering decision filled a hundred pages of the United States Reports. See Alexander, 602 U.S. at 1-100.

Accordingly, it stretches matters past their breaking point to say that the Equal Protection Clause "expressly forbid[s]" race-conscious redistricting. Merola, 427 F. Supp. 3d at 292. Since the 1990s, that provision has been construed to prohibit individual districts that run afoul of the elaborate framework outlined above. That framework is the opposite of a clear command: a byzantine doctrine whose implications are often anything but obvious.

II The NYVRA Is Facially Constitutional.

Turning to the merits of Defendants' attack on the NYVRA,[2] it should fail just as all other challenges to the constitutionality of state VRAs and Section 2 of the federal VRA have ultimately fallen short. Like these laws, the NYVRA employs no racial classifications. It refers to race-related concepts but it never classifies by race. The statute is therefore subject to rational basis review, which it easily survives. Moreover, even if strict scrutiny did apply to the NYVRA, it would still be valid. Its two theories of vote dilution—one based on racially polarized voting, the other on circumstances of historical and ongoing racial discrimination—are narrowly tailored to furthering the compelling state interest in preventing and remedying racial discrimination in voting. As for the NYVRA's partial divergence from the Gingles framework for vote dilution claims under the federal VRA, it is constitutionally irrelevant. In particular, the absence of an element identical to the first Gingles prong does not give rise to a racial classification. Lastly, everyone agrees that some applications of the NYVRA are lawful—for example, where all elements of a federal VRA claim could be satisfied. For this reason, too, the law's facial nullification was improper.

[2] This section addresses only the NYVRA's vote dilution provision and uses "NYVRA" as shorthand for it. The following section discusses the statute as a whole, which the trial court purported to invalidate.

i. The NYVRA Employs No Racial Classifications.

A. The Supreme Court Failed to Identify Any Racial Classifications.

The central constitutional issue in this case is whether the NYVRA classifies by race. Under the Equal Protection Clause, laws that employ racial classifications are subject to strict scrutiny. See, e.g., Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 506 (2005). By contrast, laws that do not employ racial (or other suspect) classifications are not subject to that "degree of critical examination" and are instead reviewed under the "relatively relaxed" standard known as "rational basis review." Mass. Bd. of Ret. v. Murgia, 427 U.S. 307, 314 (1976). One might have expected the Supreme Court to analyze this issue carefully and comprehensively. Instead, the Court announced and justified its conclusion that the NYVRA does racially classify in just one short paragraph. NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 16. And most of this paragraph did not explain how or why the NYVRA racially classifies but rather stated and then repeated the Court's position that it does so. The NYVRA "classifies people according to their race, color and national origin," declared the Court. Id. "For Plaintiffs to suggest that the NYVRA is not a race-based (or national origin-based) statute is simply to deny the obvious" the Court reiterated. Id.

An initial problem with this discussion is that the Supreme Court failed to specify the definition of a racial classification. This definition is critical because only statutes that classify by race are subject to strict scrutiny. Statutes that merely refer to race or are race-conscious are not. See, e.g., Tex. Dep't of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmty. Project, Inc., 576 U.S. 519, 545 (2015) ("[M]ere awareness of race in attempting to solve [race-related] problems ... does not doom that endeavor at the outset."). Fortunately, there is no need to guess the meaning of a racial classification. The U.S. Supreme Court has defined it as a legal provision that (1) distributes burdens or benefits (2) to individuals (3) on the basis of individuals' race. See, e.g., Parents Involved, 551 U.S. at 720 ("[W]hen the government distributes burdens or benefits on the basis of individual racial classifications, that action is reviewed under strict scrutiny."); Crawford v. Board of Educ. of City of Los Angeles, 458 U.S. 527, 537 (1982) (a law "does not embody a racial classification" if "[i]t neither says nor implies that persons are to be treated differently on account of their race").

To be sure, the Supreme Court was not required to show its work. If it had identified a racial classification in the NYVRA, its omission of the definition of a racial classification would have been a minor lapse. But the Court never named the NYVRA provision(s) it believed to be racial classifications. The lone paragraph analyzing this issue did not cite, let alone quote, a single NYVRA clause. This will not do. New York laws are entitled to a "strong presumption of constitutionality." LaValle, 98 N.Y.2d at 161. Before being nullified, their invalidity must be demonstrated "beyond a reasonable doubt." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). These basic principles oblige a court, at least, to point to the provision(s) it thinks warrant strict scrutiny. To subject a statute to the most rigorous review known to constitutional law, without first confirming that such intense oversight is called for, is to show insufficient respect to the coordinate branches of government.

The Supreme Court did claim that, under the NYVRA, "[a] person can only seek relief on the basis of their race, color or national origin." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 16. But this assertion is wrong. The NYVRA provision that governs standing states that "[a]ny aggrieved person"—of any race—may bring a vote dilution claim. Election Law §17-206(4) (emphasis added). There is no racial test here for who may seek relief. Nor does relief depend on anyone's race per se. Instead, a successful vote dilution suit hinges on proof of either racially polarized voting or the impairment of protected class members' ability to elect candidates of their choice, as well as satisfaction of the reasonable-alternative-policy requirement. As explained in the next section, these elements refer to, but do not classify by, race.

Now, it is true that plaintiffs of the same race generally sue under the NYVRA. (Though not always—and not here, for instance, where three plaintiffs are Black and three are Latino.) But this fact about some vote dilution litigation is attributable not to any racial classification but rather to the nature of the legal harm. Vote dilution, well, dilutes the electoral influence of members of one or more protected classes. It stands to reason that only these members typically sue because only their representation is diminished. Other members of the electorate are not "aggrieved" by the challenged electoral practice. Id.

Moreover, suits by plaintiffs of the same race are an utterly ordinary feature of antidiscrimination law. Take Section 2 of the federal VRA. Who usually alleges voter suppression or vote dilution under this provision? Members of the protected class(es) disparately impacted by these policies. See, e.g., Gingles, 478 U.S. at 35 ("black citizens" challenged seven North Carolina districts). Suits by same-race plaintiffs are also commonplace against employers accused of discriminatory hiring practices, see, e.g., Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 426 (1971), and authorities charged with housing discrimination, see, e.g., Town of Huntington v. Huntington Branch, NAACP, 488 U.S. 15, 16 (1988). Suits by same-race plaintiffs are even routine under the Equal Protection Clause, the very provision wielded by the Supreme Court to strike down the NYVRA. See, e.g., Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 232 (1976). The Court's suggestion that laws classify by race if they are often enforced by same-race plaintiffs is thus untenable. That approach would imperil most antidiscrimination statutes as well as, paradoxically, the Equal Protection Clause itself.

The Supreme Court further remarked that the NYVRA's "remedies are ... created based upon those [racial] classifications." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 16. They are not. The law lists various remedies that might be implemented in vote dilution cases, including "a district-based method of election," "an alternative method of election," and "new or revised districting or redistricting plans." Election Law §17-206(5)(a)(i)-(iii). None of these remedies even mentions race, much less classifies by it. These remedies are also identical to the ones imposed for decades under other state VRAs, the federal VRA, and the federal Constitution. See, e.g., White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 765 (1973) (replacing multimember districts with single-member districts); Singleton, 2023 WL 6567895, at *16 (replacing one district plan with another); United States v. City of Eastpointe, No. 4:17-CV-10079, 2019 WL 2647355, at *2 (E.D. Mich. June 26, 2019) (replacing an at-large electoral system with ranked-choice voting). Relief available for decades under other sources of law does not turn into a racial classification when authorized by the NYVRA.

Perhaps the Supreme Court meant that jurisdictions will classify by race in an effort to avoid or cure vote dilution. But this argument does not support strict scrutiny for the NYVRA either. Plainly, for the statute to be subject to such stringent review, the statute must racially classify. Strict scrutiny for the NYVRA does not follow from the alleged future racial classifications of political subdivisions. To illustrate, states sometimes misconstrue Section 2 of the federal VRA and craft districts that are unlawful racial gerrymanders. This results in the judicial invalidation of the illegal districts. But it does not cause Section 2 itself to classify by race, let alone to violate the federal Constitution. To the contrary, in Allen, the U.S. Supreme Court brusquely "reject[ed] Alabama's argument that § 2 ... is unconstitutional." 599 U.S. at 41. In so doing, the Court confirmed that Section 2 must only be "appropriate" to pass constitutional muster—not necessary to achieve a compelling interest, as would be the case if strict scrutiny applied. Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).[3]

Additionally, jurisdictions do not need to classify by race to comply with the NYVRA. They merely have to analyze the elements of vote dilution and, if this analysis indicates that liability is likely, make changes to their electoral system to prevent or remedy the violation. The next section shows that none of these statutory elements is a racial classification. None distributes burdens or benefits to individuals, and none is satisfied by anyone's race as such. Lastly, as other courts have recognized, the possibility that some jurisdictions may act unconstitutionally in the future does not justify strict scrutiny for state VRAs in the present. Instead, the correct approach is for plaintiffs to bring as-applied challenges if and when jurisdictions break constitutional rules (as by unlawfully racially gerrymandering). See, e.g., Portugal, 530 P.3d at 1006 ("Strict scrutiny could certainly be triggered in an as-applied challenge to districting maps that sort voters on the basis of race." (internal quotation marks omitted)); Sanchez, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 844 ("[A]ny district-based remedy [a] court might impose ... would be subject to analysis under the [racial-gerrymandering] line of cases.").

[3] The Court plainly did not say that Section 2 is subject to strict scrutiny in Abbott v. Perez, 585 U.S. 579 (2018), as Defendants wrongly claimed below. The Court actually said close to the opposite: that a district drawn for a predominantly racial reason "satisfies strict scrutiny" if it is reasonably "necessary in order to comply with the VRA," thanks to the Court's assumption that "complying with the VRA is a compelling state interest." Id. at 587 (emphasis added).

B. No Elements of the NYVRA Classify by Race.

Below, Defendants also tried to find a racial classification in the NYVRA. But their search was futile because state VRAs, "like the [federal] []VRA ... [do] not allocate benefits or burdens on the basis of race or any other suspect classification." Sanchez, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 837. Begin with the NYVRA's references to a "protected class," which "means a class of individuals who are members of a race, color, or language-minority group." Election Law §17-204(5). These are quintessential statutory references to race, which, again, are distinct from racial classifications. See, e.g., Inclusive Cmtys. Project, 576 U.S. at 545. When a law simply mentions race, it does not thereby advantage or handicap anyone on the basis of race.

Significantly, other state VRAs, the federal VRA, and most civil rights statutes refer to race as well. The federal VRA, for instance, prohibits voting discrimination "on account of race," 52 U.S.C. §10301(a), and defines a "language minority group" as "persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives or of Spanish heritage," id. §10310(c)(3). Yet courts have uniformly held that these laws do not classify by race and so do not trigger strict scrutiny. In Allen, the U.S. Supreme Court used the distinctive language of rational basis review when it confirmed the constitutionality of Section 2 of the federal VRA. See 599 U.S. at 41. The Washington Supreme Court similarly rejected the argument that the Washington VRA "makes 'racial classifications' by recognizing the existence of race, color, and language minority groups." Portugal, 530 P.3d at 1006. The court observed that "[n]o authority supports that position," which would mean that "every statute prohibiting racial discrimination ... would be subject to ... strict scrutiny." Id.; see also Sanchez, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 838 (refuting the claim that the California VRA is "subject to strict scrutiny because of its reference to race").

Next, take the NYVRA's element of racially polarized voting between members of the protected class and other members of the electorate. See Election Law §17-206(2)(b)(i)(A). Racially polarized voting refers to the electoral choices of members of different racial and ethnic groups. The concept does not boil down to any voter's race per se. Put differently, racially polarized voting involves voters' behavior, not their racial identity. To be a racial classification, however, the element would have to be (but, in fact, is not) satisfied by voters' race alone.

Furthermore, requiring proof of racially polarized voting is not some innovation of the NYVRA. Rather, it was the U.S. Supreme Court's idea for a precondition for liability in vote dilution cases brought under Section 2 of the federal VRA. In Gingles, the Court made the political cohesiveness of the minority group the second prerequisite for a Section 2 violation and white bloc voting the third prerequisite. See 478 U.S. at 51. Together, the second and third Gingles prongs create a requirement of racially polarized voting. See id. at 52. Consequently, if the NYVRA classifies by race because it asks for a showing of racially polarized voting, then so does Section 2. If the NYVRA is subject to strict scrutiny for this reason, then so is Section 2. To reiterate, though, that conclusion is untenable given Allen. See 599 U.S. at 41; see also Portugal, 530 P.3d at 1010 ("Recognizing the possibility of racially polarized voting is neither novel nor unique to the [Washington VRA]."); Sanchez, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 826 (disagreeing that "the [California VRA] is unconstitutional because it uses 'race' to identify the polarized voting that causes vote dilution").

Now turn to the other kind of vote dilution claim authorized by the NYVRA, based on the impairment of protected class members' ability to elect candidates of their choice under the totality of the circumstances. See Election Law §17-206(2)(b)(i)(B). Most of the relevant circumstances identified by the statute relate to race in some way: for example, a jurisdiction's history of racial discrimination, racial disparities in various areas, and the use of racial appeals in campaigns. See id. §17-206(3). But none of these factors just is anyone's race. None is established by the mere fact that one or more individuals identify with one race or another. A plaintiff who presented only such evidence would get laughed out of court for failing to prove any of the pertinent factors.

Examination of the totality of the circumstances is not some oddity of the NYVRA either. To the contrary, Section 2 of the federal VRA explicitly makes liability contingent on consideration of the relevant factors. "A violation ... is established if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes ... are not equally open to participation by [protected class] members." 52 U.S.C. §10301(b) (emphasis added). The key Senate report about the 1982 amendments to Section 2 also includes a compilation of relevant factors that mirrors the NYVRA's list. See S. Rep. No. 97-417, at 28-29 (1982). And these so-called "Senate factors" were not plucked out of thin air but rather were borrowed nearly verbatim from the circumstances that were evaluated by courts in pre-1982 constitutional vote dilution litigation. See, e.g., Zimmer, 485 F.2d at 1305. Accordingly, if the NYVRA's catalog of race-related factors triggers strict scrutiny, then so does Section 2's parallel list, and so too does that list's constitutional predecessor. But that consequence for Section 2 is precluded by Allen—and that result for the Constitution, which cannot presumptively nullify itself, is nonsensical.

This leaves only the NYVRA's reasonable-alternative-policy requirement, which can be dealt with quickly since Defendants have not tarred it as a racial classification. See Election Law §17-206(2)(a). Again, this requirement entails awareness of race since the election of candidates preferred by protected class members under the status quo must be compared to these candidates' likely success under one or more alternative policies. Being aware of race, though, is different from taking an action because of an individual's race, which the requirement in no way countenances.

And once more, the requirement is not unique to the NYVRA but rather shared with other state VRAs and Section 2 of the federal VRA. Under the California VRA, "a plaintiff must identify a reasonable alternative voting practice ... that will serve as the benchmark 'undiluted' voting practice." Pico Neighborhood Ass'n., 534 P.3d at 65 (internal quotation marks omitted). Under Section 2, likewise, a plaintiff must "postulate a reasonable alternative voting practice," "against which the fact of dilution may be measured." Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 480 (1997). Since these elements do not classify by race, the NYVRA's identical reasonable-alternative-policy requirement does not do so either.

Two last points on this topic: First, the NYVRA also does not racially classify because it distributes no burdens or benefits to individuals. Instead, the statute applies exclusively to political subdivisions, which are the entities that are barred from committing vote dilution. See Election Law §17-206(2)(a) ("No board of elections or political subdivision shall use any [dilutive] method of election."). This language imposes no requirements on any individuals. No individuals are compelled to do anything, nor may individuals be sued. The sole regulated units are political subdivisions. In the related context of partisan vote dilution, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that individual voters have no cognizable interest in "the overall composition of the legislature." Gill v. Whitford, 585 U.S. 48, 68 (2018). Analogously, voters in their individual capacity are neither harmed nor helped by either the presence of racial vote dilution or its remediation.

Second, none of this analysis is affected by the Court's decision in Students for Fair Admissions, Inc. v. President & Fellows of Harvard College (SFFA), 600 U.S. 181 (2023). In SFFA, the Court in no way altered its longstanding definition of a racial classification. In fact, the Court did not even mention this definition. SFFA involved a quintessential racial classification: an affirmative action policy that advantaged individual minority applicants to an elite university because of their race. See id. at 208 ("These cases involve whether a university may make admissions decisions that turn on an applicant's race."). Precisely because the affirmative action context is so far removed from this one, courts have consistently declined to extend SFFA to voting rights cases. See, e.g., Robinson v. Ardoin, 86 F.4th 574, 593 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Drawing a comparison between voting redistricting and affirmative action occurring at Harvard is a tough analogy."); Singleton v. Allen, 690 F. Supp. 3d 1226, 1317 (N.D. Ala. 2023) ("[A]ffirmative action cases ... are fundamentally unlike this [federal VRA] case.").

ii. The NYVRA Is Narrowly Tailored to Preventing and Remedying Racial Discrimination in Voting.

A. The Supreme Court Wrongly Refused to Consider the State Interest Furthered by the NYVRA

Even if strict scrutiny somehow did apply to the NYVRA, the statute would still be constitutional. To survive strict scrutiny, a law must further a compelling state interest, and the law must be narrowly tailored to serve that interest. See, e.g., SFFA, 600 U.S. at 206-07. Here, the state interest advanced by the NYVRA—as well as by other state VRAs and the federal VRA—is preventing and remedying racial discrimination in voting. No one disputes that this is a vital goal. It is the same one that motivated the Fifteenth Amendment itself. The U.S. Supreme Court has also characterized "racial discrimination in voting" as an "insidious and pervasive evil" that may be addressed through "sterner and more elaborate measures." South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 308-09 (1966).

Nevertheless, the Supreme Court refused to consider the NYVRA's objective because it could not locate it in the statutory text. "[T]he Court is unable to find within [the law's] text" its aim of avoiding and curing racial discrimination in voting. NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 17. "[T]he wording of the NYVRA is devoid of" an articulation of this state interest. Id. But the NYVRA's introductory section states that the statute is intended to stop "the denial or abridgement of the voting rights of members of a race, color, or language-minority group." Election Law §17-200.

Racial discrimination in voting is the archetypal conduct that denies or abridges protected class members' votes. This section adds that the law seeks to "[e]nsure that eligible voters who are members of racial, color, and language-minority groups shall have an equal opportunity to participate in the political processes of the state of New York." Id. §17-200(2). This is another way of saying that the law's aspiration is the end of racial discrimination in voting. In fact, it is the same way that Section 2 of the federal VRA describes its operation. See 52 U.S.C. §10301(b) (Section 2 is violated when protected class members "have less opportunity ... to participate in the political process").

Even if the Supreme Court were right that the NYVRA's purpose is not apparent from its text, the Court was wrong to insist on a textual statement of the statute's goal. A court may neither instruct the Legislature how to write a law nor look askance at a law that deviates from the court's preferred drafting style. See, e.g., Sheehy v. Big Flats Cmty. Day, Inc., 73 N.Y.2d 629, 634 (1989) ("[T]he Legislature has both the right and the authority to select the methods to be used in effectuating its goals, as well as to choose the goals themselves."). New York courts routinely credit state interests that are not directly encoded into statutory language. Unlike the Supreme Court, they do not enforce their own views as to how state interests ought to be communicated. See, e.g., People v. Watts, 42 N.Y.3d 60, 69 (2024) (recognizing a "compelling interest" justifying the Sex Offender Registration Act not specified in the law itself); People v. Foley, 94 N.Y.2d 668, 682 (2000) (recognizing the "primary legislative purpose" of a penal law by consulting the governor's memorandum approving the law).

When the aperture is widened beyond the NYVRA itself, more evidence pours in that the statute hopes to curb—and the State has a problem with—racial discrimination in voting. The committee report on the law states that it "provide[s] strong protections for the franchise at time when voter suppression is on the rise[] [and] vote dilution remains prevalent." N.Y. Comm. Rpt. on S. 1046D (N.Y. May 20, 2022). The report also acknowledges that "New York has an extensive history of discrimination against racial, ethnic, and language minority groups in voting." Id. A white paper confirms that "many discriminatory practices remain in place" in New York, including "at-large election systems, redistricting plans that dilute minority voting strength, polling location plans with too few and/or too inconvenient sites, and failures to provide adequate language assistance." NYCLU & LDF, John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York 2 (2022), https://www.naacpldf.org/wp-content/uploads/NYVRA-White-Paper-NYCLU-LDF-March-2022.pdf. The white paper further explains that the NYVRA "address[es] these pervasive problems," "confront[s] evolving barriers to effective participation," and "root[s] out longstanding discriminatory practices more effectively." Id.

Additionally, several New York counties were covered by Section 5 of the federal VRA prior to Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529 (2013). See Jurisdictions Previously Covered by Section 5, U.S. Dep't of Justice (May 17, 2023), https://www.justice.gov/crt/jurisdictions-previously-covered-section-5. These jurisdictions were placed under federal oversight because of their low participation and use of discriminatory voting practices. See 52 U.S.C. §10303(b). And since Section 2 of the federal VRA took its current form, dozens of New York political subdivisions have been sued for voter suppression and vote dilution. See Section 2 Cases Database, Michigan Law Voting Rights Initiative (2024), https://voting.law.umich.edu/database/ (last accessed Nov. 25, 2024). Some of these suits have been among the highest-profile Section 2 victories in recent years. See, e.g., Clerveaux v. E. Ramapo Cent. Sch. Dist., 984 F.3d 213 (2d Cir. 2021); United States v. Village of Port Chester, 704 F. Supp. 2d 411 (S.D.N.Y. 2010).

The Supreme Court had one more reason for rebuffing the State's interest in preventing and remedying racial discrimination in voting.[4] It is that, under the

[4] The Supreme Court also asserted that "no compelling interest exists in allowing multiple protected classes to aggregate for purposes of proving vote dilution." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 19. But coalition claims are allowed by the NYVRA—and, in most circuits, by the federal VRA—not because the aggregation of protected classes is itself a compelling interest but rather because coalitions of groups may experience vote dilution. Coalition claims are thus a means to the end of NYVRA, liability for vote dilution can arise without a plaintiff "proving past discrimination [against] a protected class." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 17. But statutes rarely make their ultimate objectives explicit elements that need to be satisfied before liability may be imposed. Statutes more commonly rely on elements that are reasonable proxies for, and easier to establish than, their ultimate ends. A court may not disregard the state interest underpinning a law simply because the interest does not have to be demonstrated anew in every suit.

To illustrate, neither Section 2 of the federal VRA nor any other state VRA requires a plaintiff to prove past discrimination to prevail on a vote dilution claim. See, e.g., 52 U.S.C. §10301 (not even mentioning "discrimination"); Cal. Elec. Code §14028(d) ("Proof of an intent ... to discriminate against a protected class is not required." (emphasis added)). Yet no court has ever doubted that these voting rights laws aim to stop racial discrimination in voting. See, e.g., Shelby Cnty., 570 U.S. at 557 (noting the "nationwide ban on racial discrimination in voting found in § 2"). Moreover, there was a brief two-year window in which, because of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980), Section 2 claims stopping racial discrimination in voting, not an end in and of themselves. See, e.g., NAACP Spring Valley Branch v. E. Ramapo Cent. Sch. Dist., 462 F. Supp. 3d 368, 379 (S.D.N.Y. 2020) ("[D]iverse minority groups can be combined to meet VRA litigation requirements." (internal quotation marks omitted)).

---

required proof of intentional discrimination. But Congress "dispositively reject[ed]" this rule when it amended Section 2 in 1982. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 43. Congress "repudiated" the discriminatory intent requirement because it was "unnecessarily divisive," "place[d] an inordinately difficult burden of proof on plaintiffs," and "ask[ed] the wrong question." Id. at 44 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Supreme Court thus faulted the NYVRA for not including an element that has been absent from voting rights doctrine for more than forty years. But it was the Court that erred, not the statute, by turning back the clock.

B. The Supreme Court Wrongly Conducted Its Tailoring Analysis in the Abstract.

After concluding that the NYVRA does not serve a compelling state interest, the Supreme Court should have ended its strict scrutiny analysis. Instead, the Court forged on to the tailoring stage, at which point it examined the fit between the statute and ... nothing at all. Having declined to recognize the law's goal of avoiding and curing racial discrimination in voting, the Court had no end relative to which to evaluate the law's means. The Court therefore discussed the NYVRA's tailoring in the abstract, not with respect to its actual objective. Because the statute's "breadth of remedies" did not seem "narrow" to the Court "in any sense of that word," the Court held that the NYVRA is not narrowly tailored. NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 20.

This approach to tailoring is foreign to equal protection (and every other body of) law. To survive strict scrutiny, a law that classifies by race must be "narrowly tailored—meaning necessary—to achieve that interest." SFFA, 600 U.S. at 207 (internal quotation marks omitted) (emphasis added); see also, e.g., People v. Barton, 8 N.Y.3d 70, 77 (2006) ("[T]he requirement of narrow tailoring is satisfied so long as the ... regulation promotes a substantial government interest." (emphasis added)). That an interest advanced by a law must be identified before the law's tailoring can be assessed is evident from the nature of the inquiry. The inquiry focuses on the degree to which a law is "overinclusive and underinclusive in relation to the state interests [it] purportedly serve[s]." Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 579 (1993) (Blackmun, J., concurring in the judgment) (emphasis added). If those interests are left unsaid, a law's fit with them cannot be determined.

Had the Supreme Court acknowledged the NYVRA's aim of fighting racial discrimination in voting—in particular, vote dilution—the statute's narrow tailoring would have been plain. The "essence" of vote dilution is that an electoral practice "interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by [different racial and ethnic groups] to elect their preferred representatives." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 47. In turn, the "social and historical conditions" that enable vote dilution are racially polarized voting, see id. at 52-74, and/or past and present racial discrimination, see id. at 36-37, 44-45. Racially polarized voting is relevant because, when it is present, protected class members have genuinely preferred candidates whose election is opposed—and typically thwarted—by other members of the electorate with different views. See, e.g., Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40-41 (1993). Racial discrimination matters because it is often the reason why protected class members and other members of the electorate diverge in their electoral preferences. See, e.g., Gingles, 478 U.S. at 70.

Remember that the NYVRA authorizes two kinds of vote dilution claims: one based on racially polarized voting, the other on circumstances mostly involving historical and ongoing racial discrimination, both of which also require a showing of a reasonable alternative policy. The claim based on racially polarized voting corresponds to the "essence" of vote dilution because the "social and historical conditions" that comprise this essence include racially polarized voting. Id. at 47. Consider what a plaintiff who prevails on this type of claim has proven: A vast gulf separates the electoral preferences of protected class members from the views of other members of the electorate. And because of this stark racial divide, protected class members are currently underrepresented—yet could be better represented under a reasonable alternative policy. In this situation, vote dilution is exactly what protected class members experience. They "prefer certain candidates whom they could elect were it not for the interaction of the challenged electoral law or structure with a ... majority that votes as a significant bloc for different candidates." Id. at 68.

Likewise, the claim based on the totality of the circumstances dovetails with the other social and historical condition that constitutes the essence of vote dilution, namely, past and present racial discrimination. A plaintiff who makes out this type of claim has established the following: a protected class was previously the victim of discrimination within and outside the political process; the class continues to suffer from such discrimination; and because of this deplorable record, the class is currently underrepresented yet could be better represented under a reasonable alternative policy. In this scenario, too, vote dilution is precisely what is occurring. The "effects of prior discrimination have combined with the [challenged] electoral structure to afford [protected class members] less opportunity than [other members of the electorate] ... to elect representatives of their choice." Id. at 70.

This type of claim is also linked to the core of vote dilution in another way. Again, racial discrimination often leads to racially polarized voting. See, e.g., id. (noting that "discrimination [can] deter whites from voting for blacks"). Racially polarized voting is sometimes difficult to measure with standard empirical methods, for instance, when the number of precincts is small, there are more than two major racial or ethnic groups, or residential patterns are highly integrated. See, e.g., D. James Greiner, Ecological Inference in Voting Rights Disputes: Where Are We Now, and Where Do We Want to Be?, 47 Jurimetrics 115 (2007). Under these conditions, racial discrimination is a reasonable proxy for racially polarized voting that cannot be directly observed. Racial discrimination supports an inference of racially polarized voting—and as explained above, racially polarized voting in combination with underrepresentation capable of amelioration is the prototypical vote dilution pattern.

One more chain connects this type of claim to vote dilution. Under the Equal Protection Clause, courts decide constitutional vote dilution cases without reference to any of the Gingles prongs. Instead, in these (now rare) cases, courts consider "a panoply of factors, any number of which may contribute to the existence of dilution." Zimmer, 485 F.2d at 1305. These factors revolve around racial discrimination: "the maintenance of racial discrimination," "the existence of past discrimination," and so on. Id.; see also, e.g., White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766-69 (1973) (surveying "the history of official racial discrimination," "the results and effects of invidious discrimination," and the like). The NYVRA's totality-of-circumstances claim thus mirrors the analysis that federal courts commonly conducted prior to the 1982 amendments to Section 2 of the federal VRA—and still perform today, albeit less often. See, e.g., Johnson v. DeSoto Cnty. Bd. of Comm'rs, 204 F.3d 1335, 1343-46

(11th Cir. 2000). The claim must be narrowly tailored, then, given its convergence with the constitutional standard.[5]

iii. The NYVRA's Partial Divergence from the Gingles Framework Is Constitutionally Irrelevant.

The Supreme Court's last constitutional critique of the NYVRA was that the statute does not perfectly replicate the legal framework that applies to claims under Section 2 of the federal VRA. The Court ascribed constitutional significance to the Gingles prongs, in particular, deeming them "applicable to the issue of whether a state voting rights act is violative of the US Constitution." NYSCEF-Doc-147 at 23. Because the NYVRA does not "satisfy the clear standards set forth in Gingles," it "is in violation of federal law and therefore cannot stand." Id. at 25.

The Supreme Court misunderstood the nature and function of the Gingles prongs. They are not derived from, meant to operationalize, or otherwise related to the Constitution, as a perusal of Gingles and subsequent Section 2 cases confirms. Neither in the thirty-plus pages in which Gingles introduced the prongs, nor in any later case, did the U.S. Supreme Court state that the prongs are constitutional in stature. To the contrary, the prongs have two non-constitutional purposes. First, as a group, they are intended to make vote dilution cases less sprawling and more manageable for litigants and courts. See, e.g., Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1010 (1994) (observing that "Gingles provided some structure to the statute's 'totality of circumstances' test"); Christopher S. Elmendorf, Racially Polarized Voting, 83 U. Chi. L. Rev. 587, 589 (2016) ("The Supreme Court understands the Gingles test to ... keep[] vote dilution law manageable.").

[5] If strict scrutiny applies, and if there is doubt about this claim's narrow tailoring, it could also be severed from the claim based on racially polarized voting pursuant to the NYVRA's severability provision. See Election Law §17-222.

Second, the first Gingles prong specifically is based on the Court's assumption about how vote dilution would typically be remedied. This prong requires a minority group to be "sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district." 478 U.S. at 50. The prong thus ensures that, if a violation is found, relief is available in the form of a reasonably-configured majority-minority district. In the Court's words, liability should not arise "[u]nless minority voters possess the potential to elect representatives." Id. at 50 n.17. Moreover, "[t]he single-member district is generally the appropriate standard against which to measure minority group potential to elect." Id.

This proper grasp of the Gingles prongs refutes the Supreme Court's objection to the NYVRA. Since the Gingles prongs are non-constitutional, no state law can run afoul of the federal Constitution merely because it fails to emulate them. But a subtler possibility remains: Could the NYVRA's partial divergence from the Gingles framework undermine either of the earlier arguments about its constitutionality, namely, that it does not classify by race but nevertheless satisfies strict scrutiny?

The answer is no. To see why, it is helpful to nail down exactly how the NYVRA does—and does not—part ways with Section 2 of the federal VRA. First, the NYVRA does not explicitly include the first Gingles prong. However, the statute does require proof of a reasonable alternative policy that would improve the protected class's representation relative to the status quo. This requirement has the same point as the first Gingles prong: ensuring that any violation can viably be remedied.[6] Second, the NYVRA's vote dilution claim based on racially polarized voting incorporates the second and third Gingles prongs. Racially polarized voting is simply the difference between protected class members' support for candidates (the subject of the second prong) and other voters' support for them (the topic of the third). See, e.g., Gingles, 478 U.S. at 52-74 (exclusively addressing "racially polarized voting" after introducing the second and third prongs). And third, the NYVRA's vote dilution claim based on the totality of the circumstances is essentially identical to Section 2's totality-of-circumstances stage. Compare Election Law §17-206(3), with S. Rep. No. 97-417, at 28-29 (1982).

---

[6] The NYVRA also states that geographic compactness—the core of the first Gingles prong—is relevant to "determining an appropriate remedy." Election Law §17-206(2)(c)(viii).

These limited contrasts between the two laws in no way cause the NYVRA to racially classify. As discussed earlier, none of the elements the NYVRA does include is a racial classification. No element can become a racial classification either because the statute omits or amends certain other requirements that are present in federal voting rights doctrine. On its own terms, a legal provision either does or does not distribute burdens or benefits to individuals on the basis of their race. If it does not (like each NYVRA element), then it cannot start doing so due to similarities with, or differences from, some other law.

The contrasts between the NYVRA and the Gingles framework also make the former better tailored to preventing and remedying vote dilution. Take each difference in turn. As has long been recognized, because of the first Gingles prong, a protected class that happens to be geographically dispersed cannot succeed in a claim under Section 2 of the federal VRA. Yet such a class can certainly experience vote dilution, as when voting is racially polarized and the class is underrepresented. See, e.g., Pamela S. Karlan, Maps and Misreadings: The Role of Geographic Compactness in Racial Vote Dilution Litigation, 24 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L. Rev. 173 (1989). The NYVRA (like all other state VRAs) compensates for this limitation of the Gingles framework by allowing liability to arise even when a protected class is geographically noncompact. The statute also avoids problematic remedies in this situation by encouraging the use of alternative methods of election. See Election Law §17-206(2)(c)(viii). These methods, again, cannot be racial gerrymanders because they involve no district-drawing.

Next, vote dilution cannot be tackled under the Gingles framework when a plaintiff cannot establish enough of the factors at the totality-of-circumstances stage. The NYVRA (also like all other state VRAs) responds to this shortcoming by permitting a plaintiff to prevail without having to muster evidence about these myriad factors. It is enough for a plaintiff to prove racially polarized voting and remediable underrepresentation. Notably, Gingles itself supports this revision to its framework. Historical and ongoing discrimination is the crux of the totality-of-circumstances stage. Yet "[f]ocusing on" such discrimination, according to Gingles, "asks the wrong question." 478 U.S. at 73. "All that matters ... under a functional theory of vote dilution is voter behavior, not its explanations." Id.

Lastly, if a plaintiff cannot show the presence of racially polarized voting, the Gingles framework flatly precludes liability. But recall that racially polarized voting can sometimes be difficult to measure for technical reasons, and that, in this scenario, a protected class can still be underrepresented and the victim of past and present discrimination. The NYVRA properly leaves the door open under these unusual conditions, understanding that racially polarized voting is generally—but not necessarily—a hallmark of vote dilution. In this way, too, the statute "provides a more efficient and effective means of prosecuting cases in which [electoral practices] dilute minority voting strength compared to federal law." NYCLU & LDF, supra, at 17.

iv. The NYVRA Cannot Be Facially Nullified Because It Undeniably Has Lawful Applications.

The Supreme Court's invalidation of the NYVRA on its face overlooked still another rule of judicial review. For a statute's "facial nullification" to be appropriate, "the law [must] suffer[] wholesale constitutional impairment" "in every conceivable application." Cohen v. State, 94 N.Y.2d 1, 8 (1999) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also, e.g., McGowan v. Burstein, 71 N.Y.2d 729, 733 (1988) (to show that a law is "per se violative of the State Constitution," "plaintiffs must demonstrate that ... in every conceivable application [it] would be unconstitutional"). In another case involving the NYVRA, Defendants' own counsel conceded that the NYVRA has lawful applications. If the statute is enforced "in line with Section 2 of the VRA ... then there would be no constitutional problem." NYSCEF-Doc-187 at 19, Coads v. Nassau Cnty., No. 611872/2023 (Sup. Ct. Nov. 11, 2024). This admission alone warrants the reversal of the Court's facial ruling.

Indeed, this case is one in which a successful Section 2 claim could have been brought. The first Gingles prong is satisfied because it is possible to draw at least one reasonably-configured majority-minority Town Board district. NYSCEF-Doc-92. The second and third Gingles prongs are satisfied by the uncontroverted evidence of highly racially polarized voting in the Town. NYSCEF-Doc-72 ¶¶60-65. And the same evidence that establishes the circumstances listed by the NYVRA, id. ¶¶80-118, shows that Section 2's nearly identical totality-of-circumstances analysis supports liability as well. Consequently, there is no need to speculate about other fact patterns where the NYVRA might lead to the same result as Section 2—and thus have lawful applications according to the Town's own counsel. This very case constitutes one of these undeniably lawful applications.

III The Supreme Court Had No Authority to Consider, Let Alone Invalidate, NYVRA Provisions Not Relating to Vote Dilution.

Finally, and most aggressively, the Supreme Court purported to invalidate the entire NYVRA. See S.J. Order at 25 (ordering that "the NYVRA is hereby stricken in its entirety"). But this litigation involves only vote dilution claims under Election Law §17-206(2)(b)(i). It does not involve a vote dilution claim against "a district-based or alternative method of election." Id. §17-206(2)(b)(ii). Nor does it involve a challenge to "voter suppression." Id. §17-206(1). Nor does it involve an action for voter "intimidation, deception, or obstruction." Id. §17-212(1)(a). Nor does it involve the interpretation of non-NYVRA laws or regulations "related to the elective franchise." Id. §17-202. And nor does it involve the system of preclearance instituted by the NYVRA. Id. §17-210. Yet without even citing any of these other provisions, the Court arrogated the authority to nullify them all. The Court did so without any briefing on the rest of the statute, without any explanation of its supposed flaws, and without any acknowledgement (let alone examination) of the NYVRA's robust severability provision. Id. §17-222.

This move requires reversal. "It is a fundamental principle of our jurisprudence that the power of a court ... is limited to[] determining the rights of persons which are actually controverted in a particular case pending before the tribunal." Matter of Hearst Corp., 50 N.Y.2d at 713. The Supreme Court ignored this "fundamental principle" by passing judgment on countless aspects of the NYVRA not "actually controverted" in this litigation. Id. In a comparable situation, the Court of Appeals summarily reversed an Appellate Division decision that "prospectively declare[d] [certain] regulations invalid on additional ... grounds" unnecessary to the court's ruling. T.D. v. N.Y. State Off. of Mental Health, 91 N.Y.2d 860, 862 (1997). According to the Court of Appeals, the Appellate Division decision was "an inappropriate advisory opinion." Id. So too here. No matter how this Court evaluates the Supreme Court's analysis of Plaintiffs' vote dilution claims under Election Law §17-206(2)(b)(i), this Court should hold that the Supreme Court had no authority to reach any other NYVRA provisions.

Conclusion

We have seen this film before. In an early case under the California VRA, an outlier trial court held that the statute was "facially invalid under the equal protection clause[]." Sanchez, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 825. An appellate court promptly corrected the trial court's wrong turn. See id. And in the nearly two decades between that correction and the Supreme Court's decision here, no court at any level questioned the constitutionality of any state VRA. The Supreme Court had no sound basis for diverging from this consensus. Its ruling should be reversed, and this case should be remanded for further proceedings on Plaintiffs' vote dilution claims.

Dated: White Plains, New York
November 26, 2024

Election Law Clinic at Harvard Law School
Attorneys for Plainiffs

By: _____
Ruth Greenwood
Nicholas O. Stephanopoulos
Daniel Hessel
Samuel Davis (pro hac vice pending)
81 Main Street, Suite 400
White Plains, New York 10601
(617) 998-1010

Appellate Counsel to:

Abrams Fensterman, LLP
Attorneys for Plaintiffs

By: _____
Robert A. Spolzino
Jeffrey A. Cohen
David Imamura
Steven Still
81 Main Street, Suite 400
White Plains, New York 10601
(914) 607-7010

PRINTING SPECIFICATIONS STATEMENT
Pursuant to 22 NYCRR 1250.8[j]

The foregoing brief was prepared on a computer using Microsoft Word. A proportionally spaced typeface was used, as follows:

Name of Typeface:	Times New Roman
Point Size:	14 point
Line Spacing:	Double

The total number of words in the brief, inclusive of point headings and footnotes and exclusive of pages containing the table of contents, table of citations, proof of service, printing specifications statement, or any authorized addendum contain statutes, rules, regulations, etc., is 13,988.

Supreme Court State of New York
Appellate Division, Second Dept.

----------X

ORAL CLARKE, ROMANCE REED, GRACE PEREZ, PETER RAMON, ERNEST TIRADO and DOROTHY FLOURNOY, Plaintiffs-Appellants,

-against-

TOWN OF NEWBURGH and TOWN BOARD OF THE TOWN OF NEWBURGH,

Defendants-Respondents.

Statement Pursuant to CPLR 5531

Docket No.: 2024-09985

NEW YORK STATE OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,

Intervenor-Appellant.

----------X

1. The Index Number in the trial court was EF-002460-2024.

2. The full names of the parties are set forth above. There have been no changes.

3. The action was commenced in the Supreme Court, Orange County.

4. The summons and verified complaint were filed on March 26, 2024. Issue was joined thereafter by the filing of a verified answer on May 28, 2024.

5. This action is pursuant to Election Law.

6. The appeal is from the Decision and Order of the Supreme Court, Orange County (Hon. Maria S. Vazquez-Doles) dated November 7, 2024 and entered November 8, 2024.

7. The appeal is being perfected on the original record method.

At a term of the IAS Part of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, held in and for the County of Orange located at 285 Main Street, Goshen, New York 10924 on the 7th day of November 2024

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK COUNTY OF ORANGE

ORAL CLARKE et al.,

Plaintiffs,

-against-

TOWN OF NEWBURGH et al.,

Defendants.

To commence the statutory time for appeals as of right (CPLR 5513 [a]), you are advised to serve a copy of this order, with notice of entry, on all parties.

DECISION & ORDER
Index No.: EF002460-2024
Motion date: 10/18/2024
Motion Seq. No.: 5

VAZQUEZ-DOLES, J.S.C.

The following papers were read on this motion by Defendants for summary judgement pursuant to CPLR §3212:

Notice of Motion/Memo of Law/Affirmations/Ex. A-J.....1-14
Opposition Affirmation/Memo of Law/Statement Material Facts/Ex. A-DD.....15-47
Amicus Brief of the ACLU et al.....48
Reply Memo of Law/Response to Material Facts/Affirmation/Ex. K-L.....49-53

I. SUMMARY OF THE DECISION

Defendants assert that no issue of fact exists as to whether the John Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York ("the NYVRA"), pled as the basis for the claims in the Complaint, violates the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution. Where race or national origin is the basis for unequal treatment by the State, as here, the NYVRA must satisfy strict scrutiny, i.e. it must both serve a compelling state interest and be narrowly tailored. The NYVRA does not satisfy either part of that exacting standard.

Defendants have capacity to assert this challenge herein on the basis that compliance with the NYVRA will force them to violate the constitutional proscription against unequal protection under the law. Under the requisite strict scrutiny analysis, no compelling interest of the State in this instance justifies the use of extremely broad race and national origin-based legislation, which opens the door to an overhaul of the electoral system of Defendant Town of Newburgh ("Defendant Town") that could be imposed by the Court. Additionally, there is no compelling State interest in allowing multiple protected classes (here, Black and Spanish heritage) to aggregate as a single group for purposes of determining whether voter dilution exists in the Defendant Town.

Moreover the process for reaching a determination of voter dilution is not narrowly tailored and can rest on the slightest of impairments in Plaintiffs' ability to influence an election. The explicit and intentional omission from the NYVRA of a requirement of past discrimination against the putative protected class(es), and of the guardrails created by the US Supreme Court when determining the permissible scope of the bases for reform when using race in voting rights cases, cannot be reconciled with US Supreme Court precedent. This Court must adhere to that precedent on issues of potential federal constitutional violations.

For these many reasons, the NYVRA is violative of the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment to the US Constitution, which is supreme to any law of New York. Therefore, the NYVRA is hereby STRICKEN in its entirety from further enforcement and application to these Defendants and to any other political subdivision in the State of New York. Defendants' motion for summary judgment is GRANTED and the Complaint is DISMISSED.

II. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Plaintiffs sent a letter to Defendant Town and Defendant Town Board of Town of Newburgh ("Defendant Board") on January 26, 2024. The letter notified the Defendants of Plaintiffs' intention to file a lawsuit for violations of the NYVRA. Defendant Board passed a resolution concerning the letter from Plaintiffs on March 15, 2024 ("the Board Resolution") in which Defendant Town included a plan to investigate whether a violation of the Act is ongoing there. After the Board Resolution was enacted, less than 90 days passed before Plaintiffs filed the instant lawsuit.

Plaintiffs commenced the instant lawsuit by filing a Summons and Complaint on March 26, 2024. The Complaint asserts facts as to the composition of the population in Defendant Town, voting history and trends, community issues that have established a pattern of alleged racially motivated behavior by the Defendants, and other data related to the alleged disenfranchisement. The Complaint pleads two causes of action that allege illegal "vote dilution" in Defendant Town. The first cause of action asserts that racially polarized voting ("RPV") has caused vote dilution. The second cause of action asserts that under a totality of the circumstances, the ability of Plaintiffs to elect candidates of their choice "or" to influence the outcome of elections is impaired[1], regardless of proof of RPV.

Defendants filed a motion to dismiss (Seq. #1) in lieu of an Answer. The sole predicate for the motion was that Plaintiffs allegedly were prohibited by the NYVRA from filing this lawsuit until the expiration of the 90 day "safe harbor" provision, NY Election Law 17-206(7). The Court denied the motion on May 17, 2024. Defendants filed an Answer on May 28, 2024.

[1] Notably, Count Two is pled in the disjunctive, an apparent recitation of the statutory wording. Neither the Complaint nor the Opposition to the instant motion clarify whether Plaintiffs assert that, under the totality standard, their votes were diluted on both bases for impairment (election of chosen candidate and ability to influence election). For purposes of the instant summary judgment motion, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the non-movant, the Court addresses the Complaint as having pled both.

The NYVRA requires that "actions brought pursuant to this title shall be subject to expedited pretrial and trial proceedings and receive an automatic calendar preference". NY Election Law 17-216. A Preliminary Conference Order was entered on May 10, 2024 that required Plaintiffs to disclose expert reports by June 28, 2024 and Defendants to do so by July 2, 2024.

The parties each disclosed two experts, whose reports and depositions are appended as exhibits to the instant motion. In sum, Plaintiff's experts assert the two protected classes of Black and Hispanic voters can – in the aggregate – be configured within four or five newly created single-member districts that will render likely the election of one or two chosen candidates. The experts assert that RPV exists in Defendant Town based on a statistical analysis of voting trends. They also assert that the ability of voters in the two protected classes to influence the elections and elect their candidate of choice has been impaired by the current at-large system.

Defendants' experts contest these findings. They assert that the statistical analysis has a significant margin of error due to its reliance on numerous vaguely defined variables, such as whether voters with particular surnames or who live on a particular residential block are actually Black or Hispanic. They contest whether RPV does exist and also whether the creation of districts would have an effect on the alleged impairment of the protected classes.

A briefing schedule for the instant motion was set in an Order docketed on September 24, 2024 (letter endorsed by the Court). The Court had set this trial to begin on October 31, 2024 but that date was adjourned sine die in the Decision and Order on Motion Seq. #7.[2]

III. FACTS UNDERLYING THE COMPLAINT

Plaintiffs are six residents of Defendant Town. Defendant Town is a political subdivision of the State of New York. Three of the Plaintiffs assert that they identify as Black and three other Plaintiffs assert that they identify as Hispanic. The Complaint asserts that as of 2020, Defendant Town was comprised of a population that was 15% "black", 25% "Hispanic" and 61% "white". On the instant motion, Plaintiff slightly changed their position to assert that as of 2022, 15.4% identified as "non-Hispanic Black" and 25.2% as "Hispanic". Compare Complaint at Par. 32 with Plaintiff Statement of Facts at Par. 39. Defendants do not contest that the 2022 data Plaintiff rely upon provides these percentages.

Defendant Town holds elections on a periodic basis for voters to choose members of Defendant Board. The election process provides that voters living anywhere in Defendant Town may vote for each of the open seats in a given election ("at-large voting"). Defendant Board has four elected positions, with four years terms, that are voted upon in staggered two years intervals. A fifth member, the Town Supervisor, is not elected.

[2] Motion Seq. #7 concerned whether the untimely disclosure of an addendum by one of Plaintiff's experts should cause the exclusion of that document and his related testimony at trial. Motion Seq. #7 was not directed to the consideration of the expert addendum on the instant Motion Seq. #5.

IV. ANALYSIS

A. Summary Judgment Standard

CPLR §3212(b) states, in pertinent part, that a motion for summary judgment "shall be granted if, upon all the papers and proof submitted, the cause of action or defense shall be established sufficiently to warrant the court as a matter of law in directing judgment in favor of any party." Section §3212(b) further states that "the motion shall be denied if any party shall show facts sufficient to require a trial of any issue of fact." "Summary judgment is a drastic remedy and should not be granted where there is any doubt as to the existence of a material and triable issue of fact" Anyanwu v Johnson, 276 A.D.2d 572 (2nd Dept. 2000). Issue finding, not issue determination, is the key to summary judgment. Krupp v Aetna Casualty Co., 103 A.D.2d 252 (2nd Dept. 1984). In deciding the motion, the court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. Kutkiewicz v Horton, 83 A.D.3d 904 (2nd Dept. 2011).

The facts at issue regarding RPV and diminished ability of the protected classes at issue to influence an election outcome are not material to the legal issue of whether the NYVRA violates the Equal Protection Clause. Those few facts that are material to a review of the NYVRA for constitutionality are not contested: Defendant Town is a political subdivision with at-large voting; Plaintiffs are members of two different protected classes; Plaintiffs have claimed RPV against them and/or impairment of their influence on election outcomes; and the Court is authorized to impose certain remedies in the NYVRA, including a mandate for new single-member districts, if Plaintiffs were to prevail at a trial.

Thus, viewing the facts most favorably for Plaintiffs, and assuming arguendo that the aforementioned factual disputes would be resolved in their favor at trial, remedies imposed pursuant to the NYVRA could nonetheless require Defendants to violate the Equal Protection Clause. For that reason, the Court proceeds to review Defendants' challenge to the NYVRA.

B. Purpose of the NYVRA

The New York State Senate proposed Senate Bill 2021-S1046 in the 2021-2022 session. The bill was amended five times, passed by both the Senate and Assembly, and signed into law as version S1046E by the Governor in 2022 as NY Election Law 17-200 et seq.

The NYVRA states that its purposes are:

> 1. Encourage participation in the elective franchise by all eligible voters to the maximum extent; and
> 2. Ensure that eligible voters who are members of racial, color, and language-minority groups shall have an equal opportunity to participate in the political processes of the state of New York, and especially to exercise the elective franchise.

NY Election Law 17-200.

The legislative history of the NYVRA corroborates this intention of the NYVRA, as well as states the justification for the breadth of the legislation:

> PURPOSE:
>
> The purpose of the NYVRA is to encourage participation in the elective franchise by all eligible voters to the maximum extent, to ensure that eligible voters who are members of racial, ethnic, and language-minority groups shall have an equal opportunity to participate in the political processes of the State of New York, and especially to exercise the elective franchise; to improve the quality and availability of demographic and election data; and to protect eligible voters against intimidation and deceptive practices.
>
> JUSTIFICATION
>
> . . . But both the Washington and California state voting rights NYVRAs are limited to addressing vote dilution in at-large elections. The New York Voting rights NYVRA builds upon the demonstrated track record of success in California and Washington, as well as the historic success of the federal voting rights NYVRA by offering the most comprehensive state law protections for the right to vote in the United States. The law will > address both a wide variety of long-overlooked infringements on the right to vote and also make New York a robust national leader in voting rights at a time when too many other states are trying to restrict access to the franchise.

Senate Bill 2021-S1046E, Sponsor (Myrie) Memorandum (Version E – final) within Ex. G to the Opposition.

The Governor signed a memorandum on June 20, 2022 that states in no uncertain terms that the NYVRA is intended to extend beyond the FVRA and provide greater protections:

> As the federal government fails to fulfill its duty to uphold voting rights across the nation, it is now incumbent upon states to step-up and step-in, and this legislation ensures voting rights will be protected in New York . . . . It also builds upon the federal Voting Rights act's vital preclearance scheme, which was gutted by the U.S Supreme Court in Shelby County v. Holder.

Governor's Bill Jacket (Ex. G to the Opposition).

C. Prohibitions and Remedies Created by the NYVRA

The NYVRA prohibits certain actions, or the effects of such actions, in the voting process within a "political subdivision". NY Election Law 17-206(1). "Political subdivision" is defined to include any town in New York. NY Election Law 17-204(4). Defendant Town is a "political subdivision" encompassed by the NYVRA.

The NYVRA makes it unlawful for Defendant Town to "use any method of election, having the effect of impairing the ability of members of a protected class to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcome of elections, as a result of vote dilution" (hereafter collectively, "Unlawful Vote Dilution"). NY Election Law 17-206(2)(a). A "protected class" (singular) is defined as "members of a race, color or language-minority group". NY Election Law 17-204 (5). The use of "race, color or language-minority[3]" as the statutory definition of "protected class", and thus the universe of people who can claim "vote dilution", encompasses literally every person in the State of New York - because every person is a member of some race or is of some color.

The NYVRA refers to 'protected class' repeatedly in the singular in Section 17-206(2) with respect to prohibited practices. However, the NYVRA later allows the aggregation of an unlimited number of protected classes, in two instances. First, aggregation is allowed where "there is evidence that more than one protected class of eligible voters are politically cohesive in the political subdivision." NY Election Law 17-206(2)(c)(vi). Later in the same subsection 17-206, aggregation is allowed for a different reason, to wit, "in the event that they demonstrate that the combined voting preferences of the multiple protected classes are polarized against the rest of the electorate." NY Election Law 17-206(8). There is no explanatory wording in the NYVRA to address i) why protections extend to only a single class but are subsequently extended to multiple classes, and ii) if aggregation is authorized, whether both requirements (i.e., 206(2)(c)(vi) and 206(8)) must be satisfied.

The NYVRA provides that Unlawful Vote Dilution exists where a town: "(i) used[4] an at-large method of election and either: (A) voting patterns of members of the protected class within[5]

---

[3] The definition of "language-minorities" is the same as set forth in federal law, to wit, "persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives or of Spanish heritage". 52 USC § 10310(c)(3). Three of the Plaintiffs have described themselves as "Hispanic."

[4] The legislation provides no explanation for why the voting system is assessed retrospectively but RPV and impairment of ability are reviewed in real time. Thus, it is unclear whether past RPV or past impairment of the protected class is a basis for relief.

[5] The legislation does not clarify why a polarization of members of the protected class from each other is a criteria for relief, versus polarization of that class from the rest of the electorate.

the political subdivision are racially polarized; or[6] (B) under the totality of the circumstances, the ability of members of the protected class to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcome of elections is impaired; . . . ." NY Election Law 17-206(2)(b). "At-large" method of election includes "a method of electing members to the governing body of a political subdivision: (a) in which all of the voters of the entire political subdivision elect each of the members to the governing body; . . . ." NY Election Law 17-204(1). There is no issue of fact herein that Defendant Town employs "at-large" voting.

"Racially polarized voting" means voting in which "there is a divergence in the candidate, political preferences[7], or electoral choice of members in a protected class from the candidates, or electoral choice of the rest of the electorate." NY Election Law 17-204(6). However, the descriptive wording of subsection 17-206(2)(b) ("racially polarized") does not employ that three word definition of RPV as a noun. Moreover, subsection 17-206(2)(b) refers to racial polarization among the protected class, not in comparison to the majority.

The NYVRA lists 11 factors that a court may consider when deciding whether Unlawful Vote Dilution has occurred. NY Election Law 17-206(3)(a)-(k). This list is not exclusive. Id. The NYVRA specifies nine ways in which a reviewing court must weigh and consider evidence of Unlawful Vote Dilution. NY Election Law 17-206(2)(c)(i)-(ix).

---

[6] Notably, in each of the Senate sponsor memoranda that accompanied the earlier versions (Original and A-D) of the Senate Bill, the word "and" appeared between subsections (A) and (B). Had the final bill used "and", then the NYVRA would have required RPV for any violation. But the final bill (and perhaps some or all of the earlier bills, the text of which are not available) used "or", thereby making proof of RPV merely optional. As discussed infra, this significant change of removing the RPV requirement, in comparison to RPV being required by the FVRA (as well as the California and Washington legislation), is one of the reasons why the NYVRA does not satisfy the strict scrutiny standard.

[7] The legislation does not explain how "political preferences" can be a factor for comparison when it is listed only in respect to the protected class but not for the rest of the electorate.

A court that finds in favor of a Plaintiff has extremely broad authority to change in virtually every respect how elections are conducted in the affected political subdivision. A court "shall implement appropriate remedies to ensure that voters of race, color, and language-minority groups have equitable access to fully participate in the electoral process, which may include, but shall not be limited to:

(i) a district-based method of election;

(ii) an alternative method of election;

(iii) new or revised districting or redistricting plans; . . . .

NY Election Law 17-206(5).

D. Capacity of Defendants to Seek Summary Judgment

Plaintiffs oppose the motion initially on the basis that Defendants do not have capacity to challenge the NYVRA on the basis of its constitutionality, because Defendants are part of the very government that enacted the NYVRA. They also assert that the time for such a challenge comes only after the Court has adjudicated the case on the merits and imposed a remedy that Defendants must implement. Plaintiffs summarize the general rule but do not accurately capture the scope and application of the exceptions.

"[P]olitical power conferred by the Legislature confers no vested right as against the government itself." City of New York v State of New York, 86 NY2d 286 (1995). "The concept of the supreme power of the Legislature over its creatures has been respected and followed in many decisions . . . counties are mere political subdivisions of the State, created by the State Legislature and possessing no more power save that deputed to them by that body." Id. The Court of Appeals has extended the doctrine of no capacity to sue by municipal corporate bodies to a wide variety of challenges based as well upon claimed violations of the State Constitution, not just the federal Constitution. Id. However, this rule is not without exceptions.

Four distinct instances have been defined by the Court of Appeals for when a municipality may challenge the constitutionality of a law that it is required to enforce. Those exceptions are as follows:

> (1) an express statutory authorization to bring such a suit (County of Albany v Hooker, 204 NY, at 9, supra); (2) where the State legislation adversely affects a municipality's proprietary interest in a specific fund of moneys (County of Rensselaer v Regan, 173 AD2d 37, affd 80 NY2d 988; Matter of Town of Moreau v County of Saratoga, 142 AD2d 864); (3) where the State statute impinges upon "Home Rule" powers of a municipality constitutionally guaranteed under article IX of the State Constitution (Town of Black Brook v State of New York, 41 NY2d 486); and (4) where "the municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription" (Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283, 287 [citing Board of Educ. v Allen, 20 NY2d 109, affd 392 US 236]).

City of New York, 86 NY2d at 291-292.

Here, Defendants rely upon and fall squarely within the ambit of the fourth of these exceptions, namely that compliance with the NYVRA will force them to violate the constitutional proscription against unequal protection under the law. The Court of Appeals in Matter of Jeter held that certain parties lacked capacity because they did not assert that "if they are obliged to comply with the State statute," said compliance would violate the constitution. 41 NY2d at 287 (emphasis added). The wording of the decision in the future tense ("if they are") confirms that an actual mandated violation is not a perquisite to a challenge. Here, Defendants assert that if they are required to comply with the NYVRA, through a mandate of this Court that alters their electoral system, it will require them to violate the Equal Protection Clause. Under these circumstances, Defendants have capacity to assert their constitutional challenge of the NYVRA now, in the instant motion, which is ripe for review.

E. The Equal Protection Clause

In the wake of the Civil War, Congress proposed and the States ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." US Constitution, Amend. XIV, Sec. 1. The last clause of Section 1 is commonly referred to as the "Equal Protection Clause." It is this provision of law that is the basis for the constitutional challenge of the Defendants.

The US Supreme Court summarized the monumental passage of this amendment in Students for Fair Admissions, Inc. v President and Fellows of Harvard College, 600 US 181, 201-202 (2023):

> To its proponents, the Equal Protection Clause represented a 'foundation[al] principle'—the absolute equality of all citizens of the United States politically and civilly before their own laws . . . . The Constitution, they were determined, should not permit any distinctions of law based on race or color . . . because any "law which operates upon one man [should] operate equally upon all . . . . . As soon-to-be President James Garfield observed, the Fourteenth Amendment would hold 'over every American citizen, without regard to color, the protecting shield of law."

Id. (citations omitted).

The New York Constitution includes a provision with similar wording: "No person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws of this state or any subdivision thereof. No person shall, because of race, color, creed or religion, be subjected to any discrimination in his or her civil rights by any other person or by any firm, corporation, or institution, or by the state or any agency or subdivision of the state." NY Constitution, Art. 1, Sec. 11. Defendants also rely upon that state authority for their challenge to the NYVRA.

The US Constitution provides that it and all federal law is the supreme law of the United States. US Constitution, Art. VI. While no state can pass and enforce legislation that limits the rights of citizens in contravention of federal law, there is no bar to a state passing a law that provides enhanced rights to its citizens that exceeds the protections of federal law. For that reason, the Court reviews the instant motion for its compliance with the potentially narrower protections afforded Defendants by the US Constitution. To the extent that the NYVRA unlawfully exceeds the limits of the Equal Protection Clause, a fortiori it will also exceed the potentially more generous protections afforded by the New York Constitution.

F. Strict Scrutiny Standard

The US Supreme Court issued its first majority decision requiring "strict scrutiny" in Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469 (1989). See Adarand Constructors v Pena, 515 US 200 (1995) (recounting the history of the heightened standard of review). In Croson, it considered whether a city's determination that 30% of its contracting work should go to minority-owned businesses was constitutional. Croson held that "the single standard of review for racial classifications should be "strict scrutiny." Id., at 493–494. That standard has not changed since 1989 with regard to the review of a state or federal law that classifies the rights of differing people on the basis of race or national origin.

Notably, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that "the level of scrutiny does not change merely because the challenged classification operates against a group that historically has not been subject to governmental discrimination." Adarand, 515 US. at 273. "Racial classifications of any sort must be subjected to 'strict scrutiny." Id. at 285. The Court in Croson affirmed its adherence to requiring strict scrutiny in all instances of race-based legislation, regardless of the demographics in the protected class or the majority group: "The standard of review under the Equal Protection Clause is not dependent on the race of those burdened or benefited by a particular classification". Croson at 493-494.

Thirty-five years later, the Supreme Court reaffirmed its precedent of requiring that the Equal Protection Clause prohibits discrimination against all people, not just those classes who have experienced historic discrimination or who experienced such morally repugnant treatment to a degree greater than other people:

> Eliminating racial discrimination means eliminating all of it. And the Equal Protection Clause, we have accordingly held, applies "without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality"—it is "universal in [its] application." Yick Wo, 118 U.S. at 369, 6 S.Ct. 1064. For "[t]he guarantee of equal protection cannot mean one thing when applied to one individual and something else when applied to a person of another color." Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 289–290, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978) (opinion of Powell, J.). "If both are not accorded the same protection, then it is not equal." Id., at 290.

Students for Fair Admissions, 600 US at 206. See Johnson v California, 543 US 499, 505-506 (2005) ("We therefore apply strict scrutiny to all racial classifications to 'smoke out' illegitimate uses of race . . . .").

Here, the text of the NYVRA, on its face, classifies people according to their race, color and national origin. These are not mere passing references in the legislation. These classes of people are not simply mentioned as part of the justification for its passage, or as part of some broader plan for electoral reform by which these classes might derive some tangential benefit. Instead classification based on race, color and national origin is the sine qua non for relief under the NYVRA. A person can only seek relief on the basis of their race, color or national origin and remedies are likewise created based upon those classifications. For Plaintiffs to suggest that the NYVRA is not a race-based (or national origin-based) statute is simply to deny the obvious.

"It is fundamental that a court, in interpreting a statute, should attempt to effectuate the intent." Affiliated Brookhaven Civic Org. v Planning Board of Town of Brookhaven, 209 AD3d 854 (2d Dept. 2022) (citations omitted). "[T]he clearest indicator of legislative intent is the statutory text". Id. "It is well established that 'when the statute's language is plain, the sole function of the courts—at least where the disposition required by the text is not absurd—is to enforce it according to its terms.' " Lamie v. U.S. Trustee, 540 U.S. 526, 534 (2004).

That being said, the inclusion of a race-based criteria does not, in and of itself, foreclose the possibility for enforcement of the NYVRA. Whether statutes are violative of the Equal Protection Clause can only be determined after the analysis required by US Supreme Court precedent. Thus, the strict scrutiny standard will be the basis upon which this Court will decide whether the NYVRA's prohibitions and remedies can satisfy the bar that the US Supreme Court has established for such state action.

G. Compelling Interest and Narrowly Tailored Legislation

i. Compelling Interest

The NYVRA must satisfy one of the very few identifiable bases for race-based government action. See Students for Fair Admissions, 600 US at 203 (e.g. education, housing covenants, buses, golf courses, remediating specific, identified instances of past discrimination that violated the Constitution or a statute). Yet, the Court is unable to find within its text any of those enumerated justifications. In voting rights cases, past discrimination against the protected class has been the justification for race-based statutes, such as the FVRA.

Yet, the wording of the NYVRA is devoid of any requirement of proving past discrimination by a protected class. Section 17-206, as discussed in detail supra, includes no such requirement. Voter dilution can be established simply by a showing that a protected class has an impaired ability to influence an election. Moreover, "protected class" is not defined by reference to historic discrimination. Instead, persons of any "race, color or language minority" have standing to seek redress. Thus, a minority (or even a majority) in a political subdivision comprised of persons who identify as White can seek electoral changes if they establish any impairment of their ability to affect an election, absent any evidence of historic discrimination against people of that color in that political subdivision.

The only wording related to the NYVRA with regard to past discrimination is in the Senate Sponsor Memorandum, which is not part of the NYVRA. Moreover, that wording does not even go as far as stating that the NYVRA was enacted to remedy historic discrimination, only mentioning discrimination. See Senate Bill 2021-S1046E, Sponsor (Myrie) Memorandum (Version E – final) within Ex. G to the Opposition.

More importantly, the NYVRA lists discrimination among the factors that a Court may, but need not necessarily, consider when deciding if voter dilution has occurred. See NY Election law 17-206(3)(a) ("the history of discrimination in or affecting the political subdivision; . . . ."). A Court can grant relief pursuant to the NYVRA absent a history of any discrimination against the "protected class". This intent to exclude historic discrimination from the NYVRA requirements is also manifest in its omission of requiring RPV. Unlike the Washington and California voting rights acts that Plaintiffs rely upon so heavily to support their position, those acts do require RPV to prove vote dilution. Cal. Election Code 14028(a) ("A violation of Section 14027 is established if it is shown that racially polarized voting occurs . . ."); Wash. Elections Stat. Ann. 29A.92.030(1) (proof of a violation when it is shown that: "(a) Elections in the political subdivision exhibit polarized voting; and (b) Members of a protected class or classes do not have an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice . . . .") (emphasis added). As noted supra, fn. 6, the passage of the NYVRA used "or" to join RPV with other means of proving vote dilution, resulting in RPV being merely optional in New York to prove a violation.

As a result, the NYVRA fails to satisfy the first part of the strict scrutiny standard. No compelling interest -as that term has been defined by the US Supreme Court's interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause – exists in protecting the voting rights of any group that has historically never been discriminated against in a political subdivision. Here, while Plaintiffs' Opposition discusses alleged past discrimination against persons who are Black and of Spanish Heritage in Defendant Town, that is not a requirement for their cause of action. They can decline to offer such proof at trial. If they do offer such proof, there is no standard for this Court to use in determining the sufficiency of that evidence because proof of discrimination is not required to any degree by the NYVRA. While the two groups herein might establish some impairment of their ability to influence an election, the US Supreme Court has held that such impairment – without a history of discrimination - is not sufficiently compelling to justify a state mandate based on race or national origin.

Additionally, no compelling interest exists in allowing multiple protected classes to aggregate for purposes of proving vote dilution. Aggregation is raised by the instant motion because the Complaint asserts that each group of Plaintiffs (Black and Spanish heritage) comprise less than a majority of the population of Defendant Town but cannot independently form a majority in a reasonably configured district. Therefore they seek to aggregate the two groups into a single group for purposes of proving vote dilution.

Even if such aggregation were permissible as a compelling interest, its boundaries must be defined. Here, the NYVRA states aggregation is allowed where "there is evidence that more than one protected class of eligible voters are politically cohesive in the political subdivision." NY Election Law 17-206(2)(c)(vi). But in the same subsection 17-206, aggregation is allowed for a different reason, to wit, "in the event that they demonstrate that the combined voting preferences of the multiple protected classes are polarized against the rest of the electorate." NY Election Law 17-206(8).

ii. Narrowly Tailored

Even if the Court assumes, arguendo, that the NYVRA does serve a compelling interest, Plaintiffs must also prove that the prohibitions and remedies are narrowly tailored. "Although all governmental uses of race are subject to strict scrutiny, not all are invalidated by it." Grutter v

Bollinger, 593 US 306, 26 (2003). "When race-based action is necessary to further a compelling governmental interest, such action does not violate the constitutional guarantee of equal protection so long as the narrow-tailoring requirement is also satisfied." Id. See Parents Involved v Seattle School District No. 1, 551 US 701, 704 (2007) ("Narrow tailoring requires "serious, good faith consideration of workable race-neutral alternatives").

Here, the breadth of remedies that a Court can impose for the most minimal of impairments of a class of voters' ability to influence an election cannot be described as "narrow" in any sense of that word. The NYVRA sets no minimum bar on the extent of any such impairment of voter ability to influence an election and does not require RPV or impairment of the ability of a protected class to elect a candidate of choice.

Moreover, the review standard is lax to the point of explicitly allowing a court to find voter dilution exists without citing any basis. The NYVRA allows a finding of vote dilution based upon a "totality of circumstances", which lacks any defined criteria because the NYVRA lists 11 factors that may be considered. Thus, a court is free to find voter dilution based on any criteria that the court itself creates, or no criteria at all. NY Election Law 17-206(3)("Nothing in this subdivision shall preclude any additional factors from being considered, nor shall any specified number of factors be required in establishing that such a violation has occurred.").

Plaintiffs are quick to compare the NYVRA to the FVRA when it suits their purposes. However, that is not entirely, but is largely a two way street. Attempts to extend the FVRA to the degree that Plaintiffs assert here have been soundly rejected. In LULAC v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399 (2006), the Supreme Court held that Section 2 of the FVRA does not require the creation of "influence districts," where a minority group cannot elect the candidate of its choice because of its sub-majority numbers but the group may still play an influential role in the electoral process. The Court held that the ability of members of a minority group to influence an election in a district was insufficient to state a claim for vote dilution. "The opportunity 'to elect representatives of their choice,' requires more than the ability to influence the outcome between some candidates, none of whom is their candidate of choice." Id.

H. Precedent for Judicial Review of Voting Rights Legislation

In the context of voting rights, the Equal Protection Clause forbids "racial gerrymandering," that is, intentionally assigning citizens to a district on the basis of race without sufficient justification. Abbott v Perez, 585 US 579, 585 (2018), citing Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 641 (1993). "At the same time that the Equal Protection Clause restricts the consideration of race in the districting process, compliance with the [Federal] Voting Rights Act of 1965 . . . pulls in the opposite direction: it often insists that districts be created precisely because of race." Id. "Since the Equal Protection Clause restricts consideration of race and the [F]VRA demands consideration of race, a legislature attempting to produce a lawful districting plan is vulnerable to " 'competing hazards of liability.' " Id. at 587, citing Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 977 (1996) (plurality opinion).

As a result of this tension between the Equal Protection Clause and the FVRA, a significant body of law developed over the past 60 years whereby the FVRA could be applied as intended by Congress, but not without limitation. Plaintiffs on this score turn away from the FVRA and urge this Court to disregard that precedent, holding that the NYVRA is constitutional, despite its explicit rejection of certain guardrails so firmly created over decades to prevent undue infringement on the Equal Protection Clause. The Court declines this invitation to ignore binding US Supreme Court precedent and apply the NYVRA in a manner by which it would become supreme over the guarantees provided by the US Constitution.

Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30 (1986) created the framework for analyzing vote dilution claims under the FVRA. Gingles specified three preconditions that a minority group must prove to succeed on a vote dilution claim: the minority group is i) sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a [reasonably configured] single-member district; ii) politically cohesive, and iii) able to demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Id. If these three preconditions are established, the minority group must then show that, "based on the totality of circumstances," the electoral process is not "equally open" to its members. This final step of the analysis entails considering several factors, often called 'the Senate factors' because they originated from the Senate Judiciary Committee Report accompanying the 1982 Amendments. Id. at 36-37.

That process has been followed in an unbroken line of Supreme Court decisions over four decades, regardless of the composition of that Court and the philosophies of its members. In some unusual instances, principles of law ring so true, and are established over time with repeated confirmation, that the doctrine of stare decisis overcomes the inclination of any member or faction of a court to disturb decades of precedent. The Gingles preconditions have been one of those rare examples.

The NYVRA mandates that a reviewing court not consider the first of the Gingles preconditions in determining a vote dilution claim. NY Election Law 17-206(c) "For the purposes of demonstrating that a violation of paragraph (a) of this subdivision has occurred, evidence shall be weighed and considered as follows: . . . (viii) evidence concerning whether members of a protected class are geographically compact or concentrated shall not be considered, but may be a factor in determining an appropriate remedy . . . ." Plaintiffs urge this Court to cast aside 40 years of jurisprudence and decline to apply Gingles to the analysis of the NYVRA, with no legal authority.

The Court is mindful that Gingles determines claims under the FVRA and this case presents a claim under the NYVRA. However, the analysis of Gingles is one by which the Supreme Court created a balance of the aforementioned tension between the Equal Protection Clause and voting rights legislation. Assuming arguendo that New York has authority equal to Congress to pass voting rights legislation that is race-based, a principle that is itself controversial, the NYVRA still must satisfy judicial precedent that permits a rare state-sanctioned infringement on the rights of persons not in the protected class. The Court is not aware of, and no party has provided upon its request, any case from the Supreme Court or any other federal court that determined that the first precondition of Gingles is not applicable to the issue of whether a state voting rights act is violative of the US Constitution.

The NYVRA's elimination of the first Gingles factor effectively creates a right to proportional representation. Where one class cannot establish that it can elect a candidate of choice - even if new districts are created -- then the aggregation of many such classes into one will result in a de jure mandate of representation in proportion to these innumerable classes, each of which has no minimum percentage of voting population. When the FVRA was amended, the Senate included wording to explicitly reject such a requirement. 52 USC 10301(b) ("nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population").

In Bartlett v State Board of Elections, 556 US 1, 15 (2009), the Supreme Court rejected Plaintiff's argument herein, declining to hold that the FVRA "grants special protection to a minority group's right to form political coalitions." Bartlett rejected the argument that 'opportunity' under the FVRA includes the opportunity to form a majority with other voters—whether those other voters are other racial minorities, whites, or both. Id. When a minority group cannot constitute a majority in a single-member district without combining with members of another minority group, the FVRA does not provide protection because there neither has been a wrong nor can there be a remedy. Growe v Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 41 (1993); see Allen v. Milligan, 599 U.S. 1, 28 (2023) ("Forcing proportional representation is unlawful and inconsistent with this Court's approach to implementing § 2 [of the FVRA].").

A similar argument was recently raised and rejected in a federal appellate case, Pettway v Galveston County, 11 F4th 596 (5th Cir 2024) (en banc). In Pettway, the protected class asked for new "crossover districts" in which they could elect the candidate of their choice with help from voters who are members of the majority and who cross over to support the minority's preferred candidate. The court rejected the proposal because when "a minority group constitutes less than a majority of the citizen voting-age population in a reasonably configured district, it has no better or worse opportunity to elect a candidate than does any other group of voters with the same relative voting strength." Id. at 610.

Coalition claims pose the same practical problems as crossover claims in determining the existence of the Gingles preconditions, especially whether the distinct minority groups are politically cohesive. Pettway, 11 F4th at 610-611. Coalition claims create questions of "judicially unmanageable complexity". Id. "[C]ontemporary demographics suggest there is no stopping point if minority coalitions may be formed out of any minority racial or language groups. Id. The factual complexity of coalition claims only increases as the number of minority groups within the coalition increases. Id.

Based on this history of cases rejecting the coalition claim that Plaintiffs herein plead as their basis for sweeping electoral reform in Defendant Town, this Court holds that such claims do not satisfy the clear standards set forth in Gingles and its progeny. For that additional reason, the NYVRA is in violation of federal law and therefore cannot stand.

Conclusion

For all the foregoing reasons, it is hereby

ORDERED that Defendants' Motion Seq. #5 for summary judgment is GRANTED and it is further

ORDERED that the Complaint is DISMISSED, and it is further ORDERED that the NYVRA is hereby STRICKEN in its entirety from further enforcement and application to these Defendants and to any other political subdivision in the State of New York.

The foregoing constitutes the Decision and Order of this Court.

Dated: November 7, 2024
Goshen, New York

ENTER:

HON. MARIA S. VAZQUEZ-DOLES, J.S.C.

25

KeyCite Yellow Flag - Negative Treatment
Declined to Extend by Arkansas State Conference NAACP v. Arkansas Board of Apportionment, 8th Cir.(Ark.), November 20, 2023

138 S.Ct. 2305
Supreme Court of the United States

Greg ABBOTT, Governor of Texas, et al., Appellants
v.
Shannon PEREZ, et al.
Greg Abbott, Governor of Texas, et al., Appellants
v.
Shannon Perez, et al.

Nos. 17–586, 17–626
|
Argued April 24, 2018.
|
Decided June 25, 2018.

Synopsis

Background: Voters, state and federal legislators, and voting rights organizations brought actions alleging that Texas's redistricting plans for United States House of Representatives, Texas House of Representatives, and Texas Senate violated Constitution and Voting Rights Act (VRA). After the District Court issued interim redistricting plans, the Texas Legislature adopted court's interim plans without change, the cases were consolidated, and bench trial was held. A three-judge panel of the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas, Xavier Rodriguez, J., 267 F.Supp.3d 750, 274 F.Supp.3d 624, entered orders barring Texas from using districting plans in effect to conduct the current year's elections, and appeal was taken.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Justice Alito, held that:

[1] orders were effectively injunctions and thus were appealable to the Supreme Court;

[2] District Court disregarded presumption of legislative good faith and improperly reversed burden of proof;

[3] evidence was insufficient to establish that the Texas Legislature acted in bad faith and engaged in intentional discrimination when it adopted interim redistricting plan approved by the district court;

[4] one congressional district did not violate VRA;

[5] two Texas House districts making up entirety of one Texas county did not violate VRA; and

[6] Texas House district created by moving Latinos into the district to bring the Latino population above 50% was an impermissible racial gerrymander.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

Justice Thomas filed a concurring opinion in which Justice Gorsuch joined.

Justice Sotomayor filed a dissenting opinion in which Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, and Kagan joined.

West Headnotes (30)

[1] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

The Equal Protection Clause forbids "racial gerrymandering," that is, intentionally assigning citizens to a congressional district on the basis of race without sufficient justification. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

The Equal Protection Clause prohibits intentional "vote dilution" — invidiously minimizing or canceling out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Election Law Majority-minority districts

The Voting Rights Act (VRA) provision prohibiting districting plans that provide less opportunity for racial minorities to elect representatives of their choice means that, under certain circumstance, States must draw "opportunity" districts in which minority groups form effective majorities. 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Election Law Apportionment and Reapportionment

Since the Equal Protection Clause restricts consideration of race and the Voting Rights Act (VRA) demands consideration of race, a legislature attempting to produce a lawful districting plan is vulnerable to competing hazards of liability. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

18 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Federal Courts Three-judge courts

Orders of a three-judge district court barring Texas from using districting plans in effect to conduct current year's elections were effectively injunctions and thus were appealable to the Supreme Court; although the district court did not call the orders "injunctions," the orders were unequivocal that the current legislative plans violated the Fourteenth Amendment and that those violations had to be remedied before the current year's elections. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; 28 U.S.C.A. § 1253.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Federal Courts Injunction

Where an order has the practical effect of granting or denying an injunction, it should be treated as such for purposes of appellate jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1253, 1292(a)(1).

34 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Federal Courts Three-judge courts

A failure to meet the specificity requirements of requiring that an injunction state its terms specifically does not deprive the Supreme Court of jurisdiction under statute permitting an appeal from an order of a three-judge district court granting or denying an interlocutory or permanent injunction. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1253; Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 65(d), 28 U.S.C.A.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Federal Courts Three-judge courts

The Supreme Court has jurisdiction under statute permitting an appeal from an order of a three-judge district court granting or denying an interlocutory or permanent injunction to hear an appeal from an order that has the same practical effect as one granting or denying an injunction. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1253.

36 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Election Law Judicial Review or Intervention

Federal Courts Three-judge courts

Because statute permitting an appeal from an order of a three-judge district court granting or denying an interlocutory or permanent injunction expressly authorizes "interlocutory" appeals, there can be more than one appeal in a case challenging a redistricting plan. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1253.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Election Law Judicial Review or Intervention

A finding on liability in an action challenging a redistricting plan cannot be appealed unless an injunction is granted or denied, and in some cases a district court may see no need for interlocutory relief. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1253.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[11] Election Law Relief in General

Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

If a redistricting plan is found to be unlawful long before the next scheduled election, a court may defer any injunctive relief until the case is completed, and if a plan is found to be unlawful very close to the election date, the only reasonable option may be to use the plan one last time. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1253.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Federal Courts Three-judge courts

Statute permitting an appeal from an order of a three-judge district court granting or denying an interlocutory or permanent injunction must be strictly construed, but it also must be sensibly construed. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1253.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[13] United States Judicial review and enforcement

District Court disregarded presumption of legislative good faith and improperly reversed burden of proof in action challenging Texas' congressional redistricting plan when it required the State to show that the Legislature somehow purged the "taint" that the court attributed to defunct and never-used plans enacted by a prior legislature; later legislature enacted, with only very small changes, plans that had been developed by a Texas district court pursuant to instructions from the Supreme Court not to incorporate any legal defects in the earlier plans. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

36 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Constitutional Law Particular Issues and Applications

Whenever a challenger claims that a state law was enacted with discriminatory intent, the burden of proof lies with the challenger, not the State.

44 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] Election Law Relief in General

States Power and Duty to Apportion

States Judicial Review and Enforcement

Redistricting is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State, and federal-court review of districting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] Election Law Presumptions and burden of proof

In assessing the sufficiency of a challenge to a districting plan, a court must be sensitive to the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus, and the good faith of the state legislature must be presumed.

34 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] Election Law Presumptions and burden of proof

The allocation of the burden of proof and the presumption of legislative good faith are not changed by a finding of past discrimination in an acting challenging a districting plan; past discrimination cannot, in the manner of original sin, condemn governmental action that is not itself unlawful.

55 Cases that cite this headnote

[18] Election Law Apportionment and Reapportionment

Election Law Presumptions and burden of proof

Election Law Weight and sufficiency

The ultimate question in an action challenging a districting plan remains whether a discriminatory intent has been proved in a given case; the historical background of a legislative enactment is one evidentiary source relevant to the question of intent, but past discrimination does not flip the evidentiary burden on its head.

33 Cases that cite this headnote

[19] Election Law Scope of review

While a district court's finding of fact on the question of discriminatory intent in an action challenging a districting plan is reviewed for clear error, whether the court applied the correct burden of proof is a question of law subject to plenary review.

11 Cases that cite this headnote

[20] Federal Courts Findings

When a finding of fact is based on the application of an incorrect burden of proof, the finding cannot stand.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[21] States Equality of Representation and Discrimination; Voting Rights Act

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Both intent of prior Legislature and district court's adoption of interim redistricting plans were relevant in action challenging later plans under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) to extent that they naturally gave rise to—or tended to refute—inferences regarding intent of subsequent Legislature that adopted the challenged plan; they had to be weighed together with any other direct and circumstantial evidence of that Legislature's intent. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[22] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Evidence in action under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) was insufficient to establish that the Texas Legislature acted in bad faith and engaged in intentional discrimination when it adopted interim congressional redistricting plan approved by the district court; direct evidence indicated the Legislature adopted interim plans in order to bring litigation about the plans to an end as expeditiously as possible, Legislature had good reason to believe that the interim plans were legally sound, and there was no evidence that its aim was to gain acceptance of plans that it knew were unlawful. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[23] Election Law Presumptions and burden of proof

The burden of proof in a preclearance proceeding under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) was on the State. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 3, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10302(c).

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[24] United States Judicial review and enforcement

Bad faith could not be inferred in Voting Rights Act (VRA) action challenging Texas's congressional redistricting plan from Texas's decision to take an appeal to the Supreme Court from a district court's decision denying preclearance, absent showing that Texas's arguments on appeal were frivolous. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 3, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10302(c).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[25] Election Law Vote Dilution

To make out an "effects" claim under Voting Rights Act (VRA) provision prohibiting districting plans that provide less opportunity for racial minorities to elect representatives of their choice, a plaintiff must establish the three "Gingles factors": (1) a geographically compact minority population sufficient to constitute a majority in a single-member district, (2) political cohesion among the members of the minority group, and (3) bloc voting by the majority to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

19 Cases that cite this headnote

[26] Election Law Vote Dilution

If a plaintiff in an action under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) provision prohibiting districting plans that provide less opportunity for racial minorities to elect representatives of their choice makes the required showing under the "Gingles factors," it must then go on to prove that, under the totality of the circumstances, the district lines dilute the votes of the members of the minority group. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[27] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Texas congressional district did not violate Voting Rights Act (VRA) provision prohibiting districting plans that provide less opportunity for racial minorities to elect representatives of their choice because it had a nearly one-third Latino population but was not made a Latino opportunity district; geography and demographics of south and west Texas did not permit the creation of any more than the seven Latino opportunity districts that existed under the current plan, and the Legislature justifiably thought that it had placed a viable opportunity district in the same area. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[28] Election Law Power and duty to apportion

Redistricting analysis in a Voting Rights Act (VRA) action must take place at the district level. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[29] States Population as basis and deviation therefrom

Two Texas House districts making up entirety of one Texas county did not violate Voting Rights Act (VRA) provision prohibiting districting plans that provide less opportunity for racial minorities to elect representatives of their choice, although Latinos made up approximately 56% of the voting age population of the county, but only one of the districts was a Latino opportunity district, where two performing Latino districts could not have been created without "breaking the county line" in violation of the Texas Constitution. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301; Vernon's Ann.Texas Const. Art. 3, § 26.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[30] States Population as basis and deviation therefrom

Texas House district created by moving Latinos into the district to bring the Latino population above 50% was an impermissible racial gerrymander in violation of the Voting Rights Act (VRA) provision prohibiting districting plans that provide less opportunity for racial minorities to elect representatives of their choice; race was predominant factor in design of the district, and although one advocacy group demanded that design and previous primary elections had not favored the Latino candidate of choice, Texas pointed to no actual legislative inquiry that would establish need for its manipulation of the district's racial makeup. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

*2309 Syllabus[*]

579 In 2011, the Texas Legislature adopted a new congressional districting plan and new districting maps for the two houses of the State Legislature to account for population growth revealed in the 2010 census. To do so, Texas had to comply with a complicated legal regime. The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment forbids "racial gerrymandering," that is, intentionally assigning citizens to a district on the basis of race without sufficient justification. Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511. But other legal requirements tend to require that state legislatures consider race in drawing districts. Like all States, Texas is subject to § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965(VRA), which is violated when a state districting plan provides "less opportunity" for racial minorities "to elect representatives of their choice," League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 425, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609. And at the time, Texas was also subject to § 5, which barred it from making any districting changes unless it could prove that they did not result in retrogression with respect to the ability of racial minorities to elect the candidates of their choice, Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 259, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1263, 191 L.Ed.2d 314. In an effort to harmonize these conflicting demands, the Court has assumed that compliance with the VRA is a compelling State interest for Fourteenth Amendment purposes, see, e.g., Bethune–Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 193, 137 S.Ct. 788, 800–801, 197 L.Ed.2d 85; and a State's consideration of race in making a districting decision is narrowly tailored if the State has "good reasons" for believing that its decision is necessary in order to comply with the VRA, *2310 Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 293, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 1464, 197 L.Ed.2d 837.

The Texas Legislature's 2011 plans were immediately tied up in litigation and never used. The case was assigned to a three-judge court (Texas court). Texas also submitted the plans for preclearance to the District Court for the District of Columbia (D.C. court). The Texas court drew up interim plans for the State's rapidly approaching primaries, giving no deference to the Legislature's plans. Texas challenged 580 the court-ordered plans in this Court, which reversed and remanded with instructions for the Texas court to start with the Texas Legislature's 2011 plans but to make adjustments as required by the Constitution and the VRA. The Texas court then adopted new interim plans. After the D.C. court denied preclearance of the 2011 plans, Texas used the Texas court's interim plans for the 2012 elections. In 2013, the Legislature repealed the 2011 plans and enacted the Texas court's plans (with minor modifications). After Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 186 L.Ed.2d 651, was decided, Texas, no longer covered by § 5, obtained a vacatur of the D.C. court's preclearance order. But the Texas court did not dismiss the case against the 2011 plans as moot. Instead, it allowed the plaintiffs to amend their complaint to challenge the 2013 plans and held that their challenges to the 2011 plans were live. Texas conducted its 2014 and 2016 elections under the 2013 plans. In 2017, the Texas court found defects in several of the districts in the 2011 federal congressional and State House plans (the State Senate plan is not at issue here). Subsequently, it also invalidated multiple Congressional (CD) and House (HD) Districts in the 2013 plans, holding that the Legislature failed to cure the "taint" of discriminatory intent allegedly harbored by the 2011 Legislature. And the court relied on that finding to invalidate several challenged 2013 districts. The court also held that three districts—CD27, HD32, and HD34—were invalid under § 2 of the VRA because they had the effect of depriving Latinos of the equal opportunity to elect their candidates of choice. And it found that HD90 was a racial gerrymander based on changes made by the 2013 Legislature. It gave the state attorney general three days to tell the court whether the Legislature would remedy the violations; and if the Legislature did not intend to adopt new plans, the court would hold remedial hearings.

Held :

1. This Court has jurisdiction to review the orders at issue. Pp. 2318 – 2324.

(a) The Texas court's orders fall within 28 U.S.C. § 1253, which gives the Court jurisdiction to hear an appeal from an order of a three-judge district court "granting or denying ... an interlocutory or permanent injunction." The Texas court did not call its orders "injunctions," but where an order has the "practical effect" of granting or denying an injunction, it should be treated as such for purposes of appellate jurisdiction. Carson v. American Brands, Inc., 450 U.S. 79, 83, 101 S.Ct. 993, 67 L.Ed.2d 59. Pp. 2318 – 2322.

(b) The text of the orders and the context in which they were issued make clear that they qualify as interlocutory injunctions under § 1253. The orders were unequivocal that the current legislative plans "violate § 2 and the Fourteenth Amendment" and that these violations 581 "must be remedied." And the short timeframe the attorney general was given to act is strong evidence that the court did not intend to allow the elections to go ahead under the plans it had just condemned. The unmistakable import of these actions is that the court intended to have new plans ready for use in this year's *2311 elections. Texas also had reason to fear that if it tried to conduct elections under those plans, the court would infer an evil motive and perhaps subject the State to the strictures of preclearance under § 3(c) of the VRA. These cases differ from Gunn v. University Comm. to End War in Viet Nam, 399 U.S. 383, 90 S.Ct. 2013, 26 L.Ed.2d 684, where the order did not have the same practical effect as an injunction. Nor does it matter that the remedy is not yet known. The issue here is whether this year's elections can be held under the plans enacted by the Legislature, not whether any particular remedies should ultimately be ordered if it is determined that the current plans are flawed. Section 1253 must be strictly but sensibly construed, and here the District Court's orders, for all intents and purposes, constituted injunctions. Thus, § 1253 provides jurisdiction. Pp. 2321 – 2324.

2. The Texas court erred in requiring the State to show that the 2013 Legislature purged the "taint" that the court attributed to the defunct and never-used plans enacted by a prior Legislature in 2011. Pp. 2324 – 2330.

(a) Whenever a challenger claims that a state law was enacted with discriminatory intent, the burden of proof lies with the challenger, not the State. Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 481, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730. In redistricting cases, the "good faith of [the] state legislature must be presumed." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762. The allocation of the burden of proof and the presumption of legislative good faith are not changed by a finding of past discrimination, which is but "one evidentiary source" relevant to the question of intent. Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 267, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450. Here, the 2011 plans were repealed, and not reenacted, by the 2013 Legislature. Nor did it use criteria that arguably carried forward the effects of the 2011 Legislature's discriminatory intent. Instead, it enacted, with only small changes, the Texas court plans developed pursuant to this Court's instructions. The Texas court contravened these basic burden of proof principles, referring, e.g., to the need to "cure" the earlier Legislature's "taint" and concluding that the Legislature had engaged in no deliberative process to do so. This fundamentally flawed approach must be reversed. Pp. 2324 – 2327.

(b) Both the 2011 Legislature's intent and the court's interim plans are relevant to the extent that they give rise to—or tend to refute—inferences about the 2013 Legislature's intent, but they must be weighed together with other relevant direct and circumstantial evidence of the Legislature's intent. But when this evidence is taken into account, 582 the evidence in the record is plainly insufficient to prove that the 2013 Legislature acted in bad faith and engaged in intentional discrimination. Pp. 2326 – 2330.

3. Once the Texas court's intent finding is reversed, there remain only four districts that were invalidated on alternative grounds. The Texas court's holding as to the three districts in which it relied on § 2's "effects" test are reversed, but its holding that HD90 is a racial gerrymander is affirmed. Pp. 2330 – 2335.

(a) To make out a § 2 "effects" claim, a plaintiff must establish the three "Gingles factors": (1) a geographically compact minority population sufficient to constitute a majority in a single-member district, (2) political cohesion among the members of the minority group, and (3) bloc voting by the majority to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 48–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25. A plaintiff who makes that *2312 showing must then prove that, under the totality of the circumstances, the district lines dilute the votes of the members of the minority group. Pp. 2330 – 2334.

(1) The Texas court held that CD27 violates § 2 because it has the effect of diluting the votes of Nueces County Latino voters, who, the court concluded, should have been included in a Latino opportunity district rather than CD27, which is not such a district. Plaintiffs, however, could not show that an additional Latino opportunity district could be created in that part of Texas. Pp. 2330 – 2332.

(2) The Texas court similarly erred in holding that HD32 and HD34, which make up the entirety of Nueces County, violate § 2. The 2013 plan created two districts that lie wholly within the county: HD34 is a Latino opportunity district, but HD32 is not. The court's findings show that these two districts do not violate § 2, and it is hard to see how the ultimate Gingles vote dilution standard could be met if the alternative plan would not enhance the ability of minority voters to elect the candidates of their choice. Pp. 2332 – 2334.

(b) HD90 is an impermissible racial gerrymander. HD90 was not copied from the Texas court's interim plans. Instead, the 2013 Legislature substantially modified that district. In 2011, the Legislature, responding to pressure from counsel to one of the plaintiff groups, increased the district's Latino population in an effort to make it a Latino opportunity district. It also moved the city of Como, which is predominantly African–American, out of the district. When Como residents and their Texas House representative objected, the Legislature moved Como back. But that decreased the Latino population, so the Legislature moved more Latinos into the district. Texas argues that its use of race as the predominant factor in HD90's design was permissible because it had "good reasons to believe" that this was necessary to satisfy 583 § 2, Bethune–Hill, 580

U.S., at 194, 137 S.Ct., at 794. But it is the State's burden to prove narrow tailoring, and Texas did not do so on the record here. Pp. 2333 – 2335.

No. 17–586, 274 F.Supp.3d 624, reversed; No. 17–626, 267 F.Supp.3d 750, reversed in part and affirmed in part; and cases remanded.

ALITO, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which ROBERTS, C.J., and KENNEDY, THOMAS, and GORSUCH, JJ., joined. THOMAS, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which GORSUCH, J., joined. SOTOMAYOR, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which GINSBURG, BREYER, and KAGAN, JJ., joined post, p. ----.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Scott A. Keller, Solicitor General, Austin, TX, for Appellants.

Edwin S. Kneedler, for Appellee United States supporting the Appellants.

Max Renea Hicks, Austin, TX, for Appellees in No. 17–586.

Allison J. Riggs, Durham, NC, for Appellees in No. 17–626.

Paul D. Clement, Erin E. Murphy, Kirkland & Ellis LLP, Washington, DC, Ken Paxton, Attorney General of Texas, Jeffrey C. Mateer, First Assistant Attorney General, Scott A. Keller, Solicitor General, Matthew H. Frederick, Deputy Solicitor General, Andrew B. Davis, Assistant Solicitor General, Office of the Attorney General, Austin, TX, for Appellants.

José Garza, Martin Golando, Garza Golando Moran, PLLC, San Antonio, TX, for appellee Mexican American Legislative Caucus, Texas House of Representatives.David Richards, Richards, Rodriguez & Skeith, LLP, Austin, TX, for Appellees Shannon Perez, et al.

*2313 Renea Hicks, Law Office of Max Renea Hicks, Austin, TX, Marc E. Elias, Bruce V. Spiva, Aria C. Branch, Perkins Coie LLP, Washington, DC, Abha Khanna, Perkins Coie LLP, Seattle, WA, for Appellees Eddie Rodriguez, et al.

Allison J. Riggs, Southern Coalition for Social Justice, Durham, NC, Robert Notzon, Law Office of Robert S. Notzon, Austin, TX, Victor L. Goode, NAACP, Baltimore, MD, for Appellees the Texas State Conference of NAACP Branches, et al.

Luis R. Vera, Jr., Law Offices of Luis Roberto Vera, Jr., San Antonio, TX, for Appellees LULAC, et al.

Gary L. Bledsoe, Potter Bledsoe, LLP, Austin, TX, for Appellees Congressmembers Eddie Bernice Johnson, Sheila Jackson Lee and Al Green and NAACP Intervenor Howard Jefferson.

J. Gerald Hebert, J. Gerald Hebert, P.C., Alexandria, VA, Mark P. Gaber, Washington, DC, Jessica Ring Amunson, Jenner & Block LLP, Washington, DC, Gerald H. Goldstein, Goldstein, Goldstein, & Hilley, San Antonio, TX, Donald H. Flanary, III, Flanary Law Firm, San Antonio, TX, Jesse Gaines, Fort Worth, TX, for Appellees Margarita Quesada, et al.

Rolando L. Rios, Law Offices of Rolando L. Rios, San Antonio, TX, for Appellee Congressman Henry Cuellar.

Noel J. Francisco, Solicitor General, Department of Justice, Washington, DC, for United States.

Opinion

Justice ALITO delivered the opinion of the Court.

584 Before us for review are orders of a three-judge court in the Western District of Texas effectively directing the State not to conduct this year's elections using districting plans that the court itself adopted some years earlier. The court developed those plans for use in the 2012 elections pursuant to our directions in Perry v. Perez, 565 U.S. 388, 132 S.Ct. 934, 181 L.Ed.2d 900 (2012) (per curiam). We instructed the three-judge court to start with the plans adopted by the Texas Legislature (or Legislature) in 2011 but to make adjustments as required by the Constitution and the Voting Rights Act. Id., at 392–396, 132 S.Ct. 934. After those plans were used in 2012, the Texas Legislature enacted them (with only minor modifications) in 2013, and the plans were used again in both 2014 and 2016.

Last year, however, the three-judge court reversed its prior analysis and held that some of the districts in those plans are unlawful. After reviewing the repealed 2011 plans, which had never been used, the court found that they were tainted by discriminatory intent and that the 2013 Legislature had not "cured" that "taint."

We now hold that the three-judge court committed a fundamental legal error. It was the challengers' burden to show that the 2013 Legislature acted with discriminatory intent when it enacted plans that the court itself had produced. The 2013 Legislature was not obligated to show that it had "cured" the unlawful intent that the court attributed to the 585 2011 Legislature. Thus, the essential pillar of the three-judge court's reasoning was critically flawed.

When the congressional and state legislative districts are reviewed under the *2314 proper legal standards, all but one of them, we conclude, are lawful.

I

A

The 2010 decennial census revealed that the population of Texas had grown by more than 20% and the State was therefore apportioned four additional seats in the United States House of Representatives. C.J.S. 369a.[1] To accommodate this new allocation and the population changes shown by the census, the Legislature adopted a new congressional districting plan, as well as new districting maps for the two houses of the State Legislature.

Redistricting is never easy, and the task was especially complicated in Texas in 2011. Not only was the Legislature required to draw districts that were substantially equal in population, see Perry, supra, at 391–392, 126 S.Ct. 2594; Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964); Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 84 S.Ct. 526, 11 L.Ed.2d 481 (1964), and to comply with special state-law districting rules,[2] but federal law imposed complex and delicately balanced requirements regarding the consideration of race.

[1] [2] Then, as now, federal law restricted the use of race in making districting decisions. The Equal Protection Clause forbids "racial gerrymandering," that is, intentionally assigning citizens to a district on the basis of race without sufficient 586 justification. Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993). It also prohibits intentional "vote dilution"—"invidiously ... minimiz[ing] or cancel[ing] out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities." Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 66–67, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (plurality opinion).

While the Equal Protection Clause imposes these important restrictions, its application in the field of districting is complicated. For one thing, because a voter's race sometimes correlates closely with political party preference, see Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 308, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 1473–1474, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017); Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 243, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001), it may be very difficult for a court to determine whether a districting decision was based on race or party preference. Here, the three-judge court found that the two factors were virtually indistinguishable.[3]

At the same time that the Equal Protection Clause restricts the consideration of race in the districting process, compliance with the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 52 U.S.C. § 10301 et seq. (VRA), pulls in the opposite direction: It often insists that districts be created precisely because of race. Two provisions of the VRA exert such demands, and in 2011, Texas was subject to both. *2315 At that time, Texas was covered by § 5 of the VRA[4] and was thus barred from making any districting changes unless it could prove that they did not result in "retrogression" with respect to the ability of racial minorities to elect the candidates of their choice. 587 Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 259, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1263, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015). That showing obviously demanded consideration of race.

[3] On top of this, Texas was (and still is) required to comply with § 2 of the VRA. A State violates § 2 if its districting plan provides " 'less opportunity' " for racial minorities " 'to elect representatives of their choice.' " League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 425, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (LULAC). In a series of cases tracing back to Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986), we have interpreted this standard to mean that, under certain circumstances, States must draw "opportunity" districts in which minority groups form "effective majorit[ies]," LULAC, supra, at 426, 126 S.Ct. 2594.

[4] Since the Equal Protection Clause restricts consideration of race and the VRA demands consideration of race, a legislature attempting to produce a lawful districting plan is vulnerable to " 'competing hazards of liability.' " Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 977, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion). In an effort to harmonize these conflicting demands, we have assumed that compliance with the VRA may justify the consideration of race in a way that would not otherwise be allowed. In technical terms, we have assumed that complying with the VRA is a compelling state interest, see, e.g., Bethune–Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 193, 137 S.Ct. 788, 800–801, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017); Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 915, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996), and that a State's consideration of race in making a districting decision is narrowly tailored and thus satisfies strict scrutiny if the State has " 'good reasons' " for believing that its decision is necessary in order to comply with the VRA. Cooper, supra, at 293, 137 S.Ct., at 1464.

B

Facing this legal obstacle course, the Texas Legislature in 2011 adopted new districting plans, but those plans were immediately tied up in litigation and were never used. Several plaintiff groups quickly filed challenges in the District Court for the Western District of Texas, arguing that some 588 of the districts in the new plans were racial gerrymanders, some were based on intentional vote dilution, and some had the effect of depriving minorities of the equal opportunity to elect the candidates of their choice. This case was assigned to a three-judge court, as required by 28 U.S.C. § 2284(a). (We will call this court "the Texas court" or simply "the District Court.")

The situation was further complicated by the requirement that Texas obtain preclearance of its new plans. To do this, Texas filed for a declaratory judgment in the District Court for the District of Columbia. See Texas v. United States, 887 F.Supp.2d 133 (2012). (We will call this court "the D.C. court.") By early 2012, the D.C. court had not yet issued a decision, and Texas needed usable plans for its rapidly approaching primaries. Accordingly, the Texas court drew up interim plans for that purpose. Perez v. Perry, 835 F.Supp.2d 209 (W.D.Tex.2011). In *2316 creating those plans, the majority of the Texas court thought that it was not "required to give any deference to the Legislature's enacted plan." Id., at 213. Instead, it based its plans on what it called "neutral principles that advance the interest of the collective public good." Id., at 212.[5]

Texas challenged those court-ordered plans in this Court, and we reversed. Perry v. Perez, 565 U.S. 388, 132 S.Ct. 934, 181 L.Ed.2d 900 (2012) (per curiam). Noting that "[r]edistricting is 'primarily the duty and responsibility of the State,' " we held that the Texas court should have respected the legislative judgments embodied in the 2011 plans to the extent allowed by the Constitution and the VRA. Id., at 392–399, 132 S.Ct. 934.

We remanded the case with very specific instructions. The Texas court was told to start with the plans adopted by the Legislature but to modify those plans as needed so as "not to incorporate ... any legal defects." Id., at 394, 132 S.Ct. 934. With 589 respect to claims under the Constitution or § 2 of the VRA, the District Court was told to change a district if the plaintiffs were likely to succeed on the merits of their challenge. Ibid. And with respect to § 5 claims, the court was instructed to make whatever changes were needed to obviate any legal claim that was "not insubstantial."[6] Id., at 395, 132 S.Ct. 934. Thus, our instructions, in an abundance of caution, demanded changes in the challenged 2011 plans without proof that those changes were actually required by either the Constitution or the VRA.

On remand, the Texas court ordered additional briefing and heard two more days of argument. App. 29a, 35a–50a; Order in Civ. No. 11–cv–00360, Doc. No. 616. It issued two opinions, totaling more than 70 pages, and analyzed disputed districts in detail. C.J.S. 367a–423a; H.J.S. 300a–315a. While stressing the preliminary nature of its determinations, see C.J.S. 368a; H.J.S. 314a–315a, the court found that some districts required change and that others were lawful, C.J.S. 367a–423a; H.J.S. 300a–315a. The court then adopted plans for the State's congressional districts and for both houses of the State Legislature. (The plan for the State Senate is not at issue.)

Both the congressional plan and the plan for the Texas House departed significantly from the State's 2011 plans. At least 8 of the 36 congressional districts were markedly altered, and 21 districts in the plan for the Texas House were "substantially" changed. Id., at 314a; C.J.S. 397a–408a.

In August 2012, the D.C. court denied preclearance of the plans adopted by the Legislature in 2011, see Texas v. United States, supra, so the State conducted the 2012 elections under the interim plans devised by the Texas court. At the same time, Texas filed an appeal in this Court contesting the 590 decision of the D.C. court,[7] but that appeal ultimately died for two reasons.

*2317 First, the 2011 plans were repealed. The Texas attorney general urged the Legislature to pass new redistricting plans, C.J.S. 429a, and in his view, the "best way to remedy the violations found by the D.C. court" was to "adopt the [Texas court's] interim plans as the State's permanent redistricting maps." Id., at 432a. Doing so, he said, would "confirm the legislature's intent" to adopt "a redistricting plan that fully comports with the law." Id., at 429a.

The Governor called a special session to do just that, and the Legislature complied. One of the legislative sponsors, Senator Seliger, explained that, although " 'the Texas Legislature remains confident that the legislatively-drawn maps adopted in 2011 are fair and legal ..., there remain several outstanding legal questions regarding these maps that undermine the stability and predictability of the electoral process in Texas.' " 274 F.Supp.3d 624, 649, n. 40 (D.C.Cir.2017). Counsel for one of the plaintiff groups, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF), testified in favor of the plans. C.J.S. 436a–439a. The 2013 Legislature then repealed the 2011 plans and enacted the Texas court's interim plans with just a few minor changes. The federal congressional plan was not altered at all, and only small modifications were made to the plan for the Texas House. C.J.S. Findings 231a–232a.

On the day after the Legislature passed the new plans and the day before the Governor signed them, this Court issued its decision in Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 186 L.Ed.2d 651 (2013), which invalidated the coverage formula in § 4 of the VRA. Now no longer subject to § 5, Texas obtained a vacatur of the D.C. court's order on preclearance. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 634–635, and n. 11.

591 With the never-effective 2011 plans now repealed and any preclearance issues overcome by events, the State argued in the Texas court that the plaintiffs' case against the 2011 plans was moot. In September 2013, the Texas court allowed the plaintiffs to amend their complaints to challenge the 2013 plans, but the court held that their challenges to the 2011 plans were still alive, reasoning that the repeal of the 2011 plans represented the "voluntary cessation" of allegedly unconstitutional conduct.[8]

Texas conducted its 2014 and 2016 elections under the plans that had been preliminarily approved by the Texas court and subsequently adopted (with only minor changes) by the Legislature in 2013. But in March and April 2017, after multiple trials, the Texas court issued a pair of rulings on the defunct 2011 plans. The court reaffirmed the conclusions it had reached in 2012 about defects in the 2011 plans, and it went further. Contrary to its earlier decision, it held that Congressional District (CD) 35 is an impermissible racial gerrymander and that CD27 violates § 2 of the VRA because it has the effect of diluting the electoral opportunities of Latino voters. C.J.S. 181a, 193a–194a. Previously, the court had provided detailed reasons for rejecting the very arguments that it now accepted. Id., at 409a–423a. Similarly, the court held that multiple districts in the plan for the Texas House were the result of intentional vote dilution. These included districts in the counties of Nueces (House District (HD) 32, HD34), Bell (HD54, HD55), and Dallas (HD103, HD104, HD105). H.J.S. 275a–276a.[9]

592 *2318 In August 2017, having ruled on the repealed 2011 plans, the Texas court finally turned its attention to the plans then in effect—i.e., the plans that had been developed by the court, adopted by the Legislature in 2013, and used in both the 2014 and 2016 elections. The court invalidated the districts in those plans that correspond to districts in the 2011 plan that it had just held to be unlawful, i.e., CD27, CD35, HD32, HD34, HD54, HD55, HD103, HD104, and HD105. See 274 F.Supp.3d 624 (No. 17–586) and 267 F.Supp.3d 750 (2017) (No. 17–626).

In reaching these conclusions, the court pointed to the discriminatory intent allegedly harbored by the 2011 Legislature, and it attributed this same intent to the 2013 Legislature because it had failed to "engage in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 645–652; 267 F.Supp.3d, at 757. The court saw "no indication that the Legislature looked to see whether any discriminatory taint remained in the plans." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649. And it faulted the State because it "did not accept [findings of the D.C. court] and instead appealed to the Supreme Court." Ibid. Seeing no evidence that the State had undergone "a change of heart," the court concluded that the Legislature's "decision to adopt the [District Court's] plans" was a "litigation strategy designed to insulate the 2011 or 2013 plans from further challenge, regardless of their legal infirmities." Id., at 649–650. Finally, summarizing its analysis, the court reiterated that the 2011 Legislature's "discriminatory taint was not removed by the [2013] Legislature's enactment of the Court's interim plans, because the Legislature engaged in no deliberative process to remove any such taint, and in fact intended any such taint to be maintained but be safe from remedy." Id., at 686.

The Texas court's decisions about CD35 and all but three of the Texas House districts were based entirely on its finding that the 2013 Legislature had not purged its predecessor's 593 discriminatory intent. However, the court also held that three districts—CD27, HD32, and HD34—were invalid under § 2 of the VRA because they had the effect of depriving Latinos of the equal opportunity to elect their candidates of choice. Id., at 682–686; 267 F.Supp.3d, at 775–783. And the court found independent proof that HD90 was a racial gerrymander. Id., at 788–794.

The court held that violations in all these districts "must be remedied." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686; see also 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795 (describing State House district violations that "must be remedied"). Mindful that October 1 was the deadline for the Texas secretary of state to provide voter registration templates to the State's counties, App. 380a–381a, the court took steps to bring about prompt remedial action. In two orders issued on August 15 and 24, the Texas attorney general was instructed to advise the court, within three days, "whether the Legislature intends to take up redistricting in an effort to cure these violations." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686; 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795. If the Legislature chose not to do so, the court warned, it would "hold a hearing to consider remedial plans." Ibid. After the Governor made clear that the State would not act, the *2319 court ordered the parties to proceed with a hearing on the congressional plan on September 5, as well as a hearing on the plan for the Texas House on September 6. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686; 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795; App. 134a–136a; Defendants' Opposed Motion To Stay Order on Plan C235 Pending Appeal or Final Judgment in Civ. No. 11–cv–00360, Doc. 1538, pp. 3–4; Defendants' Opposed Motion To Stay Order on Plan H358 Pending Appeal or Final Judgment, Doc. 1550, pp. 4–5.

Texas applied for stays of both orders, but the District Court denied the applications. App. 134a–136a. Texas then asked this Court to stay the orders, and we granted that relief. After receiving jurisdictional statements, we postponed consideration of jurisdiction and set the cases for consolidated argument. 583 U.S. 1088, 138 S.Ct. 735, 199 L.Ed.2d 601 (2018).

594 II

[5] Before reaching the merits of these appeals, we must assure ourselves that we have jurisdiction to review the orders at issue. Appellants claim that the orders amount to injunctions and are therefore appealable to this Court under 28 U.S.C. § 1253. Appellees disagree, contending that the orders do not qualify as injunctions. We hold that we have jurisdiction because the orders were effectively injunctions in that they barred Texas from using the districting plans now in effect to conduct this year's elections.

A

The Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 73, "established the general principle that only final decisions of the federal district courts would be reviewable on appeal." Carson v. American Brands, Inc., 450 U.S. 79, 83, 101 S.Ct. 993, 67 L.Ed.2d 59 (1981) (emphasis deleted). But because "rigid application of this principle was found to create undue hardship in some cases," Congress created exceptions. Ibid. Two are relevant here. We have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1253 to hear an appeal from an order of a three-judge district court "granting or denying ... an interlocutory or permanent injunction." Similarly, § 1292(a)(1) gives the courts of appeals jurisdiction over "[i]nterlocutory orders of the district courts" "granting, continuing, modifying, refusing or dissolving injunctions," "except where a direct review may be had in the Supreme Court."

[6] The orders in these cases fall within § 1253. To be sure, the District Court did not call its orders "injunctions"—in fact, it disclaimed the term, App. 134a–136a—but the label attached to an order is not dispositive. We have previously made clear that where an order has the "practical effect" of granting or denying an injunction, it should be treated as such for purposes of appellate jurisdiction. Carson, supra, at 83, 101 S.Ct. 993; see also Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 485 U.S. 271, 287–288, 108 S.Ct. 1133, 99 L.Ed.2d 296 (1988). We applied this test in 595 Carson, holding that an order that declined to enter a consent decree prohibiting certain conduct could be appealed under § 1292(a)(1) because it was the practical equivalent of an order denying an injunction and threatened serious and perhaps irreparable harm if not immediately reviewed. 450 U.S., at 83–84, 86–90, 101 S.Ct. 993.

This "practical effect" rule serves a valuable purpose. If an interlocutory injunction is improperly granted or denied, much harm can occur before the final decision in the district court. Lawful and important conduct may be barred, and unlawful and harmful conduct may be allowed to continue. Recognizing this, Congress authorized interlocutory appellate review of such orders. But if the availability of interlocutory *2320 review depended on the district court's use of the term "injunction" or some other particular language, Congress's scheme could be frustrated. The harms that Congress wanted to avoid could occur so long as the district court was careful about its terminology. The "practical effect" inquiry prevents such manipulation.

In analogous contexts, we have not allowed district courts to "shield [their] orders from appellate review" by avoiding the label "injunction." Sampson v. Murray, 415 U.S. 61, 87, 94 S.Ct. 937, 39 L.Ed.2d 166 (1974). For instance, in Sampson, we held that an order labeled a temporary restraining order (which is not appealable under § 1292(a)(1)) should be treated as a "preliminary injunction" (which is appealable) since the order had the same practical effect as a preliminary injunction. Id., at 86–88, 94 S.Ct. 937.

Appellees and the dissent contend that the "practical effect" approach should be confined to § 1292(a)(1), but we see no good reason why it should not apply to § 1253 as well. Appellees note that we "narrowly construe[]" § 1253, Goldstein v. Cox, 396 U.S. 471, 478, 90 S.Ct. 671, 24 L.Ed.2d 663 (1970), but we also construe § 1292(a)(1) "narrowly," Carson, supra, at 84, 101 S.Ct. 993. In addition, the relevant language in the two provisions is nearly identical; 596 [10] both provisions serve the same purpose; and we have previously called them "analogous." Goldstein, supra, at 475, 90 S.Ct. 671.

The provisions are also textually interlocked. Section 1292(a)(1) does not apply where "direct review may be had in the Supreme Court," i.e., where § 1253 applies. If the "practical effects" test applied under § 1292(a)(1) but not § 1253, the consequences would be unfortunate and strange. We would have to identify the magic language needed for an order to qualify as an order granting or denying an injunction, and that standard would hardly constitute the sort of "[s]imple" rule that the dissent prizes. See Post, at 2342 – 2343 (opinion of SOTOMAYOR, J.). Then, having developed that standard, we would have to apply it in any case in which a party took an appeal to us from an order of a three-judge court that clearly had the practical effect of an injunction. If we concluded that the magic-words test was not met, the order would appear to be appealable to one of the courts of appeals under § 1292(a)(1). In the language of that provision, the order would be an "orde[r] of [a] district cour[t] of the United States ... granting [an] injunctio[n]." And because this Court would lack jurisdiction under § 1253, the appeal would not fall within § 1292(1)'s exception for cases "where a direct review may be had in the Supreme Court." Having taken pains to provide for review in this Court, and not in the courts of appeals, of three-judge court orders granting injunctions Congress surely did not intend to produce that result.[11]

*2321 597 Appellees argue that an order denying an injunction (the situation in Carson) and an order granting an injunction (the situation here) should be treated differently, Brief for Appellees in No. 17–586, p. 27, but they offer no convincing reason for doing so. No authority supports their argument. The language of §§ 1253 and 1292(a)(1) makes no such distinction, and we have stated that the "practical effect" analysis applies to the "granting or denying" of injunctions. Gulfstream, supra, at 287–288, 108 S.Ct. 1133.

In addition, appellees' suggested distinction would put appellate courts in an awkward position. Suppose that a district court granted an injunction that was narrower than the one requested by the moving party. Would an appellate court (whether this Court or a court of appeals) have jurisdiction to rule on only part of that decision? Suppose the appellate court concluded that the district court was correct in refusing to give the movant all the injunctive relief it sought because the movant's entire claim was doomed to fail. Would the appellate court be limited to holding only that the lower court properly denied the relief that was withheld? The rule advocated by the appellees would needlessly complicate appellate review.[12]

[7] 598 Finally, appellees point in passing to Rule 65(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which requires that an injunction "state its terms specifically" and "describe in reasonable detail ... the act or acts restrained or required." Rules 65(d)(1)(B), (C); see Brief for Appellees in No. 17–586, at 27. But as explained in Gunn v. University Comm. to End War in Viet Nam, 399 U.S. 383, 389, n. 4, 90 S.Ct. 2013, 26 L.Ed.2d 684 (1970), we have never suggested that a failure to meet the specificity requirements of Rule 65(d) would "deprive the Court of jurisdiction under § 1253."

A contrary holding would be perverse. Rule 65(d) protects the party against which an injunction is issued by requiring clear notice as to what that party must do or refrain from doing. Where a vague injunction does not comply with Rule 65(d), the aggrieved party has a particularly strong need for appellate review. It would be odd to hold that there can be no appeal in such a circumstance.

[8] For these reasons, we hold that we have jurisdiction under § 1253 to hear an appeal from an order that has the same practical effect as one granting or denying an injunction.

B

With these principles settled, we conclude that the orders in these cases qualify as interlocutory injunctions under § 1253. The text of the orders and the context in which they were issued make this clear.

The orders are unequivocal that the current legislative plans "violate § 2 and the Fourteenth Amendment" and that these violations "must be remedied." *2322 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686; see also, e.g., 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795 ("[V]iolations found by this Court in its Order on [the State House plan] now require a remedy"); ibid. ("In Bell County, the intentional discrimination previously found by the Court must be remedied"); ibid. ("In Dallas County, the intentional discrimination previously found by the Court must be remedied").

599 We do not suggest that this language alone is sufficient to show that the orders had the practical effect of enjoining use of the current plans in this year's elections, but the court did not stop with these pronouncements. As we have noted, the orders required the Texas attorney general to inform the court within three days whether the Legislature would remedy the violations, and the orders stated that if the Legislature did not intend to adopt new plans, the court would hold remedial hearings.

The short time given the Legislature to respond is strong evidence that the three-judge court did not intend to allow the elections to go ahead under the plans it had just condemned. The Legislature was not in session, so in order to take up the task of redistricting, the Governor would have been required to convene a special session—which is no small matter. And, when the Governor declined to call a special session, the court moved ahead with its scheduled hearings and invited the parties to continue preparing for them even after this Court administratively stayed the August 15 order.

The import of these actions is unmistakable: The court intended to have new plans ready for use in this year's elections. Nothing in the record even hints that the court contemplated the possibility of allowing the elections to proceed under the 2013 plans.

What is more, Texas had reason to believe that it would risk deleterious consequences if it defied the court and attempted to conduct the elections under the plans that the court had found to be based on intentional racial discrimination. In the very orders at issue, the court inferred discriminatory intent from Texas's choice to appeal the D.C. court's preclearance decision rather than immediately taking steps to bring its plans into compliance with that decision. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649; see Part III, infra. Reading such an order, Texas had reason to fear that if it tried to conduct elections under plans that the court had found to be racially 600 discriminatory, the court would infer an evil motive and perhaps subject the State once again to the strictures of preclearance under § 3(c) of the VRA.[13] This is a remedy that the plaintiffs hoped to obtain, see, e.g., App. 177a, and that the District Court seemed inclined to consider, see C.J.S. 122a–123a (declining to declare moot the challenges to the long-since-repealed 2011 plans because "there remains the possibility of declaratory and equitable relief under § 3(c)").

Contending that the orders here do not qualify under § 1253, appellees analogize these cases to Gunn, 399 U.S. 383, 90 S.Ct. 2013, 26 L.Ed.2d 684, but there is no relevant similarity. In Gunn, anti-war protesters were charged with violating a Texas "disturbing-the-peace statute," id., at 384, 90 S.Ct. 2013 and they challenged the constitutionality of the statute in federal court. After the state charges were dismissed, *2323 the District Court issued a "discursive" opinion "expressing the view that [the statute was] constitutionally invalid." Id., at 386–387, 90 S.Ct. 2013. But the court then refrained from going any further, "pending the next session, special or general, of the Texas legislature, at which time the State of Texas may, if it so desires, enact such disturbing-the-peace statute as will meet constitutional requirements." University Comm. to End War in Viet Nam v. Gunn, 289 F.Supp. 469, 475 (W.D.Tex.1968). The defendants appealed to this Court, and at the time of our decision two years later, neither the Legislature nor the District Court had taken any further action. We therefore held that we lacked jurisdiction under § 1253. The District Court order in that case did not have the same practical effect as an injunction. Indeed, 601 it had no practical effect whatsoever and is thus entirely different from the orders now before us.[14]

Appellees suggest that appellate jurisdiction is lacking in these cases because we do not know at this point "what a remedy would entail, who it would affect, and when it would be implemented." Brief for Appellees in No. 17–586, at 27. The dissent makes a similar argument with respect to two of the Texas House districts. Post, at 2342.[15] But the issue here is whether this year's elections can be held under the plans enacted by the Legislature, not whether any particular remedies would have ultimately been ordered by the District Court.

[9] Appellees and the dissent also fret that this Court will be inundated with redistricting appeals if we accept jurisdiction 602 here, Brief for Appellees in No. 17–626, p. 34; post, at 2342 – 2344, and n. 8, but there is no reason to fear such a flood. Because § 1253 expressly authorizes "interlocutory" appeals, there is no question that there can be more than one appeal in a case challenging a redistricting plan. District courts sometimes expressly enjoin the use of districting plans before moving on to the remedial phase. See, e.g., Whitford v. Gill, No. 3:15–cv–421, Doc. No. 190 (WD Wis., Feb. 22, 2017); Harris v. McCrory, No. 1:13–cv–949, Doc. No. 143 (MDNC, Feb. 5, 2016). But appeals from such orders have not overwhelmed our docket. Our holding here will affect only a small *2324 category of additional cases.[16]

[10] [11] It should go without saying that our decision does not mean that a State can always appeal a district court order holding a redistricting plan unlawful. A finding on liability cannot be appealed unless an injunction is granted or denied, and in some cases a district court may see no need for interlocutory relief. If a plan is found to be unlawful long before the next scheduled election, a court may defer any injunctive relief until the case is completed. And if a plan is found to be unlawful very close to the election date, the only reasonable option may be to use the plan one last time.

[12] We appreciate our obligation to heed the limits of our jurisdiction, and we reiterate that § 1253 must be strictly construed. But it also must be sensibly construed, and here the District Court's orders, for all intents and purposes, constituted injunctions barring the State from conducting this year's elections pursuant to a statute enacted by the Legislature. Unless that statute is unconstitutional, this would seriously and irreparably harm[17] the State, and only an interlocutory 603 appeal can protect that State interest. See Carson, 450 U.S., at 89–90, 101 S.Ct. 993. As a result, § 1253 provides jurisdiction.

III

[13] We now turn to the merits of the appeal. The primary question is whether the Texas court erred when it required the State to show that the 2013 Legislature somehow purged the "taint" that the court attributed to the defunct and never-used plans enacted by a prior Legislature in 2011.

A

[14] Whenever a challenger claims that a state law was enacted with discriminatory intent, the burden of proof lies with the challenger, not the State. Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 481, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730 (1997). This rule takes on special significance in districting cases.

[15] [16] Redistricting "is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State," and "[f]ederal-court review of districting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (internal quotation marks omitted). "[I]n assessing the sufficiency of a challenge to a districting plan," a court "must be sensitive to the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus." Id., at 915–916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. And the "good faith of [the] state legislature must be presumed." Id., at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

[17] [18] The allocation of the burden of proof and the presumption of legislative good faith are not changed by a finding of past discrimination. "[P]ast discrimination cannot, in the manner of original sin, condemn governmental action that is not itself unlawful." Mobile, 446 U.S., at 74, 100 S.Ct. 1490 (plurality opinion). The "ultimate question remains whether a discriminatory intent has been proved in a given *2325 case." Ibid. The "historical 604 background" of a legislative enactment is "one evidentiary source" relevant to the question of intent. Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 267, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977). But we have never suggested that past discrimination flips the evidentiary burden on its head.

Neither the District Court nor appellees have pointed to any authority that would justify shifting the burden. The appellees rely primarily on Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222, 105 S.Ct. 1916, 85 L.Ed.2d 222 (1985), but that case addressed a very different situation. Hunter involved an equal protection challenge to an article of the Alabama Constitution adopted in 1901 at a constitutional convention avowedly dedicated to the establishment of white supremacy. Id., at 228–230, 105 S.Ct. 1916. The article disfranchised anyone convicted of any crime on a long list that included many minor offenses.

Id., at 226–227, 105 S.Ct. 1916. The court below found that the article had been adopted with discriminatory intent, and this Court accepted that conclusion. Id., at 229, 105 S.Ct. 1916. The article was never repealed, but over the years, the list of disqualifying offenses had been pruned, and the State argued that what remained was facially constitutional. Id., at 232–233, 105 S.Ct. 1916. This Court rejected that argument because the amendments did not alter the intent with which the article, including the parts that remained, had been adopted. Id., at 233, 105 S.Ct. 1916. But the Court specifically declined to address the question whether the then-existing version would have been valid if "[re]enacted today." Ibid.

In these cases, we do not confront a situation like the one in Hunter. Nor is this a case in which a law originally enacted with discriminatory intent is later reenacted by a different legislature. The 2013 Texas Legislature did not reenact the plan previously passed by its 2011 predecessor. Nor did it use criteria that arguably carried forward the effects of any discriminatory intent on the part of the 2011 Legislature. Instead, it enacted, with only very small changes, plans that had been developed by the Texas court pursuant to instructions from this Court "not to incorporate ... any legal defects." Perry, 565 U.S., at 394, 132 S.Ct. 934.

605 Under these circumstances, there can be no doubt about what matters: It is the intent of the 2013 Legislature. And it was the plaintiffs' burden to overcome the presumption of legislative good faith and show that the 2013 Legislature acted with invidious intent.

The Texas court contravened these basic principles. Instead of holding the plaintiffs to their burden of overcoming the presumption of good faith and proving discriminatory intent, it reversed the burden of proof. It imposed on the State the obligation of proving that the 2013 Legislature had experienced a true "change of heart" and had "engage[d] in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649.

The Texas court's references to the need to "cure" the earlier Legislature's "taint" cannot be dismissed as stray comments. On the contrary, they were central to the court's analysis. The court referred repeatedly to the 2013 Legislature's duty to expiate its predecessor's bad intent, and when the court summarized its analysis, it drove the point home. It stated: "The discriminatory taint [from the 2011 plans] was not removed by the Legislature's enactment of the Court's interim plans, because the Legislature engaged in no deliberative process to remove any such taint, and in fact intended any such taint to be *2326 maintained but be safe from remedy." Id., at 686.[18]

606 The dissent labors to explain away all these references to the 2013 Legislature's supposed duty to purge its predecessor's allegedly discriminatory intent, but the dissent loses track of its own argument and characterizes the District Court's reasoning exactly as we have. Indeed, the dissent criticizes us on page 2346 of its opinion for saying precisely the same thing that it said 11 pages earlier. On page 2353, the dissent states:

> "[T]he majority quotes the orders as requiring proof that the Legislature ' "engage[d] in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans." ' But the District Court did not put the burden on Texas to make that affirmative showing." Post, at 2353 (quoting supra, at 23-24, in turn quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649; citations omitted).

But earlier, the dissent itself describes the District Court's analysis as follows:

> "Despite knowing of the discrimination in its 2011 maps, 'the Legislature did not engage in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans.' " Post, at 2347 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649).

And this is not just a single slip of the pen. The dissent writes that the District Court was required "to assess how the 2013 Legislature addressed the known discrimination that motivated" the districts approved by that Court in 2012. Post, at 2351 – 2352. The dissent quotes the District Court's statement that " 'there is no indication that the Legislature looked to see whether any discriminatory taint remained in the plans.' " Post, at 2348 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649). And there is also this: "Texas was just 'not truly interested in fixing any remaining discrimination in [its 2011 maps].' " Post, at 2347 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 651, n. 45). The District Court's true mode of analysis is so obvious that the 607 dissent cannot help but repeat it. And that approach was fundamentally flawed and demands reversal.

[19] [20] While a district court's finding of fact on the question of discriminatory intent is reviewed for clear error, see Cromartie, 532 U.S., at 242, 121 S.Ct. 1452 whether the court applied the correct burden of proof is a question of law subject to plenary review, U.S. Bank N.A. v. Village at Lakeridge, LLC, 583 U.S. 387, 393, 138 S.Ct. 960, 965, 200 L.Ed.2d 218 (2018); Highmark Inc. v. Allcare Health Management System, Inc., 572 U.S. 559, 563, 134 S.Ct. 1744, 1748, 188 L.Ed.2d 829 (2014). And when a finding of fact is based on the application of an incorrect burden of proof, the finding cannot stand. Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 501, 104 S.Ct. 1949, 80 L.Ed.2d 502 (1984) ("An appellate cour[t has] power to correct errors of law, including those that ... infect ... a finding of fact that is predicated on a misunderstanding of the governing rule of law").

B

[21] [22] In holding that the District Court disregarded the presumption of legislative *2327 good faith and improperly reversed the burden of proof, we do not suggest either that the intent of the 2011 Legislature is irrelevant or that the plans enacted in 2013 are unassailable because they were previously adopted on an interim basis by the Texas court. Rather, both the intent of the 2011 Legislature and the court's adoption of the interim plans are relevant to the extent that they naturally give rise to—or tend to refute—inferences regarding the intent of the 2013 Legislature. They must be weighed together with any other direct and circumstantial evidence of that Legislature's intent. But when all the relevant evidence in the record is taken into account, it is plainly insufficient to prove that the 2013 Legislature acted in bad faith and engaged in intentional discrimination.[19] See, e.g., 608 Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557, 585, 129 S.Ct. 2658, 174 L.Ed.2d 490 (2009); McCleskey v. Zant, 499 U.S. 467, 497, 111 S.Ct. 1454, 113 L.Ed.2d 517 (1991). There is thus no need for any further prolongation of this already protracted litigation.

The only direct evidence brought to our attention suggests that the 2013 Legislature's intent was legitimate. It wanted to bring the litigation about the State's districting plans to an end as expeditiously as possible. The attorney general advised the Legislature that the best way to do this was to adopt the interim, court-issued plans. The sponsor of the 2013 plans voiced the same objective, and the Legislature then adopted the court-approved plans.

On its face, this explanation of the Legislature's intent is entirely reasonable and certainly legitimate. The Legislature had reason to know that any new plans it devised were likely to be attacked by one group of plaintiffs or another. (The plaintiffs' conflicting positions with regard to some of the districts in the plans now before us bear this out.) Litigating districting cases is expensive and time consuming, and until the districts to be used in the next election are firmly established, a degree of uncertainty clouds the electoral process. Wishing to minimize these effects is understandable and proper.

The court below discounted this direct evidence, but its reasons for doing so are not sound. The court stated that the "strategy" of the 2013 Legislature was to "insulate [the plans] from further challenge, regardless of [the plans'] legal infirmities." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 650; see also id., at 651, n. 45. But there is no evidence that the Legislature's aim was to gain acceptance of plans that it knew were unlawful.[20] 609 Indeed, there is no evidence that the Legislature thought that the plans were invalid—and as we will explain, the Legislature had sound reasons to believe just the opposite.[21]

*2328 The District Court found it significant that the Legislature must have realized that enacting the interim plans would not "end the litigation," because it knew that at least some plaintiffs would pursue their challenges anyway. Id., at 651, n. 45. But even if, as seems likely, the Legislature did not think that all the plaintiffs would immediately abandon all their claims, it does not follow that the Legislature was insincere in stating that it adopted the court-approved plan with the aim of bringing the litigation to a close. It was reasonable for the Legislature to think that approving the court-approved plans might at least reduce objections and thus simplify and expedite the conclusion of the litigation.[22] That MALDEF, counsel for one of the plaintiff groups, testified in favor of the plans is evidence that the Legislature's objective was reasonable. C.J.S. 436a–439a.

Not only does the direct evidence suggest that the 2013 Legislature lacked discriminatory intent, but the circumstantial 610 evidence points overwhelmingly to the same conclusion. Consider the situation when the Legislature adopted the court-approved interim plans. First, the Texas court had adopted those plans, and no one would claim that the court acted with invidious intent when it did so. Second, the Texas court approved those plans only after reviewing them and modifying them as required to comply with our instructions. Not one of the judges on that court expressed the view that the plans were unlawful. Third, we had directed the Texas court to make changes in response to any claims under the Equal Protection Clause and § 2 of the VRA if those claims were merely likely to prevail. Perry, 565 U.S., at 394, 132 S.Ct. 934. And the Texas court was told to accommodate any claim under § 5 of the VRA unless it was "insubstantial." Id., at 395, 132 S.Ct. 934. Fourth, the Texas court had made a careful analysis of all the claims, had provided a detailed examination of individual districts, and had modified many districts. Its work was anything but slapdash. All these facts gave the Legislature good reason to believe that the court-approved interim plans were legally sound.

Is there any evidence from which a contrary inference can reasonably be drawn? Appellees stress the preliminary nature of the Texas court's approval of the interim plans, and as we have said, that fact is relevant. But in light of our instructions to the Texas court and the care with which the interim plans were developed, the court's approval still gave the Legislature a sound basis for thinking that the interim plans satisfied all legal requirements.

The court below and the dissent infer bad faith because the Legislature "pushed the redistricting bills through quickly in a special session." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649. But we do not see how the brevity of the legislative process can give rise to an inference 2329 of bad faith—and certainly not an inference that is strong enough to overcome the presumption of legislative good faith (a concept to which the dissent pays *611 only the briefest lipservice, post, at 2346). The "special session" was necessary because the regular session had ended. As explained, the Legislature had good reason to believe that the interim plans were sound, and the adoption of those already-completed plans did not require a prolonged process. After all, part of the reason for adopting those plans was to avoid the time and expense of starting from scratch and leaving the electoral process in limbo while that occurred.[23]

The District Court and the dissent also err when they charge that Representative Darby, the chair of the Texas House Redistricting Committee at the time in question, " 'willfully ignored those who pointed out deficiencies' " in the plans. Post, at 2346 – 2347 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 651, n. 45). This accusation is not only misleading, it misses the point. The Legislature adopted the interim plans in large part because they had the preliminary approval of the District Court, and Darby was open about the fact that he wanted to minimize amendments to the plans for that reason. See, e.g., Joint Exh. 17.3, pp. S1–S2. That Darby generally hoped to minimize amendments—so that the plans would remain legally compliant—hardly shows that he, or the Legislature, acted with discriminatory intent. In any event, it is misleading to characterize this attitude as "willfu[l] ignor[ance]." The record shows that, although Darby hoped to minimize amendments, he did not categorically refuse to consider changes. This is illustrated by his support for an amendment to HD90, which was offered by the then-incumbent, Democrat Lon Burnam, precisely because it fixed an objection raised by the Mexican–American Legal Caucus *612 (MALC) that the district's Latino population was too low. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 790.[24]

The Texas court faulted the 2013 Legislature for failing to take into account the problems with the 2011 plans that the D.C. court identified in denying preclearance, ibid., but the basis for that criticism is hard to understand. One of the 2013 Legislature's principal reasons for adopting the court-approved plans was to fix the problems identified by the D.C. court. The attorney general advised the Legislature to adopt the interim plans because he thought that was the "best way to remedy the violations found by the D.C. court." C.J.S. 432a. Chairman Darby similarly stated that the 2013 plans fixed the errors found by the D.C. court, Tr. 1498, 1584–1585 (July 14, 2017), as did Senator Seliger, Joint Exh. 26.2, p. A–5.

There is nothing to suggest that the Legislature proceeded in bad faith—or even that it acted unreasonably—in pursuing this strategy. Recall that we instructed the Texas court, in developing the interim plans, to remedy any § 5 claim that was "not insubstantial." Perry, 565 U.S., at 395, 132 S.Ct. 934. And that is just 2330 what the interim plans, which the Legislature later enacted, attempted to do. For instance, the D.C. court held that the congressional plan had one too few "ability to elect" districts for Latinos, largely because of changes to CD23, Texas, 887 F.Supp.2d, at 156–159; the interim plan (and, by extension, the 2013 plan) amended CD23, C.J.S. 397a–399a. Similarly, in the plan for the Texas House, the D.C. court found § 5 retrogression with respect to HD35, HD117, and HD149, Texas, supra, at 167–175, and all of those districts were changed in the 2013 plans, H.J.S. 305a–307a, 312a.

[23] *613 Although the D.C. court found that the 2011 Legislature acted with discriminatory intent in framing the congressional plan, that finding was based on evidence about districts that the interim plan later changed. The D.C. court was concerned about the intent reflected in the drawing of CDs 9, 18, and 30, but all those districts were amended by the Texas court. Texas, supra, at 159–160; C.J.S. 406a–408a. With respect to the plan for the Texas House, the D.C. court made no intent findings, but its areas of concern were generally addressed by the Texas court and the 2013 plans. Compare Texas, supra, at 178 (noting evidence of unlawful intent in HD117), with H.J.S. 307a (amending HD117).[25]

[24] It is indicative of the District Court's mistaken approach that it inferred bad faith from Texas's decision to take an appeal to this Court from the D.C. court's decision denying preclearance. See 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649 ("Defendants did not accept [these findings] and instead appealed to the Supreme Court"). Congress gave the State the right to appeal, and no bad motive can be inferred from its decision to make use of this right—unless of course the State had no reasonable grounds for appeal. Before our decision in Shelby County mooted Texas's appeal to this Court from the D.C. court's preclearance decision, Texas filed a jurisdictional statement claiming that the D.C. court made numerous errors, but the Texas court made no attempt to show that Texas's arguments were frivolous.

As a final note, appellees assert that the 2013 Legislature should have either defended the 2011 plans in litigation or gone back to the drawing board and devised entirely new plans, Brief for Appellees in No. 17–626, at 45, but there is 614 no reason why the Legislature's options should be limited in this way. It was entirely permissible for the Legislature to favor a legitimate option that promised to simplify and reduce the burden of litigation. That the Legislature chose this course is not proof of discriminatory intent.

IV

Once the Texas court's intent finding is reversed, there remain only four districts that were invalidated on alternative grounds. For three of these districts, the District Court relied on the "effects" test of § 2. We reverse as to each of these, but we affirm the District Court's final holding that HD90 is a racial gerrymander.

A

[25] [26] To make out a § 2 "effects" claim, a plaintiff must establish the three so-called "Gingles factors." These are (1) a geographically compact minority population sufficient to constitute a majority in a *2331 single-member district, (2) political cohesion among the members of the minority group, and (3) bloc voting by the majority to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Gingles, 478 U.S., at 48–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752; LULAC, 548 U.S., at 425, 126 S.Ct. 2594. If a plaintiff makes that showing, it must then go on to prove that, under the totality of the circumstances, the district lines dilute the votes of the members of the minority group. Id., at 425–426, 126 S.Ct. 2594.

1

[27] The Texas court held that CD27 violates § 2 of the VRA because it has the effect of diluting the votes of Latino voters in Nueces County. C.J.S. 191a. CD27 is anchored in Nueces County (home to Corpus Christi) and follows the Gulf of Mexico to the northeast before taking a turn inland to the northwest in the direction of Austin. Nueces County contains a Latino population of roughly 200,000 (a little less than one-third the size of an ideal Texas congressional district), and the court held that the Nueces County Latinos 615 should have been included in a Latino opportunity district, rather than CD27, which is not such a district. The court found that an area centered on Nueces County satisfies the Gingles factors and that, under the totality of the circumstances, the placement of the Nueces County Latinos in CD27 deprives them of the equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice. C.J.S. 181a–195a.

The problem with this holding is that plaintiffs could not establish a violation of § 2 of the VRA without showing that there is a " 'possibility of creating more than the existing number of reasonably compact' " opportunity districts. LULAC, supra, at 430, 126 S.Ct. 2594. And as the Texas court itself found, the geography and demographics of south and west Texas do not permit the creation of any more than the seven Latino opportunity districts that exist under the current plan. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 684, and n. 85.

Attempting to get around this problem, the Texas court relied on our decision in LULAC, but it misapplied our holding. In LULAC, we held that the State should have created six proper Latino opportunity districts but instead drew only five. 548 U.S., at 435, 126 S.Ct. 2594. Although the State claimed that the plan actually included a sixth opportunity district, that district failed to satisfy the Gingles factors. 548 U.S., at 430, 126 S.Ct. 2594. We held that a "State's creation of an opportunity district for those without a § 2 right offers no excuse for its failure to provide an opportunity district for those with a § 2 right." Ibid.

Here, the Texas court concluded that Texas committed the same violation as in LULAC : It created "an opportunity district for those without a § 2 right" (the Latinos in CD35), while failing to create such a district "for those with a § 2 right" (the Latinos of Nueces County). Ibid. This holding is based on a flawed analysis of CD35.

CD35 lies to the north of CD27 and runs along I–35 from San Antonio up to Austin, the center of Travis County. In the District Court's view, the Latinos of CD35 do not have a 616 § 2 right because one of the Gingles factors, majority bloc voting, is not present. The Court reached this conclusion because the non-Latino voters of Travis County tend to favor the same candidates as the great majority of Latinos. There are two serious problems with the District Court's analysis.

[28] First, the Court took the wrong approach in evaluating the presence of majority bloc voting in CD35. The Court looked at only one, small part of the district, *2332 the portion that falls within Travis County. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 683; C.J.S. 175a–176a. But Travis County makes up only 21% of the district. We have made clear that redistricting analysis must take place at the district level. Bethune–Hill, 580 U.S., at 191-192, 137 S.Ct., at 800. In failing to perform that district-level analysis, the District Court went astray.

Second, here, unlike in LULAC, the 2013 Legislature had "good reasons" to believe that the district at issue (here CD35) was a viable Latino opportunity district that satisfied the Gingles factors. CD35 was based on a concept proposed by MALDEF, C.J.S. Findings 315a–316a, and the Latino Redistricting Task Force (a plaintiff group) argued that the district is mandated by § 2. C.J.S. 174a. The only Gingles factor disputed by the court was majority bloc voting, and there is ample evidence that this factor is met. Indeed, the court found that majority bloc voting exists throughout the State. C.J.S. Findings 467a. In addition, the District Court extensively analyzed CD35 in 2012 and determined that it was likely not a racial gerrymander and that even if it was, it likely satisfied strict scrutiny. C.J.S. 415a. In other words, the 2013 Legislature justifiably thought that it had placed a viable opportunity district along the I–35 corridor.

2

[29] The District Court similarly erred in holding that HD32 and HD34 violate § 2. These districts make up the entirety of Nueces County, which has a population that is almost exactly 617 equal to twice the population of an ideal Texas House district. (It can fit 2.0295 ideal districts. H.J.S. Findings 91a.) In 2010, Latinos made up approximately 56% of the voting age population of the county. Ibid. The 2013 plan created two districts that lie wholly within the county; one, HD34, is a Latino opportunity district, but the other, HD32, is not. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 767.

Findings made by the court below show that these two districts do not violate § 2 of the VRA. Under Gingles, the ultimate question is whether a districting decision dilutes the votes of minority voters, see LULAC, supra, at 425–426, 126 S.Ct. 2594 and it is hard to see how this standard could be met if the alternative to the districting decision at issue would not enhance the ability of minority voters to elect the candidates of their choice.

The only plaintiff that pressed a § 2 claim with respect to HD32 and HD34 was MALC, 267 F.Supp.3d, at 767, and as the District Court recognized, that group's own expert determined that it was not possible to divide Nueces County into more than one performing Latino district. In his analysis, the expert relied on Nueces County election returns for statewide elections between 2010 and 2016. Id., at 775–776. Based on this data, he calculated that when both HD32 and HD34 were maintained as Latino-majority districts, one performed for Latinos in only 7 out of 35 relevant elections, and the other did so in none of the 35 elections. Ibid. In order to create two performing districts in that area, it was necessary, he found, to break county lines in multiple places, id., at 778, but the District Court held that "breaking the County Line Rule" in the Texas Constitution, see Art. III, § 26, to "remove Anglos and incorporate even more Hispanics to improve electoral outcomes goes beyond what § 2 requires," 267 F.Supp.3d, at 783. So if Texas could not create two performing districts in Nueces County and did not have to break county lines, the logical result is that Texas did not dilute the Latino vote.

618 The court refused to accept this conclusion, but its reasons for doing so cannot stand up. As an initial matter, the court *2333 thought that the two districts would have to be redrawn based on its finding regarding the intent of the 2013 Legislature,[26] and it therefore deferred a final decision on the § 2 issue and advised the plaintiffs to consider at the remedial phase of the case whether they preferred to have two districts that might not perform or just one safe district. Id., at 783. The court's decision cannot be sustained on this ground, since its finding of discriminatory intent is erroneous.

The only other reason provided by the court was the observation that MALC "failed to show" that two majority-Latino districts in Nueces County would not perform. Id., at 782. This observation twisted the burden of proof beyond recognition. It suggested that a plaintiff might succeed on its § 2 claim because its expert failed to show that the necessary factual basis for the claim could not be established.[27] 619 Courts cannot find § 2 effects violations on the basis of uncertainty. In any event, if even the District Court remains unsure how to draw these districts to comply with § 2 (after six years of litigation, almost a dozen trials, and numerous opinions), the Legislature surely had the " 'broad discretion' " to comply as it reasonably saw fit in 2013, LULAC, 548 U.S., at 429, 126 S.Ct. 2594.

The dissent charges us with ignoring the District Court's " 'intensely local appraisal' " of Nueces County, post, at 2358, but almost none of the "findings" that the District Court made with respect to HD32 and HD34 referred to present local conditions, and none cast any significant light on the question whether another opportunity district is possible at the present time. For instance, what the dissent describes as Texas's "long 'history of voting-related discrimination,' " id., at 663, in no way undermines—or even has any logical bearing on—the conclusions reached by MALC's expert about whether Latino voters would have a real opportunity to elect the candidates of their choice if the county were divided into two districts with narrow majorities of Latino citizens of voting age. The same is true with respect to the District Court's findings regarding racially polarized *2334 voting in the county and Latinos' "continuing pattern of disadvantage" relative to non-Latinos. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 779 (internal quotation marks omitted). Perhaps recognizing as much, both the District Court and the dissent point to the anticipated future growth in the percentage of eligible voters of Latino descent, but the districts now at issue would not necessarily be used beyond 2020, after which time the 2020 census would likely require redistricting once again.

620 B

[30] HD90 is a district in Tarrant County that, unlike the other districts at issue in this appeal, was not copied from the District Court's interim plans. Instead, the 2013 Legislature substantially modified the district developed by the District Court, and the District Court held that the 2013 Legislature's creation is an invalid racial gerrymander. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 794.

In drawing HD90, the Legislature was pulled in opposite directions by competing groups. In 2011, the Legislature, responding to pressure from MALDEF, increased the Latino population of the district in an effort to make it a Latino opportunity district. H.J.S. Findings 258a–262a. In the process of doing so, the Legislature moved the community of Como, which is predominantly African–American, out of the district. But Como residents and the member of the Texas House who represented the district, Lon Burnam, objected, and in 2013, the Legislature moved Como back into the district. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 788–789. That change was opposed by MALC because it decreased the Latino population below 50%. App. 398a–399a. So the Legislature moved Latinos into the district to bring the Latino population back above 50%. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 789–790.

In light of these maneuvers, Texas does not dispute that race was the predominant factor in the design of HD90, but it argues that this was permissible because it had " 'good reasons to believe' " that this was necessary to satisfy § 2 of the VRA." Bethune–Hill, 580 U.S., at 194, 137 S.Ct., at 801.

Texas offers two pieces of evidence to support its claim. The first—that one of the plaintiffs, MALC, demanded as much—is insufficient. A group that wants a State to create a district with a particular design may come to have an overly expansive understanding of what § 2 demands. So one group's demands alone cannot be enough.

The other item of evidence consists of the results of the Democratic primaries in 2012 and 2014. In 2012, Representative 621 Burnham, who was not the Latino candidate of choice, narrowly defeated a Latino challenger by 159 votes. And in 2014, the present representative, Ramon Romero, Jr., beat Burnam by 110 votes. See Brief for Appellants 70. These election returns may be suggestive, but standing alone, they were not enough to give the State good reason to conclude that it had to alter the district's lines solely on the basis of race. And putting these two evidentiary items together helps, but it is simply too thin a reed to support the drastic decision to draw lines in this way.

We have previously rejected proffers of evidence that were at least as strong as Texas's here. For example, in Cooper, 581 U.S., at 300, 137 S.Ct., at 1469, we analyzed North Carolina's justification for deliberately moving "African–American voters" into a district to "ensure ... the district's racial composition" in the face of its expansion in size. North Carolina argued that its race-based decisions were necessary to comply with § 2, but the State could point to "no meaningful legislative *2335 inquiry" into "whether a new, enlarged" district, "created without a focus on race, ... could lead to § 2 liability." Id., at 304, 137 S.Ct., at 1471. North Carolina pointed to two expert reports on "voting patterns throughout the State," but we rejected that evidence as insufficient. Ibid., n. 5. 137 S.Ct., at 1490. Here, Texas has pointed to no actual "legislative inquiry" that would establish the need for its manipulation of the racial makeup of the district.

By contrast, where we have accepted a State's "good reasons" for using race in drawing district lines, the State made a strong showing of a pre-enactment analysis with justifiable conclusions. In Bethune–Hill, the State established that the primary mapdrawer "discussed the district with incumbents from other majority-minority districts[,] ... considered turnout rates, the results of the recent contested primary and general elections," and the district's large prison population. 580 U.S., at 194, 137 S.Ct., at 801. The State established that it had performed a "functional analysis" and acted to achieve an "informed 622 bipartisan consensus." Ibid. Texas's showing here is not equivalent.

Perhaps Texas could have made a stronger showing, but it is the State's burden to prove narrow tailoring, and it did not do so on the record before us. We hold that HD90 is an impermissible racial gerrymander. On remand, the District Court will have to consider what if any remedy is appropriate at this time.

* * *

Except with respect to one Texas House district, we hold that the court below erred in effectively enjoining the use of the districting maps adopted by the Legislature in 2013. We therefore reverse with respect to No. 17–586; reverse in part and affirm in part with respect to No. 17–626; and remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice THOMAS, with whom Justice GORSUCH joins, concurring.

I adhere to my view that § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 does not apply to redistricting. See Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 327, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 1485–1486, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017) (concurring opinion) (citing Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 922–923, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment)). Thus, § 2 cannot provide a basis for invalidating any district, and it cannot provide a justification for the racial gerrymander in House District 90. Because the Court correctly applies our precedents and reaches the same conclusion, I join its opinion in full.

Justice SOTOMAYOR, with whom Justice GINSBURG, Justice BREYER, and Justice KAGAN join, dissenting.

The Court today goes out of its way to permit the State of Texas to use maps that the three-judge District Court unanimously found were adopted for the purpose of preserving the racial discrimination that tainted its previous maps. 623 In reaching its desired result, the majority commits three fundamental errors along the way.

First, the majority disregards the strict limits of our appellate jurisdiction and reads into the District Court orders a nonexistent injunction to justify its premature intervention. Second, the majority indulges Texas' distorted reading of the District Court's meticulous orders, mistakenly faulting the court for supposedly shifting the burden of proof to the State to show that it cured the taint of past discrimination, all the while ignoring the clear language and unambiguous factual findings of *2336 the orders below. Third, the majority elides the standard of review that guides our resolution of the factual disputes in these appeals—indeed, mentioning it only in passing—and selectively parses through the facts. As a result of these errors, Texas is guaranteed continued use of much of its discriminatory maps.

This disregard of both precedent and fact comes at serious costs to our democracy. It means that, after years of litigation and undeniable proof of intentional discrimination, minority voters in Texas—despite constituting a majority of the population within the State—will continue to be underrepresented in the political process. Those voters must return to the polls in 2018 and 2020 with the knowledge that their ability to exercise meaningfully their right to vote has been burdened by the manipulation of district lines specifically designed to target their communities and minimize their political will. The fundamental right to vote is too precious to be disregarded in this manner. I dissent.

I

A

The first obstacle the majority faces in its quest to intervene in these cases is jurisdictional. The statute that governs our jurisdiction over these appeals is 28 U.S.C. § 1253, which provides that "any party may appeal to the Supreme Court from an order granting or denying ... an interlocutory 624 or permanent injunction in any civil action, suit or proceeding required by any Act of Congress to be heard and determined by a district court of three judges." Unlike the more typical certiorari process, for cases falling within § 1253, appellate review in this Court is mandatory. That is why, until today, this Court has repeatedly recognized and adhered to a "long-established rule" requiring "strict construction" of this jurisdictional statute "to protect our appellate docket." Stainback v. Mo Hock Ke Lok Po, 336 U.S. 368, 375, 378, 69 S.Ct. 606, 93 L.Ed. 741 (1949); see, e.g., Gonzalez v. Automatic Employees Credit Union, 419 U.S. 90, 98, 95 S.Ct. 289, 42 L.Ed.2d 249 (1974) (noting that "only a narrow construction" of our jurisdiction under § 1253 "is consonant with the overriding policy, historically encouraged by Congress, of minimizing the mandatory docket of this Court in the interests of sound judicial administration"); Gunn v. University Comm. to End War in Viet Nam, 399 U.S. 383, 387, 90 S.Ct. 2013, 26 L.Ed.2d 684 (1970) (similar); Goldstein v. Cox, 396 U.S. 471, 477–478, 90 S.Ct. 671, 24 L.Ed.2d 663 (1970) (rejecting a construction of § 1253 that would "involve an expansion of [our] mandatory appellate jurisdiction," even where the statutory text "is subject to [that] construction," in light of "canon of construction" requiring that § 1253 be "narrowly construed"); Phillips v. United States, 312 U.S. 246, 248–250, 61 S.Ct. 480, 85 L.Ed. 800 (1941) (explaining that § 1253 is an "exceptional procedure" and that "inasmuch as this procedure ... brings direct review of a district court to this Court, any loose construction ... would defeat the purposes of Congress ... to keep within narrow confines our appellate docket").

In line with that command, this Court has held that a ruling on the merits will not suffice to invoke our mandatory appellate jurisdiction in the absence of an order granting or denying an injunction. In fact, even if a three-judge district court unequivocally indicates that a state law must be enjoined as it stands, we have required more before accepting mandatory review. For example, the Court in *2337 625 Gunn found no jurisdiction where the three-judge District Court held that a Texas disturbing-the-peace statute was " 'impermissibly and unconstitutionally broad,' " concluded that the plaintiffs were " 'entitled to their declaratory judgment to that effect, and to injunctive relief against the enforcement of [the statute] as now worded, insofar as it may affect the rights guaranteed under the First Amendment,' " and stayed the mandate to allow the State to, " 'if it so desires, enact such disturbing-the-peace statute as will meet constitutional requirements.' " 399 U.S., at 386, 90 S.Ct. 2013. Despite the District Court's resolution of the merits and its clear indication that, unless amended, the disturbing-the-peace statute would be enjoined, this Court dismissed an appeal from the State for want of jurisdiction, concluding that the District Court merely wrote a "rather discursive per curiam opinion" and "there was no order of any kind either granting or denying an injunction—interlocutory or permanent." Id., at 387, 90 S.Ct. 2013. The Court explained that, in addition to the congressional command to " 'keep within narrow confines our appellate docket,' " other "policy considerations" counseled limiting "our power of review," including "that until a district court issues an injunction, or enters an order denying one, it is simply not possible to know with any certainty what the court has decided." Id., at 387–388, 90 S.Ct. 2013. Those considerations, the Court thought, were "conspicuously evident" in that case, where the opinion did not specify, for instance, exactly what was to be enjoined or against whom the injunction would run. Id., at 388, 90 S.Ct. 2013.

Similarly, Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971), concerned a redistricting challenge in which a three-judge District Court held that "a redistricting of [the challenged county was] necessitated" and "that the evidence adduced ... and the additional apportionment requirements set forth by the Supreme Court call[ed] for a redistricting of the entire state as to both houses of the General Assembly," Chavis v. Whitcomb, 305 F.Supp. 1364, 1391 (S.D.Ind.1969). Recognizing "that the federal judiciary functions within a system of federalism which entrusts the responsibility of legislative apportionment and districting primarily to the state legislature," the District Court afforded the Governor "a reasonable 626 opportunity to call a Special Session of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana so that it may enact legislation to redistrict the State and reapportion the legislative seats in the General Assembly in accordance with federal constitutional requirements and in compliance with [its] opinion." Id., at 1392. The District Court gave the State a little over two months to enact new statutes "to remedy the improper districting and malapportionment." Ibid. When the Governor appealed from that order, this Court dismissed for want of jurisdiction because "at [the] time no judgment had been entered and no injunction had been granted or denied." 403 U.S., at 138, n. 19, 91 S.Ct. 1858. The findings of liability on the merits and the unequivocal indication that the redistricting and malapportionment violations had to be remedied were not enough.

B

Straightforward application of this precedent compels the conclusion that this Court lacks jurisdiction over these appeals. Here, Texas appeals from two orders entered by the three-judge District Court on August 15 and 24, 2017. Those orders concern the constitutional and statutory challenges to Texas' State House and federal congressional redistricting plans, enacted by the Texas Legislature (hereinafter Legislature) in 2013 (hereinafter the 2013 maps). As relevant here, the orders concerned Texas House districts in Bell County (HD54 and HD55), Dallas County (HD103, HD104, and HD105), Nueces *2338 County (HD32 and HD34), and Tarrant County (HD90), as well as federal congressional districts encompassing Nueces County (CD27) and parts of Travis County (CD35). The District Court concluded that plaintiffs had proved intentional discrimination as to HD54, HD55, HD103, HD104, HD105, HD32, HD34, and CD27.[1] It also 627 concluded that plaintiffs had proved a "results" violation under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act as to HD32, HD34, and CD27,[2] and had established a racial gerrymandering claim as to HD90 and CD35.[3]

Having ruled on the challengers' statutory and constitutional claims, the District Court stated that all but one of the "violations must be remedied by either the Texas Legislature or [the District] Court." 274 F.Supp.3d 624, 686 (W.D.Tex.2017); see also 267 F.Supp.3d 750, 795 (W.D.Tex.2017).[4] With respect to the § 2 results violation concerning HD32 and HD34, however, the District Court noted that it had yet to decide "whether § 2 requires a remedy for this results violation." Id., at 783, 795. The District Court then ordered "the [Texas] Office of the Attorney General [to] file a written advisory within three business days stating whether the Legislature intends to take up redistricting in an effort to cure these violations and, if so, when the matter will be considered." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686; see also 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795. The court went on: "If the Legislature does not intend to take up redistricting, the [District] Court will hold a hearing to consider remedial plans" on September 5 and 6, 2017, respecting the congressional and Texas House districts. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686–687; see also 628 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795. "In preparation for the hearing[s]," the District Court ordered the parties to confer and to "take immediate steps to consult with their experts and mapdrawers and prepare" maps to present at those hearings. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 687; 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795.

The District Court went no further. Though there had been a determination on the merits that Texas violated both the Equal Protection Clause and § 2 of the Voting Rights Act with respect to a number of districts in the 2013 maps, the District Court did not enjoin use of the 2013 maps for the upcoming 2018 elections. For instance, with respect to the congressional map, the District Court explained that its order "only partially addresse[d]" the challengers' claims, as it had "bifurcated the remedial phase" from the merits phase. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 687. Importantly, in denying Texas' motions for a stay, the District Court took care to make abundantly clear the scope of its orders: "Although the [District] Court found violations *2339 [in the congressional and Texas House maps], the [District] Court has not enjoined [their] use for any upcoming elections." App. 134a–136a.

That is the end of the inquiry under our precedent, as our past cases are directly on point. Like in Gunn and Whitcomb, the District Court issued a ruling on the merits against the State. Like in Gunn and Whitcomb, the District Court was clear that those violations required a remedy. Like in Gunn and Whitcomb, the District Court stayed its hand and did not enter an injunction, instead allowing the State an opportunity to remedy the violations. Therefore, like in Gunn and Whitcomb, this Court lacks jurisdiction under § 1253 because there is "no order of any kind either granting or denying an injunction—interlocutory or permanent." Gunn, 399 U.S., at 387, 90 S.Ct. 2013.[5]

629 C

1

Despite this precedent, the majority nonetheless concludes that our intervention at this early stage is not only authorized, but mandatory. None of the justifications that the majority offers for deviating from our precedent is persuasive.

The majority justifies its jurisdictional overreach by holding that § 1253 mandates appellate review in this Court if a three-judge district court order "has the 'practical effect' of granting or denying an injunction." Ante, at 2319. It reasons that the Court has "previously made clear that where an order has the 'practical effect' of granting or denying an injunction, it should be treated as such for purposes of appellate jurisdiction." Ibid. That reasoning, however, has no application here. Whereas this Court has applied the "practical effect" rule in the context of the courts of appeals' appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1), it has never applied it to questions of its own mandatory appellate docket under § 1253. That explains why the only cases the majority can round up to support its position concern jurisdiction 630 under § 1292(a)(1). Ante, at 2319 (citing Carson v. American Brands, Inc., 450 U.S. 79, 83–84, 101 S.Ct. 993, 67 L.Ed.2d 59 (1981), and Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 485 U.S. 271, 287–288, 108 S.Ct. 1133, 99 L.Ed.2d 296 (1988)).

This distinction matters a great deal. Courts of appeals generally have jurisdiction *2340 over direct appeals from the district courts. See 15A C. Wright, A. Miller, & E. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3901, p. 13 (3d ed. 1992) ("Courts of appeals jurisdiction extends to nearly every action that might be taken by a district court"). In contrast, exercising mandatory review over direct appeals in this Court is a truly "exceptional procedure," Phillips, 312 U.S., at 248, 61 S.Ct. 480 in no small part due to our "necessarily finite docket," 16B Wright, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4003, at 19. Reading § 1253 broadly risks transforming that exceptional procedure into a routine matter, when our precedent commands a strict construction precisely so that we can " 'keep within narrow confines our appellate docket.' " Goldstein, 396 U.S., at 478, 90 S.Ct. 671.

Brushing that distinction aside, the majority contends that "we also construe § 1292(a)(1) 'narrowly,' " and have referred to the statutes as " 'analogous.' " Ante, at 2319 – 2320. True, but that is no response to the jurisdictional obstacle of § 1253. The command from our precedent is not simply one to undertake the same narrow interpretation as we do for § 1292(a)(1). Rather, our "long-established rule" requires "strict construction" of § 1253, Stainback, 336 U.S., at 378, 69 S.Ct. 606 so that even where the statutory text could be read to expand our mandatory appellate docket, this Court will not adopt that reading if a narrower construction is available, Goldstein, 396 U.S., at 477–478, 90 S.Ct. 671. That "strict construction" rule exists for a purpose specific to this Court: to protect our "carefully limited appellate jurisdiction." Board of Regents of Univ. of Tex. System v. New Left Ed. Project, 404 U.S. 541, 543, 92 S.Ct. 652, 30 L.Ed.2d 697 (1972). Unlike the courts of appeals, which hear cases on mandatory jurisdiction regularly, this Court hears 631 cases on mandatory jurisdiction only rarely. The majority nowhere grapples with that vital contextual distinction between § 1253 and § 1292(a)(1). Nor does the majority acknowledge that, in interpreting § 1253, this Court has itself recognized that distinction, noting that "this Court above all others must limit its review of interlocutory orders." Goldstein, 396 U.S., at 478, 90 S.Ct. 671 (emphasis added).

2

Looking to escape that pitfall in its reasoning, the majority turns to the text of the two jurisdictional statutes. But the text provides no refuge for its position. The majority first states that "the relevant language in the two provisions is nearly identical." Ante, at 2320. But whereas § 1253 provides for appeal "from an order granting or denying ... an interlocutory or permanent injunction," § 1292(a)(1) provides for appeal from "[i]nterlocutory orders ... granting, continuing, modifying, refusing or dissolving injunctions, or refusing to dissolve or modify injunctions." It is a stretch, to say the least, to characterize these provisions as "nearly identical." Ante, at 2319 – 2320.

Next, the majority contends that § 1253 and § 1292(a)(1) are "textually interlocked," ante, at 2320, in that § 1292(a)(1) provides for appeal to the courts of appeals, "except where a direct review may be had in the Supreme Court." In its view, this demonstrates that the "practical effect" rule must apply under § 1253. The majority reasons that "the consequences would be unfortunate and strange" otherwise, imagining that an order from a three-judge district court that had the practical effect of an injunction but did not invoke § 1253 jurisdiction would "appear to be appealable to one of the courts of appeals" in light of the "excep[t]" clause, a result "Congress surely did not intend" given that it took "pains to provide for *2341 review in this Court, and not in the courts of appeals, of three-judge court orders granting injunctions." Ante, at 2320.

632 This reasoning rests on a mistaken premise. Congress did not provide for review of every three-judge court order in this Court. It provided for review of only certain narrow categories of orders, i.e., those granting or denying an injunction. There is nothing "unfortunate" or "strange" about the proposition that orders from a three-judge court that do not fall within these narrow categories of actions made directly appealable to this Court can be appealed only to the courts of appeals. In fact, this Court itself has recognized as much. See, e.g., Rockefeller v. Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn & Queens, Inc., 397 U.S. 820, 90 S.Ct. 1517, 25 L.Ed.2d 806 (1970) (per curiam) ("The judgment appealed from does not include an order granting or denying an interlocutory or permanent injunction and is therefore not appealable to this Court under 28 U.S.C. § 1253. The judgment of the District Court is vacated and the case is remanded to that court so that it may enter a fresh decree from which timely appeal may be taken to the Court of Appeals" (citation omitted)); see also*Mitchell v. Donovan,* 398 U.S. 427, 431–432, 90 S.Ct. 1763, 26 L.Ed.2d 378 (1970) (per curiam) (concluding that "this Court lacks jurisdiction of the appeal" under § 1253 and directing "the District Court [to] enter a fresh order ... thus affording the appellants an opportunity to take a timely appeal to the Court of Appeals").[6] And to the extent a party prematurely appeals to the court of appeals an order that would otherwise fall within § 1253, e.g., 633 if Texas had appealed the August 15 and 24 orders to the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, that court surely will be more than capable of identifying as much and instructing the party to wait for an actual injunction before bringing an appeal to this Court.

3

The majority attempts to bolster its jurisdictional conclusion with a passing reference to the "valuable purpose" served by the " 'practical effect' " rule, i.e., preventing district courts from manipulating proceedings by avoiding labeling their orders as " 'injunction[s].' " Ante, at 2318 – 2319. Notably, the majority cites no evidence for the proposition that district courts are engaging in any kind of manipulation. Nor is there any indication that the District Court here attempted to manipulate the proceedings by shielding its orders from appellate review. Instead, the District Court carefully adhered to a common practice in cases implicating important state interests, staying its hand as to the remedy to allow the State an opportunity to act, as happened in Gunn and Whitcomb.

More important, the majority ignores the "valuable purposes" served by the longstanding rule requiring strict construction of § 1253. Not only does it comply with the congressional command to " 'keep within narrow confines our appellate docket,' *2342 " but without strict enforcement of the requirement that an order grant or deny an injunction, "it is simply not possible to know with any certainty what the court has decided." Gunn, 399 U.S., at 387–388, 90 S.Ct. 2013. Such clarity "is absolutely vital in a case where a federal court is asked to nullify a law duly enacted by a sovereign State." Id., at 389, 90 S.Ct. 2013. Orders coming to this Court on direct appeal under the "practical effect" rule will more often than not lack that clarity.

In these cases, for instance, what does the majority read the "practical effect" of the orders to have been with respect to HD32 and HD34? The District Court held that the challengers 634 had "not proven that § 2 requires breaking the County Line Rule" in the Texas Constitution, Art. III, but that "§ 2 could require" drawing two majority-HCVAP[7] districts. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 783, 795. Does the majority read that to mean that the § 2 results violation could potentially go without a remedy? If so, there would have been no obstacle to use of the 2013 maps for those districts even after a remedial phase. Or does the majority read that to mean that the challengers still had more to show before the District Court "would" redraw the districts that § 2 "could" require to be redrawn? And what is the effect of the conclusion respecting the County Line Rule on the potential remedy for the intentional vote dilution holding as to HD32 and HD34? The majority conveniently avoids confronting this lack of clarity by ignoring the relevant record, instead stating without explanation that it believes "it clear that the District Court effectively enjoined use of these districts as currently configured." Ante, at 2323, n. 15. But it cannot escape the reality that its rule will "needlessly complicate appellate review," ante, at 2321, given that "it is simply not possible [absent an injunction] to know with any certainty what the court has decided," Gunn, 399 U.S., at 388, 90 S.Ct. 2013.

I do not disagree that "lack of specificity in an injunctive order would [not] alone deprive the Court of jurisdiction under § 1253." Id., at 389, n. 4, 90 S.Ct. 2013; see also ante, at 2321 (quoting Gunn). "But the absence of any semblance of effort by the District Court to comply with [the specificity required of injunctive orders under the Federal Rules] makes clear that the court did not think its [orders] constituted an order granting an injunction." Gunn, 399 U.S., at 389, n.4. 90 S.Ct. 2013. If any doubt remained as to the effect of the orders here, moreover, the District Court explicitly assured the parties that, even though it had found violations, it was not enjoining use of the 2013 maps for the upcoming elections. App. 134a–136a.

635 Finally, it is axiomatic that "administrative simplicity is a major virtue in a jurisdictional statute." Hertz Corp. v.

Friend, 559 U.S. 77, 94, 130 S.Ct. 1181, 175 L.Ed.2d 1029 (2010).

> "Complex jurisdictional tests complicate a case.... Complex tests produce appeals and reversals, [and] encourage gamesmanship.... Judicial resources too are at stake [as] courts benefit from straightforward rules under which they can readily assure themselves of their power to hear a case. Simple jurisdictional rules also promote greater predictability." Ibid. (citations omitted).

Simple is thus the name of the game when it comes to jurisdictional rules. The rule in the majority opinion is anything but. Although the majority claims that a mere "finding on liability cannot be appealed unless an injunction is granted or denied," *2343 ante, at 2324, the rule it embraces today makes it hard to understand when a finding on liability would not be read, as the majority does here, as having the "practical effect" of an injunction. It is a worrisome prospect that, after today, whenever a three-judge district court expresses that a statutory or constitutional violation must be remedied, the party held liable will straightaway file an appeal in this Court and assert jurisdiction under § 1253, even where the district court is clear that no injunction has issued.[8]

636 The majority opinion purports to add a limit by distinguishing between unappealable orders that find a plan "unlawful long before the next scheduled election" or "very close to the election date," and those (presumably) appealable orders that are entered neither "long before" nor "very close" to the next election. Ante, at 2323 – 2324.[9] What does that even mean? The orders at issue here were entered about 15 months before the 2018 elections, and according to the majority fall within the not "long before" but not "very close" appealable range. Why this is so, however, the majority never says. Without any definitions for its boundary posts, courts will be left to wonder: What about orders entered 17 or 18 months before an election? Are those considered "long before" so they would be unappealable? And are orders entered 14, 13, or 12 months before the election similarly unappealable because they were entered "very close" to the election date? And what does the majority mean by "the election date"? Does that include primaries? What about registration deadlines, or ballot-printing deadlines? It is not uncommon for there to be, at any given time, multiple impending deadlines relating to an upcoming election. Thinking through the many variations of jurisdictional disputes that will arise over the years following this novel reading of § 1253 should be enough to stop the majority from rewriting our long established jurisprudence in this area.

After today, our mandatory appellate docket will be flooded by unhappy litigants in three-judge district court cases, demanding our review. Given the lack of predictability, 637 the rule will incentivize appeals and "encourage gamesmanship." Hertz Corp., 559 U.S., at 94, 130 S.Ct. 1181. The Court will no doubt regret the day it opened its courthouse doors to such time-consuming and needless manipulation of its docket.

D

Even if the majority were correct to import the "practical effect" rule into the *2344 § 1253 context, moreover, that would still not justify the Court's premature intervention in these appeals for at least two reasons. First, while taking from Carson the "practical effect" rule it likes, the majority gives short shrift to the second half of that case, in which the Court was explicit that "[u]nless a litigant can show that an interlocutory order ... might have a 'serious, perhaps irreparable, consequence,' and that the order can be 'effectually challenged' only by immediate appeal, the general congressional policy against piecemeal review will preclude interlocutory appeal." 450 U.S., at 84, 101 S.Ct. 993. Texas has made no showing of a "serious, perhaps irreparable consequence" requiring our immediate intervention, nor has Texas shown that the orders could not be "effectually challenged" after the remedial stage was completed. In fact, when Texas sought a stay of those orders before this Court, the 2018 elections were more than a year away. For the majority, however, it is enough that the District Court found the Texas redistricting maps to be in violation of federal law. Ante, at 2323 – 2324. That cursory application of Carson, in particular whether the injunctions the majority reads into the August 15 and 24 orders could be "effectually challenged" absent immediate appeal to this Court, deprives that limit to our jurisdiction of much of its meaning when assessing Texas' request for our intervention in these cases. Nothing in our precedent supports that truncated approach. And in any event, if Texas wanted review of the orders after any injunction was entered by the District Court, it could have asked this Court for an emergency stay.

638 Second, the August 15 and 24 orders at issue here simply did not have the "practical effect" of enjoining Texas' use of the 2013 maps. The majority thinks otherwise in part because the District Court noted that the violations " 'must be remedied.' " Ante, at 2321 – 2322. In addition, the majority believes that "Texas had reason to fear that if it tried to conduct elections under plans that the court had found to be racially discriminatory, the court would infer an evil motive and perhaps subject the State once again to the strictures of preclearance under § 3(c) of the Voting Rights Act." Ante, at 2322. But the majority forgets that the District Court made explicit that "[a]lthough [it] found violations [in the 2013 maps], [it] ha[d] not enjoined [their] use for any upcoming elections." App. 134a–136a. That the District Court requested the Texas attorney general to advise it, within "three business days," whether "the Legislature intends to take up redistricting in an effort to cure [the] violations," 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686; 267 F.Supp.3d, at 795, does not undermine that unequivocal statement. Nothing in that language indicates that the District Court required the Legislature to "redraw both maps immediately " or else "the court would do so itself." Brief for Appellants 20 (emphasis in original). Instead, recognizing "that the federal judiciary functions within a system of federalism which entrusts the responsibility of legislative ... districting primarily to the state legislature," Whitcomb, 305 F.Supp., at 1392, the District Court gave Texas an opportunity to involve its Legislature and asked for a simple statement of intent so that the court could manage its docket accordingly. This request for a statement of intent, which was necessary for the District Court to manage its own docket, does not transform the orders into injunctions.

As to the second point, if Texas had any "fear" regarding the use of its maps, despite having been explicitly told that the maps were not enjoined, that would still not be enough. This Court recognized in Gunn that the State in that case, 639 faced *2345 with the order declaring its statute unconstitutional, "would no doubt hesitate long before disregarding it." 399 U.S., at 390, 90 S.Ct. 2013. That hesitation was not enough in Gunn to magically transform an order into an injunction for purposes of § 1253, and nothing about these cases justifies the majority taking out its wand today. Whatever "fear" Texas had does not transform the August 15 and 24 orders into injunctions. And absent an injunction, this Court lacks jurisdiction over these appeals. The cases should thus be dismissed.

II

Having rewritten the limits of § 1253, the majority moves to the merits. There again the Court goes astray. It asserts that the District Court legally erred when it purportedly shifted the burden of proof and "required the State to show that the 2013 Legislature somehow purged the 'taint' that the court attributed to the defunct and never-used plans enacted by a prior legislature in 2011." Ante, at 2324. But that holding ignores the substantial amount of evidence of Texas' discriminatory intent, and indulges Texas' warped reading of the legal analysis and factual record below.[10]

A

Before delving into the content of the August 15 and 24 orders, a quick recap of the rather convoluted history of these cases is useful. In 2011, the Texas Legislature redrew its electoral districts. Various plaintiff groups challenged the 2011 maps under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act and the Fourteenth Amendment, and those lawsuits were consolidated before the three-judge District Court below pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284(a). Because Texas then was subject to preclearance under § 5 of the Voting Rights Act, the 2011 640 maps did not take effect immediately, and Texas filed a declaratory action in the District Court for the District of Columbia to obtain preclearance.

"Faced with impending election deadlines and un-precleared plans that could not be used in the [2012] election, [the District] Court was faced with the 'unwelcome obligation' of implementing interim plans so that the primaries could proceed." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 632. In January 2012, this Court vacated the first iteration of those interim maps in Perry v. Perez, 565 U.S. 388, 394–395, 132 S.Ct. 934, 181 L.Ed.2d 900 (2012) (per curiam), finding that the District Court failed to afford sufficient deference to the Legislature. In February 2012, the District Court issued more deferential interim plans, but noted that its analysis had been expedited and curtailed, and that it had only made preliminary conclusions that might be revised on full consideration. C.J.S. 367a–424a; H.J.S. 300a–315a.

In August 2012, the D.C. District Court denied preclearance of the 2011 maps. Texas v. United States, 887 F.Supp.2d 133 (2012). It concluded that the federal congressional map had "retrogressive effect" and "was enacted with discriminatory intent," id., at 159, 161, and that the State House map was retrogressive and that "the full record strongly suggests that the retrogressive effect ... may not have been accidental," id., at 178. Texas appealed, and the case was eventually dismissed following Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S.

529, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 186 L.Ed.2d 651 (2013) (holding unconstitutional the formula used to subject States to the preclearance requirement).

2346 In June 2013, the Texas Governor called a special legislative session, and that same month the Legislature adopted the 2012 interim maps as the permanent maps for the State. The Legislature made small changes to the maps, including redrawing the lines in HD90, but the districts at issue in these appeals all remained materially unchanged from the 2011 maps.

The District Court in these cases denied Texas' motion to dismiss the challenges to the 2011 maps, and the challengers *641 amended their complaints to assert claims respecting the 2013 maps. In April and May 2017, the District Court held that districts in Texas' 2011 maps violated § 2 and the Fourteenth Amendment. The August 15 and 24 orders respecting the 2013 maps followed.

B

The majority believes that, in analyzing the 2013 maps, the District Court erroneously "attributed [the] same [discriminatory] intent [harbored by the 2011 Legislature] to the 2013 Legislature" and required the 2013 Legislature to purge that taint. Ante, at 2317 – 2318. The District Court did no such thing. It engaged in a painstaking analysis of discriminatory intent under Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977), which is critical to understanding why, as explained in Part II–D, infra, the District Court did not improperly presume that the Legislature acted with discriminatory intent.

Under Arlington Heights, "in determining whether racially discriminatory intent existed," this Court considers "circumstantial and direct evidence" of: (1) the discriminatory "impact of the official action," (2) the "historical background," (3) the "specific sequence of events leading up to the challenged decision," (4) departures from procedures or substance, and (5) the "legislative or administrative history," including any "contemporary statements" of the lawmakers. 429 U.S., at 266–268, 97 S.Ct. 555. Although this analysis must start from a strong "presumption of good faith," Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), a court must not overlook the relevant facts. This Court reviews the "findings of fact" made by the District Court, including those respecting legislative motivations, "only for clear error." Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 293, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 1465, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017); see also Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985). The Court therefore "may not reverse just because we 'would have decided the [matter] differently.'.... A finding that is 'plausible' in light of the *642 full record—even if another is equally or more so—must govern." Harris, 581 U.S., at 293, 137 S.Ct., at 1465.

The District Court followed the guidance in Arlington Heights virtually to a tee, and its factual findings are more than "plausible" in light of the record. To start, there is no question as to the discriminatory impact of the 2013 plans, as the "specific portions of the 2011 plans that [the District Court] found to be discriminatory or unconstitutional racial gerrymanders continue unchanged in the 2013 plans, their harmful effects 'continu[ing] to this day.' " 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649 (alteration in original). Texas, moreover, has a long "history of discrimination" against minority voters. Id., at 648, n. 37. "In the last four decades, Texas has found itself in court every redistricting cycle, and each time it has lost." Texas, 887 F.Supp.2d, at 161.

There is also ample evidence that the 2013 Legislature knew of the discrimination that tainted its 2011 maps. "The 2013 plans were enacted by a substantially similar 2347 Legislature with the same leadership only two years after the original enactment." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 648, n. 37. The Legislature was also well aware that "the D.C. court concluded that [its 2011] maps were tainted by evidence of discriminatory purpose," H.J.S. 443a, and despite the District Court having warned of the potential that the Voting Rights Act may require further changes to the maps, "the Legislature continued its steadfast refusal to consider [that] possibility," 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649.

Turning to deliberative process—on which the majority is singularly focused, to the exclusion of the rest of the factors analyzed in the orders below, see Part II–D, infra—the District Court concluded that Texas was just "not truly interested in fixing any remaining discrimination in the [maps]." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 651, n. 45. Despite knowing of the discrimination in its 2011 maps, "the Legislature did not engage in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured *643 any taint from the 2011 plans."[11] Id., at 649. For instance, Representative Darby, a member of the redistricting committee, "kept stating that he wanted to be informed of legal deficiencies so he could fix them," but "he did not himself seek to have the plan evaluated for deficiencies and he willfully ignored those who pointed out deficiencies, continuing to emphasize that he had thought 'from the start' that the interim plans were fully legal." Id., at 651, n. 45.[12] The 644 Legislature made no substantive changes to the challenged districts that *2348 were the subject of the 2011 complaints, and "there is no indication that the Legislature looked to see whether any discriminatory taint remained in the plans." Id., at 649. In fact, the only substantive change that the Legislature made to the maps was to add more discrimination in the form of a new racially gerrymandered HD90, as the majority concedes. Ante, at 2334 – 2335.

The absence of a true deliberative process was coupled with a troubling sequence of events leading to the enactment of the 2013 maps. Specifically, "the Legislature pushed the redistricting bills through quickly in a special session," 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649, despite months earlier having been urged by the Texas attorney general to take on redistricting during the regular session, id., at 634; see also H.J.S. 440a. By pushing the bills through a special session, the Legislature did not have to comply with "a two-thirds rule in the Senate or a calendar rule in the House," 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649, n. 38, and it avoided the "full public notice and hearing" that would have allowed " 'meaningful input' from all Texans, including the minority community," H.J.S. 444a. In addition, "necessary resources were not allocated to support a true deliberative process." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649. For instance, the House committee "did not have counsel when the session started." Ibid., n. 39.

Nor can Texas credibly claim to have understood the 2012 interim orders as having endorsed the legality of its maps so that adopting them would resolve the challengers' complaints. 645 In its 2012 interim orders, "the [District] Court clearly warned that its preliminary conclusions ... were not based on a full examination of the record or the governing law and were subject to revision" "given the severe time constraints ... at the time" the orders were adopted. Id., at 650. The District Court also explained that the "claims presented ... involve difficult and unsettled legal issues as well as numerous factual disputes." C.J.S. 367a. During the redistricting hearings, chief legislative counsel for the Texas Legislative Council in 2013, Jeff Archer, advised the Legislature that the District Court " 'had not made full determinations, ... had not made fact findings on every issue, had not thoroughly analyzed all the evidence,' " and had " 'made it explicitly clear that this was an interim plan to address basically first impression of voting rights issues.' " 274 F.Supp.3d, at 650 (alterations in original); see also App. 441a–442a (testimony that interim plans were "impromptu" and "preliminary" and that the District Court "disclaimed making final determinations"). Archer explained that although the Legislature had " 'put to bed' " challenges regarding " 'those issues that the [District] Court identified so far,' " it had not " 'put the rest to bed.' " 274 F.Supp.3d, at 651, n. 45; see also App. 446a–447a (advising that, "on a realistic level," the Legislature had not "removed legal challenges" and that adopting the interim maps "in no way would inoculate the plans").

There was substantial evidence that the 2013 Legislature instead adopted the interim plans as part of a "strategy [that] involved adopting the interim maps, however flawed," to insulate (and thus continue to benefit from) the discriminatory taint of its 2011 maps. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 651. Texas hoped that, by adopting the 2012 interim maps, the challengers "would have no remedy, and [the Legislature] would maintain the benefit of such discrimination or unconstitutional effects." Ibid. That strategy originated with the Texas attorney general, who was responsible for defending 646 the State in the redistricting challenges. Id., at 650, and n. 41. He advised the Legislature that adopting the interim plans was the " 'best way to *2349 avoid further intervention from federal judges' " and to " 'insulate [Texas'] redistricting plans from further legal challenge.' " Id., at 650 (emphasis added); see also H.J.S. 443a. The Texas attorney general also drafted the "legislative fact findings accompanying the plans, before the Legislature had engaged in any fact findings on the bills," stating that the 2012 interim plans "complied 'with all federal and state constitutional provisions or laws applicable to redistricting plans.' " 274 F.Supp.3d, at 650, n. 41 (emphasis added). That the legislative factfindings were predrafted by the attorney defending Texas in these redistricting challenges—purporting to conclude that the 2012 interim plans complied with the law, when in fact the evidence showed that the Legislature did not engage in a true deliberative process or meaningfully consider evidence of the legality of the plans so that it could have endorsed such factfindings—demonstrates that the adoption of the interim plans was a mere pretext to insulate the discriminatory benefits of the 2011 plans. That explains why legislators thought that removal of those factfindings would " 'gu[t] the bill.' " Ibid.

In the end, having presided over years of litigation and seeing firsthand all of the evidence, the District Court thought it clear that Texas' "strategy involved adopting the interim maps, however flawed," so that the challengers "would have no remedy, and [Texas] would maintain the benefit of such discrimination and unconstitutional effects." Id., at 651. It is hard to imagine what a more thorough consideration of the Arlington Heights factors in these cases would have looked like. Review of the District Court's thorough inquiry leads to the inescapable conclusion that it did not err—let alone clearly err—in concluding that the "Legislature in 2013 intentionally furthered and continued the existing discrimination in the plans." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 652.

647 C

In contrast to that thorough Arlington Heights inquiry, the majority engages in a cursory analysis of the record to justify its conclusion that the evidence "overwhelmingly" shows that Texas acted with legitimate intent. Ante, at 2328. Two critical things are conspicuously missing from its analysis: first, consideration of the actual factual record (or most of it, anyway),[13] and second, meaningful consideration of the limits of our review of facts on these appeals.[14]

The majority first makes reference to the fact that the Texas attorney general "advised the Legislature that the best way to [end the redistricting litigation] was to adopt the interim, court-issued plans," a position repeated by the sponsor of the plans. Ante, at 2327. And in its view, it was reasonable for the Legislature to believe that adopting the interim plans "might at least reduce objections and thus *2350 simplify and expedite the conclusion of the litigation." Ante, at 2328. The majority also states that "there is no evidence that the Legislature thought that the plans were invalid." Ante, at 2327. In reaching those findings, however, the majority ignores all of the evidence in the record that demonstrates that the Legislature was aware of (and ignored) the infirmities in the maps, that it knew that adopting the interim plans would not resolve the litigation concerning the disputed districts, 648 and that it nevertheless moved forward with the bills as a strategy to "insulate" the discriminatory maps from further judicial scrutiny and perpetuate the discrimination embedded in the 2012 interim maps. See Part II–B, supra.

Instead of engaging with the factual record, the majority opinion sets out its own view of "the situation when the Legislature adopted the court-approved interim plans." Ante, at 2328. Under that view, "the Legislature [had] good reason to believe that the court-approved interim plans were legally sound," particularly in light of our remand instructions in Perry, 565 U.S. 388, 132 S.Ct. 934, 181 L.Ed.2d 900. Ante, at 2328 – 2329. The majority nowhere considers, however, the evidence regarding what the Legislature actually had before it concerning the effect of the interim orders, including the explicit cautionary statements in the orders and the repeated warnings of the chief legislative counsel that the interim plans were preliminary, incomplete, and impromptu.[15] See Part II–B, supra.

The majority finds little significance in the fact that the Legislature " 'pushed the redistricting bills through quickly 649 in a special session,' " reasoning that a special session was needed "because the regular session had ended." Ante, at 2329. That of course ignores the evidence that the Legislature disregarded requests by the Texas attorney general, months earlier, to take up redistricting during the regular session, that proceeding through a special session permitted the Legislature to circumvent procedures that would have ensured full and adequate consideration, and that resources were not sufficiently allocated to permit considered review of the plans. See Part II–B, supra.

Finally, the majority sees nothing wrong with the fact that the Legislature failed "to take into account the problems with the 2011 plans that the D.C. court identified in denying preclearance." Ante, at 2329. It maintains that the purpose of adopting the interim plans was to "fix the problems identified by the D.C. court" and reasons that the interim maps did just that by modifying any problematic districts. Ibid. *2351 But of course the finding of discriminatory intent rested not only on what happened with particular districts. Rather, the evidence suggested that discriminatory motive permeated the entire 2011 redistricting process, as the D.C. court considered that "Texas has found itself in court every redistricting cycle [in the last four decades], and each time it has lost"; that "Black and Hispanic members of Congress testified at trial that they were excluded completely from the process of drafting new maps, while the preferences of Anglo members were frequently solicited and honored"; that the redistricting committees "released a joint congressional redistricting proposal for the public to view only after the start of a special legislative session, and each provided only seventy-two hours' notice before the sole public hearing on the proposed plan in each committee"; that minority members of the Texas Legislature "raised concerns regarding their exclusion from the drafting process and their inability to influence the plan"; and that the Legislature departed from normal procedure in the "failure to release a redistricting 650 proposal during the regular session, the limited time for review, and the failure to provide counsel with the necessary election data to evaluate [Voting Rights Act] compliance." 887 F.Supp.2d, at 161. The majority also ignores the findings of retrogression concerning the previous version of CD25, which of course are relevant to the challengers' claims about CD27 and CD35 in this litigation and were not addressed in the 2012 interim plans. See Part III–A, infra. That the 2012 interim maps addressed some of the deficiencies identified by the D.C. court in the preclearance litigation does not mean that the Legislature in 2013 was free to wholly disregard the significance of other evidence of discrimination that tainted its 2011 maps and were entrenched in the 2012 interim maps.

Even had the majority not ignored the factual record, it still would be wrong in concluding that the District Court erred in finding that the 2013 Legislature acted with the intent to further and benefit from the discrimination in the 2011 maps. In light of the record before this Court, the finding of invidious intent is at least more than " 'plausible' " and thus "must govern." Harris, 581 U.S., at 293, 137 S.Ct., at 1465. The majority might think that it has a "better view of the facts" than the District Court did, but "the very premise of clear error review is that there are often 'two permissible'—because two 'plausible'—'views of the evidence.' " Id., at 299, 137 S.Ct., at 1468.

D

The majority resists the weight of all this evidence of invidious intent not only by disregarding most of it and ignoring the clear-error posture but also by endorsing Texas' distorted characterizations of the intent analysis in the orders below. Specifically, the majority accepts Texas' argument that the District Court "reversed the burden of proof" and "imposed on the State the obligation of proving that the 2013 Legislature had experienced a true 'change of heart' and had 'engage[d] in a deliberative process to ensure that 651 the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans.' " Ante, at 2325 (alteration in original). The District Court did no such thing, and only a selective reading of the orders below could support Texas' position.

It is worth noting, as a preliminary matter, that the majority does not question the relevance of historical discrimination in assessing present discriminatory intent. Indeed, the majority leaves undisturbed the longstanding principle recognized in Arlington Heights that the " 'historical background' of a legislative enactment is 'one evidentiary source' relevant to the question *2352 of intent." Ante, at 2325 (quoting Arlington Heights, 429 U.S., at 267, 97 S.Ct. 555). With respect to these cases, the majority explicitly acknowledges that, in evaluating whether the 2013 Legislature acted with discriminatory purpose, "the intent of the 2011 Legislature [is] relevant" and "must be weighed together with any other direct and circumstantial evidence" bearing on intent. Ante, at 2327.

If consideration of this " 'historical background' " factor means anything in the context of assessing intent of the 2013 Legislature, it at a minimum required the District Court to assess how the 2013 Legislature addressed the known discrimination that motivated the drawing of the district lines that the Legislature was adopting, unchanged, from the 2011 maps. Therefore, the findings as to whether the 2013 Legislature engaged in a good-faith effort to address any known discrimination that tainted its 2011 plans were entirely apposite, so long as the District Court "weighed [this factor] together with any other direct and circumstantial evidence" bearing on the intent question, and so long as the burden remained on the challengers to establish invidious intent. Ibid.

The majority faults the District Court for not adequately engaging in that weighing and giving too "central" a focus to the historical factor in its intent analysis. Ante, at 2325 – 2326; see also Ibid., That alleged "central" focus, the majority contends, led the District Court to shift the 652 burden of proof on the intent inquiry away from the challengers, instead requiring Texas to show that the Legislature cured its past transgressions. Ante, at 2325 – 2326. Those conclusions can only be supported if, as Texas and the majority have done, one engages in a highly selective reading of the District Court orders.

To begin, entirely absent from the majority opinion is any reference to the portions of the District Court orders that unequivocally confirm its understanding that the burden remained on the challengers to show that the 2013 Legislature acted with invidious intent. The District Court was explicit that the challengers bore the burden to "establish their claim by showing that the Legislature adopted the plans with a discriminatory purpose, maintained the district lines with a discriminatory purpose, or intentionally furthered preexisting intentional discrimination." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 646; see also id., at 645 (discussing Circuit precedent regarding the showing needed for "a plaintiff [to] meet the purpose standard").[16]

Even when it does look at the actual language of the orders, the majority picks the few phrases that it believes support its 2353 argument, choosing to disregard the rest. For instance, *653 the majority quotes the District Court order as having required Texas to show that the 2013 Legislature had a " 'change of heart.' " Ante, at 2325 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649). When that sentence is read in full, however, it is evident that the District Court was not imposing a "duty to expiate" the bad intent of the previous Legislature, as the majority contends, ante, at 2325 – 2326, but instead was describing what the weighing of the direct and circumstantial evidence revealed about the motivations of the 2013 Legislature: "The decision to adopt the interim plans was not a change of heart concerning the validity of [the challengers'] claims ... —it was a litigation strategy designed to insulate the 2011 or 2013 plans from further challenge, regardless of their legal infirmities." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649–650.

Likewise, the majority quotes the orders as requiring proof that the Legislature " 'engage[d] in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans.' " Ante, at 2325 – 2326 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 649). But the District Court did not put the burden on Texas to make that affirmative showing. Instead, that partial quote is lifted from a sentence in which the District Court, having held a trial on these factual issues, concluded that the challengers had met their burden to show that "the Legislature did not engage in a deliberative process," which it supported later in that paragraph with findings that the Legislature "pushed the redistricting bills through quickly in a special session" without allocating the "necessary resources ... to support a true deliberative process." Id., at 649.

The majority finally asserts that the District Court "drove the point home" when it "summarized its analysis" as follows: " 'The discriminatory taint [from the 2011 plans] was not removed by the Legislature's enactment of the Court's interim plans, because the Legislature engaged in no deliberative process to remove any such taint, and in fact intended any such taint to be maintained but safe from remedy.' " Ante, at 2325 – 2326 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686). The majority no *654 doubt hopes that the reader will focus on the portion of the sentence in which the District Court concludes that the discriminatory taint found in the 2011 maps " 'was not removed' " by the enactment of the interim maps " 'because the Legislature engaged in no deliberative process to remove any such taint.' " Ante, at 2325 (quoting 274 F.Supp.3d, at 686).[17] But the majority ignores the import of the remaining part of the sentence, in which the District Court held that the Legislature "in fact intended any such taint to be maintained but be safe from remedy." *id.,*at 652; see also id., at 686. The majority also conveniently leaves out the sentence that immediately follows: "The Legislature in 2013 intentionally furthered and continued the existing discrimination in the plans." Id., at 652. When read in full and in context, it is clear that the District Court remained focused on the evidence proving the intent of the 2013 Legislature to shield its plans from a remedy and thus further the discrimination, rather than simply presuming invidious intent 2354 from the failure to remove the taint, as the majority claims.

In selectively reviewing the record below, the majority attempts to shield itself from the otherwise unavoidable conclusion that the District Court did not err. If forced to acknowledge the true scope of the legal analysis in the orders below, the majority would find itself without support for its insistence that the District Court was singularly focused on whether the Legislature "removed" past taint. And then the majority would have to contend with the thorough analysis of the Arlington Heights factors, Part II–B, supra, that *655 led the District Court to conclude that the 2013 Legislature acted with invidious intent.

III

The majority fares no better in its district-by-district analysis. In line with the theme underlying the rest of its analysis, the majority opinion overlooks the factual record and mischaracterizes the bulk of the analysis in the orders below in concluding that the District Court erred in finding a § 2 results violation as to CD27, HD32, and HD34. I first address CD27, and then turn to HD32 and HD34.

A

1

To put in context the objections to the District Court's conclusion regarding CD27, a brief review of the District Court's factual findings as to that district is necessary. Before 2011, CD27 was a Latino opportunity district, i.e., a majority-HCVAP district with an opportunity to elect a Hispanic-preferred candidate. When the Legislature reconfigured the district in 2013, it moved Nueces County, a majority-HCVAP county, into a new Anglo-majority district to protect an incumbent "who was not the candidate of choice of those Latino voters" and likely would have been "ousted" by them absent the redistricting. C.J.S. 191a. The District Court found that the "placement of Nueces County Hispanics in an Anglo-majority district ensures that the Anglo majority usually will defeat the minority-preferred candidate, given the racially polarized voting in the area." Id., at 189a–190a. It also found that "the political processes are not equally open to Hispanics" in Texas as a result of its "history of official discrimination touching on the right of Hispanics to register, vote, and otherwise to participate in the democratic process [that] is well documented," and that "Latinos bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education and employment/income, which hinder their 656 ability to participate effectively in the political process." Id., at 190a–191a. Given those findings, the District Court concluded that the newly constituted CD27 "has the effect of diluting Nueces County Hispanic voters' electoral opportunity." Id., at 191a.

Texas nevertheless contended (and maintains here) that no § 2 results violation existed because only "seven compact Latino opportunity districts could be drawn in South/West Texas," id., at 181a, and that all seven districts already existed under its maps. To explain how it counted to seven, Texas pointed to the creation of CD35 as a supposed new Latino opportunity district that joined Travis County Hispanics with Hispanics in San Antonio. The District Court agreed that only seven such districts could be drawn in the area, but rejected Texas' invocation of CD35 as a defense. The District Court concluded that because Travis County "[did] not have Anglo bloc voting," 274 F.Supp.3d, at 683, § 2 did not require the placement of Travis County Hispanics in an opportunity district, C.J.S. 176a; see also Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). The District Court *2355 found that Texas had moved Travis County Hispanics from their pre–2011 district, CD25, to the newly constituted CD35, not to comply with § 2, but "to use race as a tool for partisan goals ... to intentionally destroy an existing district with significant minority population (both African American and Hispanic) that consistently elected a Democrat (CD25)." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 683. Thus, it concluded that "CD35 was an impermissible racial gerrymander because race predominated in its creation without furthering a compelling state interest." Ibid.

Importantly, the District Court concluded that, without CD35, Texas could have drawn one more Latino opportunity district in South/West Texas that included Nueces County Hispanics. C.J.S. 181a; see also id., at 190a ("Plaintiffs have thus shown that a district could be drawn in which Hispanics, including Nueces County Hispanics, are sufficiently numerous and geographically compact to constitute a majority 657 HCVAP"); id., at 192a ("Numerous maps also demonstrated that accommodating the § 2 rights of all or most Nueces County Hispanic voters would not compromise the § 2 rights of any other voters, and in fact including it substantially accommodates the § 2 rights of Hispanic voters in South/West Texas"). Indeed, "[p]lans were submitted during the legislative session and during this litigation that showed that seven compact districts could be drawn that included all or most Nueces County Hispanic voters but not Travis County voters." Id., at 181a, n. 47.

2

Nothing in the record or the parties' briefs suggests that the District Court clearly erred in these findings of fact, which unambiguously support its conclusion that there is a § 2 results violation with respect to CD27. Nevertheless, the majority offers two reasons for reversing that conclusion. First, the majority contends that the District Court erred because "in evaluating the presence of majority bloc voting in CD35," it "looked at only one, small part of the district, the portion that falls within Travis County." Ante, at 2331 – 2332. It cites to Bethune–Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 192, 137 S.Ct. 788, 800, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017), an equal protection racial gerrymandering case, for the proposition "that redistricting analysis must take place at the district level." Ante, at 2332. According to the majority, then, the District Court should have looked at the existence of majority bloc voting in CD35 as a whole after the 2011 redistricting.

But the majority confuses the relevant inquiry, as well as the relevant timeline. The particular § 2 question here does not concern the status of Travis County Latinos in the newly constituted CD35 after the 2011 redistricting. Rather, it concerns the status of Travis County Latinos in the old CD25, prior to the 2011 redistricting. That is because the challengers' § 2 claim concerns the choices before the Legislature at the time of the 2011 redistricting, when it was deciding which Latinos in Southwest Texas to place in the 658 new opportunity district to be created in that area of the State. The Legislature chose to include Travis County Latinos in an opportunity district at the expense of the Nueces County Latinos, who were instead moved into a majority-Anglo district. So the question is whether, knowing that Nueces County Latinos indisputably had a § 2 right, the Legislature's choice was nevertheless justified because the Travis County Latinos also had a § 2 right that needed to be accommodated. In other words, did the Legislature actually create a new § 2 opportunity district for persons with a § 2 right, or did it simply move people without a § 2 right into a new 2356 district and just call it an opportunity district? To answer that question, the status of Travis County Latinos in 2011 is the only thing that matters, and the District Court thus correctly focused its inquiry on whether bloc voting existed in Travis County prior to the 2011 redistricting, such that Travis County Latinos could be found to have a § 2 right. Whether the newly constituted CD35 now qualifies as a § 2 opportunity district—an inquiry that would, as the majority suggests, call for district wide consideration—is beside the point.

Second, the majority reasons that "the 2013 Legislature had 'good reasons' to believe that [CD35] was a viable Latino opportunity district that satisfied the Gingles factors." Ante, at 2332. For this, the majority cites to the fact that the district "was based on a concept proposed by MALDEF" and that one group of plaintiffs "argued that the district [was] mandated by § 2," and vaguely suggests that, contrary to the District Court's finding, "there is ample evidence" of majority bloc voting in CD35. Ibid.[18]

The majority forgets, yet again, that we review factual findings for clear error. Harris, 581 U.S., at 293, 137 S.Ct., at 1464–1465. Indeed, *659 its analysis is too cursory even for de novo review. The majority does not meaningfully engage with the full factual record below. Instead, it looks only to the handful of favorable facts cited in Texas' briefs. Compare Brief for Appellants 46 with ante, at 2332. Had the majority considered the full record, it could only have found that the District Court cited ample evidence in support of its conclusion that the Legislature had no basis for believing that § 2 required its drawing of CD35. In fact, the District Court noted that Texas in 2011 "actually asserted that CD35 is not required by § 2," C.J.S. 174a, n. 40, that the main plan architect testified that he was not sure whether § 2 required drawing the district, and that testimony at trial showed that the district was drawn because, on paper, it would fulfill the requirement of being majority-HCVAP while providing Democrats only one new district, and "not because all of the Gingles factors were satisfied," id., at 179a, n. 45. The District Court also concluded that "there is no evidence that any member of the Legislature ... had any basis in evidence for believing that CD35 was required by § 2 other than its HCVAP-majority status." Ibid.

Had the majority properly framed the inquiry and applied the clear-error standard to the full factual record, it could not convincingly dispute the existence of a § 2 results violation as to CD27. Texas diluted the voting strength of Nueces County Latinos by transforming a minority-opportunity district into a majority-Anglo district. The State cannot defend that result by pointing to CD35, because its "creation of an opportunity district for [Travis County Latinos] without a § 2 right offers no excuse for its failure to provide an opportunity district for [Nueces County Latinos] with a § 2 right." League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 430, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (LULAC).[19]

2357 *660 B

1

I turn now to HD32 and HD34. Before the 2011 redistricting, Nueces County had within it two Latino opportunity districts and part of one Anglo-represented district. 267 F.Supp.3d, at 767. Due to slower population growth reflected in the 2010 census, however, Nueces County was entitled to have within it only two districts. Accordingly, during the 2011 redistricting, the Legislature opted to "eliminate one of the Latino opportunity districts ... and draw two districts wholly within Nueces County—one strongly Latino (HD34) and one a safe Anglo Republican seat (HD32) to protect [an] incumbent." Ibid. "Based on an analysis of the Gingles requirements and the totality of the circumstances," however, the District Court found that the Legislature could have drawn two compact minority districts in Nueces County. Id., at 780. Namely, the evidence demonstrated that it was possible to draw a map with "two districts with greater than 50% HCVAP," that "Latinos in Nueces County are highly cohesive, and that Anglos vote as a block usually to defeat minority preferred candidates." Id., at 777–778.

*661 The District Court then considered two proposed configurations for those districts: one with two HCVAP-majority districts located wholly within Nueces County, and another that required breaking the County Line Rule. Id., at 777. The challengers preferred the latter configuration because, according to their expert, "an exogenous election index" revealed that the two HCVAP-majority districts wholly within Nueces County did "not perform sufficiently." Id., at 778. The District Court did not accept that expert's assessment at face value. Instead, it explained that "an exogenous election index alone will not determine opportunity," and so evaluated the expert testing and ample other evidence and ultimately concluded that the challengers had "not adequately demonstrated that they lack equal opportunity in [an alternative] configuration ... such that a county line break is necessary." Id., at 778, 781. Thus, although it found that "two HCVAP-districts could have been drawn that would provide Hispanics with equal electoral opportunity, and that § 2 could require those two districts," because § 2 did not require the challengers' requested remedy (i.e., breaking the County Line Rule), the District Court had to "consider whether § 2 requires a remedy" and directed the challengers to "consider their preferred configuration for the remedy stage" that was to follow (before Texas prematurely appealed). Id., at 783.

2

The majority purports to accept these factual findings and contends that they "show that [HD32 and HD34] do not violate § 2." Ante, at 2332. Specifically, the majority points to the fact that the challengers' "own expert determined that it *2358 was not possible to divide Nueces County into more than one performing Latino district" without breaking the County Line Rule, a remedy the District Court concluded was not required by § 2. Ante, at 2332 – 2333 (emphasis in original). "So if Texas could not create two performing districts in Nueces County and did not have to break county lines," the 662 majority reasons, "the logical result is that Texas did not dilute the Latino vote." Ibid. (emphasis in original). In its view, a districting decision cannot be said to dilute the votes of minority voters "if the alternative to the districting decision at issue would not enhance the ability of minority voters to elect the candidates of their choice." Ibid.

At bottom, then, the majority rests its conclusion on one aspect of the challengers' expert evidence, i.e., that it was not possible to place within Nueces County more than one performing Latino district without breaking county lines. The majority acknowledges the District Court's finding that the challengers had " 'failed to show' that two majority-Latino districts in Nueces County would not perform," but waves away that finding by concluding that the District Court "twisted the burden of proof beyond recognition" by "suggest [ing] that a plaintiff might succeed on its § 2 claim because its expert failed to show that the necessary factual basis for the claim could not be established." Ante, at 2333. That conclusion is only possible because the majority closes its eyes to significant evidence in the record and misrepresents the District Court's conclusion about the potential for creating two performing Latino-majority districts in Nueces County.

The majority, of course, is right on one thing: The District Court recognized that the challengers' expert opined that the two HCVAP-majority districts would not perform based on the results of an exogenous election index. See ante, at 2332 – 2333. But the majority ignores that the District Court rejected that expert's conclusion because "the results of an exogenous election index alone will not determine opportunity," as "[s]uch indices often do not mirror endogenous election performance." 267 F.Supp.3d, at 778. Instead of "just relying on an exogenous election index to measure opportunity," the District Court "conduct[ed] an intensely local appraisal to determine whether real electoral opportunity exists." Ibid.

663 That "intensely local appraisal" resulted in a lengthy analysis that considered, among other facts: that Texas had a long "history of voting-related discrimination"; that "racially polarized voting exist[s] in Nueces County and its house district elections, the level is high, and the high degree of Anglo bloc voting plays a role in the defeat of Hispanic candidates"; "that Hispanics, including in Nueces County, suffer a 'continuing pattern of disadvantage' relative to non-Hispanics"; that population growth in the county "was [driven by] Hispanic growth" and that the "HCVAP continues to climb"; that the districts "include demographic distributions strongly favoring Hispanic voters," and that the "numbers translate into a significant advantage in house district elections"; and that data analysis showed that "performance for Latinos increased significantly in presidential election years," which "indicates that the districts provide potential to elect." Id., at 778–782.[20] and that the expert "only looked at statewide races and no county races," even though it was "conceivable that, in competitive local races with Latino candidates, Hispanic voters would mobilize in significantly higher numbers." 267 F.Supp.3d, at 781 (emphasis in original).

*2359 The District Court's focus on the history of the county as well as its potential performance going forward was an important point of departure from the challengers' expert, who considered only the former. See LULAC, 548 U.S., at 442, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (noting "a significant distinction" in analysis of what district performance " 'had been' " compared to "how it would operate today ... given the growing Latino political power in the district"). The District Court also found the expert's analysis lacking in other key respects. Namely, the District Court noted that one of the majority-HCVAP districts "provides opportunity, at least in presidential election years"; 664 that "[m]ost of the elections in [the exogenous election] index did not involve a Latino Democrat candidate";

Based on this review of the evidence, the District Court concluded "that Hispanics have equal opportunity in two districts drawn wholly within Nueces County (or at least [the challengers] failed to show that they do not)." Id., at 782. It further explained that, whereas the "evidence shows that two HCVAP-districts could have been drawn that would provide Hispanics with equal electoral opportunity, ... the evidence does not show that the Legislature was required to break the County Line Rule to draw what [the challengers] consider to be 'effective' districts." Id., at 783.

When read in the context of the full analysis just detailed, it is clear that the District Court was not "twist[ing] the burden of proof," ante, at 2333, when it observed that the challengers "failed to show that" the two HCVAP-majority districts drawn wholly within Nueces County would not perform. That statement plainly refers to the challengers' failure to rebut the finding that the two districts wholly within Nueces County provided equal electoral opportunity to Hispanics, as they needed to do to show that § 2 required breaking the County Line Rule. If anything is "twisted ... beyond recognition," ibid., it is the majority opinion's description of the District Court's findings. For while relying on a reference to what the challengers' expert opined, the majority wholly ignores the District Court's lengthy discussion rejecting that opinion on the basis of other evidence in the record.[21]

665 This Court has been clear that "the ultimate right of § 2 is equality of opportunity." Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1014, n. 11, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994). The District Court found that *2360 two HCVAP-majority districts drawn wholly within Nueces County provided such "equality of opportunity," and its findings of fact are not clearly erroneous. Only by selectively reading the factual record and ignoring the relevant analysis of those facts can the majority escape the § 2 results violation that flows from those findings.

IV

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and § 2 of the Voting Rights Act secure for all voters in our country, regardless of race, the right to equal participation in our political processes. Those guarantees mean little, however, if courts do not remain vigilant in curbing States' efforts to undermine the ability of minority voters to meaningfully exercise that right. For although we have made progress, "voting discrimination still exists; no one doubts that." Shelby County, 570 U.S., at 536, 133 S.Ct. 2612.

The Court today does great damage to that right of equal opportunity. Not because it denies the existence of that right, but because it refuses its enforcement. The Court intervenes when no intervention is authorized and blinds itself to the overwhelming factual record below. It does all of this to allow Texas to use electoral maps that, in design and effect, 666 burden the rights of minority voters to exercise that most precious right that is "preservative of all rights." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 370, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220 (1886); see Husted v. A. Philip Randolph Institute, 584 U.S. 756, 810, 138 S.Ct. 1833, 1865, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2018) (SOTOMAYOR, J., dissenting) ("Our democracy rests on the ability of all individuals, regardless of race, income, or status, to exercise their right to vote"). Because our duty is to safeguard that fundamental right, I dissent.

All Citations

585 U.S. 579, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 201 L.Ed.2d 714, 86 USLW 4575, 18 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 6239, 2018 Daily Journal D.A.R. 6123, 27 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 482

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 There are several appendixes in these cases. We use "App." to refer to the joint appendix filed at the merits stage. We use "C.J.S." and "H.J.S." to refer to the appendixes attached to Texas's jurisdictional statements in No. 17–586 and No.

17–626, respectively. We use "C.J.S. Findings" and "H.J.S. Findings" to refer to appellees' supplemental appendixes in No. 17–586 and No. 17–626.

2 See, e.g., Tex. Const., Art. III, § 25 (Senate), § 26 (House).

3 The court found: "[I]t is difficult to differentiate an intent to affect Democrats from an intent to affect minority voters. Making minorities worse off will likely make Democrats worse off, and vice versa." C.J.S. Findings 467a (citation omitted). "This correlation is so strong that [an expert] assessed whether districts were minority opportunity districts by looking at Democratic results/wins (noting that in Texas, minority candidates of choice means Democrats)." Ibid.

4 See Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 186 L.Ed.2d 651 (2013).

5 Judge Smith dissented, arguing that the majority had produced a "runaway plan" that "award[ed] judgment on the pleadings in favor of one side—a slam-dunk victory for the plaintiffs." Perez v. Perry, 835 F.Supp.2d 209, 218 (W.D.Tex.2011).

6 The Texas court was given more leeway to make changes to districts challenged under § 5 because it would have been inappropriate for that court to address the "merits of § 5 challenges," a task committed by statute to the District Court for the District of Columbia. Perez, 565 U.S., at 394, 132 S.Ct. 934.

7 Notice of Appeal in Texas v. United States, Civ. No. 11–cv–1303, Doc. 234. (D DC, Aug. 31, 2012).

8 We express no view on the correctness of this holding.

9 Judge Smith again dissented, on both mootness and the merits. On mootness, Judge Smith explained that, "[s]ix years later, we are still enveloped in litigation over plans that have never been used and will never be implemented." C.J.S. 349a. On the merits, Judge Smith argued that the majority erroneously inferred a "complex, widespread conspiracy of scheming and plotting, by various legislators and staff, carefully designed to obscure the alleged race-based motive," when the intent was in fact partisan. H.J.S. 294a; C.J.S. 351a.

10 In relevant part, § 1253 applies to "an order granting ... an interlocutory ... injunction." Section 1292(a)(1) applies to "[i]nterlocutory orders ... granting ... injunctions." Although the similarity is obvious, the dissent perceives some unspecified substantive difference.

11 The dissent sees nothing strange about such a result because we held in Mitchell v. Donovan, 398 U.S. 427, 90 S.Ct. 1763, 26 L.Ed.2d 378 (1970) (per curiam), that we lacked jurisdiction under § 1253 to hear an appeal from a three-judge court order denying a declaratory judgment. The decision in Donovan was based on the plain language of § 1253, which says nothing about orders granting or denying declaratory judgments. By contrast, § 1253 gives us jurisdiction to hear appeals from orders granting or denying injunctions.

The same goes for Rockefeller v. Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn & Queens, Inc., 397 U.S. 820, 90 S.Ct. 1517, 25 L.Ed.2d 806 (1970) (per curiam), also cited by the dissent. In that case, the District Court issued a declaratory judgment, not an injunction. Again, the text of § 1253 says nothing about declaratory judgments.

12 The inquiry required by the practical effects test is no more difficult when the question is whether an injunction was effectively granted than it is when the question is whether an injunction was effectively denied. Lower courts have had "no problem concluding that [certain orders have] the practical effect of granting an injunction." I.A.M. Nat. Pension Fund Benefit Plan A v. Cooper Industries, Inc., 789 F.2d 21, 24 (C.A.D.C.1986); see also Andrew v. American Import Center, 110 A.3d 626, 634 (D.C.2015) ("[G]ranting a stay pending arbitration does have the 'practical effect' of enjoining the party opposing arbitration").

13 Section 3(c) provides that if "the court finds that violations of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment justif[y] equitable relief," the court "shall retain jurisdiction for such period as it may deem appropriate and during such period no voting" practice shall go into effect unless first precleared by the court or the United States Attorney General. 52 U.S.C. § 10302(c).

14 The other authority cited by the dissent is a footnote in Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971), a case that came to us in an exceedingly complicated procedural posture. In Whitcomb, the District Court held in August 1969 that Indiana's legislative districting scheme was unconstitutional, but the court made it clear that it would take no further action for two months. See Chavis v. Whitcomb, 305 F.Supp. 1364, 1392 (S.D.Ind.). The Governor nevertheless appealed to this Court, but by the time we ruled, the Governor had taken another appeal from a later order, entered in December 1969, prohibiting the use of Indiana's current plans and requiring the use of court-created plans in the 1970 elections. See 403 U.S., at 139, 91 S.Ct. 1858; Juris. Statement in Whitcomb v. Chavis, O.T.1970, No. 92, pp. 1–3. And to further complicate matters, by the time we reviewed the case, the Indiana Legislature had enacted new plans. Whitcomb, 403 U.S., at 140, 91 S.Ct. 1858.

This Court entertained the later appeal and reversed, but the Court dismissed the earlier—and by then, entirely superfluous—appeal, stating that, at the time when it was issued, "no judgment had been entered and no injunction had been granted or denied." Id., at 138, n. 19, 91 S.Ct. 1858. But that cursory conclusion has little relevance here, where the District Court's orders were far more specific, immediate, and likely to demand compliance.

15 While we think it clear that the District Court effectively enjoined the use of these districts as currently configured for this year's elections, even if the court had not done so, that would not affect our jurisdiction to review the court's order with respect to all other districts.

16 The dissent cites exactly two cases (Gunn and Whitcomb) decided during the past half-century in which a party attempted to take an appeal to this Court from a three-judge court order holding a state statute unconstitutional but declining to issue an injunction.

17 The dissent argues that we give "short shrift" to the irreparable harm question, post, at 2343 – 2344, but the inability to enforce its duly enacted plans clearly inflicts irreparable harm on the State, see, e.g., Maryland v. King, 567 U.S. 1301, 133 S.Ct. 1, 183 L.Ed.2d 667 (2012) (ROBERTS, C.J., in chambers).

18 The dissent attempts to rehabilitate this statement by focusing on the last part of this sentence, in which the District Court stated that the Legislature '' ' ''intended [the] taint to be maintained but safe from remedy.'' ' '' Post, at 2353. In making this argument, the dissent, like the District Court, refuses to heed the presumption of legislative good faith and the allocation of the burden of proving intentional discrimination. We do not dispute that the District Court purportedly found that the 2013 Legislature acted with discriminatory intent. The problem is that, in making that finding, it relied overwhelmingly on what it perceived to be the 2013 Legislature's duty to show that it had purged the bad intent of its predecessor.

19 The dissent is simply wrong in claiming over and over that we have not thoroughly examined the record. See post, at 2344 – 2345, 2349, 2349 – 2350, 2351, 2353 – 2354, 2357 – 2358, 2360. The dissent seems to think that the repetition of these charges somehow makes them true. It does not. On the contrary, it betrays the substantive weakness of the dissent's argument.

20 The dissent and the District Court attach much meaning to the attorney general's use of the term "insulate" when he advised the Legislature to adopt the District Court's plans to avoid further legal challenge. Setting aside that the word "insulate" is a common term used to describe minimizing legal concerns, the context of the letter makes clear that the attorney general was trying to make the point that adopting these plans was the best method of obtaining legal compliance, not the start of a grand conspiracy to trick the District Court. Indeed, if his plan was to dupe the District Court, shouting it to the world in a public letter was an odd way to go about it.

21 In any event, the Texas court was simply wrong that Texas believed its plans would be free from any legal challenge. 274 F.Supp.3d 624, 651 (2017). Texas consistently acknowledged that effects claims would continue to be available and responded in detail to those arguments in both the District Court and this Court. See Brief for Appellants 64; Defendants' Post–Trial Brief, Doc. 1526, p. 53. Moreover, Texas has not argued that intentional discrimination claims are unavailable; it has instead argued that intent must be assessed with respect to the 2013 Legislature, the Legislature that actually enacted the plans at issue.

22 The 2013 Legislature had no reason to believe that the District Court would spend four years examining moot plans before reversing its own previous decisions by imputing the intent of the 2011 Legislature to the 2013 Legislature. At the very least, the 2013 Legislature had good reason to believe that adopting the court-approved plans would lessen the time, expense, and complexity of further litigation (even if that belief turned out to be wrong).

23 Moreover, in criticizing the Legislature for moving too quickly, the dissent downplays the significant time and effort that went into consideration of the 2013 plans. Legislative committees held multiple field hearings in four cities, Tr. 1507 (July 14, 2017), and the legislative actors spent significant time considering the legislation, as well as accepting and rejecting amendments, see, e.g., Joint Exh. 17.3, p. S29; Joint Exh. 24.4, p. 21.

24 The dissent tries to minimize the relevance of this amendment by arguing that it turned HD90 into a racial gerrymander. See post, at 2347, n. 12. But again this is misleading. The Legislature adopted changes to HD90 at the behest of minority groups, not out of a desire to discriminate. See Part IV–B, infra. That is, Darby was too solicitous of changes with respect to HD90.

25 In assessing the significance of the D.C. court's evaluation of intent, it is important not to forget that the burden of proof in a preclearance proceeding was on the State. Texas v. United States, 887 F.Supp.2d 133, 151 (D.C.Cir.2012). Particularly where race and partisanship can so often be confused, see supra, at 2314, and n. 3, the burden of proof may be crucial.

26 The District Court also purported to find a violation of the "one person, one vote" principle in Nueces County, 267 F.Supp.3d 750, 783 (2017); H.J.S. 254a–255a, but that finding was in actuality a restatement of its racial discrimination finding. The population deviations from the ideal are quite small (0.34% in HD32 and 3.29% in HD34, id., at 254a), and the District Court relied solely on the "evidence of the use of race in drawing the lines in Nueces County" to find a one person, one vote violation. Id., at 255a; see also id., at 254a ("[T]he State intentionally discriminated against minority voters by overpopulating minority districts and underpopulating Anglo districts"). Even assuming that a court could find a one person, one vote violation on the basis of such a small deviation, cf. Brown v. Thomson, 462 U.S. 835, 842–843, 103 S.Ct. 2690, 77 L.Ed.2d 214 (1983) (noting that deviations under 10% are generally insufficient to show invidious discrimination), the District Court erred in relying on its unsound finding regarding racial discrimination.

Moreover, plaintiffs rejected any separate one person, one vote claims before the District Court, Tr. 22 (July 10, 2017), and they have not mentioned such a claim as a separate theory in their briefing in this Court.

27 The District Court's belief that simple Latino majorities in Nueces County might be sufficient to create opportunity districts —and that Texas should have known as much—conflicts with other parts of its decision. With respect to numerous other districts, the District Court chided Texas for focusing on bare numbers and not considering real opportunity to elect. See, e.g., C.J.S. 134a ("[T]he court rejects [the] bright-line rule that any HCVAP-majority district is by definition a Latino opportunity district" because it "may still lack real electoral opportunity" (internal quotation marks omitted)); H.J.S. 121a (Texas "increase[d the Latino population] while simultaneously ensuring that election success rates remained minimally improved").

1 The Fourteenth Amendment and § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 prohibit intentional "vote dilution," i.e., purposefully enacting "a particular voting scheme ... 'to minimize or cancel out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities,' an action disadvantaging voters of a particular race." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 911, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (citations omitted).

2 The § 2 "results" test focuses, as relevant here, on vote dilution accomplished through cracking or packing, i.e., "the dispersal of [a protected class of voters] into districts in which they constitute an ineffective minority of voters or from the concentration of [those voters] into districts where they constitute an excessive majority." Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 46, n. 11, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986).

3 The Fourteenth Amendment "limits racial gerrymanders" and "prevents a State, in the absence of 'sufficient justification,' from 'separating its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race.' " Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 291, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 1463, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017).

4 The various appendixes are abbreviated herein consistent with the majority opinion. See ante, at 2314, n. 1.

5 Contrary to what the majority contends, whether Whitcomb involved an "exceedingly complicated procedural posture" has no effect on whether, at the time the State first appealed, the District Court had granted or denied an injunction for purposes of § 1253 jurisdiction. Ante, at 2323, n. 14. Nor was the order at issue in Whitcomb less "specific" or less "likely to demand compliance" than the orders at issue in these appeals. Ibid. The District Court in Whitcomb, like here, issued an order on the merits finding the State liable and unambiguously holding that a remedy was required. Chavis v. Whitcomb, 305 F.Supp. 1364, 1391–1392 (S.D.Ind.1969). The District Court discussed how the Indiana Legislature might go about redistricting. Ibid. Also, the orders here were no more "immediate" than the order in Whitcomb. Ante, at 2323, n. 14. As in Whitcomb, the District Court here first attempted to defer to the State to redistrict, and nothing in the record suggests that the court would not have allowed the Texas Legislature a reasonable amount of time to redistrict had the State decided to take up the task, as the District Court did in Whitcomb. To the extent the majority relies on the 3–day deadline contained in the orders below, that deadline was solely for the Texas attorney general to inform the District Court whether the Legislature intended to take up redistricting; it was not a deadline to enact new maps. See infra, at 2344 – 2345. Whitcomb is thus not distinguishable in any relevant respect.

6 The majority opinion attempts to distinguish Donovan and Rockefeller by stating that the decisions there were "based on the plain language of § 1253, which says nothing about orders granting or denying declaratory judgments." Ante, at 2320, n. 11. But of course, "the plain language of § 1253" also "says nothing about" noninjunctive orders, like the ones issued by the District Court below. Notably, the order at issue in Rockefeller looked similar to the orders on appeal here: There, the three-judge District Court declined to enter an injunction only because "the state ha[d] shown a desire to comply with applicable federal requirements," but its order nevertheless clearly resolved the merits against the State. See Catholic Medical Center of Brooklyn & Queens, Inc. v. Rockefeller, 305 F.Supp. 1268, 1271 (E.D.N.Y.1969).

7 "HCVAP" stands for Hispanic citizen voting age population.

8 The majority guarantees that there is "no reason to fear such a flood" of appeals from three-judge district court orders because "appeals from [orders expressly enjoining redistricting plans] have not overwhelmed our docket." Ante, at 2323. But of course, its jurisdictional ruling applies to all § 1253 cases, not just those involving redistricting. The majority also makes much of the fact that only "two cases (Gunn and Whitcomb) decided during the past half-century" have involved the scenario at issue here, i.e., an effort to invoke our mandatory jurisdiction to review "a three-judge court order holding a state statute unconstitutional but declining to issue an injunction." Ante, at 2324, n. 16. The majority never stops to consider, however, that one reason so few cases have come to the Court in this posture may be that Gunn and Whitcomb drew clear jurisdictional lines that litigants easily understood—the same clear lines the majority erases today.

9 The majority believes these "long before" and "very close" limits guide district courts' determinations about whether to enter an injunction. Ante, at 2323 – 2324. Presumably the majority would resort to the same indeterminate limits in determining whether, in its view, a noninjunctive order had the "practical effect" of an injunction such that it would be justified to accept an appeal under § 1253.

10 Because the Court reaches the merits of these appeals despite lacking jurisdiction, this dissent addresses that portion of the majority opinion as well.

11 The majority is correct that our reference to these findings in the District Court orders below is "not just a single slip of the pen." Ante, at 2326. That is because these findings form part (though not the whole) of the comprehensive analysis that led the District Court to conclude that the 2013 Legislature acted with the specific intent to further the discrimination in its 2011 maps. Full consideration of that analysis, as I have endeavored to do here, requires review of those findings, and when read in the context of the full factual record and legal reasoning contained in the orders below, it is clear that these statements do not come close to suggesting what Texas and the majority read into them, i.e., that the District Court somehow shifted the burden of proof to require Texas to show that it cured the taint from its past maps.

12 The majority again engages in its own factfinding, without reference to the fact that our review is for clear error only, when it decides that the District Court was wrong in concluding that Representative Darby willfully ignored the deficiencies in the 2013 maps. The legislative hearing that the District Court cited, see 274 F.Supp.3d, at 651, n. 45, shows, inter alia, that Representative Darby: told certain members of the Legislature that changes to district lines would not be considered; rejected proposed amendments where there was disagreement among the impacted members; rejected an amendment to the legislative findings that set out the history underlying the 2011 maps and related court rulings; acknowledged that the accepted amendments did not address concerns of retrogression or minority opportunity to elect their preferred candidates; and dismissed concerns regarding the packing and cracking of minority voters in, inter alia, HD32, HD34, HD54, and HD55, stating simply that the 2012 court had already rejected the challengers' claims respecting those districts but without engaging in meaningful discussion of the other legislators' concerns. See Joint Exh. 17.3, pp. S7–S9, S11, S30–S35, S39–S43, S53. Instead of addressing what is evident from the 64–page hearing transcript, the majority fixates on the single fact that Representative Darby accepted an amendment for the redrawing of the new (racially gerrymandered) HD90, believing that this fact somehow erases or outweighs all the evidence in the record showing that Representative Darby was not interested in addressing concerns regarding the interim plans. Ante, at 2328 – 2330, and n. 24. Even if Representative Darby was in fact responsive to minority concerns regarding the composition of HD90—which the record contradicts, see 267 F.Supp.3d, at 791, 793—that does not undermine the weight of all of the evidence in the record regarding his intent with respect to the enactment of the 2013 maps as a whole.

13 The majority contends in passing that its analysis takes account of "all the relevant evidence in the record," ante, at 2327, and n. 19, apparently believing that stating it explicitly somehow makes it true. It does not. The District Court orders in these cases are part of the public record and readers can therefore judge for themselves.

14 The majority never explains why it believes it appropriate to engage in what amounts to de novo review of the factual record. Presumably, it justifies its de novo review with its claim of legal error as to the finding of invidious intent. See Part II–D, infra. But even if the majority were correct that the District Court improperly shifted the burden to the State to disprove invidious intent, the proper next step would have been to remand to the District Court for reconsideration of the facts in the first instance under the correct legal standard.

15 The majority is also just flat wrong on its characterization of the interim orders. With respect to all but two of the challenged State House districts, the discussion in the interim orders states only in general terms that the District Court "preliminarily [found] that any [§ 2] and constitutional challenges do not have a likelihood of success, and any [§ 5] challenges are insubstantial," emphasizing the "preliminarily nature of [its] order." H.J.S. 303a, 307a–309a. With respect to the congressional districts, the District Court opined that the "claims are not without merit" and were "a close call," but ultimately concluded that the challengers had not at that time demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits. C.J.S. 409a, 419a. The District Court nevertheless emphasized that there remained "unsettled legal issues as well as numerous factual disputes" such that the interim map was "not a final ruling on the merits of any claims." Id., at 367a. It is a stretch to characterize these interim orders as providing "a careful analysis of all the claims," ante, at 2328, and borderline disingenuous to state that, despite repeated and explicit warnings that its rulings were not final and subject to change, the District Court was somehow "reversing its own previous decisions" when it finally did render a final decision, ante, at 2328, n. 22.

16 The majority spends some time distinguishing Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222, 105 S.Ct. 1916, 85 L.Ed.2d 222 (1985), adamant that it does not support "shifting the burden" as it purports the District Court did below. Ante, at 2324 - 2325. But the District Court agreed that Hunter was distinguishable and did not rely on it to support any sort of burden shifting. As the majority explains, Hunter involved a state constitutional provision adopted with discriminatory intent that, despite pruning over the years, the State never repealed. Ante, at 2324 - 2325 (citing 471 U.S., at 229, 232–233, 105 S.Ct. 1916). The District Court discussed the differences between Hunter and these cases, namely, that Hunter "did not involve a later reenactment ... which is what [Texas] now claims cleanses the plans." 274 F.Supp.3d, at 647. It noted the important distinction that, " 'when a plan is reenacted—as opposed to merely remaining on the books like the provision in Hunter—the state of mind of the reenacting body must also be considered.' " Id., at 648. That the majority ignores that the District Court did not, as it suggests, rely on Hunter as controlling is another example of how it conveniently overlooks the District Court's express legal analysis.

17 Notably, the majority takes no issue with that first conclusion, i.e., that the enactment of the interim plans does not, on its own, insulate the 2013 plans from challenge. It explicitly notes that the opinion does not hold that the ''2013 [plans] are unassailable because they were previously adopted on an interim basis by the Texas court," noting that such a factor is relevant insofar as it informs the inquiry into the intent of the 2013 Legislature. Ante, at 2326 – 2327.

18 The majority also believes that the interim orders gave the Legislature cover with respect to CD35, ante, at 2332, forgetting that the District Court explicitly and repeatedly warned the parties that its interim orders did not resolve all factual and legal disputes in the cases.

19 It is worth noting that Texas' efforts to suppress the voting strength of minority voters in Nueces County eerily mirror the actions this Court invalidated as a violation of § 2 in LULAC, 548 U.S. 399, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609. Like in LULAC, "a majority-Hispanic district that would likely have elected the Hispanic-preferred candidate was flipped into an Anglo-majority district to protect a candidate that was not preferred by the Hispanic voters." C.J.S. 182a; see also LULAC, 548 U.S., at 427–429, 126 S.Ct. 2594. And like in LULAC, Texas attempted to defend that curtailment of minority voters' rights by pointing to the creation of another supposed opportunity district. 274 F.Supp.3d, at 684–685; LULAC, 548 U.S., at 429, 126 S.Ct. 2594. In finding a § 2 results violation, the Court concluded that the "vote dilution of a group that was beginning to ... overcome prior electoral discrimination ... cannot be sustained." Id., at 442, 126 S.Ct. 2594. The Court also rejected Texas' defense, holding that its "creation of an opportunity district for those without a § 2 right offers no excuse for its failure to provide an opportunity district for those with a § 2 right." Id., at 430, 126 S.Ct. 2594. In line with LULAC, the Court should hold that Texas has once again contravened § 2 in its drawing of CD27.

20 The majority contends that the District Court did not engage in a sufficiently local analysis because it cited to the statewide history of discrimination against minority voters, the continuing disadvantage of Latino voters, and racially polarized voting. Ante, at 2333 – 2334. The majority not only misapprehends the importance of that statewide evidence to the local appraisal, but again ignores the many other factual findings and analysis that are specific to Nueces County and thus problematic for its conclusion. See infra at 2359 – 2360.

21 Contrary to what the majority suggests, the District Court did not believe that "simple Latino majorities in Nueces County might be sufficient to create opportunity districts" based only on "bare numbers." Ante, at 2333, n. 27. Consistent with its rebuke of Texas elsewhere in the opinion for advocating a "bright-line rule that any HCVAP-majority district is by definition a Latino opportunity district" because it "may still lack 'real electoral opportunity,' " C.J.S. 134a, the District Court in its analysis of HD32 and HD34 was clear that the challengers "could assert that [the] HCVAP-majority districts do not present real electoral opportunity due to racially polarized voting and lower registration and turnout caused by the lingering effects of official discrimination." 267 F.Supp.3d, at 781. Based on its review of that evidence, it concluded that the two majority-HCVAP districts drawn within Nueces County provided minority voters equal electoral opportunity. Id., at 783.

End of Document

135 S.Ct. 1257
Supreme Court of the United States

ALABAMA LEGISLATIVE BLACK CAUCUS, et al., Appellants
v.
ALABAMA et al.
Alabama Democratic Conference, et al., Appellants
v.
Alabama et al.

Nos. 13–895, 13–1138
|
Argued Nov. 12, 2014.
|
Decided March 25, 2015.[1]

Synopsis

Background: Black political caucus, political party, office holders, and county commissioners of Alabama brought separate actions against state of Alabama and various state officials, challenging redistricting plans for Alabama's Senate and House of Representatives. Actions were consolidated. After bench trial, a three-judge panel of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Alabama, Pryor, Circuit Judge, 989 F.Supp.2d 1227, dismissed in part and granted judgment to defendants. Probable jurisdiction was noted.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Justice Breyer, held that:

[1] racial gerrymandering claims apply district-by-district;

[2] district court should have allowed one plaintiff to present evidence of its associational standing;

[3] equal population goal was not a factor to be weighed, for equal protection challenge to redistricting; and

[4] Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA) does not require a covered jurisdiction to maintain a particular numerical minority percentage when redistricting.

Vacated and remanded.

Justice Scalia filed a dissenting opinion, in which Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Thomas and Alito joined.

Justice Thomas filed a dissenting opinion.

West Headnotes (10)

[1] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

States Compactness; contiguity; gerrymandering in general

A racial gerrymandering claim against a State, asserting an equal protection violation in drawing boundaries for electoral districts, applies to the boundaries of individual districts, i.e., district-by-district, and does not apply to a State considered as an undifferentiated whole. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

The nature of the harms that underlie a racial gerrymandering claim, asserting an equal protection violation in drawing boundaries for electoral districts, are personal, and they include being personally subjected to a racial classification, as well as being represented by a legislator who believes his primary obligation is to represent only the members of a particular racial group; such harms directly threaten a voter who lives in the district attacked. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Election Law Gerrymandering of equipopulous districts

Voters asserting a racial gerrymandering claim, alleging an equal protection violation in a State's drawing of boundaries for electoral districts, can present statewide evidence in order to prove racial gerrymandering in a particular district. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

34 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

Challengers to Alabama's state legislative redistricting of majority-minority districts did not waive, on review of three-judge district court ruling, a district-by-district analysis of their equal protection claim alleging racial gerrymandering, though challengers could have presented their district-specific claims more clearly, they relied heavily on statewide evidence to prove that race predominated in drawing of individual district lines, and district court's opinion suggested that challengers had led district court to consider racial gerrymandering of the State as whole; challengers brought, and their argument rested significantly upon, district-specific claims, and statewide evidence presented by challengers was relevant to proving racial gerrymandering in particular districts. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

71 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

Challenger to Alabama's state legislative redistricting of majority-minority districts did not waive its district-specific claims, on challenger's appeal to Supreme Court from three-judge district court's rejection of racial gerrymandering claim asserting an equal protection violation in drawing boundaries for electoral districts, which rejection had applied the racial gerrymandering claim to the State considered as an undifferentiated whole; at oral argument before the Supreme Court, challenger, when asked specifically about its position, stated it was relying on statewide evidence to prove its district-specific challenges, and challenger clarified that by referring to "statewide," challenger meant a common policy that applied to every district in the State. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

18 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

While three-judge district court had independent obligation to confirm its jurisdiction even in absence of challenge by State to association's standing to assert racial gerrymandering claim alleging equal protection violation redistricting of majority-minority districts, elementary principles of procedural fairness required district court to give association an opportunity to provide evidence that it had a member residing in each majority-minority district, rather than sua sponte holding that association lacked standing, where evidence presented by association, regarding residency of its members, supported common sense inference that association had members in all of State's majority-minority districts, and such inference was strong enough to lead association reasonably to believe that, in absence of State challenge or court request for more detailed information, it need not provide additional information such as a specific membership list. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

24 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

For a racial gerrymandering claim relating to redistricting, an equal population goal for districts is not one factor among others to be weighed against the use of race, to determine, under strict scrutiny for an equal protection violation, whether race was the predominant motivating factor in creating any challenged districts; rather, an equal population goal is part of the redistricting background, taken as a given, when determining whether race, or other factors, predominate in a legislator's determination as to how equal population objectives will be met. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

29 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A plaintiff pursuing a racial gerrymandering claim, alleging an equal protection violation in drawing electoral districts, must show that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

50 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), imposing preclearance requirements for covered States and certain other jurisdictions and forbidding retrogression when redistricting, does not require a covered jurisdiction to maintain a particular numerical minority percentage when redistricting, and instead requires the jurisdiction to maintain a minority's ability to elect a preferred candidate of choice. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 12(b, d), 52 U.S.C.A. § 10304(b, d).

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A court's analysis of the narrow tailoring requirement, on strict scrutiny for an equal protection violation in drawing electoral districts, insists only that the legislature have a strong basis in evidence in support of the race-based choice that it has made, and this standard does not demand that a State's actions actually be necessary to achieve a compelling state interest in order to be constitutionally valid. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

11 Cases that cite this headnote

*1259 Syllabus[*]

254 In 2012 Alabama redrew the boundaries of the State's 105 House districts and 35 Senate districts. In doing so, while Alabama sought to achieve numerous traditional districting objectives—e.g., compactness, not splitting counties or precincts, minimizing change, and protecting incumbents—it placed yet greater importance on two goals: (1) minimizing a district's deviation from precisely equal population, by keeping any deviation less than 1% of the theoretical ideal; and (2) seeking to avoid retrogression with respect to racial minorities' "ability to elect their preferred candidates of choice" under § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 52 U.S.C. § 10304(b), by maintaining roughly the same black population percentage in existing majority-minority districts.

Appellants—Alabama Legislative Black Caucus (Caucus), Alabama Democratic Conference (Conference), and others—claim that Alabama's new district boundaries create a "racial gerrymander" in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. After a bench trial, the three-judge District Court ruled (2 to 1) for the State. It recognized that electoral districting violates the Equal Protection Clause when race is the "predominant" consideration in deciding "to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district," Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 913, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762, and the use of race is not "narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest," Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 902, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (Shaw II).

In ruling against appellants, it made four critical determinations: (1) that both appellants had argued "that the Acts as a whole constitute racial gerrymanders," and that the Conference had also argued that the State had racially gerrymandered Senate Districts 7, 11, 22, and 26; (2) that the Conference lacked standing to make its racial gerrymandering claims; (3) that, in any event, appellants' claims must fail because race "was not the predominant motivating factor" in making the redistricting decisions; and (4) that, even were it wrong about standing and predominance, these claims must fail because any predominant use of race was 255 "narrowly tailored" to *1260 serve a "compelling state interest" in avoiding retrogression under § 5.

Held:

1. The District Court's analysis of the racial gerrymandering claim as referring to the State "as a whole," rather than district-by-district, was legally erroneous. Pp. 1264 – 1268.

(a) This Court has consistently described a claim of racial gerrymandering as a claim that race was improperly used in the drawing of the boundaries of one or more specific electoral districts, see, e.g., Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (Shaw I), and has described the plaintiff's evidentiary burden similarly, see Miller, supra, at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. The Court's district-specific language makes sense in light of the personal nature of the harms that underlie a racial gerrymandering claim, see Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 957, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248; Shaw I, supra, at 648, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Pp. 1264 – 1265.

(b) The District Court found the fact that racial criteria had not predominated in the drawing of some Alabama districts sufficient to defeat a claim of racial gerrymandering with respect to the State as an undifferentiated whole. But a showing that race-based criteria did not significantly affect the drawing of some Alabama districts would have done little to defeat a claim that race-based criteria predominantly affected the drawing of other Alabama districts. Thus, the District Court's undifferentiated statewide analysis is insufficient, and the District Court must on remand consider racial gerrymandering with respect to the individual districts challenged by appellants. Pp. 1265 – 1266.

(c) The Caucus and the Conference did not waive the right to further consideration of a district-by-district analysis. The record indicates that plaintiffs' evidence and arguments embody the claim that individual majority-minority districts were racially gerrymandered, and those are the districts that the District Court must reconsider. Although plaintiffs relied heavily upon statewide evidence to prove that race predominated in the drawing of individual district lines, neither the use of statewide evidence nor the effort to show widespread effect can transform a racial gerrymandering claim about a set of individual districts into a separate, general claim that the legislature racially gerrymandered the State "as" an undifferentiated "whole." Pp. 1266 – 1268.

2. The District Court also erred in deciding, sua sponte, that the Conference lacked standing. It believed that the "record" did "not clearly identify the districts in which the individual members of the [Conference] reside." But the Conference's post-trial brief and the testimony of a Conference representative support an inference that the organization has members in all of the majority-minority districts, which is sufficient to meet the Conference's burden of establishing standing. At 256 the very least, the Conference reasonably believed that, in the absence of a state challenge or a court request for more detailed information, it need not provide additional information such as a specific membership list. While the District Court had an independent obligation to confirm its jurisdiction, in these circumstances elementary principles of procedural fairness required the District Court, rather than acting sua sponte, to give the Conference an opportunity to provide evidence of member residence. On remand, the District Court should permit the Conference to file its membership list and the State to respond, as appropriate. Pp. 1268 – 1270.

3. The District Court also did not properly calculate "predominance" in its alternative holding that "[r]ace was not the predominant motivating factor" in the creation *1261 of any of the challenged districts. It reached its conclusion in part because it placed in the balance, among other nonracial factors, legislative efforts to create districts of approximately equal population. An equal population goal, however, is not one of the "traditional" factors to be weighed against the use of race to determine whether race "predominates," see Miller, supra, at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Rather, it is part of the redistricting background, taken as a given, when determining whether race, or other factors, predominate in a legislator's determination as to how equal population objectives will be met. Had the District Court not taken a contrary view of the law, its "predominance" conclusions, including those concerning the four districts that the Conference specifically challenged, might well have been different. For example, there is strong, perhaps overwhelming, evidence that race did predominate as a factor when the legislature drew the boundaries of Senate District 26. Pp. 1270 – 1272.

4. The District Court's final alternative holding—that "the [challenged] Districts would satisfy strict scrutiny"—rests upon a misperception of the law. Section 5 does not require a covered jurisdiction to maintain a particular numerical minority percentage. It requires the jurisdiction to maintain a minority's ability to elect a preferred candidate of choice. Pp. 1272 – 1274.

(a) The statute's language, 52 U.S.C. §§ 10304(b), (d), and Department of Justice Guidelines make clear that § 5 is satisfied if minority voters retain the ability to elect their preferred candidates. The history of § 5 further supports this view, as Congress adopted the language in § 5 to reject this Court's decision in Georgia v. Ashcroft, 539 U.S. 461, 123 S.Ct. 2498, 156 L.Ed.2d 428, and to accept the views of Justice Souter's dissent—that, in a § 5 retrogression case, courts should ask whether a new voting provision would likely deprive minority voters of their ability to elect a candidate of their choice, and that courts should not mechanically rely upon numerical percentages but should take account of all significant circumstances, 257 id., at 493, 498, 505, 509, 123 S.Ct. 2498. Here, both the District Court and the legislature relied heavily upon a mechanically numerical view as to what counts as forbidden retrogression. Pp. 1272 – 1274.

(b) In saying this, this Court does not insist that a state legislature, when redistricting, determine precisely what percent minority population § 5 demands. A court's analysis of the narrow tailoring requirement insists only that the legislature have a "strong basis in evidence" in support of the (race-based) choice that it has made. Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 29. Here, however, the District Court and the legislature both asked the wrong question with respect to narrow tailoring. They asked how to maintain the present minority percentages in majority-minority districts, instead of asking the extent to which they must preserve existing minority percentages in order to maintain the minority's present ability to elect the candidate of its choice. Because asking the wrong question may well have led to the wrong answer, the Court cannot accept the District Court's conclusion. Pp. 1273 – 1274.

989 F.Supp.2d 1227, vacated and remanded.

BREYER, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which KENNEDY, GINSBURG, SOTOMAYOR, and KAGAN, JJ., joined. SCALIA, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which ROBERTS, C.J., and THOMAS and ALITO, JJ., joined. THOMAS, J., filed a dissenting opinion.

Attorneys and Law Firms

*1262 Richard H. Pildes, New York, NY, for Appellants in No. 13–1138.

Eric Schnapper, Seattle, WA, for Appellants in No. 13–895.

Donald B. Verrilli, Jr., for the United States as amicus curiae, by special leave of the Court, supporting neither party.

Andrew L. Brasher, Solicitor General, for Respondents.

Eric Schnapper, Counsel of Record, Seattle, WA, James U. Blacksher, Birmingham, AL, Edward Still, Birmingham, AL, U.W. Clemon, White Arnold & Dowd P.C., Birmingham, AL, for Appellants.

Dorman Walker, Deputy Attorney General, Balch & Bingham LLP, Montgomery, AL, Counsel for Appellees Gerald Dial, Alabama Senator, and Jim McClendon, Alabama Representative.

Luther Strange, Alabama Attorney General, Andrew L. Brasher, Counsel of Record, Solicitor General, Megan A. Kirkpatrick, Assistant Solicitor General, John J. Park, Jr., Deputy Attorney General, Office of Ala. Att'y Gen., Montgomery, AL, for Appellees Alabama and Jim Bennett, Alabama Secretary of State.

Edward Still, Birmingham, AL, U.W. Clemon, White Arnold & Dowd P.C., Birmingham, AL, James U. Blacksher, Counsel of Record, Birmingham, AL, for Appellants Alabama Legislative Black Caucus et al.

James H. Anderson, William F. Patty, Brannan W. Reaves, Jackson, Anderson & Patty, P.C., Montgomery, AL, Paul M. Smith, Jessica Ring Amunson, Mark P. Gaber, Jenner & Block LLP, Washington, DC, Richard H. Pildes, Counsel of Record, New York, NY, John K. Tanner, Washington, DC, Walter S. Turner, Montgomery, AL, Kevin Russell, Goldstein & Russell, P.C., Bethesda, MD, for Appellants.

John K. Tanner, Washington, DC, Joe M. Reed, Joe M. Reed & Associates, LLC, Montgomery, AL, Sam Heldman, The Gardner Firm, PC, Washington DC, James H. Anderson, Counsel of Record, William F. Patty, Brannan W. Reaves, Jackson, Anderson & Patty, P.C., Montgomery, AL, Walter S. Turner, Montgomery, AL, for Appellants Alabama Democratic Conference, et al.

Opinion

Justice BREYER delivered the opinion of the Court.

258 The Alabama Legislative Black Caucus and the Alabama Democratic Conference appeal a three-judge Federal District Court decision rejecting their challenges to the lawfulness of Alabama's 2012 redistricting of its State House of Representatives and State Senate. The appeals focus upon the appellants' claims that new district boundaries create "racial gerrymanders" in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. See, e.g., Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 907–908, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II) (Fourteenth Amendment forbids use of race as " 'predominant' " district boundary-drawing " 'factor' " unless boundaries are "narrowly tailored" to achieve a " 'compelling state interest' " (citations omitted)). We find that the District Court applied incorrect legal standards in evaluating the claims. We consequently vacate its decision *1263 and remand the cases for further proceedings.

259 I

The Alabama Constitution requires the legislature to reapportion its State House and Senate electoral districts following each decennial census. Ala. Const., Art. IX, §§ 199–200. In 2012 Alabama redrew the boundaries of the State's 105 House districts and 35 Senate districts. 2012 Ala. Acts no. 602 (House plan); id., at no. 603 (Senate plan) (Acts). In doing so, Alabama sought to achieve numerous traditional districting objectives, such as compactness, not splitting counties or precincts, minimizing change, and protecting incumbents. But it placed yet greater importance on achieving two other goals. See Alabama Legislature Reapportionment Committee Guidelines in No. 12–cv–691, Doc. 30–4, pp. 3–5 (Committee Guidelines).

First, it sought to minimize the extent to which a district might deviate from the theoretical ideal of precisely equal population. In particular, it set as a goal creating a set of districts in which no district would deviate from the theoretical, precisely equal ideal by more than 1%—i.e., a more rigorous deviation standard than our precedents have found necessary under the Constitution. See Brown v. Thomson, 462 U.S. 835, 842, 103 S.Ct. 2690, 77 L.Ed.2d 214 (1983) (5% deviation from ideal generally permissible). No one here doubts the desirability of a State's efforts generally to come close to a one-person, one-vote ideal.

Second, it sought to ensure compliance with federal law, and, in particular, the Voting Rights Act of 1965. 79 Stat. 439, as amended, 52 U.S.C. § 10301 et seq. At the time of the redistricting Alabama was a covered jurisdiction under that Act. Accordingly § 5 of the Act required Alabama to demonstrate that an electoral change, such as redistricting, would not bring about retrogression in respect to racial minorities' "ability ... to elect their preferred candidates of choice." 52 U.S.C. § 10304(b). Specifically, Alabama believed that, to avoid retrogression under § 5, it was required to maintain roughly the same black population percentage 260 in existing majority-minority districts. See Appendix B, infra.

Compliance with these two goals posed particular difficulties with respect to many of the State's 35 majority-minority districts (8 in the Senate, 27 in the House). That is because many of these districts were (compared with the average district) underpopulated. In order for Senate District 26, for example, to meet the State's no–more–than–1% population-deviation objective, the State would have to add about 16,000 individuals to the district. And, prior to redistricting, 72.75% of District 26's population was black. Accordingly, Alabama's plan added 15,785 new individuals, and only 36 of those newly added individuals were white.

This suit, as it appears before us, focuses in large part upon Alabama's efforts to achieve these two goals. The Caucus and the Conference basically claim that the State, in adding so many new minority voters to majority-minority districts (and to others), went too far. They allege the State created a constitutionally forbidden "racial gerrymander"—a gerrymander that (e.g., when the State adds more minority voters than needed for a minority group to elect a candidate of its choice) might, among other things, harm the very minority voters that Acts such as the Voting Rights Act sought to help.

After a bench trial, the Federal District Court held in favor of the State, i.e., against the Caucus and the Conference, with respect to their racial gerrymandering *1264 claims as well as with respect to several other legal claims that the Caucus and the Conference had made. With respect to racial gerrymandering, the District Court recognized that electoral districting violates the Equal Protection Clause when (1) race is the "dominant and controlling" or "predominant" consideration in deciding "to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district," Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 913, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), and (2) the use of race is not "narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest," 261 Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 902, 116 S.Ct. 1894; see also Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (shaw i) (CONSTITUTION FORBIDS "SEPARAT[ION of] voters into different districts on the basis of race" when the separation "lacks sufficient justification"); Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 958–959, 976, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (principal opinion of O'Connor, J.) (same). But, after trial the District Court held (2 to 1) that the Caucus and the Conference had failed to prove their racial gerrymandering claims. The Caucus along with the Conference (and several other plaintiffs) appealed. We noted probable jurisdiction with respect to the racial gerrymandering claims. 572 U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 2697, 189 L.Ed.2d 739 (2014).

We shall focus upon four critical District Court determinations underlying its ultimate "no violation" conclusion. They concern:

1. The Geographical Nature of the Racial Gerrymandering Claims. The District Court characterized the appellants' claims as falling into two categories. In the District Court's view, both appellants had argued "that the Acts as a whole constitute racial gerrymanders," 989 F.Supp.2d 1227, 1287 (M.D.Ala.2013) (emphasis added), and one of the appellants (the Conference) had also argued that the State had racially gerrymandered four specific electoral districts, Senate Districts 7, 11, 22, and 26, id., at 1288.

2. Standing. The District Court held that the Caucus had standing to argue its racial gerrymandering claim with respect to the State "as a whole." But the Conference lacked standing to make any of its racial gerrymandering claims—the claim requiring consideration of the State "as a whole," and the claims requiring consideration of four individual Senate districts. Id., at 1292.

3. Racial Predominance. The District Court held that, in any event, the appellants' claims must fail because race "was not the predominant motivating factor" either (a) "for the Acts as a whole" or (b) with respect to "Senate Districts 7, 11, 22, or 26." Id., at 1293.

262 4. Narrow Tailoring/Compelling State Interest. The District Court also held that, even were it wrong about standing and predominance, the appellants' racial gerrymandering claims must fail. That is because any predominant use of race in the drawing of electoral boundaries was "narrowly tailored" to serve a "compelling state interest," id., at 1306–1307, namely the interest in avoiding retrogression with respect to racial minorities' "ability to elect their preferred candidates of choice." § 10304(b).

In our view, each of these determinations reflects an error about relevant law. And each error likely affected the District Court's conclusions—to the point where we must vacate the lower court's judgment and remand the cases to allow appellants to reargue their racial gerrymandering claims. In light of our opinion, all parties *1265 remain free to introduce such further evidence as the District Court shall reasonably find appropriate.

II

We begin by considering the geographical nature of the racial gerrymandering claims. The District Court repeatedly referred to the racial gerrymandering claims as claims that race improperly motivated the drawing of boundary lines of the State considered as a whole. See, e.g., 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1293 ("Race was not the predominant motivating factor for the Acts as a whole"); id., at 1287 (construing plaintiffs' challenge as arguing that the "Acts as a whole constitute racial gerrymanders"); id., at 1292 (describing the plaintiffs' challenge as a "claim of racial gerrymandering to the Acts as a whole"); cf. supra, at 1264 – 1265 (noting four exceptions).

[1] A racial gerrymandering claim, however, applies to the boundaries of individual districts. It applies district-by-district. It does not apply to a State considered as an undifferentiated "whole." We have consistently described a claim of 263 racial gerrymandering as a claim that race was improperly used in the drawing of the boundaries of one or more specific electoral districts. See, e.g., Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (violation consists of "separat[ing] voters into different districts on the basis of race" (emphasis added)); Vera, 517 U.S., at 965, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (principal opinion) ("[Courts] must scrutinize each challenged district ..." (emphasis added)). We have described the plaintiff's evidentiary burden similarly. See*Miller, supra,* at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (plaintiff must show that "race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district" (emphasis added)).

[2] Our district-specific language makes sense in light of the nature of the harms that underlie a racial gerrymandering claim. Those harms are personal. They include being "personally ... subjected to [a] racial classification," Vera, supra, at 957, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (principal opinion), as well as being represented by a legislator who believes his "primary obligation is to represent only the members" of a particular racial group, Shaw I, supra, at 648, 113 S.Ct. 2816. They directly threaten a voter who lives in the district attacked. But they do not so keenly threaten a voter who lives elsewhere in the State. Indeed, the latter voter normally lacks standing to pursue a racial gerrymandering claim. United States v. Hays,

515 U.S. 737, 744–745, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995).

[3] Voters, of course, can present statewide evidence in order to prove racial gerrymandering in a particular district. See Miller, supra, at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. And voters might make the claim that every individual district in a State suffers from racial gerrymandering. But this latter claim is not the claim that the District Court, when using the phrase "as a whole," considered here. Rather, the concept as used here suggests the existence of a legal unicorn, an animal that exists only in the legal imagination.

This is not a technical, linguistic point. Nor does it criticize what might seem, in effect, a slip of the pen. Rather, here the District Court's terminology mattered. That is because 264 the District Court found that racial criteria had not predominated in the drawing of some Alabama districts. And it found that fact (the fact that race did not predominate in the drawing of some, or many districts) sufficient to defeat what it saw as the basic claim before it, namely a claim of racial gerrymandering with respect to the State as an undifferentiated *1266 whole. See, e.g., 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1294 (rejecting plaintiffs' challenge because "[the legislature] followed no bright-line rule" with respect to every majority-minority district); id., at 1298–1299, 1301 (citing examples of majority-minority districts in which black population percentages were reduced and examples of majority-white districts in which precincts were split).

A showing that race-based criteria did not significantly affect the drawing of some Alabama districts, however, would have done little to defeat a claim that race-based criteria predominantly affected the drawing of other Alabama districts, such as Alabama's majority-minority districts primarily at issue here. See id., at 1329 (Thompson, J., dissenting) ("[T]he drafters['] fail [ure] to achieve their sought-after percentage in one district does not detract one iota from the fact that they did achieve it in another"). Thus, the District Court's undifferentiated statewide analysis is insufficient. And we must remand for consideration of racial gerrymandering with respect to the individual districts subject to the appellants' racial gerrymandering challenges.

[4] The State and principal dissent argue that (but for four specifically mentioned districts) there were in effect no such districts. The Caucus and the Conference, the State and principal dissent say, did not seek a district-by-district analysis. And, the State and principal dissent conclude that the Caucus and the Conference have consequently waived the right to any further consideration. Brief for Appellees 14, 31; post, at 1276 – 1280 (opinion of SCALIA, J.).

265 We do not agree. We concede that the District Court's opinion suggests that it was the Caucus and the Conference that led the Court to consider racial gerrymandering of the State "as a whole." 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1287. At least the District Court interpreted their filings to allege only that kind of claim. Ibid. But our review of the record indicates that the plaintiffs did not claim only that the legislature had racially gerrymandered the State "as" an undifferentiated "whole." Rather, their evidence and their arguments embody the claim that individual majority-minority districts were racially gerrymandered. And those are the districts that we believe the District Court must reconsider.

There are 35 majority-minority districts, 27 in the House and 8 in the Senate. The District Court's opinion itself refers to evidence that the legislature's redistricting committee, in order to satisfy what it believed the Voting Rights Act required, deliberately chose additional black voters to move into underpopulated majority-minority districts, i.e., a specific set of individual districts. See, e.g., 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1274 (referring to Senator Dial's testimony that the Committee "could have used," but did not use, "white population within Jefferson County to repopulate the majority-black districts" because "doing so would have resulted in the retrogression of the majority-black districts and potentially created a problem for [Justice Department] preclearance"); id., at 1276 (stating that Representative Jim McClendon, also committee cochair, "testified consistently with Senator Dial"); id., at 1277 (noting that the committee's expert, Randolph Hinaman, testified that "he needed to add population" to majority-black districts "without significantly lowering the percentage of the population in each district that was majority-black").

The Caucus and the Conference presented much evidence at trial to show that the legislature had deliberately moved black voters into these majority-minority districts—again, a specific set of districts—in *1267 order to prevent the percentage of minority voters in each district from declining. See, e.g., Committee Guidelines 3–5; 1 266 Tr. 28–29, 36–37, 55, 63, 67–68, 77, 81, 96, 115, 124, 136, 138 (testimony of Senator Dial); Deposition of Gerald Dial in No. 12–cv–691 (May 21, 2013), Doc. 123–5, pp. 17, 39–41, 62, 100 (Dial Deposition); 3 Tr. 222 (testimony of Representative McClendon); id., at 118–119, 145–146, 164, 182–183, 186–187 (testimony of Hinaman); Deposition of Randolph Hinaman in No. 12–cv–691 (June 25, 2013), Doc. 134–4, pp. 23–24, 101 (Hinaman Deposition).

In their post-trial Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, the plaintiffs stated that the evidence showed a racial gerrymander with respect to the majority of the majority-minority districts; they referred to the specific splitting of precinct and county lines in the drawing of many majority-minority districts; and they pointed to much district-specific evidence. E.g., Alabama Legislative Black Caucus Plaintiffs' Notice of Filing Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in No. 12–cv–691, Doc. 194, pp. 9–10, 13–14, 30–35, 40 (Caucus Post–Trial Brief); Newton Plaintiffs' Notice of Filing Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in No. 12–cv–691, Doc. 195, pp. 33–35, 56–61, 64–67, 69–74, 82–85, 108, 121–122 (Conference Post–Trial Brief); see also Appendix A, infra (organizing these citations by district).

We recognize that the plaintiffs relied heavily upon statewide evidence to prove that race predominated in the drawing of individual district lines. See generally Caucus Post–Trial Brief 1, 3–7, 48–50; Conference Post–Trial Brief 2, 44–45, 105–106. And they also sought to prove that the use of race to draw the boundaries of the majority-minority districts affected the boundaries of other districts as well. See, e.g., 1 Tr. 36–37, 48, 55, 70–71, 93, 111, 124 (testimony of Dial); 3 Tr. 142, 162 (testimony of Hinaman); see generally Caucus Post–Trial Brief 8–16. Such evidence is perfectly relevant. We have said that the plaintiff's burden in a racial gerrymandering case is "to show, either through circumstantial evidence of a district's shape and demographics or more direct evidence going to legislative purpose, that race was 267 the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Cf. Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (explaining the plaintiff's burden in cases, unlike these, in which the State argues that politics, not race, was its predominant motive). That Alabama expressly adopted and applied a policy of prioritizing mechanical racial targets above all other districting criteria (save one-person, one-vote) provides evidence that race motivated the drawing of particular lines in multiple districts in the State. And neither the use of statewide evidence nor the effort to show widespread effect can transform a racial gerrymandering claim about a set of individual districts into a separate, general claim that the legislature racially gerrymandered the State "as" an undifferentiated "whole."

We, like the principal dissent, recognize that the plaintiffs could have presented their district-specific claims more clearly, post, at 1277 – 1278, 1279 – 1280 (opinion of SCALIA, J.), but the dissent properly concedes that its objection would weaken had the Conference "developed such a claim in the course of discovery and trial." Post, at 1277. And that is just what happened.

In the past few pages and in Appendix A, we set forth the many record references that establish this fact. The Caucus helps to explain the complaint omissions when it tells us that the plaintiffs unearthed the *1268 factual basis for their racial gerrymandering claims when they deposed the committee's redistricting expert. See Brief for Appellants in No. 13–895, pp. 12–13. The State neither disputes this procedural history nor objects that plaintiffs' pleadings failed to conform with the proof. Indeed, throughout, the plaintiffs litigated these claims not as if they were wholly separate entities but as if they were a team. See, e.g., Caucus Post–Trial Brief 1 ("[We] support the additional claims made by the [Conference] plaintiffs"); but cf. post, at 1275 – 1280 (SCALIA, 268 J., dissenting) (treating separately Conference claims from Caucus claims). Thus we, like the dissenting judge below (who also lived with these cases through trial), conclude that the record as a whole shows that the plaintiffs brought, and their argument rested significantly upon, district-specific claims. See 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1313 (Thompson, J., dissenting) (construing plaintiffs as also challenging "each majority-Black House and Senate District").

[5] The principal dissent adds that the Conference waived its district-specific claims on appeal. Cf. post, at 1278. But that is not so. When asked specifically about its position at oral argument, the Conference stated that it was relying on statewide evidence to prove its district-specific challenges. Tr. of Oral Arg. 15–16. Its counsel said that "the exact same policy was applied in every black-majority district," id., at 15, and "[b]y statewide, we simply mean a common policy applied to every district in the State," id., at 16. We accept the Conference's clarification, which is consistent with how it presented these claims below.

We consequently conclude that the District Court's analysis of racial gerrymandering of the State "as a whole" was legally erroneous. We find that the appellants did not waive their right to consideration of their claims as applied to particular districts. Accordingly, we remand the cases. See Pullman–

Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 291, 102 S.Ct. 1781, 72 L.Ed.2d 66 (1982) (remand is required when the District Court "failed to make a finding because of an erroneous view of the law"); Rapanos v. United States, 547 U.S. 715, 757, 126 S.Ct. 2208, 165 L.Ed.2d 159 (2006) (same).

III

[6] We next consider the District Court's holding with respect to standing. The District Court, sua sponte, held that the Conference lacked standing—either to bring racial gerrymandering claims with respect to the four individual districts that the court specifically considered (i.e., Senate Districts 7, 11, 22, and 26) or to bring a racial gerrymandering 269 claim with respect to the "State as a whole." 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1292.

The District Court recognized that ordinarily

> "[a]n association has standing to bring suit on behalf of its members when its members would have standing to sue in their own right, the interests at stake are germane to the organization's purpose, and neither the claim asserted nor the relief requested requires individuals members' participation in the lawsuit." Id., at 1291 (quoting Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 181, 120 S.Ct. 693, 145 L.Ed.2d 610 (2000); emphasis added).

It also recognized that a "member" of an association "would have standing to sue" in his or her "own right" when that member "resides in the district that he alleges was the product of a racial gerrymander." 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1291 (citing Hays, 515 U.S., at 744–745, 115 S.Ct. 2431). But, the District Court nonetheless denied standing *1269 because it believed that the "record" did "not clearly identify the districts in which the individual members of the [Conference] reside," and the Conference had "not proved that it has members who have standing to pursue any district-specific claims of racial gerrymandering." 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1292.

The District Court conceded that Dr. Joe Reed, a representative of the Conference, testified that the Conference "has members in almost every county in Alabama." Ibid. But, the District Court went on to say that "the counties in Alabama are split into many districts." Ibid. And the "Conference offered no testimony or evidence that it has members in all of the districts in Alabama or in any of the [four] specific districts that it challenged." Ibid.

The record, however, lacks adequate support for the District Court's conclusion. Dr. Reed's testimony supports, and nothing in that record undermines, the Conference's own statement, in its post-trial brief, that it is a "statewide political 270 caucus founded in 1960." Conference Post–Trial Brief 3. It has the "purpose" of "endors[ing] candidates for political office who will be responsible to the needs of the blacks and other minorities and poor people." Id., at 3–4. These two statements (the second of which the principal dissent ignores), taken together with Dr. Reed's testimony, support an inference that the organization has members in all of the State's majority-minority districts, other things being equal, which is sufficient to meet the Conference's burden of establishing standing. That is to say, it seems highly likely that a "statewide" organization with members in "almost every county," the purpose of which is to help "blacks and other minorities and poor people," will have members in each majority-minority district. But cf. post, at 1275 – 1277 (SCALIA, J., dissenting).

At the very least, the common sense inference is strong enough to lead the Conference reasonably to believe that, in the absence of a state challenge or a court request for more detailed information, it need not provide additional information such as a specific membership list. We have found nothing in the record, nor has the State referred us to anything in the record, that suggests the contrary. Cf. App. 204–205, 208 (State arguing lack of standing, not because of inadequate member residency but because an association "lives" nowhere and that the Conference should join individual members). The most the State argued was that "[n]one of the individual [p]laintiffs [who brought the case with the Conference] claims to live in" Senate District 11, id., at 205 (emphasis added), but the Conference would likely not have understood that argument as a request that it provide a membership list. In fact, the Conference might have understood the argument as an indication that the State did not contest its membership in every district.

To be sure, the District Court had an independent obligation to confirm its jurisdiction, even in the absence of a state challenge. See post, at 1276 – 1277 (SCALIA, J., dissenting). But, 271 in these circumstances, elementary principles of procedural fairness required that the District Court, rather than acting sua sponte, give the Conference an opportunity to provide evidence of member residence. Cf. Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 501–502, 95 S.Ct. 2197, 45 L.Ed.2d 343 (1975) (explaining that a court may "allow or [r]equire" a plaintiff to supplement the record to show standing and that " [i]f, after this opportunity, the plaintiff's standing does not adequately appear from all materials of record, the complaint must be dismissed" (emphasis added)). Moreover, we have no reason to believe that the Conference *1270 would have been unable to provide a list of members, at least with respect to the majority-minority districts, had it been asked. It has filed just such a list in this Court. See Affidavit of Joe L. Reed Pursuant to this Court's Rule 32.3 (Lodging of Conference affidavit listing members residing in each majority-minority district in the State); see also Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701, 718, 127 S.Ct. 2738, 168 L.Ed.2d 508 (2007) (accepting a lodged affidavit in similar circumstances). Thus, the District Court on remand should reconsider the Conference's standing by permitting the Conference to file its list of members and permitting the State to respond, as appropriate.

IV

The District Court held in the alternative that the claims of racial gerrymandering must fail because "[r]ace was not the predominant motivating factor" in the creation of any of the challenged districts. 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1293. In our view, however, the District Court did not properly calculate "predominance." In particular, it judged race to lack "predominance" in part because it placed in the balance, among other nonracial factors, legislative efforts to create districts of approximately equal population. See, e.g., id., at 1305 (the "need to bring the neighboring districts into compliance with the requirement of one person, one vote served as the primary motivating factor for the changes to [Senate] District 272 22" (emphasis added)); id., at 1297 (the "constitutional requirement of one person, one vote trumped every other districting principle"); id., at 1296 (the "record establishes that the drafters of the new districts, above all, had to correct [for] severe malapportionment ..."); id., at 1306 (the "inclusion of additional precincts [in Senate District 26] is a reasonable response to the underpopulation of the District").

[7] In our view, however, an equal population goal is not one factor among others to be weighed against the use of race to determine whether race "predominates." Rather, it is part of the redistricting background, taken as a given, when determining whether race, or other factors, predominate in a legislator's determination as to how equal population objectives will be met.

[8] To understand this conclusion, recall what "predominance" is about: A plaintiff pursuing a racial gerrymandering claim must show that "race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. To do so, the "plaintiff must prove that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations." Ibid. (emphasis added).

Now consider the nature of those offsetting "traditional race-neutral districting principles." We have listed several, including "compactness, contiguity, respect for political subdivisions or communities defined by actual shared interests," ibid., incumbency protection, and political affiliation, Vera, 517 U.S., at 964, 968, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (principal opinion).

But we have not listed equal population objectives. And there is a reason for that omission. The reason that equal population objectives do not appear on this list of "traditional" criteria is that equal population objectives play a different role in a State's redistricting process. That role is not a minor one. Indeed, in light of the Constitution's demands, that role may often prove "predominant" in the ordinary 273 sense of that word. But, as the United *1271 States points out, "predominance" in the context of a racial gerrymandering claim is special. It is not about whether a legislature believes that the need for equal population takes ultimate priority. Rather, it is, as we said, whether the legislature "placed" race "above traditional districting considerations in determining which persons were placed in appropriately apportioned districts." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 19 (some emphasis added). In other words, if the legislature must place 1,000 or so additional voters in a particular district in order to achieve an equal population goal, the "predominance" question concerns *which*voters the legislature decides to choose, and specifically whether the legislature predominately uses race as opposed to other, "traditional" factors when doing so.

Consequently, we agree with the United States that the requirement that districts have approximately equal populations is a background rule against which redistricting takes place. Id., at 12. It is not a factor to be treated like other nonracial factors when a court determines whether race predominated over other, "traditional" factors in the drawing of district boundaries.

Had the District Court not taken a contrary view of the law, its "predominance" conclusions, including those concerning the four districts that the Conference specifically challenged, might well have been different. For example, once the legislature's "equal population" objectives are put to the side —i.e., seen as a background principle—then there is strong, perhaps overwhelming, evidence that race did predominate as a factor when the legislature drew the boundaries of Senate District 26, the one district that the parties have discussed here in depth.

The legislators in charge of creating the redistricting plan believed, and told their technical adviser, that a primary redistricting goal was to maintain existing racial percentages in each majority-minority district, insofar as feasible. See 274 supra, at 1278 – 1279 (compiling extensive record testimony in support of this point). There is considerable evidence that this goal had a direct and significant impact on the drawing of at least some of District 26's boundaries. See 3 Tr. 175–180 (testimony of Hinaman); Appendix C, infra (change of district's shape from rectangular to irregular). Of the 15,785 individuals that the new redistricting laws added to the population of District 26, just 36 were white —a remarkable feat given the local demographics. See, e.g., 2 Tr. 127–128 (testimony of Senator Quinton Ross); 3 Tr. 179 (testimony of Hinaman). Transgressing their own redistricting guidelines, Committee Guidelines 3–4, the drafters split seven precincts between the majority-black District 26 and the majority-white District 25, with the population in those precincts clearly divided on racial lines. See Exh. V in Support of Newton Plaintiffs' Opposition to Summary Judgment in No. 12–cv–691, Doc. 140–1, pp. 91–95. And the District Court conceded that race "was a factor in the drawing of District 26," and that the legislature "preserved" "the percentage of the population that was black." 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1306.

We recognize that the District Court also found, with respect to District 26, that "preservi[ng] the core of the existing [d]istrict," following "county lines," and following "highway lines" played an important boundary-drawing role. Ibid. But the first of these (core preservation) is not directly relevant to the origin of the new district inhabitants; the second (county lines) seems of marginal importance since virtually all Senate District 26 boundaries departed from county lines; and the third (highways) was not mentioned in the legislative *1272 redistricting guidelines. Cf. Committee Guidelines 3–5.

All this is to say that, with respect to District 26 and likely others as well, had the District Court treated equal population goals as background factors, it might have concluded that race was the predominant boundary-drawing consideration. 275 Thus, on remand, the District Court should reconsider its "no predominance" conclusions with respect to Senate District 26 and others to which our analysis is applicable.

Finally, we note that our discussion in this section is limited to correcting the District Court's misapplication of the "predominance" test for strict scrutiny discussed in Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. It does not express a view on the question of whether the intentional use of race in redistricting, even in the absence of proof that traditional districting principles were subordinated to race, triggers strict scrutiny. See Vera, 517 U.S., at 996, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (KENNEDY, J., concurring).

V

The District Court, in a yet further alternative holding, found that "[e]ven if the [State] subordinated traditional districting principles to racial considerations," the racial gerrymandering claims failed because, in any event, "the Districts would satisfy strict scrutiny." 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1306. In the District Court's view, the "Acts are narrowly tailored to comply with Section 5" of the Voting Rights Act. Id., at 1311. That provision "required the Legislature to maintain, where feasible, the existing number of majority-black districts and not substantially reduce the relative percentages of black voters in those districts." Ibid. (emphasis added). And, insofar as the State's redistricting embodied racial considerations, it did so in order to meet this § 5 requirement.

[9] In our view, however, this alternative holding rests upon a misperception of the law. Section 5, which covered particular States and certain other jurisdictions, does not require a covered jurisdiction to maintain a particular numerical minority percentage. It requires the jurisdiction to maintain a minority's ability to elect a preferred candidate of choice. That is precisely what the language of the statute says. It prohibits a covered jurisdiction from adopting any change that "has the purpose of or will have the effect of diminishing the ability of [the minority group] to elect their preferred 276 candidates of choice." 52 U.S.C. § 10304(b); see also § 10304(d) (the "purpose of subsection (b) ... is to protect the ability of such citizens to elect their preferred candidates of choice").

That is also just what Department of Justice Guidelines say. The Guidelines state specifically that the Department's preclearance determinations are not based > "on any predetermined or fixed demographic percentages.... Rather, in the Department's view, this determination requires a functional analysis of the electoral behavior within the particular jurisdiction or election district.... [C]ensus data alone may not provide sufficient indicia of electoral behavior to make the requisite determination." Guidance Concerning Redistricting Under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 76 Fed. Reg. 7471 (2011).

Consistent with this view, the United States tells us that "Section 5" does not "requir[e] the State to maintain the same percentage of black voters in each of the majority-black districts as had existed in the prior districting plans." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 22. Rather, it "prohibits only those diminutions of a minority group's proportionate strength that strip the group within a district *1273 of its existing ability to elect its candidates of choice." Id., at 22–23. We agree. Section 5 does not require maintaining the same population percentages in majority-minority districts as in the prior plan. Rather, § 5 is satisfied if minority voters retain the ability to elect their preferred candidates.

The history of § 5 further supports this view. In adopting the statutory language to which we referred above, Congress rejected this Court's decision in Georgia v. Ashcroft, 539 U.S. 461, 480, 123 S.Ct. 2498, 156 L.Ed.2d 428 (2003) (holding that it is not necessarily retrogressive for a State to replace safe majority-minority districts with crossover or influence districts), and it adopted the views of the dissent. 277 H.R.Rep. No. 109–478, pp. 68–69, and n. 183 (2006). While the thrust of Justice Souter's dissent was that, in a § 5 retrogression case, courts should ask whether a new voting provision would likely deprive minority voters of their ability to elect a candidate of their choice—language that Congress adopted in revising § 5—his dissent also made clear that courts should not mechanically rely upon numerical percentages but should take account of all significant circumstances. Georgia v. Ashcroft, supra, at 493, 498, 505, 509, 123 S.Ct. 2498. And while the revised language of § 5 may raise some interpretive questions—e.g., its application to coalition, crossover, and influence districts—it is clear that Congress did not mandate that a 1% reduction in a 70% black population district would be necessarily retrogressive. See Persily, The Promises and Pitfalls of the New Voting Rights Act, 117 Yale L.J. 174, 218 (2007). Indeed, Alabama's mechanical interpretation of § 5 can raise serious constitutional concerns. See Miller, supra, at 926, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

The record makes clear that both the District Court and the legislature relied heavily upon a mechanically numerical view as to what counts as forbidden retrogression. See Appendix B, infra. And the difference between that view and the more purpose-oriented view reflected in the statute's language can matter. Imagine a majority-minority district with a 70% black population. Assume also that voting in that district, like that in the State itself, is racially polarized. And assume that the district has long elected to office black voters' preferred candidate. Other things being equal, it would seem highly unlikely that a redistricting plan that, while increasing the numerical size of the district, reduced the percentage of the black population from, say, 70% to 65% would have a significant impact on the black voters' ability to elect their preferred candidate. And, for that reason, it would be difficult to explain just why a plan that uses racial criteria predominately to maintain the black population at 70% is "narrowly tailored" to achieve a "compelling state interest," namely the interest in preventing § 5 retrogression. 278 The circumstances of this hypothetical example, we add, are close to those characterizing Senate District 26, as set forth in the District Court's opinion and throughout the record. See, e.g., 1 Tr. 131–132 (testimony of Dial); 3 Tr. 180 (testimony of Hinaman).

[10] In saying this, we do not insist that a legislature guess precisely what percentage reduction a court or the Justice Department might eventually find to be retrogressive. The law cannot insist that a state legislature, when redistricting, determine precisely what percent minority population § 5 demands. The standards of § 5 are complex; they often require evaluation of controverted claims about voting behavior; the evidence may be unclear; and, with respect to any particular district, judges may disagree about the proper outcome. The law cannot lay a *1274 trap for an unwary legislature, condemning its redistricting plan as either (1) unconstitutional racial gerrymandering should the legislature place a few too many minority voters in a district or (2) retrogressive under § 5 should the legislature place a few too few. See Vera, 517 U.S., at 977, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (principal opinion). Thus, we agree with the United States that a court's analysis of the narrow tailoring requirement insists only that the legislature have a "strong basis in evidence" in support of the (race-based) choice that it has made. Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 29 (citing Ricci v. DeStefano, 557 U.S. 557, 585, 129 S.Ct. 2658, 174 L.Ed.2d 490 (2009)). This standard, as the United States points out, "does not demand that a State's actions actually be necessary to achieve a compelling state interest in order to be constitutionally valid." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 29. And legislators "may have a strong basis in evidence to use racial classifications in order to comply with a statute when they have good reasons to believe such use is required, even if a court does not find that the actions were necessary for statutory compliance." Ibid. (emphasis added).

279 Here the District Court enunciated a narrow tailoring standard close to the one we have just mentioned. It said that a plan is "narrowly tailored ... when the race-based action taken was reasonably necessary" to achieve a compelling interest. 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1307 (emphasis added). And it held that preventing retrogression is a compelling interest. Id., at 1306–1307. While we do not here decide whether, given Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. ——, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 186 L.Ed.2d 651 (2013), continued compliance with § 5 remains a compelling interest, we conclude that the District Court and the legislature asked the wrong question with respect to narrow tailoring. They asked: "How can we maintain present minority percentages in majority-minority districts?" But given § 5's language, its purpose, the Justice Department Guidelines, and the relevant precedent, they should have asked: "To what extent must we preserve existing minority percentages in order to maintain the minority's present ability to elect the candidate of its choice?" Asking the wrong question may well have led to the wrong answer. Hence, we cannot accept the District Court's "compelling interest/narrow tailoring" conclusion.

* * *

For these reasons, the judgment of the District Court is vacated. We note that appellants have also raised additional questions in their jurisdictional statements, relating to their one-person, one-vote claims (Caucus) and vote dilution claims (Conference), which were also rejected by the District Court. We do not pass upon these claims. The District Court remains free to reconsider the claims should it find reconsideration appropriate. And the parties are free to raise them, including as modified by the District Court, on any further appeal.

The cases are remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice SCALIA, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice THOMAS, and Justice ALITO join, dissenting.

282 Today, the Court issues a sweeping holding that will have profound implications for the constitutional ideal of one person, one vote, for the future of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and for the primacy of the State in managing its own elections. If the Court's destination seems fantastical, just wait until you see the journey.

*1275 Two groups of plaintiffs, the Alabama Democratic Conference and the Alabama Legislative Black Caucus, brought separate challenges to the way in which Alabama drew its state legislative districts following the 2010 census. These cases were consolidated before a three-judge District Court. Even after a full trial, the District Court lamented that "[t]he filings and arguments made by the plaintiffs on these claims were mystifying at best." 989 F.Supp.2d 1227, 1287 (M.D.Ala.2013). Nevertheless, the District Court understood both groups of plaintiffs to argue, as relevant here, only that "the Acts as a whole constitute racial gerrymanders." Id., at 1287. It also understood the Democratic Conference to argue that "Senate Districts 7, 11, 22, and 26 constitute racial gerrymanders," id., at 1288, but held that the Democratic Conference lacked standing to bring "any district-specific claims of racial gerrymandering," id., at 1292 (emphasis added). It then found for Alabama on the merits.

The Court rightly concludes that our racial gerrymandering jurisprudence does not allow for statewide claims. Ante, at 1264 – 1268. However, rather than holding appellants to the misguided legal theory they presented to the District Court, it allows them to take a mulligan, remanding the case with orders that the District Court consider whether some (all?) of Alabama's 35 majority-minority districts result from impermissible racial gerrymandering. In doing this, the Court disregards the detailed findings and thoroughly reasoned conclusions of the District Court—in particular its determination, reached after watching the development of 283 the case from complaint to trial, that no appellant proved (or even pleaded) district-specific claims with respect to the majority-minority districts. Worse still, the Court ignores the Democratic Conference's express waiver of these claims before this Court. It does this on the basis of a few stray comments, cherry-picked from district-court filings that are more Rorschach brief than Brandeis brief, in which the vague outline of what could be district-specific racial-gerrymandering claims begins to take shape only with the careful, post-hoc nudging of appellate counsel.

Racial gerrymandering strikes at the heart of our democratic process, undermining the electorate's confidence in its government as representative of a cohesive body politic in which all citizens are equal before the law. It is therefore understandable, if not excusable, that the Court balks at denying merits review simply because appellants pursued a flawed litigation strategy. But allowing appellants a second bite at the apple invites lower courts similarly to depart from the premise that ours is an adversarial system whenever they deem the stakes sufficiently high. Because I do not believe that Article III empowers this Court to act as standby counsel for sympathetic litigants, I dissent.

I. The Alabama Democratic Conference

The District Court concluded that the Democratic Conference lacked standing to bring district-specific claims. It did so on the basis of the Conference's failure to present any evidence that it had members who voted in the challenged districts, and because the individual Conference plaintiffs did not claim to vote in them. 989 F.Supp.2d, at 1292.

A voter has standing to bring a racial-gerrymandering claim only if he votes in a gerrymandered district, or if specific evidence demonstrates that he has suffered the special harms that attend racial gerrymandering. United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 744–745, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995). However, the Democratic *1276 Conference only claimed to have "chapters and members 284 in almost all counties in the state." Newton Plaintiffs' Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in No. 12–cv–691, Doc. 195–1, pp. 3–4 (Democratic Conference Post–Trial Brief) (emphasis added). Yet the Court concludes that this fact, combined with the Conference's self-description as a " 'statewide political caucus' " that endorses candidates for political office, "supports an inference that the organization has members in all of the State's majority-minority districts, other things being equal." Ante, at 1269. The Court provides no support for this theory of jurisdiction by illogical inference, perhaps because this Court has rejected other attempts to peddle more-likely-than-not standing. See Summers v. Earth Island Institute, 555 U.S. 488, 497, 129 S.Ct. 1142, 173 L.Ed.2d 1 (2009) (rejecting a test for organizational standing that asks "whether, accepting [an] organization's self-description of the activities of its members, there is a statistical probability that some of those members are threatened with concrete injury").

The inference to be drawn from the Conference's statements cuts in precisely the opposite direction. What is at issue here is not just counties but voting districts within counties. If the Conference has members in almost every county, then there must be counties in which it does not have members; and we have no basis for concluding (or inferring) that those counties do not contain all of the majority-minority voting districts. Moreover, even in those counties in which the Conference does have members, we have no basis for concluding (or inferring) that those members vote in majority-minority districts. The Conference had plenty of opportunities, including at trial, to demonstrate that this was the case, and failed to do so. This failure lies with the Democratic Conference, and the consequences should be borne by it, not by the people of Alabama, who must now shoulder the expense of further litigation and the uncertainty that attends a resuscitated constitutional challenge to their legislative districts.

285 Incredibly, the Court thinks that "elementary principles of procedural fairness" require giving the Democratic Conference the opportunity to prove on appeal what it neglected to prove at trial. Ante, at 1269 – 1270. It observes that the Conference had no reason to believe it should provide such information because "the State did not contest its membership in every district," and the opinion cites an affidavit lodged with this Court providing a list of the Conference's members in each majority-minority district in Alabama. Ibid. I cannot imagine why the absence of a state challenge would matter. Whether or not there was such a challenge, it was the Conference's responsibility, as "[t]he party invoking federal jurisdiction," to establish standing. See Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 561, 112 S.Ct. 2130, 119 L.Ed.2d 351 (1992). That responsibility was enforceable, challenge or no, by the court: "The federal courts are under an independent obligation to examine their own jurisdiction, and standing 'is perhaps the most important of [the jurisdictional] doctrines.' " FW/PBS, Inc. v. Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 230–231, 110 S.Ct. 596, 107 L.Ed.2d 603 (1990) (citations omitted). And because standing is not a "mere pleading requiremen[t] but rather an indispensable part of the plaintiff's case, each element must be supported in the same way as any other matter on which the plaintiff bears the burden of proof, i.e., with the manner and degree of evidence required at the successive stages of the litigation." Defenders of Wildlife, supra, at 561, 112 S.Ct. 2130.

The Court points to *1277 Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701, 718, 127 S.Ct. 2738, 168 L.Ed.2d 508 (2007), as support for its decision to sandbag Alabama with the Democratic Conference's out-of-time (indeed, out-of-court) lodging in this Court. The circumstances in that case, however, are far afield. The organization of parents in that case had established organizational standing in the lower court by showing that it had members with children who would be subject to the school district's "integration tiebreaker," which was applied at ninth grade. Brief for Respondents, 286 O.T. 2006, No. 05–908, p. 16. By the time the case reached this Court, however, the youngest of these children had entered high school, and so would no longer be subject to the challenged policy. Ibid. Accordingly, we accepted a lodging that provided names of additional, younger children in order to show that the organization had not lost standing as a result of the long delay that often accompanies federal litigation. Here, by contrast, the Democratic Conference's lodging in the Supreme Court is its first attempt to show that it has members in the majority-minority districts. This is too little, too late.

But that is just the start. Even if the Democratic Conference had standing to bring district-specific racial-gerrymandering claims, there remains the question whether it did bring them. Its complaint alleged three counts: (1) Violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, (2) Racial gerrymandering in violation of the Equal Protection Clause, and (3) § 1983 violations of the Voting Rights Act and the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Complaint in No. 2:12–cv–1081, Doc. 1, pp. 17–18. The racial gerrymandering count alleged that "Alabama Acts 2012–602 and 2012–603 were drawn for the purpose and effect of minimizing the opportunity of minority voters to participate effectively in the political process," and that this "racial gerrymandering by Alabama Acts 2012–602 and 2012–603 violates the rights of Plaintiffs." Id., at 17. It made no reference to specific districts that were racially gerrymandered; indeed, the only particular jurisdictions mentioned anywhere in the complaint were Senate District 11, Senate District 22, Madison County Senate Districts, House District 73, and Jefferson and Montgomery County House Districts. None of the Senate Districts is majority-minority. Nor is House District 73. Jefferson County does, admittedly, contain 8 of the 27 majority-minority House Districts in Alabama, and Montgomery County contains another 4, making a total of 12. But they also contain 14 majority-white House Districts 287 between them. In light of this, it is difficult to understand the Court's statement that appellants' "evidence and ... arguments embody the claim that individual majority-minority districts were racially gerrymandered." Ante, at 1266.

That observation would, of course, make sense if the Democratic Conference had developed such a claim in the course of discovery and trial. But in its post-trial Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, the Conference hewed to its original charge of statewide racial gerrymandering—or, rather, it did so as much as it reasonably could without actually proposing that the Court find any racial gerrymandering, statewide or otherwise. Instead, the Conference chose only to pursue claims that Alabama violated § 2 of the Voting Rights Act under two theories. See Democratic Conference Post–Trial Brief 91–103 (alleging a violation of the results prong of Voting Rights Act § 2) and 103–124 (alleging a violation of the purpose prong of Voting Rights Act § 2).

To be sure, the Conference employed language and presented factual claims at various points in its 126–page post-trial brief that are evocative of a claim of racial gerrymandering. But in clinging to these *1278 stray comments to support its conclusion that the Conference made district-specific racial-gerrymandering claims, ante, at 1266 – 1267, the Court ignores the context in which these comments appear—the context of a clear Voting Rights Act § 2 claim. Voting Rights Act claims and racial-gerrymandering claims share some of the same elements. See League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 514, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). Thus, allegations made in the course of arguing a § 2 claim will often be indistinguishable from allegations that would be made in support of a racial-gerrymandering claim. The appearance of such allegations in one of the Conference's briefs might support reversal if this case came to us on appeal from 288 the District Court's grant of a motion to dismiss. See Johnson v. City of Shelby, 574 U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 346, 346, 190 L.Ed.2d 309 (2014) (per curiam) (noting that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure "do not countenance dismissal of a complaint for imperfect statement of the legal theory supporting the claim asserted"). But here the District Court held a full trial before concluding that the Conference failed to make or prove any district-specific racial-gerrymandering claims with respect to the majority-minority districts. In this posture, and on this record, I cannot agree with the Court that the Conference's district-specific evidence, clearly made in the course of arguing a § 2 theory, should be read to give rise to district-specific claims of racial gerrymandering with respect to Alabama's majority-minority districts.

The Court attempts to shift responsibility for the Democratic Conference's ill-fated statewide theory from the Conference to the District Court, implying that it was the "legally erroneous" analysis of the District Court, ante, at 1268, rather than the arguments made by the Conference, that conjured this "legal unicorn," ante, at 1265 – 1266, so that the Conference did not forfeit the claims that the Court now attributes to it, ante, at 1268. I suspect this will come as a great surprise to the Conference. Whatever may have been presented to the District Court, the Conference unequivocally stated in its opening brief: "Appellants challenge Alabama's race-based statewide redistricting policy, not the design of any one particular election district." Brief for Appellants in No. 13–1138, p. 2 (emphasis added). It drove the point home in its reply brief: "[I]f the Court were to apply a predominant-motive and narrow-tailoring analysis, that analysis should be applied to the state's policy, not to the design of each particular district one-by-one." Reply Brief in No. 11–1138, p. 7. How could anything be clearer? As the Court observes, the Conference attempted to walk back this unqualified description of its case at oral argument. Ante, at 1267 – 1268. Its assertion that what it really meant to challenge 289 was the policy as applied to every district (not every majority-minority district, mind you) is not "clarification," ante, at 1268, but an entirely new argument—indeed, the same argument it expressly disclaimed in its briefing. "We will not revive a forfeited argument simply because the petitioner gestures toward it in its reply brief." Republic of Argentina v. NML Capital, Ltd., 573 U.S. ——, ——, n. 2, 134 S.Ct. 2250, 2255, n. 2, 189 L.Ed.2d 234 (2014); we certainly should not do so when the issue is first presented at oral argument.

II. The Alabama Legislative Black Caucus

The Court does not bother to disentangle the independent claims brought by the Black Caucus from those of the Democratic Conference, but it strongly implies that both parties asserted racial-gerrymandering *1279 claims with respect to Alabama's 35 majority-minority districts. As we have described, the Democratic Conference brought no such claims; and the Black Caucus's filings provide even weaker support for the Court's conclusion.

The Black Caucus complaint contained three counts: (1) Violation of One Person, One Vote, see Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964); (2) Dilution and Isolation of Black Voting Strength in violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act; and (3) Partisan Gerrymandering. Complaint in No. 2:12–cv–691, Doc. 1, pp. 15–22. The failure to raise any racial-gerrymandering claim was not a mere oversight or the consequence of inartful pleading. Indeed, in its amended complaint the Black Caucus specifically cited this Court's leading racial-gerrymandering case for the proposition that "traditional or neutral districting principles may not be subordinated in a dominant fashion by either racial or partisan interests absent a compelling state interest for doing so." Amended Complaint in No. 2:12–cv–691, Doc. 60, p. 23 (citing Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 642, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993); emphasis added). This quote appears in the first paragraph under the "Partisan Gerrymandering" heading, and claims of subordination 290 to racial interests are notably absent from the Black Caucus complaint.

Racial gerrymandering was not completely ignored, however. In a brief introductory paragraph to the amended complaint, before addressing jurisdiction and venue, the Black Caucus alleged that "Acts 2012–602 and 2012–603 are racial gerrymanders that unnecessarily minimize population deviations and violate the whole-county provisions of the Alabama Constitution with both the purpose and effect of minimizing black voting strength and isolating from influence in the Alabama Legislature legislators chosen by African Americans." Amended Complaint, at 3. This was the first and last mention of racial gerrymandering, and like the Democratic Conference's complaint, it focused exclusively on the districting maps as a whole rather than individual districts. Moreover, even this allegation appears primarily concerned with the use of racially motivated districting as a means of violating one person, one vote (by splitting counties), and § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (by minimizing and isolating black voters and legislators).

To the extent the Black Caucus cited particular districts in the body of its complaint, it did so only with respect to its enumerated one-person, one-vote, Voting Rights Act, and partisan-gerrymandering counts. See, e.g., id., at 13–14 (alleging that the "deviation restriction and disregard of the 'whole county' requirements ... facilitated the Republican majority's efforts to gerrymander the district boundaries in Acts 2012–602 and 2012–603 for partisan purposes.

By packing the majority-black House and Senate districts, the plans remove reliable Democratic voters from adjacent majority-white districts ..."); id., at 36 ("The partisan purpose of [one] gerrymander was to remove predominately black Madison County precincts to SD 1, avoiding a potential crossover district"); id., at 44–45 (asserting that "splitting Jefferson County among 11 House and Senate districts" and "increasing the size of its local legislative delegation and the 291 number of other counties whose residents elect members" of the delegation "dilut[es] the votes of Jefferson County residents" by diminishing their ability to control county-level legislation in the state legislature). And even these claims were made with a statewide scope in mind. Id., at 55 ("Viewed in their entirety, the plans in Acts 2012–602 and 2012–603 have the purpose and effect of minimizing the opportunities *1280 for black and white voters who support the Democratic Party to elect candidates of their choice").

Here again, discovery and trial failed to produce any clear claims with respect to the majority-minority districts. In a curious inversion of the Democratic Conference's practice of pleading racial gerrymandering and then effectively abandoning the claims, the Black Caucus, which failed to plead racial gerrymandering, did clearly advance the theory after the trial. See Alabama Legislative Black Caucus Plaintiffs' Post–Trial Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in No. 2:12–cv–691, Doc. 194, pp. 48–51 (Black Caucus Post–Trial Brief). The Black Caucus asserted racial-gerrymandering claims in its post-trial brief, but they all had a clear statewide scope. It charged that Alabama "started their line drawing with the majority-black districts" so as to maximize the size of their black majorities, which "impacted the drawing of majority-white districts in nearly every part of the state." Id., at 48–49. "[R]ace was the predominant factor in drafting both plans," id., at 49, which "drove nearly every districting decision," "dilut [ing] the influence of black voters in the majority-white districts," id., at 50.

The Black Caucus did present district-specific evidence in the course of developing its other legal theories. Although this included evidence that Alabama manipulated the racial composition of certain majority-minority districts, it also included evidence that Alabama manipulated racial distributions with respect to the districting maps as a whole, id., at 6 ("Maintaining the same high black percentages had a 292 predominant impact on the entire plan"), and with respect to majority-white districts, id., at 10–11 ("Asked why [majority-white] SD 11 was drawn in a semi-donut-shape that splits St. Clair, Talladega, and Shelby Counties, Sen. Dial blamed that also on the need to preserve the black majorities in Jefferson County Senate districts"), and 43–44 ("Sen. Irons' quick, 'primative' [sic] analysis of the new [majority-white] SD 1 convinced her that it was designed to 'shed' the minority population of Sen. Sanford's [majority-white] SD 7 to SD 1" in order to "crack a minority influence district"). The Black Caucus was attacking the legislative districts from every angle. Nothing gives rise to an inference that it ever homed in on majority-minority districts—or, for that matter, any particular set of districts. Indeed, the fair reading of the Black Caucus's filings is that it was presenting illustrative evidence in particular districts—majority-minority, minority-influence, and majority-white—in an effort to make out a claim of statewide racial gerrymandering. The fact that the Court now concludes that this is not a valid legal theory does not justify its repackaging the claims for a second round of litigation.

III. Conclusion

Frankly, I do not know what to make of appellants' arguments. They are pleaded with such opacity that, squinting hard enough, one can find them to contain just about anything. This, the Court believes, justifies demanding that the District Court go back and squint harder, so that it may divine some new means of construing the filings. This disposition is based, it seems, on the implicit premise that plaintiffs only plead legally correct theories. That is a silly premise. We should not reward the practice of litigation by obfuscation, especially when we are dealing with a well-established legal claim that numerous plaintiffs have successfully brought in the past. See, e.g., Amended Complaint and Motion for Preliminary and Permanent Injunction in 293 Cromartie v. Hunt, No. 4:96–cv–104 (EDNC), Doc. 21, p. 9 ("Under the *1281 March 1997 redistricting plan, the Twelfth District and First District have boundaries which were drawn pursuant to a predominantly racial motivation," which were "the fruit of [earlier] racially gerrymandered plans"). Even the complaint in Shaw, which established a cause of action for racial gerrymandering, displayed greater lucidity than appellants', alleging that defendants "creat[ed] two amorphous districts which embody a scheme for segregation of voters by race in order to meet a racial quota" "totally unrelated to considerations of compactness, contiguous, and geographic or jurisdictional communities of interest." Complaint and Motion for Preliminary and Permanent Injunction and for Temporary Restraining Order in Shaw v. Barr, No. 5:92–cv–202 (EDNC), Doc. 1, pp. 11–12.

The Court seems to acknowledge that appellants never focused their racial-gerrymandering claims on Alabama's majority-minority districts. While remanding to consider whether the majority-minority districts were racially gerrymandered, it admits that plaintiffs "basically claim that the State, in adding so many new minority voters to majority-minority districts (and to others), went too far." Ante, at 1263 (emphasis added). It further concedes that appellants "relied heavily upon statewide evidence," and that they "also sought to prove that the use of race to draw the boundaries of the majority-minority districts affected the boundaries of other districts as well." Ante, at 1267.

The only reason I see for the Court's selection of the majority-minority districts as the relevant set of districts for the District Court to consider on remand is that this was the set chosen by appellants after losing on the claim they actually presented in the District Court. By playing along with appellants' choose-your-own-adventure style of litigation, willingly turning back the page every time a strategic decision leads to a dead-end, the Court discourages careful litigation and punishes defendants who are denied both notice and 294 repose. The consequences of this unprincipled decision will reverberate far beyond the narrow circumstances presented in this case.

Accordingly, I dissent.

Justice THOMAS, dissenting.

"[F]ew devices could be better designed to exacerbate racial tensions than the consciously segregated districting system currently being constructed in the name of the Voting Rights Act." Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 907, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment). These consolidated cases are yet another installment in the "disastrous misadventure" of this Court's voting rights jurisprudence. Id., at 893, 114 S.Ct. 2581. We have somehow arrived at a place where the parties agree that Alabama's legislative districts should be fine-tuned to achieve some "optimal" result with respect to black voting power; the only disagreement is about what percentage of blacks should be placed in those optimized districts. This is nothing more than a fight over the "best" racial quota.

I join Justice SCALIA's dissent. I write only to point out that, as this case painfully illustrates, our jurisprudence in this area continues to be infected with error.

I

The Alabama Legislature faced a difficult situation in its 2010 redistricting efforts. It began with racially segregated district maps that were inherited from previous decades. The maps produced by the 2001 redistricting contained 27 majority-black House districts and 8 majority-black Senate districts—both at the time they *1282 were drawn, App. to Juris. Statement 47–48, and at the time of the 2010 Census, App. 103–108. Many of these majority-black districts were over 70% black when they were drawn in 2001, and even more were over 60% black. App. to Juris. Statement 47–48. Even after the 2010 Census, the population remained above 60% black in the majority of districts. App. 103–108.

295 Under the 2006 amendments to § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Alabama was also under a federal command to avoid drawing new districts that would "have the effect of diminishing the ability" of black voters "to elect their preferred candidates of choice." 52 U.S.C. § 10304(b). To comply with § 5, the legislature adopted a policy of maintaining the same percentage of black voters within each of those districts as existed in the 2001 plans. See*ante,* at 1270 – 1271. This, the districting committee thought, would preserve the ability of black voters to elect the same number of preferred candidates. App. to Juris. Statement 174–175. The Department of Justice (DOJ) apparently agreed. Acting under its authority to administer § 5 of the Voting Rights Act, the DOJ precleared Alabama's plans.[1] Id., at 9.

Appellants—including the Alabama Legislative Black Caucus and the Alabama Democratic Conference—saw matters differently. They sued Alabama, and on appeal they argue that the State's redistricting plans are racially gerrymandered because many districts are highly packed with black voters. According to appellants, black voters would have more voting power if they were spread over more districts rather than concentrated in the same number of districts as in previous decades. The DOJ has entered the fray in support of appellants, arguing that the State's redistricting maps fail strict scrutiny because the State focused too heavily on a single racial characteristic—the number of black voters in majority-minority districts—which potentially resulted in impermissible packing of black voters.

296 Like the DOJ, today's majority sides with appellants, faulting Alabama for choosing the wrong percentage of blacks in the State's majority-black districts, or at least for arriving at that percentage using the wrong reasoning. In doing so, the Court—along with appellants and the DOJ—exacerbates a problem many years in the making. It seems fitting, then, to trace that history here. The practice of creating highly packed—"safe"—majority-minority districts is the product of our erroneous jurisprudence, which created a system that forces States to segregate voters into districts based on the color of their skin. Alabama's current legislative districts have their genesis in the "max-black" policy that the DOJ itself applied to § 5 throughout the 1990's and early 2000's. The 2006 amendments to § 5 then effectively locked in place Alabama's max-black districts that were established during the 1990's and 2000's. These three problems—a jurisprudence requiring segregated districts, the distortion created by the DOJ's max-black policy, and the ossifying effects of the 2006 amendments—are the *1283 primary culprits in this case, not Alabama's redistricting policy. Nor does this Court have clean hands.

II

This Court created the current system of race-based redistricting by adopting expansive readings of § 2 and § 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Both § 2 and § 5 prohibit States from implementing voting laws that "den[y] or abridg[e] the right to vote on account of race or color." §§ 10304(a), 10301(a). But both provisions extend to only certain types of voting laws: any "voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure." Ibid. As I have previously explained, the terms " 'standard, practice, or procedure' ... refer only to practices that affect minority citizens' access to the ballot," such as literacy tests. Holder, 512 U.S. at 914, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion concurring in judgment). They do not apply to "[d]istricting systems and electoral mechanisms that may affect the 'weight' given to a ballot duly cast and counted." Ibid. Yet this Court has adopted 297 far-reaching interpretations of both provisions, holding that they encompass legislative redistricting and other actions that might "dilute" the strength of minority votes. See generally Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986) (§ 2 "vote dilution" challenge to legislative districting plan); see also Allen v. State Bd. of Elections, 393 U.S. 544, 583–587, 89 S.Ct. 817, 22 L.Ed.2d 1 (1969) (Harlan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

The Court's interpretation of § 2 and § 5 have resulted in challenge after challenge to the drawing of voting districts. See, e.g., Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (2009); League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006); Georgia v. Ashcroft, 539 U.S. 461, 123 S.Ct. 2498, 156 L.Ed.2d 428 (2003); Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 528 U.S. 320, 120 S.Ct. 866, 145 L.Ed.2d 845 (2000) (Bossier II); Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541, 119 S.Ct. 1545, 143 L.Ed.2d 731 (1999); Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730 (1997) (Bossier I); Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996); Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995); United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995); Holder, supra ; Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994); Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993); Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (Shaw I); Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993).

The consequences have been as predictable and as they are unfortunate. In pursuing "undiluted" or maximized minority voting power, "we have devised a remedial mechanism that encourages federal courts to segregate voters into racially designated districts to ensure minority electoral success." Holder, supra, at 892, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment). Section 5, the provision at issue here, has been applied to require States that redistrict to maintain the number of pre-existing majority-minority districts, in which minority voters make up a large enough portion of the population to be able to elect their candidate of choice. See, e.g., Miller, supra, at 923–927, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (rejecting the DOJ's policy of requiring States to increase the number of majority-black districts because maintaining the same number of majority-black districts would not violate § 5).

*1284 298 In order to maintain these "racially 'safe burroughs,' " States or courts must perpetually "divid[e] the country into electoral districts along racial lines—an enterprise of segregating the races into political homelands." Holder, supra, at 905, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (internal quotation marks omitted). The assumptions underlying this practice of creating and maintaining "safe minority districts"—"that members of [a] racial group must think alike and that their interests are so distinct that they must be provided a separate body of representatives"—remain "repugnant to any nation that strives for the ideal of a color-blind Constitution." Id., at 905–906, 114 S.Ct. 2581. And, as predicted, the States' compliance efforts have "embroil[ed] the courts in a lengthy process of attempting to undo, or at least to minimize, the damage wrought by the system we created." Id., at 905, 114 S.Ct. 2581. It is this fateful system that has produced these cases.

III

A

In tandem with our flawed jurisprudence, the DOJ has played a significant role in creating Alabama's current redistricting problem. It did so by enforcing § 5 in a manner that required States, including Alabama, to create supermajority-black voting districts or face denial of pre-clearance.

The details of this so-called "max-black" policy were highlighted in federal court during Georgia's 1991 congressional redistricting. See Johnson v. Miller, 864 F.Supp. 1354, 1360–1361 (S.D.Ga.1994). On behalf of the Black Caucus of the Georgia General Assembly, the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) submitted a redistricting proposal to the Georgia Legislature that became known as the "max-black plan." Id., at 1360. The ACLU's map created two new "black" districts and "further maximized black voting strength by pushing the percentage of black voters within its majority-black districts as high as possible." Id., at 1361 (internal quotation marks omitted).

299 The DOJ denied several of Georgia's proposals on the ground that they did not include enough majority-black districts. Id., at 1366. The plan it finally approved was substantially similar to the ACLU's max-black proposal, id., at 1364–1366, creating three majority-black districts, with total black populations of 56.63%, 62.27%, and 64.07%, id., at 1366, and n. 12.[2]

Georgia was not the only State subject to the DOJ's maximization policy. North Carolina, for example, submitted a congressional redistricting plan after the 1990 Census, but the DOJ rejected it because it did not create a new majority-minority district, and thus "appear[ed] to minimize minority voting strength." Shaw v. Barr, 808 F.Supp. 461, 463–464 (E.D.N.C.1992) (quoting Letter from John R. Dunne, Assistant Attorney General of N. C., Civil Rights Div., to Tiare B. Smiley, Special Deputy Attorney General of N.C. 4 (Dec. 18, 1991)). The DOJ likewise pressured Louisiana to create a new majority-black district when the State sought approval of its congressional redistricting plan following the 1990 Census. See Hays v. Louisiana, 839 F.Supp. 1188, 1190 (W.D.La.1993), vacated on other grounds by *1285 Louisiana v. Hays, 512 U.S. 1230, 114 S.Ct. 2731, 129 L.Ed.2d 853 (1994).

Although we eventually rejected the DOJ's max-black policy, see Miller, supra, at 924–927, 115 S.Ct. 2475, much damage to the States' congressional and legislative district maps had already been done. In those States that had enacted districting plans in accordance with the DOJ's max-black policy, the prohibition on retrogression under § 5 meant that the legislatures were effectively required to maintain those max-black plans during any subsequent redistricting. That is what happened in Alabama.

300 B

Alabama's 2010 redistricting plans were modeled after max-black-inspired plans that the State put in place in the 1990's under the DOJ's max-black policy. See generally Kelley v. Bennett, 96 F.Supp.2d 1301 (M.D.Ala.2000), vacated on other grounds by Sinkfield v. Kelley, 531 U.S. 28, 121 S.Ct. 446, 148 L.Ed.2d 329 (2000) (per curiam).

Following the 1990 Census, the Alabama Legislature began redrawing its state legislative districts. After several proposals failed in the legislature, a group of plaintiffs sued, and the State entered into a consent decree agreeing to use the "Reed–Buskey" plan. 96 F.Supp.2d, at 1309. The primary designer of this plan was Dr. Joe Reed, the current chairman of appellant Alabama Democratic Conference. According to Dr. Reed, the previous plan from the 1980's was not "fair" because it did not achieve the number of "black-preferred" representatives that was proportionate to the percentage of blacks in the population. Id., at 1310. And because of the DOJ's max-black policy, "it was widely assumed that a state could (and, according to DOJ, had to) draw district lines with the primary intent of maximizing election of black officials." Id., at 1310, n. 14. "Dr. Reed thus set out to maximize the number of black representatives and senators elected to the legislature by maximizing the number of black-majority districts." Id., at 1310. Illustrating this strategy, Alabama's letter to the DOJ seeking preclearance of the Reed–Buskey plan "emphasize[d] the Plan's deliberate creation of enough majority-black districts to assure nearly proportional representation in the legislature," ibid., n. 14 and boasted that the plan had created four new majority-black districts and two additional majority-black Senate districts. Ibid.

Dr. Reed populated these districts with a percentage of black residents that achieved an optimal middle ground—a "happy medium"—between too many and too few. Id., at 1311. Twenty-three of the twenty-seven majority-black House districts were between 60% and 70% black under 301 Reed's plan, id., at 1311, and Senate District 26—one of the districts at issue today—was pushed from 65% to 70% black. Id., at 1315.[3] A District Court struck down several districts created in the Reed–Buskey plan as unconstitutionally based on race. Id., at 1324. This Court reversed, however, holding that the plaintiffs lacked standing because they did not *1286 live in the gerrymandered districts. Sinkfield, supra, at 30–31, 121 S.Ct. 446.

The Reed–Buskey plan thus went into effect and provided the template for the State's next redistricting efforts in 2001. See Montiel v. Davis, 215 F.Supp.2d 1279, 1282 (S.D.Ala.2002). The 2001 maps maintained the same number of majority-black districts as the Reed–Buskey plan had created: 27 House districts and 8 Senate districts. Ibid. And "to maintain the same relative percentages of black voters in those districts," the legislature "redrew the districts by shifting more black voters into the majority-black districts." App. to Juris. Statement 4. The State's letters requesting preclearance of the 2001 plans boasted that the maps maintained the same number of majority-black districts and the same (or higher) percentages of black voters within those districts, other than "slight reductions" that were "necessary to satisfy other legitimate, nondiscriminatory redistricting considerations." Letter from William H. Pryor, Alabama Attorney General, to Voting Section Chief, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice 6–7 (Aug. 14, 2001) (Senate districts); Letter from William H. Pryor, Alabama Attorney General, to Voting 302 Section Chief, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice 7, 9 (Sept. 4, 2001) (House districts).

Section 5 tied the State to those districts: Under this Court's § 5 precedents, States are prohibited from enacting a redistricting plan that "would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities." Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976). In other words, the State could not retrogress from the previous plan if it wished to comply with § 5.

IV

Alabama's quandary as it attempted to redraw its legislative districts after 2010 was exacerbated by the 2006 amendments to § 5. Those amendments created an inflexible definition of "retrogression" that Alabama understandably took as requiring it to maintain the same percentages of minority voters in majority-minority districts. The amendments thus provide the last piece of the puzzle that explains why the State sought to maintain the same percentages of blacks in each majority-black district.

Congress passed the 2006 amendments in response to our attempt to define "retrogression" in Georgia v. Ashcroft, 539 U.S. 461, 123 S.Ct. 2498, 156 L.Ed.2d 428. Prior to that decision, practically any reapportionment change could "be deemed 'retrogressive' under our vote dilution jurisprudence by a court inclined to find it so." Bossier I, 520 U.S., at 490–491, 117 S.Ct. 1491 (THOMAS, J., concurring). "[A] court could strike down any reapportionment plan, either because it did not include enough majority-minority districts or because it did (and thereby diluted the minority vote in the remaining districts)." Id., at 491, 117 S.Ct. 1491. Our § 5 jurisprudence thus "inevitably force[d] the courts to make political judgments regarding which type of apportionment best serves supposed minority interests—judgments courts are ill equipped to make." Id., at 492, 117 S.Ct. 1491.

We tried to pull the courts and the DOJ away from making these sorts of judgments in Georgia v. Ashcroft, supra. Insofar as § 5 applies to the drawing of voting districts, we 303 held that a District Court had wrongly rejected Georgia's reapportionment plan, and we adopted a retrogression standard that gave States flexibility in determining the percentage of black voters in each district. Id., at 479–481, 123 S.Ct. 2498. As we explained, "a State may choose to create a certain number of 'safe' districts, in which it is highly *1287 likely that minority voters will be able to elect the candidate of their choice." Id., at 480, 123 S.Ct. 2498. Alternatively, "a State may choose to create a greater number of districts in which it is likely—although perhaps not quite as likely as under the benchmark plan—that minority voters will be able to elect candidates of their choice." Ibid. We noted that "spreading out minority voters over a greater number of districts creates more districts in which minority voters may have the opportunity to elect a candidate of their choice," even if success is not guaranteed, and even if it diminished the chance of electing a representative in some districts. Id., at 481, 123 S.Ct. 2498. Thus, States would be permitted to make judgments about how best to prevent retrogression in a minority group's voting power, including assessing the range of appropriate minority population percentages within each district. Id., at 480–481, 123 S.Ct. 2498.

In response, Congress amended § 5 and effectively overruled Georgia v. Ashcroft. See 120 Stat. 577. The 2006 amendments added subsection (b), which provides:

> "Any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice or procedure with respect to voting that has the purpose or will have the effect of diminishing the ability of any citizens of the United States on account of race or color ... to elect their preferred candidates of choice denies or abridges the right to vote within the meaning of ... this section." 52 U.S.C. § 10304(b). See § 5, 120 Stat. 577.

Thus, any change that has the effect of "diminishing the ability" of a minority group to "elect their preferred candidate of choice" is retrogressive.

304 Some were rightly worried that the 2006 amendments would impose too much inflexibility on the States as they sought to comply with § 5. Richard Pildes, who argued on behalf of the Alabama Democratic Conference in these cases, testified in congressional hearings on the 2006 amendments. He explained that*Georgia v. Ashcroft* "recognizes room ... for some modest flexibility in Section 5," and warned that if "Congress overturns Georgia v. Ashcroft, it will make even this limited amount of flexibility illegal." Hearing on the Continuing Need for Section 5 Pre–Clearance before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 109th Congress, 2d Sess., pp. 11–12 (2006). Pildes also observed that the proposed standard of "no 'diminished ability to elect' ... has a rigidity and a mechanical quality that can lock into place minority districts in the south at populations that do not serve minority voters' interests." Id., at 12. Although this testimony says nothing about how § 5 ought to be interpreted, it tells us that the Alabama Democratic Conference's own attorney believes that the State was subject to a "rigi[d]" and "mechanical" standard in determining the number of black voters that must be maintained in a majority-black district.

All of this history explains Alabama's circumstances when it attempted to redistrict after the 2010 Census. The legislature began with the max-black district maps that it inherited from the days of Reed–Buskey. Using these inherited maps, combined with population data from the 2010 Census, many of the State's majority-black House and Senate districts were between 60% and 70% black, and some were over 70%. App. to Juris. Statement 103–108. And the State was prohibited from drawing new districts that would "have the effect of diminishing the ability" of blacks "to elect their preferred candidates of choice." § 10304(b). The legislature *1288 thus adopted a policy of maintaining the same number of majority-black districts and roughly the same percentage of blacks within each of those districts. See ante, at 1270 – 1271.

305 The majority faults the State for taking this approach. I do not pretend that Alabama is blameless when it comes to its sordid history of racial politics. But, today the State is not the one that is culpable. Its redistricting effort was indeed tainted, but it was tainted by our voting rights jurisprudence and the uses to which the Voting Rights Act has been put. Long ago, the DOJ and special-interest groups like the ACLU hijacked the Act, and they have been using it ever since to achieve their vision of maximized black electoral strength, often at the expense of the voters they purport to help. States covered by § 5 have been whipsawed, first required to create " safe" majority-black districts, then told not to "diminis[h]" the ability to elect, and now told they have been too rigid in preventing any "diminishing" of the ability to elect. Ante, at 1271 – 1272.

Worse, the majority's solution to the appellants' gerrymandering claims requires States to analyze race even more exhaustively, not less, by accounting for black voter registration and turnout statistics. Ante, at 1271 – 1272. The majority's command to analyze black voting patterns en route to adopting the "correct" racial quota does nothing to ease the conflict between our color-blind Constitution and the "consciously segregated districting system" the Court has required in the name of equality. Holder, 512 U.S., at 907, 114 S.Ct. 2581. Although I dissent today on procedural grounds, I also continue to disagree with the Court's misguided and damaging jurisprudence.

Appendix A

V

Majority-minority District	Instances in Plaintiffs' Post-Trial Briefs Arguing that Traditional Race-Neutral Districting Principles Were Subordinated to Race
HOUSE
HD 52, 54–60	Caucus Post-Trial Brief 30; Conference Post-Trial Brief 56–57, 60, 82–83, 121–122
HD 53	Caucus Post-Trial Brief 33–35; Conference Post-Trial Brief 59–61
HD 68	Conference Post-Trial Brief 70, 84–85
HD 69	Conference Post-Trial Brief 66–67, 85
HD 70	Conference Post-Trial Brief 85
HD 71	Conference Post-Trial Brief 83–85
HD 72	Caucus Post-Trial Brief 40; Conference Post-Trial Brief 83–85
HD 76–78	Conference Post-Trial Brief 65–66
SENATE*
SD 18–20	Conference Post-Trial Brief 56–59
SD 23–24	Caucus Post-Trial Brief 9–10, 40; Conference Post-Trial Brief 69–74
SD 33	Caucus Post-Trial Brief 13–14

* Senate District 26 excluded from this list

1289 Appendix B

State's Use of Incorrect Retrogression Standard

The following citations reflect instances in either the District Court opinion or in the record showing that the State believed that § 5 forbids, not just substantial reductions, but any reduction in the percentage of black inhabitants of a majority-minority district.

District Court Findings	989 F. Supp. 2d, at 1307; id., at 1273; id., at 1247
Evidence in the Record	Senator Gerald Dial	1 Tr. 28–29, 36–37, 55, 81, 96, 136, 138
		Dial Deposition 17, 39–41, 81, 100
	Representative Jim McClendon	3 Tr. 222
	Randolph Hinaman	3 Tr. 118–119, 145–146, 149–150, 164, 182–183, 187
		Hinaman Deposition 23–24, 101; but see id., at 24–25, 101

1290 Appendix C

All Citations

575 U.S. 254, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 191 L.Ed.2d 314, 83 USLW 4210, 15 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 2930, 2015 Daily Journal D.A.R. 3374, 25 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 167

Footnotes

1 Together with No. 13–1138, Alabama Democratic Conference et al. v. Alabama et al., also on appeal from the same court.

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 As I have previously explained, § 5 of the Voting Rights Act is unconstitutional. See Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. ——, ——, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 2631, 186 L.Ed.2d 651 (2013) (THOMAS, J., concurring). And § 5 no longer applies to Alabama after the Court's decision in Shelby County. See id., at 2631 (majority opinion). Because the appellants' claims are not properly before us, however, I express no opinion on whether compliance with § 5 was a compelling governmental purpose at the time of Alabama's 2012 redistricting, nor do I suggest that Alabama would necessarily prevail if appellants had properly raised district-specific claims.

2 The District Court found it "unclear whether DOJ's maximization policy was driven more by [the ACLU's] advocacy or DOJ's own misguided reading of the Voting Rights Act," and it concluded that the "considerable influence of ACLU advocacy on the voting rights decisions of the United States Attorney General is an embarrassment." Johnson v. Miller, 864 F.Supp. 1354, 1368 (S.D.Ga.1994).

3 In this litigation, Dr. Reed and the Alabama Democratic Conference argue that the percentage of black residents needed to maintain the ability to elect a black-preferred candidate is lower than it was in the 2000's because black participation has increased over the last decade. Brief for Appellants in No. 13–1138, pp. 39–40. Although appellants disclaim any argument that the State must achieve an optimal percentage of black voters in majority-black districts, id., at 35, it is clear that that is what they seek: a plan that maximizes voting strength by maintaining "safe" majority-minority districts while also spreading black voters into other districts where they can influence elections. Id., at 17–18.

144 S.Ct. 1221
Supreme Court of the United States.

Thomas C. ALEXANDER, in his official Capacity as President of the South Carolina Senate, et al., Appellants
v.
The SOUTH CAROLINA STATE CONFERENCE OF THE NAACP, et al.

No. 22-807
|
Argued October 11, 2023
|
Decided May 23, 2024

Synopsis

Background: Voter and civil rights organization brought action against state officials, challenging on equal protection grounds the validity of South Carolina's congressional redistricting plan. A three-judge panel of the United States District Court for the District of South Carolina, 649 F.Supp.3d 177, granted judgment and permanent injunctive relief to plaintiffs as to one congressional district and granted judgment to defendants as to two congressional districts. Defendants filed direct appeal, and the Supreme Court noted its probable jurisdiction. The three-judge District Court, 2024 WL 1327340, granted in part and denied in part defendants' motion to stay the injunction.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Justice Alito, held that:

[1] finding of racial predominance, based on direct evidence that state legislature drew the challenged congressional district with racial target, was clearly erroneous;

[2] finding of racial predominance, based on circumstantial evidence that mapmaker and others viewed racial data, was clearly erroneous;

[3] finding of racial predominance, based on expert reports, was clearly erroneous; and

[4] finding of racial predominance, without adverse inference against plaintiffs based on their failure to provide an alternative map, was clearly erroneous.

Reversed in part and remanded in part.

Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Gorsuch, Kavanaugh, and Barrett joined, and Justice Thomas joined in part.

Justice Thomas filed an opinion concurring in part.

Justice Kagan filed a dissenting opinion, in which Justices Sotomayor and Jackson joined.

West Headnotes (45)

[1] Constitutional Law Justiciability
Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering
United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Claims that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander are not justiciable in federal court, and so as far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, a legislature may pursue partisan ends when it engages in redistricting, while in contrast, if a legislature gives race a predominant role in redistricting decisions, the resulting map is subject to strict scrutiny for an equal protection violation and may be held unconstitutional as a racial gerrymander. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[2] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A party challenging a state legislature's map for congressional districts, as being a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, must disentangle race and politics if it wishes to prove that the legislature was motivated by race as opposed to partisanship, because as far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, a legislature may pursue partisan ends when it engages in congressional redistricting. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[3] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Power and duty to apportion

Congressional redistricting constitutes a traditional domain of state legislative authority, but the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause introduces one constraint by prohibiting a State from engaging in a racial gerrymander unless it can satisfy strict scrutiny, so federal courts, given the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus, must exercise extraordinary caution in adjudicating claims that a State has drawn district lines on the basis of race, and such caution is necessary because federal-court review of redistricting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

When a challenger asserts that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, the challenger, to untangle impermissible race considerations from permissible considerations, must to show that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[5] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

When a challenger asserts that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, the challenger, to untangle impermissible race considerations from permissible considerations by showing that race was the predominant factor, must prove that the State subordinated race-neutral districting criteria such as compactness, contiguity, and core preservation, to racial considerations, and that is because it may otherwise be difficult for challengers to find other evidence sufficient to show that race was the overriding factor causing neutral considerations to be cast aside. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[6] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Racial considerations predominate, so that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is subject to strict scrutiny for racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, when race was the criterion that, in the State's view, could not be compromised in the drawing of district lines. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[7] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A challenger can establish the predominance of racial considerations, so that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is subject to strict scrutiny for racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, by showing that the legislature used race as a proxy for political interests. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[8] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

A showing of the predominance of racial considerations, so that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is subject to strict scrutiny for racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, can be made through some combination of direct and circumstantial evidence. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[9] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Direct evidence of the predominance of racial considerations, so that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is subject to strict scrutiny for racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, may come in the form of a relevant state actor's express acknowledgment that race played a role in the drawing of district lines, and such concessions are not uncommon because States often admit to considering race for the purpose of satisfying Supreme Court precedent interpreting the VRA. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1; Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301 et seq.

[10] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Even in the absence of direct evidence of predominance of racial considerations for a state legislature's map for congressional districts, which is challenged as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, it is possible that in rare instances racial predominance can be shown through circumstantial evidence that a district's shape is so bizarre on its face that it discloses a racial design absent any alternative explanation. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[11] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Showing the predominance of race, so that a state legislature's map for congressional districts is subject to strict scrutiny for racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, solely on basis of circumstantial evidence is especially difficult when the State raises a partisan-gerrymandering defense, and that is because partisan gerrymanders and racial gerrymanders are capable of yielding similar oddities in a district's boundaries when there is a high correlation between race and partisan preference. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A state legislature may engage in political gerrymandering for its map for congressional districting, without violating equal protection as a racial gerrymander, even if it so happens that the most loyal voters for a political party happen to be Black and even if the State is conscious of that fact. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[13] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

A State's partisan-gerrymandering defense, when the state legislature's map for congressional districts is challenged as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, raises special problems for challengers who rely on circumstantial evidence of the predominance of race, and to prevail, the challengers must disentangle race from politics by proving that the former drove a district's lines, and that means, among other things, ruling out the competing explanation that political considerations dominated the legislature's redistricting efforts, because if either politics or race could explain a district's contours, the plaintiff has not cleared its bar. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Without an alternative map showing that a rational legislature sincerely driven by its professed partisan goals would have drawn a different map with greater racial balance, it is difficult for plaintiffs who challenge, based on circumstantial evidence, a state legislature's map for congressional districts as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection to defeat the starting presumption by federal courts that the legislature acted in good faith. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[15] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Presumption of legislative good faith, when a state legislature's map for congressional districts is challenged as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, directs federal district courts to draw the inference that cuts in the legislature's favor when confronted with evidence that could plausibly support multiple conclusions, and this approach ensures that when racial gerrymandering is found, race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was the legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its district lines. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith when a state legislature's map for congressional districts is challenged as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection reflects the Federal Judiciary's due respect for the judgment of state legislators, who are bound by an oath to follow the Constitution. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[17] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith when a state legislature's map for congressional districts is challenged as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection is justified because when a federal court finds that race drove a legislature's districting decisions, it is declaring that the legislature engaged in offensive and demeaning conduct that bears an uncomfortable resemblance to political apartheid, and federal courts should not be quick to hurl such accusations at the political branches. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[18] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith when a state legislature's map for congressional districts is challenged as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection reflects that federal courts must be wary of plaintiffs who seek to transform federal courts into weapons of political warfare that will deliver victories that eluded them in the political arena. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[19] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

If a plaintiff, who challenges a state legislature's map for congressional districts as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, can demonstrate that race drove the mapping of district lines, then the burden shifts to the State to prove that the map can overcome the daunting requirements of strict scrutiny. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[20] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Under strict scrutiny for an equal protection violation, when a state legislature's map for congressional districts is challenged as a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, courts begin by asking whether the State's decision to sort voters on the basis of race furthers a compelling governmental interest, and they then determine whether the State's use of race is narrowly tailored—i.e., necessary—to achieve that interest. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[21] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

The strict scrutiny standard for an equal protection violation, when a state legislature's map for congressional districts is challenged as a racial gerrymander, is extraordinarily onerous because the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to eradicate race-based state action. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[22] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Challengers to state legislature's map for congressional districts, who alleged that the plan constituted racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, bore the burden of showing that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles to racial considerations. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[23] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

Supreme Court would review for clear error three-judge District Court's factual findings, on State's direct appeal from District Court's judgment that a congressional district drawn by state legislature constituted a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, and under clear-error standard of review, Supreme Court could not set aside those findings unless, after examining the entire record, it was left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake had been committed. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[24] Federal Courts Scope and Extent of Review

If a trial court bases its findings upon a mistaken impression of applicable legal principles, the reviewing court is not bound by the clearly erroneous standard of review for factual findings.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[25] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

Supreme Court would exercise special care in reviewing the relevant findings of fact by three-judge District Court, on State's direct appeal from District Court's judgment that a congressional district drawn by state legislature constituted a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection; there was special danger that a misunderstanding of what the law required might infect what was labeled a finding of fact because standard of proof that District Court was required to apply, i.e., racial-predominance test, had very substantial legal component that took account of Supreme Court's prior relevant decisions, and application of test called for particular care because State contended that driving force in its critical districting decisions (namely, partisanship) was factor closely correlated with race. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[26] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

For successful challenge to a State's congressional redistricting plan as being a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, it is not enough for a challenger to show that race was a mere factor in the State's redistricting calculus; rather, the challenger must show that race played a predominant role in shaping a district's lines. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[27] Stipulations Matters which may be subject of stipulation

Parties can stipulate to issues of fact, but they cannot by stipulation amend the law.

[28] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Predominance of race in shaping challenged congressional district's lines, rather than a showing that race was a mere factor, was the applicable constitutional standard, on claim of state legislature's racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, though State denied relying at all on racial data; State could stipulate to issues of fact but it could not stipulate to amending the law, and it would be uniquely perverse to deprive State of a more generous constitutional standard simply because it made the laudable effort to disregard race altogether in redistricting process. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[29] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance, based on direct evidence that state legislature drew the challenged congressional district with a racial target, namely, the maintenance of a 17% Black voting age population (BVAP), was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; no direct evidence supported the finding, and direct evidence in the record was contrary, i.e., non-partisan career legislative employee who drew enacted map testified that he used only political data, and his colleagues likewise steadfastly denied using race in drawing enacted map. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[30] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance, based on circumstantial evidence that, despite all of the changes during drawing of redistricting map's lines for challenged congressional district, Black voting age population (BVAP) stayed around 17%, was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of state legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; State considered variety of maps, including those submitted by challengers, maps with Democratic-leaning district had BVAP percentages that generally ranged between 21% to 24%, District Court itself concluded that 17% BVAP produced a Republican tilt, 20% BVAP produced toss-up district, and 21% to 24% BVAP produced Democratic tilt, and no map in record would have satisfied legislature's political aim of creating stronger Republican political tilt in district while having BVAP above 17%. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[31] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance, based on circumstantial evidence that state legislature's congressional redistricting plan moved more voters out of challenged district than necessary to comply with one-person, one-vote rule, and that a few counties were split even though avoiding such splits was traditional redistricting objective, was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; these facts were easily explained by legislature's avowed partisan objective of creating stronger Republican political tilt in district. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[32] Constitutional Law Equal protection
Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering
United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance, based on circumstantial evidence that state legislature's congressional redistricting plan moved many predominantly Black precincts in a county to a district with strong Democratic tilt, was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; race and partisan preferences were tightly correlated, so the evidence did little to show that race, not politics, drove the legislature's choice. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[33] Constitutional Law Equal protection
Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering
United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance, based on circumstantial evidence that several state legislative staffers, including non-partisan career legislative employee who drew legislature's congressional redistricting map, viewed racial data at some point during redistricting process, was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; legislature would be expected to almost always be aware of racial demographics, and employee testified without contradiction that he considered relevant racial data only after he had drawn map and that he generated the data solely for lawful purpose of checking that maps he produced complied Supreme Court's VRA precedent. U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1; Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301 et seq.

[34] Constitutional Law Equal protection
Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering
United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance for challenged congressional district in state legislature's redistricting map, based on expert reports, was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of state legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; reports ignored certain traditional districting criteria such as geographical constraints and the legislature's partisan interests, and reports did not replicate the myriad considerations that legislature had to balance as part of its redistricting efforts. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[35] Constitutional Law Equal protection
Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering
United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance for challenged congressional district in state legislature's redistricting map, based on report from expert who developed a computer algorithm that generated 20,000 maps of State's congressional districts that complied with one-person, one-vote rule, was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; expert made no effort to disentangle race from politics, and expert failed to consider core district retention, i.e., proportion of district that remained when State transitioned from one districting plan to another. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[36] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance for challenged congressional district in state legislature's redistricting map, based on report from expert who used models employing county envelope approach, was clearly erroneous and therefore did not overcome federal courts' presumption of legislative good faith, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; expert failed to account for two key mapmaking factors, i.e., contiguity and compactness, and expert measured precincts' partisan tilt by looking at total votes rather than net votes cast for Democratic candidate in most recent presidential election, which method failed to account for fact that voter turnout could vary significantly from precinct to precinct. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[37] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A state-wide analysis cannot show that an electoral district, which is challenged as racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, was drawn based on race. U.S. Const. Amend. 14.

[38] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

Clear-error review, on direct appeal to Supreme Court from a three-judge District Court's finding that state legislature's congressional districting is racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, does not cause the challenger's demanding burden of proving racial predominance to vanish on appeal because a challenger's hardest job allegedly should be done once the challenger has prevailed before a three-judge District Court. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[39] Federal Courts Scope and Extent of Review

In determining whether a finding of fact is clearly erroneous, an appellate court must ask whether the factfinder in the first instance made a mistake in concluding that a fact had been proven under the applicable standard of proof.

[40] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Evidence Withheld or Falsified Evidence

United States Judicial review and enforcement

Finding of racial predominance, without drawing adverse inference against challengers to congressional district in state legislature's redistricting plan based on challengers' failure to provide alternative map that showed how legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives for district while producing significantly greater racial balance, was clearly erroneous, in action alleging racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection; race and partisanship were closely intertwined, and alternative map could have performed critical task of distinguishing between racial and political motivations. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[41] Evidence Withheld or Falsified Evidence

Failure of a challenger, who alleges that congressional redistricting is a racial gerrymander in violation of equal protection, to submit an alternative map, which can be designed with ease, should be interpreted as an implicit concession that the challenger cannot draw a map that undermines the legislature's defense that the districting lines were based on a permissible, rather than a prohibited, ground. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; U.S. Const. art. 1, § 4, cl. 1.

[42] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

Clear-error review is not a perfunctory task, though a District Court's findings of fact are generally correct; conscientious District Courts sometimes err, and appellants are entitled to meaningful appellate review.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[43] Evidence Withheld or Falsified Evidence

A factfinder may draw an adverse inference when a party fails to produce highly probative evidence that it could readily obtain if in fact such evidence exists.

[44] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A racial-gerrymandering claim, asserting an equal protection violation, asks whether race predominated in the drawing of an electoral district regardless of the motivations for the use of race, and racial classification itself is the relevant harm in that context. U.S. Const. Amend. 14.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[45] Election Law Vote Dilution

United States Judicial review and enforcement

A vote-dilution claim under the VRA is analytically distinct from a racial-gerrymandering claim alleging an equal protection violation, so a plaintiff pressing a vote-dilution claim cannot prevail simply by showing that race played a predominant role in the electoral districting process; rather, the plaintiff must show that the State enacted a particular voting scheme as a purposeful device to minimize or cancel out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities, i.e., the State's districting plan has the purpose and effect of diluting the minority vote. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

*1229 Syllabus[*]

1 The Constitution entrusts state legislatures with the primary responsibility for drawing congressional districts, and legislative redistricting is an inescapably political enterprise. Claims that a map is unconstitutional because it was drawn to achieve a partisan end are not justiciable in federal court. By contrast, if a legislature gives race a predominant role in redistricting decisions, the resulting map is subjected to strict scrutiny and may be held unconstitutional. These doctrinal lines collide when race and partisan preference are highly correlated. This Court has endorsed two related propositions when navigating this tension. First, a party challenging a map's constitutionality must disentangle race and politics to show that race was the legislature's "predominant" motivating factor. Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762. Second, the Court starts with a presumption that the legislature acted in good faith. To disentangle race from other permissible considerations, plaintiffs may employ some combination of direct and circumstantial evidence. Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 291, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837. Where race and politics are highly correlated, a map that has been gerrymandered to achieve a partisan end can look very similar to a racially gerrymandered map. Thus, in Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430, the Court held that the plaintiffs 2 failed to meet the high bar for a racial-gerrymandering claim when they failed to produce an alternative map showing that a rational legislature sincerely driven by its professed partisan goals would have drawn a different map with greater racial balance. Id., at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Without an alternative map, the Court also found it difficult for plaintiffs to defeat the starting presumption that the legislature acted in good faith.

Following the 2020 Census, South Carolina was tasked with redrawing its congressional district maps because of population shifts in two of its seven districts—Districts 1 and 6. The State Senate subcommittee responsible for drawing the new map issued a statement explaining that the process would be guided by traditional districting principles along with the goal of creating a stronger Republican tilt in District 1. To draw the new maps, the Senate turned to Will Roberts, a nonpartisan staffer with experience in drawing reapportionment plans. Roberts' plan (the Enacted Plan) achieved the legislature's political goal by increasing District 1's projected Republican vote share by 1.36% to 54.39%. The plan also raised the black voting-age population (BVAP) from 16.56% to 16.72%. The legislature adopted the plan, and the Governor signed it into law.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and District 1 voter Taiwan Scott (Challengers), challenged the plan, alleging that it resulted in racial gerrymanders in certain districts and in the dilution of the electoral power of the State's black voters. The three-judge District Court held that the State drew District 1 with a 17% BVAP target in mind in violation of the Equal Protection Clause and that this putative use of race to draw District 1 unlawfully diluted the black vote.

Held:

1. The District Court's finding that race predominated in the design of District I in the Enacted Plan was clearly erroneous. Pp. 1239 - 1252.

(a) Because the State's principal legal argument—that the District Court did not properly disentangle race from politics —is an attack on the factual basis of the District Court's findings, this case can be disposed on clear-error grounds. The District Court clearly erred because the Challengers did not satisfy the demanding burden of showing that the "legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations." Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. The Challengers provided no direct evidence of a racial gerrymander, and their circumstantial evidence is very weak. Instead the Challengers relied on deeply flawed expert reports. And the Challengers did not offer a single alternative map to show that the legislature's partisan goal could be achieved while raising the BVAP in District 1. Pp. 1239 - 1240.

3 (b) The District Court's factual findings in this case are reviewed for clear error. Because the racial predominance test has a very substantial legal component that must take account of the Court's prior relevant decisions, special care must be exercised in reviewing the relevant findings of fact. Pp. 1240 -1241.

(c) The District Court's heavy reliance on four pieces of evidence was seriously misguided in light of the appropriate legal standard and repeated instructions that a court in a case such as this must rule out the possibility that politics drove the districting process. None of the facts on which the District Court relied to infer a racial motive is sufficient to support an inference that can overcome the presumption of legislative good faith. First, the District Court concluded that the legislature deliberately sought to maintain a particular BVAP because the maps that produced the sought-after partisan goal all had roughly the same BVAP. But the mere fact that District 1's BVAP remained around 17%, despite all the changes made during the redistricting process, proves very little. The tight correlation between the legislature's partisan aim and District 1's BVAP is substantiated by the District Court's own findings. The Challengers could not point to a single map in the record that would satisfy the legislature's political aim with a BVAP above 17%. The District Court disregarded the presumption of legislative good faith by drawing an inference that the State acted in bad faith based on the racial consequences of a political gerrymander in a jurisdiction in which race and partisan preference are very closely related. Second, the District Court inferred a racial motive from the fact that the Enacted Plan moved more voters out of District 1 than were needed to comply with the one person, one vote rule, and that the Enacted Plan split a few counties. But the high priority that the legislature gave to its partisan aim can explain these decisions. Third, the District Court clearly erred when it concluded that the legislature's real aim was racial based on the movement of certain predominantly black Charleston precincts from District 1 to District 6. Again, the legislature's partisan goal can easily explain this decision. Fourth, the District Court placed excessive weight on the fact that several legislative staffers admitted to viewing racial data at some point during the redistricting process. The District Court cited no evidence that could not also support the inference that politics drove the mapmaking process and provided no explanation why a mapmaker who wanted to produce a version of District 1 that would be safely Republican would use data about voters' race rather than their political preferences. Pp. 1240 - 1244.

(d) The four expert reports relied upon by the Challengers are flawed because they ignored traditional districting criteria such as geographical constraints and the legislature's partisan interests. 4 Allen v. Milligan, 599 U.S. 1, 34, 143 S.Ct. 1487, 216 L.Ed.2d 60. The report of Dr. Kosuke Imai made no effort to disentangle race from politics. It also failed to consider "core district retention," a term referring to "the proportion of districts that remain when a State transitions from one districting plan to another." Id., at 21, 143 S.Ct. 1487. The report of Dr. Jordan Ragusa did attempt to disentangle race from politics, but its analysis has two serious defects. First, each of his three models failed to control for contiguity or compactness. Second, he used an inferior method of measuring a precinct's partisan leanings by counting absolute votes rather than a party's relative share of the vote. The report of Dr. Baodong Liu purported to show that race rather than politics explains District 1's design, but Dr. Liu's methodology was plainly flawed. Like Dr. Ragusa, Dr. Liu failed to account for contiguity and compactness. And while this defect alone is sufficient to preclude reliance, Dr. Liu also used inferior data to measure a district's partisan tilt —i.e., data from the 2018 off-cycle gubernatorial primaries. Finally, the report of Dr. Moon Duchin, like that of Dr. Imai, did not account for partisanship or core retention and was based on an assessment of the map as a whole rather than District 1 in particular. Thus, her report has no probative force with respect to the Challengers' racial-gerrymandering claim regarding District 1's boundaries. Pp. 1243 - 1249.

(e) The District Court also critically erred by failing to draw an adverse inference against the Challengers for not providing an adequate alternate map. By showing that a rational legislature, driven only by its professed mapmaking criteria, could have produced a different map with "greater racial balance," Cromartie, 532 U.S. at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452, an alternative map can perform the critical task of distinguishing between racial and political motivations when race and partisanship are closely entwined. Moreover, an alternative map is easy to produce. The District Court mistakenly held that an alternative map is relevant only for the purpose of showing that a remedy is plausible. A plaintiff's failure to submit an alternative map should be interpreted by courts as an implicit concession that the plaintiff cannot draw a map that undermines the legislature's defense. Pp. 1249 -1250.

2. Because the same findings of fact and reasoning that guided the court's racial-gerrymandering analysis also guided the analysis of the Challengers' independent vote-dilution claim, that conclusion also cannot stand. The District Court also erred in conflating the two claims. A plaintiff pressing a vote-dilution claim cannot prevail simply by showing that race played a predominant role in the districting process, but rather must show that the State "enacted a particular voting scheme as a purposeful device to minimize or cancel out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities." Miller, 515 U.S. at 911, 115 S.Ct. 2475. In other words, the plaintiff must show that the State's districting plan "has the purpose 5 and effect" of diluting the minority vote. Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511. In light of these two errors in the District Court's analysis, a remand is appropriate. Pp. 1251 - 1252.

Reversed in part and remanded in part.

ALITO, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which ROBERTS, C. J., and GORSUCH, KAVANAUGH, and BARRETT, JJ., joined, and in which THOMAS, J., joined as to all but Part III–C. THOMAS, J., filed an opinion concurring in part. KAGAN, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which SOTOMAYOR and JACKSON, JJ., joined.

Attorneys and Law Firms

John M. Gore, Washington, DC, for Appellants.

Leah C. Aden, New York, NY, for Appellees.

Caroline A. Flynn for the United States, as amicus curiae, supporting neither party.

William W. Wilkins, Andrew A. Mathias, Maynard Nexsen PC, Greenville, SC, Mark C. Moore, Hamilton B. Barber, Michael A. Parente, Maynard Nexsen PC, Columbia, SC, Counsel for House Appellants.

John M. Gore, Counsel of Record, Ryan M. Proctor, Jones Day, Washington, DC, Robert E. Tyson, Jr., Vordman Carlisle Traywick, III, Robinson Gray Stepp & Laffitte, LLC, Columbia, SC, Counsel for Senate Appellants.

M. Elizabeth Crum, Michael R. Burchstead, Burr & Forman LLP, Columbia, SC, Counsel for State Election Commission Appellants.

Janai S. Nelson, Director-Counsel, Samuel Spital, Leah C. Aden*, Counsel of Record, Raymond Audain, John S. Cusick, Naacp Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., New York, NY, Santino Coleman, Antonio L. Ingram II, I. Sara Rohani, NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., Washington, DC, Adriel I. Cepeda Derieux, Counsel of Record, Ming Cheung, Davin Rosborough, Kelsey A. Miller, Sophia Lin Lakin, American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, New York, NY, David D. Cole, Patricia Yan, American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, Washington, DC, John A. Freedman, Elisabeth S. Theodore, Stephen K. Wirth, Gina M. Colarusso, Arnold & Porter Kaye Scholer LLP, Washington, DC, Sarah Gryll, Arnold & Porter Kaye Scholer LLP, Chicago, IL, Christopher J. Bryant, Bryant Legal, LLC, Baltimore, MD, Cecillia D. Wang, American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, San Francisco, CA, Allen Chaney, American Civil Liberties Union Foundation of South Carolina, Columbia, SC, Jeffrey A. Fuisz, Paula Ramer, Andrew R. Hirschel, Arnold & Porter Kaye Scholer LLP, New York, NY, for Appellees the South Carolina State Conference of the NAACP, et al.

Justice ALITO delivered the opinion of the Court.

1233 *6 I

[1] The Constitution entrusts state legislatures with the primary responsibility for drawing congressional districts, and redistricting is an inescapably political enterprise. Legislators are almost always aware of the political ramifications of the maps they adopt, and claims that a map is unconstitutional because it was drawn to achieve a partisan end are not justiciable in federal court. Thus, as far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, a legislature may pursue partisan ends when it engages in redistricting. By contrast, if a legislature gives race a predominant role in redistricting decisions, the resulting map is subjected to strict scrutiny and may be held unconstitutional.

[2] These doctrinal lines collide when race and partisan preference are highly correlated. We have navigated this tension by endorsing two related propositions. First, a party challenging a map's constitutionality must disentangle race and politics if it wishes to prove that the legislature was motivated by race as opposed to partisanship. Second, in assessing a legislature's work, we start with a presumption that the legislature acted in good faith.

*7 In this case, which features a challenge to South Carolina's redistricting efforts in the wake of the 2020 census, the three-judge District Court paid only lip service to these propositions. That misguided approach infected the District Court's findings of fact, which were clearly erroneous under the appropriate legal standard. We therefore reverse the trial court in part and remand for further proceedings.

II

A

[3] [4] Redistricting constitutes a traditional domain of state legislative authority. See Moore v. Harper, 600 U.S. 1, 143 S.Ct. 2065, 216 L.Ed.2d 729 (2023); see also U. S. Const., Art. I, § 4, cl. 1. The Fourteenth Amendment introduces one constraint by prohibiting a State from engaging in a racial gerrymander unless it can satisfy strict scrutiny. But given "the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's 1234 redistricting calculus," we have repeatedly emphasized that federal courts must "exercise extraordinary caution in adjudicating claims that a State has drawn district lines on the basis of race." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915–916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995). Such caution is necessary because "[f]ederal-court review of districting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions." Id., at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. To untangle race from other permissible considerations, we require the plaintiff to show that race was the "predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Id., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

[5] [6] [7] To make that showing, a plaintiff must prove that the State "subordinated" race-neutral districting criteria such as compactness, contiguity, and core preservation to "racial considerations." Ibid. Racial considerations predominate when "[r]ace was the criterion that, in the State's view, could not be compromised" in the drawing of district lines.[1] *8 Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 907, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996). We have recognized that, "[a]s a practical matter," challengers will often need to show that the State's chosen map conflicts with traditional redistricting criteria. Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 190, 137 S.Ct. 788, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017). That is because it may otherwise "be difficult for challengers to find other evidence sufficient to show that race was the overriding factor causing neutral considerations to be cast aside." Ibid.

[8] [9] This showing can be made through some combination of direct and circumstantial evidence. See Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 291, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017). Direct evidence often comes in the form of a relevant state actor's express acknowledgment that race played a role in the drawing of district lines. Such concessions are not uncommon because States often admit to considering race for the purpose of satisfying our precedent interpreting the Voting Rights Act of 1965. See, e.g., Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 259–260, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015). Direct evidence can also be smoked out over the course of litigation. In Cooper, for instance, we offered the hypothetical example of a plaintiff finding "scores of leaked e-mails from state officials instructing their mapmaker to pack as many black voters as possible into a district." 581 U.S. at 318, 137 S.Ct. 1455. In such instances, if the State cannot satisfy strict scrutiny, direct evidence of this sort amounts to a confession of error.

[10] Proving racial predominance with circumstantial evidence alone is much more difficult. Although we have never invalidated an electoral map in a case in which the plaintiff failed to adduce any direct evidence, we have, at least in theory, kept the door open for those rare instances in which a district's shape is "so bizarre on its face that it discloses a racial design" absent any alternative explanation. 9 Miller, 515 U.S. at 914, 115 S.Ct. 2475; see also Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 643–645, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (Shaw I).

*1235 [11] [12] [13] A circumstantial-evidence-only case is especially difficult when the State raises a partisan-gerrymandering defense. That is because partisan and racial gerrymanders "are capable of yielding similar oddities in a district's boundaries" when there is a high correlation between race and partisan preference. Cooper, 581 U.S. at 308, 137 S.Ct. 1455. And that is the situation in this case, as the 2020 Presidential election illustrated. Exit polls found that at least 90% of black voters voted for the Democratic candidate in South Carolina and throughout the Nation.[2] When partisanship and race correlate, it naturally follows that a map that has been gerrymandered to achieve a partisan end can look very similar to a racially gerrymandered map. For that reason, "[o]ur prior decisions have made clear that a jurisdiction may engage in constitutional political gerrymandering, even if it so happens that the most loyal Democrats happen to be black Democrats and even if the State were conscious of that fact." Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541, 551, 119 S.Ct. 1545, 143 L.Ed.2d 731 (1999) (Cromartie I); see also Rucho v. Common Cause, 588 U.S. 684, 721, 139 S.Ct. 2484, 204 L.Ed.2d 931 (2019) (concluding that federal judges lack the license to evaluate partisan-gerrymandering claims). We have noted that a State's partisan-gerrymandering defense therefore raises "special challenges" for plaintiffs. Cooper, 581 U.S. at 308, 137 S.Ct. 1455. To prevail, a plaintiff must "disentangle race from politics" by proving "that the former drove a district's lines." Ibid. (emphasis added). That means, among other things, ruling out the competing explanation that political considerations dominated 10 the legislature's redistricting efforts. If either politics or race could explain a district's contours, the plaintiff has not cleared its bar.

Our decision in Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (Cromartie II), illustrates the difficulties that plaintiffs must overcome in this context. There, the plaintiffs' case hinged on circumstantial evidence of a racial gerrymander such as expert testimony and discrepancies between the relevant district lines and traditional districting criteria. Id., at 240–241, 121 S.Ct. 1452; see also Cooper, 581 U.S. at 321, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (describing the direct evidence in Cromartie II as "extremely weak"). After the State asserted a partisan-gerrymandering defense, we faulted the plaintiffs for failing to show "that the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles." Cromartie II, 532 U.S. at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452. In other words, the plaintiffs failed to meet the high bar for a racial-gerrymandering claim by failing to produce, among other things, an alternative map showing that a rational legislature sincerely driven by its professed partisan goals would have drawn a different map with greater racial balance. Since our decision in Cromartie II, any plaintiff with a strong case has had every incentive to produce such an alternative map.

[14] [15] Without an alternative map, it is difficult for plaintiffs to defeat our starting presumption that the legislature acted in good faith. This presumption of legislative good faith directs district courts to *1236 draw the inference that cuts in the legislature's favor when confronted with evidence that could plausibly support multiple conclusions. See, e.g., Abbott v. Perez, 585 U.S. 579, 610–612, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018). This approach ensures that "race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was the legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its district lines." Miller, 515 U.S. at 913, 115 S.Ct. 2475; see also Cromartie I, 526 U.S. at 546, 119 S.Ct. 1545 (noting that strict scrutiny is warranted when a map is "unexplainable on grounds other than race" (internal quotation marks omitted)).

11 [16] [17] [18] Three additional reasons justify this presumption. First, this presumption reflects the Federal Judiciary's due respect for the judgment of state legislators, who are similarly bound by an oath to follow the Constitution. Second, when a federal court finds that race drove a legislature's districting decisions, it is declaring that the legislature engaged in "offensive and demeaning" conduct, Miller, 515 U.S. at 912, 115 S.Ct. 2475, that "bears an uncomfortable resemblance to political apartheid," Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 647, 113 S.Ct. 2816. We should not be quick to hurl such accusations at the political branches. Third, we must be wary of plaintiffs who seek to transform federal courts into "weapons of political warfare" that will deliver victories that eluded them "in the political arena." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 335, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (ALITO, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). The presumption of good faith furthers each of these constitutional interests. It also explains why we have held that the plaintiff 's evidentiary burden in these cases is especially stringent. See Cromartie II, 532 U.S. at 241, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

[19] [20] [21] If a plaintiff can demonstrate that race drove the mapping of district lines, then the burden shifts to the State to prove that the map can overcome the daunting requirements of strict scrutiny. Under this standard, we begin by asking whether the State's decision to sort voters on the basis of race furthers a compelling governmental interest. Cooper, 581 U.S. at 292, 137 S.Ct. 1455. We then determine whether the State's use of race is "narrowly tailored"—i.e., "necessary"—to achieve that interest. This standard is extraordinarily onerous because the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to eradicate race-based state action. Students for Fair Admissions, Inc. v. President and Fellows of Harvard College, 600 U.S. 181, 206, 143 S.Ct. 2141, 216 L.Ed.2d 857 (2023).

B

South Carolina has seven congressional districts, and this case concerns two of them, Districts 1 and 6. District 1 covers the State's southeast region, while District 6 covers its southwest and central regions. South Carolina's prior map, 12 which was enacted in 2011, split several counties between Districts 1 and 6, including Beaufort, Berkeley, Charleston, Colleton, and Dorchester Counties. See Figure 1, infra, at 1238 - 1239. The Department of Justice precleared the 2011 map, and a three-judge District Court upheld it against racial-gerrymandering and intentional vote-dilution claims after finding that the legislature "demonstrate[d] that [it] adhered to traditional race-neutral principles." Backus v. South Carolina, 857 F.Supp.2d 553, 560 (DSC), summarily aff'd, 568 U.S. 801, 133 S.Ct. 156, 184 L.Ed.2d 1 (2012). The relevant part of that map is shown in Figure 1, infra, at 1238 - 1239.

Over the next decade, the 2011 map consistently yielded a 6-to-1 Republican-Democratic delegation—with one exception. In 2018, the Democratic candidate, with 50.7% of the votes, narrowly won *1237 District 1, which had previously elected Republican candidates.[3] But in 2020, when the Republican Presidential candidate handily won the State, the Republican congressional candidate retook District 1 by a slender margin, winning 50.6% of the votes.[4]

South Carolina had to redraw its map after the 2020 census because two of the State's seven districts saw major population shifts. District 1 was overpopulated by 87,689 residents while District 6 was underpopulated by 84,741 residents. South Carolina therefore had to add voters to District 6 while subtracting voters from District 1 in order to comply with the principle of one person, one vote. The remaining districts also had to be modified in order to bring the whole map into compliance with that requirement.

In September 2021, the Senate subcommittee tasked with drawing the new map issued guidance explaining that traditional 13 districting principles, such as respect for contiguity and incumbent protection, would guide the mapmaking process along with the strict equal-population requirement. At the same time, the Republican-controlled legislature also made it clear that it would aim to create a stronger Republican tilt in District 1. Senate Majority Leader Shane Massey, for instance, testified at trial that partisanship was "one of the most important factors" in the process and that the Republican Party was "not going to pass a plan that sacrificed [District 1]." J. S. A. 265a. As he put it, the legislature's adoption of any map that improved the Democrats' chance of reclaiming District 1 would constitute "political malpractice." Id., at 276a. Contemporaneous evidence confirms that leaders in the legislature sought to "create a stronger Republican tilt" in District 1 while "honoring" other race-neutral, traditional districting criteria. 649 F.Supp.3d 177, 187 (DSC 2023); J. S. A. 333a–334a.

To draw its maps, the Senate turned to Will Roberts, a nonpartisan staffer with 20 years of experience in state government. Roberts had "worked with the three-judge panel in Backus" and had routinely prepared "reapportionment plans for counties, cities[,] and school boards across the state." 649 F.Supp.3d at 188. During the trial of this case, one of the judges praised Roberts' expertise and honesty on the record.[5] Under the Senate's open-door policy, Roberts drew maps upon request for Republican and Democratic Senators alike. In making these maps, Roberts relied on political data from the 2020 Presidential election along with traditional districting criteria and input from various lawmakers, including Representative Jim Clyburn, whose 14 recommendations would have preserved the strong Democratic tilt in his district (District 6) and included a version of District 1 with a black voting-age population (BVAP) of 15.48%. J. S. A. 127a.

The eventual map (Enacted Plan), see Figure 2, infra, at 1239 - 1240, differed from the 2011 map in three important respects that reflected the legislature's *1238 priorities. First, the Enacted Plan unified Beaufort and Berkeley Counties within District 1. This move enhanced the Republican advantage in District 1 because the moved-in portions of those counties leaned Republican. Second, to further increase the Republican lead in District 1, Roberts also put more of Dorchester County in District 1. These changes exacerbated the population imbalance between District 1 and District 6. Third, to cure this problem, Roberts moved a series of precincts in Charleston from District 1 to District 6. In keeping with the legislature's partisan objectives, the precincts moved out of District 1 had a 58.8% Democratic vote share.

By design, the legislature divided Charleston between Districts 1 and 6. This split was seen as in Charleston's best interests because it meant that the county would have two Representatives in the House—one Democrat, Representative Clyburn, who has represented District 6 since 1993 and has held important House leadership positions, and one Republican representing District 1. Republican Senator Chip Campsen, who spearheaded the mapmaking process, testified that Charleston benefits from bipartisan congressional representation on "bread-and-butter things" like port maintenance and "influence with the incumbent administration." Id., at 338a. As he explained, "I am tickled to death that Jim Clyburn represents Charleston County," id., at 371a, because "Clyburn has more influence with the Biden Administration perhaps than anyone in the nation," id., at 338a. To achieve all these objectives, Roberts 15 moved roughly 193,000 residents between the districts with a net migration of 87,690 people into District 6. Id., at 439a, 443a.

The Enacted Map achieved the legislature's political goal by increasing District 1's projected Republican vote share by 1.36% to 54.39%. The version of District 1 in the Enacted Plan also had a slightly higher BVAP, rising from 16.56% to 16.72%. The legislature voted to adopt the Enacted Plan, and the Governor signed it into law in January 2022.

While the Enacted Map was still in the making, the plaintiff-appellees in this case—the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and Taiwan Scott, a voter in District 1 (collectively, the Challengers)—sued to contest the 2011 map on the ground that, in light of the 2020 census, it violated the one person, one vote requirement. After South Carolina passed the Enacted Plan, the Challengers amended their complaint to attack that map instead. The Challengers alleged that Districts 1, 2, and 5 were racially gerrymandered and that these districts diluted the electoral power of the State's black voters. A three-judge District Court rejected these claims with respect to Districts 2 and 5. But the court held that South Carolina drew District 1 with a 17% BVAP "target" in mind and that this violated the Equal Protection Clause. For similar reasons, the court also found that the State's putative use of race to draw District 1 unlawfully diluted the black vote. The court permanently enjoined South Carolina from conducting elections in District 1 until it approved a new map. The State appealed to this Court, and we noted probable jurisdiction. 598 U. S. ——, 143 S.Ct. 2456, 216 L.Ed.2d 430 (2023).

*1239

16

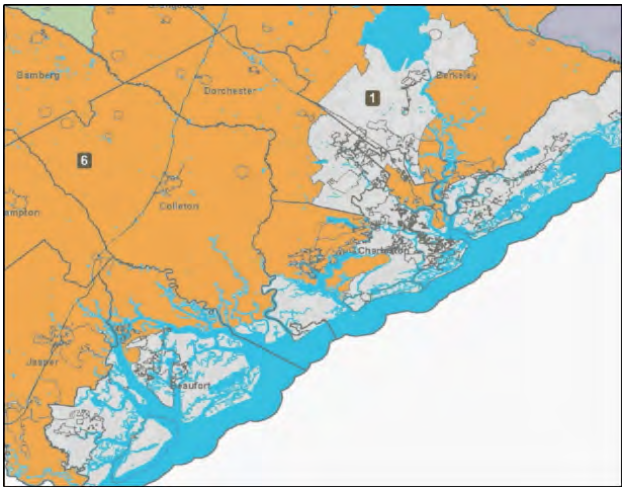

Figure 1. 2011 Map—Districts 1 and 6 (Exh. 1 to State's Motion for Summary Judgment in South Carolina State Conference of the NAACP v. McMaster, No. 3:21–cv–3302 (D SC, Aug. 19, 2022), ECF Doc. 323–1, p. 2)

17

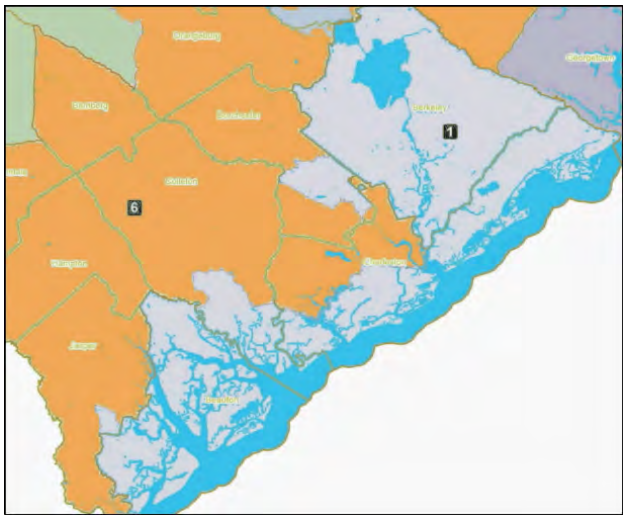

Figure 2. Enacted Plan—Districts 1 and 6 (South Carolina House of Representatives, S. 865 Passed—As Signed by the *1240 Governor, https://redistricting.schouse.gov/docs/plans/cpg/conpassed%20map.pdf)

III

The State contends that the District Court committed both legal error and clear factual error in concluding that race played a predominant role in the legislature's design of District 1. The State's principal legal argument is that the District Court did not properly disentangle race from politics. Because this argument, at bottom, attacks the factual basis of the District Court's findings, we dispose of this case on clear-error grounds.

[22] Under our case law, the Challengers bore the burden of showing that the "legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations." Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. In this case, the District Court clearly erred because the Challengers did not meet this "demanding" 18 standard. Id., at 928, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring). They provided no direct evidence of a racial gerrymander, and their circumstantial evidence is very weak. Instead, the Challengers relied on deeply flawed expert reports. And while these experts produced tens of thousands of maps with differently configured districts, they did not offer a single map that achieved the legislature's partisan goal while including a higher BVAP in District 1. Faced with this record, we must reverse the District Court on the racial-gerrymandering claim.

We divide our analysis into four parts. First, we set out the appropriate legal standard for reviewing a district court's factual findings in racial-gerrymandering cases. Second, we explain why the District Court's factual findings are clearly flawed with respect to the Challengers' circumstantial evidence. Third, we examine the four expert reports that the Challengers presented below. And finally, we explain that the District Court erred by not drawing an adverse inference from the Challengers' failure to submit an alternative map that would have allowed the State to achieve its districting goals while maintaining a higher BVAP in District 1.

A

[23] We review the District Court's factual findings for clear error. That means we may not set those findings aside unless, after examining the entire record, we are "left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 309, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (internal quotation marks omitted). This is a demanding test, but it is not a rubber stamp.

[24] [25] [26] [27] [28] Moreover, in a case like this, there is a special danger that a misunderstanding of what the law requires may infect what is labeled a finding of fact. "[I]f [a] trial court bases its findings upon a mistaken impression of applicable legal principles, the reviewing court is not bound by the clearly erroneous standard." 19 Inwood Laboratories, Inc. v. Ives Laboratories, Inc., 456 U.S. 844, 855, n. 15, 102 S.Ct. 2182, 72 L.Ed.2d 606 (1982); see also Abbott, 585 U.S. at 607, 138 S.Ct. 2305. Here, the standard of proof that the three-judge court was required to apply, i.e., the racial-predominance test, has a very substantial legal component that must take account of our prior relevant decisions.[6] *1241 And the application of this test calls for particular care when the defense contends that the driving force in its critical districting decisions (namely, partisanship) was a factor that is closely correlated with race. Thus, in a case like this, we must exercise special care in reviewing the relevant findings of fact.

B

[29] The District Court found that South Carolina drew District 1 with a racial "target," namely, the maintenance of a 17% BVAP, and it concluded that this deliberate use of race rendered District 1's lines unlawful. See Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 183–185, 137 S.Ct. 788. But the Challengers did not offer any direct evidence to support that conclusion, and indeed, the direct evidence that is in the record is to the contrary. Roberts, the non-partisan career employee who drew the Enacted Map, testified that he used only political data, and his colleagues likewise steadfastly denied using race in drawing the Enacted Map. None of the facts on which the District Court relied to infer a racial motive is sufficient to support 20 an inference that can overcome the presumption of legislative good faith.

[30] First, the District Court inferred a racial motive from the fact that District 1's BVAP stayed around 17% "[d]espite all of th[e] changes" that South Carolina made during the redistricting process. 649 F.Supp.3d at 191. But where race and partisan preferences are very closely tied, as they are here, the mere fact that District 1's BVAP stayed more or less constant proves very little. If 100% of black voters voted for Democratic candidates, it is obvious that any map with the partisan breakdown that the legislature sought in District 1—something in the range of 54% Republican to 46% Democratic—would inevitably involve the removal of a disproportionate number of black voters. And since roughly 90% of black voters cast their ballots for Democratic candidates, the same phenomenon is very likely.

The District Court's own findings substantiate the tight correlation between the legislature's partisan aim and District 1's BVAP. During the redistricting process, the State considered a variety of maps, including those submitted by the Challengers. Maps with a Democratic-leaning District 1 had BVAP percentages that generally ranged between 21% to 24%. See App. 83; J. S. A. Supp. 142a. The District Court itself concluded that a 17% BVAP "produced a Republican tilt," a 20% BVAP "produced a 'toss up district,' " and a 21% to 24% BVAP "produced a Democratic tilt." 649 F.Supp.3d at 188. And the Challengers cannot point to even one map in the record that would have satisfied the legislature's political aim and had a BVAP above 17%. Thus, there is strong evidence that the district's BVAP of 17% was simply a side effect of the legislature's partisan goal. And certainly nothing rules out that possibility. In light of the presumption of legislative good faith, that possibility is dispositive.

The District Court's reasoning, however, is flatly inconsistent with that presumption. And what the court did—inferring 21 bad faith based on the racial effects of a *1242 political gerrymander in a jurisdiction in which race and partisan preference are very closely correlated—would, if accepted, provide a convenient way for future litigants and lower courts to sidestep our holding in Rucho that partisan-gerrymandering claims are not justiciable in federal court. Under the District Court's reasoning, a litigant could repackage a partisan-gerrymandering claim as a racial-gerrymandering claim by exploiting the tight link between race and political preference. Instead of claiming that a State impermissibly set a target Republican-Democratic breakdown, a plaintiff could simply reverse-engineer the partisan data into racial data and argue that the State impermissibly set a particular BVAP target. Our decisions cannot be evaded with such ease. For that reason, the District Court clearly erred in finding that the legislature deliberately sought to maintain a particular BVAP just because the maps that produced the sought-after partisan goal all had roughly the same BVAP.

[31] Second, the District Court inferred a racial motive from certain changes that the State made in redrawing District 1, namely, the Enacted Plan moved more voters out of District 1 (approximately 140,000) than were needed to comply with the one person, one vote rule (about 88,000), and the Enacted Plan split Charleston and a few other counties even though the avoidance of such splits is a traditional redistricting objective. But here, again, the State's avowed partisan objective easily explains these facts. The State claims it sought to ensure that District 1 had a reliable Republican majority, and simply removing 88,000 voters without regard to their party preferences would not have satisfied that objective. Similarly, the high priority that the legislature gave to its partisan goal provides an entirely reasonable explanation for the subordination of other objectives such as the avoidance of county splits. See Cooper, 581 U.S. at 308, 137 S.Ct. 1455 ("[P]olitical and racial [gerrymanders] 22 are capable of yielding similar oddities in a district's boundaries").

[32] Third, the District Court found it telling that many predominantly black Charleston precincts were moved out of District 1 and into District 6. But because of the tight correlation between race and partisan preferences, this fact does little to show that race, not politics, drove the legislature's choice. The Charleston County precincts that were removed are 58.8% Democratic. Thus, the legislature's stated partisan goal can easily explain this decision, and the District Court therefore erred in crediting the less charitable conclusion that the legislature's real aim was racial.

[33] Fourth, the District Court placed too much weight on the fact that several legislative staffers, including Roberts, viewed racial data at some point during the redistricting process. This acknowledgment means little on its own because we expect that "[r]edistricting legislatures will ... almost always be aware of racial demographics." Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Here, Roberts testified without contradiction that he considered the relevant racial data only after he had drawn the Enacted Map and that he generated that data solely for a lawful purpose, namely, to check that the maps he produced complied with our Voting Rights Act precedent. J. S. A. 92a, 205a, 379a.

The District Court discredited this testimony, but it cited no evidence that could not also support the inference that politics drove the mapmaking process. And the court provided no explanation why a mapmaker who wanted to produce a version of District 1 that would be safely Republican would use data about voters' race rather than their political preferences. Why would *1243 Roberts have used racial data—with the associated legal risks—as a proxy for partisan data when he had access to refined, sub-precinct-level political data that accounted for voter turnout and electoral 23 preferences? The District Court provided no answer to this obvious question.[7]

The Challengers look to plug this gap by arguing that Roberts must have used racial data because the political data he claimed to have used was blatantly unsatisfactory. For support, they cite the testimony of Dale Oldham, a political consultant who did not participate in drawing the Enacted Plan. Oldham testified that he believed the standard data South Carolina used for measuring partisanship is unreliable because it does not accurately reflect the partisan preferences of absentee voters. Oldham opined that a new type of composite data that first became available in 2020 does a better job in that regard. J. S. A. Supp. 417a–418a, 420a.

This criticism is entitled to little weight. One consultant's opinion about the quality of South Carolina's political data obviously does not settle the question whether the State's political data was inferior. And in any event, the relevant question is not whether the State used the best available data but whether it is reasonable to infer that the mapmakers' political data was so obviously flawed that they must have surreptitiously used racial data. Oldham's testimony falls far short of establishing that the State cannot plausibly have believed that its own political data was sufficient. Nothing in our case law requires the State to adopt novel methodologies in analyzing election data. Indeed, the State plausibly argues that its data was more than good enough for its purposes because it showed partisan preferences at 24 the sub-precinct level and also accounted for variations in voter turnout. Reply Brief 9, 11; J. S. A. 93a.

In sum, the District Court's heavy reliance on these four pieces of evidence was seriously misguided in light of the appropriate legal standard and our repeated instructions that a court in a case such as this must rule out the possibility that politics drove the districting process.

C

[34] Once these weak inferences are set aside, all that the Challengers have left are four expert reports. But these reports are flawed because they "ignored certain traditional districting criteria" such as geographical constraints and the legislature's partisan interests. Allen v. Milligan, 599 U.S. 1, 34, 143 S.Ct. 1487, 216 L.Ed.2d 60 (2023). Because these reports do not replicate the "myriad considerations" that a legislature must balance as part of its redistricting efforts, they cannot sustain a finding that race played a predominant role in the drawing of District 1's lines. Id., at 35, 143 S.Ct. 1487. We will discuss each of the Challengers' four experts in turn.

[35] Dr. Kosuke Imai. The report of the Challengers' first expert, Dr. Kosuke Imai, provides no support for the decision below because Dr. Imai made no effort to disentangle race from politics. Dr. Imai developed a computer algorithm that generated 20,000 maps of the State's congressional districts that complied with the one *1244 person, one vote rule. This algorithm did not take race into account, and it sought to respect traditional redistricting objectives such as contiguity and compactness. The Challengers assert that these maps prove that race drove the State's redistricting process because the average District 1 in these simulations contained a higher BVAP than the District 1 in the Enacted Plan.

The Challengers' inference is flawed because Dr. Imai's models failed to consider partisanship. See J. S. A. Supp. 30a (acknowledging that "no race or partisan information was used" (emphasis added)). That is a fatal omission in this 25 case. As noted, race and politics strongly correlate in South Carolina, and Dr. Imai's algorithm produced maps without requiring that District 1 comply with the legislature's asserted aim of ensuring that District 1 remain a relatively safe Republican seat. The effect of Dr. Imai's omission can be seen by looking at the Democratic vote share (measured by the results in the 2020 Presidential election) in the versions of District 1 that his simulations produced. President Biden's vote share in the average District 1 in Dr. Imai's maps was significantly higher than his vote share in the version of District 1 in the Enacted Plan. Rebuttal Report of Sean Trende in South Carolina State Conference of the NAACP v. McMaster, No. 3:21–cv–3302 (D SC, Aug. 19, 2022), ECF Doc. 323–33, pp. 5–6. Indeed, Dr. Sean Trende, the State's expert, showed that District 1 would have voted for the Democratic nominee in 2020 in 91% of Dr. Imai's simulations. Ibid. Because Dr. Imai's model fails to track the considerations that governed the legislature's redistricting decision, it is irrelevant that the racial makeup of District 1 in his maps differs from that in the version of the district in the Enacted Plan.

It is also noteworthy that Dr. Imai could have easily controlled for partisan preferences just as he controlled for other redistricting factors such as compactness and county splits. He could have generated maps conditioned on District 1's vote share matching or exceeding the Benchmark Plan's Republican tilt. But he did not take that obvious step.

he Challengers seek to excuse their failures to disentangle race and politics by arguing that South Carolina raised a partisan-gerrymandering defense for the first time during the trial, but this argument rests on the implausible premise that the Challengers were unaware of the legislature's partisan concerns during the mapmaking process. The fact of the matter is that politics pervaded the highly visible mapmaking process from start to finish. The Republican and 26 Democratic caucuses submitted competing maps, and the Enacted Plan passed the legislature by a margin of 26 to 15 in the Senate and 72 to 33 in the House, with only Democrats voting in opposition. The public hearings and legislative debates are of a piece. For example, Senator Margie Bright Matthews, a black Democrat, said in a floor debate with Senator Campsen that " 'we're not going to get into the racial gerrymandering thing because you and I both know in Charleston it matters not about your race. It is just that you went by how those folks voted.' " App. 296. For evidence, she recognized that the Enacted Plan also moved into District 6 predominantly white parts of Charleston that skewed Democratic, such as West Ashley. She added, " 'Senator [Campsen], ... I really appreciate you agreeing with me that our opposition ... is not about racial [gerrymandering].' " Ibid. Instead, she said, it was about " 'packing' " the Democratic-voting area of Charleston into District 6 " 'to make [District 1] more electable.' " Ibid. Former Congressman Cunningham, the Democrat *1245 who represented District 1 from 2018 to 2020, also criticized the Enacted Plan's District 1 lines as " 'mak[ing] no sense unless, of course, the sole purpose ... is to make it harder for a Republican to lose.' " Id., at 295. He added that "the folks in Washington, D.C.," did not want a repeat of the 2018 election or even the 2020 election where he lost against the Republican nominee by "a single point in one of the closest elections in the entire country." Ibid. Under these circumstances, it is safe to say that the Challengers were on notice hat the State would raise a partisan-gerrymandering defense at trial.

Dr. Imai's conspicuous failure to control for party preference is alone sufficient to discredit any reliance on his report, but his report exhibited another serious flaw: it failed to consider "core district retention," a term that "refers to the proportion of districts that remain when a State transitions from one districting plan to another." Allen, 599 U.S. at 21, 143 S.Ct. 1487. 27 The Enacted Plan retains 83% of District 1's core, but the average map produced by Dr. Imai's model scored 69% on the core-district-retention metric—three standard deviations lower. ECF Doc. 323–33, at 5.

Dr. Imai's failure to consider core retention betrays a blinkered view of the redistricting process. Lawmakers do not typically start with a blank slate; rather, they usually begin with the existing map and make alterations to fit various districting goals. Core retention recognizes this reality. Dr. Imai could have controlled for this metric by restricting the core retention in his simulations to at least 83%. His failure to do so here means we cannot rule out core retention as another plausible explanation for the difference between the Enacted Plan and the average Imai simulation.

[36] Dr. Jordan Ragusa. As evidence that race predominated in District 1's design, the District Court also credited a report by Dr. Jordan Ragusa, another expert for the Challengers. Unlike Dr. Imai, Dr. Ragusa attempted to disentangle race from politics, but as we will explain, his analysis has at least two serious defects. First, he failed to account for two key mapmaking factors: contiguity and compactness. Second, he used an inferior method of measuring a precinct's partisan leanings.

We begin with the matter of contiguity and compactness. Dr. Ragusa used three separate models, but none of them controlled for these critical districting factors. Two of his models employed the so-called county envelope approach. Using this approach, he first identified the five counties that have at least one precinct that fell within District 1 in the Benchmark Plan. These counties in their entirety constituted the "county envelope."

Dr. Ragusa employed a method that we will discuss below to control for the partisan preferences of voters in these precincts, and he also controlled for precinct size. He then asked whether a precinct of a given size with a given partisan 28 breakdown was more or less likely to be included in District 1 depending on its racial demographics, and he reported that districts with a high percentage of black voters were more likely to be excluded.

His remaining model looked only at the precincts that were in District 1 in the Benchmark Plan, and controlling in the same way for size and partisan leaning, he reported that a precinct was more likely to be moved out if it had a high percentage of black voters.

All three of these models exhibit the same flaw. Because they did not control for contiguity or compactness, they all assume that a precinct could be moved into or out of District 1 regardless of its distance *1246 from the line between that district and District 6. That is highly unrealistic. A simple example illustrates this point in relation to the county envelope approach, as can be seen with a quick look at Figure 1, which we again reproduce below.

29 Under Dr. Ragusa's methodology, any precinct in Colleton County could have been moved into District 1, but many precincts in that county are nowhere near District 1's outer boundaries. For example, precincts near the county's northern border with Bamberg County could not have been moved into District 1 without egregiously flouting the State's important interests in contiguity or compactness. And the same problem arises with respect to the question whether a precinct in District 1 in the Benchmark Plan could have been moved into District 6. Precincts in District 1 that are not close to the district line could not have been moved without making District 6 less contiguous or compact.[8]

We have already rejected a plaintiff 's expert report for failing to account for this feature of mapmaking. In Cromartie II, we faulted the plaintiff 's expert for failing to consider whether the excluded precincts "were located near enough to [the district's] boundaries or each other for the legislature as a practical matter to have *1247 drawn [the district's] boundaries to have included them, without sacrificing other important political goals." 532 U.S. at 247, 121 S.Ct. 1452. The District 30 Court clearly erred in crediting Dr. Ragusa's models because his approach made that same mistake.

Dr. Ragusa's report also carries less weight because of how he measured a precinct's partisan leanings. Using the results of the 2020 Presidential election, Dr. Ragusa measured partisan tilt by looking at the total votes cast for President Biden, not the net votes for President Biden. This method fails to account for the fact that voter turnout may vary significantly from precinct to precinct, and therefore a precinct in which a candidate gets a large number of votes may also be a precinct in which the candidate fails to win a majority. To illustrate this point, consider this simplified example:

	Precinct 1	Precinct 2
Total Voting Age Population	1,250	1,250
Biden Vote	400	500
Trump Vote	250	600
Net Biden Votes	150	-100

Biden Vote %	62%	45%
Black Voting Age Population	250	0
Moved from District 1 to District 6	Yes	No

Dr. Ragusa's model considers only the total number of Biden votes in its partisanship analysis. J. S. A. 502a. But legislators aiming to make District 1 a relatively safe Republican seat would be foolish to exclude Precinct 2 merely because it has more Democratic votes than Precinct 1. Instead, they would look at the net Democratic votes and would thus remove Precinct 1, not Precinct 2. Although the use of total votes may be a statistically permissible measure of partisan lean, it is undoubtedly preferable for an expert report 31 to rely on net votes when measuring a district's partisan lean.

The Challengers seek to defend Dr. Ragusa's report by suggesting that he followed the same methodology as Professor Stephen Ansolabehere, whose report we blessed in Cooper, 581 U.S. at 315, 137 S.Ct. 1455, but that is wrong. There are important differences between Dr. Ragusa's methodology and Professor Ansolabehere's,[9] and in all events, Professor Ansolabehere's report played a minor role in Cooper, where the plaintiffs could also point to direct evidence. Here, by contrast, *1248 once the District Court's other circumstantial findings are set aside, the Challengers must rest their entire case on these expert reports. Dr. Ragusa's report, on its own, cannot prove that District 1's lines are "unexplainable on grounds other than race." Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 644, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Dr. Baodong Liu. Dr. Baodong Liu, another of the Challengers' experts, submitted a report that purported to show that race rather than politics explains District 1's design. Although the District Court did not cite Dr. Liu's report, the Challengers contend that it bolsters the District Court's findings. Tr. of Oral Arg. 86–87. But Dr. Liu's methodology was plainly flawed.

First, his methodology, like Dr. Ragusa's, failed to account for contiguity and compactness. Dr. Liu examined all voters living within the county envelope for District 1 of the 32 Enacted Plan to see which voters were more likely to have been excluded. His analysis suggested that black Democrats were more likely to have been excluded than white Democrats.

This methodology was highly unrealistic because it treated each voter as an independent unit that South Carolina could include or exclude from District 1. No mapmaker who respects contiguity and compactness could take such an approach. For example, a mapmaker could not assign a black Republican to one district while moving a black Democrat who lives in the same apartment building to another district. To accurately reflect the districting process, an analysis would have to pay attention to whether a voter's neighbors were moved too.

This defect alone is sufficient to preclude reliance on Dr. Liu's report, but that report exhibited another flaw: it used inferior data to measure a district's partisan tilt. While the State used voting data from the 2020 Presidential election, Dr. Liu relied on data from the 2018 gubernatorial primaries. Data from that gubernatorial primary is less informative because far fewer voters turn out for off-cycle gubernatorial primary elections. The numbers prove the point. In the 2018 elections, a total of about 610,000 votes were cast across both primaries; in the 2020 Presidential election, by contrast, a total of 2.5 million votes were cast.[10] Because Dr. Liu examined only a small, highly non-random sample of the regular voting electorate, we cannot say that the same results would hold true if he had applied his methodology to the State's 2020 data.

33 Dr. Moon Duchin. Dr. Moon Duchin, the final expert put forward by the Challengers, provided a report assessing whether the Enacted Plan "cracks" black voters among multiple districts in a way that produced "discernible vote dilution." J. S. A. Supp. 127a. After finding that the Enacted Plan diluted the black vote, Dr. Duchin concluded that it is "not plausible" that the dilution was a mere "side effect of partisan concerns." Id., at 175a.

[37] Neither the District Court nor the Challengers cite Dr. Duchin's report to support the racial-predominance finding, and that is for a good reason. Like Dr. Imai's report, various parts of Dr. Duchin's report did not account for partisanship *1249 or core retention. App. 102–103. Moreover, Dr. Duchin's conclusion was based on an assessment of the map as a whole rather than District 1 in particular. A state-wide analysis cannot show that District 1 was drawn based on race.

See Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 191, 137 S.Ct. 788 ("[T]he basic unit of analysis for racial gerrymandering claims ... is the district"); Alabama Legislative Black Caucus, 575 U.S. at 262–263, 135 S.Ct. 1257 (a racial-gerrymandering claim "does not apply to a State considered as an undifferentiated 'whole' "). Given these serious problems, it is no wonder that the challengers cite Dr. Duchin's report only in support of their racial vote-dilution claim. It has no probative force with respect to their racial-gerrymandering claim regarding District 1's boundaries.

[38] [39] To sum up our analysis so far, no direct evidence supports the District Court's finding that race predominated in the design of District 1 in the Enacted Plan. The circumstantial evidence falls far short of showing that race, not partisan preferences, drove the districting process, and none of the expert reports offered by the Challengers provides any significant support for their position.[11]

34 D

[40] In addition to all this, the District Court also critically erred by failing to draw an adverse inference against the Challengers for not providing a substitute map that shows how the State "could have achieved its legitimate political objectives" in District 1 while producing "significantly greater racial balance." Cromartie II, 532 U.S. at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452. We have repeatedly observed that an alternative map of this sort can go a long way toward helping plaintiffs disentangle race and politics. In Cooper, we expressed "no doubt that an alternative districting plan ... can serve as key evidence in a race-versus-politics dispute." 581 U.S. at 317, 137 S.Ct. 1455. By showing that a rational legislature, driven only by its professed mapmaking criteria, could have produced a different map with "greater racial balance," Cromartie II, 532 U.S. at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452, an alternative map can perform the critical task of distinguishing between racial and political motivations when race and partisanship are closely entwined. For that reason, we have said that when all plaintiffs can muster is "meager direct evidence of a racial gerrymander" "only [an alternative] 35 ma[p] of that kind" can "carry the day." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 322, 137 S.Ct. 1455.

*1250 Nor is an alternative map difficult to produce. Any expert armed with a computer "can easily churn out redistricting maps that control for any number of specified criteria, including prior voting patterns and political party registration." Id., at 337, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (opinion of ALITO, J.). The Challengers enlisted four experts who could have made these maps at little marginal cost. Dr. Imai's simulations generated 20,000 different maps—but none that actually controlled for politics. The evidentiary force of an alternative map, coupled with its easy availability, means that trial courts should draw an adverse inference from a plaintiff 's failure to submit one. The adverse inference may be dispositive in many, if not most, cases where the plaintiff lacks direct evidence or some extraordinarily powerful circumstantial evidence such as the "strangely irregular twenty-eight-sided" district lines in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 341, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960), which betrayed the State's aim of segregating voters on the basis of race with "mathematical" precision, ibid.

[41] The District Court, however, misunderstood our case law when it held that an alternative map is relevant only for the purpose of showing that a remedy is plausible. 649 F.Supp.3d at 198–199. Because "a constitutionally compliant plan for [District 1] can be designed without undue difficulty," the District Court concluded that it was "not necessary for Plaintiffs to present an acceptable alternative map to prevail on their claims." Id., at 199. That is wrong. A plaintiff 's failure to submit an alternative map—precisely because it can be designed with ease—should be interpreted by district courts as an implicit concession that the plaintiff cannot draw a map that undermines the legislature's defense that the districting lines were "based on a permissible, rather than a prohibited, ground." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 317, 137 S.Ct. 1455. The District Court's conclusions are clearly erroneous because it did not follow this basic logic.

36 E

Despite its length, the dissent boils down to six main points. None is valid.

[42] First, the dissent suggests that clear-error review is a perfunctory task, see post, at 1272 - 1273, but that is not so. While district court findings of fact are generally correct, conscientious district courts sometimes err, and appellants are entitled to meaningful appellate review. Does the dissent really think that all district court findings on the question of racial discrimination are virtually immune from reversal?

Second, the dissent attacks the proposition that in redistricting cases the "good faith of [the] state legislature must be presumed." Miller, 515 U.S. at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. But, as the citation to Justice Kennedy's opinion for the Court in Miller reveals, that presumption is an established feature of our case law.

[43] Third, the dissent claims that our decision is inconsistent with Cooper, but the dissent's argument is based on an imaginary version of that opinion. Nothing in Cooper is inconsistent with the venerable rule that a factfinder may draw an adverse inference when a party fails to produce highly probative evidence that it could readily obtain if in fact such evidence exists. See Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 226, 59 S.Ct. 467, 83 L.Ed. 610 (1939); see also 2 J. Wigmore, Evidence in Trials at Common Law § 291, pp. 227–229 (Chadbourn rev. 1979). "[T]his rule can be traced as far back as 1722" and "has been utilized in scores of modern cases." *1251 International Union, United Auto, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of Am. (UAW) v. NLRB, 459 F.2d 1329, 1336 (CADC 1972). The dissent is correct that this inference "pack[s] a wallop" in such cases, post, at 1272 - 1273, but that is only because an adequate alternative map is remarkably easy to produce—as demonstrated by the fact that the Challengers introduced tens of thousands of other maps into the record. Under such circumstances, if a sophisticated plaintiff bringing a racial-gerrymandering claim cannot provide 37 an alternative map, that is most likely because such a map cannot be created. It would be clear error for the factfinder to overlook this shortcoming.

Fourth, the dissent argues that the Challengers were blindsided when the State argued at trial that its map was drawn to achieve a political goal. Post, at 1274 - 1275. But there is ample evidence that the State's aim was well known before trial. See supra, at 1244 - 1245. And neither the Challengers nor the dissent can explain why the Challengers' experts, who created thousands of maps that took into account all sorts of variables, supposedly never even tried to create a District 1 that had a higher BVAP while achieving the legislature's political goals. Nor can they explain why, if such a map can be created, the Challengers' experts did not produce one during the trial.

Fifth, the dissent makes much of the fact that Roberts had taken racial demographics into account in drawing maps in the past and was aware of the racial makeup of the various districts he created in this case. But there is nothing nefarious about his awareness of the State's racial demographics. Roberts has spent nearly 20 years drawing maps for various state and local initiatives, and it is therefore entirely unsurprising that he exhibited a wealth of knowledge about who lives in which part of the State. Cf. Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (state redistricting officials "will ... almost always be aware of racial demographics" during the districting process). The dissent seeks to undercut Roberts's credibility by labeling him "a veteran consumer of racial data." Post, at 1277. We think it is unfair for the dissent to question his credibility simply because he, like every other expert who has ever worked on a Voting Rights Act case, has had to "consum[e] ... racial data" to comply with our precedents.

Finally, the dissent thinks that the State must have used racial data because that data, in its view, is more accurate than political data in predicting future votes. Refusing to use the racial data, according to the dissent, would have required 38 the "self-restraint of a monk." Post, at 1279. This jaded view is inconsistent with our case law's longstanding instruction that the "good faith of [the] state legislature must be presumed" in redistricting cases. Miller, 515 U.S. at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. And in any event, there is little reason to think that it requires much restraint for a mapmaker with a political aim to use data that bears directly on what he is trying to achieve, namely, political data. That is especially so where, as here, the political data, unlike the racial data that the dissent prefers, took into account voter turnout. See supra, at 1242 - 1244, and n. 7.

In sum, there is no substance to the dissent's attacks.

IV

The Challengers also raised an independent vote-dilution claim. The District Court held that this claim was governed by the "same findings of fact and reasoning" that guided its racial-gerrymandering analysis, and it thus entered judgment for the Challengers on that ground as well. 649 F.Supp.3d at 198. But in light of our conclusion that those findings were clearly erroneous, that conclusion cannot stand. *1252 Moreover, the District Court's analysis did not take into account the differences between vote-dilution and racial-gerrymandering claims.

[44] [45] A racial-gerrymandering claim asks whether race predominated in the drawing of a district "regardless of the motivations" for the use of race. Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 645, 113 S.Ct. 2816. The racial classification itself is the relevant harm in that context. A vote-dilution claim is "analytically distinct" from a racial-gerrymandering claim and follows a "different analysis." Id., at 650, 652, 113 S.Ct. 2816. A plaintiff pressing a vote-dilution claim cannot prevail simply by showing that race played a predominant role in the districting process. Rather, such a plaintiff must show that the State "enacted a particular voting scheme as a purposeful device to minimize or cancel out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities." 39 Miller, 515 U.S. at 911, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (internal quotation marks omitted). In other words, the plaintiff must show that the State's districting plan "has the purpose and effect" of diluting the minority vote. Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (emphasis added).

In light of these two errors in the District Court's analysis of the Challengers' vote-dilution claim, a remand is appropriate.

* * *

We reverse the judgment of the District Court in part and remand the case in part for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice THOMAS, concurring in part.
I join all but Part III–C of the Court's opinion. The Court correctly concludes that the judgment below must be reversed under our precedents. Although I find the analysis in Part III–C persuasive, clear-error review is not an invitation for the Court to "sift through volumes of facts" and "argue its interpretation of those facts." Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 262, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (THOMAS, J., dissenting). The Court's searching review of the expert reports exceeds the proper scope of clear-error review. But, that analysis is not necessary to resolve the case. In Part III–B, the Court explains that the District Court failed to evaluate evidence reflecting the correlation between race and politics with the necessary presumption of legislative good faith. Ante, at 1240 - 1243. And, in Part III–D, it explains that the District Court failed to properly account for the plaintiffs' failure to produce an alternative map. Ante, at 1248 - 1249. Both of those mistakes are reversible legal errors.

I write separately to address whether our voting-rights precedents are faithful to the Constitution. This case is unique because it presents solely constitutional questions. The plaintiffs do not rely on the Voting Rights Act of 1965 for any of their claims. Nor do the South Carolina officials 40 invoke the Voting Rights Act as part of their defense. There can be no more propitious occasion to consider the constitutional underpinnings of our voting-rights jurisprudence.

The plaintiffs press two distinct constitutional claims. First, they bring a "racial gerrymandering" claim, alleging that South Carolina drew its new Congressional District 1 to sort black voters based on their race. To prevail on that claim under our precedents, the plaintiffs must show that race was the "predominant factor" in the legislature's approach to drawing the district. Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995). Second, they bring a "vote dilution" claim, alleging that South Carolina drew *1253 District 1 to intentionally reduce the voting strength of the district's black residents. To prevail on that claim under our precedents, the plaintiffs must show that District 1's design reduces "minority voters' ability, as a group, 'to elect the candidate of their choice.' " Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (quoting Allen v. State Bd. of Elections, 393 U.S. 544, 569, 89 S.Ct. 817, 22 L.Ed.2d 1 (1969)).

In my view, the Court has no power to decide these types of claims. Drawing political districts is a task for politicians, not federal judges. There are no judicially manageable standards for resolving claims about districting, and, regardless, the Constitution commits those issues exclusively to the political branches.

The Court's insistence on adjudicating these claims has led it to develop doctrines that indulge in race-based reasoning inimical to the Constitution. As we reiterated last Term, " '[o]ur Constitution is color-blind.' " Students for Fair Admissions, Inc. v. President and Fellows of Harvard College, 600 U.S. 181, 230, 143 S.Ct. 2141, 216 L.Ed.2d 857 (2023) (quoting Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting)). A colorblind Constitution does not require that racial considerations "predominate" before subjecting them to scrutiny. Nor does it tolerate groupwide judgments about the preferences and beliefs 41 of racial minorities. It behooves us to abandon our misguided efforts and leave districting to politicians.

I

Determining the proper shape of a district is a political question not suited to resolution by federal courts. The questions presented by districting claims are "

'nonjusticiable,' or 'political questions.' " Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 277, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158 L.Ed.2d 546 (2004) (plurality opinion). We have explained that a question is nonjusticiable when there is " 'a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving' " the issue or " 'a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department.' " Id., at 277–278, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 217, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962)).

In Rucho v. Common Cause, 588 U.S. 684, 139 S.Ct. 2484, 204 L.Ed.2d 931 (2019), we applied those principles to conclude that 42 partisan gerrymandering claims are nonjusticiable. Partisan gerrymandering claims allege that a political map unduly favors one political party over another. We explained that partisan gerrymandering claims therefore present questions about how to "apportion political power as a matter of fairness," despite the fact that "[t]here are no legal standards discernible in the Constitution for making such judgments, let alone limited and precise standards that are clear, manageable, and politically neutral." Id., at 705, 707, 139 S.Ct. 2484. We bolstered our conclusion by reference to "the Framers' decision to entrust districting to political entities" in the Elections Clause, Art. I, § 4, cl. 1. Id., at 697, 701, 139 S.Ct. 2484. Because courts "have no commission to allocate political power and influence in the absence of a constitutional directive or legal standards to guide us in the exercise of such authority," we held that partisan gerrymandering claims are nonjusticiable. Id., at 721, 139 S.Ct. 2484.

The same logic demonstrates that racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims are also nonjusticiable. As with partisan gerrymandering claims, the racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims in this case lack "judicially discoverable and manageable standards" for their resolution. *1254 Vieth, 541 U.S. at 277–278, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (internal quotation marks omitted). And, they ask us to address an issue—congressional districting—that is textually committed to a coordinate political department, Congress. Id., at 277, 124 S.Ct. 1769. As a result, racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims brought under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments are nonjusticiable.

A

Racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims lack " 'judicially discoverable and manageable standards' " for their resolution. Id., at 277–278, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 217, 82 S.Ct. 691). Both types of claims turn on questions that cannot be answered through the kind of reasoning that constitutes an exercise of the "judicial Power." Art. III, § 1, cl. 1. I address in turn the reasons why each claim is unmanageable.

1

Racial gerrymandering claims ask courts to reverse-engineer the purposes behind a complex and often arbitrary legislative process. The standard developed under our precedents "require[s] the plaintiff to show that race was the 'predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district.' " Ante, at 1234 (quoting Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475). In other words, "a plaintiff must prove that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations." Id., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. The Court's focus on legislative purpose is unavoidable because "the constitutional violation in racial gerrymandering cases stems from the racial purpose of state action," not the resulting map. Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 189, 137 S.Ct. 788, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017) (internal quotation marks omitted).

43 Divining legislative purpose is a dubious undertaking in the best of circumstances, but the task is all but impossible in gerrymandering cases. "Electoral districting is a most difficult subject for legislatures," a pure "exercise [of] the political judgment necessary to balance competing interests." Miller, 515 U.S. at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. We have therefore cautioned courts to "be sensitive to the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus." Id., at 915–916, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

In cases without smoking-gun evidence, the only practical way to prove that a State considered race when drawing districts is to "show that the State's chosen map conflicts with traditional redistricting criteria."[1] Ante, at 1234. The Court's racial gerrymandering precedents use the term " 'traditional districting principles' " to refer to the "competing interests" and "complex ... forces" involved in drawing districts. Miller, 515 U.S. at 915–916, 919, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (quoting Shaw, 509 U.S. at 647, 113 S.Ct. 2816). Judging a map's consistency or conflict with traditional districting principles requires a court to ascertain what kinds of maps should result from the application of those principles.

Determining how a legislature would have drawn district lines in a vacuum is a fool's errand. Indeed, as we have defined them, "traditional districting principles" are simply anything relevant to drawing districts other than race. They include "principles such as compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions." 1255 Id., at 647, 113 S.Ct. 2816. They also include "keeping communities of interest together, and protecting incumbents," Rucho, 588 U.S. at 706–707, 139 S.Ct. 2484, as well as "minimizing change," Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 259, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015). Today, the Court identifies "the legislature's partisan interests" as a traditional criterion. *44 Ante, at 1243. Even considerations such as a district's "consistently urban character," "common media sources," and inclusion of "major transportation lines ... implicate traditional districting principles." Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 966, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion). We have readily acknowledged that "[t]raditional redistricting principles ... are numerous and malleable," and that "some ... are surprisingly ethereal and admit of degrees." Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 190, 137 S.Ct. 788 (alteration and internal quotation marks omitted).

To evaluate whether a map aligns with traditional districting principles, a court must "rank the relative importance of those ... criteria." Rucho, 588 U.S. at 708, 139 S.Ct. 2484. Without such a ranking, it is impossible to say what kinds of maps the principles should yield. But, that analysis ensnarls courts in a political thicket. Traditional districting principles often conflict with one another, and there is no principled way for judges to resolve those conflicts. Consider the question whether the principles of contiguity and compactness can justify a map that retains a relatively small part of the old district's core. See ante, at 1243 - 1244, 1244 -1245. Or, consider whether the principle of keeping communities of interest together can justify uniting one community at the cost of splitting another between several districts, or healing partially an existing split at the cost of introducing a new one. See Allen v. Milligan, 599 U.S. 1, 57, 61, 143 S.Ct. 1487, 216 L.Ed.2d 60 (2023) (THOMAS, J., dissenting). These questions do not ask for legal answers, only political compromises. Judicial resolution of racial gerrymandering claims thus requires precisely the kind of "inconsistent, illogical, and ad hoc" decisionmaking that we have said is beyond the judicial power. Vieth, 541 U.S. at 278, 124 S.Ct. 1769.

Evaluating compliance with traditional districting principles is further complicated by the fact that many decisions are equally consistent with both a good-faith application of those principles and with common gerrymandering techniques. *45 A legislature seeking to gerrymander a district will often proceed by "packing" or "cracking" groups of minority voters. "Packing" means concentrating minority voters in a single district to reduce their influence in surrounding districts. "Cracking" means splitting a group of minority voters between multiple districts to avoid strong minority influence in any one district. But, in areas where "political groups ... tend to cluster (as is the case with Democratic voters in cities)," apparent packing or cracking can simply reflect "adherence to compactness and respect for political subdivision lines" or "the traditional criterion of incumbency protection." Id., at 290, 298, 124 S.Ct. 1769. This case exemplifies the problem—the majority observes that Dr. Moon Duchin's report failed to "account for" the traditional districting principles of "partisanship or core retention" in "assessing whether the Enacted Plan 'cracks' black voters among multiple districts." Ante, at 1248. The difference between illegitimate packing and the legitimate pursuit of compactness is too often in the eye of the beholder.

Perhaps the most serious obstacle to evaluating whether a map is consistent with traditional districting principles is the fact that race and politics are, at present, highly correlated in American society. Racial 1256 gerrymandering is constitutionally suspect, but "a jurisdiction may engage in constitutional political gerrymandering." Rucho, 588 U.S. at 701, 139 S.Ct. 2484 (internal quotation marks omitted). So, even if a court is able to navigate all the complications I have identified so far, it must still contend with the reality that "political and racial reasons are capable of yielding similar oddities in a district's boundaries." Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 308, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017). To that end, "when the State asserts partisanship as a defense," plaintiffs must meet the "formidable task" of "disentangl[ing] race from politics and prov[ing] that the former drove a district's lines." Ibid. Courts are not well equipped to evaluate whether plaintiffs succeed in disentangling race and politics.

*46 As the Court observes, roughly 90% of black voters in South Carolina supported the Democratic candidate in the last Presidential election. Ante, at 1234 - 1235, and n. 2. When nearly all black voters support Democrats, an effort to strategically sort Democratic voters can be indistinguishable from an effort to strategically sort black voters. In this case, all Democratic-leaning maps presented during the districting process featured a black share of the voting-age population of 21% or higher, and all Republican-leaning maps featured a black voter share of 17% or lower. Ante, at 1241. The dispute in this case therefore focuses on whether that correlation reflected a racial purpose, or merely reflected the result of a political purpose.

The majority's reasoning highlights the difficulties inherent in disentangling race and politics. Its explanation of why the expert evidence was insufficient does not rest on the application of legal principles, but on the likely errors it finds in the experts' statistical models after a "foray into the minutiae of the record." Cromartie, 532 U.S. at 262, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). The majority discounts four separate expert reports based on methodological concerns. One report is insufficient because it fails to model partisanship. Ante, at 1243 - 1245. Another "carries less weight" because it measures partisanship through the wrong statistical method. Ante, at 1246 - 1247. And, another cannot be relied upon because it measures partisanship with the wrong election data. Ante, at 1247 - 1248. The dissent accuses the Court of "play[ing] armchair statistician." Post, at 1284 (opinion of KAGAN, J.). But, the dissent's defense of the expert reports includes an exercise in armchair cartography. The dissent justifies the experts' assumption that the legislature could move any precinct in District 1 to District 6 by explaining that District 1 is thin, coastal, and shares a long border with District 6. Post, at 1282 - 1284. It supports its hunch with two zoomed-out maps that include no information about precinct size or location. Post, at 1286 - 1287, Appendix. This type of back-and-forth is the 47 inevitable result of our voting-rights doctrine. One worries that the Court will soon begin drawing its own sample maps and performing in-house regression analyses.

A system in which only specialized experts can discern the existence of a constitutional injury is intolerable, and strongly suggests that the racial gerrymandering injury is not amenable to judicial resolution. We should resist the temptation to reduce the Fourteenth Amendment to a battle of expert witnesses. Our gerrymandering misadventures demonstrate that these claims lack judicially manageable standards.

2

As I have long maintained, vote dilution claims are also "not readily subjected to any judicially manageable standards." *1257 Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 901–902, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment). To prove vote dilution as a constitutional claim, our precedents require plaintiffs to show that the design of a district reduces "minority voters' ability, as a group, to elect the candidate of their choice." Shaw, 509 U.S. at 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (internal quotation marks omitted). The same consideration is used for vote dilution claims brought under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act. See Allen, 599 U.S. at 13, 143 S.Ct. 1487 (explaining that § 2 "borrow[s] language from a Fourteenth Amendment [vote dilution] case").

To assess whether a legislature has diluted a minority's vote, "the critical question ... is: 'Diluted relative to what benchmark?' " Id., at 50, 143 S.Ct. 1487 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (quoting Gonzalez v. Aurora, 535 F.3d 594, 598 (CA7 2008) (Easterbrook, C. J.)). Despite repeated efforts in our Voting Rights Act cases, the Court has "never succeeded" in formulating "an objective and workable method of identifying the undiluted benchmark." 599 U.S. at 69, 143 S.Ct. 1487 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). The Court's failure is not surprising because the task is futile. The Constitution does not offer "a theory for defining effective participation in representative government." Holder, 512 U.S. at 897, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

48 Choosing among theories of effective representation depends on particular voters' objectives and preferred political strategies, not principles of constitutional law. Are a minority's votes "more 'effective' when they provide influence over a greater number of seats, or control over a lesser number of seats"? Id., at 899, 114 S.Ct. 2581. Are minority voters " 'represented' only when they choose a delegate who will mirror their views in the legislative halls," or does the "practical influence" of a small group of potential swing voters also amount to effective representation? Id., at 900, 114 S.Ct. 2581. Only minority voters themselves can answer these questions. No "theory of the 'effective' vote" is "inherent in the concept of representative democracy itself." Id., at 899, 114 S.Ct. 2581. So, when our precedents ask a court to determine if a minority's vote is diluted, they are "actually ask[ing]" the court " 'to choose among competing bases of representation—ultimately, really, among competing theories of political philosophy.' " Id., at 897, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 300, 82 S.Ct. 691 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting)). The Constitution expresses no view on such issues, and they are not amenable to judicial resolution.

In practice, this Court has endorsed a theory of representation that distributes legislative seats in direct proportion to racial demographics. "[T]he 'lack of any better alternative' identified in our case law" and the "intuitive appeal" of "direct proportionality" make a racial proportionality standard irresistible. Allen, 599 U.S. at 72, 143 S.Ct. 1487 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (quoting Holder, 512 U.S. at 937, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.)). As a result, there is a "near-perfect correlation between [courts'] proportionality findings and [vote dilution] liability results." 599 U.S. at 72, 143 S.Ct. 1487 (citing E. Katz, M. Aisenbrey, A. Baldwin, E. Cheuse, & A. Weisbrodt, Documenting Discrimination in Voting: Judicial Findings Under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act Since 1982, 39 U. Mich. J. L. Reform 643, 730–732 (2006)). A proportionality approach is easy to apply, but it is "radically inconsistent with the [Reconstruction] Amendments' command that government treat citizens 49 as individuals and their 'goal of a political system in which race no longer matters.' " 599 U.S. at 82, 143 S.Ct. 1487 (quoting Shaw, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816).

*1258 I continue to believe that "[t]he matters the Court has set out to resolve in vote dilution cases are ... not questions of law," and that "they are not readily subjected to any judicially manageable standards." Holder, 512 U.S. at 901–902, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). The Court's determination to nonetheless adjudicate these cases has yielded an unconstitutional practice of distributing of political power based on race.

B

Racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims—at a minimum, those challenging congressional districts—are nonjusticiable for an additional reason: The Elections Clause makes a "textually demonstrable constitutional commitment" of the power to oversee congressional districting to "a coordinate political department," Congress. Vieth, 541 U.S. at 277, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (internal quotation marks omitted). And, no other constitutional provision overcomes that commitment to Congress. The Constitution contemplates no role for the federal courts in the districting process.

1

Although States have the initial duty to draw district lines, the Elections Clause commits exclusive supervisory authority over the States' drawing of congressional districts to Congress—not federal courts. It provides: "The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators." Art. I, § 4, cl. 1. The first part of the Clause "imposes a duty upon" state legislatures to "prescribe the details necessary to hold congressional elections." U. S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 862, 115 S.Ct. 1842, 131 L.Ed.2d 881 (1995) (THOMAS, J., dissenting). The second part "grants power 50 exclusively to Congress" to police the state legislatures' performance of their duty. Id., at 864, 115 S.Ct. 1842. Critically, the Clause leaves the Judiciary out of the districting process entirely.

The Clause's assignment of roles is comprehensive. For example, a state legislature's responsibility over congressional elections " 'transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a State' " through other state actors; the state legislature is the exclusive state authority. Moore v. Harper, 600 U.S. 1, 58, 143 S.Ct. 2065, 216 L.Ed.2d 729 (2023) (THOMAS, J., dissenting) (quoting Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130, 137, 42 S.Ct. 217, 66 L.Ed. 505 (1922)). In a similar vein, the Clause makes Congress the exclusive federal authority over States' efforts to draw congressional districts, to the exclusion of courts.

The historical record compels this interpretation of the Elections Clause's text. Gerrymandering and vote dilution are not new phenomena. The founding generation was familiar with political districting problems from the American colonial experience. See Vieth, 541 U.S. at 274, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (collecting examples). But, the Framers nowhere suggested the federal courts as a potential solution to those problems. Instead, they relied on congressional oversight. The Framers' considered choice of a nonjudicial remedy is highly relevant context to the interpretation of the Elections Clause. See New York State Rifle & Pistol Assn., Inc. v. Bruen, 597 U.S. 1, 26–27, 142 S.Ct. 2111, 213 L.Ed.2d 387 (2022).

Because the Elections Clause attracted considerable criticism during the ratification debates, ample contemporaneous discussion sheds light on the original understanding *1259 of the Clause. As a delegate to the Virginia ratifying convention observed, Congress's power to regulate the time, place, and manner of elections drew objections that "echoed from one end of the continent to the other." 3 Debates on the Constitution 9 (J. Elliot ed. 1836) (Elliot's Debates). Opponents of ratification attacked the Clause as a radical expansion of national power and a grave danger to liberty.

Patrick Henry argued: "What can be more defective than the clause 51 concerning the elections? The control given to Congress over the time, place, and manner of holding elections, will totally destroy the end of suffrage." Id., at 60.

Defenses of the Elections Clause demonstrate that it was designed at least in part as a way to address abusive districting. To be sure, proponents of ratification primarily justified the Clause as a "constitutional remedy for th[e] evil" presented by the possibility that "the states [might] neglect to appoint representatives" to the new Federal Government. 2 id., at 326 (statement of John Jay). But, other defenses of the Elections Clause resonate with modern concerns about gerrymandering and vote dilution.

Some proponents of ratification championed the Clause as necessary "for securing to the people their equal rights of election." Id., at 26. A delegate to the Massachusetts ratifying convention cautioned that "a state legislature ... in times of popular commotion, and when faction and party spirit run high, ... might make an unequal and partial division of the states into districts for the election of representatives." Id., at 27. In such a situation, he explained, "the people can have no remedy" except for that created by the Elections Clause: the "controlling power" by which Congress may "preserve and restore to the people their equal and sacred rights of election." Ibid. And, James Madison raised similar arguments at the Constitutional Convention. See 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, pp. 240–241 (M. Farrand ed. 1911).

It was Congress, not the courts, that the Founders contemplated would provide recourse against state intrusions on voting rights through the districting process. Even when listing all entities that could possibly regulate congressional elections, the founding generation did not consider the federal courts. To support his assertion that "the discretionary power over elections ought to exist somewhere," Alexander Hamilton posited that "there were only three ways in which this power could have been reasonably organized; that 52 it must either have been lodged wholly in the National Legislature, or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter, and ultimately in the former." The Federalist No. 59, p. 326 (E. Scott ed. 1898) (emphasis added). A delegate made the same observation at the Massachusetts ratifying convention: "The power ... to regulate the elections of our federal representatives must be lodged somewhere. I know of but two bodies wherein it can be lodged—the legislatures of the several states, and the general Congress." 2 Elliot's Debates 24.

The Elections Clause's text and history therefore point to the same conclusion: The Clause commits supervisory authority over congressional districting to Congress alone. "At no point" during the drafting or ratification of the Constitution "was there a suggestion that the federal courts had a role to play" in resolving "electoral districting problems." Rucho, 588 U.S. at 699, 139 S.Ct. 2484. Even when the debate touched on how political districting could affect the voting rights of individuals, it was understood that any remedy related to *1260 districting would come from Congress, not federal courts.[2]

2

None of the Constitution's other provisions undercuts or countermands the Elections Clause's clear mandate for Congress to supervise the States' districting efforts. The Court 53 has viewed the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments as the source of its authority to entertain challenges to districts. But, the Reconstruction Amendments are perfectly consistent with Congress's exclusive authority to oversee congressional districting.

Our decisions primarily identify the Equal Protection Clause as the textual basis for judicial resolution of districting claims. See Shaw, 509 U.S. at 642, 113 S.Ct. 2816; Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 151, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986) (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment) (asserting that, in contrast to political gerrymandering, "the greater warrant the Equal Protection Clause gives the federal courts to intervene for protection against racial discrimination ... render[s] racial gerrymandering claims justiciable"). That conclusion does not comport with the text of the Equal Protection Clause or the structure of the Reconstruction Amendments.

The text of the Equal Protection Clause makes it an unlikely source for claims about political districting. The Equal Protection Clause provides that "[n]o State shall ... deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Amdt. 14, § 1. The Clause's "focus on 'protection' " suggests that it imposes only " 'a duty on each state to protect all persons and property within its jurisdiction from violence and to enforce their rights through the court system,' " not a "prohibit[ion on] discriminatory legislative classifications." United States v. Vaello Madero, 596 U.S. 159, 178–179, n. 4, 142 S.Ct. 1539, 212 L.Ed.2d 496 (2022) (THOMAS, J., concurring) (quoting C. Green, The Original Sense of the (Equal) Protection Clause: Pre-Enactment History, 19 Geo. Mason U. Civ. Rights L. J. 1, 3 (2008)). So understood, the Equal Protection Clause has no obvious bearing on districting.[3]

1261 *54 Reading the Equal Protection Clause—or anything else in § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment—to invite judicial involvement in disputes over voting rights also ignores the fact that another part of the Fourteenth Amendment deals directly with those rights. Section 2 provides that "when the right to vote ... is denied" to a State's voting-age male citizens "or in any way abridged," the State's apportionment of congressional representatives "shall be reduced in the proportion" of the denial of the franchise. Congress alone can provide that remedy through its power to apportion representatives among the States. See Art. I, § 2, cl. 3. Federal courts are therefore unable to enforce § 2. See Saunders v. Wilkins, 152 F.2d 235 (CA4), cert. denied, 328 U.S. 870, 66 S.Ct. 1362, 90 L.Ed. 1640 (1945). The express provision of a nonjudicial remedy for voting-rights violations in § 2 counsels against reading § 1 to allow judicial remedies implicitly in those same voting-rights disputes. Cf. Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 594, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

Reading the Equal Protection Clause to support claims for racial gerrymandering or vote dilution also makes the existence of the Fifteenth Amendment unexplainable. If § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment allows for such fulsome protection of the franchise by federal courts, it is hard to see why *55 "Congress and the States still found it necessary to adopt the Fifteenth Amendment—which protects '[t]he right of citizens of the United States to vote'—two years after the Fourteenth Amendment's passage." McDonald, 561 U.S. at 852, 130 S.Ct. 3020 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

Nor can the Fifteenth Amendment justify racial gerrymandering or vote dilution claims in its own right. The Fifteenth Amendment is the primary constitutional protection for the voting rights of racial minorities. But, the Fifteenth Amendment "address[es] only matters relating to access to the ballot." Holder, 512 U.S. at 930, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). "[I]ts protections [are] satisfied as long as members of racial minorities [can] ' "register and vote without hindrance." ' " Id., at 921, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (quoting Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 65, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (plurality opinion)). The Court's decision in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960)—a Fifteenth Amendment case often cited as a touchstone of our racial gerrymandering jurisprudence—is consistent with this understanding. Gomillion involved only a claim "that the boundaries of a city had been drawn to prevent blacks from voting in municipal elections altogether," not a claim about the way minority voters were distributed between two districts. Holder, 512 U.S. at 920, n. 20, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

At this juncture, I see no directive in the Reconstruction Amendments for courts to police the lines between political districts. Instead, the Elections Clause assigns the responsibility for supervising the States' drawing of congressional districts solely to Congress.

* * *

Racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims lack judicially manageable standards for their resolution. And, they conflict 1262 with the Constitution's textual commitment of congressional districting issues to the state legislatures and Congress. They therefore present nonjusticiable political *56 questions. The Court should extricate itself from this business and return political districting to the political branches, where it belongs.

II

When an institution strays from its competencies, one does not expect good results. This Court's efforts in the districting field are no exception. The underlying nonjusticiability of racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims leads us to distort our doctrines in numerous ways. The standard that the Court uses to resolve racial gerrymandering claims betrays the colorblind promise of the Fourteenth Amendment by endorsing the notion that some racial classifications are benign. The standard that the Court uses to resolve vote dilution claims invariably falls back on racial stereotypes. And, the remedy commonly ordered in redistricting cases—a judicially imposed map—ignores the normal limits on federal equity power. Taken together, the Court's misconceived doctrines leave the States in an unenviable position.

A

The racial predominance standard for racial gerrymandering claims is plainly inconsistent with the fact that " '[o]ur Constitution is color-blind.' " Harvard College, 600 U.S. at 230, 143 S.Ct. 2141 (quoting Plessy, 163 U.S. at 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138 (opinion of Harlan, J.)). Ordinarily, any governmental consideration of race—even as a second-order consideration—triggers strict scrutiny. For example, using race merely as a "tip" or a "plus" factor in college admissions does not excuse a university from satisfying strict scrutiny. 600 U.S. at 195–196, 213, 143 S.Ct. 2141 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Our voting-rights precedents diverge from this rule by subjecting an alleged racial gerrymander to strict scrutiny only if "race was the 'predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district.' " Ante, at 1234 (quoting Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475) (emphasis added). A "predominance" 57 requirement conflicts with the classification-based harm that racial gerrymandering claims purport to address. The constitutional injury underlying a racial gerrymandering claim is the legislature's mere use of a racial classification in drawing its map. See Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 189, 137 S.Ct. 788. That injury exists whether race is a legislature's first or last consideration in drawing districts. "Racial classifications of any sort pose the risk of lasting harm to our society." Shaw, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (emphasis added). "They reinforce the belief ... that individuals should be judged by the color of their skin" and "balkanize us into competing racial factions." Ibid. All racial classifications are inherently suspect, whether predominant or not.

The Court developed the racial predominance standard with concerns about the justiciability of gerrymandering claims in mind. The Court initially formulated the predominance standard while observing that "[f]ederal-court review of districting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions," and stressing the need to allow States "discretion to exercise the political judgment necessary to balance competing interests." Miller, 515 U.S. at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. And, after describing the predominance standard, the Court cautioned that federal courts must consider the problem of racial gerrymandering in light of "the intrusive *1263 potential of judicial intervention into the legislative realm." Id., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. These concerns about intruding on the political process should have been a clear sign to retreat. Instead, the Court forged ahead to adopt a constitutionally suspect compromise.

The racial predominance standard does not even purport to be consistent with the colorblind Constitution. The Miller Court simply borrowed that standard from the District Court's flawed opinion below. The Court endorsed the District Court's decision "to require strict scrutiny whenever race is the 'overriding, predominant force' in the redistricting process." Id., at 909, 917, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (quoting 58 Johnson v. Miller, 864 F.Supp. 1354, 1372 (SD Ga. 1994)). But, the District Court's opinion could not have been a stronger rejection of our colorblind Constitution. It acknowledged that the racial predominance standard allowed legislatures to "intentionally consider race in redistricting—and even alter the occasional line in keeping with that consideration—without incurring constitutional review." Id., at 1373. But, the District Court reasoned, "[b]oth the Supreme Court and Congress have already admitted that the Constitution is not genuinely 'color-blind.' " Id., at 1374. This provenance underscores the inconsistency of the racial predominance standard with our colorblind Constitution.

Any use of race in drawing political districts—no matter how minor—must be justified by a compelling interest. The Court's insistence on hearing nonjusticiable districting claims leads it to disregard that principle in favor of a distorted standard that legitimizes racial classifications. If the Court is truly concerned about intruding on the political process, it should acknowledge that districting is a political question and vacate the field.

B

The Court's standard for vote dilution claims is similarly flawed, because it requires judges to engage in racial stereotyping. As I have explained, the Constitution does not define a baseline of effective representation by which to evaluate the dilution of a vote. Supra, at 1256 - 1258. The Court has purported to fill that gap by looking to "minority voters' ability, as a group, 'to elect the candidate of their choice.' " Shaw, 509 U.S. at 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (quoting Allen, 393 U.S. at 569, 89 S.Ct. 817). Simply put, the lack of a manageable vote dilution standard has led the Court to fall back on generalized expectations about members of minority groups.

"Our constitutional history does not tolerate [the] choice" to treat as "the touchstone of an individual's identity ... the color of their skin." Harvard College, 600 U.S. at 231, 143 S.Ct. 2141. It 59 therefore does not permit courts to make judgments about what candidate "minority voters as a group" would choose. That assessment requires a court to assume that "members of racial and ethnic groups must all think alike on important matters of public policy." Holder, 512 U.S. at 903, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). And, it requires a court to construct a caricature of the racial group to determine —in the abstract—the attributes that define "the candidate of its choice." The Constitution does not indulge the belief that members of racial minorities "always (or even consistently) express some characteristic minority viewpoint on any issue." Harvard College, 600 U.S. at 219, 143 S.Ct. 2141 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The racial stereotyping encouraged by our vote dilution precedents is pronounced here. To establish vote dilution, the plaintiffs point to the District Court's observation that recent elections in the district " 'were close, with less than one percent 1264 separating the candidates,' so increasing the district's Black population to 20% 'would produce a "toss up" district' " instead of a Republican one. Brief for Appellees 64. But, that reasoning simply equates the ability of black South Carolinians to elect the candidate of their choice with their ability to elect a Democrat—an exercise in racial stereotyping. The mere fact that "members of a racial group tend to prefer the same candidates" is not license to treat that correlation as an absolute truth. Holder, 512 U.S. at 904, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). Plaintiffs make no effort to explore whether the affinity of the district's black population toward the Democratic Party "might be the product of similar socioeconomic interests rather than some other factor related to race." Ibid. They instead proceed on the "working assumption that racial groups can be conceived of largely as political interest groups." Id., at 905, 114 S.Ct. 2581. The Constitution forbids such an assumption.

The plaintiffs' stereotyping does not stop there. They contend that their vote dilution claim also finds support in an expert report evaluating the ability of black South Carolinians *60 to elect the candidate of their choice. That expert based her conclusion on the results of "elections with Black candidates on the ballot." Brief for Appellees 64. The plaintiffs' argument therefore assumes that the "candidate of choice" for black voters is simply a black candidate. But, the stereotyping is worse than that. In 2016, South Carolina reelected Republican Tim Scott to the United States Senate; Scott is the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction. The plaintiffs and their expert nonetheless decided that this race was not "considered probative for Black electoral opportunity." Supp. App. to Juris. Statement 174a. Plaintiffs' argument therefore combines two stereotypes by assuming that black South Carolinians can be properly represented only by a black Democrat.

Such stereotyping is, of course, not limited to this case or black voters. For example, a District Court recently concluded that Hispanic voters in a majority-Hispanic district lacked an opportunity to elect the candidate of their choice, even though the district elected a Hispanic Republican. Soto Palmer v. Hobbs, 686 F.Supp.3d 1213, 1224-26, 1230-31, 1234-35 (WD Wash. 2023). The court later purported to correct the lack of Hispanic opportunity by imposing a remedial map that made the district "substantially more Democratic," but slightly less Hispanic. Soto Palmer, 2024 WL 1138939, *2, *5 (Mar. 15, 2024). In short, the court concluded that securing the rights of Hispanic voters required replacing some of those voters with non-Hispanic Democrats. That dismissive attitude toward non-Democratic members of minority groups exemplifies the tendency of the Court's race-obsessed jurisprudence to "balkanize us into competing racial factions." Shaw, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816. The Court should correct course now before it inflicts further damage.

The vote dilution analysis in this case inevitably reduces black Charlestonians to partisan pawns and racial tokens. The analysis is demeaning to the courts asked to perform it, *61 to say nothing of the black voters that it stereotypes. "The assumptions upon which our vote dilution decisions have been based should be repugnant to any nation that strives for the ideal of a color-blind Constitution." Holder, 512 U.S. at 905–906, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

C

The Court's insistence on adjudicating racial gerrymandering and vote dilution claims has also tempted it to ignore constitutional 1265 limits on its remedial powers. Ultimately, the only remedy for the constitutional injuries caused by an illegally drawn map is a new map. But, federal courts lack "the power to create remedies previously unknown to equity jurisprudence." Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S. A. v. Alliance Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308, 332, 119 S.Ct. 1961, 144 L.Ed.2d 319 (1999). And, there is no "indication that the Framers had ever heard of courts" playing any role in resolving electoral districting problems. Rucho, 588 U.S. at 699, 139 S.Ct. 2484. The power to redraw a States' electoral districts therefore exceeds "the jurisdiction in equity exercised by the High Court of Chancery in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and the enactment of the original Judiciary Act." Grupo Mexicano, 527 U.S. at 318, 119 S.Ct. 1961 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The Court once recognized its limited equitable powers in this area. We previously acknowledged that "[o]f course no court can affirmatively re-map [a State's] districts so as to bring them more in conformity with the standards of fairness for a representative system. At best we could only declare the existing electoral system invalid." Colegrove v. Green, 328 U.S. 549, 553, 66 S.Ct. 1198, 90 L.Ed. 1432 (1946) (opinion of Frankfurter, J.); see also Baker, 369 U.S. at 328, 82 S.Ct. 691 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting) ("Surely a Federal District Court could not itself remap the State").

The view of equity required to justify a judicial map-drawing power emerged only in the 1950s. The Court's "impatience with the pace of desegregation" caused by resistance to Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954), 62 "led us to approve ... extraordinary remedial measures," Missouri v. Jenkins, 515 U.S. 70, 125, 115 S.Ct. 2038, 132 L.Ed.2d 63 (1995) (THOMAS, J., concurring). In the follow-on case to Brown, the Court considered "the manner in which relief [was] to be accorded" for vindication of "the fundamental principle that racial discrimination in public education is unconstitutional." Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 298, 75 S.Ct. 753, 99 L.Ed. 1083 (1955) (Brown II). In doing so, the Court took a boundless view of equitable remedies, describing equity as being "characterized by a practical flexibility in shaping its remedies and by a facility for adjusting and reconciling public and private needs." Id., at 300, 75 S.Ct. 753 (footnote omitted). That understanding may have justified temporary measures to "overcome the widespread resistance to the dictates of the Constitution" prevalent at that time, but, as a general matter, "[s]uch extravagant uses of judicial power are at odds with the history and tradition of the equity power and the Framers' design." Jenkins, 515 U.S. at 125–126, 115 S.Ct. 2038 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). Federal courts have the power to grant only the equitable relief "traditionally accorded by courts of equity," not the flexible power to invent whatever new remedies may seem useful at the time. Grupo Mexicano, 527 U.S. at 319, 119 S.Ct. 1961.

Redistricting remedies rest on the same questionable understanding of equitable power. No court has explained where the power to draw a replacement map comes from, but all now assume it may be exercised as a matter of course. The most consideration this Court has given to the question, if it can be called consideration, was in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506. In that case, the Court foreswore any attempt to "consider ... the difficult question of the proper remedial devices which federal courts should utilize in state legislative reapportionment cases," but nonetheless upheld, as an act of "proper judicial restraint," the District Court "ordering its own temporary *1266 reapportionment plan." Id., at 585–586, 84 S.Ct. 1362. The Court's only support for that conclusion was the naked statement in Justice Douglas's Baker concurrence that " 'any 63 relief accorded can be fashioned in the light of well-known principles of equity.' " Reynolds, 377 U.S. at 585, 84 S.Ct. 1362 (quoting 369 U.S. at 250, 82 S.Ct. 691). Douglas's statement is an obvious fallback to the "practical flexibility" extolled as a "traditional attribut[e] of equity power" in Brown II, 349 U.S. at 300, 75 S.Ct. 753. The explanation is wholly inadequate; the Court has never attempted to ground the map-drawing power in "the jurisdiction in equity exercised by the High Court of Chancery in England" in 1789. Grupo Mexicano, 527 U.S. at 318, 119 S.Ct. 1961 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The lack of a historically grounded map-drawing remedy is an enormous problem for districting claims, because no historically supportable remedy can correct an improperly drawn district. The most promising option is "[t]he negative injunction remedy against state officials countenanced in Ex parte Young," a "standard tool of equity that federal courts have authority to entertain under their traditional equitable jurisdiction." Whole Woman's Health v. Jackson, 595 U. S. 30, 53, 142 S.Ct. 522, 211 L.Ed.2d 316 (2021) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted); see also Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 28 S.Ct. 441, 52 L.Ed. 714 (1908). The Court has "long held that federal courts may in some circumstances grant injunctive relief against state officers who are violating, or planning to violate, federal law." Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Center, Inc., 575 U.S. 320, 326, 135 S.Ct. 1378, 191 L.Ed.2d 471 (2015).

But, a negative-injunction remedy does not actually redress racial gerrymandering or vote dilution, for two reasons. First, it is not apparent that an Ex parte Young injunction can prevent a state election official from conducting an election under an unconstitutional map, or force him to draw a new map. Such an injunction "permits a party to assert in equity a defense that would otherwise have been available in the State's enforcement proceedings at law," and it "extends no further than permitting private parties in some circumstances to prevent state officials from bringing an action to enforce a state law that is contrary to federal 64 law." Whole Woman's Health, 595 U. S., at 53, 142 S.Ct. 522 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (alteration and internal quotation marks omitted). It is thus not clear that such an injunction could stop an election. Second, even if it is possible to enjoin state officials from conducting an election, it is questionable whether that remedy is ever "equitable." Our system of government depends on regular elections; putting elections indefinitely on hold may do more harm than good. Cf. Baker, 369 U.S. at 327, 82 S.Ct. 691 (opinion of Frankfurter, J.) ("An injunction restraining a general election unless the legislature reapportions would paralyze the critical centers of a State's political system and threaten political dislocation whose consequences are not foreseeable"). Ultimately, to remedy racial gerrymandering or vote dilution, someone must draw a new map. I can find no explanation why that "someone" can be a federal court.

D

The Court's attempts to adjudicate the impossible have put the States in an untenable position. We have hesitated to subject States to the " ' "competing hazards of liability" ' " that arise from the fact that the Constitution "restricts consideration of race and the [Voting Rights Act] demands consideration of race." *1267 Abbott v. Perez, 585 U.S. 579, 587, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018) (quoting Vera, 517 U.S. at 977, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (plurality opinion)). But, the lack of manageable standards for districting claims and the unfortunate trajectory of the Court's Voting Rights Act precedents combine to make it impossible for States to navigate these hazards.

Last Term, the Court held that the Voting Rights Act required Alabama to draw a map that would give black Alabamians a majority in two of the State's seven congressional districts. Because black Alabamians make up less than two-sevenths of the State's population, such a map could result only from an obsessive focus on race in the map-drawing process. See Allen, 599 U.S. at 56, 143 S.Ct. 1487 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). For example, one of the plaintiffs' experts used a race-neutral 65 algorithm to generate 2 million random maps; not a single map yielded two majority-black districts. Id., at 58–59, 143 S.Ct. 1487. In this case, however, South Carolina faced a real risk of constitutional liability based on allegations that it considered race too heavily in drawing a district that was 17% black instead of 20%.

In fact, the Court recently granted emergency relief after a State failed to thread the impossible needle created by our voting-rights precedents. Voters in Louisiana challenged the State's 2022 congressional map, arguing that "Louisiana was required under the Voting Rights Act to create a second black-majority district." Robinson v. Ardoin, 86 F.4th 574, 585 (CA5 2023). The Fifth Circuit concluded that the plaintiffs were likely to succeed on their Voting Rights Act claim. Louisiana argued that, under the Voting Rights Act, "the possibility of drawing a majority-minority district does not require the drawing of the district," but the court pointed to our decision in Allen to reject that contention. 86 F.4th at 599. Louisiana then held a special legislative session and adopted a new map that "established a second majority-Black congressional district to resolve the [Voting Rights Act] litigation." Callais v. Landry, —— F. Supp. 3d ——, ——, 2024 WL 1903930, *1 (WD La., Apr. 30, 2024). The result? A different group of voters brought constitutional gerrymandering and vote-dilution claims against the State. Id., at ——–——, 2024 WL 1903930, at *6–*7. That suit was also successful. A District Court found that race predominated in Louisiana's process of adding the second majority-minority district, and enjoined the use of the new map. Id., at ——, ——, 2024 WL 1903930, at *17, *24. After the State argued that the proximity of the District Court's order to important election deadlines would cause "election chaos," Emergency Application in No. 23A1002, p. 19, we stayed the order, Order in No. 23A1002, 601 U. S. —— (2024) (citing Purcell v. Gonzalez, 549 U.S. 1, 127 S.Ct. 5, 166 L.Ed.2d 1 (2006) (per curiam)).

As these cases make clear, this Court's jurisprudence puts States in a lose-lose situation. Taken together, our precedents 66 stand for the rule that States must consider race just enough in drawing districts. And, what "just enough" means depends on a federal court's answers to judicially unanswerable questions about the proper way to apply the State's traditional districting principles, or about the groupwide preferences of racial minorities in the State. There is no density of minority voters that this Court's jurisprudence cannot turn into a constitutional controversy. We have extracted years of litigation from every districting cycle, with little to show for it. The Court's involvement in congressional districting is unjustified and counterproductive.

* * *

"When, under our direction, federal courts are engaged in methodologically *1268 carving the country into racially designated electoral districts, it is imperative that we stop to consider whether the course we have charted for the Nation is the one" required by the Constitution. Holder, 512 U.S. at 945, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). The Constitution provides courts no power to draw districts, let alone any standards by which they can attempt to do so. And, it does not authorize courts to engage in the race-based reasoning that has come to dominate our voting-rights precedents. It is well past time for the Court to return these political issues where they belong—the political branches.

Justice KAGAN, with whom Justice SOTOMAYOR and Justice JACKSON join, dissenting.

This voting case, as the Court acknowledges, turns on a quintessential factual dispute: Did South Carolina rely on racial data to reconfigure the State's Congressional District 1? The parties here agree that the South Carolina Legislature wanted to make District 1 more Republican. They further agree that in pursuit of that aim, the legislature moved nearly 200,000 people into or out of the district. What the parties disagree about is how the people expelled from the 67 district were chosen. The State contends that its mapmakers looked exclusively at data from the last election and targeted people who had voted Democratic. If that is true, the State's actions (however unsavory and undemocratic) are immune from federal constitutional challenge. The Challengers, though, offer a different account. They say that the mapmakers, not content with what the election data revealed, also reviewed and heavily relied on racial data—thus exploiting the well-known correlation between race and voting behavior. And if that is true, the Challengers have a good constitutional claim, because the Equal Protection Clause forbids basing election districts mainly on race in order to achieve partisan aims. See Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 291, and n. 1, 308, n. 7, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 914, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995). So the key question again: In drawing District 1, did the mapmakers consider voting data alone, or did they also closely attend and respond to which residents were Black and which were White?

A three-judge District Court undertook to resolve that factual dispute. And the court, over nearly a year, did everything one could ask to carry out its charge. After overseeing broad discovery, the court held a 9-day trial, featuring some two dozen witnesses and hundreds of exhibits. It evaluated evidence about South Carolina geography and politics. It heard first-hand testimony about the redistricting process. And it considered the views of statistical experts on how the State's new district lines could—and could not—have come about. In the end, the court had to decide between two starkly different stories, backed by opposing bodies of evidence. One side you know from having read the majority opinion: The state officials repeatedly denied using race in choosing the people kicked out of District 1, insisting that they based their decisions on political data alone. The other side you have not yet heard, except in the sketchiest of terms. It is that the State's mapmakers were experienced and skilled in the use of racial data to draw electoral 68 maps; that they configured their mapmaking software to show how any change made to the district would affect its racial composition; that the racial make-up they landed on was precisely what they needed, to the decimal point, to achieve their partisan goals; and that their politics-only story could not account, as a statistical matter, for their large-scale exclusion of African-American citizens. Faced with that proof, all three judges agreed: *1269 The Challengers' version of events was the more credible. The court, to put the matter bluntly, did not believe the state officials. It thought they had gerrymandered District 1 by race.

In reviewing those conclusions, the majority goes seriously wrong. Factfinding about electoral districting, as about other matters, is reversible "only for clear error." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 293, 137 S.Ct. 1455. This Court must give a district court's view of events "significant deference," which means we must uphold it so long as it is "plausible." Ibid. Under that standard, South Carolina should now have to redraw District 1. As I'll detail, the Challengers introduced more than enough evidence of racial gerrymandering to support the District Court's judgment. The majority's attempt to explain its contrary result fails at every turn. The majority picks and chooses evidence to its liking; ignores or minimizes less convenient proof; disdains the panel's judgments about witness credibility; and makes a series of mistakes about expert opinions. The majority declares that it knows better than the District Court what happened in a South Carolina map-drawing room to produce District 1. But the proof is in the pudding: On page after page, the majority's opinion betrays its distance from, and lack of familiarity with, the events and evidence central to this case.

Yet there is worse: The majority cannot begin to justify its ruling on the facts without in two ways reworking the law—each to impede racial-gerrymandering cases generally. First, the majority, though ostensibly using the clear-error standard, effectively inverts it whenever a trial court rules 69 against a redistricting State. In the majority's version, all the deference that should go to the court's factual findings for the plaintiffs instead goes to the losing defendant, because it is presumed to act in good faith. See ante, at 1235 - 1236. So the wrong side gets the benefit of the doubt: Any "possibility" that favors the State is treated as "dispositive." Ante, at 1241. Second, the majority invents a new rule of evidence to burden plaintiffs in racial-gerrymandering cases. As of today, courts must draw an adverse inference against those plaintiffs when they do not submit a so-called alternative map—no matter how much proof of a constitutional violation they otherwise present. See ante, at 1249 - 1250. Such micro-management of a plaintiff 's case is elsewhere unheard of in constitutional litigation. But as with its upside-down application of clear-error review, the majority is intent on changing the usual rules when it comes to addressing racial-gerrymandering claims.

To be fair, we have seen all this once before—except that it was in a dissent. Just seven years ago, this Court decided another racial-gerrymandering case, strikingly similar to this one. In Cooper v. Harris, the Court rejected the State's request for an alternative-map requirement; the dissent vehemently objected. See 581 U.S. at 318, 137 S.Ct. 1455; id., at 334–337, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (ALITO, J., dissenting). The Court applied normal clear-error review, deferring to all plausible trial court findings. See id., at 293, 137 S.Ct. 1455. The dissent, invoking a presumption of good faith, instead deferred to all plausible arguments of the losing State defendant. See id., at 357, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (ALITO, J., dissenting). Today, for all practical purposes, the Cooper dissent becomes the law.

Perhaps most dispiriting is what lies behind the Court's new approach—its special rules to specially disadvantage suits to remedy race-based redistricting. The Cooper dissent thought plaintiffs would use racial-gerrymandering actions as "weapons of political warfare." Id., at 335, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (ALITO, J., dissenting). And it lamented *1270 that courts finding gerrymanders 70 were "accus[ing]" States of "offensive and demeaning conduct." Id., at 334, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (internal quotation marks omitted). So the problem was more with challenging racial gerrymanders than with putting them into place. Today, that view becomes central to the majority opinion. See ante, at 1236. The suspicion, and indeed derision, of suits brought to stop racial gerrymanders are self-evident; the intent to insulate States from those suits no less so. But consider what this altered perspective misses. That a State may in fact have engaged in such "offensive and demeaning" conduct. That it may have sorted citizens by their race with respect to the most fundamental of all their political rights. That it may have done so for no reason other than to achieve partisan gain. And here, that a three-judge court unanimously found all this to have occurred.

The proper response to this case is not to throw up novel roadblocks enabling South Carolina to continue dividing citizens along racial lines. It is to respect the plausible—no, the more than plausible—findings of the District Court that the State engaged in race-based districting. And to tell the State that it must redraw District 1, this time without targeting African-American citizens.

I

Begin with the law, and more particularly the usual standard of review. This Court all the time recites the words: "only for clear error." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 293, 309, 137 S.Ct. 1455. And those words always mean (or anyway, always meant) the same thing. Under the clear-error standard, a lower court's factual findings "warrant[ ] significant deference." Id., at 293, 137 S.Ct. 1455. We do not rubber stamp those findings, but we affirm them so long as they are "plausible" in light of the full record. Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 574, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985). And that is so even if, left to our own devices, we "would have decided the [matter] differently." Id., at 573, 105 S.Ct. 1504. We can reverse only when "left with the definite and firm conviction 71 that a mistake has been committed." Ibid. And nowhere is that high bar higher than when witness credibility is at issue. A trial court's judgment about whether a witness is telling the truth is entitled to "singular deference." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 309, 137 S.Ct. 1455.

The reasons for thus deferring to trial court factfinding are equally well-settled. Trial courts are the judiciary's factfinding specialists. They live with a case for months or years, supervising discovery, ruling on the admission of expert opinions, and watching how the evidence unfolds. They preside over the trial and see the live witnesses (24 in this case) up close. They can observe "the variations in demeanor and tone" that "bear so heavily" on credibility judgments. Anderson, 470 U.S. at 575, 105 S.Ct. 1504. They know the ins and outs of often massive records. (This case boasts, for example, a 2,122-page trial transcript, a 1,694-page compilation of key deposition testimony, and (as one judge remarked) too many exhibits to fit in the courtroom. No. 3:21–cv–3302 (D SC), ECF Doc. 503, p. 23.) Chances are, then, that a trial court will do better factfinding than an appellate court parachuting in at the last moment. The clear-error standard is a recognition of comparative competence. And it is a forced dose of humility—a virtue which sometimes doesn't come naturally to appellate courts. Apply that last point to this Court in particular. The clear-error standard tells us that when we disagree with a trial court's view of the facts, we are the ones likely to be wrong. So we should make triple sure that we are correcting, not creating, an error before we reverse.

1271 Cooper illustrates how the ordinary clear-error standard works in districting litigation. The question there, as here, was whether a state legislature chose voters for a congressional district based on their race, or instead based on their past political choices. The three-judge District Court found that race accounted for the new district lines. On review, we decided the evidence "adequately support[ed]" that conclusion. *72 581 U.S. at 309, 137 S.Ct. 1455. As that phrasing suggests, we nowhere claimed the court was actually right. To the contrary, we observed that in this "thoroughly two-sided case," both views of the evidence were "plausible" and "permissible," and we declined to choose between them. Id., at 299, 307, n. 6, 137 S.Ct. 1455; see id., at 316–317, 137 S.Ct. 1455 ("Maybe we would have evaluated the testimony differently had we presided over the trial; or then again, maybe we would not have"). Our decision followed from the deference we thought owed to the District Court. Under clear-error review, we noted, "we will not take it upon ourselves to weigh the trial evidence as if we were the first to hear it." Id., at 316, 137 S.Ct. 1455. Because the District Court's view was "plausible in light of the full record," it "must govern"—even if another were "equally or more so." Id., at 293, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Today's decision could not be more different. To be sure, the majority recites the clear-error standard. See ante, at 1240. But from then on, the majority ignores it—no, worse, does the opposite of what the standard commands. It is not just that the majority refuses to defer to the District Court's findings in favor of the Challengers. It is that the majority defers to the assertions of the State defendants—the side that lost below. Invoking a "presumption of legislative good faith," the majority insists that "when confronted with evidence that could plausibly support multiple conclusions," a court must "draw the inference that cuts" in the State's favor. Ante, at 1236. So over and over the majority puts its thumb on the scale against the District Court. Each time it takes up a piece of evidence, the majority declares that there is a "possibility" of seeing it the State's way. Ante, at 1241, 1243 - 1244. And that possibility is "dispositive"; because of it, the State's version of the facts must control. Ante, at 1241 - 1242; see also, e.g., ante, at 1235 - 1236, 1242, 1245 (similarly awarding points to the State because its claims were "plausible," even if the Challengers' were more so). In effect, the majority's demand for deference to the State overrides clear-error review's *73 call for deference to the trial court. If the District Court wants deference, it had better just rule for the State.

That approach conflicts with this Court's precedent. Indeed, it has only ever appeared in the Cooper ... dissent. There too, Justice ALITO argued for reversing the trial court's view of evidence because it was not "the only plausible interpretation." 581 U.S. at 357, 137 S.Ct. 1455. There too, he called for accepting the State's contrary view because the evidence could "as easily be understood" that way. Ibid.; see id., at 345, 350, 352, 358–359, 137 S.Ct. 1455. The Cooper Court noticed—and disapproved. The dissent, it said, "repeatedly flips the appropriate standard of review," to give the State rather than the trial court deference. Id., at 309 137 S.Ct. 1455. But that move reflected "an elemental error": There is no "super-charged, pro-State presumption on appeal, trumping clear error review." Ibid. Of course clear-error review takes into account the standard of proof in the trial court. See ante, at 1249, n. 11. But that standard is not transformed because of the good-faith presumption. In our precedents, that presumption tells a court not to assume a districting plan is flawed or to limit the State's opportunities to defend it. 1272 See Abbott v. Perez, 585 U.S. 579, 603, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018) (the presumption requires a plan's challengers to bear the burden of proof); Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541, 553, 119 S.Ct. 1545, 143 L.Ed.2d 731 (1999) (the presumption may suggest sending a case to trial, rather than rejecting a plan on summary judgment). And the presumption reminds a court that it is a serious matter to find a State in breach of the Constitution. See Miller, 515 U.S. at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. But that is all. Nothing in our decisions suggests that a trial court must resolve every plausibly disputed factual issue for the State (as if we could hardly imagine officials violating the law). And still less do our decisions suggest that the trial court's factual findings are deprived of deference on appeal. To the contrary, as Cooper stated, clear-error review of those findings proceeds just as usual, unaffected by the presumption. See 581 U.S. at 309, n. 8, 137 S.Ct. 1455; see *74 also Miller, 515 U.S. at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (good faith is presumed "until a claimant makes a showing" of "race-based decisionmaking" (emphasis added)).

The majority's deeper reasons for specially indulging the State also clash with this Court's decisions. In the majority's view, claims of racial gerrymanders are often "weapons of political warfare," using courts for illegitimate ends. Ante, at 1236. And when courts vindicate those claims, they "accus[e]" States of "offensive and demeaning conduct," bearing "an uncomfortable resemblance to political apartheid," ibid.—an apparently intolerable insult even when justified. Those sentiments, again, come straight out of the dissent in Cooper. See 581 U.S. at 334–335, 137 S.Ct. 1455. The Court there took a different view, more reflective of our precedents. See id., at 319 137 S.Ct. 1455. Time and again, this Court has noted the important role suits like this one play in stopping the unlawful race-based division of citizens into electoral districts. See, e.g., Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 187, 137 S.Ct. 788, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017). For sorting of that kind does occur—sometimes (as here) to serve partisan goals, occasionally just to suppress the political influence of minority voters. See Cooper, 581 U.S. at 319, n. 15, 137 S.Ct. 1455. And when it does, the Court has held, it requires a judicial response. See, e.g., Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993). If calling out a racial gerrymander "accus[es]" a State of a grave wrong, then so be it. This Court is not supposed to be so fearful of telling discriminators, including States, to stop discriminating. In other recent decisions, the Court has prided itself on halting race-based decision-making wherever it arises—even though serving far more commendable goals than partisan advantage. See, e.g., Students for Fair Admissions, Inc. v. President and Fellows of Harvard College, 600 U.S. 181, 213–214, 143 S.Ct. 2141, 216 L.Ed.2d 857 (2023). It is not the ordinary thing to agonize so much about giving "offens[e]" to a discriminating State. Ante, at 1236.

75 And it is not the right thing either. In adopting its novel credit-the-losing-State approach, the majority thwarts efforts to undo a pernicious kind of race-based discrimination. See Shaw, 509 U.S. at 643, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (recognizing racial gerrymanders as "odious"). True enough, as the majority highlights, that the judicial system fails when a State is wrongly found to have gerrymandered a district. But the system fails as badly or worse when a State that has gerrymandered a district gets away with it. This Court has prohibited race-based gerrymanders for a reason: They divide citizens on racial lines to engineer the results of elections (without the justification of protecting minority voters' *1273 rights). And litigation to remedy that harm is already none too easy. Because of the complex political context, this Court has required challengers of electoral maps to show that race was not just a single but the "predominant" factor in moving voters between districts. Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 187, 137 S.Ct. 788. That is, and is meant to be, a demanding burden. But once plaintiffs have met it to a three-judge district court's satisfaction, their hardest job should be done. They should not have to face an upside-down form of clear-error review, in which this Court reverses if it decides there is a "possibility" of seeing the evidence the State's way. Ante, at 1241. The principal effect of that novel rule will be to defeat valid voting-discrimination claims.

And the majority is not yet done putting uncommon burdens on gerrymandered plaintiffs. From now on, those plaintiffs will also be subject to an "adverse inference" unless they present a specific form of evidence—an "alternative map" that would "achieve[the State's] legitimate political objectives" while "producing significantly greater racial balance." Ante, at 1249 - 1250 (internal quotation marks omitted). And that inference gives every sign of packing a wallop. The majority labels it "dispositive in many, if not most, cases," except when the plaintiff presents (1) direct evidence 76 of a gerrymander (say, an email admitting to the targeting of Black voters) or (2) "some extraordinarily powerful circumstantial evidence such as the strangely irregular twenty-eight-sided district lines" in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960). Ante, at 1250 (internal quotation marks omitted). Think about that last category, as the majority frames it. The majority must go back 65 years, to the most grotesque racial gerrymander in the U. S. Reports, to find a case based on circumstantial evidence that could have survived its adverse inference. How better to make the point: The majority's new evidentiary rule is meant to scuttle gerrymandering cases.

Odd that the majority fails to mention a seemingly pertinent fact: Cooper expressly rejected a similar demand that a plaintiff alleging a gerrymander submit an alternative map. In that case, North Carolina argued that "[w]hen race and politics are competing explanations of a district's lines," the challenger must introduce "an alternative map that achieves the legislature's political objectives while improving racial balance." 581 U.S. at 317, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (alterations omitted). The Cooper dissent agreed. See id., at 332–337, 137 S.Ct. 1455. The Cooper Court did not. See id., at 317–322, 137 S.Ct. 1455. The Court freely acknowledged that such a map could be good evidence of a racial gerrymander. See id., at 317, 137 S.Ct. 1455. So too, it recognized "as a practical matter" that a plaintiff with an otherwise weak case would not prevail without a map. Id., at 319, 137 S.Ct. 1455.[1] 77 But we could not have been more adamant in rebuffing the State's proposed *1274 requirement. "[I]n no area of our equal protection law," we reasoned, "have we forced plaintiffs to submit one particular form of proof." Ibid. And we were not about to start. A "plaintiff 's task" in a gerrymander case, we stated, "is simply to persuade the trial court—without any special evidentiary prerequisite"—that race was the predominant factor in redistricting voters. Id., at 318, 137 S.Ct. 1455. Like all other submissions in a gerrymandering case—the "testimony of government officials," proof about the data available to mapmakers, and "expert analysis"—"[a]n alternative map is merely an evidentiary tool." Id., at 318–319, 137 S.Ct. 1455. So "neither [a map's] presence nor its absence can itself resolve a racial gerrymandering claim." Id., at 319, 137 S.Ct. 1455.

The majority cannot evade Cooper's force by casting today's holding as an "adverse inference" rule rather than a simple requirement. First, there is precious little difference between the two. Given the apparent strength of the majority's adverse inference, few litigants will feel free to proceed without commissioning alternative maps. The majority's inference is effectively a requirement, whether or not it goes by that label. And anyway, Cooper's reasoning easily encompasses —which is to say forbids—the majority's new inference rule. The point in Cooper was to treat maps equivalently to—rather than "elevate" them above—other forms of evidence. Id., at 318, 137 S.Ct. 1455. So if the plaintiff 's non-map evidence supports a claim, the Court stated, the absence of a map "does not matter." Ibid. The Cooper dissent well understood the point. No less than three times, the dissent quoted the Court's "does not matter" line, arguing vociferously that a map's absence should matter, if not in all cases, at least in all but "exceptional ones." Id., at 336, 137 S.Ct. 1455; see 78 id., at 329, 359, 137 S.Ct. 1455. The dissent lost that battle, but now succeeds in overturning the essence of Cooper's map ruling.

The majority-née-dissent's reasons for elevating maps above other evidence have not improved since Cooper held to the contrary. The majority states that maps can serve as a good way to undermine a State's "it was all politics" defense. See ante, at 1249 - 1250. No argument there: The Cooper Court also said as much. 581 U.S. at 317, 137 S.Ct. 1455. But it went on to say that maps "are hardly the only means" of attacking such a defense—as this case well shows. Id., at 318, 137 S.Ct. 1455; see infra, at 1275 - 1286. The majority also insists that plaintiffs can "easily churn out" alternative maps at "little marginal cost." Ante, at 1250 (quoting, of course, the Cooper dissent). Maybe or maybe not; either way, the Cooper Court said, the matter is irrelevant: We have no "warrant to demand" that plaintiffs jump through "evidentiary hoops" of our creation, "whether the exercise would cost a hundred dollars or a million, a week's more time or a year's," if they can otherwise prove that race predominated in drawing district lines. 581 U.S. at 319, n. 15, 137 S.Ct. 1455.[2] Finally, the majority suggests that all plaintiffs with serious gerrymandering *1275 cases should have known to produce an alternative map. See ante, at 1235 - 1236. But that assertion requires airbrushing Cooper out of our caselaw. What plaintiffs should have known after Cooper was that they could but need not submit an alternative map. The majority today punishes the Challengers for thinking that this Court would be good to its word.

79 In any event, the Challengers had an understandable reason for not offering the kind of map the majority demands. The point of such a map, as the majority explains, is to help figure out whether race or politics accounts for districting lines. See ante, at 1249 - 1250. That function becomes important—so a map makes sense—only if a State in fact defends its plan as arising from political considerations. At trial, South Carolina indeed adopted that defense. But it was not clear beforehand, when the plaintiffs were developing their evidence for trial, that the State would do so. The plain fact is, politicians don't like admitting to partisan gerrymanders: They often deny them as aggressively as they draw them. That is because "[e]xcessive partisanship in districting" is–and is thought by voters to be—"incompatible with democratic principles." Rucho v. Common Cause, 588 U.S. 684, 718, 139 S.Ct. 2484, 204 L.Ed.2d 931 (2019). So it is scarcely surprising that, during legislative debate, the districting plan's sponsor responded to charges of a partisan gerrymander by asserting "that's really not the case." J. S. A. Supp. 286a.[3] Or that during pretrial proceedings key State witnesses continued to deny partisan motives. Luke Rankin, the Republican chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, testified in discovery that it was not "a goal of [his] to make" District 1 "more reliably republican." Id., at 425a. Likewise, a Republican member of the House Redistricting Committee testified that he "never considered partisan gain as a goal" of redistricting, and "never" heard "anyone else" admit that goal either. Id., at 409a–410a. And the Senate Redistricting Subcommittee's counsel swore 80 that there was "no effort" to make District 1 "more Republican leaning." Id., at 392a. So the Challengers, prior to trial, were not on notice of a partisanship defense. The State, to be sure, changed tack in the end: A strong case made by plaintiffs can powerfully concentrate a defendant's mind. But by that time, the Challengers' mapmaker (Dr. Kosuke Imai) had completed his work, and the trial had begun.

Even before looking at the trial evidence, the majority thus places the Challengers in a deep hole. Although this Court recently disclaimed any need for an alternative map, the majority today draws an adverse inference from such a map's absence. And contrary to settled practice, the majority decrees that, even on clear-error review of a ruling for the Challengers, the State will emerge victorious if its version of events is so much as possible. Combine those two facets of the majority's approach, and the trial evidence fades into insignificance. A legal twist here and a legal bend there ensure that the majority need show no respect for the three-judge District Court's well-considered factual findings.

II

Normal clear-error review would lead to a different outcome. The District Court *1276 faced a factual question: Did the State rely significantly on racial data in drawing its new District 1? Based on the mountains of evidence presented, the court decided that the State had done so. That finding was reasonable, and deserves to be affirmed.

As the majority explains, this case concerns changes that South Carolina made in its most recent redistricting to Congressional District 1. See ante, at 1236 - 1240. Under the pre-existing map, District 1 was a thin strip of land stretching along the Atlantic Coast. See Appendix, infra, at 1286 - 1287, Figure 1 (2011 Congressional Map). It was bordered to the northwest by District 6, the State's only majority-Black district. See ibid.; J. S. A. 429a. After the 2020 census, South 81 Carolina had to redraw both those districts to comply with the Constitution's one-person, one-vote requirement. District 1 was overpopulated by about 88,000 people, and District 6 was underpopulated by about 85,000. The State chose, though, not to make a one-way transfer of residents from the overpopulated to the underpopulated district. To unite two counties, the State first moved around 53,000 residents from (the underpopulated) District 6 into (the overpopulated) District 1. That shift, of course, exacerbated the problem: The State now needed to transfer some 140,000 residents in the opposite direction. It did so mainly by moving a large chunk of Charleston County from District 1 to District 6.

And here is the rub—the thing that created this case. The part of the county that the legislature moved out of District 1 was disproportionately Black, and by a lot. The mapmakers targeted several heavily Black neighborhoods in North Charleston, while leaving many heavily White neighborhoods alone. See id., at 261a–262a. And no matter how you slice the numbers, the effects were stark. More than 60% of Black Charleston County residents previously in District 1 were relocated to District 6. 649 F.Supp.3d 177, 189 (DSC 2023). Of the 11 precincts with the largest Black populations, 10 were gone. Ibid. Overall, the proportion of African Americans in the excised part of the county (23.8%) was more than twice as high as in the remaining part (10.3%). See id., at 190; Supp. App. 153a. The upshot was that 79% of Charleston County's Black population now found itself in District 6, whereas only 53% had been there before. See 649 F.Supp.3d at 190, and n. 9. As the State's main mapmaker —and star witness—acknowledged, the new lines created a "tremendous [racial] disparity" in comparison to the old districting plan. J. S. A. 262a; 649 F.Supp.3d at 189.

The question at trial was how that disparity had come about. By that time, the State had adopted its politics-only defense. It argued, as the majority says, that the point of 82 redrawing District 1 was to "enhance[ ] the Republican advantage" there —i.e., to make sure a Democratic candidate could not win. Ante, at 1237 -1238. But that claim, even if true, would not be enough for the State to prevail. As this Court has held, a State cannot divide voters by race to achieve political ends. See Miller, 515 U.S. at 914, 115 S.Ct. 2475. "[T]he sorting of voters on the grounds of their race" is a constitutional problem "even if race is meant to function as a proxy" for political affiliation. Cooper, 581 U.S. at 309, n. 7, 137 S.Ct. 1455; see id., at 291, and n. 1, 137 S.Ct. 1455. So the critical issue was not whether the State's ultimate aim was political or racial (though the majority often phrases it that way, see, e.g., ante, at 1233, 1235 - 1236, 1242). Instead, the issue was whether the State had advanced its partisan objective primarily by racial means. The Challengers maintained that it had. They said the State's mapmakers had consciously removed Black citizens from District 1 on the (justified) assumption *1277 that doing so would turn the district redder. The State, by contrast, denied in any way using race to draw District 1's lines. According to its account, the disproportionate removal of African Americans from District 1 was just an accidental byproduct of political sorting—more specifically, of ejecting precincts that had strongly supported then-candidate Biden in the 2020 election.[4] Faced with those competing stories, the District Court had to decide which to credit.

The court's decision to credit the Challengers, as I'll next show, was not clear error—indeed, far from it. There was 83 of course evidence pointing in each direction; like Cooper, this was a "two-sided case." 581 U.S. at 307, n. 6, 137 S.Ct. 1455. But the Challengers made a weighty showing that the mapmakers relied substantially on racial data in moving voters around. The mapmakers had the incentive to do so, given the limits of the political information in their possession. They had the ability to do so—both access to data and experience using it. And direct testimony showed that the mapmakers had in fact continually examined racial data during the line-drawing process. The map yielded by that process hit on the dot the Black voting percentage that state officials knew they needed to achieve their partisan goal. And when statistics experts reviewed the map, they found that the State's politics-only story could not explain the redistricting's extreme racial disparity. In dismissing that strong case, the majority cherry-picks evidence, ignores credibility findings, misunderstands expert views, and substitutes its own statistical theories. Its opinion gives not a whit of respect to the District Court's factual findings, thus defying the demands of clear-error review.

A

Start with the State's chief mapmaker. William Roberts, as the majority notes, was a "nonpartisan staffer with 20 years of experience" drawing maps for Republicans and Democrats alike. Ante, at 1237. He was good at what he did—expert, "helpful," and "precise." J. S. A. 74a, 254a. And also this—he was a veteran consumer of racial data. On cross-examination, Roberts testified as follows:

> Q: I think I heard the number of 75 to a hundred localities you've worked in over the past 20 years?
>
> A: Yes....
>
> Q: Before this redistricting cycle, you always looked at race data in the 75 to a hundred districts you worked in, correct?
>
> A: Yes....
>
> 84 Q: Indeed, ... you provided guidance to localities that they should be looking at BVAP [Black Voting-Age Population] in drawing lines, correct?
>
> A: That's correct.

Id., at 204a–205a. The point of looking at BVAP, according to the mapmaker's testimony, was not to suppress the Black vote. Rather, Roberts stated that he did so to achieve a panoply of lawful districting goals—like assessing Voting Rights Act *1278 compliance and "help[ing] the general public understand the race of voters getting moved in and out." Id., at 206a; see id., at 205a. Whatever the particular purpose, he consulted racial data constantly. Now as you know from the majority, Roberts denied doing so in the redistricting at issue here. See ante, at 1240 - 1241. But when asked "so in your 20 years of redistricting, this was the only time [that] you didn't look at race?," Roberts answered "That's correct." J. S. A. 207a.

True to his persistent practice (if not to his this-case-only denial), Roberts configured maproom computers to show how every line-drawing decision would affect the new District 1's racial make-up. In other words, as a mapmaker moved a district line this way or that, he could immediately see the resulting change in the district's BVAP. Displaying racial data in that way was not an unavoidable feature of the mapmaking software. As one staffer explained: "[Y]ou could configure" the computer setup "in a multitude of ways." ECF Doc. 462–9, at 114. You could make it so that new BVAP numbers appeared on your screen "while you manipulated geography"—but "there [was] no requirement that you ha[d] to set it up that way." Ibid. The mapmakers had to choose to display racial data. And here is the key thing: They did. A Senate staffer who often sat with Roberts in the maproom explained that not only "political data" but also "demographic data"—specifically, "race" and "voting age population by race"—was "visible" on computer screens "[a] 85 lot of the time." ECF Doc. 462–4, at 40. And on cross-examination, Roberts admitted that to be true:

> Q: So BVAP was visible on the screen while you were drawing maps?
>
> A: Yeah. It was in the statistics window at the bottom of the screen.
>
> Q: So, you could see BVAP as you were making changes in real time as you were drawing lines?

A: We could see the statistics update after a change was made.

Q: So, if you moved a district line, you could see if the BVAP went up or down, right?

A: You could see on the statistics what the overall district BVAP would be.

J. S. A. 207a; see J. S. A. Supp. 402a (another staffer acknowledging: "Was I aware of, while I was drawing, what the racial makeup of what I was drawing was? Yes").

So Roberts's testimony presented a puzzle. As the majority highlights, Roberts consistently denied relying on racial data. See, e.g., ante, at 1240 - 1241, 1242. But racial data, according to both him and others, was easily accessible—in fact, was usually visible—on his computer while the line-drawing was going on. And he never explained why it was there. Why configure a computer to tell you, at every stage of the mapmaking process, how the slightest change in a district line would affect Black voting-age population if you weren't tracking and manipulating Black voting-age population? Roberts had no answer.

But there was an obvious reason for attending so closely to racial data, as even the majority acknowledges: One surefire way of making a South Carolina district more Republican is to make it less Black. See ante, at 1241. The difference between a "Republican tilt" and a "Democratic tilt" in District 1, notes the majority, is the difference between a 17% BVAP and a 21% BVAP. Ibid. That is because in recent 86 statewide elections, more than 90% of Black South Carolina voters—and usually more than 95%—have supported the Democratic candidate. See J. S. A. Supp. 82a. In South Carolina, to remove a Black voter from a congressional district is pretty *1279 nearly to remove a future Democratic vote. That is no secret. So it is small wonder that racial data was conspicuously displayed on Roberts's computer. And then small wonder that the District Court found Roberts to have used that data to draw district lines. See 649 F.Supp.3d at 191. More doubt would properly have attached to the opposite finding—that Roberts put this hugely relevant data on his screen only to ignore it as he worked to make District 1 more Republican. That would have taken the self-restraint of a monk.

Especially so because using only the political data at hand would not have done the job as well. "Why," the majority asks, "would Roberts have used racial data" when he had access to sub-precinct-level voting data from the 2020 election? Ante, at 1242 - 1243; see ante, at 1251 - 1252. The question is apparently meant to be rhetorical; but the trial record provides a ready answer—and one more than sufficient on clear-error review. One of the Challengers' experts testified that "[t]he 2020 election data" was "not a good" measure of partisan tilt—neither so "accurate" nor so "reliable." App. 135. And racial data, another expert suggested, served the mapmakers' goal better. See id., at 112. The single-sentence explanation is this: In South Carolina, a Black voter is more likely to vote for a Democrat in the next election than is someone who voted for a Democrat in the last election. That is because White voting preferences in the State are not as "stable" as Black voting preferences. Ibid. A White voter "might vote for a Democrat in one election" only to vote "for a Republican in another." Ibid. So to remove a past Democratic voter (as contrasted with a Black voter) is not necessarily to remove a future Democratic 87 vote.[5] And the gap only widens for past presidential voters, like those who participated in the 2020 election. In presidential elections, one expert explained, more people than usual switch party lines to "vote for the candidate"—a trend that then-President Trump's candidacy may have further amplified. Id., at 135; see J. S. A. 382a. Given all that, the South Carolina mapmakers' racial data was peculiarly predictive: The single best thing Roberts and his staff could do to increase the future Republican vote in District 1 was to exclude a Black voter. That fact would not have meant they looked at racial data alone; they also had the 2020 election data on their computers. But the racial data offered a potent tool for ensuring that District 1 would vote for a Republican in coming elections.[6]

And strong evidence showed, as the District Court found, that the mapmakers wielded this tool—that they used their racial data to meet the BVAP level needed to achieve their partisan goal. Recall the large turnover of voters in District 1. See supra, at 1275 - 1276. Some 53,000 people were moved into, and 140,000 people were *1280 moved out of, the district (which wound up with 730,000 total). Yet the district's racial balance did not budge. The district began with a 16.6% 88 BVAP. See J. S. A. 430a. That number went up with the 53,000-person addition, because almost 40% of the new residents were Black. See id., at 439a. So what did the mapmakers do? As noted earlier, they removed from District 1 over 60% of Black Charleston County residents, by excising a part of the county more than twice as Black (23.8%) as the part they kept in (10.3%). See 649 F.Supp.3d at 189–190; Supp. App. 153a; supra, at 1276. That brought the district's BVAP right back down to 16.7%—again below the 17% required to create the desired Republican tilt. See J. S. A. 452a; 649 F.Supp.3d at 188. In the majority's description, what happened was of no particular note—just that the District's BVAP "stayed more or less constant." Ante, at 1241. But consider: With approximately a quarter of District 1's population moving in or out, the district's BVAP shifted by ... one-tenth of one percentage point. The District Court observed that uncanny stability, knowing that racial data was at the mapmakers' fingertips. See 649 F.Supp.3d at 191. And the court, as addressed shortly, had heard statistical experts deny that the racially disparate districting could have come about through political sorting. See infra, at 1281 - 1286. So it was no large step—and hardly clear error—for the court to conclude that the mapmakers had gerrymandered Charleston County to achieve "a target of 17%" BVAP. 649 F.Supp.3d at 193.

As against all that, what does the majority offer? Only a series of self-serving denials. The sum and substance of the State's case came from the testimony of Roberts and State Senator George Campsen, who was the redistricting plan's sponsor. Yes, the new map, Roberts conceded, had a "tremendous" racial skew. J. S. A. 262a. But Roberts and Campsen maintained that they had never sorted by race—never used their (constantly accessible) racial data to draw district lines. Both insisted that they had looked only to voting results from the 2020 election to ensure their partisan goal. The majority buys it—hook, line, and sinker. Indeed, 89 the majority relies on nothing else. It treats Roberts's and Campsen's account as a "fact of the matter," rather than a vigorously contested assertion. Cooper, 581 U.S. at 307, n. 6, 137 S.Ct. 1455; see, e.g., ante, at1237 - 1238. The majority trusts the two State witnesses, and believes what they said.

The problem is that the three judges who sat on the District Court did not. And they are the ones entitled to make credibility judgments. See supra, at 1270; Cooper, 581 U.S. at 309, 137 S.Ct. 1455 ("[W]e give singular deference to a trial court's judgments about the credibility of witnesses"). That is for an obvious reason: They were there. They could assess every aspect of a witness's testimony, including demeanor, tone of voice, and facial expression. They could see when the witness was at ease and when he stumbled. And after taking account of all those cues, the three judges all reached the same conclusion about Roberts and Campsen. They thought that those two witnesses were not telling the truth.

The panel was especially disbelieving of Roberts, if almost in spite of itself. The court (contra the majority) well understood what the presumption of good faith required. The judges were predisposed, as the majority has to acknowledge, to think that this "good man," who had for so long been a fixture on the South Carolina political scene, would play it straight. Ante, at 1237 - 1238, and n. 5 (citing J. S. A. 23a, 74a–75a, 254a, 263a, 421a). But in the end, the court felt compelled to find that Roberts's old habit of relying on race died *1281 hard. To the panel, the mapmaker's tale did not hang together. He said he did not consider race in drawing lines; but he could recite "off the top of his head" the racial breakdown of particular precincts in District 1. 649 F.Supp.3d at 191. Those "highly accurate" estimates, the court noted, reflected Roberts's obvious knowledge of "the racial demographics of the state down to the individual precinct level." Ibid., n. 12. And Roberts never did—never could—explain why he put so much racial data on his computer screen if not to look at it as he drew district lines. Especially given the surrounding 90 evidence, the court found, Roberts's "claim that he did not consider race" in excluding voters from District 1 "rings hollow." Id., at 191 (internal quotation marks omitted). On normal clear-error review, that credibility judgment would control.

And so too for Campsen, who obfuscated at every turn. At trial, Campsen reversed his own deposition testimony about whether state senators knew the racial makeup of their districts. (First they knew, then he couldn't possibly speak for them.) See J. S. A. 377a–378a. He answered as simple a question as whether "race and party are correlated in South Carolina" this way:

> "Yes—well, yes and no. I guess that's fluid. It is fluid, but yes.... Well, it's not in every instance, but generally African Americans tend to vote higher, you know, more—you can look at the polls—when you look at the numbers after the fact—I didn't look at them drawing the map—but you see that in the numbers." Id., at 381a.

And he contradicted common knowledge—as well as the State's own defense—when he point-blank denied that sorting people based on their voting behavior could result in racial disparities. See id., at 383a ("Q: You would agree with me that if you ... focus on partisan numbers, there's a risk that you might disproportionately impact Black voters in drawing lines, right? A: No, I'm not going to agree with that"). Would you buy what this man was selling? As the contradictions, non-answers, and evasions mounted, the District Court quite reasonably decided that it could not.

Put all this together, and the Challengers offered—even before getting to their statistical studies—a more than plausible case of racial gerrymandering. They showed that the exclusion of voters from District 1 was racially disproportionate—not by a little but by a lot. They showed that the State's star mapmaker had always—always—before 91 considered race in drawing district lines. They showed why he would want to do so here, to create a reliable Republican tilt. They showed that the mapmaker configured his computer to exhibit in real time how every adjustment of a district line affected the district's racial make-up. And they showed that after moving nearly 200,000 residents this way and that, the mapmaker managed to land on the exact BVAP figure he knew would ensure his political goal. Now it is true that the State, when confronted with this evidence, did not confess error, as the majority comes close to demanding. Its officials, as you might expect, adamantly disputed the charge of racial discrimination. But they could not keep their story straight or make it believable to three judges. The more the officials talked, the more the court became convinced that, to create a red District 1, they had divided citizens by race. And that, again, was even before the statisticians took center stage.

B

Once the statisticians did so, the Challengers' case was clinched—at the least, from a clear-error perspective. Consider how much the controverted issue lent itself to statistical evidence. That issue began *1282 with a simple fact: The part of Charleston County that the mapmakers excised from District 1 was (vastly) disproportionately Black. The dispute was about what caused that disparity. Statistical evidence showing that it could have arisen from political sorting would significantly benefit the State's defense. Conversely, statistical evidence showing that the racial disparity could not have arisen in that way would significantly benefit the Challengers' case. So you might think that the trial would feature a war of statistical experts, each presenting their own multivariate regressions. But you would be wrong. The Challengers did their part, but the State failed to respond in kind. Rather than submit its own statistical studies, the State devoted all its efforts to trying to pick apart the Challengers'. It thus anticipated today's majority, 92 which (given the unbalanced record) can do nothing more than search for holes, however minute, in the Challengers' expert evidence. But two separate studies emerge unscathed, and with significant probative force—fully sufficient on clear-error review to justify the District Court's conclusion. Each analysis was designed to answer the critical question: whether Charleston County was split as it was based on its residents' race. And each found that it was. Even controlling for political preference, Black voters were more likely than White voters to be removed from District 1.[7]

Dr. Jordan Ragusa's regression found that race, separate and apart from partisanship, was "an important factor in the design of the 1st district." J. S. A. 509a; see 649 F.Supp.3d at 192. Ragusa looked at the size, racial demographics, and partisan composition of each precinct in the old District 1. (His measure of partisanship was the vote count for then-candidate Biden in the 2020 election, which mirrored the political data the State's mapmakers possessed.) By controlling for all three of those variables, Ragusa explained, he could "statistically disentangle the effect of each factor." J. S. A. 505a. And when he did so, Ragusa determined that "the decision to move a [precinct] out of [District 1] was highly correlated to the number of African American voters" in the precinct. 649 F.Supp.3d at 192; see J. S. A. 508a–509a, 514a. If, for example, a precinct had 100 to 500 Black voters, "the chance of [its] being moved out" of District 1 was "no greater than 20%." 649 F.Supp.3d at 192. But 93 as the number climbed, so did the likelihood: When a district had 1,500 Black voters, the probability of exclusion reached 60%. See ibid. And on top of that analysis, Ragusa directly compared the effects of partisanship and race on the exclusion decision. He found that the mapmakers removed 41% of precincts with more than 1,000 Biden voters, but 62% of precincts with more than 1,000 Black voters. See J. S. A. Supp. 14a. That comparison showed that "the racial composition of a precinct was a stronger predictor of whether it was removed" from District 1 "than its partisan composition." Ibid.; see 649 F.Supp.3d at 192.

A second expert, Dr. Baodong Liu, reinforced Ragusa's conclusions about the significance of race, using a complementary methodology and data set. Liu evaluated the different likelihoods that White Democrats *1283 and Black Democrats would wind up outside or inside District 1. Based on demographic data and vote tabulations from the 2018 Democratic primary, Liu first found that Black Democrats were moved out of District 1 disproportionately to White Democrats. Whereas 26% of Black Democrats in the district were excluded, only 19% of White Democrats were; so the rate at which Black Democrats were excluded was more than one-third higher. See J. S. A. Supp. 94a. And then Liu sliced his data another way, which confirmed his results. Replicating a methodology that this Court approved in Cooper, see 581 U.S. at 315, 137 S.Ct. 1455, Liu looked at Democratic voters in all the counties that at least partly overlapped with District 1. Which of those voters, Liu asked, actually wound up in District 1 and which did not? Once again, the answer showed a significant racial disproportion. Whereas 69% of White Democrats in the region were placed in the new District 1, only 51% of Black Democrats were put there. J. S. A. Supp. 100a.

The majority's primary objection to Ragusa's and Liu's studies —that they did not "control for contiguity or compactness," ante, at 1245, 1247 - 1248—is woefully misplaced. The gripe is 94 that the experts assumed "unrealistic[ally]" that any precinct, no matter where located, could be moved. Ante, at 1245 - 1246. If the experts had thought about geography, the majority suggests, they might have found that Black Democrats were disproportionately relocated because they lived in precincts closer to a district boundary. The argument is reprised from Cooper—but (what a surprise) only from the dissent. See 581 U.S. at 358, 137 S.Ct. 1455. And the reason the objection got nowhere in Cooper applies once again. The relevant district in Cooper was super-thin, so that the lion's share of precincts within it were close enough to a boundary line to be easily moved. See id., at 326, 137 S.Ct. 1455. And so too here. Recall that the only issue under review is whether the State improperly moved Black voters from District 1 to District 6—because that is the only gerrymander the District Court found. Now turn to the map of South Carolina's old districts in this opinion's Appendix. District 1 was a narrow strip on the Atlantic coast; District 6 ran along its whole length. Nearly everyone within District 1 lived close to the border line; so nearly everyone could have been sent to District 6, consistent with contiguity and compactness. That is true even of people who lived on the beach. Under the State's districting guidelines, "[c]ontiguity by water is sufficient," so the mapmakers could—and in fact did—split the new District 1's land area by pulling District 6 all the way to the water. J. S. A. 541a; see Appendix, infra, at 1286 - 1287, Figure 2 (Inset to 2022 Congressional Map). The upshot is that precinct location did not meaningfully constrain the State's choice of which voters to move from District 1 to District 6. And so the Challengers' experts were not required to pretend that it did.[8]

95 That is why the majority, to support its contiguity theory, must use a "simple example" *1284 of zero relevance to this case. Ante, at 1246. Says the majority: District 6 "precincts near [Colleton C]ounty's northern border with Bamberg County could not have been moved into District 1 without egregiously flouting the State's important interests in contiguity or compactness." Ante, at 1247. That is true: As the map shows, District 6 is fat, and the precincts the majority mentions are far away from the District 1-District 6 line. See Appendix, infra, at 1286 - 1287, Figure 1. But of course this case has nothing to do with those outermost District 6 precincts, or even with the closer-in District 6 precincts that could have been moved into District 1. The sole issue here, again, is whether the State disproportionately selected heavily African-American precincts to move out of District 1. When it gets around to that issue, the majority says: "[T]he same problem" as in its example "arises with respect to the question whether a precinct in District 1 ... could have been moved into District 6." Ante, at 1246. But that is not true, for self-evident reasons. As just described—and shown on the map—the old District 1 was thin, and the great bulk of its precincts were close to the District 1-District 6 line. See Appendix, infra, at 1286 - 1287, Figure 1. So they could have been moved "without egregiously flouting"—actually, without flouting at all—"the State's important interests in contiguity or compactness." Ante, at 1247. The majority's inapt comparison is revelatory in one sense only: It shows why appellate courts are supposed to use a clear-error standard—to make sure we are fixing, not introducing, mistakes.

96 The majority's other main criticism, aimed solely at Ragusa, is original to this Court: It was never raised or considered below (or, as far as I know, in other voting suits). The objection relates to the way Ragusa measured each precinct's partisan tilt. He asked how many 2020 Biden voters lived in a precinct relative to its voting-age population. So, for example, a 1,250-person precinct with 700 Biden voters would count as much more Democratic than the same-sized precinct with 350 Biden voters. The majority says that measure may be "statistically permissible"—but still is not good enough. Ante, at 1247. In the majority's view, Ragusa should have "account[ed] for" potential variance in precinct turnout by looking to the Biden net vote instead of the Biden total vote. Ante, at 1246 - 1247. Now I'll admit: I'm not a statistician. I can see what the majority is saying, but my inclination would be to seek out other opinions—including from Ragusa himself—about the net-vote approach, and whether it would matter. The problem is I can't do that here. The theory is the majority's brainchild, absent from the District Court's proceedings. The State never asked Ragusa about it, before or during trial. The State's own expert did not bring it up. The State did not raise it in briefing below. And most important: Nothing in the trial record suggests that adopting the net-vote measure would have made a real difference. The majority, to show you why it might, offers what it calls a "simplified" example. Ante, at 1247. For simplified read "fictional"—meaning, not reflective of any actual precinct's vote. And for simplified, also read "unrepresentative"? To take just one example: Maybe there are some, but I doubt there are many, precincts in which 1,100 of 1,250 voting-age people make it to the polls. See ante, at 1247. A number of things about precinct composition and turnout would need to be true for the net-vote/total-vote distinction to make a significant difference to Ragusa's analysis—and we know none of them. Sure, it's fun to play 97 armchair statistician. But it's irresponsible to reverse a trial court's decision—on clear-error review—based on such hypothesizing.

*1285 A couple of final attacks fare no better. The majority faults Liu for testing partisan tilt in District 1 with data from the 2018 gubernatorial primaries, rather than the 2020 presidential election. The majority confidently declares that because an off-year primary has a lower turnout, the "[d]ata from [it] is less informative." Ante, at 1248. Liu's explanation is deemed unworthy of mention. It was that the higher turnout of a presidential election, along with its greater focus on individual candidates, makes it a poorer measure of a district's year-in, year-out partisan tilt. See App. 135. The State's own expert did not contest that view, so the majority's skepticism again finds no support in the trial record. And even if 2020 data is better than 2018 data—it might be—what is better than either is both. That is what the Challengers had: Ragusa's study based on 2020 data and Liu's based on 2018 data, each showing a racial gerrymander.

Much the same thing is true as to a more obscure methodological issue the majority raises (again, needless to say, sua sponte): whether statistical analysis should "operate[ ] at the voter level" or the precinct level. Ante, at 1247, n. 9. Here, the majority cannot get its attack-line consistent. First the majority claims that Ragusa's testimony was worse than the expert's in Cooper because Ragusa's relied on "precinct-level analysis" rather than looking at individual voters. Ibid. But within a page the majority asserts that Liu's study was "highly unrealistic" because he "treated each voter as an independent unit" rather than considering "neighbors" together. Ante, at 1247 - 1249. So an expert challenging a gerrymander can't win either way. But put that aside; the key thing, once more, is that the Challengers had not one but two types of analysis working in their favor. 98 However a statistician looked at the data—whether voter-level or precinct-level—he reached the same conclusion: that the State's mapmakers targeted Black voters.

And the State offered little by way of rebuttal. It, too, had an expert witness. And that witness, Sean Trende, took a couple of shots at Ragusa's methods. See ECF Doc. 510, at 46–52. But he did not offer the most relevant kind of evidence—a counter-analysis showing that partisanship subsumed race in the design of District 1. Trende had access to all the same data Ragusa did. He even had access to Ragusa's computer code, so that he would not have needed to start from scratch. See id., at 58. He could just have rerun the code after fixing whatever variables he thought wrong. What should one make of Trende's failure to do so? If I were adopting the majority's methods, I would draw an "adverse inference" from the decision not to submit such "easily churn[ed] out" evidence. Ante, at 1250. Surely it must count as an "implicit concession" by the State that the statistical analysis, even with the desired fixes, would keep showing evidence of a racial gerrymander? Ante, at 1250. But I don't need to create a novel adverse inference to make the critical point. It was hardly clear error for the District Court to credit the Challengers' statistical evidence about race's predominant role when the State presented no similar evidence to support its partisanship theory. The majority's contrary view—that the State's nothing necessarily beat the Challengers' something—is one more tell that it has left the proper review standard way behind.

III

In every way, the majority today stacks the deck against the Challengers. They must lose, the majority says, because the State had a "possible" story to tell about not considering race—even if the opposite story was the more credible. Ante, at 1241 - 1242. And they must lose again, the *1286 majority says, because they failed to offer a particular form of proof—which 99 they did not know would be relevant and which this Court recently told plaintiffs was not required. It does not matter that the Challengers offered extensive evidence, including expert statistical analyses, that the State's districting plan was the product of racial sorting. It does not matter that the State, by way of response, offered little more than strained and awkward denials. It does not matter that three judges—entitled to respect for their factual findings—thought that those denials were not believable, and did not put a dent in the plaintiffs' proof. When racial classifications in voting are at issue, the majority says, every doubt must be resolved in favor of the State, lest (heaven forfend) it be "accus[ed]" of "offensive and demeaning" conduct. Ante, at 1236.

What a message to send to state legislators and mapmakers about racial gerrymandering. For reasons I've addressed, those actors will often have an incentive to use race as a proxy to achieve partisan ends. See supra, at 1244 - 1245. And occasionally they might want to straight-up suppress the electoral influence of minority voters. See Cooper, 581 U.S. at 319, n. 15, 137 S.Ct. 1455. Go right ahead, this Court says to States today. Go ahead, though you have no recognized justification for using race, such as to comply with statutes ensuring equal voting rights. Go ahead, though you are (at best) using race as a short-cut to bring about partisan gains—to elect more Republicans in one case, more Democrats in another. It will be easy enough to cover your tracks in the end: Just raise a "possibility" of non-race-based decision-making, and it will be "dispositive." Ante, at 1241. And so this "odious" practice of sorting citizens, built on racial generalizations and exploiting racial divisions, will continue. Shaw, 509 U.S. at 643, 113 S.Ct. 2816. In the electoral sphere especially, where "ugly patterns of pervasive racial discrimination" have so long governed, we should demand better—of ourselves, of our political representatives, and most of all of this Court. Id., at 639, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Respectfully, I dissent.

100

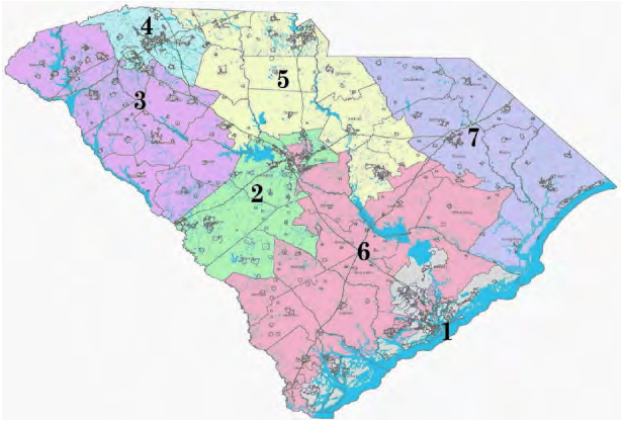

Figure 1. 2011 Congressional Map (adapted from ECF Doc. 323–1, p. 2)

*1287

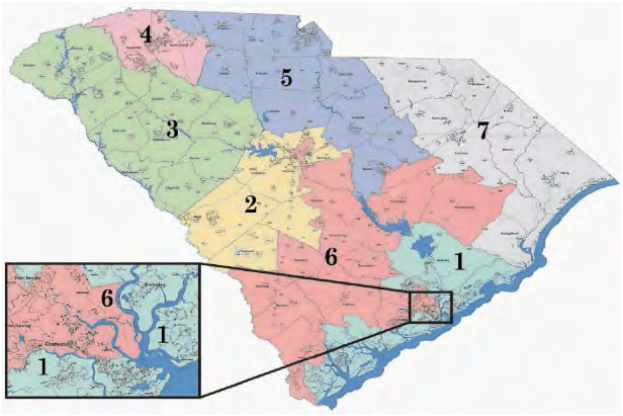

Figure 2. 2022 Congressional Map (adapted from J. S. A. Supp. 306a)

All Citations

602 U.S. 1, 144 S.Ct. 1221, 218 L.Ed.2d 512, 23 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 3855, 2024 Daily Journal D.A.R. 4385, 30 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 165

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 A plaintiff can also establish racial predominance by showing that the legislature used "race as a proxy" for "political interest[s]." Miller, 515 U.S. at 914, 115 S.Ct. 2475; see also Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 291, n. 1, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017) (noting that strict scrutiny is warranted when "a legislature elevated race to the predominant criterion in order to advance other goals, including political ones").

2 See, e.g., Pew Research Center, Behind Biden's 2020 Victory (June 30, 2021), https://www.pewresearch.org/politics/2021/06/30/behind-bidens-2020-victory/; NBC News, South Carolina Presidential Election Results 2020 (Nov. 3, 2020), https://www.nbcnews.com/politics/2020-elections/south-carolina-president-results/; N. Y. Times, South Carolina Exit Polls: How Different Groups Voted (Nov. 3, 2020), https://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2020/11/03/us/elections/exit-polls-south-carolina.html.

3 N. Y. Times, South Carolina Election Results: First House District (Jan. 28, 2019), https://www.nytimes.com/elections/results/south-carolina-house-district-1.

4 N. Y. Times, South Carolina Election Results: First Congressional District (Nov. 3, 2020), https://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2020/11/03/us/elections/results-south-carolina-house-district-1.html.

5 During the proceedings, one of the judges described Roberts as "a very precise guy" and a "good man." J. S. A. 74a, 421a. That judge also remarked that he "always liked asking [Roberts] questions," that "the legislature's blessed to have Mr. Roberts," and that if Roberts says a report is not accurate, "that's good enough for [him]." Id., at 74a–75a, 254a, 263a.

6 The dissent is correct to note that it is not enough for a plaintiff to show that race was a mere factor in the State's redistricting calculus. Rather, the plaintiff must show that race played a " 'predominant' " role in shaping a district's lines. Post, at 1277, n. 4 (opinion of KAGAN, J.) (quoting Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475). But the dissent then retreats from this standard because the State denied relying at all on racial data. Post, at 1277, n. 4. That is a puzzling argument. Parties can stipulate to issues of fact, but they cannot by stipulation amend the law. See, e.g., United States Natl. Bank of Ore. v. Independent Ins. Agents of America, 508 U.S. 439, 447, 113 S.Ct. 2173, 124 L.Ed.2d 402 (1993). And it would be uniquely perverse to deprive the State of a more generous constitutional standard simply because it made the laudable effort to disregard race altogether in the redistricting process.

7 The dissent argues that racial data is superior because black Democrats are more loyal to the party than white Democrats. Post, at 1279 - 1280. But whether or not this is true (and the dissent relies solely on the say-so of one witness), studies show that non-white voters turn out at a much lower rate than white voters. See Brennan Center for Justice, K. Morris & C. Grange, Large Racial Turnout Gap Persisted in 2020 Election (Aug. 6, 2021), https://www.brennancenter.org/our-work/analysis-opinion/large-racial-turnout-gap-persisted-2020-election.

8 The dissent excuses Dr. Ragusa's failure to control for contiguity on the ground that a vast majority of the precincts in old District 1 could have been moved into District 6 without violating contiguity. Post, at 1283 - 1284. However, a quick look at the precincts in the counties that fall within District 1 shows that this is plainly untrue. (Links to some of the relevant precinct maps are provided below.) Many precincts would have had to jump over quite a few others in order to join District 6. In addition, the dissent ignores the other objectives that the new map sought to achieve, namely, the unification of Beaufort and Berkeley Counties and the division of Charleston between Districts 1 and 6 so that the city would predictably have one Democratic House Member and one Republican House Member.

For the voting precincts in Beaufort County, see https://rfa.sc.gov/sites/default/files/2024-01/Beaufort%20Precincts%202024.pdf. For Berkeley County, see https://rfa.sc.gov/sites/default/files/2022-04/Berkeley%20Precincts.pdf.

9 Two differences in particular stand out. First, while Dr. Ragusa looked only at Democratic voters to control for partisanship, Professor Ansolabehere looked at both Democratic and Republican voters. 1 App. in Cooper v. Harris, O. T. 2016, No. 15–1262, pp. 334–337. Only after calculating the percentage of black voters moved in each partisan group did Professor Ansolabehere conclude that "race, and not party, had a disproportionate effect on the configuration of " the congressional districts. Id., at 337. Second, Professor Ansolabehere's analysis operated at the voter level. Id., at 313–314. That enabled him to compare the demographics of the moved voters to the general population in a way that Dr. Ragusa's precinct-level analysis cannot.

10 See N. Y. Times, South Carolina Governor Primary Election Results (Nov. 3, 2020), https://www.nytimes.com/elections/results/south-carolina-governor-primary-election; N. Y. Times, South Carolina Presidential Election Results (Nov. 3, 2020), https://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2020/11/03/us/elections/results-south-carolina-president.html; see also App. 135 (testimony of Baodong Liu) (noting that Presidential election years "usually ha[ve] a very high level of voter turnout").

11 The dissent, by contrast, would make it virtually impossible to show clear error in a case like this. The dissent agrees that a plaintiff raising a racial-gerrymandering claim bears a "demanding burden." Post, at 1272 - 1273 (opinion of KAGAN, J.).

But according to the dissent's view, clear-error review means that this burden vanishes on appeal because a plaintiff 's "hardest job should be done" once it prevails before a three-judge district court. Ibid. That misses the point. In assessing whether a finding is clearly erroneous, it is important to keep in mind the standard of proof that the district court was required to apply. It is hornbook law, after all, that we must ask on appeal whether the "factfinder in the first instance made a mistake in concluding that a fact had been proven under the applicable standard of proof." Concrete Pipe & Products of Cal., Inc. v. Construction Laborers Pension Trust for Southern Cal., 508 U.S. 602, 622–623, 113 S.Ct. 2264, 124 L.Ed.2d 539 (1993) (emphasis added); see also H. Edwards & L. Elliott, Federal Standards of Review 26 (3d ed. 2018) ("[I]n applying the clearly erroneous standard, a reviewing court must take account of the standard of proof informing the trial court's factual finding"). Once our task is framed properly, we can easily conclude for the reasons that follow that the District Court clearly erred when it found that the Challengers carried their "demanding burden."

1 As the Court observes, the most common direct evidence that a State considered race in drawing a districting plan is the State's admission that it considered race in order to comply with our Voting Rights Act precedents. Ante, at 1234.

2 Congress has, at times, wielded its power under the Elections Clause to impose compactness and contiguity requirements for congressional districts. See, e.g., Apportionment Act of 1842, ch. 47, 5 Stat. 491; Apportionment Act of 1911, ch. 5, 37 Stat. 13. More recently, in the Uniform Congressional District Act of 1967, Congress required the States to use single-member congressional districts instead of at-large elections. See Pub. L. 90–196, 81 Stat. 581, 2 U.S.C. § 2c. And, Congress created a system for addressing a State's failure to properly redistrict following a decennial census. See § 2a(c). Some Elections Clause legislation may give rise to justiciable controversies regarding the application of federal statutes. Cf. Wood v. Broom, 287 U.S. 1, 8, 53 S.Ct. 1, 77 L.Ed. 131 (1932). But, constitutional districting claims are not justiciable in and of themselves.

3 Other Clauses in § 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment fare no better. The Privileges or Immunities Clause provides that "[n]o State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It "grants 'United States citizens a certain collection of rights—i.e., privileges or immunities—attributable to that status.' " Ramos v. Louisiana, 590 U. S. 83, 138, 140 S.Ct. 1390, 206 L.Ed.2d 583 (2020) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment) (quoting McDonald v. Chicago, 561 U.S. 742, 808, 130 S.Ct. 3020, 177 L.Ed.2d 894 (2010) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)). And, the Citizenship Clause provides that "[a]ll persons born or naturalized in the United States ... are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." It likely "guarantees citizens equal treatment ... with respect to civil rights." Vaello Madero, 596 U.S. at 179, 142 S.Ct. 1539 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). It is questionable whether the terms "privileges and immunities" and "civil rights" were understood by the generation that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment "to extend to political rights, such as voting." J. Harrison, Reconstructing the Privileges or Immunities Clause, 101 Yale L. J. 1385, 1417 (1992).

The Due Process Clause, of course, is a nonstarter as a source for substantive rights. See Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Organization, 597 U.S. 215, 330–336, 142 S.Ct. 2228, 213 L.Ed.2d 545 (2022) (THOMAS, J., concurring).

1 The example Cooper gave was Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001). The plaintiffs' direct evidence there, Cooper noted, was "meager" and "weak." 581 U.S. at 321–322, 137 S.Ct. 1455. Cromartie described it as saying "little or nothing" about the role race had played in drawing district lines. 532 U.S. at 253, 121 S.Ct. 1452. And the additional, circumstantial evidence did not fill the gap, because it too "offer[ed] little insight" into the basis of the legislature's mapmaking. Id., at 248, 121 S.Ct. 1452. In that evidentiary vacuum, Cooper explained, an alternative map was needed to "carry the day." 581 U.S. at 322, 137 S.Ct. 1455. Not because, as today's majority decides, there is something special about that form of evidence. Just because in Cromartie there was basically nothing else. As I'll soon show, that is far from true in this case. See infra, at 1275 - 1286.

2 And that view is in no way an outlier. Note that the majority must go back almost a century to find a decision in which this Court drew an adverse inference against a civil litigant for failure to offer a certain form of evidence. See ante, at 1250 - 1251 (citing Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 226, 59 S.Ct. 467, 83 L.Ed. 610 (1939)). And even that decision merely applied an inference in a particular case; it did not create a rule to cover a whole category of suits, as the majority does today. Nor did that old decision relate to a constitutional claim. As far as I know, today's decision is the first to impose a rule defeating claims of that type merely because plaintiffs chose not to offer one form of evidence, and instead relied on others.

3 The majority does not help its cause by noting that two Democratic members of the legislature described the districting plan as a partisan gerrymander. See ante, at 1244 - 1245. Even as a districting plan's proponents deny partisan gerrymandering, a plan's opponents often allege it. (And both for the same reason—because voters don't like excessive partisan manipulation of district lines.) That Democrats were attacking the plan as a partisan gerrymander hardly shows that Republicans were likely to defend it in that way.

4 A notable feature of this case is that the State chose to litigate it in categorical terms, claiming that the new district lines were based only on political data and not at all on racial data. The State did not need to go that far. In a gerrymandering case, a defendant can prevail by arguing that although race played some role in redistricting, it was not the "predominant factor." Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. The State's eschewal of that more moderate assertion turned the factual issue about what its mapmakers did into a binary choice. I therefore mainly address it in those terms, though the Challengers' evidence was powerful enough to support a finding of gerrymandering even had the State put predominance at issue.

5 The same variability occurs the other way around. In other words, a White voter might vote for a Republican in one election only to vote for a Democrat in another. So to retain a past Republican voter in a district is not necessarily to retain a future Republican vote.

6 In arguing to the contrary—that the political data was superior to, and would have removed any incentive to use, racial data—the majority emphasizes that only the political data "accounted for voter turnout." Ante, at 1242, and n. 7, 1251. But as one of the Challengers' experts explained, that fact is a double-edged sword, because turnout in presidential elections is highly unrepresentative of turnout in off-year ones. See App. 135. And still more important, the mapmakers did not have to make a choice between using political data alone and racial data alone. They could get whatever turnout (or other) information the political data provided even as they used the racial data as an especially reliable and accurate measure of individual voting behavior.

7 Two other studies on which the majority expends much effort, see ante, at 1243 - 1245, 1248 - 1249, had only a tenuous connection to the race-versus-politics question. Dr. Moon Duchin's analysis was offered primarily to support the Challengers' independent vote-dilution claim. And Dr. Kosuke Imai's report was designed to address a different defense the State could have raised—that traditional districting principles accounted for District 1's lines. Those two studies are therefore irrelevant. They do not help the Challengers on the disputed issue. But neither does the majority score any points for saying as much.

8 None of that is to say, as the majority seems to think I say, that all or nearly all District 1 precincts touch the District 1-District 6 line. See ante, at 1246, n. 8. Some of the district's precincts are indeed several precincts away from the border. But that fact in no way revives the majority's objection to the expert reports. Because of District 1's thinness, almost all of its 300 precincts could (contra the majority) "[ ]realistic[ally]" have been moved, either alone or with a few others, to District 6. Ante, at 1245 - 1246. (And so what if with a few others?: The State generally moved precincts around in clumps.) In other words, the State's preference for contiguity and compactness left almost all precincts on the table as candidates for removal. The choice of which of those precincts to move must therefore have been explained by other variables, as the Challengers' experts concluded.

143 S.Ct. 1487
Supreme Court of the United States.

Wes ALLEN, Alabama Secretary of State, et al., Appellants
v.
Evan MILLIGAN, et al.
Wes Allen, Alabama Secretary of State, et al., Petitioners
v.
Marcus Caster, et al.

Nos. 21-1086 and 21-1087
|
Argued October 4, 2022
|
Decided June 8, 2023*

Synopsis

Background: Black registered voters and civil rights organizations brought actions against Alabama Secretary of State and others, challenging Alabama's congressional redistricting plan, for which only one of seven districts had a Black majority, as violating equal protection and diluting votes in violation of § 2 of Voting Rights Act (VRA). Two actions were consolidated for preliminary injunction proceedings, and a three-judge panel of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama, 582 F.Supp.3d 924, granted preliminary injunctions, with clarification, 2022 WL 272637, and denied a stay pending appeal, 2022 WL 272636. In third action, which involved vote dilution claim under VRA, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama, Anna M. Manasco, J., 2022 WL 264819, granted preliminary injunction. The Supreme Court, 142 S.Ct. 879, noted its probable jurisdiction in first two actions, granted certiorari before judgment in third action, and stayed the preliminary injunctions.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Chief Justice Roberts, held that:

[1] challengers were likely to succeed, as element for obtaining preliminary injunction, in showing precondition, under Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving vote dilution claim under § 2 of VRA, that group of Black voters was sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in second, reasonably configured district;

[2] challengers were likely to succeed in showing Gingles preconditions that group of Black voters was politically cohesive, and that the white majority voted sufficiently as a bloc to enable it to defeat Black voters' preferred candidate;

[3] challengers were likely to succeed at totality of circumstances stage of Gingles framework; and

[4] single-minded view that focuses on race-neutral benchmark is not a permissible approach to determining vote dilution claim under § 2 of VRA.

Affirmed.

Justices Sotomayor, Kagan, and Jackson joined, and Justice Kavanaugh joined in part.

Justice Kavanaugh filed an opinion concurring in part.

Justice Thomas filed a dissenting opinion, in which Justice Gorsuch joined, and Justices Alito and Barrett joined in part.

Justice Alito filed a dissenting opinion, in which Justice Gorsuch joined.

West Headnotes (25)

[1] Constitutional Law Fifteenth Amendment

The Fifteenth Amendment, under which the right of United States citizens to vote cannot be denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, prohibits States from acting with a racially discriminatory motivation or an invidious purpose to discriminate, but it does not prohibit laws that are discriminatory only in effect. U.S. Const. Amend. 15.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[2] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The essence of a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA is that a certain electoral law, practice, or structure interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by Black and white voters, which occurs where an electoral structure operates to minimize or cancel out minority voters' ability to elect their preferred candidates, and the risk is greatest where minority and majority voters consistently prefer different candidates and where minority voters are submerged in a majority voting population that regularly defeats their choices. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Election Law Vote Dilution

To succeed in proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, a plaintiff must satisfy three preconditions under the Supreme Court's Gingles framework: first, the minority group must be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district, second, the minority group must be able to show that it is politically cohesive, and third, the minority group must be able to demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it to defeat the minority group's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

19 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

For purposes of the precondition, under the Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, that the minority group must be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district, a district will be reasonably configured if it comports with traditional districting criteria, such as being contiguous and reasonably compact. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

16 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

A plaintiff who demonstrates, under the Supreme Court's Gingles framework, the three preconditions for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, must also show, under the totality of circumstances, that the political process is not equally open to minority voters. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

The precondition, under the Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, that the minority group must be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district, is needed to establish that the minority has the potential to elect a representative of its own choice in some single-member district. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

The precondition, under the Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, that the minority group must be able to show that it is politically cohesive, shows that a representative of the minority group's choice would in fact be elected. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[8] Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

The precondition, under the Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, that the minority group must be able to demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it to defeat the minority group's preferred candidate, establishes that the challenged districting thwarts a distinctive minority vote at least plausibly on account of race. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

10 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The totality of circumstances inquiry, for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, recognizes that application of the Supreme Court's Gingles preconditions is peculiarly dependent upon the facts of each case. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[10] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Before courts can find a violation of § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, they must conduct an intensely local appraisal of the electoral mechanism at issue, as well as a searching practical evaluation of the past and present reality. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[11] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

Challengers to Alabama's congressional redistricting plan, for which only one of seven districts had a Black majority, were likely to succeed, as element for obtaining preliminary injunction, in showing precondition, under Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, that group of Black voters was sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a second, reasonably configured district; challengers' 11 illustrative maps strongly made that suggestion, and even if Gulf Coast region was a community of interest that was separated into two different districts, challengers offered evidence that their maps were still reasonably configured because they joined together another community of interest. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

11 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Election Law Vote Dilution

Section 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, does not permit a

State, based on core retention, which involves the proportion of districts that remain when a State transitions from one districting plan to another, to provide some voters less opportunity to participate in the political process just because the State has done it before. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

Challengers to Alabama's congressional redistricting plan, for which only one of seven districts had a Black majority, were likely to succeed, as element for obtaining preliminary injunction, in showing preconditions, under Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, that group of Black voters was politically cohesive, and that the white majority voted sufficiently as a bloc to enable it to defeat Black voters' preferred candidate; challengers offered evidence that, on average, Black voters supported their candidates of choice with 92.3% of the vote while white voters supported Black-preferred candidates with 15.4% of the vote, and challengers' experts described evidence of racially polarized voting in Alabama as intense, very strong, and very clear. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

Challengers to Alabama's congressional redistricting plan, for which only one of seven districts had a Black majority, were likely to succeed, as element for obtaining preliminary injunction, at the totality of circumstances stage of Supreme Court's Gingles framework for proving a vote dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA; challengers offered evidence that elections in Alabama were racially polarized, that Black Alabamians enjoyed virtually zero success in statewide elections, that political campaigns in Alabama had been characterized by overt or subtle racial appeals, and that Alabama's extensive history of repugnant racial and voting-related discrimination was undeniable and well documented. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Section 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, turns on the presence of discriminatory effects, not discriminatory intent. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Congress used the words "on account of race or color" in § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, to mean "with respect to" race or color, and not to connote any required purpose of racial discrimination. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[17] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Individuals lack an equal opportunity to participate in the political process, in violation of § 2 of the VRA, when a State's electoral structure operates in a manner that minimizes or cancels out their voting strength, and that occurs where an individual is disabled from entering into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner in the light of past and present reality, political and otherwise. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b).

[18] Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

An electoral district is not "equally open," within meaning of § 2 of VRA, which prohibits political processes that are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens, when minority voters face—unlike their majority peers—bloc voting along racial lines, arising against the backdrop of substantial racial discrimination within the State, that renders a minority vote unequal to a vote by a nonminority voter. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b).

[19] Election Law Vote Dilution

A State's liability under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, must be determined based on the totality of circumstances, as embodied in the Supreme Court's Gingles framework, not based on a single-minded view that focuses on a race-neutral benchmark that uses modern computer technology to design maps to comply with traditional districting criteria without considering race, because such a view cannot be squared with VRA's demand that courts employ a more refined approach. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[20] Election Law Reapportionment in general

Legislative reapportionment is primarily the duty and responsibility of the States, not the federal courts.

[21] Election Law Vote Dilution

Section 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, never requires adoption of districts that violate traditional redistricting principles, and its exacting requirements, instead, limit judicial intervention to those instances of intensive racial politics where the excessive role of race in the electoral process denies minority voters equal opportunity to participate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 §§ 2, 14, 52 U.S.C.A. §§ 10301, 10310(c)(1).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[22] Election Law Vote Dilution

While algorithmic mapmaking is not categorically irrelevant in cases under § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, courts should exercise caution before treating results produced by algorithms as all but dispositive of a § 2 claim, in light of the difficulties imposed by algorithmic mapmaking, e.g., districting involves myriad considerations—compactness, contiguity, political subdivisions, natural geographic boundaries, county lines, pairing of incumbents, communities of interest, and population equality, yet quantifying, measuring, prioritizing, and reconciling these criteria requires map drawers to make difficult, contestable choices. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[23] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Election Law Vote Dilution

The meaning of "standard, practice, or procedure" in § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, is not limited to methods for conducting a part of the voting process that might be used to interfere with a citizen's ability to cast his vote, and also encompasses a single-member districting system or the selection of one set of districting lines over another. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[24] Constitutional Law Fifteenth Amendment

Election Law Apportionment and Reapportionment

As applied to redistricting, § 2 of the VRA, which prohibits States from imposing any standard, practice, or procedure in a manner which results in denial or abridgement of any citizen's right to vote on account of race or color, is not unconstitutional under the Fifteenth Amendment, which provides that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. U.S. Const. Amend. 15; Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[25] Constitutional Law Fifteenth Amendment

Even if § 1 of the Fifteenth Amendment, which provides that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, prohibits only purposeful discrimination, Congress may outlaw voting practices that are discriminatory in effect, pursuant to its enforcement power under § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment. U.S. Const. Amend. 15.

1 Case that cites this headnote

*1492 Syllabus[*]

The issue presented is whether the districting plan adopted by the State of Alabama for its 2022 congressional elections likely violated § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 52 U.S.C. § 10301. As originally enacted in 1965, § 2 of the Act tracked the language of the Fifteenth Amendment, providing that "[t]he right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged ... on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." In City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1519, 64 L.Ed.2d 47, this Court held that the Fifteenth Amendment—and thus § 2—prohibits States from acting with a "racially discriminatory motivation" or an "invidious purpose" to discriminate, but it does not prohibit laws that are discriminatory only in effect. Id., at 61–65, 100 S.Ct. 1519 (plurality opinion). Criticism followed, with many viewing Mobile's intent test as not sufficiently protective of voting rights. But others believed that adoption of an effects test would inevitably require a focus on proportionality, calling voting laws into question whenever a minority group won fewer seats in the legislature than its share of the population. Congress ultimately resolved this debate in 1982, reaching a bipartisan compromise that amended § 2 to incorporate both an effects test and a robust disclaimer that "nothing" in § 2 "establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." § 10301(b).

In 1992, § 2 litigation challenging the State of Alabama's then-existing districting map resulted in the State's first majority-black district and, subsequently, the State's first black Representative since 1877. Alabama's congressional map has remained remarkably similar since that litigation. Following the 2020 decennial census, a group of plaintiffs led by Alabama legislator Bobby Singleton sued the State, arguing that the State's population growth rendered the existing congressional map malapportioned and racially gerrymandered in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. While litigation was proceeding, the Alabama Legislature's Committee on Reapportionment drew a new districting map that would reflect the distribution of the prior decade's population growth across the State. The resulting map largely resembled the 2011 map on which it was based and similarly produced only one district in which black voters constituted a majority. That new map was signed into law as HB1.

Three groups of Alabama citizens brought suit seeking to stop Alabama's Secretary of State from conducting congressional elections under HB1. One group (Caster plaintiffs) challenged HB1 as invalid under § 2. Another group (Milligan plaintiffs) brought claims under § 2 and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. And a third group (the Singleton plaintiffs) amended the complaint in their ongoing litigation to challenge HB1 as a racial gerrymander under the Equal Protection Clause. A three-judge District Court was convened, and the Singleton and Milligan actions were consolidated before that District Court for purposes of preliminary injunction proceedings, while Caster proceeded before one of the judges on a parallel track. After an extensive hearing, the District Court concluded in a 227-page opinion that the question whether HB1 likely violated § 2 was not "close." The Court preliminarily enjoined Alabama from using HB1 in forthcoming elections. The same relief was ordered in Caster.

Held: The Court affirms the District Court's determination that plaintiffs demonstrated a reasonable likelihood of success on their claim that HB1 violates § 2. Pp. 1502 – 1510, 1511 – 1517.

(a) The District Court faithfully applied this Court's precedents in concluding that HB1 likely violates § 2. Pp. 1502 – 1506.

(1) This Court first addressed the 1982 amendments to § 2 in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25, and has for the last 37 years evaluated § 2 claims using the Gingles framework. Gingles described the "essence of a § 2 claim" as when "a certain electoral law, practice, or structure interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by black and white voters." Id., at 47, 106 S.Ct. 2752. That occurs where an "electoral structure operates to minimize or cancel out" minority voters' "ability to elect their preferred candidates." Id., at 48, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Such a risk is greatest "where minority and majority voters consistently prefer different candidates" and where minority voters are submerged in a majority voting population that "regularly defeat[s]" their choices. Ibid.

To prove a § 2 violation under Gingles, plaintiffs must satisfy three "preconditions." Id., at 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752. First, the "minority group must be sufficiently large and [geographically] compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district." Wisconsin Legislature v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, 595 U. S. ——, ——, 142 S.Ct. 1245, 1248, 212 L.Ed.2d 251 (per curiam). "Second, the minority group must be able to show that it is politically cohesive." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752. And third, "the minority must be able to demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Ibid. A plaintiff who demonstrates the three preconditions must then show, under the "totality of circumstances," that the challenged political process is not "equally open" to minority voters. Id., at 45–46, 106 S.Ct. 2752. The totality of circumstances inquiry recognizes that application of the Gingles factors is fact dependent and requires courts to conduct "an intensely local appraisal" of the electoral mechanism at issue, as well as a "searching practical evaluation of the past and present reality." Id., at 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Congress has not disturbed the Court's understanding of § 2 as Gingles construed it nearly 40 years ago. Pp. 1502 – 1504.

(2) The extensive record in these cases supports the District Court's conclusion that plaintiffs' § 2 claim was likely to succeed under Gingles. As to the first Gingles precondition, the District Court correctly found that black voters could constitute a majority in a second district that was "reasonably configured." The plaintiffs adduced eleven illustrative districting maps that Alabama could enact, at least one of which contained two majority-black districts that comported with traditional districting criteria. With respect to the compactness criteria, for example, the District Court explained that the maps submitted by one expert "perform[ed] generally better on average than" did HB1, and contained no "bizarre shapes, or any other obvious irregularities." Plaintiffs' maps contained equal populations, were contiguous, and respected existing political subdivisions. Indeed, some of plaintiffs' proposed maps split the same (or even fewer) county lines than the State's.

The Court finds unpersuasive the State's argument that plaintiffs' maps were not reasonably configured because they failed to keep together the Gulf Coast region. Even if that region is a traditional community of interest, the District Court found the evidence insufficient to sustain Alabama's argument that no legitimate reason could exist to split it. Moreover, the District Court found that plaintiffs' maps were reasonably configured because they joined together a different community of interest called the Black Belt—a community with a high proportion of similarly situated black voters who share a lineal connection to "the many enslaved people brought there to work in the antebellum period."

As to the second and third Gingles preconditions, the District Court determined that there was "no serious dispute that Black voters are politically cohesive, nor that the challenged districts' white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat Black voters' preferred candidate." The court noted that, "on average, Black voters supported their candidates of choice with 92.3% of the vote" while "white voters supported Black-preferred candidates with 15.4% of the vote." Even Alabama's expert conceded "that the candidates preferred by white voters in the areas that he looked at regularly defeat the candidates preferred by Black voters." Finally, the District Court concluded that plaintiffs had carried their burden at the totality of circumstances stage given the racial polarization of elections in Alabama, where "Black Alabamians enjoy virtually zero success in statewide elections" and where "Alabama's extensive history of repugnant racial and voting-related discrimination is undeniable and well documented." The Court sees no reason to disturb the District Court's careful factual findings, which are subject to clear error review and have gone unchallenged by Alabama in any event. Pp. 1503 – 1506.

(b) The Court declines to remake its § 2 jurisprudence in line with Alabama's "race-neutral benchmark" theory.

(1) The Court rejects the State's contention that adopting the race-neutral benchmark as the point of comparison in § 2 cases would best match the text of the VRA. Section 2 requires political processes in a State to be "equally open" such that minority voters do not "have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." § 10301(b). Under the Court's precedents, a district is not equally open when minority voters face—unlike their majority peers—bloc voting along racial lines, arising against the backdrop of substantial racial discrimination within the State, that renders a minority vote unequal to a vote by a nonminority voter. Alabama would ignore this precedent in favor of a rationale that a State's map cannot "abridge[ ]" a person's right to vote "on account of race" if the map resembles a sufficient number of race-neutral alternatives. But this Court's cases have consistently focused, for purposes of litigation, on the specific illustrative maps that a plaintiff adduces. Deviation from that map shows it is possible that the State's map has a disparate effect on account of race. The remainder of the Gingles test helps determine whether that possibility is reality by looking to polarized voting preferences and the frequency of racially discriminatory actions taken by the State.

The Court declines to adopt Alabama's interpretation of § 2, which would "revise and reformulate the Gingles threshold inquiry that has been the baseline of [the Court's] § 2 jurisprudence" for decades. Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 16, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (plurality opinion). Pp. 1506 – 1508.

(2) Alabama argues that absent a benchmark, the Gingles framework ends up requiring the racial proportionality in districting that § 2(b) forbids. The Court's decisions implementing § 2 demonstrate, however, that when properly applied, the Gingles framework itself imposes meaningful constraints on proportionality. See Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 633–634, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511; Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 906, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762; Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 957, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (plurality opinion). In Shaw v. Reno, for example, the Court considered the permissibility of a second majority-minority district in North Carolina, which at the time had 12 seats in the U. S. House of Representatives and a 20% black voting age population. 509 U.S. at 633–634, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Though North Carolina believed § 2 required a second majority-minority district, the Court found North Carolina's approach an impermissible racial gerrymander because the State had "concentrated a dispersed minority population in a single district by disregarding traditional districting principles such as compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions." Id., at 647, 113 S.Ct. 2816. The Court's decisions in Bush and Shaw similarly declined to require additional majority-minority districts under § 2 where those districts did not satisfy traditional districting principles.

The Court recognizes that reapportionment remains primarily the duty and responsibility of the States, not the federal courts. Section 2 thus never requires adoption of districts that violate traditional redistricting principles and instead limits judicial intervention to "those instances of intensive racial politics" where the "excessive role [of race] in the electoral process ... den[ies] minority voters equal opportunity to participate." S. Rep. No. 97–417, pp. 33–34. Pp. 1507 – 1510.

(c) To apply its race-neutral benchmark in practice, Alabama would require plaintiffs to make at least three showings. First, Alabama would require § 2 plaintiffs to show that the illustrative maps adduced for the first Gingles precondition are not based on race. Alabama would next graft onto § 2 a requirement that plaintiffs demonstrate, at the totality of circumstances stage, that the State's enacted plan contains fewer majority-minority districts than what an "average" race-neutral plan would contain. And finally, Alabama would have plaintiffs prove that any deviation between the State's plan and a race-neutral plan is explainable "only" by race. The Court declines to adopt any of these novel requirements.

Here, Alabama contends that because HB1 sufficiently "resembles" the "race-neutral" maps created by the State's experts—all of which lack two majority-black districts—HB1 does not violate § 2. Alabama's reliance on the maps created by its experts Dr. Duchin and Dr. Imai is misplaced because those maps do not accurately represent the districting process in Alabama. Regardless, the map-comparison test that Alabama proposes is flawed in its fundamentals. Neither the text of § 2 nor the fraught debate that produced it suggests that "equal access" to the fundamental right of voting turns on technically complicated computer simulations. Further, while Alabama has repeatedly emphasized that HB1 cannot have violated § 2 because none of plaintiffs' two million odd maps contained more than one majority-minority district, that (albeit very big) number is close to irrelevant in practice, where experts estimate the possible number of Alabama districting maps numbers is at least in the trillion trillions.

Alabama would also require plaintiffs to demonstrate that any deviations between the State's enacted plan and race-neutral alternatives "can be explained only by racial discrimination." Brief for Alabama 44 (emphasis added). But the Court's precedents and the legislative compromise struck in the 1982 amendments clearly rejected treating discriminatory intent as a requirement for liability under § 2. Pp. 1510, 1511 – 1515.

(d) The Court disagrees with Alabama's assertions that the Court should stop applying § 2 in cases like these because the text of § 2 does not apply to single-member redistricting and because § 2 is unconstitutional as the District Court applied it here. Alabama's understanding of § 2 would require abandoning four decades of the Court's § 2 precedents. The Court has unanimously held that § 2 and the Gingles framework apply to claims challenging single-member districts. Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388. As Congress is undoubtedly aware of the Court's construction of § 2 to apply to districting challenges, statutory stare decisis counsels staying the course until and unless Congress acts. In any event, the statutory text supports the conclusion that § 2 applies to single-member districts. Indeed, the contentious debates in Congress about proportionality would have made little sense if § 2's coverage was as limited as Alabama contends.

The Court similarly rejects Alabama's argument that § 2 as applied to redistricting is unconstitutional under the Fifteenth Amendment. The Court held over 40 years ago "that, even if § 1 of the [Fifteenth] Amendment prohibits only purposeful discrimination," City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 173, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119, the VRA's "ban on electoral changes that are discriminatory in effect is an appropriate method of promoting the purposes of the Fifteenth Amendment," id., at 177, 100 S.Ct. 1548. Alabama's contention that the Fifteenth Amendment does not authorize race-based redistricting as a remedy for § 2 violations similarly fails. The Court is not persuaded by Alabama's arguments that § 2 as interpreted in Gingles exceeds the remedial authority of Congress.

The Court's opinion does not diminish or disregard the concern that § 2 may impermissibly elevate race in the allocation of political power within the States. Instead, the Court simply holds that a faithful application of precedent and a fair reading of the record do not bear those concerns out here. Pp. 1514 – 1517.

Nos. 21–1086, 582 F. Supp. 3d 924, and 21–1087, affirmed.

ROBERTS, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court, except as to Part III–B–1. SOTOMAYOR, KAGAN, and JACKSON, JJ., joined that opinion in full, and KAVANAUGH, J., joined except for Part III–B–1. KAVANAUGH, J., filed an opinion concurring in all but Part III–B–1. THOMAS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which GORSUCH, J., joined, in which BARRETT, J., joined as to Parts II and III, and in which ALITO, J., joined as to Parts II–A and II–B. ALITO, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which GORSUCH, J., joined.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Edmund G. Lacour, Jr., Solicitor General, for appellants/petitioners.

Deuel Ross for appellees.

Abha Khanna for respondents.

Elizabeth B. Prelogar, Solicitor General, for United States, as amicus curiae, supporting appellees/respondents.

Deuel Ross, Counsel of Record, NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., Washington, DC, Samuel Spital, Leah Aden, Stuart Naifeh, Kathryn Sadasivan, Brittany Carter, NAACP legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., New York, NY, Latisha Gotell Faulks, Kaitlin Welborn, American Civil Liberties Union of Alabama, Montgomery, AL, Sidney M. Jackson, Nicki Lawsen, Wiggins Childs Pantazis, Fisher & Goldfarb, LLC, Birmingham, AL, David D. Cole, American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, Washington, DC, Jessica L. Ellsworth, David Dunn, Shelita M. Stewart, Hogan Lovells US LLP, Washington, DC, Michael Turrill, Harmony A. Gbe, Hogan Lovells US LLP, Los Angeles, CA, Richard P. Rouco, Quinn, Connor, Weaver, Davies & Rouco LLP, Birmingham, AL, Abha Khanna, Counsel of Record, Elias Law Group LLP, Seattle, WA, for Appellees and Respondents.

Davin M. Rosborough, Julie A. Ebenstein, American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, New York, NY, Blayne R. Thompson, Hogan Lovells US LLP, Houston, TX, Janai S. Nelson, Director-Counsel, Samuel Spital, Leah C. Aden, Deuel Ross, Counsel of Record, Stuart Naifeh, Ashley Burrell, Kathryn Sadasivan, Brittany Carter, NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, Inc., New York, NY, Jessica L. Ellsworth, David Dunn, Shelita M. Stewart, Jo-Ann Tamila Sagar, Johannah Walker, Hogan Lovells US LLP, Washington, DC, Latisha Gotell Faulks, Kaitlin Welborn, American Civil Liberties Union Of Alabama, Montgomery, AL, Sidney M. Jackson, Nicki Lawsen, Wiggins Childs Pantazis Fisher & Goldfarb, LLC, Birmingham, AL, David D. Cole, American Civil Liberties, Union Foundation, Washington, DC, Michael Turrill, Harmony A. Gbe, Hogan Lovells US LLP, Los Angeles, CA, for appellees Evan Milligan, et al.

Marc E. Elias, Lalitha D. Madduri, Daniel C. Osher, Joseph N. Posimato, Olivia N. Sedwick, Elias Law Group LLP, Washington, DC, Richard P. Rouco, Quinn, Connor, Weaver, Davies & Rouco LLP, Birmingham, AL, for respondents Marcus Caster, et al.

Dorman Walker, Balch & Bingham LLP, Montgomery, AL, Jeffrey M. Harris, Taylor A.R. Meehan, Consovoy McCarthy PLLC, Arlington, VA, Steve Marshall, Alabama Attorney General, Edmund G. LaCour Jr., Solicitor General, Counsel of Record, A. Barrett Bowdre, Thomas A. Wilson, Deputy Solicitors General, Office of the Att'y. Gen., Montgomery, AL, James W. Davis, Deputy Attorney General, Misty S. Fairbanks Messick, A. Reid Harris, Brenton M. Smith, Benjamin M. Seiss, Assistant Attorneys General, Office of the Att'y. Gen., State of Alabama, Montgomery, AL, for Appellants/Petitioners.

Opinion

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court, except as to Part III–B–1.[*]

9 *1498 In January 2022, a three-judge District Court sitting in Alabama preliminarily enjoined the State from using the districting plan it had recently adopted for the 2022 congressional 10 elections, finding that the plan likely violated Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 52 U.S.C. § 10301. This Court stayed the District Court's order pending further review. 595 U. S. —— (2022). After conducting that review, we now affirm.

I

A

Shortly after the Civil War, Congress passed and the States ratified the Fifteenth Amendment, providing that "[t]he right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged ... on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." U. S. Const., Amdt. 15, § 1. In the century that followed, however, the Amendment proved little more than a parchment promise. Jim Crow laws like literacy tests, poll taxes, and "good-morals" requirements abounded, South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 312–313, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966), "render[ing] the right to vote illusory for blacks," *1499 Northwest Austin Municipal Util. Dist. No. One v. Holder, 557 U.S. 193, 220–221, 129 S.Ct. 2504, 174 L.Ed.2d 140 (2009) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). Congress stood up to little of it; "[t]he first century of congressional enforcement of the [Fifteenth] Amendment ... can only be regarded as a failure." Id., at 197, 129 S.Ct. 2504 (majority opinion).

That changed in 1965. Spurred by the Civil Rights movement, Congress enacted and President Johnson signed into law the Voting Rights Act. 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 52 U.S.C. § 10301 et seq. The Act "create[d] stringent new remedies for voting discrimination," attempting to forever "banish the blight of racial discrimination in voting." Katzenbach, 383 U.S. at 308, 86 S.Ct. 803. By 1981, in only sixteen years' time, many considered the VRA "the most successful civil rights statute in the history of the Nation." S. Rep. No. 97–417, p. 111 (1982) (Senate Report).

These cases concern Section 2 of that Act. In its original form, "§ 2 closely tracked the language of the [Fifteenth] 11 Amendment" and, as a result, had little independent force. Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee, 594 U. S. ——, ——, 141 S.Ct. 2321, 2331, 210 L.Ed.2d 753 (2021).[1] Our leading case on § 2 at the time was City of Mobile v. Bolden, which involved a claim by black voters that the City's at-large election system effectively excluded them from participating in the election of city commissioners. 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1519, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980). The commission had three seats, black voters comprised one-third of the City's population, but no black-preferred candidate had ever won election.

[1] The Court ruled against the plaintiffs. The Fifteenth Amendment—and thus § 2—prohibits States from acting with a "racially discriminatory motivation" or an "invidious purpose" to discriminate. Id., at 61–65, 100 S.Ct. 1519 (plurality opinion). But it does not prohibit laws that are discriminatory only in effect. Ibid. The Mobile plaintiffs could "register and vote without hindrance"—"their freedom to vote ha[d] not been denied or abridged by anyone." Id., at 65, 100 S.Ct. 1519. The fact that they happened to lose frequently was beside the point. Nothing the City had done "purposeful[ly] exclu[ded]" them "from participati[ng] in the election process." Id., at 64, 100 S.Ct. 1519.

Almost immediately after it was decided, Mobile "produced an avalanche of criticism, both in the media and within the civil rights community." T. Boyd & S. Markman, The 1982 Amendments to the Voting Rights Act: A Legislative History, 40 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 1347, 1355 (1983) (Boyd & Markman). The New York Times wrote that the decision represented "the biggest step backwards in civil rights to come from the Nixon Court." N. Y. Times, Apr. 23, 1980, p. A22. And the Washington Post described Mobile as a "major defeat for blacks and other minorities fighting electoral schemes that exclude them from office." Washington 12 Post, Apr. 23, 1980, p. A5. By focusing on discriminatory intent and ignoring disparate effect, critics argued, the Court had abrogated "the standard used by the courts to determine whether [racial] discrimination existed ...: Whether such discrimination existed." It's Results That Count, Philadelphia Inquirer, Mar. 3, 1982, p. 8–A.

*1500 But Mobile had its defenders, too. In their view, abandoning the intent test in favor of an effects test would inevitably require a focus on proportionality—wherever a minority group won fewer seats in the legislature than its share of the population, the charge could be made that the State law had a discriminatory effect. That, after all, was the type of claim brought in Mobile. But mandating racial proportionality in elections was regarded by many as intolerable. Doing so, wrote Senator Orrin Hatch in the Washington Star, would be "strongly resented by the American public." Washington Star, Sept. 30, 1980, p. A–9. The Wall Street Journal offered similar criticism. An effects test would generate "more, not less, racial and ethnic polarization." Wall Street Journal, Jan. 19, 1982, p. 28.

This sharp debate arrived at Congress's doorstep in 1981. The question whether to broaden § 2 or keep it as is, said Hatch—by then Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee before which § 2 would be debated—"involve[d] one of the most substantial constitutional issues ever to come before this body." 2 Hearings before the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 1, p. 1 (1982).

Proceedings in Congress mirrored the disagreement that had developed around the country. In April 1981, Congressman Peter W. Rodino, Jr.—longtime chairman of the House Judiciary Committee—introduced a bill to amend the VRA, proposing that the words "to deny or abridge" in § 2 be replaced with the phrase "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement." H. R. 3112, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., 2 13 (as introduced) (emphasis added). This was the effects test that Mobile's detractors sought.

But those wary of proportionality were not far behind. Senator Hatch argued that the effects test "was intelligible only to the extent that it approximated a standard of proportional representation by race." Boyd & Markman 1392. The Attorney General had the same concern. The effects test "would be triggered whenever election results did not mirror the population mix of a particular community," he wrote, producing "essentially a quota system for electoral politics." N. Y. Times, Mar. 27, 1982, p. 23.

The impasse was not resolved until late April 1982, when Senator Bob Dole proposed a compromise. Boyd & Markman 1414. Section 2 would include the effects test that many desired but also a robust disclaimer against proportionality. Seeking to navigate any tension between the two, the Dole Amendment borrowed language from a Fourteenth Amendment case of ours, White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), which many in Congress believed would allow courts to consider effects but avoid proportionality. The standard for liability in voting cases, White explained, was whether "the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question—[in] that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice." Id., at 766, 93 S.Ct. 2332.

The Dole compromise won bipartisan support and, on June 18, the Senate passed the 1982 amendments by an overwhelming margin, 85–8. Eleven days later, President Reagan signed the Act into law. The amended § 2 reads as follows:

"(a) No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner 14 which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen *1501 of the United States to vote on account of race or color ... as provided in subsection (b).

"(b) A violation of subsection (a) is established if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens ... in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." 52 U.S.C. § 10301.

B

For the first 115 years following Reconstruction, the State of Alabama elected no black Representatives to Congress. See Singleton v. Merrill, 582 F.Supp.3d 924, 947 (ND Ala. 2022) (per curiam). In 1992, several plaintiffs sued the State, alleging that it had been impermissibly diluting the votes of black Alabamians in violation of § 2. See Wesch v. Hunt, 785 F.Supp. 1491, 1493 (SD Ala.). The lawsuit produced a majority-black district in Alabama for the first time in decades. Id., at 1499. And that fall, Birmingham lawyer Earl Hillard became the first black Representative from Alabama since 1877. 582 F.Supp.3d at 947.

Alabama's congressional map has "remained remarkably similar" after Wesch. Brief for Appellants in No. 21–1086 etc., p. 9 (Brief for Alabama). The map contains seven congressional districts, each with a single representative. See Supp. App. 205–211; 582 F.Supp.3d at 951. District 1 encompasses the Gulf Coast region in the southwest; District 15 2—known as the Wiregrass region—occupies the southeast; District 3 covers the eastern-central part of the State; Districts 4 and 5 stretch width-wise across the north, with the latter layered atop the former; District 6 is right in the State's middle; and District 7 spans the central west. Id., at 951.

In 2020, the decennial census revealed that Alabama's population had grown by 5.1%. See 1 App. 86. A group of plaintiffs led by Alabama legislator Bobby Singleton sued the State, arguing that the existing congressional map was malapportioned and racially gerrymandered in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. 582 F.Supp.3d at 938–939. While litigation was proceeding, the Alabama Legislature's Committee on Reapportionment began creating a new districting map. Ibid. Although the prior decade's population growth did not change the number of seats that Alabama would receive in the House, the growth had been unevenly distributed across the State, and the existing map was thus out of date.

To solve the problem, the State turned to experienced mapmaker Randy Hinaman, who had created several districting maps that Alabama used over the past 30 years. Id., at 947–948. The starting point for Hinaman was the then-existing 2011 congressional map, itself a product of the 2001 map that Hinaman had also created. Civ. No. 21–1530 (ND Ala.), ECF Doc. 70–2, pp. 40, 93–94; see also 582 F.Supp.3d at 950. Hinaman worked to adjust the 2011 map in accordance with the redistricting guidelines set by the legislature's Reapportionment Committee. Id., at 948–950; 1 App. 275. Those guidelines prioritized population equality, contiguity, compactness, and avoiding dilution of minority voting strength. 582 F.Supp.3d at 1035–1036. *1502 They also encouraged, as a secondary matter, avoiding incumbent pairings, respecting communities of interest, minimizing the number of counties in each district, and preserving cores of existing districts. Id., at 1036–1037.

16 The resulting map Hinaman drew largely resembled the 2011 map, again producing only one district in which black voters constituted a majority of the voting age population. Supp. App. 205–211. The Alabama Legislature enacted Hinaman's map under the name HB1. 582 F.Supp.3d at 935, 950–951. Governor Ivey signed HB1 into law on November 4, 2021. Id., at 950.

C

Three groups of plaintiffs brought suit seeking to stop Alabama's Secretary of State from conducting congressional elections under HB1. The first group was led by Dr. Marcus Caster, a resident of Washington County, who challenged HB1 as invalid under § 2. Id., at 934–935, 980. The second group, led by Montgomery County resident Evan Milligan, brought claims under § 2 and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Id., at 939–940, 966. Finally, the Singleton plaintiffs, who had previously sued to enjoin Alabama's 2011 congressional map, amended their complaint to challenge HB1 as an impermissible racial gerrymander under the Equal Protection Clause. Id., at 938–939.

A three-judge District Court was convened, comprised of Circuit Judge Marcus and District Judges Manasco and Moorer. The Singleton and Milligan actions were consolidated before the three-judge Court for purposes of preliminary injunction proceedings, while Caster proceeded before Judge Manasco on a parallel track. 582 F.Supp.3d at 934–935. A preliminary injunction hearing began on January 4, 2022, and concluded on January 12. Id., at 943. In that time, the three-judge District Court received live testimony from 17 witnesses, reviewed more than 1000 pages of briefing and upwards of 350 exhibits, and considered arguments from the 43 different lawyers who had appeared in the litigation. Id., at 935–936. After reviewing that extensive record, the Court concluded in a 227-page opinion that the question whether HB1 likely violated § 2 was not "a close one." It did. Id., at 1026. The Court thus preliminarily enjoined 17 Alabama from using HB1 in forthcoming elections. Id., at 936.[2]

Four days later, on January 28, Alabama moved in this Court for a stay of the District Court's injunction. This Court granted a stay and scheduled the cases for argument, noting probable jurisdiction in Milligan and granting certiorari before judgment in Caster. 595 U. S. ——, 142 S.Ct. 879, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2022).

II

The District Court found that plaintiffs demonstrated a reasonable likelihood of success on their claim that HB1 violates § 2. We affirm that determination.

A

For the past forty years, we have evaluated claims brought under § 2 using the three-part framework developed in our decision *1503 Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). Gingles concerned a challenge to North Carolina's multimember districting scheme, which allegedly diluted the vote of its black citizens. Id., at 34–36, 106 S.Ct. 2752. The case presented the first opportunity since the 1982 amendments to address how the new § 2 would operate.

[2] Gingles began by describing what § 2 guards against. "The essence of a § 2 claim," the Court explained, "is that a certain electoral law, practice, or structure interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by black and white voters." Id., at 47, 106 S.Ct. 2752. That occurs where an "electoral structure operates to 18 minimize or cancel out" minority voters' "ability to elect their preferred candidates." Id., at 48, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Such a risk is greatest "where minority and majority voters consistently prefer different candidates" and where minority voters are submerged in a majority voting population that "regularly defeat[s]" their choices. Ibid.

[3] [4] [5] To succeed in proving a § 2 violation under Gingles, plaintiffs must satisfy three "preconditions." Id., at 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752. First, the "minority group must be sufficiently large and [geographically] compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district." Wisconsin Legislature v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, 595 U. S. ——, ——, 142 S.Ct. 1245, 1248, 212 L.Ed.2d 251 (2022) (per curiam) (citing Gingles, 478 U.S. at 46–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752). A district will be reasonably configured, our cases explain, if it comports with traditional districting criteria, such as being contiguous and reasonably compact. See Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 272, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015). "Second, the minority group must be able to show that it is politically cohesive." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752. And third, "the minority must be able to demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Ibid. Finally, a plaintiff who demonstrates the three preconditions must also show, under the "totality of circumstances," that the political process is not "equally open" to minority voters. Id., at 45–46, 106 S.Ct. 2752; see also id., at 36–38, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (identifying several factors relevant to the totality of circumstances inquiry, including "the extent of any history of official discrimination in the state ... that touched the right of the members of the minority group to register, to vote, or otherwise to participate in the democratic process").

[6] [7] [8] [9] [10] Each Gingles precondition serves a different purpose. The first, focused on geographical compactness and numerosity, is "needed to establish that the minority has the potential to elect a representative of its own choice in some single-member district." Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993). The second, concerning the political cohesiveness of the minority 19 group, shows that a representative of its choice would in fact be elected. See ibid. The third precondition, focused on racially polarized voting, "establish[es] that the challenged districting thwarts a distinctive minority vote" at least plausibly on account of race. Ibid. And finally, the totality of circumstances inquiry recognizes that application of the Gingles factors is "peculiarly dependent upon the facts of each case." 478 U.S. at 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Before courts can find a violation of § 2, therefore, they must conduct "an intensely local appraisal" of the electoral mechanism at issue, as well as a "searching practical evaluation of the 'past and present reality.' " Ibid.

*1504 Gingles has governed our Voting Rights Act jurisprudence since it was decided 37 years ago. Congress has never disturbed our understanding of § 2 as Gingles construed it. And we have applied Gingles in one § 2 case after another, to different kinds of electoral systems and to different jurisdictions in States all over the country. See Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993) (Ohio); Growe, 507 U.S. at 25, 113 S.Ct. 1075 (Minnesota); Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994) (Florida); Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (Georgia); Abrams v. Johnson, 521 U.S. 74, 117 S.Ct. 1925, 138 L.Ed.2d 285 (1997) (Georgia); League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 423, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (LULAC) (Texas); Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (2009) (plurality opinion) (North Carolina); Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017) (North Carolina); Abbott v. Perez, 585 U. S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018) (Texas); Wisconsin Legislature, 595 U. S. ——, 142 S.Ct. 1245, 212 L.Ed.2d 251 (Wisconsin).

B

As noted, the District Court concluded that plaintiffs' § 2 claim was likely to succeed under Gingles. 582 F.Supp.3d at 1026. Based on our review of the record, we agree.

[11] With respect to the first Gingles precondition, the District Court correctly found that black voters could constitute a majority in a second district that was "reasonably configured." 1 App. to Emergency Application for Stay in 20 No. 21–1086 etc., p. 253 (MSA). The plaintiffs adduced eleven illustrative maps—that is, example districting maps that Alabama could enact—each of which contained two majority-black districts that comported with traditional districting criteria. With respect to compactness, for example, the District Court explained that the maps submitted by one of plaintiffs' experts, Dr. Moon Duchin, "perform[ed] generally better on average than" did HB1. 582 F.Supp.3d at 1009. A map offered by another of plaintiffs' experts, Bill Cooper, produced districts roughly as compact as the existing plan. Ibid. And none of plaintiffs' maps contained any "tentacles, appendages, bizarre shapes, or any other obvious irregularities that would make it difficult to find" them sufficiently compact. Id., at 1011. Plaintiffs' maps also satisfied other traditional districting criteria. They contained equal populations, were contiguous, and respected existing political subdivisions, such as counties, cities, and towns. Id., at 1011, 1016. Indeed, some of plaintiffs' proposed maps split the same number of county lines as (or even fewer county lines than) the State's map. Id., at 1011–1012. We agree with the District Court, therefore, that plaintiffs' illustrative maps "strongly suggest[ed] that Black voters in Alabama" could constitute a majority in a second, reasonably configured, district. Id., at 1010.

The State nevertheless argues that plaintiffs' maps were not reasonably configured because they failed to keep together a traditional community of interest within Alabama. See, e.g., id., at 1012. A "community of interest," according to Alabama's districting guidelines, is an "area with recognized similarities of interests, including but not limited to ethnic, racial, economic, tribal, social, geographic, or historical identities." Ibid. Alabama argues that the Gulf Coast region in the southwest of the State is such a community of interest, and that plaintiffs' maps erred by separating it into two different districts. Ibid.

21 *1505 We do not find the State's argument persuasive. Only two witnesses testified that the Gulf Coast was a community of interest. Id., at 1015. The testimony provided by one of those witnesses was "partial, selectively informed, and poorly supported." Ibid. The other witness, meanwhile, justified keeping the Gulf Coast together "simply" to preserve "political advantage[ ]": "You start splitting counties," he testified, "and that county loses its influence. That's why I don't want Mobile County to be split." Id., at 990, 1015. The District Court understandably found this testimony insufficient to sustain Alabama's "overdrawn argument that there can be no legitimate reason to split" the Gulf Coast region. Id., at 1015.

Even if the Gulf Coast did constitute a community of interest, moreover, the District Court found that plaintiffs' maps would still be reasonably configured because they joined together a different community of interest called the Black Belt. Id., at 1012–1014. Named for its fertile soil, the Black Belt contains a high proportion of black voters, who "share a rural geography, concentrated poverty, unequal access to government services, ... lack of adequate healthcare," and a lineal connection to "the many enslaved people brought there to work in the antebellum period." Id., at 1012–1013; see also 1 App. 299–304. The District Court concluded—correctly, under our precedent—that it did not have to conduct a "beauty contest[ ]" between plaintiffs' maps and the State's. There would be a split community of interest in both. 582 F.Supp.3d at 1012 (quoting Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 977–978, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion)).

[12] The State also makes a related argument based on "core retention"—a term that refers to the proportion of districts that remain when a State transitions from one districting plan to another. See, e.g., Brief for Alabama 25, 61. Here, by largely mirroring Alabama's 2011 districting plan, HB1 performs well on the core retention metric. Plaintiffs' illustrative 22 plans, by contrast, naturally fare worse because they change where the 2011 district lines were drawn. See e.g., Supp. App. 164–173. But this Court has never held that a State's adherence to a previously used districting plan can defeat a § 2 claim. If that were the rule, a State could immunize from challenge a new racially discriminatory redistricting plan simply by claiming that it resembled an old racially discriminatory plan. That is not the law: § 2 does not permit a State to provide some voters "less opportunity ... to participate in the political process" just because the State has done it before. 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b).

[13] As to the second and third Gingles preconditions, the District Court determined that there was "no serious dispute that Black voters are politically cohesive, nor that the challenged districts' white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat Black voters' preferred candidate." 582 F.Supp.3d at 1016 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court noted that, "on average, Black voters supported their candidates of choice with 92.3% of the vote" while "white voters supported Black-preferred candidates with 15.4% of the vote." Id., at 1017 (internal quotation marks omitted). Plaintiffs' experts described the evidence of racially polarized voting in Alabama as "intens[e]," "very strong," and "very clear." Ibid. Even Alabama's expert conceded "that the candidates preferred by white voters in the areas that he looked at regularly defeat the candidates preferred by Black voters." Id., at 1018.

[14] Finally, the District Court concluded that plaintiffs had carried their burden *1506 at the totality of circumstances stage. The Court observed that elections in Alabama were racially polarized; that "Black Alabamians enjoy virtually zero success in statewide elections"; that political campaigns in Alabama had been "characterized by overt or subtle racial appeals"; and that "Alabama's extensive history of repugnant racial and voting-related discrimination is undeniable and well documented." Id., at 1018–1024.

23 We see no reason to disturb the District Court's careful factual findings, which are subject to clear error review and have gone unchallenged by Alabama in any event. See Cooper, 581 U.S. at 309, 137 S.Ct. 1455. Nor is there a basis to upset the District Court's legal conclusions. The Court faithfully applied our precedents and correctly determined that, under existing law, HB1 violated § 2.

III

The heart of these cases is not about the law as it exists. It is about Alabama's attempt to remake our § 2 jurisprudence anew.

The centerpiece of the State's effort is what it calls the "race-neutral benchmark." The theory behind it is this: Using modern computer technology, mapmakers can now generate millions of possible districting maps for a given State. The maps can be designed to comply with traditional districting criteria but to not consider race. The mapmaker can determine how many majority-minority districts exist in each map, and can then calculate the median or average number of majority-minority districts in the entire multimillion-map set. That number is called the race-neutral benchmark.

The State contends that this benchmark should serve as the point of comparison in § 2 cases. The benchmark, the State says, was derived from maps that were "race-blind"—maps that cannot have "deni[ed] or abridge[d]" anyone's right to vote "on account of race" because they never took race into "account" in the first place. 52 U.S.C. § 10301(a). Courts in § 2 cases should therefore compare the number of majority-minority districts in the State's plan to the benchmark. If those numbers are similar—if the State's map "resembles" the benchmark in this way—then, Alabama argues, the State's map also cannot have "deni[ed] or abridge[d]" anyone's right to vote "on account of race." Ibid.

Alabama contends that its approach should be adopted for two reasons. First, the State argues that a race-neutral 24 benchmark best matches the text of the Voting Rights Act. Section 2 requires that the political processes be "equally open." § 10301(b). What that means, the State asserts, is that the State's map cannot impose "obstacles or burdens that block or seriously hinder voting on account of race." Brief for Alabama 43. These obstacles do not exist, in the State's view, where its map resembles a map that never took race into "account." Ibid. Second, Alabama argues that the Gingles framework ends up requiring racial proportionality in districting. According to the State, Gingles demands that where "another majority-black district could be drawn, it must be drawn." Brief for Alabama 71 (emphasis deleted). And that sort of proportionality, Alabama continues, is inconsistent with the compromise that Congress struck, with the text of § 2, and with the Constitution's prohibition on racial discrimination in voting.

To apply the race-neutral benchmark in practice, Alabama would require § 2 plaintiffs to make at least three showings. First, the illustrative plan that plaintiffs adduce for the first Gingles precondition cannot have been "based" on race. Brief for Alabama 56. Second, plaintiffs must show at *1507 the totality of circumstances stage that the State's enacted plan diverges from the average plan that would be drawn without taking race into account. And finally, plaintiffs must ultimately prove that any deviation between the State's plan and a race-neutral plan is explainable "only" by race—not, for example, by "the State's naturally occurring geography and demography." Id., at 46.

As we explain below, we find Alabama's new approach to § 2 compelling neither in theory nor in practice. We accordingly decline to recast our § 2 case law as Alabama requests.

A

1

Section 2 prohibits States from imposing any "standard, practice, or procedure ... in a manner which results in a 25 denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen ... to vote on account of race or color." 52 U.S.C. § 10301(a). What that means, § 2 goes on to explain, is that the political processes in the State must be "equally open," such that minority voters do not "have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." § 10301(b).

[15] [16] [17] [18] We have understood the language of § 2 against the background of the hard-fought compromise that Congress struck. To that end, we have reiterated that § 2 turns on the presence of discriminatory effects, not discriminatory intent. See, e.g., Chisom v. Roemer, 501 U.S. 380, 403–404, 111 S.Ct. 2354, 115 L.Ed.2d 348 (1991). And we have explained that "[i]t is patently clear that Congress has used the words 'on account of race or color' in the Act to mean 'with respect to' race or color, and not to connote any required purpose of racial discrimination." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 71, n. 34, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (plurality opinion) (some alterations omitted). Individuals thus lack an equal opportunity to participate in the political process when a State's electoral structure operates in a manner that "minimize[s] or cancel[s] out the[ir] voting strength." Id., at 47, 106 S.Ct. 2752. That occurs where an individual is disabled from "enter[ing] into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner" "in the light of past and present reality, political and otherwise." White, 412 U.S. at 767, 770, 93 S.Ct. 2332. A district is not equally open, in other words, when minority voters face—unlike their majority peers—bloc voting along racial lines, arising against the backdrop of substantial racial discrimination within the State, that renders a minority vote unequal to a vote by a nonminority voter.

The State's reading of § 2, by contrast, runs headlong into our precedent. Alabama asserts that a State's map does not "abridge[ ]" a person's right to vote "on account of race" if the map resembles a sufficient number of race-neutral alternatives. See Brief for Alabama 54–56. But our cases have consistently focused, for purposes of litigation, on the specific 26 illustrative maps that a plaintiff adduces. Deviation from that map shows it is possible that the State's map has a disparate effect on account of race. The remainder of the Gingles test helps determine whether that possibility is reality by looking to polarized voting preferences and the frequency of racially discriminatory actions taken by the State, past and present.

[19] A State's liability under § 2, moreover, must be determined "based on the totality of circumstances." 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b). Yet Alabama suggests there is only one "circumstance[ ]" that matters—how the State's map stacks up relative to the benchmark. That single-minded view of § 2 cannot be squared with the VRA's *1508 demand that courts employ a more refined approach. And we decline to adopt an interpretation of § 2 that would "revise and reformulate the Gingles threshold inquiry that has been the baseline of our § 2 jurisprudence" for nearly forty years. Bartlett, 556 U.S. at 16, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plurality opinion); see also Wisconsin Legislature, 595 U. S., at ——, 142 S.Ct., at 1250 (faulting lower court for "improperly reduc[ing] Gingles' totality-of-circumstances analysis to a single factor"); De Grandy, 512 U.S. at 1018, 114 S.Ct. 2647 ("An inflexible rule would run counter to the textual command of § 2, that the presence or absence of a violation be assessed 'based on the totality of circumstances.' ").[3]

2

Alabama also argues that the race-neutral benchmark is required because our existing § 2 jurisprudence inevitably demands racial proportionality in districting, contrary to the last sentence of § 2(b). But properly applied, the Gingles framework itself imposes meaningful constraints on proportionality, as our decisions have frequently demonstrated.

27 In Shaw v. Reno, for example, we considered the permissibility of a second majority-minority district in North Carolina, which at the time had 12 seats in the U. S. House of Representatives and a 20% black voting age population. 509 U.S. 630, 633–634, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993). The second majority-minority district North Carolina drew was "160 miles long and, for much of its length, no wider than the [interstate] corridor." Id., at 635, 113 S.Ct. 2816. The district wound "in snakelike fashion through tobacco country, financial centers, and manufacturing areas until it gobble[d] in enough enclaves of black neighborhoods." Id., at 635–636, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Indeed, the district was drawn so imaginatively that one state legislator remarked: "[I]f you drove down the interstate with both car doors open, you'd kill most of the people in the district." Id., at 636, 113 S.Ct. 2816.

Though North Carolina believed the additional district was required by § 2, we rejected that conclusion, finding instead that those challenging the map stated a claim of impermissible racial gerrymandering under the Equal Protection Clause. Id., at 655, 658, 113 S.Ct. 2816. In so holding, we relied on the fact that the proposed district was not reasonably compact. Id., at 647, 113 S.Ct. 2816. North Carolina had "concentrated a dispersed minority population in a single district by disregarding traditional districting principles such as compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions." Ibid. (emphasis added). And "[a] reapportionment plan that includes in one district individuals who belong to the same race, but who are otherwise separated by geographical and political boundaries," we said, raised serious constitutional concerns. Ibid. (emphasis added).

The same theme emerged in our 1995 decision Miller v. Johnson, where we upheld a district court's finding that one of Georgia's ten congressional districts was the product of an impermissible racial gerrymander. 515 U.S. 900, 906, 910–911, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762. At the time, Georgia's black voting age population was 27%, but there was only one majority-minority district. Id., at 906, 115 S.Ct. 2475. To comply with the VRA, Georgia thought it necessary 28 to create two more *1509 majority-minority districts—achieving proportionality. Id., at 920–921, 115 S.Ct. 2475. But like North Carolina in Shaw, Georgia could not create the districts without flouting traditional criteria. One district "centered around four discrete, widely spaced urban centers that ha[d] absolutely nothing to do with each other, and stretch[ed] the district hundreds of miles across rural counties and narrow swamp corridors." 515 U.S. at 908, 115 S.Ct. 2475. "Geographically," we said of the map, "it is a monstrosity." Id., at 909, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

In Bush v. Vera, a plurality of the Court again explained how traditional districting criteria limited any tendency of the VRA to compel proportionality. The case concerned Texas's creation of three additional majority-minority districts. 517 U.S. at 957, 116 S.Ct. 1941. Though the districts brought the State closer to proportional representation, we nevertheless held that they constituted racial gerrymanders in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. That was because the districts had "no integrity in terms of traditional, neutral redistricting criteria." Id., at 960, 116 S.Ct. 1941. One of the majority-black districts consisted "of narrow and bizarrely shaped tentacles." Id., at 965, 116 S.Ct. 1941. The proposed majority-Hispanic district resembled "a sacred Mayan bird" with "[s]pindly legs reach[ing] south" and a "plumed head ris[ing] northward." Id., at 974, 116 S.Ct. 1941.

The point of all this is a simple one. Forcing proportional representation is unlawful and inconsistent with this Court's approach to implementing § 2. The numbers bear the point out well. At the congressional level, the fraction of districts in which black-preferred candidates are likely to win "is currently below the Black share of the eligible voter population in every state but three." Brief for Professors Jowei Chen et al. as Amici Curiae 3 (Chen Brief). Only one State in the country, meanwhile, "has attained a proportional share" of districts in which Hispanic-preferred candidates are likely to prevail. Id., at 3–4. That is because as residential segregation decreases—as it has "sharply" done since the 29 1970s—satisfying traditional districting criteria such as the compactness requirement "becomes more difficult." T. Crum, Reconstructing Racially Polarized Voting, 70 Duke L. J. 261, 279, and n. 105 (2020).

Indeed, as amici supporting the appellees emphasize, § 2 litigation in recent years has rarely been successful for just that reason. See Chen Brief 3–4. Since 2010, plaintiffs nationwide have apparently succeeded in fewer than ten § 2 suits. Id., at 7. And "the only state legislative or congressional districts that were redrawn because of successful Section 2 challenges were a handful of state house districts near Milwaukee and Houston." Id., at 7–8. By contrast, "[n]umerous lower courts" have upheld districting maps "where, due to minority populations' geographic diffusion, plaintiffs couldn't design an additional majority-minority district" or satisfy the compactness requirement. Id., at 15–16 (collecting cases). The same has been true of recent litigation in this Court. See Abbott, 585 U. S., at —— – ——, 138 S.Ct., at 2331 (finding a Texas district did not violate § 2 because "the geography and demographics of south and west Texas do not permit the creation of any more than the seven Latino ... districts that exist under the current plan").[4]

*1510 [20] [21] Reapportionment, we have repeatedly observed, "is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State[s]," not the federal courts. Id., at ——, 138 S.Ct., at 2324. Properly applied, the Gingles factors help ensure that remains the case. As respondents 30 themselves emphasize, § 2 "never require[s] adoption of districts that violate traditional redistricting principles." Brief for Respondents in No. 21–1087, p. 3. Its exacting requirements, instead, limit judicial intervention to "those instances of intensive racial politics" where the "excessive role [of race] in the electoral process ... den[ies] minority voters equal opportunity to participate." Senate Report 33–34.

B

Although we are content to reject Alabama's invitation to change existing law on the ground that the State misunderstands § 2 and our decisions implementing it, we also address how the race-neutral benchmark would operate in practice. Alabama's approach fares poorly on that score, which further counsels against our adopting it.

1

The first change to existing law that Alabama would require is prohibiting the illustrative maps that plaintiffs submit to satisfy the first Gingles precondition from being "based" on race. Brief for Alabama 56. Although Alabama is not entirely clear whether, under its view, plaintiffs' illustrative plans must not take race into account at all or whether they must just not "prioritize" race, ibid., we see no reason to impose such a new rule.

When it comes to considering race in the context of districting, we have made clear that there is a difference "between being aware of racial considerations and being motivated by them." Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475; see also North Carolina v. Covington, 585 U. S. ——, ——, 138 S.Ct. 2548, 2553, 201 L.Ed.2d 993 (2018) (per curiam). The former is permissible; the latter is usually not. That is because "[r]edistricting legislatures will ... almost always be aware of racial demographics," Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, but such "race consciousness does not lead inevitably to impermissible race discrimination," Shaw, 509 U.S. at 646, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Section 2 itself "demands consideration of race." 31 Abbott, 581 U. S., at ——, 138 S.Ct., at 2315. The question whether additional majority-minority districts can be drawn, after all, involves a "quintessentially race-conscious calculus." De Grandy, 512 U.S. at 1020, 114 S.Ct. 2647.

At the same time, however, race may not be "the predominant factor in drawing district lines unless [there is] a compelling reason." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 291, 137 S.Ct. 1455. Race predominates in the drawing of district lines, our cases explain, when "race-neutral considerations [come] into play only after the race-based decision had been made." Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 189, 137 S.Ct. 788, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017) (internal quotation marks omitted). That may occur where "race for its own sake is the overriding reason for choosing one map over others." Id., at 190, 137 S.Ct. 788.

While the line between racial predominance and racial consciousness can be difficult 1511 to discern, see Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, it was not breached here. The Caster plaintiffs relied on illustrative maps produced by expert Bill Cooper. See 2 App. 591–592. Cooper testified that while it was necessary for him to consider race, he also took several other factors into account, such as compactness, contiguity, and population equality. Ibid. Cooper testified that he gave all these factors "equal weighting." Id., at 594. And when asked squarely whether race predominated in his development of the illustrative plans, Cooper responded: "No. It was a consideration. This is a Section 2 lawsuit, after all. But it did not predominate or dominate." Id., at 595.

The District Court agreed. It found "Cooper's testimony highly credible" and commended Cooper for "work[ing] hard to give 'equal weight[ ]' to all traditional redistricting criteria." 582 F.Supp.3d at 1005–1006; see also id., at 978–979. The court also explained that Alabama's evidence of racial predominance in Cooper's maps was exceedingly thin. Alabama's expert, Thomas Bryan, "testified that he never reviewed the exhibits to Mr. Cooper's report" and "that he never reviewed" one of the illustrative plans that Cooper *32 submitted. Id., at 1006. Bryan further testified that he could offer no "conclusions or opinions as to the apparent basis of any individual line drawing decisions in Cooper's illustrative plans." 2 App. 740. By his own admission, Bryan's analysis of any race predominance in Cooper's maps "was pretty light." Id., at 739. The District Court did not err in finding that race did not predominate in Cooper's maps in light of the evidence before it.[5]

The dissent contends that race nevertheless predominated in both Cooper's and Duchin's maps because they were designed to hit " 'express racial target[s]' "—namely, two "50%-plus majority-black districts." Post, at 1527 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (quoting Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 192, 137 S.Ct. 788). This argument fails in multiple ways. First, the dissent's reliance on Bethune-Hill is mistaken. In that case, this Court was unwilling to conclude that a State's maps were produced in a racially predominant manner. Instead, we remanded for the lower court to conduct the predominance analysis itself, explaining that "the use of an express racial target" was just one factor among others that the court would have to consider as part of "[a] holistic analysis." Id., at 192, 137 S.Ct. 788. Justice *33 THOMAS dissented in relevant part, contending that because "the legislature sought to achieve a [black voting-age population] of at least 55%," race necessarily predominated in its decisionmaking. Id., at 198, 137 S.Ct. 788 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part). But the Court did not join in that view, and Justice THOMAS again dissents along the same lines today.

1512 The second flaw in the dissent's proposed approach is its inescapable consequence: Gingles must be overruled. According to the dissent, racial predominance plagues every single illustrative map ever adduced at the first step of Gingles. For all those maps were created with an express target in mind—they were created to show, as our cases require, that an additional majority-minority district could be drawn. That is the whole point of the enterprise. The upshot of the approach the dissent urges is not to change how Gingles is applied, but to reject its framework outright.

The contention that mapmakers must be entirely "blind" to race has no footing in our § 2 case law. The line that we have long drawn is between consciousness and predominance. Plaintiffs adduced at least one illustrative map that comported with our precedents. They were required to do no more to satisfy the first step of Gingles.

2

The next condition Alabama would graft onto § 2 is a requirement that plaintiffs demonstrate, at the totality of circumstances stage, that the State's enacted plan contains fewer majority-minority districts than the race-neutral benchmark. Brief for Alabama 43. If it does not, then § 2 should drop out of the picture. Id., at 44.

Alabama argues that is what should have happened here. It notes that one of plaintiffs' experts, Dr. Duchin, used an algorithm to create "2 million districting plans for Alabama ... without taking race into account in any way in the generation process." 2 App. 710. Of these two million "race-blind" *34 plans, none contained two majority-black districts while many plans did not contain any. Ibid. Alabama also points to a "race-neutral" computer simulation conducted by another one of plaintiffs' experts, Dr. Kosuke Imai, which produced 30,000 potential maps. Brief for Alabama 55. As with Dr. Duchin's maps, none of the maps that Dr. Imai created contained two majority-black districts. See 2 App. 571–572. Alabama thus contends that because HB1 sufficiently "resembles" the "race-neutral" maps created by Dr. Duchin and Dr. Imai—all of the maps lack two majority-black districts—HB1 does not violate § 2. Brief for Alabama 54.

Alabama's reliance on the maps created by Dr. Duchin and Dr. Imai is misplaced. For one, neither Duchin's nor Imai's maps accurately represented the districting process in Alabama. Dr. Duchin's maps were based on old census data—from 2010 instead of 2020—and ignored certain traditional districting criteria, such as keeping together communities of interest, political subdivisions, or municipalities.[6] And Dr. Imai's 30,000 maps failed to incorporate Alabama's own districting guidelines, including keeping together communities of interest and preserving municipal boundaries. See Supp. App. 58–59.[7]

35 *1513 But even if the maps created by Dr. Duchin and Dr. Imai were adequate comparators, we could not adopt the map-comparison test that Alabama proposes. The test is flawed in its fundamentals. Districting involves myriad considerations—compactness, contiguity, political subdivisions, natural geographic boundaries, county lines, pairing of incumbents, communities of interest, and population equality. See Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Yet "[q]uantifying, measuring, prioritizing, and reconciling these criteria" requires map drawers to "make difficult, contestable choices." Brief for Computational Redistricting Experts as Amici Curiae 8 (Redistricting Brief). And "[i]t is easy to imagine how different criteria could move the median map toward different ... distributions," meaning that "the same map could be [lawful] or not depending solely on what the mapmakers said they set out to do." Rucho v. Common Cause, 588 U. S. ——, ——–——, 139 S.Ct. 2484, 2505, 204 L.Ed.2d 931 (2019). For example, "the scientific literature contains dozens of competing metrics" on the issue of compactness. Redistricting Brief 8. Which one of these metrics should be used? What happens when the maps they produce yield different benchmark results? How are courts to decide?

[22] Alabama does not say; it offers no rule or standard for determining which of these choices are better than others. Nothing in § 2 provides an answer either. In 1982, the computerized mapmaking software that Alabama contends plaintiffs 36 must use to demonstrate an (unspecified) level of deviation did not even exist. See, e.g., J. Chen & N. Stephanopoulos, The Race-Blind Future of Voting Rights, 130 Yale L. J. 862, 881–882 (2021) (Chen & Stephanopoulos). And neither the text of § 2 nor the fraught debate that produced it suggests that "equal access" to the fundamental right of voting turns on computer simulations that are technically complicated, expensive to produce, and available to "[o]nly a small cadre of university researchers [that] have the resources and expertise to run" them. Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 28 (citing Chen & Stephanopoulos 882–884).[8]

One final point bears mentioning. Throughout these cases, Alabama has repeatedly emphasized that HB1 cannot have violated § 2 because none of plaintiffs' two million odd maps contained more than one majority-minority district. See, e.g., Brief for Alabama 1, 23, 30, 31, 54–56, 70, 79. The point is that two million is a very big number and that sheer volume matters. But as elsewhere, Alabama misconceives *1514 the math project that it expects courts to oversee. A brief submitted by three computational redistricting experts explains that the number of possible districting maps in Alabama is at least in the "trillion trillions." Redistricting Brief 6, n. 7. Another publication reports that the number of potential maps may be orders of magnitude higher: "the universe of all possible connected, population-balanced districting plans that satisfy the state's requirements," it explains, "is likely in the range of googols." Duchin & Spencer 768. Two million maps, in other words, is not many maps at all. And Alabama's insistent reliance on that number, 37 however powerful it may sound in the abstract, is thus close to irrelevant in practice. What would the next million maps show? The next billion? The first trillion of the trillion trillions? Answerless questions all. See, e.g., Redistricting Brief 2 ("[I]t is computationally intractable, and thus effectively impossible, to generate a complete enumeration of all potential districting plans. [Even] algorithms that attempt to create a manageable sample of that astronomically large universe do not consistently identify an average or median map."); Duchin & Spencer 768 ("[A] comprehensive survey of [all districting plans within a State] is impossible.").

Section 2 cannot require courts to judge a contest of computers when there is no reliable way to determine who wins, or even where the finish line is.

3

Alabama's final contention with respect to the race-neutral benchmark is that it requires plaintiffs to demonstrate that any deviations between the State's enacted plan and race-neutral alternatives "can be explained only by racial discrimination." Brief for Alabama 44 (emphasis added).

We again find little merit in Alabama's proposal. As we have already explained, our precedents and the legislative compromise struck in the 1982 amendments clearly rejected treating discriminatory intent as a requirement for liability under § 2. See, e.g., Chisom, 501 U.S. at 403–404, 111 S.Ct. 2354; Shaw, 509 U.S. at 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816; Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 481–482, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730 (1997). Yet Alabama's proposal is even more demanding than the intent test Congress jettisoned. Demonstrating discriminatory intent, we have long held, "does not require a plaintiff to prove that the challenged action rested solely on racially discriminatory purpose[ ]." Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 265, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977) (emphasis added); see also Reno, 520 U.S. at 488, 117 S.Ct. 1491. Alabama's proposed approach stands in sharp contrast to all this, injecting into the effects test of § 2 an 38 evidentiary standard that even our purposeful discrimination cases eschew.

C

Alabama finally asserts that the Court should outright stop applying § 2 in cases like these because the text of § 2 does not apply to single-member redistricting and because § 2 is unconstitutional as the District Court applied it here. We disagree on both counts.

[23] Alabama first argues that § 2 does not apply to single-member redistricting. Echoing Justice THOMAS's concurrence in Holder v. Hall, Alabama reads § 2's reference to "standard, practice, or procedure" to mean only the "methods for conducting a part of the voting process that might ... be used to interfere with a citizen's ability to cast his vote." 512 U.S. at 917–918, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion concurring *1515 in judgment). Examples of covered activities would include "registration requirements, ... the locations of polling places, the times polls are open, the use of paper ballots as opposed to voting machines, and other similar aspects of the voting process." Id., at 922, 114 S.Ct. 2581. But not "a single-member districting system or the selection of one set of districting lines over another." Id., at 923, 114 S.Ct. 2581.

This understanding of § 2 cannot be reconciled with our precedent. As recounted above, we have applied § 2 to States' districting maps in an unbroken line of decisions stretching four decades. See supra, at 1503 – 1504; see also Brnovich, 594 U. S., at ——, n. 5, 141 S.Ct., at 2333, n. 5) (collecting cases). In doing so, we have unanimously held that § 2 and Gingles "[c]ertainly ... apply" to claims challenging single-member districts. Growe, 507 U.S. at 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075. And we have even invalidated portions of a State's single-district map under § 2. See LULAC, 548 U.S. at 427–429, 126 S.Ct. 2594.[9] Alabama's approach would require 39 "abandoning" this precedent, "overruling the interpretation of § 2" as set out in nearly a dozen of our cases. Holder, 512 U.S. at 944, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

We decline to take that step. Congress is undoubtedly aware of our construing § 2 to apply to districting challenges. It can change that if it likes. But until and unless it does, statutory stare decisis counsels our staying the course. See, e.g., Kimble v. Marvel Entertainment, LLC, 576 U.S. 446, 456, 135 S.Ct. 2401, 192 L.Ed.2d 463 (2015).[10]

The statutory text in any event supports the conclusion that § 2 applies to single-member districts. Alabama's own proffered definition of a "procedure is the manner or method of proceeding in a process or course of action." Brief for Alabama 51 (internal quotation marks omitted). But the manner of proceeding in the act of voting entails determining in which districts voters will vote. The fact that the term "procedure" is preceded by the phrase "qualification or prerequisite to voting," 52 U.S.C. § 10301(a), does not change its meaning. It is hard to imagine many more fundamental "prerequisites" to voting than determining where to cast your ballot or who you are eligible to vote for. Perhaps for 40 that reason, even Alabama *1516 does not bear the courage of its conviction on this point. It refuses to argue that § 2 is inapplicable to multimember districting, though its textual arguments apply with equal force in that context.

The dissent, by contrast, goes where even Alabama does not dare, arguing that § 2 is wholly inapplicable to districting because it "focuses on ballot access and counting" only. Post, at 1520 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). But the statutory text upon which the dissent relies supports the exact opposite conclusion. The relevant section provides that "[t]he terms 'vote' or 'voting' shall include all action necessary to make a vote effective." Ibid. (quoting 52 U.S.C. § 10310(c)(1); emphasis added). Those actions "includ[e], but [are] not limited to, ... action[s] required by law prerequisite to voting, casting a ballot, and having such ballot counted properly and included in the appropriate totals of votes cast." § 10310(c)(1). It would be anomalous to read the broad language of the statute—"all action necessary," "including but not limited to"—to have the crabbed reach that Justice THOMAS posits. And we have already discussed why determining where to cast a ballot constitutes a "prerequisite" to voting, as the statute requires.

The dissent also contends that "applying § 2 to districting rests on systematic neglect of ... the ballot-access focus of the 1960s' voting-rights struggles." Post, at 1520 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). But history did not stop in 1960. As we have explained, Congress adopted the amended § 2 in response to the 1980 decision City of Mobile, a case about districting. And—as the dissent itself acknowledges—"Congress drew § 2(b)'s current operative language" from the 1973 decision White v. Regester, post, at 1521, n. 3 (opinion of THOMAS, J.), a case that was also about districting (in fact, a case that invalidated two multimember districts in Texas and ordered them redrawn into single-member districts, 412 U.S. at 765, 93 S.Ct. 2332). This was not lost on anyone when § 2 was amended. Indeed, it was the precise reason that the contentious debates over 41 proportionality raged—debates that would have made little sense if § 2 covered only poll taxes and the like, as the dissent contends.

[24] [25] We also reject Alabama's argument that § 2 as applied to redistricting is unconstitutional under the Fifteenth Amendment. According to Alabama, that Amendment permits Congress to legislate against only purposeful discrimination by States. See Brief for Alabama 73. But we held over 40 years ago "that, even if § 1 of the [Fifteenth] Amendment prohibits only purposeful discrimination, the prior decisions of this Court foreclose any argument that Congress may not, pursuant to § 2 [of the Fifteenth Amendment] outlaw voting practices that are discriminatory in effect." City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 173, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980). The VRA's "ban on electoral changes that are discriminatory in effect," we emphasized, "is an appropriate method of promoting the purposes of the Fifteenth Amendment." Id., at 177, 100 S.Ct. 1548. As City of Rome recognized, we had reached the very same conclusion in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, a decision issued right after the VRA was first enacted. 383 U.S. at 308–309, 329–337, 86 S.Ct. 803; see also Brnovich, 594 U. S., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2330–2331.

Alabama further argues that, even if the Fifteenth Amendment authorizes the effects test of § 2, that Amendment does not authorize race-based redistricting as a remedy for § 2 violations. But for the last four decades, this Court and the lower federal courts have repeatedly applied the effects test of § 2 as interpreted in Gingles and, under certain circumstances, have authorized race-based redistricting as *1517 a remedy for state districting maps that violate § 2. See, e.g., supra, at 1503 – 1504; cf. Mississippi Republican Executive Committee v. Brooks, 469 U.S. 1002, 105 S.Ct. 416, 83 L.Ed.2d 343 (1984). In light of that precedent, including City of Rome, we are not persuaded by Alabama's arguments that § 2 as interpreted in Gingles exceeds the remedial authority of Congress.

The concern that § 2 may impermissibly elevate race in the allocation of political power within the States is, of course, 42 not new. See, e.g., Shaw, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816 ("Racial gerrymandering, even for remedial purposes, may balkanize us into competing racial factions; it threatens to carry us further from the goal of a political system in which race no longer matters."). Our opinion today does not diminish or disregard these concerns. It simply holds that a faithful application of our precedents and a fair reading of the record before us do not bear them out here.

* * *

The judgments of the District Court for the Northern District of Alabama in the Caster case, and of the three-judge District Court in the Milligan case, are affirmed.

It is so ordered.

Justice KAVANAUGH, concurring in all but Part III–B–1.
I agree with the Court that Alabama's redistricting plan violates § 2 of the Voting Rights Act as interpreted in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). I write separately to emphasize four points.

First, the upshot of Alabama's argument is that the Court should overrule Gingles. But the stare decisis standard for this Court to overrule a statutory precedent, as distinct from a constitutional precedent, is comparatively strict. Unlike with constitutional precedents, Congress and the President may enact new legislation to alter statutory precedents such as Gingles. In the past 37 years, however, Congress and the President have not disturbed Gingles, even as they have made other changes to the Voting Rights Act. Although statutory stare decisis is not absolute, "the Court has ordinarily left the updating or correction of erroneous statutory precedents to the legislative process." Ramos v. Louisiana, 590 U. S. ——, ——, 140 S.Ct. 1390, 1413, 206 L.Ed.2d 583 (2020) (KAVANAUGH, J., concurring in part); see also, e.g., Kimble v. Marvel Entertainment, LLC, 576 U.S. 446, 456, 135 S.Ct. 2401, 192 L.Ed.2d 463 (2015); 43 Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164, 172–173, 109 S.Ct. 2363, 105 L.Ed.2d 132 (1989); Flood v. Kuhn, 407 U.S. 258, 283–284, 92 S.Ct. 2099, 32 L.Ed.2d 728 (1972); Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co., 285 U.S. 393, 406, 52 S.Ct. 443, 76 L.Ed. 815 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).[1]

Second, Alabama contends that Gingles inevitably requires a proportional number of majority-minority districts, which in turn contravenes the proportionality disclaimer in § 2(b) of the Voting Rights Act. 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b). But Alabama's *1518 premise is wrong. As the Court's precedents make clear, Gingles does not mandate a proportional number of majority-minority districts. Gingles requires the creation of a majority-minority district only when, among other things, (i) a State's redistricting map cracks or packs a large and "geographically compact" minority population and (ii) a plaintiff 's proposed alternative map and proposed majority-minority district are "reasonably configured"—namely, by respecting compactness principles and other traditional districting criteria such as county, city, and town lines. See, e.g., Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 301–302, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017); Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 153–154, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993); ante, at 1503 – 1505, 1507 – 1510.

If Gingles demanded a proportional number of majority-minority districts, States would be forced to group together geographically dispersed minority voters into unusually shaped districts, without concern for traditional districting criteria such as county, city, and town lines. But Gingles and this Court's later decisions have flatly rejected that approach. See, e.g., Abbott v. Perez, 585 U. S. ——, —— – ——, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 2331–2332, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018); Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 979, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion); 44 Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752; see also Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 917–920, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995); Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 644–649, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993); ante, at 1507 – 1510, 113 S.Ct. 2816.[2]

Third, Alabama argues that courts should rely on race-blind computer simulations of redistricting maps to assess whether a State's plan abridges the right to vote on account of race. It is true that computer simulations might help detect the presence or absence of intentional discrimination. For example, if all of the computer simulations generated only one majority-minority district, it might be difficult to say that a State had intentionally discriminated on the basis of race by failing to draw a second majority-minority district.

But as this Court has long recognized—and as all Members of this Court today agree—the text of § 2 establishes an effects test, not an intent test. See ante, at 1507; post, at 1522 – 1523 (THOMAS, J., dissenting); post, at 1556 – 1557 (ALITO, J., dissenting). And the effects test, as applied by Gingles to redistricting, requires in certain circumstances that courts account for the race of voters so as to prevent the cracking or packing—whether intentional or not—of large and geographically compact minority populations. See Abbott, 585 U. S., at ——, 138 S.Ct., at 2314–2315; Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1006–1007, 1020, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994); Voinovich, 507 U.S. at 153–154, 113 S.Ct. 1149; see generally Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee, 594 U. S. ——, ——, 141 S.Ct. 2321, 2341, 210 L.Ed.2d 753 (2021) ("§ 2 does not demand proof of discriminatory purpose"); Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 482, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730 (1997) (Congress "clearly expressed its desire that § 2 not have an intent component"); *1519 Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 923–924, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment) (§ 2 adopts a 45 " 'results' test, rather than an 'intent' test"); Chisom v. Roemer, 501 U.S. 380, 394, 404, 111 S.Ct. 2354, 115 L.Ed.2d 348 (1991) ("proof of intent is no longer required to prove a § 2 violation" as "Congress made clear that a violation of § 2 could be established by proof of discriminatory results alone"); Gingles, 478 U.S. at 71, n. 34, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (plurality opinion) (§ 2 does not require " 'purpose of racial discrimination' ").

Fourth, Alabama asserts that § 2, as construed by Gingles to require race-based redistricting in certain circumstances, exceeds Congress's remedial or preventive authority under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. As the Court explains, the constitutional argument presented by Alabama is not persuasive in light of the Court's precedents. See ante, at 1516 – 1517; see also City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 177–178, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980). Justice THOMAS notes, however, that even if Congress in 1982 could constitutionally authorize race-based redistricting under § 2 for some period of time, the authority to conduct race-based redistricting cannot extend indefinitely into the future. See post, at 1543 – 1544 (dissenting opinion). But Alabama did not raise that temporal argument in this Court, and I therefore would not consider it at this time.

For those reasons, I vote to affirm, and I concur in all but Part III–B–1 of the Court's opinion.

Justice THOMAS, with whom Justice GORSUCH joins, with whom Justice BARRETT joins as to Parts II and III, and with whom Justice ALITO joins as to Parts II–A and II–B, dissenting.

These cases "are yet another installment in the 'disastrous misadventure' of this Court's voting rights jurisprudence." Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 294, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015) (THOMAS, J., dissenting) (quoting Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 893, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment)). What distinguishes them is the uncommon clarity with which they lay bare the gulf between our "color-blind" 46 Constitution, Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting), and "the consciously segregated districting system currently being constructed in the name of the Voting Rights Act." Holder, 512 U.S. at 907, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). The question presented is whether § 2 of the Act, as amended, requires the State of Alabama to intentionally redraw its longstanding congressional districts so that black voters can control a number of seats roughly proportional to the black share of the State's population. Section 2 demands no such thing, and, if it did, the Constitution would not permit it.

I

At the outset, I would resolve these cases in a way that would not require the Federal Judiciary to decide the correct racial apportionment of Alabama's congressional seats. Under the statutory text, a § 2 challenge must target a "voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure." 52 U.S.C. § 10301(a). I have long been convinced that those words reach only "enactments that regulate citizens' access to the ballot or the processes for counting a ballot"; they "do not include a State's ... choice of one districting scheme over another." Holder, 512 U.S. at 945, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). "Thus, § 2 cannot provide a basis for invalidating any district." *1520 Abbott v. Perez, 585 U. S. ——, ——, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 2335, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018) (THOMAS, J., concurring).

While I will not repeat all the arguments that led me to this conclusion nearly three decades ago, see Holder, 512 U.S. at 914–930, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion concurring in judgment), the Court's belated appeal to the statutory text is not persuasive. See ante, at 1515 – 1516. Whatever words like "practice" and "procedure" are capable of meaning in a vacuum, the prohibitions of § 2 apply to practices and procedures that affect "voting" and "the right ... to vote." § 10301(a). "Vote" and "voting" are defined terms under the Act, and the Act's definition plainly focuses on ballot access and counting:

> 47 "The terms 'vote' or 'voting' shall include all action necessary to make a vote effective in any primary, special, or general election, including, but not limited to, registration, listing pursuant to this chapter, or other action required by law prerequisite to voting, casting a ballot, and having such ballot counted properly and included in the appropriate totals of votes cast with respect to candidates for public or party office and propositions for which votes are received in an election." § 10310(c)(1).

In enacting the original Voting Rights Act in 1965, Congress copied this definition almost verbatim from Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1960—a law designed to protect access to the ballot in jurisdictions with patterns or practices of denying such access based on race, and which cannot be construed to authorize so-called vote-dilution claims. See 74 Stat. 91–92 (codified in relevant part at 52 U.S.C. § 10101(e)). Title I of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which cross-referenced the 1960 Act's definition of "vote," likewise protects ballot access alone and cannot be read to address vote dilution. See 78 Stat. 241 (codified in relevant part at 52 U.S.C. § 10101(a)). Tellingly, the 1964 Act also used the words "standard, practice, or procedure" to refer specifically to voting qualifications for individuals and the actions of state and local officials in administering such requirements.[1] Our entire enterprise of applying § 2 to districting rests on systematic neglect of these statutory antecedents and, more broadly, of the ballot-access focus of the 1960s' voting-rights struggles. See, e.g., 48 Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee, 594 U. S. ——, ——, 141 S.Ct. 2321, 2330, 210 L.Ed.2d 753 (2021) (describing the "notorious methods" by which, prior to the Voting Rights Act, States and localities deprived black Americans of the ballot: "poll taxes, literacy tests, property qualifications, white primaries, and grandfather clauses" (alterations and internal quotation marks omitted)).[2]

Moreover, the majority drastically overstates the stare decisis support for applying § 2 to single-member districting plans 1521 like the one at issue here.[3] As the majority implicitly acknowledges, this Court has only applied § 2 to invalidate one single-member district in one case. See League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 447, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (LULAC) (opinion of Kennedy, J.). And no party in *49 that case argued that the plaintiffs' vote-dilution claim was not cognizable. As for Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993), it held only that the threshold preconditions for challenging multimember and at-large plans must limit challenges to single-member districts with at least the same force, as "[i]t would be peculiar [if] a vote-dilution challenge to the (more dangerous) multimember district require[d] a higher threshold showing than a vote-fragmentation challenge to a single-member district." Id., at 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075. Growe did not consider (or, thus, reject) an argument that § 2 does not apply to single-member districts.

In any event, stare decisis should be no barrier to reconsidering a line of cases that "was based on a flawed method of statutory construction from its inception," has proved incapable of principled application after nearly four decades of experience, and puts federal courts in the business of "methodically carving the country into racially designated electoral districts." Holder, 512 U.S. at 945, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). This Court has "never applied stare decisis mechanically to prohibit overruling our earlier decisions determining the meaning of statutes," and it should not do so here. Monell v. New York City Dept. of Social Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 695, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978). Stare decisis did not save "separate but equal," despite its repeated reaffirmation in this Court and the pervasive reliance States had placed upon it for decades. See, e.g., Brief for Appellees in Brown v. Board of Education, O. T. 1953, No. 1, pp. 18–30. It should not rescue modern-day forms of de jure racial balkanization—which, as these cases show, is exactly where our § 2 vote-dilution jurisprudence has led.[4]

*50 1522 II

Even if § 2 applies here, however, Alabama should prevail. The District Court found that Alabama's congressional districting map "dilutes" black residents' votes because, while it is possible to draw two majority-black districts, Alabama's map only has one.[5] But the critical question in all vote-dilution cases is: "Diluted relative to what benchmark?" Gonzalez v. Aurora, 535 F.3d 594, 598 (CA7 2008) (Easterbrook, C. J.). Neither the District Court nor the majority has any defensible answer. The text of § 2 and the logic of vote-dilution claims require a meaningfully race-neutral benchmark, and no race-neutral benchmark can justify the District Court's finding of vote dilution in these cases. The *51 only benchmark that can justify it—and the one that the District Court demonstrably applied—is the decidedly nonneutral benchmark of proportional allocation of political power based on race.

A

As we have long recognized, "the very concept of vote dilution implies—and, indeed, necessitates—the existence of an 'undiluted' practice against which the fact of dilution may be measured." Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 480, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730 (1997). In a challenge to a districting plan, a court must be able to compare a State's enacted plan with "a hypothetical, undiluted plan," ibid., ascertained by an "objective and workable standard." Holder, 512 U.S. at 881, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (plurality opinion); see also id., at 887, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of O'Connor, J.) (noting the "general agreement" on this point).

To be sure, it is no easy task to identify an objective, "undiluted" benchmark against which to judge a districting plan. As we recently held in the analogous context of partisan gerrymandering, "federal courts are not equipped to apportion political power as a matter of fairness." Rucho v. Common Cause, 588 U. S. ——, ——, 139 S.Ct. 2484, 2499, 204 L.Ed.2d 931 (2019). Yet § 2 vote-dilution cases require nothing less. If § 2 prohibited only intentional racial discrimination, there would be no difficulty in finding a clear and workable rule of decision. But the "results test" that Congress wrote into § 2 to supersede Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1519, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980), eschews intent as the criterion of liability. See Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. at 482, 117 S.Ct. 1491. Accordingly, a § 2 vote-dilution 1523 claim does not simply "as[k] ... for the elimination of a racial classification." Rucho, 588 U. S., at ——, 139 S.Ct., at 2502. It asks, instead, "for a fair share of political power and influence, with all the justiciability conundrums that entails." Ibid. Nevertheless, if § 2 applies to single-member districts, we must accept that some "objective and workable standard for choosing a reasonable benchmark" exists; otherwise, single-member districts "cannot be challenged as dilutive under § 2." Holder, 512 U.S. at 881, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (plurality opinion).

52 Given the diverse circumstances of different jurisdictions, it would be fanciful to expect a one-size-fits-all definition of the appropriate benchmark. Cf. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986) (explaining that the vote-dilution inquiry "is peculiarly dependent upon the facts of each case and requires an intensely local appraisal" (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)). One overriding principle, however, should be obvious. A proper districting benchmark must be race neutral: It must not assume, a priori, that an acceptable plan should include any particular number or proportion of minority-controlled districts.

I begin with § 2's text. As relevant here, § 2(a) prohibits a State from "impos[ing] or appl[ying]" any electoral rule "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right ... to vote on account of race or color." § 10301(a). Section 2(b) then provides that § 2(a) is violated

> "if, based on the totality of circumstances, ... the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State ... are not equally open to participation by members of [a protected class] in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State ... is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." § 10301(b).

As we held two Terms ago in Brnovich, the "equal openness" requirement is "the core" and "touchstone" of § 2(b), with "equal opportunity" serving an ancillary function.[6] 53 594 U. S., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2338. Relying significantly on § 2(b)'s disclaimer of a right to proportional representation, we also held that § 2 does not enact a "freewheeling disparate-impact regime." Id., at ——, and n. 14, 141 S.Ct., at 2341, and n. 14. Brnovich further stressed the value of "benchmarks with which ... challenged [electoral] rule[s] can be compared," id., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2338, and that "a meaningful comparison is essential" in judging the significance of any challenged scheme's racially disparate impact. Id., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2339. To the extent § 2 applies to districting plans, then, it requires that they be "equally open to participation" by voters of all races, but it is not a pure disparate-impact statute and does not guarantee proportional representation.

In its main argument here, Alabama simply carries these principles to their logical conclusion: Any vote-dilution benchmark must be race neutral. See Brief for Appellants 32–46. Whatever "equal openness" means in the context of single-member *1524 districting, no "meaningful comparison" is possible using a benchmark that builds in a presumption in favor of minority-controlled districts. Indeed, any benchmark other than a race-neutral one would render the vote-dilution inquiry fundamentally circular, allowing courts to conclude that a districting plan "dilutes" a minority's voting strength "on account of race" merely because it does not measure up to an ideal already defined in racial terms. Such a question-begging standard would not answer our precedents' demand for an "objective," "reasonable benchmark." Holder, 512 U.S. at 881, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (plurality opinion) (emphasis added). Nor could any nonneutral benchmark be reconciled with Brnovich's rejection of a disparate-impact regime or the text's disclaimer of a right to proportional representation. 594 U. S., at ——, and n. 14, 141 S.Ct., at 2341, and n. 14).

There is yet another compelling reason to insist on a race-neutral benchmark. "The Constitution abhors classifications based on race." Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 353, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Redistricting is no exception. "Just as the State 54 may not, absent extraordinary justification, segregate citizens on the basis of race in its public parks, buses, golf courses, beaches, and schools," the State also "may not separate its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 911, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (citations omitted). "[D]istricting maps that sort voters on the basis of race ' "are by their very nature odious." ' " Wisconsin Legislature v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, 595 U. S. ——, ——, 142 S.Ct. 1245, 1248, 212 L.Ed.2d 251 (2022) (per curiam) (quoting Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 643, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (Shaw I)). Accordingly, our precedents apply strict scrutiny whenever race was "the predominant factor motivating [the placement of] a significant number of voters within or without a particular district," Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, or, put another way, whenever "[r]ace was the criterion that ... could not be compromised" in a district's formation. Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 907, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II).

Because "[r]acial gerrymandering, even for remedial purposes, may balkanize us into competing racial factions" and undermine "the goal of a political system in which race no longer matters," Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816, our cases have long recognized the need to interpret § 2 to avoid "unnecessarily infus[ing] race into virtually every redistricting" plan. LULAC, 548 U.S. at 446, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (opinion of Kennedy, J.); accord, Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 21, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (2009) (plurality opinion). Plainly, however, that "infusion" is the inevitable result of any race-based benchmark. Any interpretation of § 2 that permits courts to condemn enacted districting plans as dilutive relative to a nonneutral benchmark "would result in a substantial increase in the number of mandatory districts drawn with race as 'the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision,' " thus " 'raising serious constitutional questions.' " Id., at 21–22, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (first quoting Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, then quoting LULAC, 548 U.S. at 446, 126 S.Ct. 2594). To avoid setting § 2 on a collision course with the Constitution, courts must apply a race-neutral benchmark in assessing any 55 claim that a districting plan unlawfully dilutes a racial minority's voting strength.

B

The plaintiffs in these cases seek a "proportional allocation of political power according *1525 to race." Holder, 512 U.S. at 936, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). According to the 2020 census, black Alabamians account for 27.16% of the State's total population and 25.9% of its voting-age population, both figures slightly less than two-sevenths. Of Alabama's seven existing congressional districts, one, District 7, is majority-black.[7] 56 These cases were brought to compel "the creation of two majority-minority congressional districts"—roughly proportional control. 1 App. 135 (emphasis added); see also id., at 314 ("Plaintiffs seek an order ... ordering a congressional redistricting plan that includes two majority-Black congressional districts").

Remarkably, the majority fails to acknowledge that two minority-controlled districts would mean proportionality, or even that black Alabamians are about two-sevenths of the State. Yet that context is critical to the issues before us, not least because it explains the extent of the racial sorting the plaintiffs' goal would require. "[A]s a matter of mathematics," single-member districting "tends to deal out representation far short of proportionality to virtually all minorities, from environmentalists in Alaska to Republicans in Massachusetts." M. Duchin & D. Spencer, Models, Race, and the Law, 130 Yale L. J. Forum 744, 752 (2021) (Duchin & Spencer). As such, creating two majority-black districts would require Alabama to aggressively "sort voters on the basis of race." Wisconsin Legislature, 595 U. S., at ——, 142 S.Ct., at 1248.

The plaintiffs' 11 illustrative maps make that clear. All 11 maps refashion existing District 2 into a majority-black district while preserving the current black majority in District 7. They all follow the same approach: Starting with majority-black areas of populous Montgomery County, they expand District 2 east and west to encompass predominantly majority-black areas throughout the rural "Black Belt." In the process, the plans are careful to leave enough of the Black Belt for District 7 to maintain its black majority. Then—and critically—the plans have District 2 extend a southwestern tendril into Mobile County to capture a dense, high-population majority-black *1526 cluster in urban Mobile.[8] 57 See Supp. App. 184, 186, 188, 190, 193, 195, 197, 199, 201, 203; see also id., at 149.

Those black Mobilians currently reside in the urban heart of District 1. For 50 years, District 1 has occupied the southwestern pocket of Alabama, consisting of the State's two populous Gulf Coast counties (Mobile and Baldwin) as well as some less populous areas to the immediate north and east. See id., at 205–211. It is indisputable that the Gulf Coast region is the sort of community of interest that the Alabama Legislature might reasonably think a congressional district should be built around. It contains Alabama's only coastline, its fourth largest city, and the Port of Mobile. Its physical geography runs north along the Alabama and Mobile Rivers, whose paths District 1 follows. Its economy is tied to the Gulf —to shipping, shipbuilding, tourism, and commercial fishing. See Brief for Coastal Alabama Partnership as Amicus Curiae 13–15.

But, for the plaintiffs to secure their majority-black District 2, this longstanding, compact, and eminently sensible district must be radically transformed. In the Gulf Coast region, the newly drawn District 1 would retain only the majority-white areas that District 2 did not absorb on its path to Mobile's large majority-black population. To make up the lost population, District 1 would have to extend eastward through largely majority-white rural counties along the length of Alabama's border with the Florida panhandle. The plaintiffs do not assert that white residents on the Gulf Coast have anything special in common with white residents in those communities, and the District Court made no such finding. The plaintiffs' maps would thus reduce District 1 to the leftover white communities of the southern fringe of the State, its shape and constituents defined almost entirely 58 by the need to make District 2 majority-black while also retaining a majority-black District 7.

The plaintiffs' mapmaking experts left little doubt that their plans prioritized race over neutral districting criteria. Dr. Moon Duchin, who devised four of the plans, testified that achieving "two majority-black districts" was a "nonnegotiable principl[e]" in her eyes, a status shared only by our precedents' "population balance" requirement. 2 App. 634; see also id., at 665, 678. Only "after" those two "nonnegotiable[s]" were satisfied did Dr. Duchin then give lower priority to "contiguity" and "compactness." Id., at 634. The architect of the other seven maps, William Cooper, considered "minority voting strengt[h]" a "traditional redistricting principl[e]" in its own right, id., at 591, and treated "the minority population in and of itself" as the paramount community of interest in his plans, id., at 601.

Statistical evidence also underscored the illustrative maps' extreme racial sorting. Another of the plaintiffs' experts, Dr. Kosuke Imai, computer generated 10,000 districting plans using a race-blind algorithm programmed to observe several objective districting criteria. Supp. App. 58–59. None of those plans contained even one majority-black district. Id., at 61. Dr. Imai generated another 20,000 plans using the same algorithm, but with the additional constraint that they must contain at least one majority-black district; none of those plans contained a second majority-black *1527 district, or even a second district with a black voting-age population above 40%. Id., at 54, 67, 71–72. In a similar vein, Dr. Duchin testified about an academic study in which she had randomly "generated 2 million districting plans for Alabama" using a race-neutral algorithm that gave priority to compactness and contiguity. 2 App. 710; see Duchin & Spencer 765. She "found some [plans] with one majority-black district, but never found a second ... majority-black district in 2 million attempts." 2 App. 710. "[T]hat it is hard to draw two majority-black districts by accident," 59 Dr. Duchin explained, "show[ed] the importance of doing so on purpose." Id., at 714.[9]

The plurality of Justices who join Part III–B–I of THE CHIEF JUSTICE's opinion appear to agree that the plaintiffs could not prove the first precondition of their statewide vote-dilution claim—that black Alabamians could constitute a majority in two "reasonably configured" districts, Wisconsin Legislature, 595 U. S., at ——, 142 S.Ct. at 1248—by drawing an illustrative map in which race was predominant. See ante, at 1511 – 1512. That should be the end of these cases, as the illustrative maps here are palpable racial gerrymanders. The plaintiffs' experts clearly applied "express racial target[s]" by setting out to create 50%-plus majority-black districts in both Districts 2 and 7. Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 192, 137 S.Ct. 788, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017). And it is impossible to conceive of the State adopting the illustrative maps without pursuing the same racially motivated goals. Again, the maps' key design features are: (1) making District 2 majority-black by connecting black residents in one metropolitan area (Montgomery) with parts of the rural Black Belt and black residents in another metropolitan area (Mobile); (2) leaving enough of the Black Belt's majority-black rural areas for District 7 to maintain its majority-black status; and (3) reducing District 1 to the white remainder of the southern third of the State.

If the State did this, we would call it a racial gerrymander, and rightly so. We would have no difficulty recognizing race as "the predominant factor motivating [the placement of] significant number[s] of voters within or without" Districts 1, 2, 60 and 7. Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. The "stark splits in the racial composition of populations moved into and out of " Districts 1 and 2 would make that obvious. Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 192, 137 S.Ct. 788. So would the manifest absence of any nonracial justification for the new District 1. And so would the State's clear intent to ensure that both Districts 2 and 7 hit their preordained racial targets. See ibid. (noting that "pursu[it of] a common redistricting policy toward multiple districts" may show predominance). That the plan delivered proportional control for a particular minority—a statistical anomaly that over 2 million race-blind simulations did not yield and 20,000 race-conscious simulations did not even approximate—would be still further confirmation.

The State could not justify such a plan simply by arguing that it was less bizarre to the naked eye than other, more elaborate racial gerrymanders we have encountered. See ante, at 1508 – 1509 (discussing 1528 cases). As we held in Miller, visual "bizarreness" is not "a necessary element of the constitutional wrong," only "persuasive circumstantial evidence." 515 U.S. at 912–913, 115 S.Ct. 2475.[10]

*61 Nor could such a plan be explained by supposed respect for the Black Belt. For present purposes, I accept the District Court's finding that the Black Belt is a significant community of interest. But the entire black population of the Black Belt—some 300,000 black residents, see Supp. App. 33—is too small to provide a majority in a single congressional district, let alone two.[11] The black residents needed to populate majority-black versions of Districts 2 and 7 are overwhelmingly concentrated in the urban counties of Jefferson (i.e., the Birmingham metropolitan area, with about 290,000 black residents), Mobile (about 152,000 black residents), and Montgomery (about 134,000 black residents). Id., at 83. Of the three, only Montgomery County is in the Black Belt. The plaintiffs' maps, therefore, cannot and do not achieve their goal of two majority-black districts by "join[ing] together" the Black Belt, as the majority seems wrongly to believe. Ante, at 1505. Rather, their majority-black districts are anchored by three separate high-density clusters of black residents in three separate metropolitan areas, two of them outside the Black Belt. The Black Belt's largely rural remainder is then divided between the two districts to the extent needed to fill out their population numbers with black majorities in both. Respect for the Black Belt as a community of interest cannot explain this approach. The only *62 explanation is the plaintiffs' express racial target: two majority-black districts and statewide proportionality.

The District Court nonetheless found that race did not predominate in the plaintiffs' illustrative maps because Dr. Duchin and Mr. Cooper "prioritized race only as necessary ... to draw two reasonably compact majority-Black congressional districts," as opposed to "maximiz[ing] the 1529 number of majority-Black districts, or the BVAP [black voting-age population] in any particular majority-Black district." Singleton v. Merrill, 582 F.Supp.3d 924, 1029–1030 (ND Ala. 2022) (per curiam). This reasoning shows a profound misunderstanding of our racial-gerrymandering precedents. As explained above, what triggers strict scrutiny is the intentional use of a racial classification in placing "a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Thus, any plan whose predominant purpose is to achieve a nonnegotiable, predetermined racial target in a nonnegotiable, predetermined number of districts is a racial gerrymander subject to strict scrutiny. The precise fraction used as the racial target, and the number of districts it is applied to, are irrelevant.

In affirming the District Court's nonpredominance finding, the plurality glosses over these plain legal errors,[12] and it *63 entirely ignores Dr. Duchin's plans—presumably because her own explanation of her method sounds too much like textbook racial predominance. Compare 2 App. 634 ("[A]fter ... what I took to be nonnegotiable principles of population balance and seeking two majority-black districts, after that, I took contiguity as a requirement and compactness as paramount" (emphasis added)) and id., at 635 ("I took ... county integrity to take precedence over the level of [black voting-age population] once that level was past 50 percent" (emphasis added)), with Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 189, 137 S.Ct. 788 (explaining that race predominates when it " 'was the criterion that ... could not be compromised,' and race-neutral considerations 'came into play only after the race-based decision had been made' " (quoting Shaw II, 517 U.S. at 907, 116 S.Ct. 1894)), and Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (explaining that race predominates when "the [mapmaker] subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations"). The plurality thus affirms the District Court's finding only in part and with regard to Mr. Cooper's plans alone.

In doing so, the plurality acts as if the only relevant evidence were Mr. Cooper's testimony about his own mental state and the State's expert's analysis of Mr. Cooper's maps. See ante, at 1510 – 1511. Such a blinkered view of the issue is unjustifiable. All 11 illustrative maps follow the same approach to creating two majority-black districts. The essential design features of Mr. Cooper's maps are indistinguishable from Dr. Duchin's, and it is those very design features that would require race to predominate. None of the 1530 plaintiffs' maps could possibly be drawn by a mapmaker who was merely "aware of," rather than motivated by, "racial demographics." Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. They could only ever be drawn by a mapmaker whose predominant motive was *64 hitting the "express racial target" of two majority-black districts. Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 192, 137 S.Ct. 788.[13]

The plurality endeavors in vain to blunt the force of this obvious fact. See ante, at 1511 – 1512. Contrary to the plurality's apparent understanding, nothing in Bethune-Hill suggests that "an express racial target" is not highly probative evidence of racial predominance. 580 U.S. at 192, 137 S.Ct. 788 (placing "express racial target[s]" alongside "stark splits in the racial composition of [redistricted] populations" as "relevant districtwide evidence"). That the Bethune-Hill majority "decline[d]" to act as a " 'court of ... first view,' " instead leaving the ultimate issue of predominance for remand, cannot be transmuted into such an implausible holding or, in truth, any holding at all. Id., at 193, 137 S.Ct. 788.

The plurality is also mistaken that my predominance analysis would doom every illustrative map a § 2 plaintiff "ever adduced." Ante, at 1511 – 1512 (emphasis deleted). Rather, it would mean only that—because § 2 requires a race-neutral benchmark—plaintiffs cannot satisfy their threshold burden of showing a reasonably configured alternative plan with a proposal that could only be viewed as a racial gerrymander if 65 enacted by the State. This rule would not bar a showing, in an appropriate case, that a State could create an additional majority-minority district through a reasonable redistricting process in which race did not predominate. It would, on the other hand, screen out efforts to use § 2 to push racially proportional districting to the limits of what a State's geography and demography make possible—the approach taken by the illustrative maps here.

C

The foregoing analysis should be enough to resolve these cases: If the plaintiffs have not shown that Alabama could create two majority-black districts without resorting to a racial gerrymander, they cannot have shown that Alabama's one-majority-black-district map "dilutes" black Alabamians' voting strength relative to any meaningfully race-neutral benchmark. The inverse, however, is not true: Even if it were possible to regard the illustrative maps as not requiring racial predominance, it would not necessarily follow that a two-majority-black-district map was an appropriate benchmark. All that might follow is that the illustrative maps were reasonably configured—in other words, that they were consistent with some reasonable application *1531 of traditional districting criteria in which race did not predominate. See LULAC, 548 U.S. at 433, 126 S.Ct. 2594. But, in virtually all jurisdictions, there are countless possible districting schemes that could be considered reasonable in that sense. The mere fact that a plaintiff 's illustrative map is one of them cannot justify making it the benchmark against which other plans should be judged. Cf. Rucho, 588 U. S., at —— – ——, 139 S.Ct., at 2500–2501 (explaining the lack of judicially manageable standards for evaluating the relative fairness of different applications of traditional districting criteria).

That conceptual gap—between "reasonable" and "benchmark"—is highly relevant here. Suppose, for argument's sake, that Alabama reasonably could decide to create two majority-black districts by (1) connecting Montgomery's 66 black residents with Mobile's black residents, (2) dividing up the rural parts of the Black Belt between that district and another district with its population core in the majority-black parts of the Birmingham area, and (3) accepting the extreme disruption to District 1 and the Gulf Coast that this approach would require. The plaintiffs prefer that approach because it allows the creation of two majority-black districts, which they think Alabama should have. But even if that approach were reasonable, there is hardly any compelling race-neutral reason to elevate such a plan to a benchmark against which all other plans must be measured. Nothing in Alabama's geography or demography makes it clearly the best way, or even a particularly attractive way, to draw three of seven equally populous districts. The State has obvious legitimate, race-neutral reasons to prefer its own map—most notably, its interest in "preserving the cores of prior districts" and the Gulf Coast community of interest in District 1. Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 740, 103 S.Ct. 2653, 77 L.Ed.2d 133 (1983). And even discounting those interests would not yield a race-neutral case for treating the plaintiffs' approach as a suitable benchmark: Absent core retention, there is no apparent race-neutral reason to insist that District 7 remain a majority-black district uniting Birmingham's majority-black neighborhoods with majority-black rural areas in the Black Belt.

Finally, it is surely probative that over 2 million race-neutral simulations did not yield a single plan with two majority-black districts, and even 20,000 simulations with a one-majority-black-district floor did not yield a second district with a black voting-age population over 40%. If any plan with two majority-black districts would be an "out-out-out-outlier" within the likely universe of race-neutral districting plans, Rucho, 588 U. S., at ——, 139 S.Ct., at 2518 (KAGAN, J., dissenting), it is hard to see how the mere possibility of drawing two majority-black districts could show that a one-district 67 map diluted black Alabamians' votes relative to any appropriate benchmark.[14]

*1532 D

Given all this, by what benchmark did the District Court find that Alabama's enacted plan was dilutive? The answer is as simple as it is unlawful: The District Court applied a benchmark of proportional control based on race. To be sure, that benchmark was camouflaged by the elaborate vote-dilution framework we have inherited from Gingles. But nothing else in that framework or in the District Court's reasoning supplies an alternative benchmark capable of explaining the District Court's bottom line: that Alabama's one-majority-black-district 68 map dilutes black voters' fair share of political power.

Under Gingles, the majority explains, there are three "preconditions" to a vote-dilution claim: (1) the relevant "minority group must be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district"; (2) the minority group must be "politically cohesive"; and (3) the majority group must "vot[e] sufficiently as a bloc to enable it to defeat the minority's preferred candidate[s]." Ante, at 1503 (alterations and internal quotation marks omitted). If these preconditions are satisfied, Gingles instructs courts to "consider the totality of the circumstances and to determine, based upon a searching practical evaluation of the past and present reality, whether the political process is equally open to minority voters." 478 U.S. at 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

The majority gives the impression that, in applying this framework, the District Court merely followed a set of well-settled, determinate legal principles. But it is widely acknowledged that "Gingles and its progeny have engendered considerable disagreement and uncertainty regarding the nature and contours of a vote dilution claim," with commentators "noting the lack of any 'authoritative resolution of the basic questions one would need to answer to make sense of [§ 2's] results test.' " Merrill v. Milligan, 595 U. S. ——, —— – ——, 142 S.Ct. 879, 883, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2022) (ROBERTS, C. J., dissenting from grant of applications for stays) (quoting C. Elmendorf, Making Sense of Section 2: Of Biased Votes, Unconstitutional Elections, and Common Law Statutes, 160 U. Pa. L. Rev. 377, 389 (2012)). If there is any "area of law notorious for its many unsolved puzzles," this is it. J. Chen & N. Stephanopoulos, The Race-Blind Future of Voting Rights, 130 Yale L. J. 862, 871 (2021); see also Duchin & Spencer 758 ("Vote dilution on the basis of group membership is a crucial instance of the lack of a prescribed ideal").

69 The source of this confusion is fundamental: Quite simply, we have never succeeded in translating the Gingles framework into an objective and workable method of identifying the undiluted benchmark. The second and third preconditions are all but irrelevant to the task. They essentially collapse into one question: Is voting racially polarized such that minority-preferred candidates consistently lose *1533 to majority-preferred ones? See Gingles, 478 U.S. at 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Even if the answer is yes, that tells a court nothing about "how hard it 'should' be for minority voters to elect their preferred candidates under an acceptable system." Id., at 88, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment). Perhaps an acceptable system is one in which the minority simply cannot elect its preferred candidates; it is, after all, a minority. Rejecting that outcome as "dilutive" requires a value judgment relative to a benchmark that polarization alone cannot provide.

The first Gingles precondition is only marginally more useful. True, the benchmark in a redistricting challenge must be "a hypothetical, undiluted plan," Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. at 480, 117 S.Ct. 1491, and the first precondition at least requires plaintiffs to identify some hypothetical alternative plan. Yet that alternative plan need only be "reasonably configured," and—as explained above—to say that a plan is reasonable is a far cry from establishing an objective standard of fairness.

That leaves only the Gingles framework's final stage: the totality-of-circumstances determination whether a State's "political process is equally open to minority voters." 478 U.S. at 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752. But this formulation is mere verbiage unless one knows what an "equally open" system should look like—in other words, what the benchmark is. And, our cases offer no substantive guidance on how to identify the undiluted benchmark at the totality stage. The best they have to offer is a grab bag of amorphous "factors"—widely known as the Senate factors, after the Senate Judiciary Committee Report 70 accompanying the 1982 amendments to § 2—that Gingles said "typically may be relevant to a § 2 claim." See id., at 44–45, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Those factors, however, amount to no more than "a list of possible considerations that might be consulted by a court attempting to develop a gestalt view of the political and racial climate in a jurisdiction." Holder, 512 U.S. at 938, 114 S.Ct.

2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). Such a gestalt view is far removed from the necessary benchmark of a hypothetical, undiluted districting plan.

To see this, one need only consider the District Court's use of the Senate factors here. See 582 F.Supp.3d at 1018–1024. The court began its totality-stage analysis by reiterating what nobody disputes: that voting in Alabama is racially polarized, with black voters overwhelmingly preferring Democrats and white voters largely preferring Republicans. To rebut the State's argument that this pattern is attributable to politics, not race per se, the court noted that Donald Trump (who is white) prevailed over Ben Carson (who is black) in the 2016 Republican Presidential primary. Next, the court observed that black candidates rarely win statewide elections in Alabama and that black state legislators overwhelmingly come from majority-minority districts. The court then reviewed Alabama's history of racial discrimination, noted other voting-rights cases in which the State was found liable, and cataloged socioeconomic disparities between black and white Alabamians in everything from car ownership to health insurance coverage. The court attributed these disparities "at least in part" to the State's history of discrimination and found that they hinder black residents from participating in politics today, notwithstanding the fact that black and white Alabamians register and turn out to vote at similar rates. Id., at 1021–1022. Last, the court interpreted a handful of comments by three white politicians as "racial campaign appeals." Id., at 1023–1024.

71 *1534 In reviewing this march through the Senate factors, it is impossible to discern any overarching standard or central question, only what might be called an impressionistic moral audit of Alabama's racial past and present. Nor is it possible to determine any logical nexus between this audit and the remedy ordered: a congressional districting plan in which black Alabamians can control more than one seat. Given the District Court's finding that two reasonably configured majority-black districts could be drawn, would Alabama's one-district map have been acceptable if Ben Carson had won the 2016 primary, or if a greater number of black Alabamians owned cars?

The idea that such factors could explain the District Court's judgment line is absurd. The plaintiffs' claims pose one simple question: What is the "right" number of Alabama's congressional seats that black voters who support Democrats "should" control? Neither the Senate factors nor the Gingles framework as a whole offers any principled answer.

In reality, the limits of the Gingles preconditions and the aimlessness of the totality-of-circumstances inquiry left the District Court only one obvious and readily administrable option: a benchmark of "allocation of seats in direct proportion to the minority group's percentage in the population." Holder, 512 U.S. at 937, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). True, as discussed above, that benchmark is impossible to square with what the majority calls § 2(b)'s "robust disclaimer against proportionality," ante, at 1500 – 1501, and it runs headlong into grave constitutional problems. See Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701, 730, 127 S.Ct. 2738, 168 L.Ed.2d 508 (2007) (plurality opinion). Nonetheless, the intuitive pull of proportionality is undeniable. "Once one accepts the proposition that the effectiveness of votes is measured in terms of the control of seats, the core of any vote dilution claim" "is inherently based on ratios between the numbers of the minority 72 in the population and the numbers of seats controlled," and there is no more logical ratio than direct proportionality. Holder, 512 U.S. at 902, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). Combine that intuitive appeal with the "lack of any better alternative" identified in our case law to date, id., at 937, 114 S.Ct. 2581, and we should not be surprised to learn that proportionality generally explains the results of § 2 cases after the Gingles preconditions are satisfied. See E. Katz, M. Aisenbrey, A. Baldwin, E. Cheuse, & A. Weisbrodt, Documenting Discrimination in Voting: Judicial Findings Under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act Since 1982, 39 U. Mich. J. L. Reform 643, 730–732 (2006) (surveying lower court cases and finding a near-perfect correlation between proportionality findings and liability results).

Thus, in the absence of an alternative benchmark, the vote-dilution inquiry has a strong and demonstrated tendency to collapse into a rough two-part test: (1) Does the challenged districting plan give the relevant minority group control of a proportional share of seats? (2) If not, has the plaintiff shown that some reasonably configured districting plan could better approximate proportional control? In this approach, proportionality is the ultimate benchmark, and the first Gingles precondition becomes a proxy for whether that benchmark is reasonably attainable in practice.

Beneath all the trappings of the Gingles framework, that two-part test describes how the District Court applied § 2 here. The gravitational force of proportionality is obvious throughout its opinion. At the front end, the District Court even built proportionality into its understanding of 1535 Gingles' first precondition, finding the plaintiffs' illustrative maps to be reasonably configured in part because they "provide[d] a number of majority-Black districts ... roughly proportional to the Black percentage of the population." 582 F.Supp.3d at 1016. At the back end, the District Court concluded its "totality" analysis by revisiting proportionality and finding that it "weigh[ed] decidedly in favor of the plaintiffs." *73 Id., at 1025. While the District Court disclaimed giving overriding significance to proportionality, the fact remains that nothing else in its reasoning provides a logical nexus to its finding of a districting wrong and a need for a districting remedy. Finally, as if to leave no doubt about its implicit benchmark, the court admonished the State that "any remedial plan will need to include two districts in which Black voters either comprise a voting-age majority or something quite close." Id., at 1033. In sum, the District Court's thinly disguised benchmark was proportionality: Black Alabamians are about two-sevenths of the State's population, so they should control two of the State's seven congressional seats.

That was error—perhaps an understandable error given the limitations of the Gingles framework, but error nonetheless. As explained earlier, any principled application of § 2 to cases such as these requires a meaningfully race-neutral benchmark. The benchmark cannot be an a priori thumb on the scale for racially proportional control.

E

The majority opinion does not acknowledge the District Court's express proportionality-based reasoning. That omission is of a piece with its earlier noted failures to acknowledge the well-known indeterminacy of the Gingles framework, that black Alabamians are about two-sevenths of the State's population, and that the plaintiffs here are thus seeking statewide proportionality. Through this pattern of omissions, the majority obscures the burning question in these cases. The District Court's vote-dilution finding can be justified only by a racially loaded benchmark—specifically, a benchmark of proportional control based on race. Is that the benchmark the statute demands? The majority fails to confront this question head on, and it studiously avoids mentioning anything that would require it to do so.

The same nonresponsiveness infects the majority's analysis, which is largely devoted to rebutting an argument nobody *74 makes. Contrary to the majority's telling, Alabama does not equate the "race-neutral benchmark" with "the median or average number of majority-minority districts" in a large computer-generated set of race-blind districting plans. Ante, at 1506. The State's argument for a race-neutral benchmark is rooted in the text of § 2, the logic of vote-dilution claims, and the constitutional problems with any nonneutral benchmark. See Brief for Appellants 32–46. It then relies on the computer evidence in these cases, among other facts, to argue that the plaintiffs have not shown dilution relative to any race-neutral benchmark. See id., at 54–56. But the idea that "race-neutral benchmark" means the composite average of many computer-generated plans is the majority's alone.

After thus straw-manning Alabama's arguments at the outset, the majority muddles its own response. In a perfunctory footnote, it disclaims any holding that "algorithmic map making" evidence "is categorically irrelevant" in § 2 cases. Ante, at 1513, n. 8. That conclusion, however, is the obvious implication of the majority's reasoning and rhetoric. See ante, at 1513 (decrying a "map-comparison test" as "flawed in its fundamentals" even if it involves 1536 concededly "adequate comparators"); see also ante, at 1507 (stating that the "focu[s]" of § 2 analysis is "on the specific illustrative maps that a plaintiff adduces," leaving unstated the implication that other algorithmically generated maps are irrelevant). The majority in effect, if not in word, thus forecloses any meaningful use of computer evidence to help locate the undiluted benchmark.

There are two critical problems with this fiat. The first, which the majority seems to recognize yet fails to resolve, is that excluding such computer evidence from view cannot be reconciled with § 2's command to consider "the totality of circumstances."[15] Second—and more fundamentally—the *75 reasons that the majority gives for downplaying the relevance of computer evidence would more logically support a holding that there is no judicially manageable way of applying § 2's results test to single-member districts. The majority waxes about the "myriad considerations" that go into districting, the "difficult, contestable choices" those considerations require, and how "[n]othing in § 2 provides an answer" to the question of how well any given algorithm approximates the correct benchmark. Ante, at 1513 – 1514 (internal quotation marks omitted). In the end, it concludes, "Section 2 cannot require courts to judge a contest of computers" in which "there is no reliable way to determine who wins, or even where the finish line is." Ante, at 1514.

The majority fails to recognize that whether vote-dilution claims require an undiluted benchmark is not up for debate. If § 2 applies to single-member districting plans, courts cannot dispense with an undiluted benchmark for comparison, ascertained by an objective and workable method. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. at 480, 117 S.Ct. 1491; Holder, 512 U.S. at 881, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (plurality opinion). Of course, I would be the last person to deny that defining the undiluted benchmark is difficult. See id., at 892, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (arguing that it "immerse[s] the federal courts in a hopeless project of weighing questions of political theory"). But the "myriad considerations" and "[a]nswerless questions" the majority frets about, ante, at 1513, 1514, are inherent in the very enterprise of applying § 2 to single-member districts. Everything the majority says 76 about the difficulty of defining the undiluted benchmark with computer evidence applies with equal or greater force to the task of defining it without such evidence. At their core, the majority's workability concerns are an isolated demand for rigor against the backdrop of a legal regime that has long been " 'inherently standardless,' " and must remain so until the Court either discovers a principled and objective method of identifying the undiluted benchmark, Holder, 512 U.S. at 885, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (plurality opinion), or abandons this enterprise altogether, see id., at 945, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

*1537 Ultimately, the majority has very little to say about the appropriate benchmark. What little it does say suggests that the majority sees no real alternative to the District Court's proportional-control benchmark, though it appears unwilling to say so outright. For example, in a nod to the statutory text and its "equal openness" requirement, the majority asserts that "[a] district is not equally open ... when minority voters face—unlike their majority peers—bloc voting along racial lines, arising against the backdrop of substantial racial discrimination within the State, that renders a minority vote unequal to a vote by a nonminority voter." Ante, at 1507. But again, we have held that dilution cannot be shown without an objective, undiluted benchmark, and this verbiage offers no guidance for how to determine it.[16] Later, the majority asserts that "the Gingles framework itself imposes meaningful constraints on proportionality." Ante, at 1508. But the only constraint on proportionality the majority articulates is that it is often difficult to 77 achieve—which, quite obviously, is no principled limitation at all. Ante, at 1508 – 1510.

Thus, the end result of the majority's reasoning is no different from the District Court's: The ultimate benchmark is a racially proportional allocation of seats, and the main question on which liability turns is whether a closer approximation to proportionality is possible under any reasonable application of traditional districting criteria.[17] This approach, moreover, is consistent with how the majority describes the role of plaintiffs' illustrative maps, as well as an unjustified practical asymmetry to which its rejection of computer evidence gives rise. Courts are to "focu[s] ... on the specific illustrative maps that a plaintiff adduces," ante, at 1507 – 1508, by which the majority means that courts should not "focu[s]" on statistical evidence showing those maps to be outliers. Thus, plaintiffs may use an algorithm to generate any number of maps that meet specified districting criteria and a preferred racial target; then, they need only produce one of those maps to "sho[w] it is possible that the State's map" is dilutive. Ante, at 1507 (emphasis in original). But the State may not use algorithmic evidence to suggest that the plaintiffs' map is an unsuitable benchmark for comparison —not even, apparently, if it can prove that the illustrative map 78 is an outlier among "billion[s]" or "trillion[s]" of concededly "adequate comparators." Ante, at 1513, 1514; see also *1538 ante, at 1514 (rejecting sampling algorithms). This arbitrary restriction amounts to a thumb on the scale for § 2 plaintiffs—an unearned presumption that any "reasonable" map they put forward constitutes a benchmark against which the State's map can be deemed dilutive. And, once the comparison is framed in that way, the only workable rule of decision is proportionality. See Holder, 512 U.S. at 941–943, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

By affirming the District Court, the majority thus approves its benchmark of proportional control limited only by feasibility, and it entrenches the most perverse tendencies of our vote-dilution jurisprudence. It guarantees that courts will continue to approach vote-dilution claims just as the District Court here did: with no principled way of determining how many seats a minority "should" control and with a strong temptation to bless every incremental step toward a racially proportional allocation that plaintiffs can pass off as consistent with any reasonable map.

III

As noted earlier, the Court has long recognized the need to avoid interpretations of § 2 that " 'would unnecessarily infuse race into virtually every redistricting, raising serious constitutional questions.' " Bartlett, 556 U.S. at 21, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plurality opinion) (quoting LULAC, 548 U.S. at 446, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (opinion of Kennedy, J.)). Today, however, by approving the plaintiffs' racially gerrymandered maps as reasonably configured, refusing to ground § 2 vote-dilution claims in a race-neutral benchmark, and affirming a vote-dilution finding that can only be justified by a benchmark of proportional control, the majority holds, in substance, that race belongs in virtually every redistricting. It thus drives headlong into the very constitutional problems that the Court has long sought to avoid. The result of this collision is unmistakable: If the 79 District Court's application of § 2 was correct as a statutory matter, § 2 is unconstitutional as applied here.

Because the Constitution "restricts consideration of race and the [Voting Rights Act] demands consideration of race," Abbott, 585 U. S., at ——, 138 S.Ct., at 2315, strict scrutiny is implicated wherever, as here, § 2 is applied to require a State to adopt or reject any districting plan on the basis of race. See Bartlett, 556 U.S. at 21–22, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plurality opinion). At this point, it is necessary to confront directly one of the more confused notions inhabiting our redistricting jurisprudence. In several cases, we have "assumed" that compliance with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act could be a compelling state interest, before proceeding to reject race-predominant plans or districts as insufficiently tailored to that asserted interest. See, e.g., Wisconsin Legislature, 595 U. S., at ——, 142 S.Ct., at 1248; Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 292, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017); Shaw II, 517 U.S. at 915, 116 S.Ct. 1894; Miller, 515 U.S. at 921, 115 S.Ct. 2475. But we have never applied this assumption to uphold a districting plan that would otherwise violate the Constitution, and the slightest reflection on first principles should make clear why it would be problematic to do so.[18] The Constitution *1539 is supreme over statutes, not vice versa. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 178, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803). Therefore, if complying with a federal statute would require a State to engage in unconstitutional racial discrimination, the proper conclusion is not that the statute excuses the State's discrimination, but that the statute is invalid.

If Congress has any power at all to require States to sort voters into congressional districts based on race, that power must flow from its authority to "enforce" the Fourteenth and 80 Fifteenth Amendments "by appropriate legislation." Amdt. 14, § 5; Amdt. 15, § 2. Since Congress in 1982 replaced intent with effects as the criterion of liability, however, "a violation of § 2 is no longer a fortiori a violation of " either Amendment. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. at 482, 117 S.Ct. 1491. Thus, § 2 can be justified only under Congress' power to "enact reasonably prophylactic legislation to deter constitutional harm." Allen v. Cooper, 589 U. S. ——, ——, 140 S.Ct. 994, 1004, 206 L.Ed.2d 291 (2020) (alteration and internal quotation marks omitted); see City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 517–529, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997). Because Congress' prophylactic-enforcement authority is "remedial, rather than substantive," "[t]here must be a congruence and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end."[19] Id., at 520, 117 S.Ct. 2157. Congress' chosen means, moreover, must " 'consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution.' " Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. 529, 555, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 186 L.Ed.2d 651 (2013) (quoting McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819)); accord, Miller, 515 U.S. at 927, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

Here, as with everything else in our vote-dilution jurisprudence, the task of sound analysis is encumbered by the lack of clear principles defining § 2 liability in districting. It is awkward to examine the "congruence" and "proportionality" of a statutory rule whose very meaning exists in a perpetual state of uncertainty. The majority makes clear, however, that the primary factual predicate of a vote-dilution claim is "bloc voting along racial lines" that results in majority-preferred candidates defeating minority-preferred ones. Ante, at 1507; accord, Gingles, 478 U.S. at 48, 106 S.Ct. 2752 ("The theoretical basis for [vote-dilution claims] is that where minority and majority voters consistently prefer different candidates, the majority, by virtue of its numerical superiority, will regularly 81 defeat the choices of minority voters"). And, as I have shown, the remedial logic with which the District Court's construction of § 2 addresses that "wrong" rests on a proportional-control benchmark limited only by feasibility. Thus, the relevant statutory rule may be approximately stated as follows: If voting is racially polarized in a jurisdiction, and if there exists any more or less reasonably configured districting plan that would enable the minority group to constitute a majority in a number of districts roughly proportional to its share of the population, then the jurisdiction must ensure that its districting plan includes that number of majority-minority districts "or something quite close."[20] 582 F.Supp.3d at 1033. Thus construed *1540 and applied, § 2 is not congruent and proportional to any provisions of the Reconstruction Amendments.

To determine the congruence and proportionality of a measure, we must begin by "identify[ing] with some precision the scope of the constitutional right at issue." Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 365, 121 S.Ct. 955, 148 L.Ed.2d 866 (2001). The Reconstruction Amendments "forbi[d], so far as civil and political rights are concerned, discrimination ... against any citizen because of his race," ensuring that "[a]ll citizens are equal before the law." Gibson v. Mississippi, 162 U.S. 565, 591, 16 S.Ct. 904, 40 L.Ed. 1075 (1896) (Harlan, J.). They dictate "that the Government must treat citizens as individuals, not as simply components of a racial, religious, sexual or national class." Miller, 515 U.S. at 911, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (internal quotation marks omitted). These principles are why the Constitution presumptively forbids race-predominant districting, "even for remedial purposes." Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816.

These same principles foreclose a construction of the Amendments that would entitle members of racial minorities, 82 qua racial minorities, to have their preferred candidates win elections. Nor do the Amendments limit the rights of members of a racial majority to support their preferred candidates—regardless of whether minorities prefer different candidates and of whether "the majority, by virtue of its numerical superiority," regularly prevails. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 48, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Nor, finally, do the Amendments establish a norm of proportional control of elected offices on the basis of race. See Parents Involved, 551 U.S. at 730–731, 127 S.Ct. 2738 (plurality opinion); Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816. And these notions are not merely foreign to the Amendments. Rather, they are radically inconsistent with the Amendments' command that government treat citizens as individuals and their "goal of a political system in which race no longer matters." Ibid.

Those notions are, however, the values at the heart of § 2 as construed by the District Court and the majority. As applied here, the statute effectively considers it a legal wrong by the State if white Alabamians vote for candidates from one political party at high enough rates, provided that black Alabamians vote for candidates from the other party at a still higher rate. And the statute remedies that wrong by requiring the State to engage in race-based redistricting in the direction of proportional control.

I am not certain that Congress' enforcement power could ever justify a statute so at odds " 'with the letter and spirit of the constitution.' " Shelby County, 570 U.S. at 555, 133 S.Ct. 2612. If it could, it must be because Congress "identified a history and pattern" of actual constitutional violations that, for some reason, required extraordinary prophylactic remedies. Garrett, 531 U.S. at 368, 121 S.Ct. 955. But the legislative record of the 1982 amendments is devoid of any showing that might justify § 2's blunt approximation of a "racial register for allocating representation on the basis of race." Holder, 512 U.S. at 908, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). To be sure, the Senate Judiciary Committee Report that accompanied the 1982 amendment to the Voting Rights Act "listed many examples of what 83 the Committee took to be unconstitutional vote dilution." *1541 Brnovich, 594 U. S., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2333 (emphasis added). But the Report also showed the Committee's fundamental lack of "concern with whether" those examples reflected the "intentional" discrimination required "to raise a constitutional issue." Allen, 589 U. S., at ——, 140 S.Ct., at 1006. The Committee's "principal reason" for rejecting discriminatory purpose was simply that it preferred an alternative legal standard; it thought Mobile's intent test was "the wrong question," and that courts should instead ask whether a State's election laws offered minorities "a fair opportunity to participate" in the political process. S. Rep. No. 97–417, p. 36.

As applied here, the amended § 2 thus falls on the wrong side of "the line between measures that remedy or prevent unconstitutional actions and measures that make a substantive change in the governing law." City of Boerne, 521 U.S. at 519, 117 S.Ct. 2157. It replaces the constitutional right against intentionally discriminatory districting with an amorphous race-based right to a "fair" distribution of political power, a "right" that cannot be implemented without requiring the very evils the Constitution forbids.

If that alone were not fatal, § 2's "reach and scope" further belie any congruence and proportionality between its districting-related commands, on the one hand, and actionable constitutional wrongs, on the other. Id., at 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157. Its "[s]weeping coverage ensures its intrusion at every level of government" and in every electoral system. Ibid. It "has no termination date or termination mechanism." Ibid. Thus, the amended § 2 is not spatially or temporally "limited to those cases in which constitutional violations [are] most likely." Id., at 533, 117 S.Ct. 2157. Nor does the statute limit its reach to "attac[k] a particular type" of electoral mechanism "with a long history as a 'notorious means to deny and abridge voting rights on racial grounds.' " Ibid. (quoting South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 355, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966) (Black, J., concurring and dissenting)). In view of this "indiscriminate 84 scope," "it simply cannot be said that 'many of [the districting plans] affected by the congressional enactment have a significant likelihood of being unconstitutional.' " Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 647, 119 S.Ct. 2199, 144 L.Ed.2d 575 (1999) (quoting City of Boerne, 521 U.S. at 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157).

Of course, under the logically unbounded totality-of-circumstances inquiry, a court applying § 2 can always embroider its vote-dilution determination with findings about past or present unconstitutional discrimination. But this possibility does nothing to heal either the fundamental contradictions between § 2 and the Constitution or its extreme overbreadth relative to actual constitutional wrongs. "A generalized assertion of past discrimination" cannot justify race-based redistricting, "because it provides no guidance for a legislative body to determine the precise scope of the injury it seeks to remedy." Shaw II, 517 U.S. at 909, 116 S.Ct. 1894 (internal quotation marks omitted). To justify a statute tending toward the proportional allocation of political power by race throughout the Nation, it cannot be enough that a court can recite some indefinite quantum of discrimination in the relevant jurisdiction. If it were, courts "could uphold [race-based] remedies that are ageless in their reach into the past, and timeless in their ability to affect the future." Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 276, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (plurality opinion). That logic "would effectively assure that race will always be relevant in [redistricting], and that the ultimate goal of eliminating entirely from governmental decisionmaking *1542 such irrelevant factors as a human being's race will never be achieved." Parents Involved, 551 U.S. at 730, 127 S.Ct. 2738 (plurality opinion) (alteration and internal quotation marks omitted).

For an example of these baleful results, we need look no further than the congressional districts at issue here. In 1992, Alabama and a group of § 2 plaintiffs, whom a federal court chose to regard as the representatives "of all African-American 85 citizens of the State of Alabama," stipulated that the State's black population was " 'sufficiently compact and contiguous to comprise a single member significant majority (65% or more) African American Congressional district,' " and that, " '[c]onsequently,' " such a " 'district should be created.' " Wesch v. Hunt, 785 F.Supp. 1491, 1493, 1498 (SD Ala.). Accepting that stipulation, the court reworked District 7 into an irregularly shaped supermajority-black district—one that scooped up populous clusters of black voters in the disparate urban centers of Birmingham and Montgomery to connect them across a swath of largely majority-black rural areas—without even "decid[ing] whether the creation of a majority African-American district [was] mandated by either § 2 or the Constitution." Id., at 1499; see n. 7, supra. It did not occur to the court that the Constitution might forbid such an extreme racial gerrymander, as it quite obviously did. But, once District 7 had come into being as a racial gerrymander thought necessary to satisfy § 2, it became an all-but-immovable fixture of Alabama's districting scheme.

Now, 30 years later, the plaintiffs here demand that Alabama carve up not two but three of its main urban centers on the basis of race, and that it configure those urban centers' black neighborhoods with the outlying majority-black rural areas so that black voters can control not one but two of the State's seven districts. The Federal Judiciary now upholds their demand—overriding the State's undoubted interest in preserving the core of its existing districts, its plainly reasonable desire to maintain the Gulf Coast region as a cohesive political unit, and its persuasive arguments that a race-neutral districting process would not produce anything like the districts the plaintiffs seek. Our reasons for doing so boil down to these: that the plaintiffs' proposed districts are more or less within the vast universe of reasonable districting outcomes; that Alabama's white voters do not support the black minority's preferred candidates; that Alabama's racial climate, taken as a rarefied whole, crosses some indefinable 86 line justifying our interference; and, last but certainly not least, that black Alabamians are about two-sevenths of the State's overall population.

By applying § 2 in this way to claims of this kind, we encourage a conception of politics as a struggle for power between "competing racial factions." Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816. We indulge the pernicious tendency of assigning Americans to "creditor" and "debtor race[s]," even to the point of redistributing political power on that basis. Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 239, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995) (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). We ensure that the race-based redistricting we impose on Alabama now will bear divisive consequences long into the future, just as the initial creation of District 7 segregated Jefferson County for decades and minted the template for crafting black "political homelands" in Alabama. Holder, 512 U.S. at 905, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). We place States in the impossible position of having to weigh just how much racial sorting is necessary to avoid the "competing hazards" of violating § 2 and violating the Constitution. Abbott, 585 U. S., at ——, 138 S.Ct., at 2315 (internal quotation 1543 marks omitted). We have even put ourselves in the ridiculous position of "assuming" that compliance with a statute can excuse disobedience to the Constitution. Worst of all, by making it clear that there are political dividends to be gained in the discovery of new ways to sort voters along racial lines, we prolong immeasurably the day when the "sordid business" of "divvying us up by race" is no more. LULAC, 548 U.S. at 511, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (ROBERTS, C. J., concurring in part, concurring in judgment in part, and dissenting in part). To the extent § 2 requires any of this, it is unconstitutional.

The majority deflects this conclusion by appealing to two of our older Voting Rights Act cases, City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980), and South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769, that did not address § 2 at all and, indeed, predate Congress' adoption of the results test. Ante, at 1516 – 1517. That maneuver is untenable. Katzenbach upheld § 5's preclearance *87 requirements, § 4(b)'s original coverage formula, and other related provisions aimed at "a small number of States and political subdivisions" where "systematic resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment" had long been flagrant. 383 U.S. at 328, 86 S.Ct. 803; see also id., at 315–317, 86 S.Ct. 803 (describing the limited issues presented). Fourteen years later, City of Rome upheld the 1975 Act extending § 5's preclearance provisions for another seven years. See 446 U.S. at 172–173, 100 S.Ct. 1548. The majority's reliance on these cases to validate a statutory rule not there at issue could make sense only if we assessed the congruence and proportionality of the Voting Rights Act's rules wholesale, without considering their individual features, or if Katzenbach and City of Rome meant that Congress has plenary power to enact whatever rules it chooses to characterize as combating "discriminatory ... effect[s]." Ante, at 1516 (internal quotation marks omitted). Neither proposition makes any conceptual sense or is consistent with our cases. See, e.g., Shelby County, 570 U.S. at 550–557, 133 S.Ct. 2612 (holding the 2006 preclearance coverage formula unconstitutional); Northwest Austin Municipal Util. Dist. No. One v. Holder, 557 U.S. 193, 203, 129 S.Ct. 2504, 174 L.Ed.2d 140 (2009) (emphasizing the distinctness of §§ 2 and 5); City of Boerne, 521 U.S. at 533, 117 S.Ct. 2157 (discussing City of Rome as a paradigm case of congruence-and-proportionality review of remedial legislation); Miller, 515 U.S. at 927, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (stressing that construing § 5 to require "that States engage in presumptively unconstitutional race-based districting" would raise "troubling and difficult constitutional questions," notwithstanding City of Rome).

In fact, the majority's cases confirm the very limits on Congress' enforcement powers that are fatal to the District Court's construction of § 2. City of Rome, for example, immediately after one of the sentences quoted by the majority, explained the remedial rationale for its approval of the 1975 preclearance extension: "Congress could rationally have concluded that, because electoral changes by jurisdictions with a demonstrable history of intentional racial discrimination *88 in voting create the risk of purposeful discrimination, it was proper to prohibit changes that have a discriminatory impact." 446 U.S. at 177, 100 S.Ct. 1548 (emphasis added; footnote omitted). The next section of City of Rome then separately examined and upheld the reasonableness of the extension's 7-year time period. See id., at 181–182, 100 S.Ct. 1548. City of Rome thus stands for precisely the propositions for which City of Boerne cited it: Congress may adopt "[p]reventive measures ... when there is reason to believe that many of the laws 1544 affected by the congressional enactment have a significant likelihood of being unconstitutional," 521 U.S. at 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157, particularly when it employs "termination dates, geographic restrictions, or egregious predicates" that "tend to ensure Congress' means are proportionate to ends legitimate," id., at 533, 117 S.Ct. 2157; see also id., at 532–533, 117 S.Ct. 2157 (analyzing Katzenbach in similar terms); Shelby County, 570 U.S. at 535, 545–546, 133 S.Ct. 2612 (same). Again, however, the amended § 2 lacks any such salutary limiting principles; it is unbounded in time, place, and subject matter, and its districting-related commands have no nexus to any likely constitutional wrongs.

In short, as construed by the District Court, § 2 does not remedy or deter unconstitutional discrimination in districting in any way, shape, or form. On the contrary, it requires it, hijacking the districting process to pursue a goal that has no legitimate claim under our constitutional system: the proportional allocation of political power on the basis of race. Such a statute "cannot be considered remedial, preventive legislation," and the race-based redistricting it would command cannot be upheld under the Constitution. City of Boerne, 521 U.S. at 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157.[21]

*89 IV

These cases are not close. The plaintiffs did not prove that Alabama's districting plan "impose[s] or applie[s]" any "voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure" that effects "a denial or abridgement of the[ir] right ... to vote on account of race or color." § 10301(a). Nor did they prove that Alabama's congressional districts "are not equally open to participation" by black Alabamians. § 10301(b). The plaintiffs did not even prove that it is possible to achieve two majority-black districts without resorting to a racial gerrymander. The most that they can be said to have shown is that sophisticated mapmakers can proportionally allocate Alabama's congressional districts based on race in a way that exceeds the Federal Judiciary's ability to recognize as a racial gerrymander with the naked eye. The District Court held that this showing, plus racially polarized voting and its gestalt view of Alabama's racial climate, was enough to require the State to redraw its districting plan on the basis of race. If that is the benchmark for vote dilution under § 2, then § 2 is nothing more than a racial entitlement to roughly proportional control of elective offices—limited only by feasibility—wherever different racial groups consistently prefer different candidates.

If that is what § 2 means, the Court should hold that it is unconstitutional. If that is not what it means, but § 2 applies to districting, then the Court should hold that vote-dilution challenges require a race-neutral benchmark that bears no resemblance to unconstitutional racial registers. On the other hand, if the Court believes that finding a race-neutral benchmark is as impossible as much of its rhetoric suggests, it should hold that 1545 § 2 cannot be applied to single-member districting plans for want of an "objective and *90 workable standard for choosing a reasonable benchmark." Holder, 512 U.S. at 881, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (plurality opinion). Better yet, it could adopt the correct interpretation of § 2 and hold that a single-member districting plan is not a "voting qualification," a "prerequsite to voting," or a "standard, practice, or procedure," as the Act uses those terms. One way or another, the District Court should be reversed.

The majority goes to great lengths to decline all of these options and, in doing so, to fossilize all of the worst aspects of our long-deplorable vote-dilution jurisprudence. The majority recites Gingles' shopworn phrases as if their meaning were self-evident, and as if it were not common knowledge that they have spawned intractable difficulties of definition and application. It goes out of its way to reaffirm § 2's applicability to single-member districting plans both as a purported original matter and on highly exaggerated stare decisis grounds. It virtually ignores Alabama's primary argument—that, whatever the benchmark is, it must be race neutral—choosing, instead, to quixotically joust with an imaginary adversary. In the process, it uses special pleading to close the door on the hope cherished by some thoughtful observers, see Gonzalez, 535 F.3d at 599–600, that computational redistricting methods might offer a principled, race-neutral way out of the thicket Gingles carried us into. Finally, it dismisses grave constitutional questions with an insupportably broad holding based on demonstrably inapposite cases.[22]

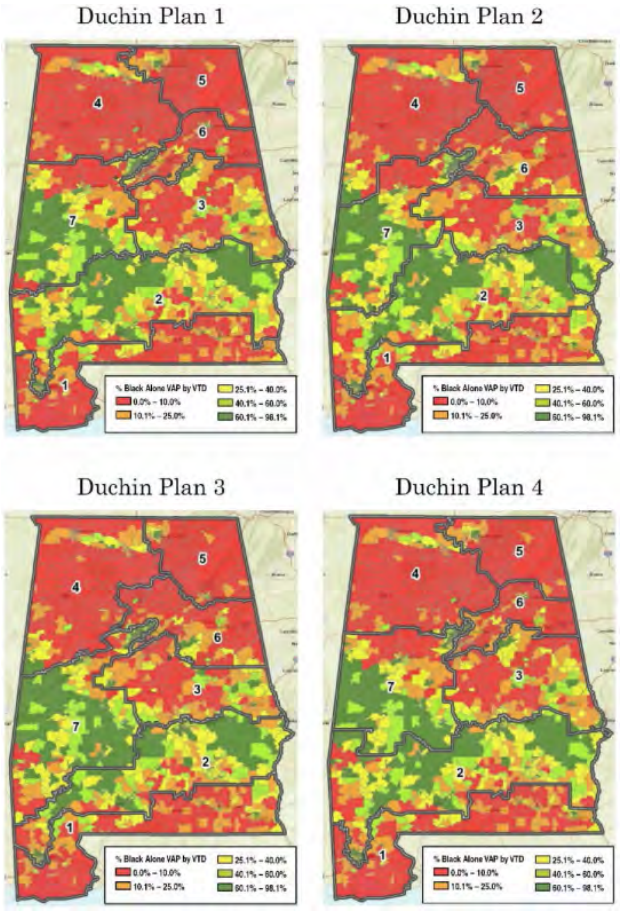
I find it difficult to understand these maneuvers except as proceeding from a perception that what the District Court did here is essentially no different from what many courts *91 have done for decades under this Court's superintendence, joined with a sentiment that it would be unthinkable to disturb that approach to the Voting Rights Act in any way. I share the perception, but I cannot understand the sentiment. It is true that, "under our direction, federal courts [have been] engaged in methodically carving the country into racially designated electoral districts" for decades now. Holder, 512 U.S. at 945, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). But that fact should inspire us to repentance, not resignation. I am even more convinced of the opinion that I formed 29 years ago:

> "In my view, our current practice should not continue. Not for another Term, not until the next case, not for another day. The disastrous implications of the policies we have adopted under the Act are too grave; the dissembling in our approach to the Act too damaging to the credibility of the Federal Judiciary. The 'inherent tension'—indeed, I would call it an irreconcilable conflict—between the standards we have adopted for evaluating vote dilution claims and the text of the Voting Rights Act would itself be sufficient in my view to warrant overruling the interpretation of § 2 set out in Gingles. When that obvious conflict is combined with the destructive effects our expansive reading of the Act has had in involving the Federal Judiciary in the project of dividing the Nation into racially segregated electoral districts, I can see no reasonable alternative to abandoning our current unfortunate 1546 understanding of the Act." Id., at 944, 114 S.Ct. 2581.

I respectfully dissent.

APPENDIX

*92



*93

1547

*94

1548

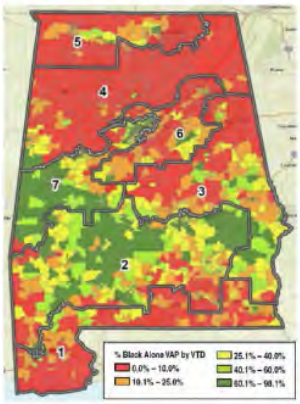
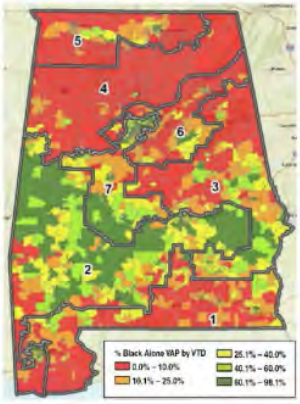
Cooper Plan 5



Cooper Plan 6



Cooper Plan 7

Justice ALITO, with whom Justice GORSUCH joins, dissenting.

95 Based on a flawed understanding of the framework adopted in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986), the Court now holds that the congressional districting map adopted by the Alabama Legislature violates § 2 of the Voting Rights Act. Like the Court, I am happy to apply Gingles in these cases. But I would interpret that precedent in a way that heeds what § 2 actually says, and I would take constitutional requirements into account. When *1549 the Gingles framework is viewed in this way, it is apparent that the decisions below must be vacated.

I

A

Gingles marked the Court's first encounter with the amended version of § 2 that Congress enacted in 1982, and the Court's opinion set out an elaborate framework that has since been used to analyze a variety of § 2 claims. Under that framework, a plaintiff must satisfy three "preconditions." Id., at 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752. As summarized in more recent opinions, they are as follows:

> "First, [the] 'minority group' [whose interest the plaintiff represents] must be 'sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority' in some reasonably configured legislative district. Second, the minority group must be 'politically cohesive.' And third, a district's white majority must 'vote[ ] sufficiently as a bloc' to usually 'defeat the minority's preferred candidate.' " Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 301–302, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017) (citations omitted).

See also Wisconsin Legislature v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, 595 U. S. ——, ——, 142 S.Ct. 1245, 1248, 212 L.Ed.2d 251 (2022) (per curiam); 96 Merrill v. Milligan, 595 U. S. ——, ——, 142 S.Ct. 879, 886–888, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2022) (KAGAN, J., dissenting from grant of applications for stays).

If a § 2 plaintiff can satisfy all these preconditions, the court must then decide whether, based on the totality of the circumstances, the plaintiff 's right to vote was diluted. See Gingles, 478 U.S. at 46–48, 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752. And to aid in that inquiry, Gingles approved consideration of a long list of factors set out in the Senate Judiciary Committee's Majority Report on the 1982 VRA amendments. Id., at 44–45, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (citing S. Rep. No. 97–417, pp. 28–30 (1982)).

B

My fundamental disagreement with the Court concerns the first Gingles precondition. In cases like these, where the claim is that § 2 requires the creation of an additional majority-minority district, the first precondition means that the plaintiff must produce an additional illustrative majority-minority district that is "reasonably configured." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 301, 137 S.Ct. 1455; Wisconsin Legislature, 595 U. S., at ——, 142 S.Ct., at 1248; see also Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752.

The Court's basic error is that it misunderstands what it means for a district to be "reasonably configured." Our cases make it clear that "reasonably configured" is not a synonym for "compact." We have explained that the first precondition also takes into account other traditional districting criteria like attempting to avoid the splitting of political subdivisions and "communities of interest." League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 433–434, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (LULAC).

To its credit, the Court recognizes that compactness is not enough and that a district is not reasonably configured if it flouts other "traditional districting criteria." Ante, at 1503. At various points in its opinion it names quite a few: minimizing the splitting of counties and other political subdivisions, keeping "communities of interest" together where possible, and avoiding the creation of new districts that require 97 two incumbents to run against each other. Ante, at 1504 – 1505, 1512 – 1513. In addition, the Court acknowledges that a district is not "reasonably configured" if it does not comport with the Equal Protection *1550 Clause's one-person, one-vote requirement. Ante, at 1513. But the Court fails to explain why compliance with "traditional districting criteria" matters under § 2 or why the only relevant equal protection principle is the one-person, one-vote requirement. If the Court had attempted to answer these questions, the defect in its understanding of the first Gingles precondition would be unmistakable.

To explain this, I begin with what is probably the most frequently mentioned traditional districting criterion and ask why it should matter under § 2 whether a proposed majority-minority district is "compact." Neither the Voting Rights Act (VRA) nor the Constitution imposes a compactness requirement. The Court notes that we have struck down bizarrely shaped districts, ante, at 1508 – 1509, but we did not do that for esthetic reasons. Compactness in and of itself is not a legal requirement—or even necessarily an esthetic one. (Some may find fancifully shaped districts more pleasing to the eye than boring squares.)

The same is true of departures from other traditional districting criteria. Again, nothing in the Constitution or the VRA demands compliance with these criteria. If a whimsical state legislature cavalierly disregards county and municipal lines and communities of interest, draws weirdly shaped districts, departs radically from a prior map solely for the purpose of change, and forces many incumbents to run against each other, neither the Constitution nor the VRA would make any of that illegal per se. Bizarrely shaped districts and other marked departures from traditional districting criteria matter because mapmakers usually heed these criteria, and when it is evident that they have not done so, there is reason to suspect that something untoward—specifically, unconstitutional racial gerrymandering—is afoot. 98 See, e.g., Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 643–644, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993); Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 979, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion); cf. LULAC, 548 U.S. at 433–435, 126 S.Ct. 2594.

Conspicuous violations of traditional districting criteria constitute strong circumstantial evidence of unconstitutionality. And when it is shown that the configuration of a district is attributable predominantly to race, that is more than circumstantial evidence that the district is unlawful. That is direct evidence of illegality because, as we have often held, race may not "predominate" in the drawing of district lines. See, e.g., Cooper, 581 U.S. at 292, 137 S.Ct. 1455; Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 191–192, 137 S.Ct. 788, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017); Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 906–907, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 920, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995).[1]

Because non-predominance is a longstanding and vital feature of districting law, it must be honored in a Gingles plaintiff 's illustrative district. If race predominated in the creation of such a district, the plaintiff has failed to satisfy both our precedent, which requires "reasonably configured" districts, and the terms of § 2, which demand equal openness. Two Terms ago, we engaged in a close analysis of the text of § 2 and explained that its "key requirement" is that the political processes leading to nomination or election must be " 'equally open to participation' by members of a protected class." *1551 Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee, 594 U. S. ——, ——, 141 S.Ct. 2321, 2332, 2337, 210 L.Ed.2d 753 (2021) (quoting 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b); emphasis deleted). "[E]qual openness," we stressed, must be our "touchstone" in interpreting and applying that provision. 594 U. S., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2338.

When the race of one group is the predominant factor in the creation of a district, that district goes beyond making the electoral process equally open to the members of the group in question. It gives the members of that group an 99 advantage that § 2 does not require and that the Constitution may forbid. And because the creation of majority-minority districts is something of a zero-sum endeavor, giving an advantage to one minority group may disadvantage others.

C

What all this means is that a § 2 plaintiff who claims that a districting map violates § 2 because it fails to include an additional majority-minority district must show at the outset that such a district can be created without making race the predominant factor in its creation. The plaintiff bears both the burden of production and the burden of persuasion on this issue, see Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 155–156, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993); White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), but a plaintiff can satisfy the former burden simply by adducing evidence—in any acceptable form—that race did not predominate.

A plaintiff need not offer computer-related evidence. Once upon a time, legislative maps were drawn without using a computer, and nothing prevents a § 2 plaintiff from taking this old-school approach in creating an illustrative district. See, e.g., M. Altman, K. McDonald, & M. McDonald, From Crayons to Computers: The Evolution of Computer Use in Redistricting, 23 Soc. Sci. Computer Rev. 334, 335–336 (2005). In that event, the plaintiff can simply call upon the mapmaker to testify about the process he or she used and the role, if any, that race played in that process. The defendant may seek to refute that testimony in any way that the rules of civil procedure and evidence allow.

If, as will often be the case today, a § 2 plaintiff 's mapmaker uses a computer program, the expert can testify about the weight, if any, that the program gives to race. The plaintiff will presumably argue that any role assigned to race was not predominant, and the defendant can contest this by cross-examining the plaintiff 's expert, seeking the actual program in discovery, and calling its own expert to testify 100 about the program's treatment of race. After this, the trial court will be in a position to determine whether the program gave race a "predominant" role.

This is an entirely workable scheme. It does not obligate either party to offer computer evidence, and it minimizes the likelihood of a clash between what § 2 requires and what the Constitution forbids. We have long assumed that § 2 is consistent with the Constitution. See, e.g., Cooper, 581 U.S. at 301, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (assuming States have a compelling interest in complying with § 2); Shaw II, 517 U.S. at 915, 116 S.Ct. 1894 (same); Vera, 517 U.S. at 977, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (plurality opinion) (same). But that cannot mean that every conceivable interpretation of § 2 is constitutional, and I do not understand the majority's analysis of Alabama's constitutional claim to suggest otherwise. Ante, at 1516 – 1517; ante, at 1518 – 1519 (KAVANAUGH, J., concurring in part).

Our cases make it perfectly clear that using race as a "predominant factor" in drawing legislative districts is unconstitutional unless the stringent requirements of *1552 strict scrutiny can be satisfied,[2] and therefore if § 2 can be found to require the adoption of an additional majority-minority district that was created under a process that assigned race a "predominant" role, § 2 and the Constitution would be headed for a collision.

II

When the meaning of a "reasonably configured" district is properly understood, it is apparent that the decisions below must be vacated and that the cases must be remanded for the application of the proper test. In its analysis of whether the plaintiffs satisfied the first Gingles precondition, the District Court gave much attention to some traditional districting criteria—specifically, compactness and avoiding the splitting of political subdivisions and communities of interest—but 101 it failed to consider whether the plaintiffs had shown that their illustrative districts were created without giving race a "predominant role." Singleton v. Merrill, 582 F.Supp.3d 924, 1008–1016 (ND Ala. 2022). For this reason, the District Court's § 2 analysis was deficient.

It is true that the District Court addressed the question of race-predominance when it discussed and rejected the State's argument that the plaintiffs' maps violated the Equal Protection Clause, but the court's understanding of predominance was deeply flawed. The court began this part of its opinion with this revealing statement:

> "Dr. Duchin and Mr. Cooper [plaintiffs' experts] testified that they prioritized race only for the purpose of determining and to the extent necessary to determine whether it was possible for the Milligan plaintiffs and the Caster plaintiffs to state a Section Two claim. As soon as they determined the answer to that question, they assigned greater weight to other traditional redistricting criteria." Id., at 1029–1030 (emphasis added).

This statement overlooks the obvious point that by "prioritiz[ing] race" at the outset, Dr. Duchin and Mr. Cooper gave race a predominant role.

The next step in the District Court's analysis was even more troubling. The court wrote, "Dr. Duchin's testimony that she considered two majority-Black districts as 'nonnegotiable' does not" show that race played a predominant role in her districting process. Id., at 1030. But if achieving a certain objective is "non-negotiable," then achieving that objective will necessarily play a predominant role. Suppose that a couple are relocating to the Washington, D. C., metropolitan area, and suppose that one says to the other, "I'm flexible about where we live, but it has to be in Maryland. That's non-negotiable." Could anyone say that finding a home in Maryland was not a "predominant" factor in the couple's search? Or suppose that a person looking for 102 a flight tells a travel agent, "It has to be non-stop. That's non-negotiable." Could it be said that the number of stops between the city of origin and the destination was not a "predominant" factor in the search for a good flight? The obvious answer to both these questions is no, and the same is true about the role of race in the creation of a new district. If it is "non-negotiable" that the district be majority black, then race is given a predominant role.

The District Court wrapped up this portion of its opinion with a passage that highlighted its misunderstanding of the first Gingles precondition. The court *1553 thought that a § 2 plaintiff cannot proffer a reasonably configured majority-minority district without first attempting to see if it is possible to create such a district—that is, by first making the identification of such a district "non-negotiable." Ibid. But that is simply not so. A plaintiff 's expert can first create maps using only criteria that do not give race a predominant role and then determine how many contain the desired number of majority-minority districts.

One final observation about the District Court's opinion is in order. The opinion gives substantial weight to the disparity between the percentage of majority-black House districts in the legislature's plan (14%) and the percentage of black voting-age Alabamians (27%), while the percentage in the plaintiffs' plan (29%) came closer to that 27% mark. See, e.g., id., at 946, 1016, 1018, 1025–1026; see also id., at 958–959, 969, 976, 982, 991–992, 996–997. Section 2 of the VRA, however, states expressly that no group has a right to representation "in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b). This provision was a critical component of the compromise that led to the adoption of the 1982 amendments, as the Court unanimously agreed two Terms ago. See Brnovich, 594 U. S., at ——, and n. 14, 141 S.Ct., at 2341, and n. 14); id., at ——, n. 6, 141 S.Ct., at 2360, n. 6 (KAGAN, J., dissenting). The District Court's reasoning contravened this statutory proviso. See ante, at 1524 – 1525, 1534 – 1535 (THOMAS, J., dissenting).

103 III

The Court spends much of its opinion attacking what it takes to be the argument that Alabama has advanced in this litigation. I will not debate whether the Court's characterization of that argument is entirely correct, but as applied to the analysis I have just set out, the Court's criticisms miss the mark.

A

The major theme of this part of the Court's opinion is that Alabama's argument, in effect, is that "Gingles must be overruled." Ante, at 1512. But as I wrote at the beginning of this opinion, I would decide these cases under the Gingles framework. We should recognize, however, that the Gingles framework is not the same thing as a statutory provision, and it is a mistake to regard it as such. National Pork Producers Council v. Ross, 598 U. S. ——, ——, 143 S.Ct. 1142, 1155, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2023) ("[T]he language of an opinion is not always to be parsed as though we were dealing with language of a statute" (quoting Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 341, 99 S.Ct. 2326, 60 L.Ed.2d 931 (1979))). In applying that framework today, we should keep in mind subsequent developments in our case law.

One important development has been a sharpening of the methodology used in interpreting statutes. Gingles was decided at a time when the Court's statutory interpretation decisions sometimes paid less attention to the actual text of the statute than to its legislative history, and Gingles falls into that category. The Court quoted § 2 but then moved briskly to the Senate Report. See 478 U.S. at 36–37, 43, and n. 7, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Today, our statutory interpretation decisions focus squarely on the statutory text. National Assn. of Mfrs. v. Department of Defense, 583 U. S. 109, 127, 138 S.Ct. 617, 199 L.Ed.2d 501 (2018); Puerto Rico v. Franklin Cal. Tax-Free Trust, 579 U.S. 115, 125, 136 S.Ct. 1938, 195 L.Ed.2d 298 (2016); cf. Brnovich, 594 U. S., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2337. And as we held in Brnovich, "[t]he key requirement" set out in the text of § 2 is that a State's electoral process must be " 'equally *1554 open' " 104 to members of all racial groups. Id., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2337. The Gingles framework should be interpreted in a way that gives effect to this standard.

Another development that we should not ignore concerns our case law on racial predominance. Post-Gingles decisions like Miller, 515 U.S. at 920, 115 S.Ct. 2475, Shaw II, 517 U.S. at 906–907, 116 S.Ct. 1894, and Vera, 517 U.S. at 979, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (plurality opinion), made it clear that it is unconstitutional to use race as a "predominant" factor in legislative districting. "[W]hen statutory language is susceptible of multiple interpretations, a court may shun an interpretation that raises serious constitutional doubts and instead may adopt an alternative that avoids those problems." Jennings v. Rodriguez, 583 U. S. ——, ——, 138 S.Ct. 830, 836, 200 L.Ed.2d 122 (2018). This same principle logically applies with even greater force when we interpret language in one of our prior opinions. It therefore goes without question that we should apply the Gingles framework in a way that does not set up a confrontation between § 2 and the Constitution, and understanding the first Gingles precondition in the way I have outlined achieves that result.[3]

B

The Court's subsidiary criticisms of Alabama's arguments are likewise inapplicable to my analysis. The Court suggests that the "centerpiece" of Alabama's argument regarding the role race can permissibly play in a plaintiff 's illustrative map seeks the imposition of "a new rule." Ante, at 1506, 1510. But I would require only what our cases already demand: 105 that all legislative districts be produced without giving race a "predominant" role.[4]

The Court maintains that Alabama's benchmark scheme would be unworkable because of the huge number of different race-neutral maps that could be drawn. As the Court notes, there are apparently numerous "competing metrics on the issue of compactness" alone, and each race-neutral computer program may assign different values to each traditional districting criterion. Ante, at 1513 (internal quotation marks omitted).

My analysis does not create such problems. If a § 2 plaintiff chooses to use a computer program to create an illustrative district, the court need ask only whether that program assigned race a predominant role.

The Court argues that Alabama's focus on race-neutral maps cannot be squared with a totality-of-the-circumstances test because "Alabama suggests there is only one 'circumstance[ ]' that matters—how the State's map stacks up relative to the *1555 benchmark" maps. Ante, at 1507. My analysis, however, simply follows the Gingles framework, under which a court must first determine whether a § 2 plaintiff has satisfied three "preconditions" before moving on to consider the remainder of relevant circumstances. See Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40–41, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993) (unless plaintiffs establish all three preconditions, there "neither has been a wrong nor can be a remedy").

106 IV

As noted, I would vacate and remand for the District Court to apply the correct understanding of Gingles in the first instance. Such a remand would require the District Court to determine whether the plaintiffs have shown that their illustrative maps did not give race a predominant role, and I will therefore comment briefly on my understanding of the relevant evidence in the record as it now stands.

A

In my view, there is strong evidence that race played a predominant role in the production of the plaintiffs' illustrative maps and that it is most unlikely that a map with more than one majority-black district could be created without giving race such a role. An expert hired by the Milligan plaintiffs, Dr. Kosuke Imai, used a computer algorithm to create 30,000 potential maps, none of which contained two majority-black districts. See 2 App. 571–572; Supp. App. 59, 72. In fact, in 20,000 of those simulations, Dr. Imai intentionally created one majority-minority district, and yet even with one majority-minority district guaranteed as a baseline, none of those 20,000 attempts produced a second one. See 2 App. 571–572; Supp. App. 72.

Similarly, Dr. Moon Duchin, another expert hired by the Milligan plaintiffs, opined that "it is hard to draw two majority-black districts by accident." 2 App. 714. Dr. Duchin also referred to a study where she generated two million maps of potential district configurations in Alabama, none of which contained a second majority-minority district. Id., at 710. And the first team of trained mapmakers that plaintiff Milligan consulted was literally unable to draw a two-majority-black-district map, even when they tried. Id., at 511–512. Milligan concluded at the time that the feat was impossible. Id., at 512.

The majority quibbles about the strength of this evidence, protesting that Dr. Imai's studies failed to include as controls 107 certain redistricting criteria and that Dr. Duchin's two-million-map study was based on 2010 census data, see ante, at 1512 – 1513, and nn. 6–7, but this is unconvincing for several reasons. It is plaintiffs' burden to produce evidence and satisfy the Gingles preconditions, so if their experts' maps were deficient, that is no strike against Alabama. And the racial demographics of the State changed little between 2010 and 2020, Supp. App. 82, which is presumably why Dr. Duchin herself raised the older study in answering questions about her work in this litigation, see 2 App. 710. If it was impossible to draw two such districts in 2010, it surely at least requires a great deal of intentional effort now.

The Court suggests that little can be inferred from Dr. Duchin's two-million-map study because two million maps are not that many in comparison to the "trillion trillion" maps that are possible. See ante, at 1513 – 1514, and n. 9. In making this argument, the Court relies entirely on an amicus brief submitted by three computational redistricting experts in support of the appellees. See Brief for Computational Redistricting Experts 2, 6, n. 7. These experts' argument concerns a complicated statistical issue, and I think it is *1556 unwise for the Court to make their argument part of our case law based solely on this brief. By the time this amicus brief was submitted, the appellants had already filed their main brief, and it was too late for any experts with contrary views to submit an amicus brief in support of appellants. Computer simulations are widely used today to make predictions about many important matters, and I would not place stringent limits on their use in VRA litigation without being quite sure of our ground. If the cases were remanded, the parties could take up this issue if they wished and call experts to support their positions on the extent to which the two million maps in the study are or can be probative of the full universe of maps.

In sum, based on my understanding of the current record, I am doubtful that the plaintiffs could get by the first Gingles 108 precondition, but I would let the District Court sort this matter out on remand.

B

Despite the strong evidence that two majority-minority districts cannot be drawn without singular emphasis on race, a plurality nonetheless concludes that race did not predominate in the drawing of the plaintiffs' illustrative maps. See ante, at 1510 – 1512. Their conclusion, however, rests on a faulty view of what non-predominance means.

The plurality's position seems to be that race does not predominate in the creation of a districting map so long as the map does not violate other traditional districting criteria such as compactness, contiguity, equally populated districts, minimizing county splits, etc. Ibid. But this conclusion is irreconcilable with our cases. In Miller, for instance, we acknowledged that the particular district at issue was not "shape[d] ... bizarre[ly] on its face," but we nonetheless held that race predominated because of the legislature's "overriding desire to assign black populations" in a way that would create an additional "majority-black district." 515 U.S. at 917, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

Later cases drove home the point that conformity with traditional districting principles does not necessarily mean that a district was created without giving race a predominant role. In Cooper, we held that once it was shown that race was " 'the overriding reason' " for the selection of a particular map, "a further showing of 'inconsistency between the enacted plan and traditional redistricting criteria' is unnecessary to a finding of racial predominance." 581 U.S. at 301, n. 3, 137 S.Ct. 1455 (quoting Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 190, 137 S.Ct. 788). We noted that the contrary argument was "foreclosed almost as soon as it was raised in this Court." Cooper, 581 U.S. at 301, n. 3, 137 S.Ct. 1455; see also Vera, 517 U.S. at 966, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (plurality opinion) (race may still predominate even if "traditional districting principle[s] do correlate to some extent with the district's layout"). "Traditional redistricting principles ... are numerous and 109 malleable.... By deploying those factors in various combinations and permutations, a [mapmaker] could construct a plethora of potential maps that look consistent with traditional, race-neutral principles." Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 190, 137 S.Ct. 788. Here, a plurality allows plaintiffs to do precisely what we warned against in Bethune-Hill.

The plurality's analysis of predominance contravenes our precedents in another way. We have been sensitive to the gravity of " 'trapp[ing]' " States " 'between the competing hazards of liability' " imposed by the Constitution and the VRA. Id., at 196, 137 S.Ct. 788 (quoting Vera, 517 U.S. at 977, 116 S.Ct. 1941). The VRA's demand that States not unintentionally "dilute" the 1557 votes of particular groups must be reconciled with the Constitution's demand that States generally avoid intentional augmentation of the political power of any one racial group (and thus the diminution of the power of other groups). The plurality's predominance analysis shreds that prudential concern. If a private plaintiff can demonstrate § 2 liability based on the production of a map that the State has every reason to believe it could not constitutionally draw, we have left "state legislatures too little breathing room" and virtually guaranteed that they will be on the losing end of a federal court's judgment. Bethune-Hill, 580 U.S. at 196, 137 S.Ct. 788.

* * *

The Court's treatment of Gingles is inconsistent with the text of § 2, our precedents on racial predominance, and the fundamental principle that States are almost always prohibited from basing decisions on race. Today's decision unnecessarily sets the VRA on a perilous and unfortunate path. I respectfully dissent.

All Citations

599 U.S. 1, 143 S.Ct. 1487, 216 L.Ed.2d 60, 23 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 5172, 29 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 905

Footnotes

* Together with No. 21–1087, Allen, Alabama Secretary of State, et al. v. Caster et al., on certiorari before judgment to the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

* Justice KAVANAUGH joins all but Part III–B–1 of this opinion.

1 As originally enacted, § 2 provided that "[n]o voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color." 42 U.S.C. § 1973 (1970 ed.).

2 Judge Manasco, presiding in Caster, also preliminarily enjoined Alabama from using HB1. Her opinion was based on the same evidentiary record as was before the three-judge Court, and it adopted in full that Court's "recitation of the evidence, legal analysis, findings of fact and conclusions of law." 1 App. to Emergency Application for Stay in No. 2:21–cv–1536, p. 4; see also 582 F.Supp.3d at 942–943, and n. 4. Any reference to the "District Court" in this opinion applies to the Caster Court as well as to the three-judge Court.

3 The principal dissent complains that "what the District Court did here is essentially no different from what many courts have done for decades under this Court's superintendence." Post, at 1545 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). That is not such a bad definition of stare decisis.

4 Despite this all, the dissent argues that courts have apparently been "methodically carving the country into racially designated electoral districts" for decades. Post, at 1545 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). And that, the dissent inveighs, "should inspire us to repentance." Ibid. But proportional representation of minority voters is absent from nearly every corner of this country despite § 2 being in effect for over 40 years. And in case after case, we have rejected districting plans that would bring States closer to proportionality when those plans violate traditional districting criteria. See supra, at 1508 – 1509. It seems it is the dissent that is "quixotically joust[ing] with an imaginary adversary." Post, at 1545 (opinion of THOMAS, J.).

5 The dissent claims that Cooper "treated 'the minority population in and of itself' as the paramount community of interest in his plans." Post, at 1526 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (quoting 2 App. 601). But Cooper testified that he was "aware that the minority population in and of itself can be a community of interest." Id., at 601 (emphasis added). Cooper then explained that the relevant community of interest here—the Black Belt—was a "historical feature" of the State, not a demographic

one. Ibid. (emphasis added). The Black Belt, he emphasized, was defined by its "historical boundaries"—namely, the group of "rural counties plus Montgomery County in the central part of the state." Ibid. The District Court treated the Black Belt as a community of interest for the same reason.

The dissent also protests that Cooper's "plans prioritized race over neutral districting criteria." Post, at 1526 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). But as the District Court found, and as Alabama does not contest, Cooper's maps satisfied other traditional criteria, such as compactness, contiguity, equal populations, and respect for political subdivisions.

6 Dr. Duchin created her two million map sample as part of an academic article that she helped author, not for her work on this case, and the article was neither entered into evidence below nor made part of the record here. See 2 App. 710; see also M. Duchin & D. Spencer, Models, Race, and the Law, 130 Yale L. J. Forum 744, 763–764 (2021) (Duchin & Spencer).

7 The principal dissent decrees that Dr. Duchin's and Dr. Imai's maps are "surely probative," forgiving the former's use of stale census data as well as both mapmakers' collective failure to incorporate many traditional districting guidelines. Post, at 1531 – 1532, and n. 14 (opinion of THOMAS, J.); see also post, at 1527, n. 9, 1527 – 1528. In doing so, that dissent ignores Dr. Duchin's testimony that—when using the correct census data—the "randomized algorithms" she employed "found plans with two majority-black districts in literally thousands of different ways." MSA 316–317. The principal dissent and the dissent by Justice ALITO also ignore Duchin's testimony that "it is certainly possible" to draw the illustrative maps she produced in a race-blind manner. 2 App. 713. In that way, even the race-blind standard that the dissents urge would be satisfied here. See post, at 1530 (opinion of THOMAS, J.); post, at 1551 (opinion of ALITO, J.). So too could that standard be satisfied in every § 2 case; after all, as Duchin explained, any map produced in a deliberately race-predominant manner would necessarily emerge at some point in a random, race-neutral process. 2 App. 713. And although Justice ALITO voices support for an "old-school approach" to § 2, even that approach cannot be squared with his understanding of Gingles. Post, at 1551. The very reason a plaintiff adduces a map at the first step of Gingles is precisely because of its racial composition—that is, because it creates an additional majority-minority district that does not then exist.

8 None of this is to suggest that algorithmic mapmaking is categorically irrelevant in voting rights cases. Instead, we note only that, in light of the difficulties discussed above, courts should exercise caution before treating results produced by algorithms as all but dispositive of a § 2 claim. And in evaluating algorithmic evidence more generally in this context, courts should be attentive to the concerns we have discussed.

9 The dissent suggests that Growe does not support the proposition that § 2 applies to single-member redistricting. Post, at 1520 – 1521 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). The Court has understood Growe much differently. See, e.g., Abrams v. Johnson, 521 U.S. 74, 90, 117 S.Ct. 1925, 138 L.Ed.2d 285 (1997) ("Our decision in [Gingles] set out the basic framework for establishing a vote dilution claim against at-large, multimembers districts; we have since extended the framework to single-member districts." (citing Growe, 507 U.S. at 40–41, 113 S.Ct. 1075)); Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1006, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994) ("In Growe, we held that a claim of vote dilution in a single-member district requires proof meeting the same three threshold conditions for a dilution challenge to a multimember district ...."); Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 12, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (plurality opinion) ("The Court later held that the three Gingles requirements apply equally in § 2 cases involving single-member districts ...." (citing Growe, 507 U.S. at 40–41, 113 S.Ct. 1075)).

10 Justice ALITO argues that "[t]he Gingles framework should be [re]interpreted" in light of changing methods in statutory interpretation. Post, at 1554 (dissenting opinion). But as we have explained, Gingles effectuates the delicate legislative bargain that § 2 embodies. And statutory stare decisis counsels strongly in favor of not "undo[ing] ... the compromise that was reached between the House and Senate when § 2 was amended in 1982." Brnovich, 594 U. S., at ——, 141 S.Ct., at 2341.

1 Unlike ordinary statutory precedents, the "Court's precedents applying common-law statutes and pronouncing the Court's own interpretive methods and principles typically do not fall within that category of stringent statutory stare decisis." Ramos, 590 U. S., at ——, n. 2, 140 S.Ct., at 1413, n. 2 (opinion of KAVANAUGH, J.); see also, e.g., Kisor v. Wilkie, 588 U. S. ——, —— – ——, 139 S.Ct. 2400, 2443–2445, 204 L.Ed.2d 841 (2019) (GORSUCH, J., concurring in judgment); id., at —— – ——, 139 S.Ct., at 2448–2449 (KAVANAUGH, J., concurring in judgment); Leegin Creative Leather Products, Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 899–907, 127 S.Ct. 2705, 168 L.Ed.2d 623 (2007); Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 510–516, 126 S.Ct. 1235, 163 L.Ed.2d 1097 (2006).

2 To ensure that Gingles does not improperly morph into a proportionality mandate, courts must rigorously apply the "geographically compact" and "reasonably configured" requirements. See ante, at 1510 (§ 2 requirements under Gingles are "exacting"). In this case, for example, it is important that at least some of the plaintiffs' proposed alternative maps respect county lines at least as well as Alabama's redistricting plan. See ante, at 1504 – 1505.

1 "No person acting under color of law shall ... in determining whether any individual is qualified under State law or laws to vote in any election, apply any standard, practice, or procedure different from the standards, practices, or procedures applied under such law or laws to other individuals within the same county, parish, or similar political subdivision who have been found by State officials to be qualified to vote." 52 U.S.C. § 10101(a)(2)(A).

2 The majority suggests that districting lines are a " 'prerequisite to voting' " because they "determin[e] where" voters "cast [their] ballot[s]." Ante, at 1515. But, of course, a voter's polling place is a separate matter from the district to which he is assigned, and communities are often moved between districts without changing where their residents go to vote. The majority's other example ("who [voters] are eligible to vote for," ibid.) is so far a stretch from the Act's focus on voting qualifications and voter action that it speaks for itself.

3 The majority chides Alabama for declining to specifically argue that § 2 is inapplicable to multimember and at-large districting plans. But these cases are about a single-member districting plan, and it is hardly uncommon for parties to limit their arguments to the question presented. Further, while I do not myself believe that the text of § 2 applies to multimember or at-large plans, the idea that such plans might be especially problematic from a vote-dilution standpoint is hardly foreign to the Court's precedents, see Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1012, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994); Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993); cf. Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 888, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (explaining that single-member districts may provide the benchmark when multimember or at-large systems are challenged, but suggesting no benchmark for challenges to single-member districts), or to the historical evolution of vote-dilution claims. Neither the case from which the 1982 Congress drew § 2(b)'s current operative language, see White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), nor the one it was responding to, Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1519, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980), involved single-member districts.

4 Justice KAVANAUGH's partial concurrence emphasizes the supposedly enhanced stare decisis force of statutory-interpretation precedents. See ante, at 1517 – 1518. This emphasis is puzzling in several respects. As an initial matter, I can perceive no conceptual "basis for applying a heightened version of stare decisis to statutory-interpretation decisions"; rather, "our judicial duty is to apply the law to the facts of the case, regardless of how easy it is for the law to change." Gamble v. United States, 587 U. S. ——, ——, 139 S.Ct. 1960, 1987, 204 L.Ed.2d 322 (2019) (THOMAS, J., concurring). Nor does that approach appear to have any historical foundation in judicial practice at the founding or for more than a century thereafter. See T. Lee, Stare Decisis in Historical Perspective: From the Founding Era to the Rehnquist Court, 52 Vand. L. Rev. 647, 708–732 (1999). But, even putting those problems aside, any appeal to heightened statutory stare decisis is particularly misplaced in this context. As the remainder of this dissent explains in depth, the Court's § 2 precedents differ from "ordinary statutory precedents" in two vital ways. Ante, at 1517, n. 1 (opinion of KAVANAUGH, J.). The first is their profound tension with the Constitution's hostility to racial classifications, a tension that Justice KAVANAUGH acknowledges and that makes every § 2 question the reverse side of a corresponding constitutional question. See ante, at 1518 – 1519. The second is that, to whatever extent § 2 applies to districting, it can only "be understood as a delegation of authority to the courts to develop a common law of racially fair elections." C. Elmendorf, Making Sense of Section 2: Of Biased Votes, Unconstitutional Elections, and Common Law Statutes, 160 U. Pa. L. Rev. 377, 383 (2012). It would be absurd to maintain that this Court's "notoriously unclear and confusing" § 2 case law follows, in any straightforward way, from the statutory text's high-flown language about the equal openness of political processes. Merrill v. Milligan, 595 U. S. ——, ——, 142 S.Ct. 879, 881, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2022) (KAVANAUGH, J., concurring in grant of applications for stays).

5 Like the majority, I refer to both courts below as "the District Court" without distinction.

6 While Brnovich involved a time-place-and-manner voting rule, not a vote-dilution challenge to a districting plan, its analysis logically must apply to vote-dilution cases if the text of § 2 covers such claims at all.

7 District 7 owes its majority-black status to a 1992 court order. See Wesch v. Hunt, 785 F.Supp. 1491, 1493–1494, 1496–1497, 1501–1502 (SD Ala.), aff 'd sub nom. Camp v. Wesch, 504 U.S. 902, 112 S.Ct. 1926, 118 L.Ed.2d 535 (1992). At the time, the Justice Department's approach to preclearance under § 5 of the Act followed the "so-called 'max-black' policy," which "required States, including Alabama, to create supermajority-black voting districts or face denial of preclearance." Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 298, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015) (THOMAS, J., dissenting). Although Wesch was a § 2 case and the court-imposed plan that resulted was not subject to preclearance, see 785 F.Supp. at 1499–1500, there can be little doubt that a similar ethos dominated that litigation, in which all parties stipulated to the desirability of a 65%-plus majority-black district. See id., at 1498–1499. To satisfy that dubious need, the Wesch court aggressively adjusted the northeast and southeast corners of the previous District 7. In the northeast, where District 7 once encompassed all of Tuscaloosa County and the more or less rectangular portion of Jefferson County not included in District 6, the 1992 plan drew a long, thin "finger" that traversed the southeastern third of Tuscaloosa County to reach deep into the heart of urban Birmingham. See Supp. App. 207–208. Of the Jefferson County residents captured by the "finger," 75.48% were black. Wesch, 785 F.Supp. at 1569. In the southeast, District 7 swallowed a jigsaw-shaped portion of Montgomery County, the residents of which were 80.18% black. Id., at 1575. Three years later, in Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 923–927, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), we rejected the "max-black" policy as unwarranted by § 5 and inconsistent with the Constitution. But "much damage to the States' congressional and legislative district maps had already been done," including in Alabama. Alabama Legislative Black Caucus, 575 U.S. at 299, 135 S.Ct. 1257 (THOMAS, J., dissenting).

8 I have included an Appendix, infra, illustrating the plaintiffs' 11 proposed maps. The first 10 images display the "black-only" voting-age population of census-designated voting districts in relation to the maps' hypothetical district lines. The record does not contain a similar illustration for the 11th map, but a simple visual comparison with the other maps suffices.

9 The majority notes that this study used demographic data from the 2010 census, not the 2020 one. That is irrelevant, since the black population share in Alabama changed little (from 26.8% to 27.16%) between the two censuses. To think that this minor increase might have changed Dr. Duchin's results would be to entirely miss her point: that proportional representation for any minority, unless achieved "by design," is a statistical anomaly in almost all single-member-districting systems. Duchin & Spencer 764.

10 Of course, bizarreness is in the eye of the beholder, and, while labels like " 'tentacles' " or " 'appendages' " have no ultimate legal significance, it is far from clear that they do not apply here. See ante, at 1504 – 1505. The tendrils with which the various versions of illustrative District 2 would capture black Mobilians are visually striking and are easily recognized as a racial grab against the backdrop of the State's demography. The District 7 "finger," which encircles the black population of the Birmingham metropolitan area in order to separate them from their white neighbors and link them with black rural areas in the west of the State, also stands out to the naked eye. The District Court disregarded the "finger" because it has been present in every districting plan since 1992, including the State's latest enacted plan. Singleton v. Merrill, 582 F.Supp.3d 924, 1011 (ND Ala. 2022) (per curiam). But that reasoning would allow plaintiffs to bootstrap one racial gerrymander as a reason for permitting a second. Because the question is not before us, I express no opinion on whether existing District 7 is constitutional as enacted by the State. It is indisputable, however, that race predominated in the original creation of the district, see n. 7, supra, and it is plain that the primary race-neutral justification for the district today must be the State's legitimate interest in "preserving the cores of prior districts" and the fact that the areas constituting District 7's core have been grouped together for decades. Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 740, 103 S.Ct. 2653, 77 L.Ed.2d 133 (1983); see also id., at 758, 103 S.Ct. 2653 (Stevens, J., concurring) (explaining that residents of a political unit "often develop a community of interest"). The plaintiffs' maps, however, necessarily would require the State to assign little weight to core retention with respect to other districts. There could then be no principled race-neutral justification for prioritizing core retention only when it preserved an existing majority-black district, while discarding it when it stood in the way of creating a new one.

11 The equal-population baseline for Alabama's seven districts is 717,154 persons per district.

12 The plurality's somewhat elliptical discussion of "the line between racial predominance and racial consciousness," ante, at 1510, suggests that it may have fallen into a similar error. To the extent the plurality supposes that, under our precedents, a State may purposefully sort voters based on race to some indefinite extent without crossing the line into predominance, it is wrong, and its predominance analysis would water down decades of racial-gerrymandering jurisprudence. Our constitutional precedents' line between racial awareness and racial predominance simply tracks the distinction between awareness of consequences, on the one hand, and discriminatory purpose, on the other. See Miller, 515 U.S. at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (" 'Discriminatory purpose implies more than intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences. It implies that the decisionmaker selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part "because of," not merely "in spite of," its adverse effects' " (alterations and some internal quotation marks omitted)); accord, Shaw I, 509 U.S. 630, 646, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993). And our statements that § 2 "demands consideration of race," Abbott v. Perez, 585 U. S. ——, ——, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 2315, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018), and uses a "race-conscious calculus," De Grandy, 512 U.S. at 1020, 114 S.Ct. 2647, did not imply that a State can ever purposefully sort voters on a race-predominant basis without triggering strict scrutiny.

13 The plurality's reasoning does not withstand scrutiny even on its own terms. Like Dr. Duchin, Mr. Cooper found it "necessary to consider race" to construct two majority-black districts, 2 App. 591, and he frankly acknowledged "reconfigur[ing]" the southern part of the State "to create the second African-American majority district," id., at 610. Further, his conclusory statement that race did not "predominate" in his plans, id., at 595, must be interpreted in light of the rest of his testimony and the record as a whole. Mr. Cooper recognized communities of interest as a traditional districting principle, but he applied that principle in a nakedly race-focused manner, explaining that "the minority population in and of itself " was the community of interest that was "top of mind as [he] was drawing the plan[s]." Id., at 601. As noted, he also testified that he considered "minority voting strengt[h]" to be a "traditional redistricting principl[e]" in its own right. Id., at 591. His testimony therefore buttresses, rather than undermines, the conclusion already obvious from the maps themselves: Only a mapmaker pursuing a fixed racial target would produce them.

14 The majority points to limitations of Dr. Duchin's and Dr. Imai's algorithms that do not undermine the strong inference from their results to the conclusion that no two-majority-black-district plan could be an appropriate proxy for the undiluted benchmark. Ante, at 1512, 1513 – 1514. I have already explained why the fact that Dr. Duchin's study used 2010 census data is irrelevant. See n. 9, supra. As for the algorithms' inability to incorporate all possible districting considerations, the absence of additional constraints cannot explain their failure to produce any maps hitting the plaintiffs' preferred racial target. Next, while it is true that the number of possible districting plans is extremely large, that does not mean it is impossible to generate a statistically significant sample. Here, for instance, Dr. Imai explained that "10,000 simulated plans" was sufficient to "yield statistically precise conclusions" and that any higher number would "not materially affect" the results. Supp. App. 60. Finally, the majority notes Dr. Duchin's testimony that her "exploratory algorithms" found "thousands" of possible two-majority-black-district maps. 2 App. 622; see ante, at 1512 – 1513, n. 7. Setting aside that Dr. Duchin never provided the denominator of which those "thousands" were the numerator, it is no wonder that the algorithms in question generated such maps; as Dr. Duchin explained, she programmed them with "an algorithmic preference" for "plans in which there would be a second majority-minority district." 2 App. 709. Thus, all that those algorithmic results prove is that it is possible to draw two majority-black districts in Alabama if one sets out to do so, especially with the help of sophisticated mapmaking software. What is still lacking is any justification for treating a two-majority-black-district map as a proxy for the undiluted benchmark.

15 The majority lodges a similar accusation against the State's arguments (or what it takes to be the State's arguments). See ante, at 1507 ("Alabama suggests there is only one 'circumstance' that matters—how the State's map stacks up relative to the benchmark" (alteration omitted)). But its rebuke is misplaced. The "totality of circumstances" means that courts must consider all circumstances relevant to an issue. It does not mean that they are forbidden to attempt to define the substantive standard that governs that issue. In arguing that a vote-dilution claim requires judging a State's plan relative to an undiluted benchmark to be drawn from the totality of circumstances—including, where probative, the results of districting simulations—the State argues little more than what we have long acknowledged. See Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 480, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730 (1997).

16 To the extent it is any sort of answer to the benchmark question, it tends inevitably toward proportionality. By equating a voting minority's inability to win elections with a vote that has been "render[ed] ... unequal," ante, at 1507, the majority assumes "that members of [a] minority are denied a fully effective use of the franchise unless they are able to control seats in an elected body." Holder, 512 U.S. at 899, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). That is precisely the assumption that leads to the proportional-control benchmark. See id., at 902, 937, 114 S.Ct. 2581.

17 Indeed, the majority's attempt to deflect this analysis only confirms its accuracy. The majority stresses that its understanding of Gingles permits the rejection of "plans that would bring States closer to proportionality when those plans violate traditional districting criteria." Ante, at 1509 – 1510, n. 4 (emphasis added). Justice KAVANAUGH, similarly, defends Gingles against the charge of "mandat[ing] a proportional number of majority-minority districts" by emphasizing that it requires only the creation of majority-minority districts that are compact and reasonably configured. Ante, at 1518 (opinion concurring in part). All of this precisely tracks my point: As construed by the District Court and the majority, § 2 mandates an ever closer approach to proportional control that stops only when a court decides that a further step in that direction would no longer be consistent with any reasonable application of traditional districting criteria.

18 In Bethune-Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 137 S.Ct. 788, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017), the Court upheld a race-predominant district based on the assumed compelling interest of complying with § 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Id., at 193–196, 137 S.Ct. 788. There, the Court was explicit that it was still merely "assum[ing], without deciding," that the asserted interest was compelling, as the plaintiffs "d[id] not dispute that compliance with § 5 was a compelling interest at the relevant time." Id., at 193, 137 S.Ct. 788.

19 While our congruence-and-proportionality cases have focused primarily on the Fourteenth Amendment, they make clear that the same principles govern "Congress' parallel power to enforce the provisions of the Fifteenth Amendment." City of Boerne, 521 U.S. at 518, 117 S.Ct. 2157.

20 This formulation does not specifically account for the District Court's findings under the Senate factors, which, as I have explained, lack any traceable logical connection to the finding of a districting wrong or the need for a districting remedy.

21 Justice KAVANAUGH, at least, recognizes that § 2's constitutional footing is problematic, for he agrees that "race-based redistricting cannot extend indefinitely into the future." Ante, at 1519 (opinion concurring in part). Nonetheless, Justice KAVANAUGH votes to sustain a system of institutionalized racial discrimination in districting—under the aegis of a statute that applies nationwide and has no expiration date—and thus to prolong the "lasting harm to our society" caused by the use of racial classifications in the allocation of political power. Shaw I, 509 U.S. at 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816. I cannot agree with that approach. The Constitution no more tolerates this discrimination today than it will tolerate it tomorrow.

22 The Court does not address whether § 2 contains a private right of action, an issue that was argued below but was not raised in this Court. See Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee, 594 U. S. ——, ——, 141 S.Ct. 2321, 2350, 210 L.Ed.2d 753 (2021) (GORSUCH, J., concurring).

1 Alabama's districting guidelines explicitly incorporate this nonpredominance requirement. See Singleton v. Merrill, 582 F.Supp.3d 924, 1036 (ND Ala. 2022).

2 Although our cases have posited that racial predominance may be acceptable if strict scrutiny is satisfied, the Court does not contend that it is satisfied here.

3 The second and third Gingles preconditions, which concern racially polarized voting, cannot contribute to avoiding a clash between § 2 and the Constitution over racial predominance in the drawing of lines. Those preconditions do not concern the drawing of lines in plaintiffs' maps, and in any event, because voting in much of the South is racially polarized, they are almost always satisfied anyway. Alabama does not contest that they are satisfied here.

4 The Court appears to contend that it does not matter if race predominated in the drawing of these maps because the maps could have been drawn without race predominating. See ante, at 1512 – 1513, n. 7. But of course, many policies could be selected for race-neutral reasons. They nonetheless must be assessed under the relevant standard for intentional reliance on race if their imposition was in fact motivated by race. See, e.g., Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222, 227–231, 105 S.Ct. 1916, 85 L.Ed.2d 222 (1985); Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 264–266, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977); Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 241–248, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976).

End of Document

2024 WL 3201671
Only the Westlaw citation is currently available.
United States District Court, E.D. New York.

Bruce A. BLAKEMAN, in his official capacity as County Executive of the County of Nassau; County of Nassau; Marc Mullen, as parent and natural guardian of K.E.M., an infant under the age of eighteen years; and Jeanine Mullen, as parent and natural guardian of K.E.M., an infant under the age of eighteen years, Plaintiffs,

v.

Letitia JAMES, as Attorney General of the State of New York; State of New York Office of the Attorney General; and State of New York, Defendants.

2:24-cv-1655 (NJC) (LGD)
|
Signed April 4, 2024

Attorneys and Law Firms

Victoria LaGreca, Sheharyar Ali, I, Matthew M. Rozea, Office of the Nassau County Attorney, Mineola, NY, for Plaintiffs Bruce A. Blakeman, County of Nassau.

Joseph E. Macy, Donna A. Napolitano, Berkman, Henoch, Peterson, Peddy & Fenchel, P.C., Garden City, NY, Matthew M. Rozea, Office of the Nassau County Attorney, Mineola, NY, for Plaintiffs Jeanine Mullen, Marc Mullen.

Travis William England, Sandra Shin-Young Park, Zoe Ridolfi-Starr, NYS Office of the Attorney General, New York, NY, Helena Ann Lynch, NYS Office of the Attorney General Nassau Regional Office, Mineola, NY, for Defendants.

OPINION AND ORDER

NUSRAT J. CHOUDHURY, District Judge:

1 Plaintiffs Bruce A. Blakeman ("Blakeman") and Nassau County (together "County Plaintiffs"), and Marc and Jeanine Mullen (together "Individual Plaintiffs") filed a Complaint for declaratory and injunctive relief against the State of New York ("New York"), the State of New York Office of the Attorney General ("OAG"),[1] and Letitia James ("James"), in her capacity as the Attorney General of the State of New York ("NY Attorney General," collectively, "Defendants"). (Compl., ECF No. 1.) The Complaint brings a single claim under the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201, and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. (Compl. ¶¶ 33–35.) Plaintiffs' claim concerns a cease-and-desist letter from the OAG to Nassau County asserting that Nassau County Executive Order 2-2024 ("Executive Order") violates the New York Human Rights Law's prohibition against discrimination on the bases of sex and gender identity and expression. (OAG Ltr., ECF No. 10-3 (citing N.Y. Exec. Law §§ 296(2), (6)).) The letter calls for the County Plaintiffs to rescind the Executive Order and produce the documents that supported its issuance, or else face further legal action by the OAG. (Id. at 9.) The Complaint alleges that the OAG's action to enforce the New York Human Rights Law as applied to the Executive Order violates the rights of women and girl athletes in Nassau County to equal protection under the law. (Compl. ¶¶ 35, 38–41.)

On March 7, 2024, the County Plaintiffs filed an Order to Show Cause seeking an order "temporarily restrain[ing] and enjoin[ing]" Defendants "from initiating any legal proceedings and/or actions" against Blakeman "related to [the Executive Order]." (ECF No. 10 at 2.) The County Plaintiffs' supporting brief asks for an order "staying AG James' demand for document production, preventing her from taking further legal action and declaring Executive Order Number 2-2024 valid under the U.S. Constitution, Federal Law, and State Law." (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 5, ECF No. 10-5.) On March 11, 2024, following the reassignment of this case to this Court's docket, the County Plaintiffs filed a proposed Temporary Restraining Order ("TRO") reiterating these requests for a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction. (See Proposed TRO, ECF No. 17 at 3–4.) The Court construes the Order to Show Cause as the County Plaintiffs' Motion for a Temporary Restraining Order and/or Preliminary Injunction ("TRO/PI Motion").[2]

2 The Court has reviewed the parties' submissions on the fully briefed TRO/PI Motion: (1) the Complaint (ECF No. 1); (2) the County Plaintiffs' Order to Show Cause and Proposed Temporary Restraining Order (ECF Nos. 10, 17); (3) the County Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Law (ECF No. 10-5); (4) the Affidavit of Bruce A. Blakeman (ECF No. 10-4); (5) the Declaration of County Plaintiffs' counsel,

Victoria LaGreca, and attached exhibits (ECF Nos. 10-1–10-3); (6) the Defendants' opposition brief (ECF No. 18); and (7) the County Plaintiffs' reply brief (ECF No. 21). The Individual Plaintiffs did not join in the County Plaintiffs' TRO/PI Motion. (See ECF Nos. 10, 17.) Although the Court provided the Individual Plaintiffs an opportunity to present their position on the TRO/PI Motion, they elected not to do so.[3]

At a conference with the Court on March 12, 2024, the County Plaintiffs requested an expedited resolution of the TRO Motion. (Conf., Mar. 12, 2024.) No party requested discovery or an evidentiary hearing on the PI Motion, whether during the conference or in their submissions to the Court. (Id.; see also ECF Nos. 1, 10, 10-1–10-5, 17, 18, 21.)

The County Plaintiffs' TRO/PI Motion falls far short of meeting the high bar for securing the extraordinary relief of a temporary restraining order from this Court. Plaintiffs' claims are nonjusticiable for multiple reasons: (1) Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity bars the declaratory and injunctive relief claim against Defendants New York and the OAG, as well as any claim for retrospective declaratory relief against Defendant James in her official capacity; (2) the County Plaintiffs lack capacity to bring the equal protection claim under Rule 17(b), Fed. R. Civ. P., and New York's capacity-to-sue rule; and (3) the record does not establish Plaintiffs' standing to bring the equal protection claim pled in the Complaint. Moreover, the County Plaintiffs' submission fails to demonstrate irreparable harm—a critical prerequisite for the issuance of a temporary restraining order. For the reasons addressed below, the Court denies the County Plaintiffs' TRO Motion and reserves decision on the PI Motion following the resolution of Defendants' Motion to Dismiss (ECF No. 20).

BACKGROUND

The NY Attorney General is New York's chief legal officer. See N.Y. Const. art. V, § 4; N.Y. Exec. Law § 63(1). Under New York law, the Attorney General:

> [p]rosecut[es] and defend[s] all actions and proceedings in which the state is interested, and ha[s] charge and control of all the legal business of the departments and bureaus of the state, or of any office thereof which requires the services of attorney or counsel, in order to protect the interest of the state ....

N.Y. Exec. Law § 63(1). The New York Legislature has granted the Attorney General a central role in ensuring the consistent application and enforcement of laws enacted by the legislature, including New York's anti-discrimination laws. The New York Executive Law empowers the Attorney General to "[b]ring and prosecute or defend upon request of the commissioner of labor or the state division of human rights, any civil action or proceeding ... necessary for effective enforcement of the laws of this state against discrimination ...." Id. § 63(9). It also grants the Attorney General authority to prosecute people for criminal violations of state anti-discrimination laws in certain circumstances, id. § 63(10), to file a complaint of Human Rights Law violations, id. § 297(1), and to play a role in the investigation and handling of Human Rights Law complaints, id. § 297. The New York Civil Rights Law requires notice to be served upon the Attorney General prior to the commencement of any private litigation alleging the violation of state civil rights laws. N.Y. Civ. Rts. Law § 40-d.

3 On February 22, 2024, Blakeman signed into law Executive Order 2024-2, titled "An Executive Order for Fairness for Women and Girls in Sports." (E.O., ECF No. 10-2.) The Executive Order relates to the process for securing a permit to use Nassau County Parks property[4] for "organizing a sporting event or competition" and does three main things. (E.O. at 1.) First, it requires that any permit applicant seeking to use Nassau County Parks property for a sporting event or competition "must expressly designate" whether the activity relates to (1) "[m]ales, men, or boys," (2) "[f]emales, women, or girls," or (3) "[c]oed or mixed, including both males and females" "based on [participants'] biological sex at birth." (Id.) Second, the Executive Order prohibits the Nassau County Department of Parks, Recreation and Museums (the "Parks Department") from issuing a permit for any sporting event or competition designated for "females, women, or girls" that allows "biological males" to participate, but allows the Parks Department to issue permits for sporting events or competitions designated for "males, men, or boys" that include participation by "biological females." (Id. at 1–2.)[5] Third, the Executive Order defines "gender" as "the individual's biological sex at birth" and permits the Parks Department to consider a birth certificate as identification of a participant's sex only when the birth certificate was "filed at or near the time" of the participant's birth. (Id. at 2.)

The plain text of the Executive Order prohibits transgender[6] women and girls, as well as any women and girls' sports teams that include them, from participating in women and girls' sporting events on Nassau County Parks property. (Id. at 1–2.) Transgender women and girls are only permitted to participate in sporting events designated as "male" or "coed." (Id.) By contrast, the plain text of the Executive Order permits transgender men and boys to participate in any sporting events on Nassau County Parks property, whether the events are designated as "female," "male," or "coed." (Id. at 2.) The Executive Order does not address people who may identify as intersex or nonbinary. (See Defs.' Br. at 4.)

4 On March 1, 2024, the OAG's Civil Rights Bureau sent a letter to Blakeman indicating that the office had reviewed the Executive Order and concluded that it is "in clear violation of New York State anti-discrimination laws." (OAG Ltr. at 1, ECF No. 10-3.) In the letter, the OAG demands rescission of the Executive Order within five business days and that Blakeman "immediately produce any and all documents constituting the record supporting [his] decision to issue the Order." (Id. at 3.) The OAG also states that "[f]ailure to comply with this directive may result in further legal action by the OAG." (Id.)

According to the March 1, 2024 letter, facilities covered by the Executive Order "rang[e] from general playing fields in parks to baseball, football, and soccer fields, basketball and tennis courts, indoor and outdoor swimming pools, as well as ice rinks and shooting ranges" and "would apply to approximately 100 venues." (Id. at 2.) The OAG asserts that the immediate effect of the Order is "to force sports leagues to make an impossible choice: discriminate against transgender women and girls, in violation of New York law, or find somewhere else to play." (Id.) It argues that the Executive Order violates the New York Human Rights Law's prohibition against discrimination on the bases of "sex" and "gender identity or expression" in places of public accommodation, N.Y. Exec. Law §§ 292(9), 296(2), and its prohibition against " 'compel[ling]' others to discriminate in ways that will violate the Human Rights Law" under N.Y. Exec. Law § 296(6). (OAG Ltr. at 2.) The OAG further argues that the Executive Order violates the New York Civil Rights Law, which provides that "no person shall be subjected to any discrimination in [their] civil rights" based on "sex ... [or] gender expression or identity," N.Y. Civ. Rts. Law § 40-c, as well as the Equal Protection Clause of the New York State Constitution. (OAG Ltr. at 2–3.)

Rather than respond to the letter, Plaintiffs filed suit in this Court on March 5, 2024. (See Compl.) The Complaint pleads a single cause of action alleging that the OAG's March 1, 2024 letter, as well as any other actions by Defendants "to prevent enforcement of" the Executive Order, violates the rights of "biological girls and women" under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. (Compl. ¶¶ 33–43.) Plaintiffs bring this claim under the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201, but do not cite 42 U.S.C. § 1983 ("Section 1983") or any other basis for the cause of action. (Id.) The Complaint alleges that the Executive Order advances the important government interest of "ensuring equality in women's athletics," and that the OAG's position "effectively vitiates biological females' right to equal opportunities in athletics as well as the right to a safe playing field by exposing biological females to the risk of injury by transgender women (i.e., biological males) as well as unfair competitive advantage." (Id. ¶¶ 29, 38.) It alleges that the New York Human Rights Law "is unconstitutional" as applied to the Executive Order because it purportedly "elevates transgender women to a level not recognized by Federal law in the athletics context all to the detriment of biological girls and women." (Id. ¶ 40.) Plaintiffs seek relief in the form of: (1) a declaration that Defendants' application of the New York Human Rights Law against the Executive Order violates the Equal Protection Clause;[7] (2) a declaration that the Executive Order "is valid under the United States Constitution, Federal law, and state law"; (3) a permanent injunction preventing "Defendants from taking any action to prevent" the County Plaintiffs "from implementing and enforcing" the Executive Order; and (4) costs, disbursements, reasonable attorney fees, and any further relief. (Compl. at 12.)

5 On March 7, 2024, the County Plaintiffs filed the TRO/PI Motion (ECF No. 10), seeking to bar Defendants from "taking further action" relating to the Executive Order, including by "initiating any legal proceedings and/or actions" against the County Plaintiffs. (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 27; TRO/PI Mot. at 2.) The County Plaintiffs' supporting brief also requests an order "staying AG James' demand for document production ... and declaring [the Executive Order] valid under the U.S. Constitution, Federal Law, and State Law." (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 5.)[8] Blakeman attests that, without immediate injunctive relief, Nassau County "will suffer immediate and irreparable injury, loss, and damage in that women and girls in Nassau County will be discriminated against and their constitutional rights under the United States Constitution will be violated." (Blakeman Aff. ¶ 3, ECF No. 10-4.) According to Blakeman, without the Executive Order:

> [W]omen and girls will not receive equal and fair opportunities to obtain recognition and accolades, college scholarships, and numerous other long-term benefits that result from participating and competing in athletic endeavors; women and girls will not have access to a supportive and safe environment for the purpose of engaging in sports; and biological males will have an unfair advantage over women and girls in sports.

(Id. ¶ 4.)

The Court permitted Defendants and the Individual Plaintiffs to respond to the County Plaintiffs' TRO/PI Motion by March 22, 2024. (Elec. Order, Mar. 23, 2024.) Defendants opposed the Motion (Defs.' Br.), but the Individual Plaintiffs did not provide a brief or factual submissions addressing any position on the Motion (see Elec. Order, Mar. 23, 2024). The Court further permitted the County Plaintiffs the opportunity to submit a reply brief addressing the arguments raised in Defendants' opposition brief by March 28, 2024. (Id.; Elec. Order, Mar. 26, 2024.) The County Plaintiffs filed a timely reply. (Cnty. Pls.' Reply, ECF No. 21.)

The County Plaintiffs have not provided any factual submissions addressing how the Executive Order is implemented in practice. Their brief asserts that permit applicants must "merely indicate whether said [athletic] competition is male, female, or coed and ... supply a copy of the applicants['] 'athlete participation policy.' " (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 6.) The "athlete participation policy" has not been introduced into evidence; nor have the County Plaintiffs provided any sworn statements about what information applicants must provide on this document to ensure compliance with the terms of the Executive Order or how applicants procure that information from their participants. The record is further silent as to whether any athletic/sports entity has applied for a permit to use Nassau County Parks property since the enactment of the Executive Order. The County Plaintiffs' brief asserts that "[n]o permit has been denied since the County's Executive Order was executed." (Id.)

VENUE AND JURISDICTION

Venue is proper under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(2) because, as described above, a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to this action occurred in this judicial district.

There is no dispute that this Court has personal jurisdiction over Defendants. New York State and the OAG are clearly state entities and James is sued in her role as NY Attorney General—a state official.

Plaintiffs assert that this Court has federal question jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claim under the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201, and the Fourteenth Amendment pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 1331. (Compl. ¶¶ 12, 34–35.) Defendants challenge Plaintiffs' standing to bring this claim under Article III of the U.S. Constitution. (Defs.' Br. at 13–14.) "If plaintiffs lack Article III standing, a court has no subject matter jurisdiction to hear their claim." Bohnak v. Marsh & McLennan Cos., Inc., 79 F.4th 276, 283 (2d Cir. 2023) (quotation marks omitted). As discussed in detail below, this Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction because Plaintiffs lack standing to bring the sole claim pled in the Complaint (Compl. ¶¶ 33–34). Bohnak, 79 F.4th at 283; see infra, Section I.C.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

6 The Second Circuit has long established that a party seeking a preliminary injunction must show three things: (1) irreparable harm in the absence of an injunction pending resolution of the action, (2) either a likelihood of success on the merits or both serious questions on the merits and a balance of hardships decidedly favoring the moving party, and (3) that a preliminary injunction is in the public interest. See N. Am. Soccer League, LLC v. U.S. Soccer Fed'n, 883 F.3d 32, 37 (2d Cir. 2018). The Second Circuit has "consistently applied the likelihood-of-success standard to cases challenging government actions taken in the public interest pursuant to a statutory or regulatory scheme," in lieu of the lower standard requiring a showing only of serious questions on the merits and a balance of hardships decidedly favoring the moving party. We the Patriots USA, Inc. v. Hochul, 17 F.4th 266, 279 n.13 (2d Cir. 2021), opinion clarified, 17 F.4th 368 (2d Cir. 2021); N. Am. Soccer League, 883 F.3d at 37; see, e.g., Gazzola v. Hochul, 88 F.4th 186, 194 (2d Cir. 2023) (requiring showing of a likelihood of success on the merits on preliminary injunction motion against New York commercial regulations on firearms and ammunition sales and related state licensing scheme and background-check and training requirements), petition for cert. filed, No. 23-995 (Mar. 12, 2024). Courts apply the same standard when considering an application for a TRO. See e.g., Dukes v. Cold Spring Harbor Cent. Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., No.

20CV4532JMAST, 2021 WL 308341, at *4 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 29, 2021); Hopkins Hawley LLC v. Cuomo, No. 20-CV-10932 (PAC), 2021 WL 8200607, at *1 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 8, 2021).

The Second Circuit has made clear that when a party seeks "mandatory" rather than "prohibitory" preliminary relief, "the likelihood-of-success and irreparable-harm requirements become more demanding still, requiring that the plaintiff show a clear or substantial likelihood of success on the merits and make a strong showing of irreparable harm." Daileader v. Certain Underwriters at Lloyds London Syndicate 1861, No. 23-690, 2024 WL 1145347, at *3 (2d Cir. Mar. 18, 2024) (citing New York ex rel. Schneiderman v. Actavis PLC, 787 F.3d 638, 650 (2d Cir. 2015)) (quotation marks and citations omitted). A mandatory temporary restraining order typically requires the non-movant to take some action, whereas a prohibitory temporary restraining order "typically requires the non-movant to refrain from taking some action." Id. "This higher standard is particularly appropriate when a plaintiff seeks a preliminary injunction against a government body ...." Weinstein v. Krumpter, 120 F. Supp. 3d 289, 297 (E.D.N.Y. 2015) (citations omitted); see also C.C. v. New York City Dep't of Educ., No. 22-0459, 2023 WL 2545665, at *2 (2d Cir. Mar. 17, 2023) (recognizing that this higher standard applies to a request for a mandatory injunction against governmental action) (citing Hester v. French, 985 F.3d 165, 176 (2d Cir. 2021)). Determining whether requested preliminary relief is mandatory or prohibitory "is sometimes unclear":

> In borderline cases, essentially identical injunctions can be phrased either in mandatory or prohibitory terms. We have therefore explained that [p]rohibitory injunctions maintain the status quo pending resolution of the case; mandatory injunctions alter it. In this context, the status quo is really the status quo ante – that is, the last actual, peaceable[,] uncontested status which preceded the pending controversy.

Daileader, 2024 WL 1145347, at *3 (citing N. Am. Soccer League, 883 F.3d at 36 n.4, 37 n.5) (quotation marks and citations omitted).

The County Plaintiffs contend, without explanation, that they may secure a temporary restraining order by meeting the lowest standard, which requires showing only "sufficiently serious questions going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation and a balance of hardships tipping decidedly in the plaintiff's favor." (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 23.) Defendants argue that the highest standard applicable to mandatory injunctions—requiring a showing of a "clear or substantial likelihood of success on the merits"—applies because the requested relief "will affect government action taken in the public interest pursuant to a statutory or regulatory scheme." (Defs.' Br. at 6.) Defendants do not explicitly address, however, whether the requested preliminary relief is mandatory or prohibitory in nature.

7 The lesser "serious questions" standard is inapplicable here because the requested temporary restraining order will affect the OAG and James' enforcement of the New York Human Rights Law, which constitutes "government action taken in the public interest pursuant to a statutory or regulatory scheme." We the Patriots USA, Inc., 17 F.4th at 279 n.13; see N.Y. Exec. Law § 292 et seq.; id. § 63(1). The Court does not resolve at this time, however, whether the TRO/PI Motion seeks mandatory or prohibitory relief. The status quo ante—the last actual, peaceable, uncontested status that preceded the pending controversy—was shortly after Blakeman issued the Executive Order and before the OAG issued the March 1, 2024 letter calling for the Executive Order's rescission and requesting the documents supporting its issuance. At that time, James and the OAG could exercise discretion under New York law to bring an enforcement action against the County Plaintiffs under the New York Human Rights Law. See N.Y. Exec. Law § 63(1). On the one hand, the County Plaintiffs' requested temporary restraining order is prohibitory because it would require the "non-movant to refrain from taking some action"—here, OAG and James' action to enforce state anti-discrimination laws. Daileader, 2024 WL 1145347, at *3. On the other hand, the requested temporary restraining order is mandatory because it would upend the status quo in which the New York Legislature has granted the NY Attorney General broad discretion to enforce the state's anti-discrimination laws. See N.Y. Exec. Law § 63. There is an additional question about whether the requested order may "provide the movant with substantially all the relief sought" and whether "that relief cannot be undone even if the defendant prevails at a trial on the merits," factors that weigh in favor of framing the requested TRO as mandatory. Yang v. Kosinski, 960 F.3d 119, 127–28 (2d Cir. 2020).

The Court need not resolve these questions at this time because, as explained in this opinion, the County Plaintiffs fail to meet the lower "likelihood of success on the merits" standard applied to a motion for a temporary restraining order seeking prohibitory relief against government actions taken in the public interest pursuant to a statutory or regulatory scheme. See, e.g., We the Patriots USA, Inc., 17 F.4th at 279; Gazzola, 88 F.4th at 194.

DISCUSSION

The County Plaintiffs fail to meet the standard for securing the "extraordinary remedy" of a temporary restraining order for two principal reasons. Benisek v. Lamone, 138 S. Ct. 1942, 1943 (2018) (per curiam) ("[A] preliminary injunction is an extraordinary remedy never awarded as of right.") (quotation marks omitted); Gazzola, 88 F.4th at 193–94 (same). First and foremost, the County Plaintiffs' TRO Motion fails to demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits of the sole equal protection claim pled in the Complaint. Based on the record before the Court, the claim is nonjusticiable under the doctrine of Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity, the application of Rule 17(b) and New York's capacity-to-sue rule, and the requirements of Article III standing. Second, the County Plaintiffs' submissions fail to show that they will suffer irreparable harm without the requested temporary restraining order.

I. Likelihood of Success on the Merits

The Plaintiffs' single claim for declaratory and injunctive relief under the Equal Protection Clause suffers from defects that render it nonjusticiable. The Eleventh Amendment affords New York and the OAG sovereign immunity from Plaintiffs' claim for injunctive and declaratory relief and bars any claim for retrospective declaratory relief against James. Additionally, the County Plaintiffs lack the capacity to sue all Defendants under Rule 17(b), Fed. R. Civ. P., and New York law. Furthermore, the record does not establish that any of the Plaintiffs—whether Nassau County, Blakeman, or the Individual Plaintiffs—have demonstrated an actual and imminent injury that is concrete and particularized as required for Article III standing to bring the equal protection claim pled in the Complaint.

A. Eleventh Amendment Sovereign Immunity

Defendants argue that the Eleventh Amendment bars Plaintiffs' claim for injunctive and declaratory relief against New York and the OAG, as well as any claim for "retroactive relief" against James for conduct taken in her official capacity as the NY Attorney General. (Defs.' Br. at 8–9.) The County Plaintiffs fail to address the Eleventh Amendment in their opening brief and to respond to any of Defendants' arguments in their reply brief in support of the TRO Motion. (See generally Defs.' Br. at 8–9; Cnty. Pls.' Reply.) Defendants are correct. The Eleventh Amendment bars almost all aspects of Plaintiffs' equal protection claim, with the sole exception of an equal protection claim for injunctive and prospective declaratory relief against James in her official capacity as the NY Attorney General.[9]

8 The Eleventh Amendment provides that "[t]he Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State." U.S. Const. Amend. XI. Though not set forth in the text, the Eleventh Amendment also bars "suits in federal court against a state brought by that state's own citizens." Mary Jo C. v. New York State & Loc. Ret. Sys., 707 F.3d 144, 151 (2d Cir. 2013). Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity also applies to suits by a municipality—such as Nassau County—against a state. See Monroe Cnty. v. State of Fla., 678 F.2d 1124, 1131 (2d Cir. 1982) (holding that a New York county bringing suit against Florida is a "Citizen of another State" within the meaning of the Eleventh Amendment), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1104 (1983); see also Oneida Cnty., N.Y. v. Oneida Indian Nation of New York State, 470 U.S. 226 (holding that the Eleventh Amendment bars a county's cross-claim against New York for indemnification), reh'g denied, 471 U.S. 1062 (1985). Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity applies not just to lawsuits filed in federal court against states themselves, but also to "certain actions against state agents and instrumentalities." Leitner v. Westchester Cmty. Coll., 779 F.3d 130, 134 (2d Cir. 2015) (citing Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. Doe, 519 U.S. 425, 429 (1997)); see also Mary Jo C., 707 F.3d at 151–52 (same). An entity "asserting Eleventh Amendment immunity ... bear[s] the burden of demonstrating entitlement." Leitner, 779 F.3d at 134. "[T]he question is whether the state instrumentality is independent or whether it is an 'arm of the state.' " Id.; see, e.g., Gollomp v. Spitzer, 568 F.3d 355, 366 (2d Cir. 2009) (holding that the New York State Unified Court System is an "arm of the State" entitled to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity). The Second Circuit has applied two different tests to answer this question. Leitner, 779 F.3d at 134–35, 137.[10] Both tests are ultimately guided by what the Supreme Court has recognized are the Eleventh Amendment's "twin reasons for being": the need to "preserv[e] the state's treasury and protect[ ] the integrity of the state." Id. at 134 (citing Hess v. PATH, 513 U.S. 30, 47–48 (1994)).

Entities shielded from suit by the Eleventh Amendment "may not be sued in federal court unless they have waived their Eleventh Amendment immunity, or unless Congress has abrogate[d] the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity when acting pursuant to its authority under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment." Gollomp, 568 F.3d at 366 (quotation marks omitted). The Eleventh Amendment thus "generally bars suits in federal court" against "non-consenting states." Leitner, 779 F.3d at 134. This bar applies to federal court suits against a state and its agents and instrumentalities "regardless of the nature of the relief sought." 74 Pinehurst LLC v. New York, 59 F.4th 557, 570 (2d Cir. 2023), cert. denied, No. 22-1130, 2024 WL 674658 (U.S. Feb. 20, 2024); Pennhurst State Sch. & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 120 (1984) ("[I]f a § 1983 action alleging a constitutional claim is brought directly against a State, the Eleventh Amendment bars a federal court from granting any relief on that claim.") (emphasis supplied). Accordingly, states and their agents and instrumentalities are immune from suits seeking monetary damages and injunctive relief, McGinty v. New York, 251 F.3d 84, 91 (2d Cir. 2001) (citations omitted), as well as declaratory relief, Ashmore v. Prus, 510 F. App'x 47, 48 (2d Cir. 2013) (citing Pennhurst, 465 U.S. at 100–01); Manners v. New York, 175 F.3d 1008, 1999 WL 96136 at *1 (2d Cir. 1999) (summary order) (citing Atlantic Healthcare Benefits Trust v. Googins, 2 F.3d 1, 4 (2d Cir. 1993)).

9 Notwithstanding the Eleventh Amendment's bar to federal court suits against states and their agents and instrumentalities, a plaintiff may sue a state official acting in their official capacity "for prospective, injunctive relief from violations of federal law" under the doctrine established by the Supreme Court in Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908). State Emps. Bargaining Agent Coal. v. Rowland, 494 F.3d 71, 94 (2d Cir. 2007). The Ex parte Young exception applies to a claim against a state official when the "complaint (a) alleges an ongoing violation of federal law and (b) seeks relief properly characterized as prospective." In re Deposit Ins. Agency, 482 F.3d 612, 618 (2d Cir. 2007) (citing Verizon Maryland Inc. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n of Maryland, 535 U.S. 635, 645 (2002)) (quotation marks omitted). The Ex parte Young exception does not apply if a plaintiff seeks declaratory relief that "would have the same effect as an award of damages against the state." Williams v. Marinelli, 987 F.3d 188, 197 (2d Cir. 2021) (citing Green v. Mansour, 474 U.S. 64, 73 (1985)); see also Bythewood v. New York, No. 22-2542-CV, 2023 WL 6152796, at *1 (2d Cir. Sept. 21, 2023) ("Retrospective declaratory relief cannot otherwise serve as an end run around the Eleventh Amendment's bar on retrospective awards of monetary relief.") (citing Ward v. Thomas, 207 F.3d 114, 120 (2d Cir. 2000)) (quotation marks omitted).

1) Plaintiffs' Claim against New York and the OAG

The Eleventh Amendment precludes Plaintiffs' claim against New York and the OAG because New York has not waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity to claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause and Congress has not abrogated that immunity. Gollomp, 568 F.3d at 366; Barone v. Laws.' Fund for Client Prot., 2023 WL 1975783, at *2 (2d Cir. 2023).

First, the Eleventh Amendment applies to both New York and the OAG. As one of the "United States," New York is squarely covered by the plain text of the Eleventh Amendment. U.S. Const. Amend. XI. The OAG also falls within the Amendment's reach because it "is unquestionably an arm of the State of New York for purposes of Eleventh Amendment immunity." Giordani v. U.S. Dep't of Just., No. 22-CV-642 (AMD) (LB), 2022 WL 17488494, at *6 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 7, 2022) (citation omitted), appeal dismissed (Nov. 6, 2023); see also Butler v. New York State Dep't of L., 211 F.3d 739, 746 (2d Cir. 2000) (affirming dismissal of employment discrimination claim against the OAG (referred to as the "New York State Department of Law") as barred by Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity); Mitchell v. New York, No. 23-705, 2024 WL 319106, at *2 (2d Cir. Jan. 29, 2024) (holding that "no relief, either legal or equitable, is available against ... the New York Attorney General" because it is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity); Smith v. United States, 554 F. App'x 30, 31 (2d Cir. 2013) (affirming district court's dismissal of a suit against New York and the NY Attorney General as barred by the Eleventh Amendment); Petreykov v. Vacco, 159 F.3d 1347 (2d Cir. 1998) (same); Rivera v. United States Citizenship & Immigr. Servs., No. 19-CV-3101, 2020 WL 4705220, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 12, 2020) (collecting district court decisions holding that the Eleventh Amendment bars claims against the OAG).[11]

10 Second, Congress has not abrogated the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity as to Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claim. The Complaint appears to assert a claim under the Declaratory Judgment Act and the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause without identifying a valid cause of action under which Plaintiffs bring this claim. (See generally Compl.)[12] Even if the Court were to liberally construe the Complaint to assert a Fourteenth Amendment claim pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, it is well established that "Congress did not abrogate the state's Eleventh Amendment immunity by enacting 42 U.S.C. § 1983." Barone, 2023 WL 1975783, at *2 (citing Will v. Mich. Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 66 (1989)).

Third, there is no indication that New York has waived its immunity by "voluntarily invok[ing] federal court jurisdiction, or else ... mak[ing] a clear declaration that it intends to submit itself to federal court jurisdiction." Kelly v. New York State Unified Ct. Sys., No. 21-1633, 2022 WL 1210665, at *2 (2d Cir. Apr. 25, 2022) (quoting Coll. Sav. Bank v. Fla. Prepaid Postsecondary Educ. Expense Bd., 527 U.S. 666, 675–76 (1999)) (brackets omitted); see also, e.g., Trotman v. Palisades Interstate Park Comm'n, 557 F.2d 35, 37–38 (2d Cir. 1977) (finding that clause in interstate charter permitting New York to "sue and be sued," was not a clear declaration that New York intended to waive sovereign immunity).

Fourth, the Eleventh Amendment applies to the injunctive and declaratory relief Plaintiffs seek through their equal protection claim against New York and the OAG, as well as the specific relief they seek on the TRO/PI Motion. Plaintiffs' requests for a temporary restraining order, preliminary injunction, and permanent injunction all include requests for injunctive relief that is squarely barred by the Eleventh Amendment. See McGinty, 251 F.3d at 91 (holding that the Eleventh Amendment bars claims for "injunctive relief" against nonconsenting states).[13] Plaintiffs' request for a declaration that Defendants' application of the New York Human Rights Law to the Executive Order violates the Fourteenth Amendment and a declaration that the Executive Order is lawful under federal and state law concern declaratory relief that is also barred by the Eleventh Amendment. See Ashmore, 510 F. App'x at 48; Manners, 1999 WL 96136 at *1.

11 Accordingly, Plaintiffs' equal protection claim for declaratory and injunctive relief against Defendants New York and the OAG are barred by Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity.

2) Claims against Defendant James, in her Capacity as NY Attorney General

Defendants argue that any claims for "retroactive relief" against Defendant James acting in her official capacity are also barred by Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity. (Defs.' Br. at 9.) This raises the question of whether any part of Plaintiffs' claim against James withstands Defendants' invocation of immunity.

The Complaint by its caption sues James "as attorney General of the State of New York" and its allegations solely address conduct by James' staff at the OAG, both of which suggest that Plaintiffs sue James only in her official capacity, rather than in her individual capacity. (See Compl. at 1.) The Complaint's request for a declaration that Defendants' application of the New York Human Rights Law to the Executive Order violates the Equal Protection Clause could be construed to include a request for a declaration that the OAG's March 1, 2024 letter violated the Equal Protection Clause. (See Compl. ¶ 41 (alleging that "[i]n fact, the cease-and-desist order violates the constitutional rights of biologically [sic] girls and women who are a federally recognized protected class")). The Eleventh Amendment bars this demand for retrospective declaratory relief against James in her official capacity. Williams, 987 F.3d at 197; Green, 474 U.S. at 73; Bythewood, 2023 WL 6152796, at *1.

At least a portion of the requested declaratory relief pled against James, however, is forward looking. That portion seeks to establish that the Executive Order is lawful going forward and that the New York Human Rights Law's provisions prohibiting discrimination on the bases of sex and gender identity and expression are invalid. These aspects of Plaintiffs' declaratory relief claim against James, as well as the request for an injunction barring James from taking any action to prevent implementation of the Executive Order, fall within the Ex parte Young exception to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity. See Seneca Nation, 58 F.4th at 672 n.39; Rowland, 494 F.3d at 95–98. As discussed below, however, those aspects of Plaintiffs' declaratory relief claim against James are nonjusticiable for other reasons.

B. The County Plaintiffs' Capacity to Sue

Defendants argue that both Nassau County and Blakeman, who sues in his official capacity as the Nassau County Executive, lack the capacity to sue Defendants for the equal protection claim pled in the Complaint.

Rule 17(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure governs the capacity of an entity to bring a claim in federal court. Centro de la Comunidad Hispana de Locust Valley v. Town of Oyster Bay, 954 F. Supp. 2d 127, 136 (E.D.N.Y. 2013), aff'd 868 F.3d 104 (2d Cir. 2017). "Capacity to sue is a threshold matter allied with, but conceptually distinct from, the question of standing." Sonterra Cap. Master Fund, Ltd. v. Barclays

Bank PLC, 403 F. Supp. 3d 257, 267 (S.D.N.Y. 2019). As relevant here, the "[c]apacity to sue or be sued is determined ... by the law of the state where the court is located." Fed. R. Civ. P. 17(b)(3); Orraca v. City of New York, 897 F. Supp. 148, 152 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (noting that under Rule 17(b), "the capacity of a governmental entity to sue or be sued is a question of state law"); see, e.g., In re World Trade Ctr. Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litig., 846 F.3d 58, 63–64 (2d Cir. 2017) (applying New York law to determine whether a public benefit corporation had the capacity to challenge a New York claim-revival statute under the New York Constitution). "[A] party must maintain its capacity to sue throughout litigation, and lack of capacity is grounds for dismissal." Sonterra, 403 F. Supp. 3d at 267 (quotation marks and citation omitted). If not raised by motion, a defense of lack of capacity to sue "can be waived." City of New York v. State of New York, 86 N.Y.2d 286, 292 (1995).

12 New York follows the "traditional" capacity-to-sue rule, according to which "municipalities and other local governmental corporate entities and their officers lack capacity to mount constitutional challenges to acts of the State and State legislation." City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 289; In re World Trade Ctr. Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litig., 846 F.3d at 63. This rule "flows" from the recognition that "municipal corporate bodies—counties, towns and school districts—are merely subdivisions of the State, created by the State for the convenient carrying out of the State's governmental powers and responsibilities as its agents." City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 289. The Second Circuit has recognized that "[t]his rule is also a necessary outgrowth of separation of powers doctrine: it expresses the extreme reluctance of courts to intrude in the political relationships between the Legislature, the State and its governmental subdivisions." In re World Trade Ctr. Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litig., 846 F.3d at 63 (citing City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 296). Thus, New York counties "cannot have the right to contest the actions of their principal or creator affecting them in their governmental capacity or as representatives of their inhabitants." City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 290. "Municipal officials ... suffer the same lack of capacity to sue the State with the municipal corporate bodies they represent." Id. at 291.[14]

The New York Court of Appeals recognizes only four limited exceptions to the general rule that municipal corporate entities and their officers lack capacity to mount constitutional challenges to State action and legislation:

> (1) [where there is] an express statutory authorization to bring such a suit; (2) where the State legislation adversely affects a municipality's proprietary interest in a specific fund of moneys; (3) where the State statute impinges upon "Home Rule" powers of a municipality constitutionally guaranteed under article IX of the State Constitution; and (4) where the municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription.

City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 291–92 (quotation marks and citations omitted); see also In re World Trade Ctr. Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litig., 846 F.3d at 63–64. The New York Court of Appeals has emphasized that these four exceptions are "narrow." In re World Trade Ctr. Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litig., 30 N.Y.3d 377, 387 (2017). Thus, the capacity-to-sue rule has been applied to bar:

> public entities from challenging a wide variety of state actions, such as, e.g., the allocation of state funds amongst various localities, the modification of a village operated hospital's operating certificate, the closure of a local jail by the State, special exemptions from local real estate tax assessments, laws mandating that counties make certain expenditures, state land use regulations and state laws requiring electronic voting systems to be installed at polling places in lieu of lever-operated machines.

Id. (citations to New York Court of Appeals decisions omitted).

Defendants have timely raised the County Plaintiffs' lack of capacity to sue in their opposition to the TRO/PI Motion and in a timely filed Motion to Dismiss the Complaint. (See Defs.' Br. at 9; Defs.' Mem. Supp. Mot. Dismiss at 9, ECF No. 20-1.) Under well-established New York law, both Nassau County and Blakeman lack the capacity to sue Defendants for the sole claim pled in the Complaint. Plaintiffs explicitly seek a ruling from this Court that Defendants violate the rights of women and girl athletes to equal protection by applying state anti-discrimination laws to the Executive Order. (Compl. ¶¶ 35–41; id. at 12.) Blakeman attests that he and Nassau County bring this suit to vindicate the rights of women and girls in Nassau County. (Blakeman Aff. ¶¶ 3–4.) As a subdivision and creation of Defendant New York, Nassau County lacks the authority to bring such a claim "contest[ing] the actions of [its] principal or creator affecting [it] in [its] governmental capacity or as representatives of [its] inhabitants." City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 290. Because Blakeman sues in his role as Nassau County's top official, he too lacks the authority to bring such a claim. See id. at 291 ("Municipal officials ... suffer the same lack of capacity to sue the State with the municipal corporate bodies they represent.").

13 The County Plaintiffs fail to show that any of the four limited exceptions to New York's capacity-to-sue rule apply to their claim. First, they do not identify any express statutory language or legislative history showing that the New York Legislature intended to confer upon a county or a county executive the capacity to sue Defendants under the Fourteenth Amendment for any type of relief, much less the specific relief sought in the Complaint. See e.g., City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 289 (holding that the New York capacity-to-sue doctrine barred an equal protection claim by New York City, its Mayor, and other city entities against New York State and "various State officials" for public school funding issues where there was no "any express statutory language or legislative history" showing "capacity to bring suit challenging State legislation").[15]

This case does not trigger the second exception to New York's capacity-to-sue rule because the Plaintiffs do not show that the challenged provisions of the New York Human Rights Law adversely affect Nassau County's "proprietary interest in a specific fund of moneys." City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 287. There is no argument, much less a showing, that Plaintiffs' claims concern any Nassau County proprietary interest in any monetary fund.

The County Plaintiffs argue that the third exception to New York's capacity-to-sue rule—the "home rule" exception—applies to their Fourteenth Amendment equal protection claim because the New York Constitution's home rule provision "provides protections to local governments more extensive than those in many other states," the "laws enacted and adopted by the Nassau County Legislature carry the weight of state law," and that body delegated to the County Executive the authority to develop policies and procedures for the issuance of permits to use Nassau County Park property. (Cnty. Pls.' Reply at 2–3.) This argument is unpersuasive.

The New York Court of Appeals first recognized the home rule exception in Town of Black Brook v. State, 41 N.Y.2d 486 (1977), finding "a limited exception" to the rule that a municipality cannot attack "state legislative action affecting its powers" where the "local government's claim is based on one of the [home rule] protections of article IX [of the New York Constitution]." Id. at 487–89. This "limited exception" applies only to a municipality's claim that a state statute violates Article IX of the New York Constitution. See id. at 489 (noting that the home rule exception applies "when a home rule challenge is brought"); New York Blue Line Council, Inc. v. Adirondack Park Agency, 86 A.D.3d 756, 758 (2011) (affirming the lower court's ruling "that the municipal petitioners lack capacity to sue on all claims other than that alleging a violation of their home rule powers" under "article IX of the N.Y. Constitution"), appeal dismissed 17 N.Y.3d 947 (2011), lv. denied 18 N.Y.3d 806 (2012); Town of Verona v. Cuomo, 136 A.D.3d 36, 41 (2015) (noting that the home rule exception "applies when a municipality's claim is based upon a violation of its home rule powers").[16]

14 Here, the home rule exception does not apply because the Complaint does not plead a claim that the New York Human Rights law, as applied to the Executive Order, violates the home rule provision of the New York Constitution. See New York Blue Line Council, 86 A.D.3d at 759 (2011) (applying the home rule exception to hold that municipal entities only had capacity to sue state agency under article IX of the N.Y. Constitution, but not to bring other claims); Town of Black Brook, 41 N.Y.2d at 489 (the home rule exception applies "when a home rule challenge is brought"). The sole claim set forth in the Complaint concerns an alleged violation of the Equal Protection Clause and the Declaratory Judgment Act. (Compl. ¶¶ 33–43.) Without providing any legal authority, the County Plaintiffs appear to argue that the home rule exception permits a municipality and a municipal official to sue state defendants for claims other than an alleged violation of the home rule protections of article IX of the New York Constitution. (See Reply Br. at 2–3). This Court will not expand the home rule exception beyond the contours laid out by New York courts. Based on the record before the Court, the home rule exception is inapplicable to this case and the County Plaintiffs lack capacity to sue Defendants for violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause and the Declaratory Judgment Act.

Finally, the fourth exception to the New York capacity-to-sue rule, which the County Plaintiffs invoke on reply, does not apply. (Id.) The record does not establish that any action by Defendants to enforce the New York Human Rights Law against the Executive Order would compel either Nassau County or Blakeman "to violate a constitutional proscription." City of New York, 86 N.Y.2d at 292. "New York courts have interpreted constitutional ... proscriptions to be something expressly forbidden ...." Merola v. Cuomo, 427 F. Supp. 3d 286, 292 (2019). The County Plaintiffs broadly argue that rescission of the Executive Order would "allow[ ] transgender females (biological males) to play sports with biological females, thereby violating the constitutional rights of women as a protected class" and that rescission of the Executive Order would "violate the rights afforded to [women] by Title IX." (Cnty. Pls.' Reply at 2.) The County Plaintiffs' claim that rescission of the Executive Order would lead to Title IX violations is confusing and out of place because that statute applies to educational institutions, and the County Plaintiffs concede that Title IX does not apply to any sporting and athletic endeavors on Nassau County Parks property. (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 7 n.1.) The County Plaintiffs' assertion that invalidation of the Executive Order would compel them to violate the equal protection rights of women and girls is also unpersuasive. There is no record evidence that the County Plaintiffs would be forced to violate the Equal Protection Clause's prohibition against intentional discrimination with respect to any individual or group if Nassau County were to revert to the procedures in place prior to enactment of the Executive Order for evaluating and granting permits to use Nassau County Parks facilities. See Howard v. City of New York, 602 F. App'x 545, 547 (2d Cir. 2015) ("[T]he Equal Protection Clause[ ] only prohibits intentional ... discrimination.") (quoting Brown v. City of Oneonta, 221 F.3d 329, 339 (2d Cir. 2000)). Indeed, the County Plaintiffs' argument suggests that prior to the Executive Order's enactment, the County Plaintiffs were violating the rights of women and girls by not having such a permitting process in place.

C. Standing

Plaintiffs' equal protection claim boils down to the argument that the OAG's application of the New York Human Rights Law's prohibitions against discrimination on the bases of gender identity and expression to the Executive Order will cause violations of women and girls' rights under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. (See Compl. ¶¶ 33–43.) Based on this claim, Plaintiffs seek a declaration that those provisions of the New York Human Rights Law are unconstitutional as applied to the Executive Order and that the Executive Order complies with federal and state law, and an injunction barring New York, the OAG, and James in her role as NY Attorney General, from taking any enforcement action that might lead to invalidation of the Executive Order. (Id. at 12.) The Court lacks jurisdiction over this claim under Article III of the Constitution because none of the Plaintiffs have standing to bring it.

15 Article III of the Constitution "limits the federal judicial power to deciding 'Cases' and 'Controversies.' " Soule v. Connecticut Ass'n of Sch., Inc., 90 F.4th 34, 45 (2d Cir. 2023) (citing U.S. Const. art. III § 2). A case or controversy only exists when the plaintiff has "standing" to sue because they have "a personal stake in the outcome of the litigation." Id. (citing United States v. Texas, 599 U.S. 670 (2023)) (quotation marks omitted). In order to establish Article III standing, a plaintiff must show: "(1) that they suffered an injury in fact, (2) that the injury is fairly traceable to Defendants' challenged conduct, and (3) that the injury is likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision." Id. (citing Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 578 U.S. 330, 338 (2016)) (quotation marks omitted). A "plaintiff[ ] must demonstrate standing for each claim that they press and for each form of relief that they seek." Id. (citing TransUnion LLC v. Ramirez, 594 U.S. 413 (2021)). When seeking the extraordinary relief of a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction, a plaintiff's burden to demonstrate standing "will normally be no less than that required on a motion for summary judgment." Do No Harm v. Pfizer Inc., No. 23-15, 2024 WL 949506, at *7 (2d Cir. Mar. 6, 2024) (citing Cacchillo v. Insmed, Inc., 638 F.3d 401, 404 (2d Cir. 2011)). Accordingly, a plaintiff seeking such extraordinary relief "cannot rest on such mere allegations as would be appropriate at the pleading stage but must set forth by affidavit or other evidence specific facts" to establish injury-in-fact, redressability, and standing. Id. (citing Cacchillo, 638 F.3d at 404); see also Green Haven Prison Preparative Meeting of Religious Soc'y of Friends v. New York State Dep't of Corr. & Cmty. Supervision, 16 F.4th 67, 78–79 (2d Cir. 2021) (same); Pers. v. United States, No. 19 CIV. 154 (LGS), 2019 WL 258095, at *1 n.2 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 18, 2019) (applying the same rule "in the context of a temporary restraining order, since the legal standard for granting temporary restraining orders and preliminary injunctions is the same").

In order to demonstrate an "injury in fact," a plaintiff must establish "an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized ... and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical." Lujan v. Defs. of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992) (quotation marks and citations omitted); see also Soule, 90 F.4th at 45, 50 (citing TransUnion, 594 U.S. at 423). To be "concrete," an injury must be "real, and not abstract." Id. at 45. An injury is "particularized" only when it "affect[s] the plaintiff in a personal and individual way." Id. at 45–46 (citing Spokeo, 578 U.S. at 339). Lastly, an injury is "actual or imminent" where the injury "has actually happened or is certainly impending." Id. at 46, 50 (citing Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S.

398, 409 (2013), and then citing Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560–61) (quotation marks omitted).

Under these standards, the County Plaintiffs' submissions fail to establish that any Plaintiff—Nassau County, Blakeman, or K.E.M., whose claim is brought by the Mullens—have the required injury-in-fact for standing to bring a claim for the requested relief against Defendants. (Compl. at 12.)

1) County Plaintiffs

The County Plaintiffs' submissions fail to show they have standing for two reasons. First, in the Second Circuit, it is well established that a county lacks standing to challenge the constitutionality of a state statute under the Fourteenth Amendment. Blakeman does not demonstrate that he meets any exception to this rule for county officials who bring a legal claim in their official capacity. Second, the County Plaintiffs fail to show that they have any constitutional interest implicated by an OAG enforcement action against them related to the Executive Order. Even if an OAG enforcement action implicated the constitutional interest of third-parties —such as women and girls in Nassau County—the County Plaintiffs lack standing to assert an equal protection claim on behalf of these third-parties.

a. Standing to Challenge the Constitutionality of the New York Human Rights Law

The County Plaintiffs lack standing to bring the equal protection claim pled in the Complaint. (See Compl. ¶¶ 33–43.) The Second Circuit has squarely held that "a political subdivision" of a state, such as a county, "does not have standing to sue its state under the Fourteenth Amendment." Tweed-New Haven Airport Auth. v. Tong, 930 F.3d 65, 73 n.7 (2d Cir. 2019). "Political subdivisions of a state may not challenge the validity of a state statute under the Fourteenth Amendment." City of New York v. Richardson, 473 F.2d 923, 929 (2d Cir. 1973) (citations omitted); see also Aguayo v. Richardson, 473 F.2d 1090, 1101 (2d Cir. 1973).[17] Accordingly, under longstanding Second Circuit precedent, Nassau County, as a political subdivision of New York, does not have standing to bring a claim for injunctive and declaratory relief against any of the Defendants to challenge the OAG's application of the New York Human Rights Law to the Executive Order under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. See Tweed, 930 F.3d at 73 n.7.[18]

16 The Second Circuit has recognized a limited theory of standing—the so-called "dilemma" theory—where, unlike a municipal corporation, a municipal official acting in their official capacity may have standing to challenge a state statute under the Fourteenth Amendment in certain circumstances. See Bd. of Educ. of Mt. Sinai Union Free Sch. Dist. v. New York State Tchrs. Ret. Sys., 60 F.3d 106, 112 (2d Cir. 1995) (citing Bd. of Ed. of Cent. Sch. Dist. No. 1 v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 241 n.5 (1968)). The county official must demonstrate that "compliance with state law will require them to violate their oaths to act constitutionally" and "that their positions as officials or funding for [their governmental entity] is in jeopardy if they refuse" to comply. New York State Tchrs. Ret. Sys., 60 F.3d at 110–112 (finding that county officials who did not make such allegations lacked standing to bring Fourteenth Amendment and Contracts Clause claims against a state statute under the dilemma theory); see also Merola v. Cuomo, 427 F. Supp. 3d 286, 290–91 (N.D.N.Y. 2019).

Blakeman has failed to make the required showing. The County Plaintiffs have not set forth any evidence that an OAG enforcement action against them or even the eventual invalidation of the Executive Order would require Blakeman to violate his oath to act in accordance with the U.S. Constitution. Further, the County Plaintiffs have not submitted evidence showing that Blakeman's failure to comply with the New York Human Rights Law would likely result in the loss of his position as County Executive or a reduction in funding for Nassau County. Without evidence as to any "realistic threat of harm" to Blakeman if the OAG were to prevail on its theory that the Executive Order violates the New York Human Rights Law's prohibitions against discrimination on the bases of sex and gender identity and expression, the County Plaintiffs fail to establish any dilemma that could support Blakeman's standing to bring the Fourteenth Amendment claim pled in the Complaint. New York State Tchrs. Ret. Sys., 60 F.3d at 112.

b. Standing to Bring a Pre-Enforcement Challenge

Finally, the County Plaintiffs' submissions fail to establish their standing to bring a pre-enforcement equal protection claim challenging Defendants' application of the New York Human Rights Law to the Executive Order. The OAG has not initiated any legal action against Nassau County related to the Executive Order, although the March 1, 2024 letter conveys a demand that the County Plaintiffs rescind the Executive Order and produce the documentary record supporting its issuance or face "further legal action by the OAG." (OAG Ltr. at 3). For standing to bring a pre-enforcement challenge, a plaintiff must show a "sufficiently imminent" injury-in-fact by demonstrating (1) "an intention to engage in a course of conduct arguably affected with a constitutional interest, but proscribed by a statute," and (2) that there exists "a credible threat of prosecution thereunder." Silva v. Farrish, 47 F.4th 78, 86 (2d Cir. 2022) (citing Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 159 (2014)) (quotations omitted); see, e.g., Org. for Marriage, Inc. v. Walsh, 714 F.3d 682, 687–691 (2d Cir. 2013) (holding that an organization had standing to bring a pre-enforcement First Amendment challenge to a state law where the plaintiff intended to engage in arguably protected speech and fear of violating the law had a chilling effect on that speech).

Defendants argue that implementation of the Executive Order does not implicate any "constitutional interest" of the County Plaintiffs themselves as required for a pre-enforcement challenge. (Defs.' Br. at 13.) Indeed, the County Plaintiffs have not pointed to any constitutional interest in maintaining the Executive Order that they themselves—rather than third parties—possess. Cf. Cnty. of Santa Clara v. Trump, 250 F. Supp. 3d 497, 525 (N.D. Cal. 2017) (finding that plaintiff counties demonstrated injury-in-fact to support standing for a pre-enforcement challenge to a federal executive order where plaintiffs' failure to comply would lead to the withdrawal of federal funding and "implicate a constitutional interest, the rights of states and local governments to determine their own local policies and enforcement priorities pursuant to the Tenth Amendment"). Instead, the County Plaintiffs allege that the OAG's enforcement actions will cause "women and girls in Nassau County" to face "discriminat[ion]" and violations of "their constitutional rights." (Blakeman Aff. ¶ 3.) The County Plaintiffs contend that they have standing because of an asserted "increased risk of future physical injury" to these third parties and rely on two district court decisions that address organizational standing. (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 23–24) (citing Rural & Migrant Ministry v. United States EPA, 510 F. Supp. 3d 138, 155 (S.D.N.Y. 2020), amended and superseded by Rural & Migrant Ministry v. United States EPA, 565 F. Supp. 3d 578 (S.D.N.Y. 2021); Brooklyn Ctr. for Indep. of the Disabled v. Bloomberg, 290 F.R.D. 409, 416 (S.D.N.Y. 2012)). The County is not an organization, however, and the County Plaintiffs do not provide any legal authority for the proposition that a municipality is treated as an organization for purposes of Article III standing. Cf. City of Olmsted Falls, OH v. F.A.A., 292 F.3d 261, 268 (D.C. Cir. 2002) (assuming, without deciding, that a city may not establish standing on behalf of its citizens under the doctrine of organizational standing).

17 Moreover, even if Nassau County could avail itself of organizational standing doctrine, it would not be able to assert the equal protection rights of its female residents. It is well established in the Second Circuit that an organization lacks "standing to assert the rights of its members" under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Connecticut Citizens Def. League, Inc. v. Lamont, 6 F.4th 439, 447 (2d Cir. 2021) (quotation marks omitted); Nnebe v. Daus, 644 F.3d 147, 156 (2d Cir. 2011) ("It is the law of this Circuit that an organization does not have standing to assert the rights of its members in a case brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, as we have 'interpret[ed] the rights [§ 1983] secures to be personal to those purportedly injured.").

In the section of their reply brief addressing irreparable harm, the County Plaintiffs also argue that Nassau County and Blakeman will suffer an injury in the form of budget uncertainty due to the potential for "[a]n influx of [personal injury] lawsuits against the County" in the absence of the Executive Order, which "can result in millions of dollars of increase in the County budget in the form of settlements or verdicts." (Cnty. Pls.' Reply at 4.) These assertions, which are not alleged in the Complaint or supported by any evidence, are speculative and fail to establish that enforcement of the Executive Order implicates any constitutional interest of the County itself. Cf. County of Santa Clara, 250 F. Supp. 3d at 528–29.

Accordingly, the record fails to show that the County Plaintiffs have standing to sue Defendants in a pre-enforcement claim that the New York Human Rights Law as applied to the Executive Order violates the Equal Protection Clause.

2) Individual Plaintiffs

In addition to the County Plaintiffs, the Individual Plaintiffs bring an equal protection claim against Defendants on behalf of their minor child, K.E.M. The record also fails to demonstrate an injury in fact supporting K.E.M.'s Article III standing to sue Defendants for the requested relief.

"Parents generally have standing to assert the claims of their minor children." Nguyen v. Milliken, No. 15-CV-0587 (MKB), 2016 WL 2962204, at *7 (E.D.N.Y. May 20, 2016) (citing Altman v. Bedford Cent. Sch. Dist., 245 F.3d 49, 70 (2d Cir. 2001)) (quotation marks omitted); see, e.g., Soule, 90 F.4th 51 (finding standing to bring Title IX claim for some requested injunctive relief where parents sued on behalf of their minor daughters). Where a parent asserts a claim in federal court on behalf of a child, the child must meet the requirements for Article III standing. See id. at 45–51 (analyzing whether the plaintiffs' children met the Article III requirements); see also McCormick ex. Rel. v. Sch. Dist. of Mamaroneck, 370 F.3d 275, 284 (2d Cir. 2004) (same).

There is no evidence in the record relating to K.E.M. The Complaint alleges only that K.E.M. is a "16-year-old biological female high school volleyball player" whose parents reside in Nassau County, and that "the Mullens are being forced into making the impossible determination whether to expose their 16-year-old daughter to the risk of injury by a transgender girl or simply to not play volleyball at all and forego whatever opportunities may present because of her participation in volleyball." (Compl. ¶¶ 7–8, 30.) Plaintiffs have not put forward any evidence addressing whether K.E.M. plays on a volleyball team, whether that team engages in athletic endeavors on Nassau County Parks property, whether K.E.M. plays against or alongside transgender girls in those activities, or how rescission of the Executive Order will directly cause K.E.M. any concrete and imminent injury. The record lacks any evidence showing that K.E.M. has suffered, or imminently will suffer, an injury that is real, and not abstract and actual and imminent based on the OAG's application of the New York Human Rights Law to the Executive Order. The record thus fails to show that K.E.M has standing to seek a declaration that the New York Human Rights Law's prohibition against discrimination on the bases of gender identity and expression violates the Equal Protection Clause, a declaration that the Executive Order is lawful, or an injunction barring the OAG's enforcement of the New York Human Rights Law against the Executive Order. See Do No Harm v. Pfizer Inc., 2024 WL 949506, at *7 (requiring plaintiff seeking preliminary relief to establish injury-in-fact, causation and redressability as required for standing by "affidavit or other evidence"); Green Haven Prison, 16 F.4th at 78–79 (same); cf. Soule, 90 F.4th 45 (finding plaintiffs established an injury in a Title IX action against a sports conference policy permitting athletes to play on teams consistent with their gender identities, where each plaintiff alleged, among other things, that they had competed in covered events and finished behind a transgender girl at least once).

18 Further, to the extent the Complaint alleges that the Individual Plaintiffs themselves will suffer an injury based on any violation of K.E.M.'s constitutional right to equal protection, they lack standing to pursue such a claim. Nguyen, 2016 WL 2962204, at *7 ("[A]lthough parents may sue on behalf of their minor child, they do not have standing to assert claims on their own behalf for a violation of their child's rights."); see also T.P. ex rel. Patterson v. Elmsford Union Free Sch. Dist., No. 11 CV 5133 VB, 2012 WL 860367, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 27, 2012) (finding that a mother could not recover on a derivative claim under Section 1983 for the violation of her child's constitution rights).

D. The Merits of Plaintiffs' Equal Protection Claim

The County Plaintiffs cannot show a likelihood of success on the merits of their equal protection claim where, as here, the Court finds that (1)Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity bars all aspects of the claim except for the portion seeking injunctive and prospective declaratory relief against James in her official capacity; (2) the County Plaintiffs lack the capacity to sue Defendants under Rule 17(b) and New York law; and (3) the record fails to show that Nassau County, Blakeman, or the Individual Plaintiffs have standing to bring the sole equal protection claim pled in the Complaint. In this context, the Court need not address the merits of Plaintiffs' equal protection challenge to Defendants' application of the New York Human Rights Law to the Executive Order. See Fed. Defs. of New York, Inc. v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 954 F.3d 118, 134 (2d Cir. 2020) ("It is axiomatic that the federal courts should, where possible, avoid reaching constitutional questions.") (citation and quotation marks omitted); see also Spector Motor Serv., Inc. v. McLaughlin, 323 U.S. 101, 105 (1944) ("If there is one doctrine more deeply rooted than any other in the process of constitutional adjudication, it is that we ought not to pass on questions of constitutionality ... unless such adjudication is unavoidable.").

II. Irreparable Harm

The County Plaintiffs fail to show that they will suffer irreparable harm absent the requested TRO. A demonstration of irreparable harm is "the single most important prerequisite for the issuance of" a temporary restraining order. JTH Tax, LLC v. Agnant, 62 F.4th 658, 672 (2d Cir. 2023) (internal citation omitted). That is because a temporary restraining order, like a preliminary injunction, seeks to maintain the status quo in order "to protect [the] plaintiff from irreparable injury" while awaiting final decision on the merits. 11A Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 2947 (3d ed. April 2023 Update). Therefore, Plaintiffs must show that without a temporary restraining order, "they will suffer an injury that is neither remote nor speculative, but actual and imminent, and one that cannot be remedied if a court waits until the end of trial to resolve the harm." JTH Tax, 62 F.4th at 672.

In cases concerning claims of constitutional injury, a bare assertion of a constitutional injury, without evidence "convincingly show[ing]" the existence of noncompensable damages, is insufficient to automatically trigger a finding of irreparable harm. KM Enters. v. McDonald, 11-cv-5098, 2012 WL 540955, at *4 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 16, 2012) (citing Savage v. Gorski, 850 F.2d 64, 68 (2d Cir. 1988), aff'd 518 Fed. App'x 12 (2d Cir. 2013)) (emphasis supplied); Weinstein v. Krumpter, 120 F. Supp. 3d 289, 297 (E.D.N.Y. 2015) (same). By contrast, irreparable harm is satisfied when "the constitutional deprivation is convincingly shown and that violation carries noncompensable damages." Donohue v. Mangano, 886 F. Supp. 2d 126, 150 (E.D.N.Y. 2012). Indeed, when "the violation of a constitutional right is the irreparable harm ... the two prongs of the preliminary injunction threshold merge into one: in order to show irreparable injury, plaintiff must show a likelihood of success on the merits." Turley v. Giulani, 86 F. Supp. 2d 291, 295 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (citation omitted); Jansen v. New York City Dep't of Educ., No. 23-cv-6756, 2023 WL 6160691, at *3 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 20, 2023), recons. denied, No. 23-cv-6756, 2023 WL 6541901 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 6, 2023). Even in a case concerning an alleged constitutional injury, "it often will be more appropriate to determine irreparable injury by considering what adverse factual consequences the plaintiff apprehends if an injunction is not issued, and then considering whether the infliction of those consequences is likely to violate any of the plaintiff's rights." Time Warner Cable of New York City, a division of Time Warner Ent. Co., L.P. v. Bloomberg L.P., 118 F.3d 917, 924 (2d Cir. 1997) (addressing motion for a preliminary injunction on a First Amendment claim).

19 The County Plaintiffs make three irreparable harm arguments—none of which are persuasive or supported by the record. First, Blakeman attests that if the Executive Order is rescinded, "women and girls in Nassau County" will "not have access to a supportive and safe environment" for sporting activities and will face "discriminat[ion]" and exclusion from the "long-term benefits" of participation in these endeavors, including "recognition and accolades, [and] college scholarships." (Blakeman Aff. ¶¶ 3–4; see also Cnty. Pls.' Reply at 3.) The County Plaintiffs have not put forward evidence about any specific women and girls in Nassau County who would face an imminent threat of physical injury, discrimination, or exclusion from recognition, accolades, or college scholarships, or any other long-term benefit from any current or future athletic activities on Nassau County Parks property in the absence of a temporary restraining barring the OAG from securing documents supporting the Executive Order's issuance and from exercising discretion to take legal action against the Executive Order, or even in the event the Executive Order is rescinded. As discussed above, the record provides no facts addressing whether K.E.M. plays on a volleyball team that uses Nassau County Parks property or involves the participation of transgender women or girls, much less that any transgender women or girls pose to K.E.M. an actual or imminent threat of either physical injury or exclusion from recognition or other benefits from athletic activities. Instead, the County Plaintiffs rely on several media reports of injuries to cisgender women and girls in athletic endeavors with transgender women and girls outside of Nassau County (and even outside of New York) (see TRO/PI Motion at 20; Reply Br. at 4), which do not meet their high burden to demonstrate that "they will suffer an injury that is neither remote nor speculative, but actual and imminent" as required for the extraordinary relief of a temporary restraining order. JTH Tax, 62 F.4th at 672.

The County Plaintiffs cite several cases to support the undisputed proposition that a "substantial risk of serious illness or death" presents a situation where "monetary damages are difficult to ascertain or are inadequate." (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 25.) Those cases concerning serious medical illness and death are readily distinguishable because the plaintiffs were able to establish, through both expert and lay testimonial evidence, that a specific illness or disease from which they suffered would result in injury or illness absent the requested preliminary relief. In Shapiro v. Cadman Towers, Inc., for example, the Second Circuit upheld the district court's finding that the plaintiff established irreparable harm to support a preliminary injunction requiring her apartment complex to provide her a parking space inside the apartment's garage where the district court found, based upon testimony from medical experts, that the plaintiff suffered from multiple sclerosis and that requiring her to park on the street could result in humiliation and injury from urinary dysfunction and loss of balance. 51 F.3d 328, 332–33 (2d Cir. 1995). In other words, the plaintiff established, through expert testimonial evidence, that a disease from which she presently suffered could cause symptoms that would increase her risk of injury and humiliation absent injunctive relief. Likewise, in Innovative Health Systems, Inc. v. City of White Plains, the Second Circuit upheld the district court's finding of irreparable harm if a drug and alcohol treatment center were to close based on testimonial evidence that the plaintiffs being treated for substance abuse at the center were at risk of relapse and consequent harms, including illness, disability, or death. 117 F.3d 37, 43–44 (2d Cir. 1997), superseded on other grounds in Zervos v. Verizon New York, Inc., 252 F.3d 163, 171 n.7 (2001). Further, the Circuit upheld a finding that one plaintiff in particular would not suffer irreparable harm where that individual had completed treatment at the program and provided no evidence that he continued to use their services. Id.[19] By contrast, here, the County Plaintiffs have not presented any evidence showing that K.E.M. or any other woman or girl would be physically injured or be excluded from recognition, accolades, or other long-term benefits from athletic activities by invalidation of the Executive Order, much less a denial of the requested TRO barring Defendants from securing the record supporting issuance of the Executive Order and from taking enforcement action related to the Executive Order.

20 The County Plaintiffs' second irreparable harm argument is that without the Executive Order, they face "the risk of substantial personal injury judgments by allowing participation on women's athletic teams based on gender identity." (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 19). This argument has no basis in the record. The County Plaintiffs fail to identify a single past or current personal injury lawsuit filed against them due to an alleged injury suffered by a cisgender women during an athletic endeavor involving the participation of a transgender woman or girl on Nassau County Parks property. Moreover, as noted above, the record does not support the conclusion that any such personal injury lawsuits would imminently be filed against the County if the requested TRO is denied because there are no facts in the record showing that any specific cisgender woman or girl in Nassau County will face imminent injury in an athletic event involving a transgender woman or girl on Nassau County Parks property if the Executive Order is invalidated.

Third, the County Plaintiffs argue that irreparable harm is "presumed" in this case because the Complaint alleges that "the NYS AG is effectively seeking to deprive Plaintiffs their constitutional right to equal protection." (Cnty. Pls.' Br. at 25.) The County Plaintiffs misstate the law. As discussed, "the mere allegation of a constitutional infringement in and of itself does not constitute irreparable harm." Pinckney v. Bd. of Educ. of Westbury Union Free Sch. Dist., 920 F. Supp. 393, 400 (E.D.N.Y. 1996). The burden remains on the County Plaintiffs to "convincingly show[ ]" irreparable constitutional injury in order to secure a temporary restraining order. Donohue, 886 F. Supp. 2d at 150; KM Enters., 2012 WL 540955, at *4 (same); Weinstein, 120 F. Supp. 3d at 297 (same). Based on the current record before the Court, the County Plaintiffs fail to meet this burden because: (1) Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity bars Plaintiffs' equal protection claim for declaratory and injunctive relief against Defendants New York and the OAG, and Plaintiffs' claim for retrospective declaratory relief against James; (2) the County Plaintiffs lack the capacity to bring their equal protection claim under Rule 17(b) and New York's capacity-to-sue rule; and (3) all of the Plaintiffs lack standing to bring the sole equal protection claim pled in the Complaint. See supra, Section I.

III. Balance of Hardships and Public Interest

A plaintiff seeking a temporary restraining order must additionally establish that the "public interest" and "balance of equities" of the parties weigh in favor of granting the injunction. Yang, 960 F.3d at 127. "When the government is a party to the suit, our inquiries into the public interest and the balance of the equities merge." We the Patriots USA, Inc., 17 F.4th at 295. The Court declines to address these factors because the County Plaintiffs' submissions do not meet the critical requirements of showing a likelihood of success on the merits of their equal protection claim and irreparable harm in the absence of the requested temporary restraining order.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the Court denies the County Plaintiffs' TRO Motion (ECF No. 10) and reserves decision on the PI Motion pending resolution of Defendants' Motion to Dismiss (ECF No. 20).

All Citations

Slip Copy, 2024 WL 3201671

Footnotes

1 New York law refers to the OAG as the "New York Department of Law." See N.Y. Const. art. V, § 4 ("The head of the ... department of law[shall be] the attorney-general."); see also N.Y. Exec. Law § 60.

2 The Court overlooks any procedural deficiency in the County Plaintiffs' submission and construes it as a TRO/PI Motion because Plaintiffs "submitt[ed] a memorandum of law and supporting documents that allow the Court to consider the proposed motion" (ECF Nos. 10-5, 14, 17) and because "the parties are fairly and adequately apprised of the nature and basis of the application." Fiedler v. Incandela, 222 F. Supp. 3d 141, 155 (E.D.N.Y. 2016) (quotation marks omitted).

3 As discussed below, the Court set a March 22, 2024 deadline for the Defendants and the Individual Plaintiffs to respond to the County Plaintiffs' TRO/PI Motion. Although the Defendants provided a timely response, the Individual Plaintiffs did not submit anything. (Elec. Order, Mar. 28, 2024.)

4 The plain text of the Executive Order refers to permits to use and occupy "Nassau County Parks property" (see E.O. at 1), but Defendants characterize the Executive Order as applying to all property under the purview of the Nassau County Department of Parks, Recreation and Museums. (Defs.' Br. at 3.) The full name of the department overseeing Nassau County Parks property is the "Nassau County Department of Parks, Recreation, and Museums." See Nassau County, Departments, Parks, Recreation and Museums, About Parks, https://www.nassaucountyny.gov/1768/About-Parks (last visited Apr. 2, 2024). According to Nassau County's website, there are "more than 70 parks, preserves, museums, historic properties, and athletic facilities comprising 6,000 acres throughout the county." Id. The Court need not resolve whether the Executive Order applies to all property under the purview of the Nassau County Department of Parks, Recreation and Museums or only a subset consisting of "Nassau County Parks property," as that term is used in the Executive Order, in order to resolve the County Plaintiffs' TRO Motion.

5 This Opinion and Order uses the terms "biological males" and "biological females" only when quoting from the Executive Order. These terms are scientifically "imprecise" and are viewed as derogatory to transgender women and girls. Soule v. Connecticut Ass'n of Sch., Inc., 90 F.4th 34 at 83 n.8 (2d Cir. 2023) (Judges Chin, Carney, Kahn, Lee, Pérez, dissenting) (referring to intervening parties as "transgender females" and transgender girls" rather than "biological males" (the term used by appellants) to "afford them the respect and dignity they are due" because "calling attention to a transgender person's biological sex by referring to them as a 'biological male' is harmful and invalidating" and because such terms are scientifically "imprecise") (citing Wylie C. Hembree, Peggy T. Cohen-Kettenis, et al., Endocrine Treatment of Gender-Dysphoric/Gender-Incongruent Persons: An Endocrine Society Clinical Practice Guideline, 102(11) J. Clinical Endocrinology & Metabolism, 3869, 3875 tbl. 1 (2017)); Glossary of Terms: Transgender, GLADD Media Reference Guide: 11th Edition, GLADD, https://glaad.org/reference/trans-terms/ (last visited Apr. 22, 2024); see also Hecox v. Little, 79 F.4th 1009, 1023–24 (9th Cir. 2023) ("[T]he [challenged] Act's definition of 'biological sex' is likely an oversimplification of the complicated biological reality of sex and gender.").

6 This Opinion and Order uses the term "transgender" to refer to individuals whose gender identity does not correspond to their sex assigned at birth. The term "gender identity" refers to a person's sense of being male, female, neither, or some combination of both, which may or may not correspond to an individual's sex assigned at birth. See N.Y. Exec. Law § 292(35) ("The term 'gender identity or expression' means a person's actual or perceived gender-related identity, appearance, behavior, expression, or other gender-related characteristic regardless of the sex assigned to that person at birth, including, but not limited to, the status of being transgender.").

7 Although the March 1, 2024 letter set forth the OAG's position that the Executive Order violates both the New York Human Rights Law and the New York Civil Rights Law, Plaintiffs' requested declaratory relief concerns only the alleged unconstitutionality of the New York Human Rights Law as applied to the Executive Order. (See Compl. at 12.)

8 Although this requested declaration is part of the ultimate relief sought in the Complaint (Compl. at 12), it is not identified as a part of the preliminary relief requested in the Order to Show Cause or proposed TRO. (See ECF Nos. 10, 17.)

9 Defendants do not argue that Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity bars any claim for injunctive relief by Plaintiffs against James for conduct taken in her official capacity. (Defs' Br. at 8–9). As discussed below, Plaintiffs' equal protection claim for injunctive relief against James for conduct taken in her official capacity is permissible under the exception to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity established in Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908).

10 The Second Circuit has recognized that both arm-of-the-state tests "have much in common" and that "the choice of test is rarely outcome-determinative." Leitner, 779 F.3d at 137. The first arm-of-the-state test requires courts to consider (1) "the extent to which the state would be responsible for satisfying any judgment that might be entered against the defendant entity," and (2) "the degree of supervision exercised by the state over the defendant entity." Clissuras v. City Univ. of N.Y., 359 F.3d 79, 82 (2d Cir. 2004) (quotation marks omitted). The second arm-of-the state test requires consideration of six factors:

> (1) how the entity is referred to in the documents that created it; (2) how the governing members of the entity are appointed; (3) how the entity is funded; (4) whether the entity's function is traditionally one of local or state government; (5) whether the state has a veto power over the entity's actions; and (6) whether the entity's obligations are binding upon the state.

Mancuso v. New York State Thruway Auth., 86 F.3d 289, 293 (2d Cir. 1996). If the factors from the second test do not lean in a clear direction, a court must consider "the twin reasons for the Eleventh Amendment: (1) protecting the dignity of the state, and (2) preserving the state treasury." Woods v. Rondout Valley Cent. Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 466 F.3d 232, 240 (2d Cir. 2006) (citing Mancuso, 86 F.3d at 293). If consideration of these two reasons does not clarify the determination, the court then focuses on "whether a judgment against the governmental entity would be paid out of the state treasury." Id. at 241.

11 Given the weight of this authority, the Court does not address all of the factors of the Mancuso arm-of-the-state test, but recognizes that the first four Mancuso factors weigh in favor of finding the OAG to be an arm of the state. The OAG is referenced in the New York Constitution and its duties and powers are established in New York statutes (the first Mancuso factor). See N.Y. Const. art. V, §§ 1, 4; N.Y. Exec Law § 60 et seq. The NY Attorney General is elected in "the same general election as the governor" (the second Mancuso factor). N.Y. Const. art. V, § 1. The budget for the office comes from the New York Legislature (the third Mancuso factor). See N.Y. Exec. Law § 60. The powers and duties of the NY Attorney General are traditionally those of state government (the fourth Mancuso factor). See e.g., N.Y. Exec. Law § 63 ("The attorney-general shall ... [p]rosecute and defend all actions and proceedings in which the state is interested ... and have charge and control of all the legal business of the departments and bureaus of the state ... in order to protect the interest of the state ....").

12 The Complaint does not cite 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which established a cause of action for bringing constitutional claims against people acting under color of state law. (See Compl. ¶ 14; id. at 9.) The only statute Defendants' cite—the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201—"does not create an independent cause of action." Chevron Corp. v. Naranjo, 667 F.3d 232, 244–45 (2d Cir. 2012). In their reply brief, the County Plaintiffs state that the claim "was in fact asserted under the Equal Protection Clause" (Cnty. Pls.' Reply at 1), but point to no authority for the proposition that there is an implied cause of action against state governments under the Fourteenth Amendment. Cf. Pauk v. Bd. of Trs. of City Univ. of New York, 654 F.2d 856, 864 (2d Cir. 1981) (collecting cases where courts have found implied causes of action for certain constitutional violations, but not in the Equal Protection Clause context); Turpin v. Mailet, 591 F.2d 426 (2d Cir. 1979) (abrogating prior Second Circuit decision finding an implied cause of action under the Fourteenth Amendment for suits against municipalities). Even if Plaintiffs could bring an implied cause of action under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court has held that Congress did not express an intent to abrogate states' Eleventh Amendment immunity by ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment itself. See Santiago v. New York State Dept. of Corr. Servs., 945 F.2d 25, 30–32 (2d Cir. 1991) ("[W]e are unpersuaded that the states, in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment, waived their Eleventh Amendment immunity ....").

13 As discussed, the Complaint requests a permanent injunction barring Defendants from "taking any action" against implementation and enforcement of the Executive Order. (Compl. at 12). Plaintiffs also seek a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction barring Defendants from "taking further legal action" and "from initiating any legal proceedings and/or actions against" the County Plaintiffs, and enjoining Defendants "from obtaining any and all documents produced or maintained by" the County Plaintiffs. (Proposed TRO at 1.)

14 As discussed later in this Opinion and Order, see Section I.C n.18, the Second Circuit has employed a similar rationale in finding that political subdivisions lack "standing" to sue their state creators in a challenge to a state statute under the Fourteenth Amendment. See Tweed-New Haven Airport Auth. v. Tong, 930 F.3d 65, 73 n.7 (2d Cir. 2019); Aguayo v. Richardson, 473 F.2d 1090, 1101 (2d Cir. 1973).

15 In arguing that the first exception to New York's capacity-to-sue rule does not apply to this case, Defendants contend that county and county officials generally lack capacity to assert a Fourteenth Amendment claim against a state because "they are not 'persons' within the meaning" of the Due Process Clause. (Defs.' Br. at 11) (citing Cnty. of Chautauqua v. Shah, 126 A.D.3d 1317, 1321 (4th Dep't 2015), aff'd sub nom Cnty. of Chemung v. Shah, 28 N.Y.3d 244 (2016)). The Court does not need to reach this question because the County Plaintiffs point to no express statutory language or legislative history demonstrating the New York Legislature's intent to grant them capacity to sue Defendants under the Fourteenth Amendment.

16 In Town of Babylon, NY v. James, No. 22-CV-1681(KAM)(AYS), 2023 WL 8734201 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 19, 2023), appeal docketed, No. 24-177 (2d Cir. Jan. 22, 2024), however, the parties brought claims against the NY Attorney General challenging a state statute under the Fourteenth Amendment and article IX of the New York Constitution. The Court held that the home rule exception did not apply to the case and did not explicitly distinguish whether it was invoked with respect to both claims, or just the home rule claim. Id.

17 By contrast, the Second Circuit held in Tweed that a political subdivision "may sue its state under the Supremacy Clause" because that clause "raises unique federalism concerns." 930 F.3d at 73. Tweed did not abrogate the Second Circuit's previous decisions in Richardson and Aguayo as to a political subdivision's lack of standing to sue the state under the Fourteenth Amendment, finding that those cases "present[ed] considerations different from those we consider here." Tweed, 930 F.3d at 73 n.7. Accordingly, this Court is bound to follow the holdings of Richardson and Aguayo. See, e.g., Town of Babylon, 2023 WL 8734201, at *9 (finding that under the Tweed-Richardson-Aguayo line of cases, a New York municipality is barred from bringing due process and equal protection claims against a New York statute).

18 The Second Circuit has characterized its analysis in the Tweed-Richardson-Aguayo line of cases as concerning a political subdivision's "standing" to sue. See Tweed, 930 F.3d at 73 n.7; Aguayo, 473 F.2d at 1100; but see Richardson, 473 F.2d at 929 (describing the rule as one where the state lacks "privileges or immunities ... [to] invoke in opposition to the will of its creator" (citing Williams v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, 289 U.S. 36, 40 (1933))). This concept of standing is distinct from New York law on the capacity to sue. Sonterra, 403 F. Supp. 3d at 267 ("Capacity to sue is a threshold matter allied with, but conceptually distinct from, the question of standing.").

19 See also New York v. Heckler, 742 F.2d 729, 736 (2d Cir. 1984) (plaintiffs established irreparable harm where they suffered from mental illnesses and presented "ample evidence" that they would likely suffer "a severe medical setback" as a result of the challenged requirement), aff'd sub nom. Bowen v. City of New York, 476 U.S. 467 (1986); New York v. Sullivan, 906 F.2d 910, 918 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) (plaintiffs, who had cardiovascular disease, established that irreparable harm would result if they did not receive disability benefits needed to ensure treatment).

60 F.3d 106
United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE MT. SINAI UNION FREE SCHOOL DISTRICT; Mt. Sinai Union Free School District; Peter C. Paciolla, Superintendent of Mt. Sinai Union Free School District; Nicholas C. DiPiazza, as President of the Board of Education of the Mt. Sinai Union Free School District and individually; Gail Litsch; Maureen Poerio; Board of Education of the Sewanhaka Central High School District; Sewanhaka Central High School District; Dr. George Goldstein, Superintendent of Sewanhaka Central High School District; and James Parla, as President of the Board of Education, Plaintiffs–Appellants,

v.

NEW YORK STATE TEACHERS RETIREMENT SYSTEM; H.N. Langlitz, in his capacity as Executive Director, New York State Teachers Retirement System; Richard E. Tehhaken, President; Richard F. Lindstrom, Vice President; Michael R. Corn; R. Michael Kraus; Lucy P. Martin; Joseph P. McLaughlin; S.J. Salenger; H. Carl McCall; Ruth E. Williams; Iris Wolfson, in their capacity as members of the Board of Directors of the New York State Teachers Retirement System; Charles Golding; and William Conboy, Defendants–Appellees.

No. 1275, Docket 94–9006
|
Argued Feb. 15, 1995.
|
Decided July 12, 1995.

Synopsis

School districts, boards of education of school districts, officials of school districts, and citizen taxpayers sued officers and directors of state teachers' retirement system and two teachers who had previously retired from positions as police officers, challenging application of statute which required school districts employing individuals who had previously retired from service in another part of public sector to make contributions to state teachers' retirement system in amount school district would have made had retiree been member of system throughout entire period of second employment. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, Thomas C. Platt, Jr., Chief Judge, dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. School districts, boards of education, officials and taxpayers appealed. The Court of Appeals, Miner, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) taxpayers did not have common-law taxpayer standing or statutory standing to sue, and (2) school district and board officials did not have standing.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes (11)

[1] Federal Courts Standing

Court of Appeals reviews dismissal of complaint for lack of standing de novo. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 12(b)(1), 28 U.S.C.A.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Federal Courts Standing

In exercising its de novo review of dismissal of complaint for lack of standing, Court of Appeals must accept as true all material allegations of complaint, and must construe complaint in favor of complaining party. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 12(b)(1), 28 U.S.C.A.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

It is burden of party who seeks exercise of jurisdiction in his favor, clearly to allege facts demonstrating that he is proper party to invoke judicial resolution of dispute. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 12(b)(1), 28 U.S.C.A.

27 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Municipal Corporations Nature and scope in general

Whether plaintiff has standing in his capacity as taxpayer turns largely on sovereign whose act he challenges.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] United States Taxpayer standing

Federal taxpayer cannot rest standing to challenge acts of Congress, or acts taken by other arms of federal government, on theory that challenged conduct injures him through its effect on his taxes.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] United States Taxpayer standing

Generally, standing premised on federal taxpayer status fails for want of concrete injury; abstract injury shared by public does not suffice.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] States Standing in general

State taxpayers, like federal taxpayers, do not have standing to challenge actions of state governments based upon fact that they pay taxes to the state.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Education Taxpayers' Suits and Other Remedies

Citizen taxpayers of school district did not have standing as municipal taxpayers to challenge state statute which required school districts employing individuals who had previously retired from service in another part of public sector to make contributions to state teachers' retirement system in amount it would have made had retiree been member of system throughout entire period of second employment; challenge was directed against state, rather than municipal action. N.Y.Laws 1990, c. 666, § 1 et seq.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Municipal Corporations Misapplication of Funds

Availability of municipal taxpayer standing does not extend to actions in which municipal taxpayer challenges expenditure of municipal funds mandated by state law.

10 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Courts Suits involving validity or construction of state statutes

Municipal taxpayers did not have standing to challenge in federal district court state statute which required school districts employing individuals who had retired from service in another part of public sector to make contributions to state teachers' retirement system in amount school district would have made had retiree been member of system throughout entire period of second employment pursuant to statute which confers standing on citizen taxpayers to bring action against state employees who have caused or are about to cause wrongful expenditure of state funds; such actions must be brought in state court. N.Y. McKinney's State Finance Law §§ 123–b, 123–c; N.Y.Laws 1990, c. 666, § 1 et seq.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Education Rights of action and defenses

Officials of school districts and school boards did not have standing to challenge in federal district court state statute which required school districts employing individuals who had retired from service in another part of public sector to make contributions to state teachers' retirement system in amount school district would have made had retiree been member of system throughout entire period of second employment, pursuant to Allen in which court stated that "dilemma" of being required to choose between violating oath to support constitution and refusing to comply with law, which would most likely result in their expulsion from office and reduction in state funds for their school districts; officials did not allege that their positions or funding for their schools was in jeopardy if they refused to implement state statute. N.Y.Laws 1990, c. 666, § 1 et seq.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

Attorneys and Law Firms

107 Scott J. Steiner, New York City (Curt Rogg–Meltzer, Rogg–Meltzer, Steiner & Ebeling, New York City, of counsel), for plaintiffs-appellants.

Elizabeth Bradford, Asst. Atty. Gen. State of N.Y. (G. Oliver Koppell, Atty. Gen. State of N.Y., of counsel), for defendants-appellees.

108 Before: MINER and JACOBS, Circuit Judges.[*]

Opinion

MINER, Circuit Judge:

Plaintiffs-appellants are the Mt. Sinai Union Free School District ("Mt. Sinai"), the Sewanhaka Central School District ("Sewanhaka"), the boards of education of the school districts, officials of the school districts, and citizen taxpayers of one of the districts. They appeal from a judgment entered in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York (Platt, then-Chief Judge) dismissing their amended complaint, pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), on the ground that none of the plaintiffs had standing to pursue the claims alleged in the complaint. The district court concluded that: (1) the school districts and their boards of education, as political subdivisions of the state, lack standing to challenge state legislation, (2) the taxpayer plaintiffs were to be considered state taxpayers and, as such, could not demonstrate adequate injury to support Article III standing, nor did they have standing under state law, and (3) the school-board officials lack the requisite personal stake in the outcome of the controversy to support standing. For the reasons that follow, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

BACKGROUND

This case involves a challenge to the constitutionality of Chapter 666 of the Laws of 1990 of New York State ("Chapter 666"), a law aimed at reducing unfairness in the provision of pensions to public employees. It appears from the amended complaint that the two defendant teachers in this action, William Conboy and Charles Golding, were former members of the New York City Police Department. Accordingly, both had been members of the New York City Police Pension Fund and, upon retirement from the Police Department, each became eligible for a pension from the Police Pension Fund. Like many retired police officers, the two men chose to pursue second careers. Conboy was employed as a teacher by Mt. Sinai beginning in 1979, and Golding was employed as a teacher by Sewanhaka beginning in 1971. When they were hired as teachers, state law permitted them to draw their pensions from the Police Pension Fund only on the condition that they not become members of the New York State Teachers' Retirement System ("NYSTRS"), the pension fund established for teachers in New York State schools.

In 1990, the legislature passed Chapter 666, which was designed to permit individuals like Conboy and Golding to receive a pension benefit that would reflect all of their years in public service. Under the law, an individual who has retired from service in one part of the public sector and is reemployed in another, including a school district, may apply for relief under Chapter 666. Upon proper application, Chapter 666 requires the school district employing such an individual to make contributions to NYSTRS in the amount the school district would have made had the retiree been a member of the system throughout the entire period of his second employment.

In 1992, Conboy and Golding applied for and were granted the benefits provided under Chapter 666. Accordingly, NYSTRS billed their school district employers for the payments that would have been made had Conboy and Golding been NYSTRS members from the start of their employment as teachers. As a result, Mt. Sinai was instructed to pay $89,172 to NYSTRS on Mr. Conboy's behalf, and Sewanhaka was instructed to pay $93,563 on Mr. Golding's behalf.[1] The school districts refused to make the payments, and brought this suit in the 109 district court to challenge the validity of Chapter 666.

The amended complaint was filed by three groups of plaintiffs: 1) the school districts that employ the two teachers and their boards of education; 2) officers and directors of those school districts and boards, namely Peter C. Paciolla, who is the Superintendent of Mt. Sinai, Nicholas C. DiPiazza, who is the President of the Board of Education of Mt. Sinai, Dr. George Goldstein, who is the Superintendent of Sewanhaka, and James Parla, who is the President of Sewanhaka; and 3) taxpayers of the Mt. Sinai School District, namely Gail Litsch, Maureen Poerio, and Nicholas DiPiazza. The defendants named in the complaint were various officers and directors of NYSTRS, in their official capacities, and the two teachers.

Upon the facts described above, the plaintiffs alleged violations of federal and state law. Plaintiffs alleged that Chapter 666 violates the Contracts Clause of the Constitution by impairing the contracts between the school districts and the teachers, that Chapter 666 violates the Contracts Clause by impairing the contracts between the plaintiffs and NYSTRS, and that Chapter 666 violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The plaintiffs also pleaded various state-law claims, including violations of the state constitution, misapplication of Chapter 666, defects in the teachers' applications for benefits under Chapter 666, and a claim of conversion.

NYSTRS and its officers moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), on the ground that none of the plaintiffs has standing to maintain the action, and for failure to state a claim, under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6).[2] The district court granted the defendants' motion on the ground that the plaintiffs lacked standing to bring suit. The court held that (1) the taxpayer plaintiffs were to be considered state taxpayers, rather than municipal taxpayers, and, as such, did not suffer a "concrete" injury sufficient to support standing; (2) the taxpayer plaintiffs did not have standing under Article 7–A of the New York State Finance Law, which grants standing to challenge state expenditures, because the expenditures at issue would be made by school districts and not by the state; (3) the plaintiff school district officials lacked a sufficient injury to give rise to standing; and (4) the plaintiff school districts and boards of education lacked standing to contest the state legislation because they were creatures of the state legislature.

In this appeal, plaintiffs-appellants challenge only that portion of the district court's judgment in which the court determined that the taxpayers and the officials of the school districts and of the boards of education lack standing. They do not challenge the determination that the school districts and boards of education lack standing.

DISCUSSION

I. Standard of Review

[1] [2] [3] This court reviews the dismissal of a complaint for lack of standing de novo. See Thompson v. County of Franklin, 15 F.3d 245, 249 (2d Cir.1994). In exercising our review, we must "accept as true all material allegations of the complaint, and must construe the complaint in favor of the complaining party." Id. (quoting Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 501, 95 S.Ct. 2197, 2206, 45 L.Ed.2d 343 (1975) (internal quotation marks omitted)). Nonetheless, "it is the burden of the party who seeks the exercise of jurisdiction in his favor, clearly to allege facts demonstrating that he is a proper party to invoke judicial resolution of the dispute." FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 231, 110 S.Ct. 596, 608, 107 L.Ed.2d 603 (1990) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). We conclude that, viewed under these standards, the plaintiffs have failed to establish that they have standing under any of the theories that they invoke.

II. Taxpayer Standing

The taxpayer plaintiffs contend that they have standing to challenge Chapter 666 under the taxpayer standing doctrine enunciated in Frothingham v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 43 S.Ct. 597, 67 L.Ed. 1078 (1923) and its 110 progeny. They further contend that they have standing as taxpayers under a state statute.

a. Common–Law Taxpayer Standing

[4] [5] [6] It is well settled that whether a plaintiff has standing in his capacity as a taxpayer turns largely on the sovereign whose act he challenges. A federal taxpayer, for example, cannot rest standing to challenge acts of Congress, or acts taken by other arms of the federal government, on the theory that the challenged conduct injures him through its effect on his taxes. This is so because the federal taxpayer's "interest in the moneys of the Treasury ... is shared with millions of others [and] is comparatively minute and indeterminable; and [because] the effect upon future taxation, of any payment out of the funds ... [is too] remote, fluctuating and uncertain." Frothingham, 262 U.S. at 487, 43 S.Ct. at 601. As a general matter, therefore, standing premised on federal taxpayer status fails for want of a concrete injury; an abstract injury shared by the public does not suffice. See Schlesinger v. Reservists Committee to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 219–221, 94 S.Ct. 2925, 2931–32, 41 L.Ed.2d 706 (1974). Cf. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 88 S.Ct. 1942, 20 L.Ed.2d 947 (1968) (delineating limited exception to the bar against federal taxpayer standing).

[7] State taxpayers, like federal taxpayers, do not have standing to challenge the actions of state government simply because they pay taxes to the state. In Doremus v. Board of Educ. of Hawthorne, 342 U.S. 429, 72 S.Ct. 394, 96 L.Ed. 475 (1952), the Supreme Court likened state taxpayers to federal taxpayers for the purposes of standing, and held that a state taxpayer's action only amounts to a case or controversy when it is a "good-faith pocketbook action," in which the taxpayer alleges injury to a "direct and particular financial interest." Id. at 434–35, 72 S.Ct. at 398; see also ASARCO Inc. v. Kadish, 490 U.S. 605, 613, 109 S.Ct. 2037, 2043, 104 L.Ed.2d 696 (1989) (Kennedy, J., joined by three justices) ("[W]e have likened state taxpayers to federal taxpayers, and thus we have refused to confer standing upon a state taxpayer absent a showing of 'direct injury....' "). We note, however, that the lower courts have employed differing interpretations of Doremus in regard to the question of taxpayer standing. Compare Colorado Taxpayers Union, Inc. v. Romer, 963 F.2d 1394, 1402–03 (10th Cir.1992) (requirements for federal and state taxpayer standing the same), cert. denied, 507 U.S. 949, 113 S.Ct. 1360, 122 L.Ed.2d 739 (1993) and Taub v. Kentucky, 842 F.2d 912, 918 (6th Cir.) (same), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 870, 109 S.Ct. 179, 102 L.Ed.2d 148 (1988) with Hoohuli v. Ariyoshi, 741 F.2d 1169, 1180 (9th Cir.1984) (state taxpayer standing found where each plaintiff alleged "status as a taxpayer" and identified "amounts of money appropriated" for challenged actions). It seems to us that the "direct and particular" interest referred to in Doremus requires more than the mere payment of taxes alleged here.

However, while the foregoing rules present substantial obstacles to taxpayers who challenge federal or state actions, a taxpayer who challenges municipal actions stands on a different footing for reasons explained by the Frothingham Court:

> The interest of a taxpayer of a municipality in the application of its moneys is direct and immediate, and the remedy by injunction to prevent their misuse is not inappropriate.... The reasons which support the extension of the equitable remedy to a single taxpayer in such cases are based upon the peculiar relation of the corporate taxpayer to the corporation, which is not without some resemblance to that subsisting between stockholder and private corporation.

262 U.S. at 486–87, 43 S.Ct. at 601 (citations omitted). In reliance upon this passage, this court has concluded that a municipal taxpayer has standing to challenge allegedly unlawful municipal expenditures. See United States v. City of New York, 972 F.2d 464, 470–71 (2d Cir.1992). In City of New York, we were presented with a municipal taxpayer's challenge to New York City's action in entering into certain contracts, in alleged violation of state law. We concluded that, under Frothingham, the relationship of a municipal taxpayer to the municipality is presumed to be sufficiently "direct and immediate" 111 to confer standing upon a taxpayer who challenges a municipal activity involving a " 'measurable appropriation or loss of revenue.' " Id. at 470 (quoting District of Columbia Common Cause v. District of Columbia, 858 F.2d 1, 5 (D.C.Cir.1988)); see also Freedom From Religion Found., Inc. v. Zielke, 845 F.2d 1463, 1469–70 (7th Cir.1988) (municipal taxpayer standing available to challenge improper use of tax revenues).

[8] Unlike in City of New York, the taxpayer plaintiffs' challenge here is directed at a state, rather than a municipal, action. Plaintiffs nonetheless argue that, although they challenge an action of the state legislature, they are being injured by an unlawful expenditure of municipal funds, and they therefore have standing as municipal taxpayers. In support of this position, they rely upon Gwinn Area Community Schools v. Michigan, 741 F.2d 840 (6th Cir.1984), where the court held that municipal taxpayers had standing to challenge a state law that would adversely impact the municipal fisc. Under plaintiffs' theory, whether a taxpayer has standing would turn not on the governmental unit whose act is challenged, but simply on the governmental unit whose funds were affected by the challenged action.

[9] We believe that such a rule is not supported by the cases establishing taxpayer standing, and thus decline to extend the availability of municipal taxpayer standing to actions where a municipal taxpayer challenges an expenditure of municipal funds mandated by state law. As is evident from City of New York, 972 F.2d at 470, one of the central premises of municipal taxpayer standing is that the taxpayer's suit be brought against a municipality. Here, the taxpayers do not rely on a "peculiar relation" with the municipality, see Frothingham, 262 U.S. at 486–87, 43 S.Ct. at 601. Indeed, this suit was not brought against a municipality, but against a state. Accordingly, the plaintiff taxpayers do not have standing as taxpayers to bring this suit, and the district court properly granted the motion to dismiss as to the claims brought under the common-law theory of taxpayer standing.

b. Statutory Standing

[10] The municipal taxpayer plaintiffs also contend that they have standing as taxpayers to challenge Chapter 666 under § 123–b of Article 7–A of the New York State Finance Law. That statute confers standing on citizen taxpayers to bring an action > against an officer or employee of the state who in the course of his or her duties has caused, is now causing, or is about to cause a wrongful expenditure, misappropriation, misapplication, or any other illegal or unconstitutional disbursement of state funds or state property.

Whether or not this provision would give the taxpayer plaintiffs standing, § 123–c of Article 7–A also provides that:

> An action pursuant to this article shall be brought in the supreme court in any county wherein the disbursement has occurred, is likely to occur, or is occurring, or in the county in which the state officer or employee has his or her principal office. (emphasis supplied).

Thus, actions under this statute are, by the statute's own terms, restricted to state fora, and may not be brought in federal court.

III. Standing of School District and Board Officials

[11] The plaintiffs also challenge the district court's determination that the officials of the school districts and the school boards, acting in their official capacities, did not have standing to challenge Chapter 666. We agree with the district court.

The basis for the contention of plaintiff officials that they have standing is Board of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 88 S.Ct. 1923, 20 L.Ed.2d 1060 (1968). That case involved a suit brought by the majority of a New York City school board to challenge a New York statute that required public school authorities to lend textbooks to all students, including students attending parochial schools. Id. at 239–40, 88 S.Ct. at 1924–25. The plaintiff board members claimed that the statute violated the Establishment Clause of the federal Constitution. In a footnote, the Court noted that the defendants had abandoned any challenge 112 to the plaintiffs' standing, but went on to state:

> [The school board members] have taken an oath to support the United States Constitution. Believing [the statute at issue] to be unconstitutional, they are in the position of having to choose between violating their oath and taking a step—refusal to comply with [the law]—that would be likely to bring their expulsion from office and also a reduction in state funds for their school districts. There can be no doubt that [the board members] thus have a "personal stake in the outcome" of this litigation. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204, 82 S.Ct. 691, 703, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962).

Id. at 241 n. 5, 88 S.Ct. at 1925 n. 5 (parallel citations omitted); see also Bender v. Williamsport Area School Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 544 n. 7, 106 S.Ct. 1326, 1333 n. 7, 89 L.Ed.2d 501 (1986) (applying Allen but finding no standing). In reliance upon Allen 's "dilemma" theory of standing, this court has held that the City Social Services Commissioner had standing to pursue constitutional claims against the state of New York where he believed that implementing a state-mandated work project would compel him to violate his oath of office by abrogating the Equal Protection rights of public assistance recipients. See Aguayo v. Richardson, 473 F.2d 1090, 1100 (2d Cir.1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1146, 94 S.Ct. 900, 39 L.Ed.2d 101 (1974); see also City of New York v. Richardson, 473 F.2d 923, 933 (2d Cir.) (mayor and commissioner of social services of City of New York have standing to challenge state and federal laws), cert. denied, 412 U.S. 950, 93 S.Ct. 3012, 37 L.Ed.2d 1002 (1973); Akron Bd. of Educ. v. State Bd. of Educ., 490 F.2d 1285, 1291 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 932, 94 S.Ct. 2644, 41 L.Ed.2d 236 (1974).

Here, however, the plaintiff officials have failed to recognize that "[i]t is the responsibility of the complainant clearly to allege facts demonstrating that he is a proper party to invoke judicial resolution of the dispute," Warth, 422 U.S. at 518, 95 S.Ct. at 2215. Plaintiffs do not allege that compliance with state law will require them to violate their oaths to act constitutionally; the burden of the complaint is that others (those who adopted and signed the legislation) violated their oaths by impairing the contract rights of the boards of education. Plaintiffs' claims also fail because nowhere in the complaint do they allege that their positions as officials or funding for their schools is in jeopardy if they refuse to implement Chapter 666, and no such allegation appears anywhere in the record that was before the district court. In contrast, the plaintiffs in Allen had alleged in their complaint that a loss of their jobs and state funding was likely if they refused to comply with the state law. See 392 U.S. at 240, 88 S.Ct. at 1925. Moreover, even in this court, the plaintiffs do not contend that any actual threat has been made to remove them from their positions, or that any realistic threat of harm to them exists if they fail to implement Chapter 666. Accordingly, even if we were to assume that plaintiffs fear that they might violate their constitutional oaths, they have failed to demonstrate that they are presented with the dilemma that gave rise to standing in Allen and Aguayo.

It is true that, in their brief in this court, plaintiffs describe a number of vague untoward harms that might befall them, such as interference with the performance of "their fiduciary and statutory duty," interference with their "fully staffing their schools," a "direct impact upon [their] ability ... to govern," and the fact that they will be "held ultimately accountable when the community under their supervision is damaged." These alleged harms do not provide plaintiffs with Allen standing for two reasons. For one, unlike in Allen, these harms allegedly will result from compliance with Chapter 666, rather than from a refusal to comply. Second, we conclude that these harms simply are too speculative and too insubstantial to support standing. Cf. Clarke v. United States, 705 F.Supp. 605, 608 (D.D.C.1988) (where refusal to obey law would lead to "almost certain loss of ... salar[y] and staff[ ]," injury sufficient to provide standing under Allen), aff'd, 886 F.2d 404 (D.C.Cir.1989), vacated as moot, 915 F.2d 699 (D.C.Cir.1990).

Doubtless, many officials believe that mandated expenditures are wasteful or counterproductive; but it is difficult to see how 113 compliance with a state law mandate, however foolish the law is, would violate plaintiffs' "fiduciary and statutory duty," or why the public responsibility of public officials in these circumstances cannot be discharged in the political arena. In Board of Supervisors of Warren County v. Virginia Dep't of Social Servs., 731 F.Supp. 735 (W.D.Va.1990), plaintiff officials challenged a federal formula under which the State was required to distribute federal money in a way allegedly unconstitutional under both the Equal Protection Clause and the Due Process clauses. In rejecting standing under Allen, the district court for the Western District of Virginia noted:

> The state action does not place the plaintiffs in any conflict, certainly not any conflict with a duty to uphold the constitution; it merely gives them less money than they would like with which to provide services. While the court recognizes the problems that dwindling funds have created for local governments, they are not problems which give the present plaintiffs a sufficiently personal stake in the outcome of this action.

Id. at 743. The plaintiffs in this case are faced with a problem that confronts all officials having limited and restricted resources available to serve their constituencies.

We thus conclude that the plaintiff officials, having failed to allege a realistic threat that they will lose their positions or substantial funding for their local operations if they refuse to comply with Chapter 666, are not presented with a dilemma that gives them standing to challenge the law. Therefore, the district court properly dismissed the claims brought by the plaintiff officials.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

All Citations

60 F.3d 106, 101 Ed. Law Rep. 668

Footnotes

* The Honorable James L. Oakes of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, who originally was a member of the panel, recused himself just prior to oral argument. The case is being decided by the remaining two judges of the panel, pursuant to Local Rule § 0.14(b). See Murray v. National Broadcasting Co., 35 F.3d 45 (2d Cir.1994), cert. denied, 513 U.S. 1082, 115 S.Ct. 734, 130 L.Ed.2d 637 (1995).

1 Although Golding began his employment as a teacher about eight years before Conboy, Golding apparently suspended his police retirement benefits and joined NYSTRS in September of 1983. Therefore, his school district employer was billed for payments not made during the period 1971–1983.

2 The teachers Conboy and Golding defaulted and did not appear in this litigation.

End of Document

116 S.Ct. 1941
Supreme Court of the United States

George W. BUSH, Governor of Texas, et al., Appellants,
v.
Al VERA et al.
William LAWSON, et al., Appellants,
v.
Al VERA et al.
UNITED STATES, Appellant,
v.
Al VERA et al.

Nos. 94–805, 94–806 and 94–988.
|
Argued Dec. 5, 1995.
|
Decided June 13, 1996.

Synopsis

Registered voters brought action for injunctive and declaratory relief from Texas' redistricting plan adopted after the 1990 census revealed a population increase entitling Texas to three additional congressional seats. The three-judge United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, 861 F.Supp. 1304, held that the three new districts were unconstitutional. Appeal was taken. The Supreme Court, Justice O'Connor, held that: (1) the new district lines were drawn with race as the predominant factor and, thus, the districts were subject to strict scrutiny; (2) the challenged districts could not be upheld under the Voting Rights Act's "results" test; and (3) one district could not be upheld under the "nonretrogression" principle underlying the Act's preclearance requirement where Texas substantially augmented, and did not just maintain, the African-American population percentage in the district.

Affirmed.

Justice O'Connor, filed a separate concurring opinion.

Justice Kennedy, filed a concurring opinion.

Justice Thomas, with whom Justice Scalia joined, filed an opinion concurring in the judgment.

Justice Stevens, with whom Justice Ginsburg and Justice Breyer joined, filed a dissenting opinion.

Justice Souter, with whom Justice Ginsburg and Justice Breyer joined, filed a dissenting opinion.

West Headnotes (38)

[1] Constitutional Law Elections

Voter who did not live in newly-created majority-minority congressional districts, and who did not allege any specific facts showing that he personally had been subjected to any racial classification, lacked standing to challenge districts as racial gerrymanders in violation of Fourteenth Amendment, but voters who lived in districts had standing. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Strict scrutiny applies where congressional redistricting legislation is so extremely irregular on its face that it rationally can be viewed only as effort to segregate races for purposes of voting, without regard for traditional districting principles, or where race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its district lines and legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles to racial considerations. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

68 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Strict scrutiny does not apply to congressional redistricting legislation merely because redistricting is performed with consciousness of race. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

16 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Evidence supported district court's findings that Texas' challenged congressional districts had no integrity in terms of traditional, neutral redistricting criteria, for purposes of determining whether race was predominant factor in drawing districts, subjecting them to strict scrutiny; district court found that generally Texas had not intentionally disregarded traditional districting criteria in the past, that compactness as measured by "eyeball" approach was much less important in challenged redistricting plan than in its predecessor, and that districts were especially irregular in shape in urban areas in which challenged districts were located. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

29 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Evidence supported district court's findings that tools used by Texas when it drew challenged congressional districts permitted state to pay unprecedented attention to race, for purposes of determining whether race was predominant factor in drawing districts, subjecting them to strict scrutiny; primary tool used in drawing district lines was computer program that permitted redistricters to manipulate district lines on computer maps, on which racial and other socioeconomic data were superimposed at block-by-block level, whereas other data, such as party registration and past voting statistics, were available only at level of voter tabulation districts, and that, before 1990 census, data were not broken down beyond census tract level. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

21 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

District court's findings that Texas substantially neglected traditional districting criteria such as compactness when it drew challenged congressional districts, that it was committed from the outset to creating majority-minority districts, and that it manipulated district lines to exploit unprecedentedly detailed racial data, together, weighed in favor of application of strict scrutiny to districting plan, but no one factor was independently sufficient to require strict scrutiny. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

23 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Constitution does not mandate regularity of congressional district shape, and neglect of traditional districting criteria is merely necessary, not sufficient, to require application of strict scrutiny; for strict scrutiny to apply, traditional districting criteria must be subordinated to race. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

20 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Constitutional Law Electoral Districts

State's decision to create majority-minority congressional district is not objectionable in and of itself; rather, direct evidence of that decision is merely one of several essential ingredients to require application of strict scrutiny. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[9] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Direct evidence of racial considerations in drawing congressional districts, coupled with fact that computer program used was significantly more sophisticated with respect to race than with respect to other demographic data, provided substantial evidence that it was race that led to neglect of traditional districting criteria in drawing challenged congressional districts and, therefore, Texas' districting decisions were subject to strict scrutiny. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Strict scrutiny would not be appropriately applied to congressional districting decisions if race-neutral, traditional districting considerations predominated over racial ones. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Constitutional Law Gerrymandering in general

Political gerrymandering in congressional districting is not subjected to strict scrutiny. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

[12] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Race predominated over traditional districting principles, including factors such as congressional district's consistently urban character, its common media sources throughout, and several major transportation lines, in drawing congressional district and, thus, district was subject to strict scrutiny when it was challenged as racial gerrymander; district court found that Texas' supporting data were not available to Legislature in any organized fashion before district was created, that factors did not differentiate district from surrounding areas with the same degree of correlation to district lines that racial data exhibited, and that State made no apparent attempt to compile equivalent data regarding communities of interest other than race. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

32 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] United States Method of apportionment in general

If State's goal in congressional districting is otherwise constitutional political gerrymandering, it is free to use kind of political data such as precinct general election voting patterns, precinct primary voting patterns, and legislators' experience to achieve that goal regardless of its awareness of data's racial implications and regardless of the fact that it does so in context of majority-minority district. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[14] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

If State uses race as proxy for political data such as precinct general election voting patterns, precinct primary voting patterns, and legislators' experience in drawing congressional districts, racial stereotype requiring strict scrutiny is in operation. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[15] Constitutional Law Elections, Voting, and Political Rights

Constitutional Law Juries

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Racial stereotyping that has been scrutinized closely in the context of jury service cannot pass without justification in context of voting for congressional representatives; if promise of Reconstruction Amendments, that our Nation is to be free of state-sponsored discrimination, is to be upheld, Supreme Court cannot pick and choose between basic forms of political participation in its efforts to eliminate unjustified racial stereotyping by government actors. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 13–15; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Evidence supported district court's findings that racially motivated gerrymandering had a qualitatively greater influence on drawing of congressional district lines in Texas than politically motivated gerrymandering, and that political gerrymandering was accomplished in large part by use of race as proxy for political data such as precinct general election voting patterns, precinct primary voting patterns, and legislators' experience. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Although oddly-shaped Texas congressional district did not evince consistent, single-minded effort to "segregate" voters on basis of race, and did not represent "apartheid," fact that racial data were used in complex ways, and for multiple objectives, did not mean that race did not predominate over other considerations and, thus, district was subject to strict scrutiny; record disclosed intensive and pervasive use of race both as proxy to protect the political fortunes of adjacent incumbents, and for its own sake in maximizing minority population of district, regardless of traditional districting principles. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

16 Cases that cite this headnote

[18] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Interlocking Texas congressional districts with majority African-American and majority Hispanic populations were formed in disregard of traditional redistricting criteria and had shapes that were ultimately unexplainable on grounds other than race, were product of presumptively unconstitutional racial gerrymandering and, thus, were subject to strict scrutiny. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[19] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Under "results" test for determining violation of Voting Rights Act's prohibition against imposition of any electoral practice or procedure that "results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen to vote on account of race or color," violation exists if, based on totality of circumstances, it is shown that political processes leading to nomination or election in state or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a protected class, in that its members have less opportunity than other members of electorate to participate in political process and to elect representatives of their choice. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[20] Election Law Majority-minority districts

"Narrow tailoring" requirement of strict scrutiny allows states limited degree of leeway in furthering compelling state interests; if state has "strong basis in evidence" for concluding that creation of majority-minority district is reasonably necessary to comply with Voting Rights Act's results test, and if districting that is based on race possible violation of Act, racially conscious districting satisfies strict scrutiny. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

23 Cases that cite this headnote

[21] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Under narrow tailoring requirement of strict scrutiny applied to congressional districts that were alleged racial gerrymandering, district need not have the least possible amount of irregularity in shape, making allowances for traditional districting criteria; states have limited degree of leeway in furthering compelling state interests under "results" test for determining violation of Voting Rights Act's prohibition against imposition of any electoral practice or procedure that "results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen to vote on account of race or color." (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

17 Cases that cite this headnote

[22] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Under "results" test for determining violation of Voting Rights Act's prohibition against imposition of any electoral practice or procedure that "results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen to vote on account of race or color," congressional district that is reasonably compact and regular, taking into account traditional districting principles such as maintaining communities of interest and traditional boundaries, may pass strict scrutiny without having to defeat rival compact districts designed by objectors' experts in endless "beauty contests." (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

33 Cases that cite this headnote

[23] United States Apportionment of Representatives; Reapportionment and Redistricting

In federal system, importance attaches to each state's sovereign interest in implementing its congressional redistricting plan. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.)

[24] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

States retain flexibility that federal courts lack when dealing with congressional districts that are challenged under Voting Rights Act, both insofar as states may avoid strict scrutiny altogether by respecting their own traditional districting principles, and insofar as deference is due to their reasonable fears of, and to their reasonable efforts to avoid, liability for vote dilution; state has discretion to apply traditional districting principles in majority-minority, as in other, districts and constitutional problem arises only from subordination of those principles to race. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[25] Constitutional Law Voting and political rights

Strict scrutiny remains, nonetheless, strict, although states retain flexibility that federal courts lack when dealing with congressional districts that are challenged under Voting Rights Act's prohibition against vote dilution. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

[26] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

State must have "strong basis in evidence" for finding that threshold conditions for Voting Rights Act liability are present when it draws majority-minority districts; state must have strong evidence that minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to be majority in single member district, that it is politically cohesive, and that white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it usually to defeat minority's preferred candidate, and State must not subordinate traditional districting principles to race substantially more than is "reasonably necessary" to avoid liability. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

22 Cases that cite this headnote

[27] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Majority-minority congressional districts in Texas could not be upheld under "results" test for determining violation of Voting Rights Act, even if Texas had strong basis in evidence for finding that minority population in each district was politically cohesive and that white majority voted sufficiently as a bloc to enable it usually to defeat minority's preferred candidate; challenged districts were bizarrely shaped and far from compact, and those characteristics were predominantly attributable to gerrymandering that was racially motivated and/or achieved by use of race as a proxy for traditional political considerations. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[28] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

If, because of dispersion of the minority population, reasonably compact majority-minority district cannot be created, Voting Rights Act's prohibition against vote dilution does not require majority-minority district; if reasonably compact district can be created, nothing requires race-based creation of district that is far from compact in order to satisfy "results" test. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

23 Cases that cite this headnote

[29] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Bizarre shaping and noncompactness of majority-minority congressional districts in Texas raised narrow tailoring concerns of strict scrutiny, despite claim that shape was relevant only as evidence of improper motive; significant deviations from traditional districting principles, such as bizarre shape and noncompactness, caused constitutional harm insofar as they could convey message that political identity was, or should have been, predominantly racial. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[30] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

State's interest in remedying past discrimination is compelling and may justify race-based congressional districting if discrimination that state seeks to remedy is specific, "identified discrimination" and if state has strong basis in evidence to conclude that remedial action is necessary, before it embarks on affirmative action program. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[31] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Existing racial bloc voting by white voters in majority-minority districts was not sufficient to justify race-based districts that were not narrowly tailored to comply with strict scrutiny; alleged vote dilution was the same concern that formed basis of compliance with Voting Rights Act's "results" test as unsuccessful defense to claim of racial gerrymandering. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[32] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Voting Rights Act's preclearance requirement has limited substantive goal to insure that no voting procedure changes would be made that would lead to retrogression in position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of electoral franchise. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.)

Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[33] United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Noncompact majority-minority congressional district could not be upheld under "nonretrogression" principle underlying Voting Rights Act's preclearance requirement where State substantially augmented, and did not just maintain, African-American population percentage in district; at previous redistricting, district's population was 40.8% African-American and district increased to 50.9% African-American population. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[34] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Nonretrogression principle underlying Voting Rights Act's preclearance requirement is not a license for state to do whatever it deems necessary to insure continued electoral success of minority voters; it merely mandates that minority's opportunity to elect representatives of its choice not be diminished, directly or indirectly, by state's actions. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[35] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Congressional reapportionment plan would not be narrowly tailored to goal of avoiding retrogression, which is principle underlying Voting Rights Act's preclearance requirement, and, thus, would not satisfy strict scrutiny when plan is challenged as racial gerrymandering, if state went beyond what was reasonably necessary to avoid retrogression. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[36] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Fact that congressional districts are created with view to satisfying Voting Rights Act's prohibition against vote dilution do not involve "racial subjugation," and may in a sense be "benignly" motivated, does not exempt those districts from strict scrutiny if they are challenged as racial gerrymandering. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

[37] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Racial classifications in drawing congressional districts are subjected to strict scrutiny precisely because that scrutiny is necessary to determine whether they are benign or whether they misuse race and foster harmful and divisive stereotypes without a compelling justification. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[38] Constitutional Law Elections

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Recognition of cause of action to challenge racial gerrymandering in drawing congressional districts does not threaten excessive judicial entanglement into state's districting process, despite complexity of districting process that prevents adoption of bright-line rules; courts will remain in their customary and appropriate backstop role. (Per Justice O'Connor, with the Chief Justice and one Justice concurring and two Justices concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a, b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a, b).

1 Case that cites this headnote

*1948 Syllabus *

Because the 1990 census revealed a population increase entitling Texas to three additional congressional seats, and in an attempt to comply with the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), the Texas Legislature promulgated a redistricting plan that, among other things, created District 30 as a new majority-African-American district in Dallas County and District 29 as a new majority-Hispanic district in Harris County, and reconfigured District 18, which is adjacent to District 29, as a majority-African-American district. After the Department of Justice precleared the plan under VRA § 5, the plaintiffs, six Texas voters, filed this challenge alleging that 24 of the State's 30 congressional districts constitute racial gerrymanders in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The three-judge District Court held Districts 18, 29, and 30 unconstitutional. The Governor of Texas, private intervenors, and the United States (as intervenor) appeal.

Held: The judgment is affirmed.

861 F.Supp. 1304 (S.D.Tex.1994), affirmed.

Justice O'CONNOR, joined by THE CHIEF JUSTICE and Justice KENNEDY, concluded:

1. Plaintiff Chen, who resides in District 25 and has not alleged any specific facts showing that he personally has been subjected to any racial classification, lacks standing under United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 744–745, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 2436, 132 L.Ed.2d 635. But plaintiffs Blum and Powers, who reside in District 18, plaintiffs Thomas and Vera, who reside in District 29, and plaintiff Orcutt, who resides in District 30, have standing to challenge Districts 18, 29, and 30. See, e.g., ibid. P. 1951.

2. Districts 18, 29, and 30 are subject to strict scrutiny under this Court's precedents. Pp. 1951–1960.

(a) Strict scrutiny applies where race was "the predominant factor" motivating the drawing of district lines, see, e.g., Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 2488, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (emphasis added), and traditional, race-neutral districting principles were subordinated to race, see ibid. This is a mixed motive suit, and a careful review is therefore necessary to 953 determine whether the districts at issue are subject to such scrutiny. Findings that Texas substantially neglected traditional districting criteria such as compactness, that it was committed from the outset to creating majority-minority districts, and that it manipulated district lines to exploit unprecedentedly detailed racial data, taken together, weigh in favor of the application of strict scrutiny. However, because factors other than race, particularly incumbency protection, clearly influenced the legislature, each of the challenged districts must be scrutinized to determine whether the District Court's conclusion that race predominated can be sustained. Pp. 1951–1954.

(b) District 30 is subject to strict scrutiny. Appellants do not deny that the district shows substantial disregard for the traditional districting principles of compactness and regularity, or that the redistricters pursued unwaveringly the objective of creating a majority-African-American district. Their argument that the district's bizarre shape is explained by efforts to unite communities of interest, as manifested by the district's consistently urban character and its shared media sources and major transportation lines to Dallas, must be rejected. The record contains no basis for displacing the District Court's conclusion that race predominated over the latter factors, particularly in light of the court's findings that the State's supporting data were largely unavailable to the legislature before the district was created and that the factors do not differentiate the district from surrounding areas with the same degree of correlation to district lines that racial data exhibit. Appellants' more substantial claim that incumbency protection rivaled race in determining the district's shape is also unavailing. The evidence amply supports the District Court's conclusions that 1949 racially motivated gerrymandering had a qualitatively greater influence on the drawing of district lines than politically motivated gerrymandering, which is not subject to strict scrutiny, see Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 132, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 2810, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (White, J., plurality opinion); and that political gerrymandering was accomplished in large part by the use of race as a proxy for political characteristics, which is subject to such scrutiny, cf. Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 1370, 113 L.Ed.2d 411. Pp. 1954–1958.

(c) Interlocking Districts 18 and 29 are also subject to strict scrutiny. Those districts' shapes are bizarre, and their utter disregard of city limits, local election precincts, and voter tabulation district lines has caused a severe disruption of traditional forms of political activity and created administrative headaches for local election officials. Although appellants adduced evidence that incumbency protection played a role in determining the bizarre district lines, the District Court's conclusion that the districts' shapes are unexplainable on grounds other than race and, as such, are the product of presumptively *954 unconstitutional racial gerrymandering is inescapably corroborated by the evidence. Pp. 1958–1960.

3. Districts 18, 29, and 30 are not narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. Pp. 1960–1963.

(a) Creation of the three districts was not justified by a compelling state interest in complying with the "results" test of VRA § 2(b). It may be assumed without deciding that such compliance can be a compelling state interest. See, e.g., Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 915, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 1905, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II). States attempting to comply with § 2 retain discretion to apply traditional districting principles and are entitled to a limited degree of leeway. But a district drawn in order to satisfy § 2 must not subordinate traditional districting principles to race substantially more than is reasonably necessary. The districts at issue fail this test, since all three are bizarrely shaped and far from compact, and those characteristics are predominantly attributable to gerrymandering that was racially motivated and/or achieved by the use of race as a proxy. Appellants Lawson et al. misinterpret Miller, supra, 515 U.S., at 913, 115 S.Ct., at 2486, when they argue that bizarre shaping and noncompactness go only to motive and are irrelevant to the narrow tailoring inquiry. Also unavailing is the United States' contention that insofar as bizarreness and noncompactness are necessary to achieve the State's compelling interest in compliance with § 2 while simultaneously achieving other legitimate redistricting goals, the narrow tailoring requirement is satisfied. The bizarre shaping and noncompactness of the districts in question were predominantly attributable to racial, not political, manipulation, while the Government's argument addresses the case of an otherwise compact majority-minority district that is misshapen by predominantly nonracial, political manipulation. Pp. 1960–1962.

(b) The district lines at issue are not justified by a compelling state interest in ameliorating the effects of racially polarized voting attributable to Texas' long history of discrimination against minorities in electoral processes. Among the conditions that must be satisfied to render an interest in remedying discrimination compelling is the requirement that the discrimination be specific and "identified." Shaw II, at 910, 116 S.Ct., at 1903. Here, the only current problem that appellants cite as in need of remediation is alleged vote dilution as a consequence of racial bloc voting, the same concern that underlies their VRA § 2 compliance defense. Once the correct standard is applied, the fact that these districts are not narrowly tailored to comply with § 2 forecloses this line of defense. Pp. 1962–1963.

(c) Creation of District 18 (only) was not justified by a compelling state interest in complying with VRA § 5, which seeks to prevent voting-procedure changes leading to a retrogression in the position of *955 racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise. See, e.g., Miller, 515 U.S., at 926, 115 S.Ct., at 2493. The problem with appellants' contention that this "nonretrogression" principle applies because Harris County previously contained a congressional district in which African– 1950 American voters always succeeded in selecting African–American representatives is that it seeks to justify not maintenance, but substantial augmentation, of the African–American population percentage, which has grown from 40.8% in the previous district to 50.9% in District 18. Nonretrogression is not a license for the State to do whatever it deems necessary to ensure continued electoral success; it merely mandates that the minority's opportunity to elect representatives of its choice not be diminished, directly or indirectly, by the State's actions. District 18 is not narrowly tailored to the avoidance of § 5 liability. See Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 655, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2831, 125 L.Ed.2d 511. P. 1963.

4. Various of the dissents' arguments, none of which address the specifics of this suit, and which have been rebutted in other decisions, must be rejected. Pp. 1963–1964.

Justice THOMAS, joined by Justice SCALIA, concluded that application of strict scrutiny in this suit was never a close question, since this Court's decisions have effectively resolved that the intentional creation of majority-minority districts, by itself, is sufficient to invoke such scrutiny. See, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 2113, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (strict scrutiny applies to all government classifications based on race); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 918–919, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 2489, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (Georgia's concession that it intentionally created majority-minority districts was sufficient to show that race was a predominant, motivating factor in its redistricting). DeWitt v. Wilson, 515 U.S. 1170, 115 S.Ct. 2637, 132 L.Ed.2d 876, distinguished. Application of strict scrutiny is required here because Texas has readily admitted that it intentionally created majority-minority districts and that those districts would not have existed but for its affirmative use of racial demographics. Assuming that the State has asserted a compelling state interest, its redistricting attempts were not narrowly tailored to achieve that interest. Pp. 1972–1974.

O'CONNOR, J., announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., and KENNEDY, J., joined. O'CONNOR, J., also filed a separate concurring opinion, post, p. 1968. KENNEDY, J., filed a concurring opinion, post, p. 1971. THOMAS, J., filed an opinion concurring in the judgment, in which SCALIA, J., joined, post, p. 1972. STEVENS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which GINSBURG and BREYER, JJ., joined, post, p. 1974. SOUTER, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which GINSBURG and BREYER, JJ., joined, post, p. 1997.

Attorneys and Law Firms

956 Javier Aguilar, Austin, TX, for State Appellants.

Paul Bender, Washington, DC, for Federal Appellant.

Penda D. Hair, Washington, DC, for Private Appellants.

Daniel E. Troy, Washington, DC, for Appellees.

Opinion

Justice O'CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE and Justice KENNEDY join.

This is the latest in a series of appeals involving racial gerrymandering challenges to state redistricting efforts in the wake of the 1990 census. See Shaw v. Hunt, 515 U.S. 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (Shaw II); United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995); Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (Shaw I). That census revealed a population increase,largely 957 in urban minority populations, that entitled Texas to three additional congressional seats. In response, and with a view to complying with the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 1973 et seq., the Texas Legislature promulgated a *1951 redistricting plan that, among other things, created District 30, a new majority-African-American district in Dallas County; created District 29, a new majority-Hispanic district in and around Houston in Harris County; and reconfigured District 18, which is adjacent to District 29, to make it a majority-African-American district. The Department of Justice precleared that plan under VRA § 5 in 1991, and it was used in the 1992 congressional elections.

The plaintiffs, six Texas voters, challenged the plan, alleging that 24 of Texas' 30 congressional districts constitute racial gerrymanders in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The three-judge United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas held Districts 18, 29, and 30 unconstitutional. Vera v. Richards, 861 F.Supp. 1304 (1994). The Governor of Texas, private intervenors, and the United States (as intervenor) now appeal. We noted probable jurisdiction, 515 U.S. 1172, 115 S.Ct. 2639, 132 L.Ed.2d 877 (1995). Finding that, under this Court's decisions in Shaw I and Miller, the district lines at issue are subject to strict scrutiny, and that they are not narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest, we affirm.

I

[1] As a preliminary matter, the State and private appellants contest the plaintiffs' standing to challenge these districts. Plaintiff Chen resides in Texas congressional District 25, and has not alleged any specific facts showing that he personally has been subjected to any racial classification. Under our decision in Hays, he lacks standing. See Hays, supra, at 744–745, 115 S.Ct., at 2435–2436. But plaintiffs Blum and Powers are residents of District 18, plaintiffs Thomas and Vera are residents of District 29, and plaintiff Orcutt is a resident of District 30. We 958 stated in Hays that "[w]here a plaintiff resides in a racially gerrymandered district, ... the plaintiff has been denied equal treatment because of the legislature's reliance on racial criteria, and therefore has standing to challenge the legislature's action." Hays, supra, at 744–745, 115 S.Ct., at 2436; accord, Miller, supra, at 910–911, 115 S.Ct., at 2485. Under this rule, these plaintiffs have standing to challenge Districts 18, 29, and 30.

II

[2] We must now determine whether those districts are subject to strict scrutiny. Our precedents have used a variety of formulations to describe the threshold for the application of strict scrutiny. Strict scrutiny applies where "redistricting legislation ... is so extremely irregular on its face that it rationally can be viewed only as an effort to segregate the races for purposes of voting, without regard for traditional districting principles," Shaw I, supra, 509 U.S., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2824, or where "race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was the legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its district lines," Miller, 515 U.S., at 913, 115 S.Ct., at 2486, and "the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations," id., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488. See also id., at 928, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring) (strict scrutiny only applies where "the State has relied on race in substantial disregard of customary and traditional districting practices").

[3] Strict scrutiny does not apply merely because redistricting is performed with consciousness of race. See Shaw I, supra, at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826. Nor does it apply to all cases of intentional creation of majority-minority districts. See DeWitt v. Wilson, 856 F.Supp. 1409 (E.D.Cal.1994) (strict scrutiny did not apply to an intentionally created compact majority-minority district), summarily aff'd, 515 U.S. 1170, 115 S.Ct. 2637, 132 L.Ed.2d 876 (1995); cf. Shaw I, supra, 509 U.S., at 649, 113 S.Ct., at 2828 (reserving this question). Electoral district lines are "facially race neutral," so a more searching inquiry is necessary before strict scrutiny can be found applicable in redistricting cases than in cases of "classifications based explicitly on race." See 959 Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 213, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 2105, 132 L.Ed.2d 158; cf. post, at 1972–1973, 1973–1974, (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment) (assimilating our redistricting cases to Adarand). For strict scrutiny to apply, the plaintiffs must prove that other, legitimate districting principles were "subordinated" to race. *1952 Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488. By that, we mean that race must be "the predominant factor motivating the legislature's [redistricting] decision." Ibid. (emphasis added). We thus differ from Justice THOMAS, who would apparently hold that it suffices that racial considerations be a motivation for the drawing of a majority-minority district. See post, at 1973–1974.

The present suit is a mixed motive suit. The appellants concede that one of Texas' goals in creating the three districts at issue was to produce majority-minority districts, but they also cite evidence that other goals, particularly incumbency protection (including protection of "functional incumbents," i.e., sitting members of the Texas Legislature who had declared an intention to run for open congressional seats), also played a role in the drawing of the district lines. The record does not reflect a history of " 'purely race-based' " districting revisions. Cf. Miller, supra, at 918, 115 S.Ct., at 2489 (emphasis added). A careful review is, therefore, necessary to determine whether these districts are subject to strict scrutiny. But review of the District Court's findings of primary fact and the record convinces us that the District Court's determination that race was the "predominant factor" in the drawing of each of the districts must be sustained.

[4] We begin with general findings and evidence regarding the redistricting plan's respect for traditional districting principles, the legislators' expressed motivations, and the methods used in the redistricting process. The District Court began its analysis by rejecting the factual basis for appellants' claim that Texas' challenged "districts cannot be unconstitutionally bizarre in shape because Texas does not have and never has used traditional redistricting principles such as natural geographical boundaries, contiguity, compactness, 960 and conformity to political subdivisions." 861 F.Supp., at 1333. The court instead found that "generally, Texas has not intentionally disregarded traditional districting criteria," and that only one pre–1991 congressional district in Texas was comparable in its irregularity and noncompactness to the three challenged districts. Id., at 1334. The court also noted that "compactness as measured by an 'eyeball' approach was much less important," id., at 1313, n. 9, in the 1991 plan, App. 144, than in its predecessor, the 1980 Texas congressional districting plan, id., at 138, and that districts were especially irregular in shape in the Dallas and Harris County areas where the challenged districts are located, see 861 F.Supp., at 1313, n. 9.

These findings comport with the conclusions of an instructive study that attempted to determine the relative compactness of districts nationwide in objective, numerical terms. That study gave Texas' 1980 districting plan a roughly average score for the compactness and regularity of its district shapes, but ranked its 1991 plan among the worst in the Nation. See Pildes & Niemi, Expressive Harms, "Bizarre Districts," and Voting Rights: Evaluating Election–District Appearances After Shaw v. Reno, 92 Mich. L.Rev. 483, 571–573, table 6 (1993). The same study ranked Districts 18, 29, and 30 among the 28 least regular congressional districts nationwide. See id., at 565, table 3. Our own review gives us no reason to disagree with the District Court that the districts at issue "have no integrity in terms of traditional, neutral redistricting criteria," 861 F.Supp., at 1339.

The District Court also found substantial direct evidence of the legislature's racial motivations. The State's submission to the Department of Justice for preclearance under VRA § 5 reports a consensus within the legislature that the three new congressional districts

> " 'should be configured in such a way as to allow members of racial, ethnic, and language minorities to elect Congressional representatives. Accordingly, the three 961 new districts include a predominantly black district drawn in the Dallas County area [District 30] and predominantly Hispanic districts in the Harris County area [District 29] and in the South Texas region. In addition to creating the three new minority districts, the proposed Congressional redistricting plan increases the black voting strength of the current District 18 (Harris County) by increasing the *1953 population to assure that the black community may continue to elect a candidate of its choice.' " Id., at 1315 (quoting Narrative of Voting Rights Act Considerations in Affected Districts, reprinted in App. 104–105).

The appellants also conceded in this litigation that the three districts at issue "were created for the purpose of enhancing the opportunity of minority voters to elect minority representatives to Congress." 861 F.Supp., at 1337. And testimony of individual state officials confirmed that the decision to create the districts now challenged as majority-minority districts was made at the outset of the process and never seriously questioned.

[5] The means that Texas used to make its redistricting decisions provides further evidence of the importance of race. The primary tool used in drawing district lines was a computer program called "REDAPPL." REDAPPL permitted redistricters to manipulate district lines on computer maps, on which racial and other socioeconomic data were superimposed. At each change in configuration of the district lines being drafted, REDAPPL displayed updated racial composition statistics for the district as drawn. REDAPPL contained racial data at the block-by-block level, whereas other data, such as party registration and past voting statistics, were only available at the level of voter tabulation districts (which approximate election precincts). The availability and use of block-by-block racial data was unprecedented; before the 1990 census, data were not broken down beyond the census tract level. See App. 123. By providing uniquely 962 detailed racial data, REDAPPL enabled districters to make more intricate refinements on the basis of race than on the basis of other demographic information. The District Court found that the districters availed themselves fully of that opportunity:

> "In numerous instances, the correlation between race and district boundaries is nearly perfect.... The borders of Districts 18, 29, and 30 change from block to block, from one side of the street to the other, and traverse streets, bodies of water, and commercially developed areas in seemingly arbitrary fashion until one realizes that those corridors connect minority populations." 861 F.Supp., at 1336.

[6] [7] [8] [9] These findings—that the State substantially neglected traditional districting criteria such as compactness, that it was committed from the outset to creating majority-minority districts, and that it manipulated district lines to exploit unprecedentedly detailed racial data—together weigh in favor of the application of strict scrutiny. We do not hold that any one of these factors is independently sufficient to require strict scrutiny. The Constitution does not mandate regularity of district shape, see Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2826–2827, and the neglect of traditional districting criteria is merely necessary, not sufficient. For strict scrutiny to apply, traditional districting criteria must be subordinated to race. Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488. Nor, as we have emphasized, is the decision to create a majority-minority district objectionable in and of itself. The direct evidence of that decision is not, as Justice

STEVENS suggests, post, at 1984, "the real key" to our decision; it is merely one of several essential ingredients. Nor do we "condemn state legislation merely because it was based on accurate information." Post, at 1988, n. 28. The use of sophisticated technology and detailed information in the drawing of majority-minority districts is no more objectionable than it is in the drawing of majority-majority districts. 963 But, as the District Court explained, the direct evidence of racial considerations, coupled with the fact that the computer program used was significantly more sophisticated with respect to race than with respect to other demographic data, provides substantial evidence that it was race that led to the neglect of traditional districting criteria here. We must therefore consider what role other factors played in order to determine whether race predominated.

Several factors other than race were at work in the drawing of the districts. Traditional districting criteria were not entirely neglected: Districts 18 and 29 maintain the integrity of county lines; each of the three districts takes its character from a principal city and the surrounding urban area; and none of the districts is as widely dispersed as *1954 the North Carolina district held unconstitutional in Shaw II, 517 U.S. 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207. (These characteristics are, however, unremarkable in the context of large, densely populated urban counties.) More significantly, the District Court found that incumbency protection influenced the redistricting plan to an unprecedented extent:

> "[A]s enacted in Texas in 1991, many incumbent protection boundaries sabotaged traditional redistricting principles as they routinely divided counties, cities, neighborhoods, and regions. For the sake of maintaining or winning seats in the House of Representatives, Congressmen or would-be Congressmen shed hostile groups and potential opponents by fencing them out of their districts. The Legislature obligingly carved out districts of apparent supporters of incumbents, as suggested by the incumbents, and then added appendages to connect their residences to those districts. The final result seems not one in which the people select their representatives, but in which the representatives have selected the people." 861 F.Supp., at 1334 (citations and footnotes omitted).

964 See also id., at 1317–1318 (describing specific evidence of incumbency protection efforts statewide). This finding receives inferential support from the fact that all but one of Texas' 27 incumbents won in the 1992 elections. See id., at 1318. And the appellants point to evidence that in many cases, race correlates strongly with manifestations of community of interest (for example, shared broadcast and print media, public transport infrastructure, and institutions such as schools and churches) and with the political data that are vital to incumbency protection efforts, raising the possibility that correlations between racial demographics and district lines may be explicable in terms of nonracial motivations. For example, a finding by a district court that district lines were drawn in part on the basis of evidence (other than racial data) of where communities of interest existed might weaken a plaintiff's claim that race predominated in the drawing of district lines. Cf. post, at 2000 (SOUTER, J., dissenting) (recognizing the legitimate role of communities of interest in our system of representative democracy).

[10] [11] Strict scrutiny would not be appropriate if race-neutral, traditional districting considerations predominated over racial ones. We have not subjected political gerrymandering to strict scrutiny. See Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 132, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 2810, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986) (White, J., plurality opinion) ("[U]nconstitutional discrimination occurs only when the electoral system is arranged in a manner that will consistently degrade a voter's or a group of voters' influence on the political process as a whole"); id., at 147, 106 S.Ct., at 2818 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment) ("[P]urely political gerrymandering claims" are not justiciable). And we have recognized incumbency protection, at least in the limited form of "avoiding contests between incumbent[s]," as a legitimate state goal. See Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 740, 103 S.Ct. 2653, 2663, 77 L.Ed.2d 133 (1983); White v. Weiser, 412 U.S. 783, 797, 93 S.Ct. 2348, 2355–2356, 37 L.Ed.2d 335 (1973); Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 89, n. 16, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 1294, n. 16, 16 L.Ed.2d 376 (1966); cf. Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 751–754, and 752, n. 18, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 2330–2332, and 2331, n. 18, 37 L.Ed.2d 298 (1973) (State may draw irregular district lines in order 965 to allocate seats proportionately to major political parties). Because it is clear that race was not the only factor that motivated the legislature to draw irregular district lines, we must scrutinize each challenged district to determine whether the District Court's conclusion that race predominated over legitimate districting considerations, including incumbency, can be sustained.

A

[12] The population of District 30 is 50% African–American and 17.1% Hispanic. Fifty percent of the district's population is located in a compact, albeit irregularly shaped, core in south Dallas, which is 69% African–American. But the remainder of the district consists of narrow and bizarrely shaped tentacles—the State identifies seven "segments"—extending primarily to the north and west. See App. 335; see also M. Barone 1955 & G. Ujifusa, Almanac of American Politics 1996, p. 1277 (1995) (describing the district). Over 98% of the district's population is within Dallas County, see App. 118, but it crosses two county lines at its western and northern extremities. Its western excursion into Tarrant County grabs a small community that is 61.9% African–American, id., at 331; its northern excursion into Collin County occupies a hook-like shape mapping exactly onto the only area in the southern half of that county with a combined African–American and Hispanic percentage population in excess of 50%, id., at 153. The District Court's description of the district as a whole bears repeating:

> "The district sprawls throughout Dallas County, deliberately excludes the wealthy white neighborhoods of Highland Park and University Park and extends fingers into Collin County, which include the outermost suburbs of Dallas. In Collin County, the district picks up a small African–American neighborhood. The district extends into Tarrant County only to pick up a small border area with a high African–American concentration. It 966 also reaches out to claim Hamilton Park, an affluent African–American neighborhood surrounded by whites. Part of the district runs along Trinity River bottom, using it to connect dispersed minority population. Numerous [voter tabulation districts] were split in order to achieve the population mix required for the district.
>
> . . . . .
>
> "... It is at least 25 miles wide and 30 miles long." 861 F.Supp., at 1337–1338. See also Appendix A to this opinion (outline of District 30).

Appellants do not deny that District 30 shows substantial disregard for the traditional districting principles of compactness and regularity, or that the redistricters pursued unwaveringly the objective of creating a majority-African-American district. But they argue that its bizarre shape is explained by efforts to unite communities of interest in a single district and, especially, to protect incumbents.

Appellants highlight the facts that the district has a consistently urban character and has common media sources throughout, and that its tentacles include several major transportation lines into the city of Dallas. These factors, which implicate traditional districting principles, do correlate to some extent with the district's layout. But we see no basis in the record for displacing the District Court's conclusion that race predominated over them, particularly in light of the court's findings that the State's supporting data were not "available to the Legislature in any organized fashion before District 30 was created," 861 F.Supp., at 1338, and that they do not "differentiate the district from surrounding areas," ibid., with the same degree of correlation to district lines that racial data exhibit, see App. 150. In reaching that conclusion, we do not, as Justice STEVENS fears, require States engaged in redistricting to compile "a comprehensive administrative record," post, at 1986 (STEVENS, J., dissenting), and we do not dismiss facts not explicitly mentioned in the redistricting plan's legislative history as "irrelevant," 967 post, at 1985. If, as may commonly happen, traditional districting principles are substantially followed without much conscious thought, they cannot be said to have been "subordinated to race." In considering whether race was the "predominant factor motivating the legislatur [e]," it is, however, evidentially significant that at the time of the redistricting, the State had compiled detailed racial data for use in redistricting, but made no apparent attempt to compile, and did not refer specifically to, equivalent data regarding communities of interest.

Appellants present a more substantial case for their claim that incumbency protection rivaled race in determining the district's shape. Representative Johnson was the principal architect of District 30, which was designed in part to create a safe Democratic seat for her. At an early stage in the redistricting process, Johnson submitted to the state legislature a plan for Dallas County with a relatively compact 44% African–American district that did not violate the integrity of any voter tabulation district or county lines. See App. 139; 861 F.Supp., at 1338. The District Court found that "[w]hile minority voters did not object" to it, id., at 1330, "[t]hat plan drew much opposition from incumbents and was quickly abandoned," 1956 id., at 1321, n. 22. "[F]ive other congressmen would have been thrown into districts other than the ones they currently represent." Id., at 1330–1331. Appellants also point to testimony from Johnson and others to the effect that the incumbents of the adjacent Democratic Districts 5 and 24 exerted strong and partly successful efforts to retain predominantly African–American Democratic voters in their districts. (There was evidence that 97% of African–American voters in and around the city of Dallas vote Democrat.) See generally id., at 1321–1322.

In some circumstances, incumbency protection might explain as well as, or better than, race a State's decision to depart from other traditional districting principles, such as compactness, in the drawing of bizarre district lines. And 968 the fact that, "[a]s it happens, ... many of the voters being fought over [by the neighboring Democratic incumbents] were African–American," id., at 1338, would not, in and of itself, convert a political gerrymander into a racial gerrymander, no matter how conscious redistricters were of the correlation between race and party affiliation. See Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826. If district lines merely correlate with race because they are drawn on the basis of political affiliation, which correlates with race, there is no racial classification to justify, just as racial disproportions in the level of prosecutions for a particular crime may be unobjectionable if they merely reflect racial disproportions in the commission of that crime, cf. post, at 1988, n. 30 (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (discussing United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 116 S.Ct. 1480, 134 L.Ed.2d 687 (1996)).

[13] [14] [15] If the State's goal is otherwise constitutional political gerrymandering, it is free to use the kind of political data on which Justice STEVENS focuses —precinct general election voting patterns, post, at 1987, precinct primary voting patterns, post, at 1981, and legislators' experience, post, at 1985—to achieve that goal regardless of its awareness of its racial implications and regardless of the fact that it does so in the context of a majority-minority district. To the extent that the District Court suggested the contrary, it erred. But to the extent that race is used as a proxy for political characteristics, a racial stereotype requiring strict scrutiny is in operation. Cf. Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 1370, 113 L.Ed.2d 411 (1991) ("Race cannot be a proxy for determining juror bias or competence"). We cannot agree with the dissenters, see post, at 1988 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); post, at 2001, n. 5 (SOUTER, J., dissenting); see also Shaw II, at 924–925, n. 4, 116 S.Ct., at 1910, n. 4 (STEVENS, J., dissenting), that racial stereotyping that we have scrutinized closely in the context of jury service can pass without justification in the context of voting. If the promise of the Reconstruction Amendments, that our Nation is to be free of state-sponsored discrimination, is to be upheld, we cannot pick and choose between the basic forms of 969 political participation in our efforts to eliminate unjustified racial stereotyping by government actors.

[16] Here, the District Court had ample bases on which to conclude both that racially motivated gerrymandering had a qualitatively greater influence on the drawing of district lines than politically motivated gerrymandering, and that political gerrymandering was accomplished in large part by the use of race as a proxy. The State's own VRA § 5 submission explains the drawing of District 30, and the rejection of Johnson's more compact plan, in exclusively racial terms:

> "... Throughout the course of the Congressional redistricting process, the lines of the proposed District 30 were constantly reconfigured in an attempt to maximize the voting strength for this black community in Dallas County ... While the legislature was in agreement that a safe black district should be drawn in the Dallas County area, the real dispute involved the composition, configuration and quality of that district. The community insisted that [a] 'safe' black district be drawn that had a total black population of at least 50%....
>
> "... Although some [alternative] proposals showed a more compact configuration, none of them reached the threshold 50% total black population which the community felt was necessary to assure its ability to *1957 elect its own Congressional representative without having to form coalitions with other minority groups....
>
> "... The goal was to not only create a district that would maximize the opportunity for the black community to elect a Congressional candidate of its choice in 1992, but also one that included some of the major black growth areas which will assure continued electoral and economic opportunities over the next decades." App. 106–107.

As the District Court noted, testimony of state officials in earlier litigation (in which District 30 was challenged as a political gerrymander) contradicted part of their testimony 970 here, and affirmed that "race was the primary consideration in the construction of District 30." 861 F.Supp., at 1338; see also id., at 1319–1321. And Johnson explained in a letter to the Department of Justice written at the end of the redistricting process that incumbency protection had been achieved by using race as a proxy:

> " 'Throughout the course of the Congressional redistricting process, the lines were continuously reconfigured to assist in protecting the Democratic incumbents in the Dallas/Fort Worth metroplex area by spreading the Black population to increase the Democratic party index in those areas.' " Id., at 1322 (quoting Plaintiff Exh. 6E6).

This is not to say that the direct evidence of the districters' intent showed race to be the sole factor considered. As Justice STEVENS notes, post, at 1984–1985, nn. 23–24, state officials' claims have changed as their interests have changed. In the prior political gerrymandering suit and to the Department of Justice, they asserted that race predominated. In this suit, their testimony was that political considerations predominated. These inconsistent statements must be viewed in light of their adversarial context. But such questions of credibility are matters for the District Court, and we simply differ from the dissenters in our reading of the record when they find insupportable the District Court's reliance on the State's own statements indicating the importance of race, see post, at 1984–1985, nn. 23–24, 1989, n. 31 (opinion of STEVENS, J.).

Finally, and most significantly, the objective evidence provided by the district plans and demographic maps suggests strongly the predominance of race. Given that the districting software used by the State provided only racial data at the block-by-block level, the fact that District 30, unlike Johnson's original proposal, splits voter tabulation districts and even individual streets in many places, see App. 150; 971 861 F.Supp., at 1339, suggests that racial criteria predominated over other districting criteria in determining the district's boundaries. And, despite the strong correlation between race and political affiliation, the maps reveal that political considerations were subordinated to racial classification in the drawing of many of the most extreme and bizarre district lines. For example, the northernmost hook of the district, where it ventures into Collin County, is tailored perfectly to maximize minority population, see App. 153 (all whole and parts of 1992 voter tabulation districts within District 30's Collin County hook have a combined African–American and Hispanic population in excess of 50%, with an average African–American population of 19.8%, id., at 331, while the combined African–American and Hispanic population in all surrounding voter tabulation districts, and the other parts of split districts, in Collin County is less than 25%), whereas it is far from the shape that would be necessary to maximize the Democratic vote in that area, see id., at 196 (showing a Republican majority, based on 1990 voting patterns in seven of the eight 1990 voter tabulation districts wholly or partly included in District 30 in Collin County).*

*1958 [17] 972 The combination of these factors compels us to agree with the District Court that "the contours of Congressional District 30 are unexplainable in terms other than race." 861 F.Supp., at 1339. It is true that District 30 does not evince a consistent, single-minded effort to "segregate" voters on the basis of race, post, at 1984 (STEVENS, J., dissenting), and does not represent "apartheid," post, at 2002, 2012 (SOUTER, J., dissenting). But the fact that racial data were used in complex ways, and for multiple objectives, does not mean that race did not predominate over other considerations. The record discloses intensive and pervasive use of race both 973 as a proxy to protect the political fortunes of adjacent incumbents, and for its own sake in maximizing the minority population of District 30 regardless of traditional districting principles. District 30's combination of a bizarre, noncompact shape and overwhelming evidence that that shape was essentially dictated by racial considerations of one form or another is exceptional; Texas Congressional District 6, for example, which Justice STEVENS discusses in detail, post, at 1982–1983, has only the former characteristic. That combination of characteristics leads us to conclude that District 30 is subject to strict scrutiny.

B

[18] In Harris County, centered in the city of Houston, Districts 18 and 29 interlock "like a jigsaw puzzle ... in which it might be impossible to get the pieces apart." Barone & Ujifusa, Almanac of American Politics 1996, at 1307–1308; see also Appendixes B and C to this opinion (outlines of Districts 18, 29). As the District Court noted: "[T]hese districts are so finely 'crafted' that one cannot visualize their exact boundaries without looking at a map at least three feet square." 861 F.Supp., at 1323. According to the leading statistical study of relative district compactness and regularity, they are two of the three least regular districts in the country. See Pildes & Niemi, 92 Mich. L.Rev., at 565.

District 18's population is 51% African–American and 15% Hispanic. App. 110. It "has some of the most irregular boundaries of any congressional district in the country[,] ... boundaries that squiggle north toward Intercontinental Airport and northwest out radial highways, then spurt south on one side toward the port and on the other toward the Astrodome." Barone & Ujifusa, supra, at 1307. Its "many narrow corridors, wings, or fingers ... reach out to enclose black voters, *1959 while excluding nearby Hispanic residents." Pildes & Niemi, supra, at 556.

District 29 has a 61% Hispanic and 10% African–American population. App. 110. It resembles

974 " 'a sacred Mayan bird, with its body running eastward along the Ship Channel from downtown Houston until the tail terminates in Baytown. Spindly legs reach > south to Hobby Airport, while the plumed head rises northward almost to Intercontinental. In the western extremity of the district, an open beak appears to be searching for worms in Spring Branch. Here and there, ruffled feathers jut out at odd angles.' " Barone & Ujifusa, supra, at 1335.

Not only are the shapes of the districts bizarre; they also exhibit utter disregard of city limits, local election precincts, and voter tabulation district lines. See, e.g., 861 F.Supp., at 1340 (60% of District 18 and District 29 residents live in split precincts). This caused a severe disruption of traditional forms of political activity. Campaigners seeking to visit their constituents "had to carry a map to identify the district lines, because so often the borders would move from block to block"; voters "did not know the candidates running for office" because they did not know which district they lived in. Ibid. In light of Texas' requirement that voting be arranged by precinct, with each precinct representing a community that shares local, state, and federal representatives, it also created administrative headaches for local election officials:

> "The effect of splitting dozens of [voter tabulation districts] to create Districts 18 and 29 was an electoral nightmare. Harris County estimated that it must increase its number of precincts from 672 to 1,225 to accommodate the new Congressional boundaries. Polling places, ballot forms, and the number of election employees are correspondingly multiplied. Voters were thrust into new and unfamiliar precinct alignments, a few with populations as low as 20 voters." Id., at 1325.

See also App. 119–127 (letter from local official setting forth administrative problems and conflict with local districting 975 traditions); id., at 147 (map showing splitting of city limits); id., at 128, Plaintiffs' Exh. 6E1, Attachment A (map illustrating splitting of voting precincts).

As with District 30, appellants adduced evidence that incumbency protection played a role in determining the bizarre district lines. The District Court found that one constraint on the shape of District 29 was the rival ambitions of its two "functional incumbents," who distorted its boundaries in an effort to include larger areas of their existing state legislative constituencies. 861 F.Supp., at 1340. But the District Court's findings amply demonstrate that such influences were overwhelmed in the determination of the districts' bizarre shapes by the State's efforts to maximize racial divisions. The State's VRA § 5 submission explains that the bizarre configuration of Districts 18 and 29 "result[s] in the maximization of minority voting strength" in Harris County, App. 110, corroborating the District Court's finding that "[i]n the earliest stages of the Congressional redistricting process, state Democratic and Republican leaders rallied behind the idea of creating a new Hispanic safe seat in Harris County while preserving the safe African–American seat in District 18." 861 F.Supp., at 1324. State officials testified that "it was particularly necessary to split [voter tabulation districts] in order to capture pockets of Hispanic residents" for District 29, and that a 61% Hispanic population in that district—not a mere majority—was insisted upon. Id., at 1340–1341. The record evidence of the racial demographics and voting patterns of Harris County residents belies any suggestion that party politics could explain the dividing lines between the two districts: The district lines correlate almost perfectly with race, see App. 151–152, while both districts are similarly solidly Democratic, see id., at 194. And, even more than in District 30, the intricacy of the lines drawn, separating Hispanic voters from African–American voters on a block-by-block basis, betrays the critical impact of the block-by-block racial data available on the REDAPPL program. The District 976 Court's conclusion is, therefore, inescapable: "Because Districts 18 and 29 are formed in utter disregard for traditional *1960 redistricting criteria and because their shapes are ultimately unexplainable on grounds other than the racial quotas established for those districts, they are the product of [presumptively] unconstitutional racial gerrymandering." 861 F.Supp., at 1341.

III

Having concluded that strict scrutiny applies, we must determine whether the racial classifications embodied in any of the three districts are narrowly tailored to further a compelling state interest. Appellants point to three compelling interests: the interest in avoiding liability under the "results" test of VRA § 2(b), the interest in remedying past and present racial discrimination, and the "nonretrogression" principle of VRA § 5 (for District 18 only). We consider them in turn.

A

[19] Section 2(a) of the VRA prohibits the imposition of any electoral practice or procedure that "results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen ... to vote on account of race or color." In 1982, Congress amended the VRA by changing the language of § 2(a) and adding § 2(b), which provides a "results" test for violation of § 2(a). A violation exists if,

> "based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by subsection (a) of this section in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).

977 Appellants contend that creation of each of the three majority-minority districts at issue was justified by Texas' compelling state interest in complying with this results test.

[20] [21] As we have done in each of our previous cases in which this argument has been raised as a defense to charges of racial gerrymandering, we assume without deciding that compliance with the results test, as interpreted by our precedents, see, e.g., Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 37–42, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 1082–1085, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993), can be a compelling state interest. See Shaw II, at 915, 116 S.Ct., at 1905; Miller, 515 U.S., at 920–921, 115 S.Ct., at 2490. We also reaffirm that the "narrow tailoring" requirement of strict scrutiny allows the States a limited degree of leeway in furthering such interests. If the State has a "strong basis in evidence," Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 656, 113 S.Ct., at 2832 (internal quotation marks omitted), for concluding that creation of a majority-minority district is reasonably necessary to comply with § 2, and the districting that is based on race "substantially addresses the § 2 violation," Shaw II, at 918, 116 S.Ct., at 1907, it satisfies strict scrutiny. We thus reject, as impossibly stringent, the District Court's view of the narrow tailoring requirement, that "a district must have the least possible amount of irregularity in shape, making allowances for traditional districting criteria." 861 F.Supp., at 1343. Cf. Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 291, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 1856, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (state actors should not be "trapped between the competing hazards of liability" by the imposition of unattainable requirements under the rubric of strict scrutiny).

[22] [23] [24] A § 2 district that is reasonably compact and regular, taking into account traditional districting principles such as maintaining communities of interest and traditional boundaries, may pass strict scrutiny without having to defeat rival compact districts designed by plaintiffs' experts in endless "beauty contests." The dissenters misread us when they make the leap from our disagreement about the facts of this 978 suit to the conclusion that we are creating a "stalemate" by requiring the States to "get things just right," post, at 2006 (SOUTER, J., dissenting), or to draw "the precise compact district that a court would impose in a successful § 2 challenge," post, at 1990 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); see also Shaw II, at 949, 116 S.Ct., at 1921–1922 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). Rather, we adhere to our longstanding recognition of the importance in our federal system of each State's sovereign interest in implementing its redistricting *1961 plan. See Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 156, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1156, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993) ("[I]t is the domain of the States, and not the federal courts, to conduct apportionment in the first place"); Miller, supra, at 915, 115 S.Ct., at 2488 ("It is well settled that reapportionment is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State") (internal quotation marks omitted). Under our cases, the States retain a flexibility that federal courts enforcing § 2 lack, both insofar as they may avoid strict scrutiny altogether by respecting their own traditional districting principles, and insofar as deference is due to their reasonable fears of, and to their reasonable efforts to avoid, § 2 liability. And nothing that we say today should be read as limiting "a State's discretion to apply traditional districting principles," post, at 1998 (SOUTER, J., dissenting), in majority-minority, as in other, districts. The constitutional problem arises only from the subordination of those principles to race.

[25] [26] Strict scrutiny remains, nonetheless, strict. The State must have a "strong basis in evidence" for finding that the threshold conditions for § 2 liability are present:

> "first, 'that [the minority group] is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single member district'; second, 'that it is politically cohesive'; and third, 'that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate.' " Growe, supra, at 40, 113 S.Ct., at 1084 (emphasis added) (quoting Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 50–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2766–2767, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986)).

979 And, as we have noted above, the district drawn in order to satisfy § 2 must not subordinate traditional districting principles to race substantially more than is "reasonably necessary" to avoid § 2 liability. Districts 18, 29, and 30 fail to meet these requirements.

[27] We assume, without deciding, that the State had a "strong basis in evidence" for finding the second and third threshold conditions for § 2 liability to be present. We have, however, already found that all three districts are bizarrely shaped and far from compact, and that those characteristics are predominantly attributable to gerrymandering that was racially motivated and/or achieved by the use of race as a proxy. See Part II, supra. District 30, for example, reaches out to grab small and apparently isolated minority communities which, based on the evidence presented, could not possibly form part of a compact majority-minority district, and does so in order to make up for minority populations closer to its core that it shed in a further suspect use of race as a proxy to further neighboring incumbents' interests. See supra, at 1954–1955, 1956–1958.

[28] These characteristics defeat any claim that the districts are narrowly tailored to serve the State's interest in avoiding liability under § 2, because § 2 does not require a State to create, on predominantly racial lines, a district that is not "reasonably compact." See Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1008, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 2655, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994). If, because of the dispersion of the minority population, a reasonably compact majority-minority district cannot be created, § 2 does not require a majority-minority district; if a reasonably compact district can be created, nothing in § 2 requires the race-based creation of a district that is far from compact.

[29] Appellants argue that bizarre shaping and noncompactness do not raise narrow tailoring concerns. Appellants Lawson et al. claim that under Shaw I and Miller, "[s]hape is relevant only as evidence of an improper motive." 980 Brief for Appellants Lawson et al. 56. They rely on our statement in Miller:

> "Shape is relevant not because bizarreness is a necessary element of the constitutional wrong or a threshold requirement of proof, but because it may be persuasive circumstantial evidence that race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was the legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its district lines." 515 U.S., at 913, 115 S.Ct., at 2486.

The United States takes a more moderate position, accepting that in the context of narrow tailoring, "consideration must be given *1962 to the extent to which the districts drawn by a State substantially depart from its customary redistricting practices," Brief for United States 36, but asserting that insofar as bizarreness and noncompactness are necessary to achieve the State's compelling interest in compliance with § 2 "while simultaneously achieving other legitimate redistricting goals," id., at 37, such as incumbency protection, the narrowly tailoring requirement is satisfied. Similarly, Justice STEVENS' dissent argues that "noncompact districts should ... be a permissible method of avoiding violations of [§ 2]." Post, at 1989.

These arguments cannot save the districts before us. The Lawson appellants misinterpret Miller: District shape is not irrelevant to the narrow tailoring inquiry. Our discussion in Miller served only to emphasize that the ultimate constitutional values at stake involve the harms caused by the use of unjustified racial classifications, and that bizarreness is not necessary to trigger strict scrutiny. See Miller, 515 U.S., at 912–913, 115 S.Ct., at 2486. Significant deviations from traditional districting principles, such as the bizarre shape and noncompactness demonstrated by the districts here, cause constitutional harm insofar as they convey the message that political identity is, or should be, predominantly racial. For example, the bizarre shaping of Districts 18 and 29, cutting across pre-existing 981 precinct lines and other natural or traditional divisions, is not merely evidentially significant; it is part of the constitutional problem insofar as it disrupts nonracial bases of political identity and thus intensifies the emphasis on race.

Nor is the United States' argument availing here. In determining that strict scrutiny applies here, we agreed with the District Court that in fact the bizarre shaping and noncompactness of these districts were predominantly attributable to racial, not political, manipulation. The United States' argument, and that of the dissent, post, at 1989–1990 (STEVENS, J., dissenting), address the case of an otherwise compact majority-minority district that is misshapen by predominantly nonracial, political manipulation. See also post, at 2009 (SOUTER, J., dissenting) (raising "the possibility that a State could create a majority-minority district that does not coincide with the Gingles shape so long as racial data are not overused"). We disagree with the factual premise of Justice sTEVENS' dissent, that these districts were drawn using "racial considerations only in a way reasonably designed" to avoid a § 2 violation, post, at 1989. The districts before us exhibit a level of racial manipulation that exceeds what § 2 could justify.

B

The United States and the State next contend that the district lines at issue are justified by the State's compelling interest in "ameliorating the effects of racially polarized voting attributable to past and present racial discrimination." Brief for United States 32; Brief for Appellants Bush et al. 24–25. In support of that contention, they cite Texas' long history of discrimination against minorities in electoral processes, stretching from the Reconstruction to modern times, including violations of the Constitution and of the VRA. See, e.g., Williams v. Dallas, 734 F.Supp. 1317 (N.D.Tex.1990); White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973); Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 73 S.Ct. 809, 97 L.Ed. 1152 (1953); Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 64 S.Ct. 757, 88 L.Ed. 987 (1944); Nixon v. Condon, 286 U.S. 73, 52 S.Ct. 484, 76 L.Ed. 984 (1932); Nixon v. 982 Herndon, 273 U.S. 536, 47 S.Ct. 446, 71 L.Ed. 759 (1927); see also 861 F.Supp., at 1317 (because of its history of official discrimination, Texas became a covered jurisdiction under VRA § 5 in 1975, and the Department of Justice has since "frequently interposed objections against the State and its subdivisions"). Appellants attempt to link that history to evidence that in recent elections in majority-minority districts, "Anglos usually bloc voted against" Hispanic and African–American candidates. Ibid.

[30] [31] A State's interest in remedying discrimination is compelling when two conditions are satisfied. First, the discrimination that the State seeks to remedy must be specific, "identified discrimination"; second, the State "must have had a 'strong basis in evidence' to conclude that remedial action *1963 was necessary, 'before it embarks on an affirmative action program.' " Shaw II, at 910, 116 S.Ct., at 1903 (citations omitted). Here, the only current problem that appellants cite as in need of remediation is alleged vote dilution as a consequence of racial bloc voting, the same concern that underlies their VRA § 2 compliance defense, which we have assumed to be valid for purposes of this opinion. We have indicated that such problems will not justify race-based districting unless "the State employ[s] sound districting principles, and ... the affected racial group's residential patterns afford the opportunity of creating districts in which they will be in the majority." Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 657, 113 S.Ct., at 2832 (internal quotation marks omitted). Once that standard is applied, our agreement with the District Court's finding that these districts are not narrowly tailored to comply with § 2 forecloses this line of defense.

C

[32] The final contention offered by the State and private appellants is that creation of District 18 (only) was justified by a compelling state interest in complying with VRA § 5. We have made clear that § 5 has a limited substantive goal: " 'to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that 983 would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise.' " Miller, 515 U.S., at 926, 115 S.Ct., at 2493 (quoting Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1363–1364, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976)). Appellants contend that this "nonretrogression" principle is implicated because Harris County had, for two decades, contained a congressional district in which African–American voters had succeeded in selecting representatives of their choice, all of whom were African–Americans.

[33] [34] [35] The problem with the State's argument is that it seeks to justify not maintenance, but substantial augmentation, of the African–American population percentage in District 18. At the previous redistricting, in 1980, District 18's population was 40.8% African–American. Plaintiffs' Exh. 13B, p. 55. As a result of Hispanic population increases and African–American emigration from the district, its population had reached 35.1% African–American and 42.2% Hispanic at the time of the 1990 census. The State has shown no basis for concluding that the increase to a 50.9% African–American population in 1991 was necessary to ensure nonretrogression. Nonretrogression is not a license for the State to do whatever it deems necessary to ensure continued electoral success; it merely mandates that the minority's opportunity to elect representatives of its choice not be diminished, directly or indirectly, by the State's actions. We anticipated this problem in Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 655, 113 S.Ct., at 2831: "A reapportionment plan would not be narrowly tailored to the goal of avoiding retrogression if the State went beyond what was reasonably necessary to avoid retrogression." Applying that principle, it is clear that District 18 is not narrowly tailored to the avoidance of § 5 liability.

IV

[36] [37] The dissents make several further arguments against today's decision, none of which address the specifics of this case. We have responded to these points previously. Justice SOUTER, for example, reiterates his contention from 984 Shaw I that because districts created with a view to satisfying § 2 do not involve "racial subjugation," post, at 2002, and may in a sense be " 'benign[ly]' " motivated, Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 685, 113 S.Ct., at 2848 (SOUTER, J., dissenting), strict scrutiny should not apply to them. We rejected that argument in Shaw I, and we reject it now. As we explained then, see id., at 653, 113 S.Ct., at 2830, we subject racial classifications to strict scrutiny precisely because that scrutiny is necessary to determine whether they are benign —as Justice STEVENS' hypothetical of a targeted outreach program to protect victims of sickle cell anemia, see post, at 1988, would, no doubt, be—or whether they misuse race and foster harmful and divisive stereotypes without a compelling justification. We see no need to revisit our prior debates.

[38] Both dissents contend that the recognition of the Shaw I cause of action threatens *1964 public respect for, and the independence of, the Federal Judiciary by inserting the courts deep into the districting process. We believe that the dissents both exaggerate the dangers involved, and fail to recognize the implications of their suggested retreat from Shaw I.

As to the dangers of judicial entanglement, Justice STEVENS' dissent makes much of cases stemming from State districting plans originally drawn up before Shaw I, in which problems have arisen from the uncertainty in the law prior to and during its gradual clarification in Shaw I, Miller, and today's cases. See post, at 1990–1991 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). We are aware of the difficulties faced by the States, and by the district courts, in confronting new constitutional precedents, and we also know that the nature of the expressive harms with which we are dealing, and the complexity of the districting process, are such that bright-line rules are not available. But we believe that today's decisions, which both illustrate the defects that offend the principles of Shaw I and reemphasize the importance of the States' discretion in the redistricting process, see supra, at 1960–1961, will serve 985 to clarify the States' responsibilities. The States have traditionally guarded their sovereign districting prerogatives jealously, and we are confident that they can fulfill that requirement, leaving the courts to their customary and appropriate backstop role.

This Court has now rendered decisions after plenary consideration in five cases applying the Shaw I doctrine (Shaw I, Miller, Hays, Shaw II, and this suit). The dissenters would have us abandon those precedents, suggesting that fundamental concerns relating to the judicial role are at stake. See post, at 1990, 1991, 1993 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); post, at 1998–1999 and n. 2, 2001, 2007, 2011, 2012 (SOUTER, J., dissenting); Shaw II, 919–920, 922–923, and n. 3, 929, 116 S.Ct., at 1907–1908, 1908–1910, and n. 3, 1912 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); but see ante, at 932–933, 116 S.Ct., at 1913–1914 (noting that the judicial task of distinguishing race-based from non-race-based action in Shaw I cases is far from unique). While we agree that those concerns are implicated here, we believe they point the other way. Our legitimacy requires, above all, that we adhere to stare decisis, especially in such sensitive political contexts as the present, where partisan controversy abounds. Legislators and district courts nationwide have modified their practices —or, rather, reembraced the traditional districting practices that were almost universally followed before the 1990 census —in response to Shaw I. Those practices and our precedents, which acknowledge voters as more than mere racial statistics, play an important role in defining the political identity of the American voter. Our Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence evinces a commitment to eliminate unnecessary and excessive governmental use and reinforcement of racial stereotypes. See, e.g., Georgia v. McCollum, 505 U.S. 42, 59, 112 S.Ct. 2348, 2359, 120 L.Ed.2d 33 (1992) ("[T]he exercise of a peremptory challenge must not be based on either the race of the juror or the racial stereotypes held by the party"); Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614, 630–631, 111 S.Ct. 2077, 2088, 114 L.Ed.2d 660 (1991) ("If our society is to continue to progress as a multiracial democracy, it must recognize 986 that the automatic invocation of race stereotypes retards that progress and causes continued hurt and injury"); Powers, 499 U.S., at 410, 111 S.Ct., at 1370 ("We may not accept as a defense to racial discrimination the very stereotype the law condemns"); Holland v. Illinois, 493 U.S. 474, 484, n. 2, 110 S.Ct. 803, 809, n. 2, 107 L.Ed.2d 905 (1990) ("[A] prosecutor's 'assumption that a black juror may be presumed to be partial simply because he is black' ... violates the Equal Protection Clause"); Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 104, 106 S.Ct. 1712, 1727, 90 L.Ed.2d 69 (1986) ("[T]he Equal Protection Clause prohibits a State from taking any action based on crude, inaccurate racial stereotypes"). We decline to retreat from that commitment today.

The judgment of the District Court is

Affirmed.

*1965 APPENDIX A TO OPINION OF O'CONNOR, J.

1966 APPENDIX B TO OPINION OF O'CONNOR, J.

1967 APPENDIX C TO OPINION OF O'CONNOR, J.

1968 *990 Justice O'CONNOR, concurring.

I write separately to express my view on two points. First, compliance with the results test of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA) is a compelling state interest. Second, that test can coexist in principle and in practice with Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), and its progeny, as elaborated in today's opinions.

I

As stated in the plurality opinion, ante, at 1960 (O'CONNOR, J., joined by REHNQUIST, C.J., and KENNEDY, J.), this Court has thus far assumed without deciding that compliance with the results test of VRA § 2(b) is a compelling state interest. See Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 915, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 1905, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 920–921, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 2490–2491, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995). Although that assumption is not determinative of the Court's decisions today, I believe that States and lower courts are entitled to more definite guidance as they toil with the twin demands of the Fourteenth Amendment and the VRA.

The results test is violated if,

> "based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of [e.g., a racial minority group] in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).

In the 14 years since the enactment of § 2(b), we have interpreted and enforced the obligations that it places on States in a succession of cases, assuming but never directly addressing its constitutionality. See Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994); Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994); Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993); Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 37–42, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 1083–1085, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993); Chisom v. Roemer, 501 U.S. 380, 111 S.Ct. 2354, 115 L.Ed.2d 348 (1991); Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986); cf. Chisom, 991 supra, at 418, 111 S.Ct., at 2376 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting) (noting that a constitutional challenge to the statute was not before the Court). Meanwhile, lower courts have unanimously affirmed its constitutionality. See United States v. Marengo County Comm'n, 731 F.2d 1546, 1556–1563 (C.A.11), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 976, 105 S.Ct. 375, 83 L.Ed.2d 311 (1984); Jones v. Lubbock, 727 F.2d 364, 372–375 (C.A.5 1984); Shaw v. Hunt, 861 F.Supp. 408, 438 (E.D.N.C.1994), aff'd, Shaw II, 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207; Prosser v. Elections Bd., 793 F.Supp. 859, 869 (W.D.Wis.1992); Wesley v. Collins, 605 F.Supp. 802, 808 (M.D.Tenn.1985), aff'd, 791 F.2d 1255 (C.A.6 1986); Jordan v. Winter, 604 F.Supp. 807, 811 (N.D.Miss.), aff'd. sub nom. Allain v. Brooks, 469 U.S. 1002, 105 S.Ct. 416, 83 L.Ed.2d 343 (1984); Sierra v. El Paso Independent School Dist., 591 F.Supp. 802, 806 (W.D.Tex.1984); Major v. Treen, 574 F.Supp. 325, 342–349 (E.D.La.1983); accord, Hartman, Racial Vote Dilution and Separation of Powers: An Exploration of the Conflict Between the Judicial "Intent" and the Legislative "Results" Standards, 50 Geo. Wash. L.Rev. 689, 739–752 (1982). Cf. South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966) (upholding the original VRA as a valid exercise of Congress' power under § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment); Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 477, 100 S.Ct. 2758, 2774, 65 L.Ed.2d 902 (1980) (Katzenbach and its successors interpreting § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment "confirm that congressional authority extends beyond the prohibition of purposeful discrimination to encompass state action that has discriminatory impact perpetuating the effects of past discrimination"); White v. Alabama, 867 F.Supp. 1519, 1549 (M.D.Ala.1994) (the results test "has not been held unconstitutional and complying with it remains a strong state interest"), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 74 F.3d 1058, 1069 (C.A.11 1996) (noting that "Section 2 was enacted to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment's prohibition against denying a citizen the right to vote 'on account of race' ").

*1969 Against this background, it would be irresponsible for a State to disregard the § 2 results test. The Supremacy Clause obliges the States to comply with all constitutional 992 exercises of Congress' power. See U.S. Const., Art. VI, cl. 2. Statutes are presumed constitutional, see, e.g., Fairbank v. United States, 181 U.S. 283, 285, 21 S.Ct. 648, 649, 45 L.Ed. 862 (1901), and that presumption appears strong here in light of the weight of authority affirming the results test's constitutionality. In addition, fundamental concerns of federalism mandate that States be given some leeway so that they are not "trapped between the competing hazards of liability." Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 291, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 1856, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring). We should allow States to assume the constitutionality of § 2 of the VRA, including the 1982 amendments.

This conclusion is bolstered by concerns of respect for the authority of Congress under the Reconstruction Amendments. See City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 179, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 1562–1563, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980). The results test of § 2 is an important part of the apparatus chosen by Congress to effectuate this Nation's commitment "to confront its conscience and fulfill the guarantee of the Constitution" with respect to equality in voting. S.Rep. No. 97–417, p. 4 (1982), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, pp. 177, 181. Congress considered the test "necessary and appropriate to ensure full protection of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments rights." Id., at 27, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 204. It believed that without the results test, nothing could be done about "overwhelming evidence of unequal access to the electoral system," id., at 26, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 204, or about "voting practices and procedures [that] perpetuate the effects of past purposeful discrimination," id., at 40, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 218. And it founded those beliefs on the sad reality that "there still are some communities in our Nation where racial politics do dominate the electoral process." Id., at 33, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 211. Respect for those legislative conclusions mandates that the § 2 results test be accepted and applied unless and until current lower court precedent is reversed and it is held unconstitutional.

In my view, therefore, the States have a compelling interest in complying with the results test as this Court has interpreted it.

993 II

Although I agree with the dissenters about § 2's role as part of our national commitment to racial equality, I differ from them in my belief that that commitment can and must be reconciled with the complementary commitment of our Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence to eliminate the unjustified use of racial stereotypes. At the same time that we combat the symptoms of racial polarization in politics, we must strive to eliminate unnecessary race-based state action that appears to endorse the disease.

Today's decisions, in conjunction with the recognition of the compelling state interest in compliance with the reasonably perceived requirements of § 2, present a workable framework for the achievement of these twin goals. I would summarize that framework, and the rules governing the States' consideration of race in the districting process, as follows.

First, so long as they do not subordinate traditional districting criteria to the use of race for its own sake or as a proxy, States may intentionally create majority-minority districts, and may otherwise take race into consideration, without coming under strict scrutiny. See ante, at 1951–1952 (plurality opinion); post, at 1976–1978, and n. 8, 1985 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); post, at 2003, 2007, 2011 (SOUTER, J., dissenting). Only if traditional districting criteria are neglected and that neglect is predominantly due to the misuse of race does strict scrutiny apply. Ante, at 1953, 1954, 1961 (plurality opinion).

Second, where voting is racially polarized, § 2 prohibits States from adopting districting schemes that would have the effect that minority voters "have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to ... elect representatives of their choice." § 2(b). That principle may require a State to create *1970 a majority-minority district where the three Gingles factors are present—viz., (i) the minority group "is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a 994 majority in a single-member district," (ii) "it is politically cohesive," and (iii) "the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate," Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S., at 50–51, 106 S.Ct., at 2766–2767.

Third, the state interest in avoiding liability under VRA § 2 is compelling. See supra, at 1968–1969; post, at 1989 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); post, at 2007 (SOUTER, J., dissenting). If a State has a strong basis in evidence for concluding that the Gingles factors are present, it may create a majority-minority district without awaiting judicial findings. Its "strong basis in evidence" need not take any particular form, although it cannot simply rely on generalized assumptions about the prevalence of racial bloc voting.

Fourth, if a State pursues that compelling interest by creating a district that "substantially addresses" the potential liability, Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 918, 116 S.Ct., at 1907, and does not deviate substantially from a hypothetical court-drawn § 2 district for predominantly racial reasons, cf. ante, at 1961 (plurality opinion) (explaining how District 30 fails to satisfy these criteria), its districting plan will be deemed narrowly tailored. Cf. ante, at 1962 (plurality opinion) (acknowledging this possibility); post, at 2009 (SOUTER, J., dissenting) (same); post, at 1989–1990 (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (contending that it is applicable here).

Finally, however, districts that are bizarrely shaped and noncompact, and that otherwise neglect traditional districting principles and deviate substantially from the hypothetical court-drawn district, for predominantly racial reasons, are unconstitutional. See ante, at 1961 (plurality opinion).

District 30 illustrates the application of these principles. Dallas County has a history of racially polarized voting. See, e.g., White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 765–767, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 2339–2340, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973); Lipscomb v. Wise, 399 F.Supp. 782, 785–786 (N.D.Tex.1975), rev'd, 551 F.2d 1043 (C.A.5 1977), rev'd, 437 U.S. 535, 98 S.Ct. 2493, 57 L.Ed.2d 411 (1978). One year before the redistricting at issue here, a District Court invalidated under § 2 the Dallas City Council election 995 scheme, finding racial polarization and that candidates preferred by African–American voters were consistently defeated. See Williams v. Dallas, 734 F.Supp. 1317, 1387–1394 (N.D.Tex.1990). Expert testimony in this litigation also confirmed the existence of racially polarized voting in and around Dallas County. 4 Tr. 187; see also App. 227. With respect to geographical compactness, the record contains two quite different possible designs for District 30, the original Johnson Plan, id., at 139, and the Owens–Pate Plan, id., at 141, that are reasonably compact and include, respectively, 44% and 45.6% African–American populations. This evidence provided a strong basis for Texas' belief that the creation of a majority-minority district was appropriate. But Texas allowed race to dominate the drawing of District 30 to the almost total exclusion of nonracial districting considerations, and ultimately produced a district that, because of the misuse of race as a proxy in addition to legitimate efforts to satisfy § 2, is bizarrely shaped and far from compact. See ante, at 1954–1955, 1956–1959, and n.

(plurality opinion); compare post, at 1979–1989 (STEVENS,, JJ., dissenting). It thus came under strict scrutiny and failed the narrow tailoring test.

As the disagreement among Members of this Court over District 30 shows, the application of the principles that I have outlined sometimes requires difficult exercises of judgment. That difficulty is inevitable. The VRA requires the States and the courts to take action to remedy the reality of racial inequality in our political system, sometimes necessitating race-based action, while the Fourteenth Amendment requires us to look with suspicion on the excessive use of racial considerations by the government. But I believe that the States, playing a primary role, and the courts, in their secondary role, are capable of distinguishing the appropriate and reasonably necessary uses of race from its unjustified and excessive uses.

*1971 996 Justice KENNEDY, concurring.

I join the plurality opinion, but the statements in Part II of the opinion that strict scrutiny would not apply to all cases of intentional creation of majority-minority districts, ante, at 1951, 1953–1954, require comment. Those statements are unnecessary to our decision, for strict scrutiny applies here. I do not consider these dicta to commit me to any position on the question whether race is predominant whenever a State, in redistricting, foreordains that one race be the majority in a certain number of districts or in a certain part of the State. In my view, we would no doubt apply strict scrutiny if a State decreed that certain districts had to be at least 50 percent white, and our analysis should be no different if the State so favors minority races.

We need not answer this question here, for there is ample evidence that otherwise demonstrates the predominance of race in Texas' redistricting, as the plurality shows, ante, at 1951–1960. And this question was not at issue in DeWitt v. Wilson, 856 F.Supp. 1409 (E.D.Cal.1994), summarily aff'd. in part and dism'd in part, 515 U.S. 1170, 115 S.Ct. 2637, 132 L.Ed.2d 876 (1995). (I note that our summary affirmance in DeWitt stands for no proposition other than that the districts reviewed there were constitutional. We do not endorse the reasoning of the district court when we order summary affirmance of the judgment. Mandel v. Bradley, 432 U.S. 173, 176, 97 S.Ct. 2238, 2240–2241, 53 L.Ed.2d 199 (1977) (per curiam); Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 671, 94 S.Ct. 1347, 1359–1360, 39 L.Ed.2d 662 (1974).)

On the narrow-tailoring issue, I agree that the districts challenged here were not reasonably necessary to serve the assumed compelling state interest in complying with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973. As the plurality opinion indicates, ante, at 1961, in order for compliance with § 2 to be a compelling interest, the State must have a strong basis in the evidence for believing that all three of the threshold conditions for a § 2 claim are met:

> "[F]irst, 'that [the minority group] is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in 997 a single-member district'; second, 'that it is politically cohesive'; and third, 'that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate.' " Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 1084, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993), quoting Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 50–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2766–2767, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986).

The first Gingles condition refers to the compactness of the minority population, not to the compactness of the contested district. As the plurality observes: "If, because of the dispersion of the minority population, a reasonably compact majority-minority district cannot be created, § 2 does not require a majority-minority district...." Ante, at 1961. We may assume, as the plurality does expressly, ibid., that there was sufficient evidence of racial polarization to fulfill the second and third Gingles conditions, and we may assume, as must be done to reach the narrow-tailoring question, that the African–American and Hispanic populations in Harris County and the African–American population in Dallas County were each concentrated enough to form a majority in a reasonably compact district, thereby meeting the first Gingles condition.

If a State has the assumed compelling interest in avoiding § 2 liability, it still must tailor its districts narrowly to serve that interest. "[T]he districting that is based on race [must] 'substantially addres[s] the § 2 violation.' " Ante, at 1960 (quoting Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S., at 918, 116 S.Ct., at 1907 (Shaw II)). The State may not engage in districting based on race except as reasonably necessary to cure the anticipated § 2 violation, nor may it use race as a proxy to serve other interests. Ante, at 1961. The plurality gives as an example of the former the fact that "District 30 ... reaches out to grab small and apparently isolated minority communities which, based on the evidence presented, could not possibly form part of a compact majority-minority district." Ibid. (referring to tentacles of District 30 that coil around outlying African–American communities in Collin and Tarrant Counties, 998 ante, at 1955). And, as the plurality further holds *1972 in a portion of its predominant-factor analysis that is central to the narrow-tailoring inquiry, District 30 also involved the illicit use of race as a proxy when legislators shifted blocs of African–American voters to districts of incumbent Democrats in order to promote partisan interests. See ante, at 1956–1957.

Narrow tailoring is absent in Districts 18 and 29 as well. Although the State could have drawn either a majority-African-American or majority-Hispanic district in Harris County without difficulty, there is no evidence that two reasonably compact majority-minority districts could have been drawn there. Of the major alternative plans considered below, only the Owens–Pate plan drew majority-African-American and majority-Hispanic districts in Harris County, App. 142, but those districts were not compact. Section 2 does not require the State to create two noncompact majority-minority districts just because a compact district could be drawn for either minority independently. See ante, at 1961 ("§ 2 does not require a State to create, on predominantly racial lines, a district that is not 'reasonably compact' "); Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1024, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 2663, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994) (affirming, upon a finding of no vote dilution, District Court decision not to give § 2 remedies to both African–Americans and Hispanics because population overlap made the remedies mutually exclusive). The race-based districting that the State performed in drawing Districts 18, 29, and 30 was not justified by § 2, or indeed by any other compelling interest, either real or assumed. That itself suffices to defeat the State's claim that those three districts were narrowly tailored. Shaw II, at 915–918, 116 S.Ct., at 1905–1907. (In this respect, I disagree with the apparent suggestion in Justice O'CONNOR's separate concurrence that a court should conduct a second predominant-factor inquiry in deciding whether a district was narrowly tailored, see ante, at 1970. There is nothing in 999 the plurality opinion or any opinion of the Court to support that proposition. The simple question is whether the race-based districting was reasonably necessary to serve a compelling interest.)

While § 2 does not require a noncompact majority-minority district, neither does it forbid it, provided that the rationale for creating it is proper in the first instance. Districts not drawn for impermissible reasons or according to impermissible criteria may take any shape, even a bizarre one. States are not prevented from taking into account race-neutral factors in drawing permissible majority-minority districts. If, however, the bizarre shape of the district is attributable to race-based districting unjustified by a compelling interest (e.g., gratuitous race-based districting or use of race as a proxy for other interests), such districts may "cause constitutional harm insofar as they convey the message that political identity is, or should be, predominantly racial," ante, at 1962. While districts "may pass strict scrutiny without having to defeat rival compact districts designed by plaintiffs' experts in endless 'beauty contests,' " ante, at 1960, the District Court was right to declare unconstitutional the egregious, unjustified race-based districting that occurred here.

Justice THOMAS, with whom Justice SCALIA joins, concurring in the judgment.

In my view, application of strict scrutiny in this suit was never a close question. I cannot agree with Justice O'CONNOR's assertion that strict scrutiny is not invoked by the intentional creation of majority-minority districts. See ante, at 1951. Though Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2828, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (Shaw I), expressly reserved that question, we effectively resolved it in subsequent cases. Only last Term, in Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 2113, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995), we vigorously asserted that all governmental racial classifications 1000 must be strictly scrutinized.[1] And in *1973 Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), Georgia's concession that it intentionally created majority-minority districts was sufficient to show that race was a predominant, motivating factor in its redistricting. Id., at 918–919, 115 S.Ct., at 2489–2490.

Strict scrutiny applies to all governmental classifications based on race, and we have expressly held that there is no exception for race-based redistricting. Id., at 913–915, 115 S.Ct., at 2486–2487; Shaw I, supra, at 643–647, 113 S.Ct., at 2824–2827. While we have recognized the evidentiary difficulty of proving that a redistricting plan is, in fact, a racial gerrymander, see Miller, supra, at 916–917, 115 S.Ct., at 2488; Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 646–647, 113 S.Ct., at 2826–2827, we have never suggested that a racial gerrymander is subject to anything less than strict scrutiny. See id., at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826 ("The difficulty of proof, of course, does not mean that a racial gerrymander, once established, should receive less scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause than other state legislation classifying citizens by race").

In Shaw I, we noted that proving a racial gerrymander "sometimes will not be difficult at all," ibid., and suggested that evidence of a highly irregular shape or disregard for traditional race-neutral districting principles could suffice to invoke strict scrutiny. We clarified in Miller that a plaintiff may rely on both circumstantial and direct evidence and said that a plaintiff "must prove that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations." 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488. The shape of Georgia's Eleventh District was itself "quite compelling" evidence of 1001 a racial gerrymander, but there was other evidence that showed that the legislature was motivated by a "predominant, overriding desire" to create a third majority-black district. That evidence was the State's own concession that the legislature had intentionally created an additional majority-black district. See id., at 918–919, 115 S.Ct., at 2489–2490. On that record, we found that the District Court could not have "reached any conclusion other than that race was the predominant factor in drawing Georgia's Eleventh District." Id., at 918, 115 S.Ct., at 2489.

We have said that impermissible racial classifications do not follow inevitably from a legislature's mere awareness of racial demographics. See id., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488; Shaw I, supra, at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826. But the intentional creation of a majority-minority district certainly means more than mere awareness that application of traditional, race-neutral districting principles will result in the creation of a district in which a majority of the district's residents are members of a particular minority group. See Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2296, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979) (distinguishing discriminatory intent from "intent as volition" or "intent as awareness of consequences"). In my view, it means that the legislature affirmatively undertakes to create a majority-minority district that would not have existed but for the express use of racial classifications—in other words, that a majority-minority district is created "because of," and not merely "in spite of," racial demographics. See ibid. When that occurs, traditional race-neutral districting principles are necessarily subordinated (and race necessarily predominates), and the legislature has classified persons on the basis of race. The resulting redistricting must be viewed as a racial gerrymander.

Our summary affirmance of DeWitt v. Wilson, 856 F.Supp. 1409 (E.D.Cal.1994), summarily aff'd. in part and dism'd in part, 515 U.S. 1170, 115 S.Ct. 2637, 132 L.Ed.2d 876 (1995), cannot justify exempting intentional race-based redistricting from our well-established Fourteenth Amendment standard. "When we summarily 1002 affirm, without opinion, the judgment of a three-judge district court we affirm the judgment but not necessarily the reasoning by which it was reached. An unexplicated summary affirmance *1974 settles the issues for the parties, and is not to be read as a renunciation by this Court of doctrines previously announced in our opinions after full argument." Fusari v. Steinberg, 419 U.S. 379, 391–392, 95 S.Ct. 533, 541, 42 L.Ed.2d 521 (1975) (Burger, C.J., concurring) (footnote omitted). I would not read our summary affirmance of DeWitt to eviscerate the explicit holding of Adarand or to undermine the force of our discussion of Georgia's concessions in Miller.

In this suit, Texas readily admits that it intentionally created majority-minority districts and that those districts would not have existed but for its affirmative use of racial demographics. As the State concedes in its brief:

> "Texas intentionally maintained [District] 18 as an African–American opportunity district and intentionally created [Districts] 29 and 30 as minority opportunity districts in order to comply voluntarily with its reasonable belief, based upon strong evidence, that it was required to do so by the Voting Rights Act, and because it desired to insure that minorities who have historically been excluded from the electoral process in Texas had a reasonable opportunity to elect candidates of their choice." Brief for State Appellants 25.

See also ante, at 1951–1953, 1956–1957 (reciting similar concessions by Texas). That is enough to require application of strict scrutiny in this suit.[2] I am content to reaffirm our holding in Adarand that all racial classifications by government must be strictly scrutinized and, even in the 1003 sensitive area of state legislative redistricting, I would make no exceptions.

I am willing to assume without deciding that the State has asserted a compelling state interest. Given that assumption, I agree that the State's redistricting attempts were not narrowly tailored to achieve its asserted interest. I concur in the judgment.

Justice STEVENS, with whom Justice GINSBURG and Justice BREYER join, dissenting.

The 1990 census revealed that Texas' population had grown, over the past decade, almost twice as fast as the population of the country as a whole. As a result, Texas was entitled to elect three additional Representatives to the United States Congress, enlarging its delegation from 27 to 30. Because Texas' growth was concentrated in south Texas and the cities of Dallas and Houston, the state legislature concluded that the new congressional districts should be carved out of existing districts in those areas. The consequences of the political battle that produced the new map are some of the most oddly shaped congressional districts in the United States.

Today, the Court strikes down three of Texas' majorityminority districts, concluding, inter alia, that their odd shapes reveal that the State impermissibly relied on predominantly racial reasons when it drew the districts as it did. For two reasons, I believe that the Court errs in striking down those districts.

First, I believe that the Court has misapplied its own tests for racial gerrymandering, both by applying strict scrutiny to all three of these districts, and then by concluding that none can meet that scrutiny. In asking whether strict scrutiny should apply, the Court improperly ignores the "complex interplay" of political and geographical considerations that went into the creation of Texas' new congressional districts, Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915–916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 2488, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), and 1004 focuses exclusively on the role that race played in the State's decisions to adjust the shape of its districts. A quick comparison of the unconstitutional majority-minority districts with three equally bizarre majority-Anglo districts, compare ante, at Appendixes A–C, with infra, at Appendixes A–C, demonstrates that race was not necessarily the predominant factor contorting the district lines. I would follow the fair implications of the District *1975 Court's findings,[1] and conclude that Texas' entire map is a political, not a racial, gerrymander.[2] See Part IV, infra.

Even if strict scrutiny applies, I would find these districts constitutional, for each considers race only to the extent necessary to comply with the State's responsibilities under the Voting Rights Act while achieving other race-neutral political and geographical requirements. The plurality's finding to the contrary unnecessarily restricts the ability of States to conform their behavior to the Voting Rights Act while simultaneously complying with other race-neutral goals. See Part V, infra.

Second, even if I concluded that these districts failed an appropriate application of this still-developing law to appropriately read facts, I would not uphold the District Court decision. The decisions issued today serve merely to reinforce 1005 my conviction that the Court has, with its "analytically distinct" jurisprudence of racial gerrymandering, Shaw v. Reno (Shaw I), 509 U.S. 630, 652, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2829–2830, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), struck out into a jurisprudential wilderness that lacks a definable constitutional core and threatens to create harms more significant than any suffered by the individual plaintiffs challenging these districts. See Parts VI–VII, infra; Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S., at 918–919, 116 S.Ct., at 1907 (Shaw II) (STEVENS, J., dissenting). Though we travel ever farther from it with each passing decision, I would return to the well-traveled path that we left in Shaw I.

I

The factors motivating Texas' redistricting plan are clearly revealed in the results of the 1992 elections. Both before and immediately after the 1990 census, the Democratic Party was in control of the Texas Legislature. Under the new map in 1992, more than two-thirds of the Districts—including each of the new ones—elected Democrats, even though Texas voters are arguably more likely to vote Republican than Democrat.[3] Incumbents of both parties were just as successful: 26 of the 27 incumbents were reelected, while each of the three new districts elected a state legislator who had essentially acted as an incumbent in the districting process,[4] giving "incumbents" a 97% success rate.

*1976 1006 It was not easy for the State to achieve these results while simultaneously guaranteeing that each district enclosed the residence of its incumbent, contained the same number of people, and complied with other federal and state districting requirements. Much of Dallas and Houston, for example, was already represented in Congress by Democrats, and creating new Democratic districts in each city while ensuring politically safe seats for sitting Representatives required significant political gerrymandering. This task was aided by technological and informational advances that allowed the State to adjust lines on the scale of city blocks, thereby guaranteeing twists and turns that would have been essentially impossible in any earlier redistricting.[5] "[T]he result of the Legislature's efforts," the District Court concluded, was "a 1007 crazy-quilt of districts" that bore little resemblance to "the work of public-spirited representatives." Vera v. Richards, 861 F.Supp. 1304, 1309 (S.D.Tex.1994); see, e.g., Appendixes A–D.

It is clear that race also played a role in Texas' redistricting decisions. According to the 1990 Census, Texas contained 16,986,510 residents, of whom 22.5% were of Hispanic origin, and 11.6% were non-Hispanic African–American. 861 F.Supp., at 1311. Under the pre–1990 districting scheme,

Texas' 27–member delegation included four Hispanics and one African–American. In Harris County, a concentrated Hispanic community was divided among several majority-Anglo districts as well as the majority-minority District 18. In Dallas County, the majority-black community in South Dallas was split down the middle between two majority-Anglo districts. The legislature was well aware, after the 1990 census, that the minority communities in each county were disproportionately responsible for the growth in population that gained three representatives for the State. Given the omnipresence of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973, the demographics of the two communities, and the pressure from leaders of the minority communities in those cities, it was not unreasonable—and certainly not invidious discrimination of any sort—for the State to accede to calls for the creation of majority-minority districts in both cities.[6]

1008 While complying with a multitude of other political and legal requirements, then, Texas created three new majority-minority congressional districts and significantly reconfigured one pre-existing district. The District Court concluded that the State impermissibly emphasized race over nonracial factors when it drew two of these new districts (District 30 in Dallas and District 29 in Houston) and the reconfigured District 18 in Houston. To determine whether the Court correctly affirms that decision, I begin, as does the plurality, by asking whether "strict scrutiny" should be applied to the State's *1977 consideration of race in the creation of these majority-minority districts.

II

We have traditionally applied strict scrutiny to state action that discriminates on the basis of race. Prior to Shaw I, however, we did so only in cases in which that discrimination harmed an individual or set of individuals because of their race. In contrast, the harm identified in Shaw I and its progeny is much more diffuse. See Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 921–925, 116 S.Ct., at 1908–1910 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). Racial gerrymandering of the sort being addressed in these cases is "discrimination" only in the sense that the lines are drawn based on race, not in the sense that harm is imposed on specific persons on account of their race. Id., at 923–924, 116 S.Ct., at 1909–1910 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

Aware of this distinction, a majority of this Court has endorsed a position crucial to a proper evaluation of Texas' congressional districts: Neither the Equal Protection Clause nor any other provision of the Constitution was offended merely because the legislature considered race when it deliberately 1009 created three majority-minority districts.[7] The plurality's statement that strict scrutiny "does [not] apply to all cases of intentional creation of majority-minority districts," ante, at 1951, merely caps a long line of discussions, stretching from Shaw I to Shaw II, which have both expressly and implicitly set forth precisely that conclusion.[8]

1010 The conclusion that race-conscious districting should not always be subject to strict scrutiny merely recognizes that our equal protection jurisprudence can sometimes mislead us with its rigid characterization of suspect classes and levels of scrutiny. As I have *1978 previously noted, all equal protection jurisprudence might be described as a form of rational basis scrutiny; we apply "strict scrutiny" more to describe the likelihood of success than the character of the test to be applied. See Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 452–453, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 3260–3261, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985) (STEVENS, J., concurring). Because race has rarely been a legitimate basis for state classifications, and more typically an irrational and invidious ground for discrimination, a "virtually automatic invalidation of racial classifications" has been the natural result of the application of our equal protection jurisprudence. Id., at 453, 105 S.Ct., at 3261. In certain circumstances, however, when the state action (i) has neither the intent nor effect of harming any particular group, (ii) is not designed to give effect to irrational prejudices held by its citizens but to break them down, and (iii) uses race as a classification because race is "relevant" to the benign goal of the classification, id., at 454, 105 S.Ct., at 3262, we need not view the action with the typically fatal skepticism that we have used to strike down the most pernicious forms of state behavior. See 1011 Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 316–317, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 1869–1870, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (STEVENS, J., dissenting); Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 320, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 2763–2764, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978). While the Court insisted in Shaw I that racial classifications of this sort injure the Nation (though not necessarily any particular group) in myriad ways, see 509 U.S., at 647–648, 113 S.Ct., at 2827, redistricting that complies with the three factors I outline above simply is not the sort of despicable practice that has been taken in the past to exclude minorities from the electoral process. See Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 931–933, 116 S.Ct., at 1913–1914 (STEVENS,, JJ., dissenting); Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 682–685, 113 S.Ct., at 2846–2848 (SOUTER, J., dissenting); cf., e.g., Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960); Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 73 S.Ct. 809, 97 L.Ed. 1152 (1953). While any racial classification may risk some stereotyping, the risk of true "discrimination" in this case is extremely tenuous in light of the remedial purpose the classification is intended to achieve and the long history of resistance to giving minorities a full voice in the political process. Given the balancing of subtle harms and strong remedies —a balancing best left to the political process, not to our own well-developed but rigid jurisprudence—the plurality reasonably concludes that race-conscious redistricting is not always a form of "discrimination" to which we should direct our most skeptical eye.

III

While the Court has agreed that race can, to a point, govern the drawing of district lines, it nonetheless suggests that at a certain point, when the State uses race "too much," illegitimate racial stereotypes threaten to overrun and contaminate an otherwise legitimate redistricting process. In Miller, the Court concluded that this point was reached when "race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was the ... dominant and controlling rationale" behind the shape of the district. 515 U.S., at 913, 115 S.Ct., at 2486. For strict scrutiny to apply, therefore, the plaintiff must demonstrate that "the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles, including but not limited to compactness, 1012 contiguity, [and] respect for political subdivisions ... to racial considerations." Id., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488; see also id., at 928, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring) (strict scrutiny should be applied only if State emphasized race in "substantial disregard" for traditional districting principles); ante, at 1953 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.).

Of course, determining the "predominant" motive of the Texas Legislature, ante, at 1953 (citing Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488), is not a simple matter.[9] The *1979 members of that body 1013 faced many unrelenting pressures when they negotiated the creation of the contested districts. They had to ensure that there was no deviation in population from district to district.[10] They reasonably believed that they had to create districts that would comply with the Voting Rights Act. See supra, at 1976. If the redistricting legislation was to be enacted, they had to secure the support of incumbent Congressmen of both parties by drawing districts that would ensure their election. And all of these desires had to be achieved within a single contiguous district. Every time a district line was shifted from one place to another, each of these considerations was implicated, and additional, compensating shifts were necessary to ensure that all competing goals were simultaneously accomplished. In such a constrained environment, there will rarely be one "dominant and controlling" influence. Nowhere is this better illustrated 1014 than in Dallas' District 30 where, at the very least, it is clear that race was not such an overriding factor.

IV

The plurality lists several considerations which, when taken in combination, lead it to conclude that race, and no other cause, was the predominant factor influencing District 30's configuration. First, there is the shape itself. Second, there is evidence that the districts were intentionally drawn with consciousness of race in an effort to comply with the Voting Rights Act. Third, the plurality dismisses two race-neutral considerations (communities of interest and incumbency protection) that appellants advanced as race-neutral considerations that led to the odd *1980 shape of the districts. Finally, the plurality concludes that race was impermissibly used as a proxy for political affiliation during the course of redistricting. In my opinion, an appropriate reading of the record demonstrates that none of these factors—either singly or in combination—suggests that racial considerations "subordinated" race-neutral districting principles. I discuss each in turn.

Bizarre Shape

As noted, supra, at 1974, and n. 6, Texas' Legislature concluded that it would add a new district to Dallas County that would incorporate the rapidly growing minority communities in South Dallas. To do so, the new district would have to fit into the existing districts: Before redistricting, most of southern Dallas County (including the African–American communities in South Dallas) was divided between Districts 5 and 24, represented by Democratic Representatives Bryant and Frost, respectively. The middle of the northern section of the county was divided between Districts 3 and 26, both represented by Republicans.

Then–State Senator Johnson began the redistricting process by proposing a compact, Democratic, majority-minority 1015 district encompassing all of South Dallas. See App.

139; 861 F.Supp., at 1321, n. 22. Representatives Bryant and Frost objected, however, because the proposed district included not only Johnson's residence, but their own homes, located within only 10 miles of each other on opposite sides of the city. Furthermore, Johnson's plan transferred many of Frost and Bryant's most reliable Democratic supporters into the proposed district. Rather than acquiesce to the creation of this compact majority-minority district, Frost and Bryant insisted that the new district avoid both their own homes and many of the communities that had been loyal to them. Johnson's plan was, therefore, "quickly abandoned." Ibid.

To accommodate the incumbents' desires, District 30 required geographical adjustments that had telling effects on its shape. First, two notches carefully avoiding the residences of and neighborhoods surrounding Frost and Bryant were carved out of District 30's side. See Appendix D, infra.[11] Furthermore, Frost and Bryant retained several communities —many majority-black—along the southern and eastern sides of the proposed district. See generally 861 F.Supp., at 1321–1322.[12]

1016 Had these communities been retained by District 30, it would have been much more compact. By giving up these voters to Frost and Bryant, however, District 30 was forced to seek out population and Democratic voters elsewhere. The Democratic incumbents had blocked its way to the south and east; north (and, to a lesser extent, west) was the only way it could go.[13]

It would not have helped the prospects of a Democratic candidate in the new District 30 had it simply plowed directly north to pick up additional population. Immediately north of the city of Dallas are the "Park Cities," *1981 which include a population that has voted strongly Republican throughout recent elections. See State's Exhs. 9A and 9B (depicting one index of political affiliation in 1990 and 1992 elections). Rather than dilute the Democratic vote (and threaten the Republican incumbents) in this manner, District 30 skirted these communities on the west, and then curved east, picking up communities on either side of the region's major interstate freeways.[14]

As the process of extracting Democratic voters out of the core of the Republican districts in North Dallas progressed, the distinction between Democratic and Republican voters moved from the precinct level (the smallest level at which political affiliation data was immediately available in the redistricting 1017 programs) down to the smaller census block level (the smallest level at which demographic and socioeconomic data was available).[15] In an effort to further identify which census blocks were likely to support their candidacy, the incumbents used not only census data, but their own long experience as local representatives as well as the experiences of staffers and supporters. See 3 Tr. 177–179, 181–182 (describing methods, such as simply driving through neighborhoods, that staff members and candidates for office used to develop block-specific information regarding the likely political affiliation of voters).[16]

In addition, although information about political affiliation was not available at the block level through the computer program, legislators and staffers were able to get relatively precise information about voter preferences through a system, developed by the Democratic Party, that allowed candidates to determine in which party primary voters had participated. Id., at 179–180. By examining this information, legislators were able to further fine-tune district lines to include likely supporters and exclude those who would probably 1018 support their opponents. Cf. Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 753, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 2331, 37 L.Ed.2d 298 (1973) ("[W]hen [political profiles are] overlaid on a census map, it requires no special genius to recognize the political consequences of drawing a district line along one street rather than another").[17]

The careful gerrymandering conducted by the Texas Legislature under the watchful eye of Johnson and her staff was a success not *1982 only on a districtwide level (Johnson was elected with over 70% of the vote in both 1992 and 1994), but on a precinct level. While the pre–1990 precincts in the heavily Republican North Dallas gave little reason for a Democratic incumbent to hope for much support, see State's Exh. 9B (maps of Dallas and Collin Counties with 1990 election index results showing only a few Democrat-leaning precincts in North Dallas), the gerrymandering that occurred in 1991 resulted in smaller precincts that, by all indications, gathered concentrations of Democratic voters into District 30 while leaving concentrations of Republican voters in surrounding Districts 3 and 26. See State's Exh. 9A (maps of Dallas and Collin Counties with 1992 election index results showing many more Democrat-leaning precincts in the North Dallas sections of District 30).

Presumably relying on Shaw I 's statement that "a reapportionment plan may be so highly irregular that, on its face, it rationally cannot be understood as anything other than an effort to 'segregat[e] ... voters' on the basis of race," 1019 509 U.S., at 646–647, 113 S.Ct., at 2826, the plurality offers mathematical proof that District 30 is one of the most bizarre districts in the Nation, see ante, at 1952, and relates the now-obligatory florid description of the district's shape, ante, at 1954–1955; see also ante, at 1958–1959 (describing District 29). As the maps appended to this opinion demonstrate, neither District 30 nor the Houston districts have a monopoly on either of these characteristics. Three other majority-white districts are ranked along with the majority-minority districts as among the oddest in the Nation. See Pildes & Niemi, Expressive Harms, "Bizarre Districts," and Voting Rights: Evaluating Election–District Appearances After Shaw v. Reno, 92 Mich. L.Rev. 483, 565 (1993). Perhaps the clearest example of partisan gerrymandering outside of the context of majority-minority districts is District 6, a majority-Anglo district represented by a Republican.[18]

1020 For every geographic atrocity committed by District 30, District 6 commits its own and more. District 30 split precincts to gerrymander Democratic voters out of Republican precincts; District 6 did the same. See State's Exh. 9B (Tarrant County, showing District 6 cuts). District 30 travels down a riverbed; District 6 follows the boundaries of a lake. District 30 combines various unrelated communities of interest within Dallas and its suburbs; District 6 combines rural, urban, and suburban communities. District 30 sends tentacles nearly 20 miles out from its core; District 6 is a tentacle, hundreds of miles long (as the candidate walks), and it has no core.

The existence of the equally bizarre majority-white District 6 makes the plurality's discussion *1983 of District 30's odd shape largely irrelevant. If anything, the similarities between Districts 6 and 30 suggest that it is more likely than not that the incumbency considerations that led to the mutation of District 6 were the same considerations that forced District 30 to twist and turn its way through North Dallas.[19]

1021 The political, rather than the racial, nature of District 30's gerrymander is even more starkly highlighted by comparing it with the districts struck down in Shaw II and Miller. District 30's black population is, for instance, far more concentrated than the minority population in North Carolina's District 12. And in Miller, the Court made it clear that the odd shape of Georgia's Eleventh District was the result of a conscious effort to increase its proportion of minority populations: It was, the Court found, " 'exceedingly obvious' from the shape of the Eleventh District, together with the racial demographics, that the drawing of narrow land bridges to incorporate within the district outlying appendages containing nearly 80% of the district's total black population was a deliberate attempt to bring black populations into the district." Miller, 515 U.S., at 917, 115 S.Ct., at 2489 (emphasis added; citation omitted).

District 30 is the precise demographic converse of the district struck down in Miller. District 30, for example, has a compact core in South Dallas which contains 50% of the district population and nearly 70% of the district's total black population. Cf. ibid. Unlike the appendages to Georgia's District 11, the tentacles stretching north and west 1022 from District 30 add progressively less in the way of population, and, more important for purposes of this inquiry, they actually reduce the proportional share of minorities in the district. See State's Exh. 33.

For example: The worst offender, in the trained eye of the Court, may be the northern arm of the district that winds around the Park Cities and then up into Collin County. But that arm, which contains 22% of the population, is only 21% black, ibid.—a proportion essentially identical to the proportion of African–Americans in Dallas County as a whole.[20]

The plurality is certainly correct in pointing out that District 30's outlying reaches encompass some communities with high concentrations of minorities.[21] It is implausible *1984 1023 to suggest, however, that an effort to "segregate" voters drove District 30 to collect those populations. After all, even the District Court noted that African–American voters immediately adjacent to the core of District 30 were intentionally excluded from the district "in order to protect incumbents." 861 F.Supp., at 1339 (emphasis added). Forced into Republican territory to collect Democratic votes, the district intentionally picked up some minority communities (though far more majority-white communities). If it had not, the goal of creating a majority-black district would have been sacrificed to incumbency protection (the very sort of "predominance" of race over race-neutral factors that the plurality discredits). But unlike Georgia's District 11 and North Carolina's District 12, the reason that the district was there in the first place was not to collect minority communities, but to collect population—preferably Democrats. It would, therefore, be fanciful to assert that the "several appendages" to District 30 were "drawn for the obvious," let alone the predominant, "purpose of putting black populations into the district." Miller, 515 U.S., at 910, 115 S.Ct., at 2485.[22]

In sum, a fair analysis of the shape of District 30, like the equally bizarre shape of District 6, belies the notion that its shape was determined by racial considerations.

1024 Intent

Perhaps conscious that noncompact congressional districts are the rule rather than the exception in Texas, the plurality suggests, ante, at 1952–1953, 1956–1957, that the real key is the direct evidence, particularly in the form of Texas' § 5 Voting Rights Act submissions and the person of then-State Senator Johnson, that the State expressed an intent to create these districts with a given "minimum percentage of the favored minority." 861 F.Supp., at 1309. Even if it were appropriate to rest this test of dominance on an examination of the subjective motivation of individual legislators,[23] or on 1025 testimony *1985 given in a legal proceeding designed to prove a conflicting conclusion,[24] this information does little more than confirm that the State believed it necessary to comply with the Voting Rights Act. Given its reasonable understanding of its legal responsibilities, see supra, at 1976, the legislature acted to ensure that its goal of creating a majority-black district in Dallas County was not undermined by the changes made to accommodate District 30 to other, race-neutral districting principles. As the plurality admits, see ante, at 1951, the intent to create majority-minority districts does not in itself trigger strict scrutiny; these admissions prove nothing more than that. See also Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 930–932, 116 S.Ct., at 1912–1914 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

Nonracial Factors: Community

In an effort to provide a definitive explanation for the odd shape of the district, the State emphasized two factors: The 1026 presence of communities of interest tying together the populations of the district, and the role of incumbency protection. The District Court and the plurality improperly dismissed these considerations as ultimately irrelevant to the shape of the districts.

First, the appellants presented testimony that the districts were drawn to align with certain communities of interest, such as land use, family demographics, and transportation corridors. See 861 F.Supp., at 1322–1323. Although the District Court recognized that these community characteristics amounted to accurate descriptions of District 30, id., at 1323, it dismissed them as irrelevant to the districting process, concluding that there was no evidence that "the Legislature had these particular 'communities of interest' in mind when drawing the boundaries of District 30." Ibid. The plurality concludes that appellants present no reason to displace that conclusion. Ante, at 1955.

I do not understand why we should require such evidence ever to exist. It is entirely reasonable for the legislature to rely on the experience of its members when drawing particular boundaries rather than on clearly identifiable "evidence" presented by demographers and political scientists. Most of these representatives have been members of their communities for years. Unless the Court intends to interfere in state political processes even more than it has already expressed an intent to do, I presume that it does not intend to require States to create a *1986 comprehensive administrative record in support of their redistricting process. State legislators should be able to rely on their own experience, not only prepared reports. To the extent that the presence of obvious communities of interest among members of a district explicitly or implicitly guided the shape of District 30, it amounts to an entirely legitimate nonracial consideration.[25]

1027 Nonracial Factors: Incumbency

The plurality admits that the appellants "present a ... substantial case for their claim that incumbency protection rivaled race in determining the district's shape." Ante, at 1955. Every individual who participated in the redistricting process knew that incumbency protection was a critical factor in producing the bizarre lines and, as the plurality points out, ante, at 1954, even the District Court recognized that this nearly exclusive focus on the creation of "safe" districts for incumbents was intimately related to the bizarre shape of district lines throughout the State.

> "[I]n Texas in 1991, many incumbent protection boundaries sabotaged traditional redistricting principles as they routinely divided counties, cities, neighborhoods, and regions. For the sake of maintaining or winning seats in the House of Representatives, Congressmen or would-be Congressmen shed hostile groups and potential opponents by fencing them out of their districts. The Legislature obligingly carved out districts of apparent supporters of incumbents, ... and then added appendages to connect their residences to those districts. The final result seems not one in which the people select their representatives, but in which the representatives 1028 have selected the people." 861 F.Supp., at 1334 (citations and footnotes omitted).

See also id., at 1335, n. 43. Despite this overwhelming evidence that incumbency protection was the critical motivating factor in the creation of the bizarre Texas districts, the District Court reached the stunning conclusion that because the process was so "different in degree" from the "generalized, and legitimate, goal of incumbent and seniority protection" that this Court has previously recognized, it could not serve as a legitimate explanation for the bizarre boundaries of the congressional districts. Id., at 1334–1335. In dismissing incumbency protection once and for all, the District Court stated that "[i]ncumbent protection is a valid state interest only to the extent that it is not a pretext for unconstitutional racial gerrymandering." Id., at 1336.

It is difficult to know where to begin to attack the misperceptions reflected in these conclusions,[26] and the plurality's failure to do so seriously taints its evaluation of the relative importance of nonracial considerations in the creation of District 30. The initial problem, of course, is that under the Court's threshold test as set forth in Miller, one must consider the role of incumbency protection before determining whether there is an "unconstitutional racial gerrymander." And because the ultimate focus in these gerrymandering cases is the claim that race was the "dominant and controlling rationale in drawing [the] district lines," 515 U.S., at 913, 115 S.Ct., at 2486, a court must, in applying *1987 that test, consider a State's claim that a given race-neutral rationale controlled the creation of those lines. See id., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488 ("Where [compactness, contiguity,] or other race-neutral considerations are the basis for redistricting legislation, and are not subordinated to race, a State can 'defeat a claim that a district has been 1029 gerrymandered on racial lines' "). Although a court may not like the State's explanation, that is no excuse for ignoring it.

If some independent bar prevented the use of that race-neutral criterion, then the District Court might be in a position to object to the State's use of it. We have, however, affirmed that a State has an interest in incumbency protection, see, e.g., ante, at 1954 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.); White v. Weiser, 412 U.S. 783, 791, 797, 93 S.Ct. 2348, 2352–2353, 2355–2356, 37 L.Ed.2d 335 (1973), and also assured States that the Constitution does not require compactness, contiguity, or respect for political borders, see Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2826–2827. While egregious political gerrymandering may not be particularly praiseworthy, see infra, at 1991–1992, it may nonetheless provide the race-neutral explanation necessary for a State to avoid strict scrutiny of the district lines where gerrymandering is the "dominant and controlling" explanation for the odd district shapes.[27]

The District Court's error had an apparently dispositive effect on its assessment of whether strict scrutiny should apply at all. Although aspects of our dispute with the plurality are "largely factual," ante, at 1957, n., they arise not out of our disagreement with the District Court's credibility assessments, but out of that court's erroneous conclusion that the State's overwhelming reliance on this race-neutral factor was illegitimate and irrelevant to its evaluation of the factors involved in the shifting of this district's lines. A fair evaluation of the record made in light of appropriate legal standards requires a conclusion very different from the District Court's. By following the District Court down its misdirected path, the plurality itself goes astray.

1030 Race as a Proxy

Faced with all this evidence that politics, not race, was the predominant factor shaping the district lines, the plurality ultimately makes little effort to contradict appellants' assertions that incumbency protection was far more important in the placement of District 30's lines than race. See ante, at 1956. Instead, it adopts a fallback position based on an argument far removed from even the "analytically distinct" claim set forth in Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 652, 113 S.Ct., at 2829–2830. In it, the plurality suggests that even if the predominant reason for the bizarre features of the majority-minority districts was incumbency protection, the State impermissibly used race as a proxy for determining the likely political affiliation of blocks of voters. See ante, at 1956–1957 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.).

The effect of this process, in all likelihood, was relatively unimportant to the overall shape of the district. A comparison of the 1992 precinct results with a depiction of the proportion of black population in each census block reveals that Democratic-leaning precincts cover a far greater area than majority-black census blocks. Compare State's Exh. 9A with State's Exh. 45. One would expect the opposite effect if the single-minded goal of those drawing the districts was racial composition rather than political affiliation. At the very least, the maps suggest that the drawing of boundaries involves a demographic calculus far more complex than simple racial stereotyping.

Furthermore, to the extent that race served as a proxy at all, it did so merely as a means of "fine tuning" borders that were already in particular locations for primarily political reasons. This "fine tuning" through the use of race is, of course, little different from the kind of fine tuning that could have legitimately occurred around the edges of a 1988 compact majority-minority district.[28] I perceive no reason why a *1031 legitimate process—choosing minority voters for inclusion in a majority-minority district—should become suspect once nonracial considerations force district lines away from its core.

Finally, I note that in most contexts racial classifications are invidious because they are irrational. For example, it is irrational to assume that a person is not qualified to vote or to serve as a juror simply because she has brown hair or brown skin. It is neither irrational, nor invidious, however, to assume that a black resident of a particular community is a Democrat if reliable statistical evidence discloses that 97% of the blacks in that community vote in Democratic primary elections. See Brief for United States 44. For that reason, the fact that the architects of the Texas plan sometimes appear to have used racial data as a proxy for making political judgments seems to me to be no more "unjustified," ante, at 1956 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.), and to have no more constitutional significance, than an assumption that wealthy suburbanites, whether black or white, are more likely to be Republicans *1032 than Communists.[29] Requiring the State to ignore the association between race and party affiliation would be no more logical, and potentially as harmful, as it would be to prohibit the Public Health Service from targeting African–American communities in an effort to increase awareness regarding sickle-cell anemia.[30]

Despite all the efforts by the plurality and the District Court, then, the evidence demonstrates that race was not, in all likelihood, the "predominant" goal leading to the creation of District 30. The most reasonable interpretation of the record evidence instead demonstrates that political considerations were. In accord with the presumption against interference with a legislature's consideration of complex and competing factors, see n. 9, supra, I would conclude that the configuration of District 30 does not require strict scrutiny.

1989 *1033 V

The Houston districts present a closer question on the application of strict scrutiny. There is evidence that many of the same race-neutral factors motivating the zigzags of District 30 were present at the creation (or recreation) of Districts 29 and 18. In contrast to District 30, however, there is also evidence that the interlocking shapes of the Houston districts were specifically, and almost exclusively, the result of an effort to create, out of largely integrated communities, both a majority-black and a majority-Hispanic district. For purposes of this opinion, then, I am willing to accept, arguendo, the plurality's conclusion that the Houston districts should be examined with strict scrutiny.[31] Even so, the plurality errs by concluding that these districts would fail that test.

The plurality begins with the perfectly obvious assumptions that a State has a compelling interest in complying with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act and that Texas had a strong basis for believing that it would have violated that Act in 1991 if it did not create three new majority-minority districts.[32] The plurality goes on to conclude, however, that because the final shape of these districts is not coextensive with the community that would form the core of a § 2 violation, these districts would not be "narrowly tailored" to further that state interest. Ante, at 1961. I respectfully disagree.

Neither evidence nor insinuation suggests that the State in the redistricting process considered race for any reason *1034 other than as a means of accomplishing its compelling interest of creating majority-minority districts in accord with the Voting Rights Act. The goal was, by all accounts, achieved, for these districts would certainly avoid liability under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act.[33] For reasons that continue to escape me, however, the plurality simply insists that the lack of compactness in the districts prevents them from being "narrowly tailored" solutions to the State's interests.

The plurality uses two premises to reach its conclusion that compactness is required to meet the "narrow tailoring" requirement: (i) § 2 would not have been violated unless a reasonably compact majority-minority district could have been created; and (ii) nothing in § 2 requires the creation of a noncompact district. I have no quarrel with either proposition, but each falls far short of mandating the conclusion that the plurality draws from it. While a State can be liable for a § 2 violation only if it could have drawn a compact district and failed to do so, it does not follow that creating such a district is the only way to avoid a § 2 violation. See generally Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 946–950, 116 S.Ct., at 1920–1922 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). The plurality admits that a State retains "a limited degree of leeway" in drawing a district to alleviate fears of § 2 liability, ante, at 1960, but if there is no independent constitutional duty to create compact districts in the first place, and the plurality suggests none, there is no reason why noncompact districts should not be a permissible method of avoiding violations of law. The fact that they might be unacceptable judicial remedies does not speak to the question whether they 1035 may be acceptable when adopted by a state legislature. Because these districts satisfy the State's compelling interest and do so in a manner that uses racial considerations only in a way reasonably designed to ensure such *1990 a satisfaction, I conclude that the districts are narrowly tailored.

VI

I cannot profess to know how the Court's developing jurisprudence of racial gerrymandering will alter the political and racial landscape in this Nation—although it certainly will alter that landscape. As the Court's law in this area has developed, it has become ever more apparent to me that the Court's approach to these cases creates certain perverse incentives and (I presume) unanticipated effects that serve to highlight the essentially unknown territory into which it strides. Because I believe that the social and political risks created by the Court's decisions are not required by the Constitution, my first choice would be to avoid the preceding analysis altogether, and leave these considerations to the political branches of our Government.

The first unintended outcome of the legal reasoning in Shaw II and this case is the very result that those decisions seek to avoid: the predominance of race in the districting process, over all other principles of importance. Given the Court's unwillingness to recognize the role that race-neutral districting principles played in the creation of the bizarrely shaped districts in both this case and Shaw II, it now seems clear that the only way that a State can both create a majority-minority district and avoid a racial gerrymander is by drawing, "without much conscious thought," ante, at 1955 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.), and within the "limited degree of leeway" granted by the Court, ante, at 1960, the precise compact district that a court would impose in a successful § 2 challenge. See post, at 2008 (SOUTER, J., dissenting). After the Court's decisions today, therefore, minority voters can make up a majority only in compact districts, whether 1036 intentionally or accidentally drawn, while white voters can be placed into districts as bizarre as the State desires.

The great irony, of course, is that by requiring the State to place the majority-minority district in a particular place and with a particular shape, the district may stand out as a stark, placid island in a sea of oddly shaped majority-white neighbors. See Karlan, Still Hazy After All These Years: Voting Rights in the Post-Shaw Era, 26 Cumberland L.Rev. 287, 309 (1995–1996). The inviolable sanctity of the § 2–eligible districts will signal in a manner more blatant than the most egregious of these racial gerrymanders that "a minority community sits here: Interfere with it not." The Court-imposed barriers limiting the shape of the district will interfere more directly with the ability of minority voters to participate in the political process than did the oddly shaped districts that the Court has struck down in recent cases. Unaffected by the new racial jurisprudence, majority-white communities will be able to participate in the districting process by requesting that they be placed into certain districts, divided between districts in an effort to maximize representation, or grouped with more distant communities that might nonetheless match their interests better than communities next door. By contrast, none of this political maneuvering will be permissible for majority-minority districts, thereby segregating and balkanizing them far more effectively than the districts at issue here, in which they were manipulated in the political process as easily as white voters. This result, it seems to me, involves "discrimination" in a far more concrete manner than did the odd shapes that so offended the Court's sensibilities in Miller, Shaw II, and these cases.

In light of this Court's recent work extolling the importance of state sovereignty in our federal scheme, cf. Seminole Tribe of Fla. v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44, 116 S.Ct. 1114, 134 L.Ed.2d 252 (1996), I would have expected the Court's sensibilities to steer a course rather more deferential to the States than the one that it charts with its 1037 decisions today. As we have previously noted, "[e]lectoral districting is a most difficult subject for legislatures, and so the States must have discretion to exercise the political judgment necessary to balance competing interests." Miller, 515 U.S., at 915, 115 S.Ct., at 2488; see also post, at 1998–1999 (SOUTER, J., dissenting). The record in these cases evidences the "complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus," 515

U.S., at 915–916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488, and 1991 the Court's failure to respect those forces demonstrates even less respect for the legislative process than I would have expected after the decision in Miller.

The results are not inconsequential. After Miller and today's decisions, States may find it extremely difficult to avoid litigation flowing from decennial redistricting. On one hand, States will risk violating the Voting Rights Act if they fail to create majority-minority districts. If they create those districts, however, they may open themselves to liability under Shaw and its progeny. See Miller, 515 U.S., at 949, 115 S.Ct., at 2507 (GINSBURG,, JJ., dissenting). Perhaps States will simply avoid the problem by abandoning voluntary compliance with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act altogether. See Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 672, 113 S.Ct., at 2841 (White, J., dissenting); post, at 2006–2007 (SOUTER, J., dissenting).[34] This result would not necessarily bring peace to redistricting, for there is no guarantee that districts created by court order to comply with § 2 will be immune from attack under Shaw; in both Florida and Illinois, for instance, that very sort of schizophrenic second-guessing has already occurred. See *1038 King v. State Bd. of Elections, No. 95–C–827, 1996 WL 130439 (N.D.Ill., Mar. 15, 1996); Johnson v. Mortham, 926 F.Supp. 1460 (N.D.Fla.1996). Given the difficulty of reconciling these competing legal responsibilities, the political realities of redistricting, and the cost of ongoing litigation, some States may simply step out of the redistricting business altogether, citing either frustration or hopes of getting a federal court to resolve the issues definitively in a single proceeding. See, e.g., Johnson v. Miller, 922 F.Supp. 1556, 1559 (S.D.Ga.1995) (after remand from Miller, Georgia Legislature abdicated its redistricting responsibilities to Federal District Court); post, at 2007 (SOUTER, J., dissenting) (noting the likely "vacuum of responsibility" at the state level).

Regardless of the route taken by the States, the Court has guaranteed that federal courts will have a hand—and perhaps the only hand—in the "abrasive task of drawing district lines." Wells v. Rockefeller, 394 U.S. 542, 553, 89 S.Ct. 1241, 1241, 22 L.Ed.2d 519 (1969) (WHITE, J., dissenting). Given the uniquely political nature of the redistricting process, I fear the impact this new role will have on the public's perception of the impartiality of the Federal Judiciary. I can only reiterate the Court's cautionary admonition, issued over two decades ago, that "[i]n fashioning a reapportionment plan or in choosing among plans, a district court should not pre-empt the legislative task nor 'intrude upon state policy any more than necessary.' " White v. Weiser, 412 U.S., at 795, 93 S.Ct., at 2355 (citing Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 160, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 1878, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971)).

I do not wish to leave the impression that decisions of the Court from Shaw I to the present are focusing on entirely nonexistent problems. I merely believe that the Court has entirely misapprehended the nature of the harm that flows from this sort of gerrymandering. Rather than attach blameworthiness to a decision by the majority to share political power with the victims of past discriminatory practices, the Court's real concern should be with the more significant harms that flow from legislative decisions that "serve no *1039 purpose other than to favor one segment —whether racial, ethnic, religious, economic, or political— that may occupy a position of strength at a particular point in time, or to disadvantage a politically weak segment of the community." Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 748, 103 S.Ct. 2653, 2668–2669, 77 L.Ed.2d 133 (1983) (STEVENS, J., concurring). These cases are as good an illustration of such self-serving behavior on the part of legislators as any —but not with respect to racial gerrymandering. 1992 The real problem is the politically motivated gerrymandering that occurred in Texas. Many of the oddest twists and turns of the Texas districts would never have been created if the legislature had not been so intent on protecting party and incumbents. See also Shaw II, ante, at 937–938, 116 S.Ct. at 1916–1917 (STEVENS, JJ., dissenting) (noting the same influences behind the bizarre shape of North Carolina's District 12).

By minimizing the critical role that political motives played in the creation of these districts, I fear that the Court may inadvertently encourage this more objectionable use of power in the redistricting process.[35] Legislatures and elected representatives have a responsibility to behave in a way that incorporates the "elements of legitimacy and neutrality that must always characterize the performance of the sovereign's duty to govern impartially." Cleburne, 473 U.S., at 452, 105 S.Ct., at 3261. That responsibility is not discharged when legislatures permit and even encourage incumbents to use their positions as public servants to protect themselves and their parties rather than the interests of their constituents. See Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S., at 748, 754, 103 S.Ct., at 2668, 2672 (STEVENS, J., concurring). If any lines in Texas are worth straightening, *1040 it is those that were twisted to exclude, not those altered to include.[36]

VII

The history of race relations in Texas and throughout the South demonstrates overt evidence of discriminatory voting practices lasting through the 1970's. Brischetto, Richards, Davidson, & Grofman, Texas, in Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act, 1965–1990, pp. 233–248 (C. Davidson & B. Grofman eds.1994). Even in recent years, Texans have elected only two black candidates to statewide office; majority-white Texas districts have never elected a minority to either the State Senate or the United States Congress. Brief for Appellants in No. 94–806, p. 53. One recent study suggests that majority-white districts throughout the South remain suspiciously unlikely 1041 to elect black representatives. Davidson & Grofman, The Effect of Municipal Election Structure on Black Representation in Eight Southern States, in Quiet Revolution in the South, at 344. And nationwide, fewer than 15 of the hundreds of legislators that have passed through Congress since 1950 have been black legislators elected from majority-white districts.[37] In 1994, for example, *1993 36 of the Nation's 39 black Representatives were elected from majority-minority districts, while only 3 were elected from majority-white districts.[38] See post, at 2000–2001 (SOUTER, J., dissenting).

Perhaps the state of race relations in Texas and, for that matter, the Nation, is more optimistic than might be expected in light of these facts. If so, it may be that the plurality's exercise in redistricting will be successful. Perhaps minority candidates, forced to run in majority-white districts, will be able to overcome the long history of stereotyping and discrimination that has heretofore led the vast majority of majority-white districts to reject minority candidacies. Perhaps not. I am certain only that bodies of elected federal and state officials are in a far better position than anyone on this Court to assess whether the Nation's long history of discrimination has been overcome, and that nothing in the Constitution requires this unnecessary intrusion into the ability of States to negotiate solutions to political differences while providing long-excluded groups the opportunity to participate effectively in the democratic process. I respectfully dissent.

*1994 APPENDIX A TO OPINION OF STEVENS, J.

*1995 APPENDIX B TO OPINION OF STEVENS, J.

*1996 APPENDIX C TO OPINION OF STEVENS, J.

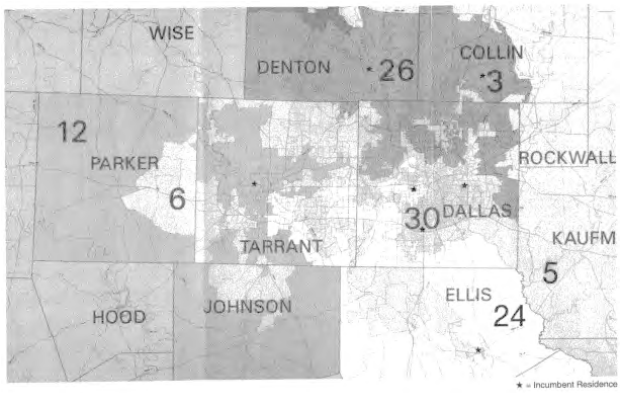
1997 APPENDIX D TO OPINION OF STEVENS, J.



*1045 Justice SOUTER, with whom Justice GINSBURG and Justice BREYER join, dissenting.

When the Court devises a new cause of action to enforce a constitutional provision, it ought to identify an injury distinguishable from the consequences of concededly constitutional conduct, and it should describe the elements necessary and sufficient to make out such a claim. Nothing less can give 1998 notice to those whose conduct may give rise to liability or provide standards for courts charged with enforcing the Constitution. Those principles of justification, fair notice, and guidance have never been satisfied in the instance of the action announced three Terms ago in Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (Shaw I), when a majority of this Court decided that a State violates the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause by excessive consideration of race in drawing the boundaries of voting districts, even when the resulting plan does not dilute the voting strength of any voters and so would not otherwise give rise to liability under the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendments, or under the Voting Rights Act.

Far from addressing any injury to members of a class subjected to differential treatment, the standard presupposition of an equal protection violation, Shaw I addressed a putative harm subject to complaint by any voter objecting to an untoward consideration of race in the political process. Although the Court has repeatedly disclaimed any intent to go as far as to outlaw all conscious consideration of race in districting, after three rounds of appellate litigation seeking to describe the elements and define the contours of the Shaw cause of action, a helpful statement of a Shaw claim still eludes this Court. This is so for reasons that go to the conceptual bone.

The result of this failure to provide a practical standard for distinguishing between the lawful and unlawful use of race has not only been inevitable confusion in statehouses and courthouses, but a consequent shift in responsibility for *1046 setting district boundaries from the state legislatures, which are invested with front-line authority by Article I of the Constitution, to the courts, and truly to this Court, which is left to superintend the drawing of every legislative district in the land.

Today's opinions do little to solve Shaw 's puzzles or return districting responsibility to the States. To say this is not to denigrate the importance of Justice O'CONNOR's position in her separate opinion, ante, at 1968–1969, that compliance with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act is a compelling state interest; her statement takes a very significant step toward alleviating apprehension that Shaw is at odds with the Voting Rights Act. It is still true, however, that the combined plurality, minority, and Court opinions do not ultimately leave the law dealing with a Shaw claim appreciably clearer or more manageable than Shaw I itself did. And to the extent that some clarity follows from the knowledge that race may be considered when reasonably necessary to conform to the Voting Rights Act, today's opinions raise the specter that this ostensible progress may come with a heavy constitutional price. The price of Shaw I, indeed, may turn out to be the practical elimination of a State's discretion to apply traditional districting principles, widely accepted in States without racial districting issues as well as in States confronting them.

As the flaws of Shaw I persist, and as the burdens placed on the States and the courts by Shaw litigation loom larger with the approach of a new census and a new round of redistricting, the Court has to recognize that Shaw 's problems result from a basic misconception about the relation between race and districting principles, a mistake that no amount of case-by-case tinkering can eliminate. There is, therefore, no reason for confidence that the Court will eventually bring much order out of the confusion created by Shaw I, and because it has not, in any case, done so yet, I respectfully dissent.

1047 I

As its text indicates and our cases have necessarily and repeatedly recognized,[1] Article I of the Constitution places responsibility for drawing voting districts on the States in the first instance. See Art. I, § 2, cl. 1 *1999 ("The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature"); Art. I, § 4, cl. 1 ("The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations"). The Court has nonetheless recognized limits on state districting autonomy when it could discern a strong constitutional justification and a reasonably definite standard for doing so, as, for example, in announcing the numerical requirement of one person, one vote, see Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964).[2] But the Court has never ignored the 1048 Constitution's commitment of districting responsibility to the political branches of the States and has accordingly assumed over the years that traditional districting principles widely accepted among States represented an informal baseline of acceptable districting practices. We have thus accorded substantial respect to such traditional principles (as those, for example, meant to preserve the integrity of neighborhood communities, to protect incumbents, to follow existing political boundaries, to recognize communities of interest, and to achieve compactness and contiguity); we have seen these objectives as entirely consistent with the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments' demands. See, e.g., id., at 578, 84 S.Ct., at 1390 ("A State may legitimately desire to maintain the integrity of various political subdivisions, insofar as possible, and provide for compact districts of contiguous territory in designing a legislative apportionment scheme"); White v. Weiser, 412 U.S. 783, 797, 93 S.Ct. 2348, 2355, 37 L.Ed.2d 335 (1973) ("[T]he District Court did not suggest or hold that the legislative policy of districting so as to preserve the constituencies of congressional incumbents was unconstitutional or even undesirable"); Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 156, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1157, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993) ("Because the States ... derive their reapportionment authority ... from independent provisions of state and federal law, the federal courts are bound to respect the States' apportionment choices unless those choices contravene federal requirements") (internal quotation marks omitted; citation omitted).

The fundamental tenet underlying most of these constitutionally unobjectionable principles (respect for communities of interest or neighborhoods, say) is that voting is more than 1049 an atomistic exercise.[3] Although it is the law of the Constitution that representatives *2000 represent people, not places or things or particular interests, Reynolds, supra, at 562, 84 S.Ct., at 1381, the notion of representative democracy within the federalist framework presumes that States may group individual voters together in a way that will let them choose a representative not only acceptable to individuals but ready to represent widely shared interests within a district. Aleinikoff & Issacharoff, Race and Redistricting: Drawing Constitutional Lines After Shaw v. Reno, 92 Mich. L.Rev. 588, 601 (1993) ("It is only as collective partisans of the same political preference—whether that preference is defined by party or race or any other measure—that voters can assert their right to meaningful participation in the political process"). Hence, in respecting the States' implementation of their own, traditional districting criteria, the Court has recognized the basically associational character of voting rights in a representative democracy.

1050 A

Accordingly, before Shaw I, the Court required evidence of substantial harm to an identifiable group of voters to justify any judicial displacement of these traditional districting principles. Such evidence existed in Reynolds v.

Sims, supra, when the disparate weighting of votes was held unconstitutional, and it was present again when the Court recognized the unconstitutional consequences of vote dilution, see Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971); White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973). In the one case, the harm was mathematically identifiable; in the other, the arithmetic provided powerful circumstantial evidence of the impossibility of political success for the chosen candidate of a racial and numerical minority in an area with pervasive racial-bloc voting. In both cases, the complainants were from an easily identified group of voters; and even in cases of racial vote-dilution claims, which were conceptually more difficult to state than the principle of one person, one vote, there were readily recognized examples of the harm in question. Indeed, even when one acknowledged that voters would be served by a representative not of their own race and that the Constitution guaranteed no right to pick a winner, see Whitcomb, supra, at 153–155, 91 S.Ct., at 1873–1875, it was impossible to see mere happenstance in the facts that the American voting-age population was 10.5% black, but the Congress that assembled in 1981 had only 17 black representatives out of 435 and no black senator. Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1982–83, p. 490 (103d ed. 1982) (Table 802); Black Americans: A Statistical Sourcebook 142 (L. Hornor ed. 1995) (Table 4.02); see also Parker, The Damaging Consequences of the Rehnquist Court's Commitment to Color–Blindness Versus Racial Justice, 45 Am. U.L.Rev. 763, 770–771 (1996) (observing that "[p]rior to the latest round of redistricting after the 1990 Census, ... [b]lacks, who constitute 11.1% of the nation's voting age population, made up only 4.9% of the members of Congress"). The conclusion was inescapable that what we 1051 know of as intentional vote dilution accounted for this astonishing fact,[4] just as it is equally inescapable that remedies *2001 for vote dilution (and hedges against its reappearance) in the form of majority-minority districts account for the fact that the 104th Congress showed an increase of 39 black members over the 1981 total. Minorities in Congress, 52 Cong. Q., Supplement to No. 44, p. 10 (Nov. 12, 1994); see also Parker, supra, at 771 (noting "a fifty percent increase in the number of black members of Congress").[5]

1052 Before Shaw I, we not only thus limited judicial interference with state districting efforts to cases of readily demonstrable harm to an identifiable class of voters, but we also confined our concern with districting to cases in which we were capable of providing a manageable standard for courts to apply and for legislators to follow. Within two years of holding in Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962), that malapportionment was a justiciable issue, "the Court recognized that its general equal protection jurisprudence was insufficient for the task and announced an increasingly rigid, simple to apply, voting-specific mandate of equipopulousity." Karlan, Still Hazy After All These Years: Voting Rights in the Post-Shaw Era, 26 Cumberland L.Rev. 287, 299 (1996) (hereinafter Karlan, Post-Shaw Era). Likewise, although it is quite true that the common definition of a racial vote-dilution injury ("less opportunity ... to participate in the political process and to elect representatives ...," 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b)) is no model of concrete description, the Court has identified categories of readily comprehensible evidence bearing on the likelihood of such an injury, including facts about size of minority population, quantifiable indications of political cohesiveness and bloc voting, historical patterns of 1053 success or failure of favored candidates, and so on. See, e.g., Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986); White v. Regester, 412 U.S., at 766–770, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–2341. The particularity of this evidence goes far to separate victims of political "inequality" from those who just happened to support losing candidates.

B

Shaw I, however, broke abruptly with these standards, including the very understanding of equal protection as a practical guarantee against harm to some class singled out for disparate treatment. Whereas malapportionment measurably reduces the influence of voters in more populous districts, and vote dilution predestines members of a racial minority to perpetual frustration as political losers, what Shaw I spoke of as harm is not confined to any identifiable class singled out for disadvantage. See *2002 Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S., at 923–925, 928, 116 S.Ct., at 1909–1910, 1911–1912 (Shaw II) (sTEVENS, J., dissenting) (noting the absence of a customary disadvantaged class and describing the Shaw I cause of action as a substantive due process, rather than an equal protection, claim). If, indeed, what Shaw I calls harm is identifiable at all in a practical sense, it would seem to play no favorites, but to fall on every citizen and every representative alike. The Court in Shaw I explained this conception of injury by saying that the forbidden use of race "reinforces the perception that members of the same racial group ... think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls," and that it leads elected officials "to believe that their primary obligation is to represent only the members of that group, rather than their constituency as a whole." Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 647–648, 113 S.Ct., at 2827. This injury is probably best understood as an "expressive harm," that is, one that "results from the idea or attitudes expressed through a governmental action, rather than from the more tangible or material consequences the action brings about." Pildes & Niemi, 1054 Expressive Harms, "Bizarre Districts," and Voting Rights: Evaluating Election–District Appearances after Shaw v. Reno, 92 Mich. L.Rev. 483, 506–507 (1993); see also id., at 493 ("The theory of voting rights [that Shaw I] endorses centers on the perceived legitimacy of structures of political representation, rather than on the distribution of actual political power between racial or political groups"). To the extent that racial considerations do express such notions, their shadows fall on majorities as well as minorities, whites as well as blacks, the politically dominant as well as the politically impotent. Thus, as an injury supposed to be barred by the Equal Protection Clause, this subject of the "analytically distinct" cause of action created by Shaw I, supra, at 652, 113 S.Ct., at 2830, bears virtually no resemblance to the only types of claims for gerrymandering we had deemed actionable following Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986), those involving districting decisions that removed an identifiable class of disfavored voters from effective political participation. See, e.g., Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960); Thornburg v. Gingles, supra.[6]

Just as the logic of traditional equal protection analysis is at odds with Shaw 's concept of injury, so the Court's rhetoric of racially motivated injury is inapposite to describe the consideration of race that it thinks unreasonable. Although the Court used the metaphor of "political apartheid" as if to refer to the segregation of a minority group to eliminate its association with a majority that opposed integration, Shaw I, supra, at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2827, talk of this sort of racial separation is not on point here. The de jure segregation that the term "political 1055 apartheid" brings to mind is unconstitutional because it emphatically implies the inferiority of one race. See Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 494, 74 S.Ct. 686, 691, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954) ("To separate [minority children] from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community"). Shaw I, in contrast, vindicated the complaint of a white voter who objected not to segregation but to the particular racial proportions of the district. See Karlan, Our Separatism? Voting Rights as an American Nationalities Policy, 1995 U. Chi. Legal Forum 83, 94 (hereinafter Karlan, Our Separatism) (noting the irony of using the term "apartheid" to describe what are "among the most integrated districts in the country"). Whatever this district may have symbolized, it was not "apartheid." Nor did the proportion of its racial mixture reflect any purpose of racial subjugation, the district in question having been created in an *2003 effort to give a racial minority the same opportunity to achieve a measure of political power that voters in general, and white voters and members of ethnic minorities in particular, have enjoyed as a matter of course. In light of a majority-minority district's purpose to allow previously submerged members of racial minorities into the active political process, this use of race cannot plausibly be said to affect any individual or group in any sense comparable to the injury inflicted by de jure segregation. It obviously conveys no message about the inferiority or outsider status of members of the white majority excluded from a district. And because the condition addressed by creating such a district is a function of numbers, the plan implies nothing about the capacity or value of the minority to which it gives the chance of electoral success.

Added to the anomalies of Shaw I 's idea of equal protection injury and the rhetoric of its descriptions, there is a further conceptual inadequacy in Shaw I. Whereas it defines injury as the reinforcement of the notion that members of a racial group will prefer the same candidates at the polls, the immediate 1056 object of the constitutional prohibition against the intentional dilution of minority voting strength is to protect the right of minority voters to make just such a preference effective. There would, for example, be no vote dilution by virtue of racial-bloc voting unless voters of a racial minority would themselves tend to stick together in voting for a given candidate (perhaps, though not necessarily, of their own race, as well). Indeed, if there were no correlation between race and candidate preference, it would make no sense to say that minority voters had less opportunity than others to elect whom they would; they would be part of the mainstream and the winners would be their own choices. When voting is thus racially polarized, it is just because of this polarization that majority-minority districts provide the only practical means of avoiding dilution or remedying the dilution injury that has occurred already. Shaw I has thus placed those who choose to avoid the long-recognized constitutional harm of vote dilution at risk by casting doubt on the legitimacy of its classic remedy; the creation of a majority-minority district "reinforces" the notion that there is a correlation between race and voting, for that correlation is the very condition on which the success of the court-ordered remedy depends. So it is that the Court's definition of injury is so broad as to cover constitutionally necessary efforts to prevent or remedy a violation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments and of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

One way to temper the overreach of the Court's concept of injury (though it would not avoid the difficulty that there is no equal protection injury in the usual sense, discussed above, see supra, at 2000) would be simply to exclude by definition from Shaw I injury a use of race in districting that is reasonably necessary to remedy or avoid dilution; the Court's move at least in this direction, see infra, at 2007–2009, is a sound one, as is its continuing recognition (despite its broad definition of harm) that not every intentional creation of a majority-minority district requires strict scrutiny. 1057 See ante, at 1951; ante, at 1969 (o'CONNOR, J., concurring); cf. Miller, 515 U.S., at 928, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 (o'CONNOR, J., concurring). But the suggested qualification would fall short of eliminating the difficulty caused by the existing definition, for the uses of race to remedy past dilution or to hedge against future dilution are not the only legitimate uses of race that are covered, and threatened, by the overbreadth of the Shaw injury. This will become clear in examining the Court's efforts to solve its definitional problems by relying upon the degree to which race is used in defining the injury it discerns.

C

The Court's failure to devise a concept of Shaw harm that distinguishes those who are injured from those who are not, or to differentiate violation from remedy, is matched by its inability to provide any manageable standard to distinguish forbidden districting conduct from the application of traditional state districting principles and the plans that they produce. This failure, while regrettable, need not have occurred, for when the Court spoke in Shaw I of a district shape so "bizarre" as to be an unequivocal indication that race had influenced the districting decision to *2004 an unreasonable degree, Shaw I could have been pointing to some workable criterion of shape translatable into objective standards. Leaving Shaw 's theoretical inadequacies aside, it would have been possible to devise a cause of action that rested on the expressive character of a district's shape, and created a safe harbor in the notion of a compact district objectively quantified in terms of dispersion, perimeter, and population. See Pildes & Niemi, 92 Mich. L.Rev., at 553–575. Had the Court followed this course, the districts whose grotesque shapes provoke the sharpest reaction would have been eliminated in racially mixed States, which would have known how to avoid Shaw violations and, thus, federal judicial intrusion. Shaw would have been left a doctrinal incongruity, but not an unmanageable one.

1058 The Court, however, rejected this opportunity last Term in Miller v. Johnson, supra, when it declined to contain Shaw by any standard sufficiently quantifiable to guide the decisions of state legislators or to inform and limit review of districting decisions by the courts. The Court rejected shape as a sufficient condition for finding a Shaw violation, or even a necessary one. 515 U.S., at 915, 115 S.Ct., at 2488. See also Issacharoff, The Constitutional Contours of Race and Politics, 1995 S.Ct. Rev. 45, 56 (hereinafter Isaacharoff, Constitutional Contours) ("Miller is rather categorical in its refusal to limit the application of the equal protection clause to bizarre districts alone"). Instead, it recharacterized the cause of action in terms devised in other cases addressing essentially different problems, by proscribing the consideration of race when it is the "predominant factor motivating the legislatur[e]," 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488, or when the use of race is "in substantial disregard of customary and traditional districting practices," id., at 928, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 (O'CONNOR,, JJ., concurring).

As a standard addressed to the untidy world of politics, neither "predominant factor" nor "substantial disregard" inspires much hope.[7] It is true of course that the law rests certain other liability decisions on the feasibility of untangling mixed motives, and courts and juries manage to do the untangling. See, e.g., Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 287, 97 S.Ct. 568, 576, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977) (employee's burden to show that constitutionally protected conduct is a "substantial factor" in 1059 decision not to rehire him; employer's burden to show that it would have made same decision "even in the absence of the protected conduct"); Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222, 228, 105 S.Ct. 1916, 1920, 85 L.Ed.2d 222 (1985) ("Once racial discrimination is shown to have been a 'substantial' or 'motivating' factor behind the enactment of the law, the burden shifts to the law's defenders to demonstrate that the law would have been enacted without this factor"); but see Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 265, 97 S.Ct. 555, 563, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977) ("Rarely can it be said that a legislature or administrative body operating under a broad mandate made a decision motivated solely by a single concern, or even that a particular purpose was the 'dominant' or 'primary' one"). At first glance, then, it may not seem entirely out of the question for courts to sort out the strands in Shaw cases. But even this cool comfort would be misplaced.

While a court may be entitled to some confidence that in most cases it will be able, for example, to distinguish the relative strength of an employer's dissatisfaction with an employee's job performance from his displeasure over a worker's union membership, see NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393, 403–405, 103 S.Ct. 2469, 2475–2476, 76 L.Ed.2d 667 (1983), such confidence *2005 would be unwarranted in the districting context. It is not merely that the very nature of districting decisions makes it difficult to identify whether any particular consideration, racial or otherwise, was the "predominant motive," though that is certainly true:

> "Districting plans are integrated bundles of compromises, deals and principles. To ask about the reason behind the design of any one particular district is typically to implicate the entire pattern of purposes and trade-offs behind a districting plan as a whole. Searching for 'the reason' or 'the dominant reason' behind a particular district's shape is often like asking why one year's federal budget is at one level rather than another. Moreover, to require a coherent explanation for the specific 1060 shape of even one district is to impose a model of legalistic decisionmaking on the one political process that least resembles that model." Pildes & Niemi, supra, at 585–586 (footnote omitted).

The reason that use of the predominant motive standard in reviewing a districting decision is bound to fail is more fundamental than that: in the political environment in which race can affect election results, many of these traditional districting principles cannot be applied without taking race into account and are thus, as a practical matter, inseparable from the supposedly illegitimate racial considerations. See Pildes & Niemi, supra, at 578 ("[R]ace frequently correlates with other socioeconomic factors. In evaluating oddly shaped districts, this correlation will require courts to attempt to untangle legitimate communities of interest from the now-illegitimate one of race. If blacks as blacks cannot be grouped into a 'highly irregular' district, but urban residents or the poor can, how will courts distinguish these contexts, and under what mixed-motive standard?"); Issacharoff, Constitutional Contours 58 ("Given the palpability of racial concerns in the political arena, [Miller 's causation standard could] ... either doom all attempts to distribute political power in multi-ethnic communities or ... fail to provide a basis for distinguishing proper from improper considerations in redistricting").

If, for example, a legislature may draw district lines to preserve the integrity of a given community, leaving it intact so that all of its members are served by one representative, this objective is inseparable from preserving the community's racial identity when the community is characterized, or even self-defined, by the race of the majority of those who live there. This is an old truth, having been recognized every time the political process produced an Irish or Italian or Polish ward.

> 1061 "[E]thnicity itself can tie people together, as volumes of social science literature have documented—even people with divergent economic interests. For this reason, ethnicity is a significant force in political life....
>
> . . . . .
>
> "... The creation of ethnic districts reflecting felt identity is not ordinarily viewed as offensive or demeaning to those included in the delineation." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S., at 944–945, 115 S.Ct., at 2504–2505 (gINSBURG, J., dissenting).

Or take the traditional principle of providing protection for incumbents. The plurality seems to assume that incumbents may always be protected by drawing lines on the basis of data about political parties. Cf. ante, at 1956, 1957–1958. But what if the incumbent has drawn support largely for racial reasons? What, indeed, if the incumbent was elected in a majority-minority district created to remedy vote dilution that resulted from racial-bloc voting? It would be sheer fantasy to assume that consideration of race in these circumstances is somehow separable from application of the traditional principle of incumbency protection, and sheer incoherence to think that the consideration of race that is constitutionally required to remedy Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendment vote dilution somehow becomes unconstitutional when aimed at protecting the incumbent the next time the census requires redistricting.

Thus, it is as impossible in theory as in practice to untangle racial consideration from the application of traditional districting principles in a society plagued by racial-bloc voting *2006 [8] with a racial minority population of political significance, or at least the unrealized potential for achieving it. And it 1062 is for just this fundamental reason that a test turning on predominant purpose is incapable of producing any answer when traditional districting principles are applied in the political environment in which Shaw I actions are brought.

II

Shaw I 's recognition of a misuse of race in districting even when no vote dilution results thus rests upon two basic deficiencies: first, the failure to provide a coherent concept of equal protection injury, there being no separably injured class and no concept of harm that would not condemn a constitutionally required remedy for past dilution as well as many of the districting practices that the Court is seeking to preserve; second, the failure to provide a coherent test for distinguishing a "predominant" racial consideration from the application of traditional districting principles in a society whose racial mixture is politically significant and where racial-bloc voting exists. The necessary consequence of these shortcomings is arbitrariness; it is impossible to distinguish what is valid from what is not, or to decide how far members of racial minorities may engage "in the same sort of pluralist electoral politics that every other bloc of voters enjoys." Karlan, Our Separatism 103. Indeed, if one needed further proof of this arbitrariness, one need go no further than Justice STEVENS's dissent in this case. The plurality effectively concedes that Justice STEVENS has not unfairly applied the principles governing the Shaw cause of action, cf. ante, at 1957, n. (noting that "[i]n the application of our precedents to District 30, our disagreement with Justice STEVENS' dissent, [ante], at 1979–1988, is largely factual"); in my judgment he has faithfully applied those principles in the spirit intended by the plurality. And yet the conclusions that the two sides reach after applying precisely the same test could not be more different.

1063 Along with this endemic unpredictability has come the destruction of any clear incentive for the States with substantial minority populations to take action to avoid vote dilution. Before Shaw, state politicians who recognized that minority vote dilution had occurred, or was likely to occur without redistricting aimed at preventing it, could not only urge their colleagues to do the right thing under the Fourteenth Amendment, but counsel them in terrorem that losing a dilution case would bring liability for counsel fees under 42 U.S.C. § 1988(b) or 42 U.S.C. § 1973*l* (e). See Issacharoff, Constitutional Contours 48 ("Minority political actors could leverage not only their political power but the enforcement provisions of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, and the threat of suit under Section 2 of the Act against adverse districting decisions"); cf. Hastert v. Illinois State Bd. of Election Commr's, 28 F.3d 1430, 1444 (C.A.7 1993) (awarding fees to the prevailing parties in a case in which the state legislature failed to draw congressional districts, over the Board of Elections's objection that it had "no interest in the eventual outcome except that there be an outcome" for it to implement) (emphasis in original). But this argument is blunted now, perhaps eliminated in practice, by the risk of counsel fees in a Shaw I action. States seeking to comply in good faith with the requirements of federal civil rights laws "now find themselves walking a tightrope: if they draw majority-black districts they face lawsuits under the equal protection clause; if they do not, they face both objections under section 5 of the Voting Rights Act and lawsuits under section 2." Karlan, Post-Shaw Era 289. See ante, at 1991 (sTEVENS, J., dissenting) ("On one hand, States will risk violating the Voting Rights Act if they fail to create majority-minority districts. If they create those districts, however, they may open themselves to liability under Shaw and its progeny"). The States, in short, have been told to get things just right, no dilution and no predominant consideration 1064 of race short of dilution, without being told how to do it. The tendency of these conflicting incentives is toward a stalemate, and neither the moral force of the *2007 Constitution nor the mercenary threat of liability can operate effectively in this obscurity.

As a consequence, where once comprehensible districting obligations confronted the legislators and governors of the States, there is now a vacuum of responsibility in any State with the mixed population from which Shaw suits come. We can no longer say with the old assurance that such States have a duty to comply with federal requirements in districting, since a State, like an individual, can hardly be blamed for failing to fulfill an obligation that has never been explained. It is true, of course, that a State may suffer consequences if the ultimate arbiter decides on a result different from the one the State has put in place, but that bad luck does not change the fact that a State cannot be said to be obliged to apply a standard that has not been revealed. Because the responsibility for the result can only be said to rest with the final arbiter, the practical responsibility over districting has simply shifted from the political branches of the States with mixed populations to the courts, and to this Court in particular. "The Court has apparently set itself upon a course of ... reviewing challenged districts one by one and issuing opinions that depend so idiosyncratically on the unique facts of each case that they provide no real guidance to either lower courts or legislatures." Karlan, Post-Shaw Era 288. The tragedy in this shift of political responsibility lies not only in the fact of its occurrence in this instance, but in the absence of coherent or persuasive justifications for causing it to occur.

III

Although today's cases do not address the uncertainties that stem from Shaw 's underlying incoherence, they do aim to mitigate its inscrutability with some specific rules.

1065 A

In each of today's cases, the Court expressly assumes that avoiding a violation of the Voting Rights Act qualifies as a sufficiently compelling government interest to satisfy the requirements of strict scrutiny. See ante, at 1960 ("As we have done in each of our three previous cases ..., we assume without deciding that compliance with the results test [of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act] ... can be a compelling state interest"); Shaw II, 517 U.S. at 915, 116 S.Ct. at 1905 ("We assume, arguendo, for the purpose of resolving this case, that compliance with § 2 could be a compelling interest"). While the Court's decision to assume this important point, arguendo, is no holding, see Seminole Tribe of Fla. v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44, 125, 116 S.Ct. 1114, 1157, 134 L.Ed.2d 252 (1996) (SOUTER, J., dissenting), the assumption itself is encouraging because it confirms the view that the intentional creation of majority-minority districts is not necessarily a violation of Shaw I, ante, at 1951 (strict scrutiny does not "apply to all cases of intentional creation of majority-minority districts"), and it indicates that the Court does not intend to bring the Shaw cause of action to what would be the cruelly ironic point of finding in the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (as amended) a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection guarantee. Cf. Pildes & Niemi, 92 Mich. L.Rev., at 498 (observing that "[i]f the Court believed there were serious constitutional questions with the fundamental structure of this scheme, the Court had numerous means to avoid permitting an unconstitutionally composed legislature to assume power," and seeing the reservation of this question in Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S., at 157, 113 S.Ct., at 1157, as "evidence that a majority of the Court is not prepared to find a general ban on race-conscious districting in the Constitution"). Justice O'CONNOR's separate opinion, ante, at 1968–1969, bears on each of these points all the more emphatically, for her view that compliance with § 2 is (not just arguendo) a compelling state interest and her statement of that position virtually insulate the Voting Rights Act from jeopardy under Shaw as such.

1066 B

The second point of reference to come out of today's cases is the rule that if a State begins its map-drawing efforts with a compact majority-minority district required by Gingles, the State may not rely too heavily *2008 on racial data in adjusting that district to serve traditional districting principles. While this rule may indeed provide useful guidance to state legislatures, its inherent weakness is clear from what was said supra, at 2005–2006: it is in theory and in fact impossible to apply "traditional districting principles" in areas with substantial minority populations without considering race. As to some of those principles, to be sure, the ban on the overuse of racial data may not have much significance; racially identified communities can be identified in other ways and will be, after today. But protecting a minority incumbent may be another matter, since we cannot assume, as the plurality does, that reliance on information about "party affiliation" will serve to protect a minority incumbent, and we cannot tell when use of racial data will go too far on the plurality's view, ante, at 1953. It therefore may well be that loss of the capacity to protect minority incumbency is the price of the rule limiting States' use of racial data. If so, it will be an exceedingly odd result, when the whole point of creating yesterday's majority-minority district was to remedy prior dilution, thus permitting the election of the minority incumbent who (the Court now seems to declare) cannot be protected as any other incumbent could be.

C

The third point of reference attributable to today's cases is as yet only a possibility; a suggestion in the discussions of the narrow tailoring test that States seeking to avoid violating § 2 of the Voting Rights Act may draw the district that the Voting Rights Act compels, and this district alone. See Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 915–918, 116 S.Ct., at 1905–1906 (rejecting North Carolina's District 12 because it does not sufficiently coincide with the 1067 assumed Gingles district); ante, at 1990 (sTEVENS, J., dissenting) ("[I]t now seems clear that the only way that a State can both create a majority-minority district and avoid a racial gerrymander is by drawing ... within the 'limited degree of leeway' granted by the Court ... the precise compact district that a court would impose in a successful §

2 challenge"). If the Court were to say that a district drawn to avoid dilution must respond to the dilution threat in some geographically exact way, but see Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 916, n. 8, 116 S.Ct., at 1906, n. 8 (suggesting that States may have flexibility in complying with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act); ante, at 1990 (sTEVENS, J., dissenting) (noting that States traditionally have enjoyed a broader discretion in drawing district lines), then presumably a district drawn in a race-conscious fashion could survive only if it was as compact as the Gingles district hypothesized for purposes of stating a vote-dilution claim, and positioned where the hypothetical district would be.

If the Court ultimately were to reach such a conclusion, it would in one respect be taking a step back toward Shaw I and its suggestion that a district's shape might play an important, if not determinative role in establishing a cause of action. Such a step would, however, do much more than return to Shaw I, which suggested that a compact district would be a safe haven, but not that the district hypothesized under Gingles was the only haven. See, e.g., Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826 ("The district lines may be drawn, for example, to provide for compact districts of contiguous territory, or to maintain the integrity of political subdivisions")

I refer to this step as a "possibility" deliberately. The Court in Shaw II does not go beyond an intimation to this effect, and Bush raises doubt that the Court would go so far. See ante, at 1960–1961 (rejecting the argument made by Justice STEVENS); see also ante, at 1961 ("[T]he States retain a flexibility that federal courts enforcing § 2 lack.... And nothing that we say today should be read as limiting 'a State's discretion to apply traditional districting principles' 1068 ; but see ante, at 1970 (O'CONNOR, JJ., concurring) ("[I]f a State pursues that compelling interest by creating a district that 'substantially addresses' the potential liability, and does not deviate substantially from a hypothetical court-drawn § 2 district for predominantly racial reasons, its districting plan will be deemed narrowly tailored" (citations omitted)); but see also ante, at 1960 ("We also *2009 reaffirm that the 'narrow tailoring' requirement of strict scrutiny allows the States a limited degree of leeway in furthering such interests.... We thus reject, as impossibly stringent, the District Court's view of the narrow tailoring requirement, that 'a district must have the least possible amount of irregularity in shape, making allowances for traditional districting criteria' " (citation omitted)). Indeed, Bush leaves open the possibility that a State could create a majority-minority district that does not coincide with the Gingles shape so long as racial data are not overused, ante, at 1953, 1962, and it does not suggest that a Shaw claim could be premised solely on a deviation from a Gingles district.

Suffice it to say for now that if the Court were to try to render Shaw more definite by imposing any such limitations on shape and placement, the added measure of clarity would either be elusive or it would come at an exorbitant price from States seeking to comply with the Voting Rights Act and the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. It would be elusive if the Court meant that race could be considered in alleviating racial dilution but not in applying any traditional districting principle: we have already seen that race is inextricably intertwined with some common districting principles when applied in a multiracial society. See supra, at 2005–2006. Or it would come at an exorbitant price, because no other districting principle would be allowed to affect the compactness or placement that would be required for purposes of Gingles. The Court would thus be cutting back on a State's power to vary district shape through its application of the very districting principles that are supposed to predominate 1069 in importance over racial consideration. That is, the Court would be reducing the discretion of a State seeking to avoid or correct dilution to the scope of a federal court's discretion when devising a remedy for dilution. There could, of course, be no justification for taking any such step. While there is good reason to limit a federal court's discretion to interfere in a State's political process when it employs its remedial power in dilution cases, cf. Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S., at 156, 113 S.Ct., at 1156–1157 ("Federal courts are barred from intervening in state apportionment in the absence of a violation of federal law precisely because it is the domain of the States ... to conduct apportionment"), there is no apparent reason to impose the same limitations upon the discretion accorded to a State subject to an independent constitutional duty to make apportionment decisions, see ibid. ("Because the States ... derive their reapportionment authority ... from independent provisions of state and federal law, ... the federal courts are bound to respect the States' apportionment choices unless those choices contravene federal requirements") (internal quotation marks omitted). The principles of federalism that we have tried to follow strongly counsel against imposing any such limitations.

D

In sum, the three steps the Court takes today toward a more definite cause of action either fail to answer the objections to Shaw I or prompt objections of their own. Recognition of a State's interest in complying with the Voting Rights Act does not address the practical impossibility courts will encounter in identifying a predominant use of race, as distinguished from some lesser, reasonable consideration of it, when a State applies its customary districting principles. The limitation on the use of racial data is unlikely to make much difference in practice except to jeopardize minority incumbency protection. And the possibility that the Court will require Gingles districts (or districts substantially close 1070 to them) when compliance with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act is an object of districting would render a State's districting obligation more definite only by eliminating its ability to apply the very districting principles traditionally considered to be important enough to furnish a theoretical baseline of reasonable districting practices.

IV

If today's developments fall short of curing Shaw 's unworkability, it must be said that options for addressing them are few. Assuming that Shaw is not to be overruled as a flawed experiment, the Court may select from two alternatives, depending on whether its weightier concern is to preserve traditional *2010 districting principles or to cure the anomalies created by Miller 's "predominant purpose" criterion.

If the Court's first choice is to preserve Shaw in some guise with the least revolutionary effect on districting principles and practice, the Court could give primacy to the principle of compactness and define the limits of tolerance for unorthodox district shape by imposing a measurable limitation on the bizarre, presumably chosen by reference to historical practice (adjusted to eliminate the influence of any dilution that very practice may have caused in the past, cf. Pildes & Niemi, 92 Mich. L.Rev., at 573–574, n. 246 (discussing the egregious racial gerrymanders of the 19th century)) and calculated on the basis of a district's dispersion, perimeter, and population. See id., at 553–575. This alternative would be true to Shaw I in maintaining that a point can be reached when the initially lawful consideration of race becomes unreasonable and in identifying appearance as the expression of undue consideration; and it would eliminate Miller 's impossible obligation to untangle racial considerations from so-called "race-neutral" objectives (such as according respect to community integrity and protecting the seats of 1071 incumbents) when the racial composition of a district and voter behavior bar any practical chance of separating them. The incongruities of Shaw 's concept of injury when considered in light of our customary equal protection analysis, our remedial practice, and traditional respect for state districting discretion would, of course, persist, but if Shaw were defined by measures that identified forbidden shape as the manifestation of unreasonable racial emphasis, we would at least provide the notice and guidance that are missing from the law today.

The other alternative for retaining a Shaw cause of action in some guise would be to accept the fact that, in the kind of polarized multiracial societies that will generate Shaw actions as presently understood, racial considerations are inseparable from many traditional districting objectives, making it impossible to speak of race as predominating. The consequence of facing this reality is that if some consideration of race is to be forbidden as supposedly unreasonable in degree, then the use of districting principles that implicate the use of race must be forbidden. That is, traditional districting practices must be eliminated. Such a result would, of course, be consistent with Shaw I 's concept of injury as affecting voters of whatever race. But cf. Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 489, 102 S.Ct. 752, 767–768, 70 L.Ed.2d 700 (1982) (fact that some expressive harms are insufficient to satisfy Article III standing requirements does not allow for relaxation of those requirements). The result, in short, would be colorblindness in determining the manner of choosing representatives, either by eliminating the practice of districting entirely, or by replacing it with districting on some principle of randomness that would not account for race in any way.

While such is the direction in which Shaw and Miller together point, the objections to following any such course seem insurmountable. The first is the irony that the price 1072 of imposing a principle of colorblindness in the name of the Fourteenth Amendment would be submerging the votes of those whom the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments were adopted to protect, precisely the problem that necessitated our recognition of vote dilution as a constitutional violation in the first place. Eliminating districting in the name of colorblindness would produce total submersion; random submersion (or packing) would result from districting by some computerized process of colorblind randomness. Thus, unless the attitudes that produce racial-bloc voting were eliminated along with traditional districting principles, dilution would once again become the norm. While dilution as an intentional constitutional violation would be eliminated by a randomly districted system, this theoretical nicety would be overshadowed by the concrete reality that the result of such a decision would almost inevitably be a so-called "representative" Congress with something like 17 black members. See supra, at 2000. In any event, the submergence would violate the prohibition of even non-intentional dilution found in § 2 of the Voting Rights Act. The only way to avoid this conflict would be to declare the Voting *2011 Rights Act unconstitutional, a prospect hardly in harmony with the Court's readiness to assume today that compliance with the Voting Rights Act qualifies as a compelling state interest for purposes of litigating a Shaw claim.

The second objection is equally clear. Whatever may be the implications of what I have called Shaw 's failings, the Court has repeatedly made it plain that Shaw was in no way intended to effect a revolution by eliminating traditional districting practice for the sake of colorblindness. Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2824 ("Despite their invocation of the ideal of a 'color-blind' Constitution, see Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559 [16 S.Ct. 1138, 1146, 41 L.Ed. 256] (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting), appellants appear to concede that race-conscious districting is not always unconstitutional.... That concession is wise: This Court 1073 never has held that race-conscious state decisionmaking is impermissible in all circumstances"); cf. Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 520–521, 109 S.Ct. 706, 735–736, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989) (sCALIA, J., concurring in judgment) (criticizing the majority for rejecting a strict principle of colorblindness). Indeed, the very fear that led to the creation of the Shaw cause of action was that racial concerns were taking too heavy a toll on districting practices that had evolved over the years through the political process. Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 644–649, 113 S.Ct., at 2825–2828. Justice O'CONNOR, moreover, has made it obvious that race has a legitimate place in districting, id., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2823 ("[R]ace-conscious redistricting is not always unconstitutional"); Miller, 515 U.S., at 928–929, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 (o'CONNOR, J., concurring); ante, at 1969 (o'CONNOR, J., concurring), that the intentional creation of majority-minority districts is not forbidden by Shaw, Miller, supra, at 928, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 (o'CONNOR, J., concurring) (districts may be permissible "even though race may well have been considered in the redistricting process"); ante, at 1968–1969 (o'CONNOR, J., concurring), and that Shaw was aimed at only the exceptional district, 515 U.S., at 928–929, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 ("Application of the Court's standard does not throw into doubt the vast majority of the Nation's 435 congressional districts"). Of the present Court majority, only Justices SCALIA and tHOMAS are on record as concluding that any intentional creation of a majority-minority district is a forbidden racial gerrymander. Ante, at 1973 (tHOMAS, J., concurring in judgment).

Since a radical transformation of the political selection process in the name of colorblindness is out of the question, the Court's options for dealing with Shaw 's unworkability are in truth only these: to confine the cause of action by adopting a quantifiable shape test or to eliminate the cause of action entirely. Because even a truncated Shaw would rest on the untenable foundation I have described, and the supposed, expressive harm Shaw seeks to remedy is unlikely 1074 to justify the disruption that even a modified Shaw would invite, there is presently no good reason that the Court's withdrawal from the presently untenable state of the law should not be complete. While I take the commands of stare decisis very seriously, the problems with Shaw and its progeny are themselves very serious. The Court has been unable to provide workable standards, the chronic uncertainty has begotten no discernible reliance, and the costs of persisting doubt about the limits of state discretion and state responsibility are high.

There is, indeed, an added reason to admit Shaw 's failure in providing a manageable constitutional standard and to allow for some faith in the political process. That process not only evolved the very traditional districting principles that the Court has pledged to preserve, but has applied them in the past to deal with ethnicity in a way that should influence our thinking about the prospects for race. It is difficult to see how the consideration of race that Shaw condemns (but cannot avoid) is essentially different from the consideration of ethnicity that entered American politics from the moment that immigration began to temper regional homogeneity. Recognition of the ethnic character of neighborhoods and incumbents, through the application of just those districting principles we now view as traditional, allowed ethnically identified voters and their preferred candidates *2012 to enter the mainstream of American politics, see Miller, supra, at 944–945, 115 S.Ct., at 2504–2505 (gINSBURG, J., dissenting); D. Judd, The Politics of American Cities: Private Power and Public Policy 70 (3d ed.1988); see generally S. Erie, Rainbow's End: Irish–Americans and the Dilemmas of Urban Machine Politics, 1840–1985 (1988), and to attain a level of political power in American democracy. The result has been not a state regime of ethnic apartheid, but ethnic participation and even a moderation of ethnicity's divisive effect in political practice. For although consciousness of ethnicity has not disappeared from the 1075 American electorate, its talismanic force does appear to have cooled over time.[9] It took Boston Irish voters, for example, to elect Thomas Menino mayor in 1993.[10]

1076 There is, then, some reason to hope that if vote dilution is attacked at the same time that race is given the recognition that ethnicity has historically received in American politics, the force of race in politics will also moderate in time. There are even signs that such hope may be vindicated, even if the evidence is necessarily tentative as yet. See U.S. Comm'n on Civil Rights, The Voting Rights Act: Ten Years After, p. 155 (Jan.1975) ("In many areas the great increase in minority registration and voting since the passage of the Voting Rights Act in 1965 has meant that politicians can no longer afford to ignore minority voters. This has brought about a significant decline in racial appeals by candidates and has made incumbents and candidates more responsive to minority needs"); Carsey, The Contextual Effects of Race on White Voter Behavior: The 1989 New York City Mayoral Election, 57 J. of Politics 221, 228 (1995) (reporting, in 1994, that "the contextual effects of race may not be so different from the contextual effects of factors like partisanship, ethnicity, or social class as we might have believed"); Sigelman, Sigelman, Walkosz, & Nitz, Black Candidates, White Voters: Understanding Racial Bias in Political Perceptions, 39 Am. J. of Political Science 243, 244 (1995) ("Over the years, white Americans have expressed increasing willingness to vote for black candidates"); Peirce, Fresh Air in City Hall, Baltimore Sun, Nov. 8, 1993, p. 7A ("In contest after contest, victory has gone to mayoral candidates who eschew talk of race"); see *2013 also Gingles, 478 U.S., at 56, 106 S.Ct., at 2769 (noting that crossover voting in favor of minority candidates is more common when minority incumbents stand for reelection); Collins v. Norfolk, 883 F.2d 1232, 1243 (C.A.4 1989) (same). This possibility that racial politics, too, may grow wiser so long as minority votes are rescued from submergence should be considered in determining how far the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments require us to devise constitutional common law to supplant 1077 the democratic process with litigation in federal courts. It counsels against accepting the profession that Shaw has yet evolved into a manageable constitutional standard, and from that case's invocation again today I respectfully dissent.

All Citations

517 U.S. 952, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248, 64 USLW 4452, 96 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 4238, 96 Daily Journal D.A.R. 6810

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

* In the application of our precedents to District 30, our disagreement with Justice STEVENS' dissent, post, at 1979–1988, is largely factual. In reviewing the District Court's findings of primary fact, we cannot ignore the reality that the District Court heard several days of testimony and argument and became significantly more familiar with the factual details of this suit than this Court can be. We therefore believe that the dissent errs in second-guessing the District Court's assessment of the witnesses' testimony, see post, at 1985, n. 24, and in dismissing as mere "fine tuning," post, at 1987, the practice of using race as a proxy that the District Court found, based on ample evidence, to be pervasive, see Vera v. Richards, 861 F.Supp. 1304, 1322 (S.D.Tex.1994).

For the same reason, we decline to debate the dissent on every factual nuance on which it diverges from the District Court's, and our, view. But two of its specific claims about District 30 merit a response. First, the dissent asserts that "[a] comparison of the 1992 precinct results with a depiction of the proportion of black population in each census block reveals that Democratic-leaning precincts cover a far greater area [of District 30] than majority-black census blocks." Post, at 1987 (emphasis added). While that may be true, the dissent's reliance on 1992 election results is misplaced. Those results were not before the legislature when it drew the district lines in 1991, and may well reflect the popularity and campaign success of Representative Johnson more than the party political predispositions of the district's residents. (The same error infects the dissent's discussion of the Collin County hook, post, at 1982–1983, n. 19 (relying on 1992 election results).) And looking at totals, rather than at the difference between areas just inside and just outside the district lines, is misleading: Race may predominate in the drawing of district lines because those lines are finely drawn to maximize the minority composition of the district, notwithstanding that in an overwhelmingly Democratic area, the total of Democrats in the district far exceeds its total minority population.

Second, the dissent suggests that strict scrutiny should not apply because District 30's compact core has a higher African–American population percentage than its wayward tentacles. Post, at 1983–1984. In doing so, it again ignores the necessity of determining whether race predominated in the redistricters' actions in light of what they had to work with. Once various adjacent majority-minority populations had been carved away from it by the use of race as a proxy to enhance the electoral chances of neighboring incumbents, the core of District 30 was substantially too small to form an entire district. The principal question faced by the redistricters was, therefore, what territory to add to the core out of the remainder of the Dallas area, which remainder has an average African–American population substantially below the 21% county average. In answering that question, as the District Court explained and the maps bear witness, the redistricters created bizarre, far-reaching tentacles that intricately and consistently maximize the available remaining African–American population.

1 In Adarand, we overruled Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547, 110 S.Ct. 2997, 111 L.Ed.2d 445 (1990), and held that strict scrutiny applies to racial classifications by the Federal Government as well as to those by the States. For quite some time, however, we have consistently held that race-based classifications by the States must be strictly scrutinized. See, e. g., Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493–494, 109 S.Ct. 706, 721–722, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989) (plurality opinion); id., at 520, 109 S.Ct., at 735–736 (sCALIA, J., concurring in judgment); Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 273, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 1846–1847, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (plurality opinion); id., at 285, 106 S.Ct., at 1852–1853 (o'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).

2 It is unnecessary to parse in detail the contours of each challenged district. See ante, at 1954–1960. I agree that the geographic evidence is itself sufficient to invoke strict scrutiny, but once the State directly conceded that it intentionally used racial classifications to create majority-minority districts, there was no need to rely on circumstantial evidence.

1 The District Court recognized, but erroneously ignored, the overwhelming weight of evidence demonstrating that political considerations dominated the shaping of Texas' congressional districts. See Vera v. Richards, 861 F.Supp. 1304, 1331, 1334–1336 (S.D.Tex.1994); infra, at 1986–1987.

2 Because I believe that political gerrymanders are more objectionable than the “racial gerrymanders” perceived by the Court in recent cases, see Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 748, 103 S.Ct. 2653, 2668, 77 L.Ed.2d 133 (1983) (sTEVENS, J., concurring); Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 161–162, 166, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 2825–2826, 2827, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986) (Powell, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), I am not entirely unsympathetic to the Court's holding. I believe, however, that the evils of political gerrymandering should be confronted directly, rather than through the race-specific approach that the Court has taken in recent years. See also infra, at 1992.

3 In elections since 1980, the State has elected a Democrat in only two of four gubernatorial races, and in only two of six races for the United States Senate. America Votes 21: A Handbook of Contemporary American Election Statistics 417 (R. Scammon & A. McGillivray eds. 1995). Furthermore, in 1994, Republican candidates received a total of 550,000 more votes than Democratic candidates in Texas' 30 races for the United States House of Representatives, id., at 4, while in 1992, Democratic House candidates outpolled Republicans by only 147,000 votes (despite winning 27 of 30 districts). America Votes 20: A Handbook of Contemporary American Election Statistics 474 (R. Scammon & A. McGillivray eds.1993).

4 Then–State Senator from Dallas, Eddie Bernice Johnson, who was chair of the Senate Subcommittee on Congressional Districts, maneuvered to construct District 30 in a manner that would ensure her election. 861 F.Supp., at 1313; Politics in America 1994: The 103rd Congress 1536 (1993) (“This is the District Eddie Bernice Johnson drew”). Vice chair of the same committee, Frank Tejeda, also “attempted to draw a district [District 28] that would facilitate his potential candidacy.” 861 F.Supp., at 1326. And State Senator Gene Green and State Representative Roman Martinez, both Houston-area officials with designs on Congress, competed in an effort to design District 29 in a way that would guarantee their own election. Id., at 1324, n. 27. (Martinez later dropped out of the congressional race to run for State Senate.) Because the role that these legislators played in the redistricting process was largely identical to that played by sitting incumbents, my references to the role of “incumbents” in the redistricting process generally refer to these individuals as well.

5 As did many other States, Texas kept track of the shapes of its post–1990 districts with a computer districting program loaded with 1990 census information and geographic information at scales ranging from statewide to that of a city block. See generally Shaw v. Hunt, 861 F.Supp. 408, 457 (E.D.N.C.1994) (describing computer programs); 861 F.Supp., at 1318–1319. The dramatic increase in bizarrely shaped districts after 1990 can be traced, at least in part, to the fact that computers allowed legislators to achieve their political goals geographically in a manner far more precise than heretofore possible. See Pildes & Niemi, Expressive Harms, "Bizarre Districts," and Voting Rights: Evaluating Election–District Appearances After Shaw v. Reno, 92 Mich. L.Rev. 483, 574 (1993); Note, The Illegitimacy of the Incumbent Gerrymander, 74 Texas L.Rev. 913, 924 (1996).

6 The State added District 28 (a majority-Hispanic district in south Texas), District 29 (a majority-Hispanic district in Houston), and District 30 (a majority-black district in Dallas). In addition, the State reconfigured Houston's District 18. That district had elected African–American Representatives to Congress since the early 1970's and remained majority-minority in 1990, although a plurality of its population was by then Hispanic. To create District 29, the legislature altered the shape of District 18 to move parts of its Hispanic population into that neighboring district while retaining a majority-black population.

> To the extent that the precise shape of these districts relied on race rather than other factors, that racial gerrymandering was somewhat less effective than the political gerrymandering had been: District 29, created as a majority-Hispanic district, elected an Anglo, former State Senator Green, in 1992, and reelected him in 1994. America Votes 21, at 437. Given his substantial role in crafting the district to meet his electoral needs, see n. 4, supra, Green's success suggests the power of incumbency over race.

7 I do not agree with the Court's approach to these cases. Nonetheless, given that the Court seems settled in its conclusion that racial gerrymandering claims such as these may be pursued, I endorse this proposition.

8 Though expressly reserving the issue in Shaw I, we noted there that appellants wisely conceded that while "race-conscious redistricting is not always unconstitutional.... This Court has never held that race-conscious state decisionmaking is impermissible in all circumstances." 509 U.S., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2824 (emphasis in original). The threshold test for the application of strict scrutiny as set forth in Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), implicitly accepts this as true, concluding that strict scrutiny applies not when race merely influences the districting process, but only when "the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations." Id., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488 (emphasis added); see also id., at 928–929, 115 S.Ct., at 2497 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring) (test does not "throw into doubt the vast majority of the Nation's 435 congressional districts ... even though race may well have been considered in the redistricting process"). Shaw II similarly recognizes that intent does not trigger strict scrutiny: Although the District Court concluded that the State "deliberately drew" the district in question to ensure that it included a majority of African–American citizens, see Shaw, 861 F.Supp., at 473; Shaw II, at 905, 116 S.Ct., at 900, the Court reviews the District Court's findings regarding the demographics of the district to determine whether the strict scrutiny was appropriately applied. See 517 U.S., at 905–906, 116 S.Ct., at 1900–1901; cf. ante, at 1972 (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment) (where State intends to create majority-minority district, application of strict scrutiny not even a "close question").

> Justice THOMAS takes a strong view on this matter, arguing that a majority-minority district should escape strict scrutiny only when it is created "in spite of," not "because of," the race of its population. Ante, at 1973. But because minorities are, by definition, minorities in the population, it will be rare indeed for a State to stumble across a district in which the minority population is both large enough and segregated enough to allow majority-minority districts to be created with at most a "mere awareness" that the placement of the lines will create such a district. See ibid. Indeed, I doubt that any such district exists in the entire Nation; the creation of even the most compact majority-minority district will generally require a conscious decision to draw its lines "just so" to ensure that the group is not a minority in the district population. It appears, however, that even when a district is placed "just so" in order to include a traditional community in which race does correlate with community interests (consider, for example, New York District 15, which is centered on Harlem), Justice THOMAS would review that district with the same presumption of invidiousness with which we viewed the district in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960). Cf. Miller, 515 U.S., at 944, 115 S.Ct., at 2504 (GINSBURG, J ., dissenting) (noting that "ethnicity itself can tie people together" in communities of interest). Because the creation of such a district threatens neither the harms of Gomillion nor, I believe, any harms against which the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to protect, I cannot accept his conclusion.

9 Because the Court's approach to cases of this kind seeks to identify the "predominant" motive of the legislature, it is worth pointing out, as we have on so many prior occasions, that it is often "difficult or impossible for any court to determine the 'sole' or 'dominant' motivation behind the choices of a group of legislators." Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217, 225, 91 S.Ct. 1940, 1945, 29 L.Ed.2d 438 (1971). As in every other legislative body, each of the members of Texas' Legislature has his or her own agenda and interests—particularly in the "complicated process" of redistricting, in which every decision "inevitably has sharp political impact." White v. Weiser, 412 U.S. 783, 795–796, 93 S.Ct. 2348, 2355, 37 L.Ed.2d 335 (1973). In these circumstances, "[r]arely can it be said that a legislature ... operating under a broad mandate made a decision motivated solely by a single concern, or even that a particular purpose was the 'dominant' or 'primary' one. In fact, it is because legislators ... are properly concerned with balancing numerous competing considerations that courts refrain from reviewing the merits of their decisions, absent a showing of arbitrariness or irrationality." Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 265, 97 S.Ct. 555, 563, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977); (footnote omitted); see also Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 636–639, 107 S.Ct. 2573, 2605–2606, 96 L.Ed.2d 510 (1987) (SCALIA, J., dissenting); Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 940, 116 S.Ct., at 1917–1918 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

Not only is this a case in which a legislature is operating under a "broad mandate," but other factors weigh in favor of deference as well. First, the inherently political process of redistricting is as much at the core of state sovereignty as any other. Second, the "motive" with which we are concerned is not per se impermissible. (For that reason, this litigation is very different from Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, 490 U.S. 228, 109 S.Ct. 1775, 104 L.Ed.2d 268 (1989), and Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977), in which the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant's action was motivated by an intent to harm individuals because of their status as members of a particular group. Where there is "proof that a discriminatory purpose has been a motivating factor in the decision," the "judicial deference" due to the legislative process is no longer justified. Id., at 265–266, 97 S.Ct., at 563.) Finally, those that are injured by the allegedly discriminatory districts can alleviate their injury through the democratic process: Those in the district could elect a representative who is not a part of their racial group, while the population at large could elect a legislature that refused to rely on racial considerations in the drawing of districts. In such circumstances we should take particular care in questioning the legislature's motives and, if in doubt, presume that the legislature has acted appropriately. See post, at 2004–2006 (SOUTER, J., dissenting).

10 We require state legislatures to ensure that populations, from district to district, are "as mathematically equal as reasonably possible," with de minimis exceptions permissible only in "unavoidable" instances. White v. Weiser, 412 U.S., at 790, 93 S.Ct., at 2352; see also Karcher, 462 U.S., at 734–735, 103 S.Ct., at 2660–2661. Population variances are not permissible even " 'if they necessarily result from a State's attempt to avoid fragmenting political subdivisions by drawing congressional district lines along existing ... political subdivision boundaries.' " White, 412 U.S., at 791, 93 S.Ct., at 2352 (citing Kirkpatrick v. Preisler, 394 U.S. 526, 533–534, 89 S.Ct. 1225, 1230–1231, 22 L.Ed.2d 519 (1969)). The legislature, therefore, understandably felt compelled to achieve mathematical equality regardless of other concerns. Rather surprisingly, they were able to do so: Every one of Texas' 30 congressional districts contains precisely 566,217 persons. Of course, this precision could not have been accomplished without breaking apart counties, cities, neighborhoods, and even pre-existing voting precincts.

11 This phenomenon is not unique to Dallas County: Throughout the State, "incumbent residences repeatedly fall just along district lines." 861 F.Supp., at 1318 (giving examples); see State's Exhs. 10A and 10B (showing incumbent residences). District 6, for instance, changed from a rural district stretching far to the southeast of Dallas to a more suburban district wrapping around Fort Worth. As it did so, however, the district pivoted around the home of incumbent Representative Joe Barton, whose residence sits at the extreme southeastern end of a district stretching in a 100–mile–long loop around Fort Worth. See Appendix D, infra.

12 The plurality suggests that these communities were shed from District 30 in a "suspect use of race as a proxy to further neighboring incumbents' interests." Ante, at 1961; see also ante, at 1957, n. I had thought, however, that the Court's concern in these cases was the "resemblance to political apartheid" involved in the creation of majority-minority districts. Shaw I, 509 U.S. 630, 647, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2827, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993). I do not see how the decision to include minority communities in a neighboring majority-White district bears any resemblance to such "apartheid" or, for that matter, how it has any relevance to the validity of the creation of a district from which those minority communities have been excluded. See also infra, at 1963–1965.

13 See, e.g., 3 Tr. 187 (testimony of Christopher Sharman: "[A]ny time you took part of a district away on one end, you would usually squeeze or push the district out on another end; and in this case, most of the time the district would get pushed to the north").

14 The author of the District Court opinion was herself aware of these political realities. See id., at 194 (Jones, J., noting that Johnson did not want anything to do with the Park Cities because she "[d]idn't want competition from Ross Perot"). In light of this recognition, it is difficult to understand why the District Court described District 30's efforts to avoid that community as a contributing factor to the allegedly race-based bizarreness of the district borders. See 861 F.Supp., at 1337; ante, at 1955.

15 Because political boundaries are more closely packed in urban than in rural areas, drawing lines based on such boundaries will almost always require tighter twists and turns in urban districts than in rural districts. Significantly, the three districts struck down by the District Court are the only three districts in the entire State with population densities of over 2,000 persons per square mile. See U.S. Dept. of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, Population and Housing Characteristics for Congressional Districts of the 103d Congress: Texas 40–44 (Feb.1993). If enough empty land were added to these districts that they matched the sparse densities of rural districts (such as District 28, which was upheld by the District Court), their turns would not appear so sharp, and the open space, without its demographic implications, could smooth the deepest of the districts' notches.

16 As Democratic communities were identified, they had to be connected with the core of the district. Although Texas has no state statutory or constitutional requirement to that effect, state legislators agreed that each of the 30 districts should be entirely contiguous, permitting any candidate, map in hand, to visit every residence in her district without leaving it.

17 Incumbents influenced the shape of districts in other ways. Both District 30 and District 29, for instance, detoured to include portions of the state legislative districts that were being represented by the state legislators who hoped to run for Congress. See, e.g., State's Exh. 31 (showing that portion of Tarrant County included in District 30 had been part of Johnson's State Senate district). In some cases, legislators drew districts to avoid the residences of potential primary challengers. See 3 Tr. 192–193; 4 id., at 46. Incumbents also sought to include communities that they expected (or knew) to contain particularly active supporters; this interest in "active" voters often trumped any desire to ensure a particular racial makeup. See 3 id., at 190; 4 id., at 40–41; 861 F.Supp., at 1320.

18 While two extremely noncompact majority-Anglo districts in Texas (Districts 3 and 25) might be able to blame part (though by no means all) of their contortions on their contiguity with the majority-minority districts, District 6 has little excuse. Although it shares a border with District 30 for a short distance, that stretch is one of the straightest in either of the districts, running almost entirely along the county line through the Dallas–Fort Worth International Airport. See Appendix D, infra.

> As for the obligatory florid description: District 6 has far less of an identifiable core than any of the majority-minority districts struck down by the District Court. To the extent that it "begins" anywhere, it is probably near the home of incumbent Rep. Barton in Ennis, located almost 40 miles southwest of downtown Dallas. From there, the district winds across predominantly rural sections of Ellis County, finally crossing into Tarrant County, the home of Fort Worth. It skips across two arms of Joe Pool Lake, noses its way into Dallas County, and then travels through predominantly Republican suburbs of Fort Worth. Nearing the central city, the borders dart into the downtown area, then retreat to curl around the city's northern edge, picking up the airport and growing suburbs north of town. Worn from its travels into the far northwestern corner of the county (almost 70 miles, as the crow flies, from Ennis), the district lines plunge south into Eagle Mountain Lake, traveling along the waterline for miles, with occasional detours to collect voters that have built homes along its shores. Refreshed, the district rediscovers its roots in rural Parker County, then flows back toward Fort Worth from the southwest for another bite at Republican voters near the heart of that city. As it does so, the district narrows in places to not much more than a football field in width. Finally, it heads back into the rural regions of its fifth county—Johnson—where it finally exhausts itself only 50 miles from its origin, but hundreds of "miles apart in distance and worlds apart in culture." Miller, 515 U.S., at 908, 115 S.Ct., at 2484 (describing a similar combined rural/urban district).

19 Seeking specific examples, the plurality makes much hay over a portion of Collin County located just over the county line north of Dallas. See ante, at 1954–1955, 1957. There, District 30 excludes a portion of a precinct that voted Democratic in 1990, and maps "exactly onto the only area in the southern half of th[e] county with a [minority] percentage population in excess of 50%." Ante, at 1955.

The map to which the plurality refers, however, groups the minority percentage by precinct, and since precincts are defined by the district boundaries, it is no surprise that the district maps "exactly" onto the precinct. See App. 153. (One might similarly argue that "District 30 maps exactly onto the only area in all of north Texas that is 50% black," but such a statement reveals little about the underlying demographics of specific sections of the district.) The more telling maps are the census block maps, which demonstrate that the Collin County section of District 30 contains many more census blocks of less than 25% minority population than it does blocks that are more than 50% minority. See State's Exh. 45 and 46 (Exh. 45 is reproduced, in part, as Appendix D, infra). Even if those majority-white blocks have relatively small populations, they were nonetheless included, suggesting that the creation of the district was not as single-mindedly focused on race as the Court and the District Court assume.

Even more significant is the fact that the new precinct leaned overwhelmingly Democratic in the 1992 election, while the portion of the precinct that was not included in District 30 voted overwhelmingly Republican. See State's Exh. 9B (Collin County). While the excluded portion of the 1990 precinct may have been dropped, in part, to help comply with the State's goals under the Voting Rights Act, it also involved a successful effort to maximize Democratic votes while avoiding Republican votes.

20 See 861 F.Supp., at 1312 (black population in Dallas County is 362,130); Bureau of Census, Population and Housing Unit Counts 185 (Oct.1993) (total population of Dallas County is 1,852,810).

21 Several responses to the plurality's specific examples are worth making, however. In Collin County, the plurality relies on the fact that the "combined African–American and Hispanic" population in the Collin County extremity of the northern appendage to District 30 is in excess of 50%. Ante, at 1957. But District 30 was created with an eye to a majority-black population, rather than a majority-minority population, so the more relevant facts are that (i) African–Americans make up only 19.8% of the Collin County appendage, App. 331, (ii) those African–Americans consist of only two-tenths of 1% of the entire population in the district, ibid., and (iii) this appendage contains more majority-white census blocks than it does majority-minority census blocks, see State's Exh. 45.

The plurality also points out that a small portion of one of the tentacles—the one that extends west into Tarrant County—contains an African–American majority. Ante, at 1954. It would be implausible to claim, however, that race was the "predominant" reason that this community was included in District 30. First, the community had been part of Senator Johnson's state legislative district, see n. 17, supra; second, it also includes majority-white census blocks; and third, the total population in that portion of the district is less than 2,000 people. App. 331. Finally, and more important, the population of the entire western tentacle (at the tip of which is the Tarrant County community) is only 29% black, see State's Exh. 33—less than half the proportion of minorities in the core of the district.

22 Indeed, if the "appendages" to District 30 reaching into neighboring counties were cut off, the proportion of African–Americans in the resulting district would actually increase. See App. 331. As presently constituted, district 30 includes 566,217 people, of which 283,225 (or 50.02%) are African–American. If the Tarrant County and Collin County portions of the district were removed, the resulting district would have 557,218 people, of which 280,620 (or 50.36%) would be African–American. While the resulting district would not include the "zero deviation" necessary under Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964), and its progeny, see n. 10, supra, the missing population could easily be acquired in majority-black census blocks adjacent to District 30's southern and eastern edge, thereby increasing the proportion of black population still further. Because the alleged racial goals of the district could be achieved more effectively by making the district more compact, I simply do not comprehend how the plurality can conclude that the effort to create a majority-minority district "predominated" over other, race-neutral goals.

23 Testimony by individuals is relevant, but hardly dispositive evidence of collective motivations. See n. 9, supra. It may be true that the most important concern motivating Senator Johnson, the Chairman of the Senate Districting Committee, was her desire to create the first Congressional District in the history of the State in which African–Americans were in the majority. Johnson never testified, however, that racial considerations were the sole concern motivating the changes to the shapes of the districts. See, e.g., App. 454–456 (certain areas that were minority communities were assigned to Anglo incumbents because of incumbent power), id., at 459 ("[J]ust as 30 went looking for friendly territory regardless of color, [the incumbents] went looking for friendly territory as well regardless of color"). Since this testimony was not only irrelevant to the § 2 proceedings but arguably harmful to her claim there that racial considerations had been taken into account, these admissions are particularly telling.

> To the extent that testimony of individual legislators is relevant, the following statements from the floor of the Texas House confirm that many legislators viewed these districts as political, not racial, gerrymanders: "This plan was drawn to protect incumbents....
>
> "[I]n order to protect an incumbent Dallas congressman and an incumbent Houston congressman, county lines were not respected, urban boundaries were not respected, precinct boundaries were not respected." Id., at 374–375 (statement of Rep. Ogden).
>
> "With the adoption of this plan, you will have 8 Republican Congressmen out of 30. That's de facto regression and provides for less Republican representation in Washington, D.C.
>
> "Communities throughout the State are surgically split in what appears to be illogical, irrational and erratic pattern[s]. But if you look at election result data throughout the State, you'll find that these lines are very logical and very rational. The lines have been drawn, dissecting communities very creatively in order to pack Republicans and maximize Democratic representation." Id., at 376 (statement of Rep. Gusendorf).
>
> See also id., at 377–380 (statement of Rep. Gusendorf illustrating the gerrymandering process by reference to District 6, not a majority-minority district).
>
> These gerrymanders "d[o] not have to happen. It has nothing to do with fairness. It has nothing to do with minority representation because if we were really concerned about minority representation, we would have drawn this map in such a way that the minorities were considered and not simply to elect Democrats." Id., at 384 (statement of Rep. Hill).

24 It is ironic and slightly unfair for the plurality and District Court to use the State's § 5 submission and Congresswoman Johnson's testimony in a § 2 challenge to the congressional district as evidence against them in these cases. See, e.g., 861 F.Supp., at 1319–1321, 1338–1339; ante, at 1956–1957. Both of those proceedings required the State to assure the Attorney General and a federal court, respectively, that the State had adequately considered the interests of minority voters in the 1991 redistricting process. Under such circumstances, it is not at all surprising that the relevant declarant would limit his or her comments to the role that race played in the redistricting process, for other considerations were largely irrelevant (the District Court's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, see 861 F.Supp., at 1339).

25 As Justice GINSBURG noted in her dissent in Miller, "ethnicity itself can tie people together" in communities of interest. 515 U.S., at 944, 115 S.Ct., at 2504; see also Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 651, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 3293, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1982) (STEVENS, J., dissenting) ("Whenever identifiable groups in our society are disadvantaged, they will share common political interests and tend to vote as a 'bloc' "). Furthermore, it may be that the very fact of racial bloc voting, a prerequisite to § 2 liability, see Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2766, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986) (and, under the Court's recent jurisprudence, to the voluntary formation of a majority-minority district), demonstrates the presence of a minority community. While communities based on race may merit a more skeptical review to ensure that a bond, rather than mere stereotyping, ties the community, see 861 F.Supp., at 1338, recognition of such a community in an electoral district certainly could, in certain circumstances, serve as a legitimate race-neutral explanation for particularly odd district shapes. By suggesting the contrary, I believe that the District Court erred. See ibid.; post, at 2005–2006 (SOUTER, J., dissenting).

26 The District Court's legal analysis was probably flawed in part because its decision was issued before this Court announced its opinion in Miller.

27 While it may be that the political gerrymandering in this case is "different in degree" from that previously recognized, 861 F.Supp., at 1334, I do not believe that the reference in Shaw I and Miller to "traditional" districting principles, see Shaw

I, 509 U.S., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2824; Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct., at 2488, was intended to prohibit a State from changing the process or policies underlying the complex negotiating process that is modern redistricting.

28 The plurality expresses particular concern over the use of computer programs, particularly the availability of block-by-block racial data, and argues that the State's effort to "compil[e] detailed racial data," ante, at 1955, is evidence of the controlling role of race in the computer-dominated process of redistricting. See ante, at 1952–1953; 861 F.Supp., at 1318–1319. It is worth noting, however, that the State made no particular "effort" to gather these data; it was included, along with similarly detailed information about sex, age, and income levels, in the data set provided by the Census Bureau and imported wholesale into the State's redistricting computers. Cf. Shaw, 861 F.Supp., at 457. Furthermore, even if the computer was used to fine tune the district lines to ensure that minority communities were included in District 30 (rather than individualized requests from candidates and their staffers on the basis of block-level data, see supra, at 1981), such a technique amounts to little more than the use of a particularly efficient and accurate means of ensuring that the intended nature of the district was not undermined as incumbency protection forced it out of a compact district. I do not suggest that the end can always justify the means, but if those means are no more invidious than the end itself, I do not understand why their use should affect the analysis. I would not condemn state legislation merely because it was based on accurate information.

29 "A prediction based on racial characteristic is not necessarily more reliable than a prediction based on some other group characteristic. Nor, since a legislator's ultimate purpose in making the prediction is political in character, is it necessarily more invidious or benign than a prediction based on other group characteristics. In the line-drawing process, racial, religious, ethnic, and economic gerrymanders are all species of political gerrymanders." Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 88, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 1510, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment) (footnote omitted).

> To the extent that a political prediction based on race is incorrect, the voters have an entirely obvious way to ensure that such irrationality is not relied upon in the future: Vote for a different party. A legislator relying on racial demographics to ensure his or her election will learn a swift lesson if the presumptions upon which that reliance was based are incorrect.

30 I find it particularly ironic that the Court considers the use of race verboten in this benign context, while the Court just recently, on the basis of evidence that, inter alia, "[m]ore than 90% of the persons sentenced in 1994 for crack cocaine trafficking were black," dismissed out of hand the Ninth Circuit's assumption that "people of all races commit all types of crimes." United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 469, 116 S.Ct. 1480, 1488, 134 L.Ed.2d 687 (1996). The Ninth Circuit's conclusion, it seems to me, is a model of the sort of race-neutral decisionmaking that this Court insists should be a part of constitutional decisionmaking processes.

31 Although I conclude that no reasonable interpretation of the record would require the application of strict scrutiny to District 30, I believe for the reasons that follow that it, too, would survive strict scrutiny if it were to be subject to that level of review.

32 While I believe that the evidence supporting the State's conclusions in this regard is stronger than that suggested by the plurality or Justice KENNEDY in his concurring opinion, I will simply assume, arguendo, as the plurality does, that the State had a reasonable fear of liability under § 2. See also supra, at 1976.

33 Even if the Court in Shaw II is correct in asserting that North Carolina's District 12 would not have allowed the State to avoid liability under § 2, see supra, at 916–918, 116 S.Ct., at 1905–1906, no such plausible argument could be made in these cases. The core of District 30, for instance, contains more than half of all the African–American population in the district, and coincides precisely with the heart of the compact community that the State reasonably believes would give rise to a § 2 violation were it not placed in a majority-minority district. The same facts are true with respect to the Houston districts.

34 The difficulty of balancing between these competing legal requirements will only be exacerbated by the ability of litigants (and courts) to use evidence proffered in defense by the State or its actors in one context as evidence against the State in another. See n. 24, supra. While there is nothing wrong with using prior inconsistent statements (to the extent that they really are inconsistent), States will be all the more unwilling to enter into the process at all given the certainty that they will be subject to suits in which evidence offered in one as defense will be fodder for the plaintiffs in another.

35 The contrary is also possible, of course. Perhaps the burgeoning role of federal courts in this process, along with their relative isolation from the political pressures that motivate legislatures to bend district lines, will mean that there will actually be fewer politically gerrymandered districts. Regardless of whether political gerrymanders are more or less prevalent after our decisions today, my point is the same: The Court has its hierarchy of values upside down.

36 My view that a State may act unconstitutionally by gerrymandering to minimize the influence of a group on the political process is consistent with the belief that there is no constitutional error in the drawing of district lines based on benign racial considerations. As Justice Powell noted in his opinion in Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S., at 165, 106 S.Ct., at 2827, there is a sharp distinction between "gerrymandering in the 'loose' sense" (i.e., the drawing of district lines to advance general political and social goals), and "gerrymandering that amounts to unconstitutional discrimination" (i.e., the drawing of district lines for the sole purpose of " 'occupy[ing] a position of strength at a particular time, or to disadvantage a politically weak segment of the community,' " id., at 164, 106 S.Ct., at 2827 (citing Karcher, 462 U.S., at 748, 103 S.Ct., at 2668 (STEVENS, J., concurring)). See also 478 U.S., at 125, n. 9, 106 S.Ct., at 2807, n. 9 ("[A] preference for nonpartisan as opposed to partisan gerrymanders ... merely recognizes that nonpartisan gerrymanders in fact are aimed at guaranteeing rather than infringing fair group representation"). While I believe that allegations of discriminatory intent and impact, if proved, should give rise to a constitutional violation, Shaw, Miller, and these cases all involve allegations of both impact and intent that are far more diffuse than the allegations to which we have traditionally directed our most rigorous review. See Shaw II, 517 U.S., at 921–923, 116 S.Ct., at 1908–1909 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); cf. Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960). Limiting the constitutional ban on gerrymandering to those claims alleging that a specific group (as opposed to every group) has been harmed would be far more consistent with prior precedent than the Court's still-developing jurisprudence of racial gerrymandering.

37 Compare 51 Congressional Quarterly 10 (1993) (list of African–Americans who have served in Congress through the end of 1992) and Supplement to 52 Congressional Quarterly 10 (Nov. 12, 1994) (listing minorities in the 104th Congress) with biyearly publications of The Almanac of American Politics (published 1975–present).

38 D. Bositis, Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, African–Americans & the 1994 Midterms 22 (rev. May 1995). Fifteen black candidates ran for office in majority-white districts. Ibid.

1 See, e.g., Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 34, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 1081, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993) ("[T]he Constitution leaves with the States primary responsibility for apportionment of their federal congressional and state legislative districts") (citing U.S. Const., Art. I, § 2); Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 156, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1156, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 586, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 1394, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964).

2 Even in the no longer controversial instance of the one-person, one-vote rule, the adequacy of justification and standard was subject to sharp dispute, and some of the Court's best minds expressed principled hesitation to go even this far into what has been called the political thicket, see id., at 615, 84 S.Ct., at 1409 (Harlan, J., dissenting) ("The Court's elaboration of its new 'constitutional' doctrine indicates how far—and how unwisely—it has strayed from the appropriate bounds of its authority. The consequence of today's decision is that in all but the handful of States which may already satisfy the new requirements the local District Court or, it may be, the state courts, are given blanket authority and the constitutional duty to supervise apportionment of the State Legislatures. It is difficult to imagine a more intolerable and inappropriate interference by the judiciary with the independent legislatures of the States"); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 267, 82 S.Ct. 691, 737–738, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting) ("The Court's authority—possessed of neither the purse nor the sword—ultimately rests on sustained public confidence in its moral sanction. Such feeling must be nourished by the Court's complete detachment, in fact and in appearance, from political entanglements and by abstention from injecting itself into the clash of political forces in political settlements").

3 As Professor Issacharoff notes, our vote-dilution cases acknowledged that "the right to cast an effective ballot implied more than simply the equal weighting of all votes.... To be effective, a voter's ballot must stand a meaningful chance of effective aggregation with those of like-minded voters to claim a just share of electoral results. For this reason, any sophisticated right to genuinely meaningful electoral participation must be evaluated and measured as a group right...." Issacharoff, Groups and the Right to Vote, 44 Emory L.J. 869, 883 (1995); see also Davidson, The Recent Revolution in Voting Rights Law Affecting Racial and Language Minorities, in Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act, 1965–1990, p. 23 (C. Davidson & B. Grofman eds. 1994) ("Ethnic or racial vote dilution takes place when a majority of voters, by bloc voting for its candidates in a series of elections, systematically prevents an ethnic minority from electing most or all of its preferred candidates.... Vote dilution not only can deprive minority voters of the important symbolic achievement of being represented by preferred members of their own group, it can deprive them of a committed advocate in councils of government ... [and] of the substantial benefits that government bestows ...").

4 See Pildes, The Politics of Race, 108 Harv. L.Rev. 1359, 1369 (1995) (reviewing Quiet Revolution in the South: The Impact of the Voting Rights Act, 1965–1990 (C. Davidson & B. Grofman eds.1994)) (noting that studies of Southern States demonstrate that, as a result of racial-bloc voting, "the probability of a district's electing a Black representative was less than 1% regardless of a district's median family income, its percentage of high school graduates; its proportion of residents who were elderly, urban, foreign-born, or who had been residents of the state for more than five years; or the region of the country in which the district was located"); id., at 1375 (finding similar results nationwide). There is, of course, reason to hope that conditions are improving. See infra, at 2012–2013 (discussing elections in which crossover voting favors minority incumbents and in which racial issues have not played a significant role in the outcome). As I discuss in detail in Part IV, infra, I believe that these improvements may be attributed in large part to the effect of the Voting Rights Act, and thus to our willingness to allow race-conscious districting in certain situations.

5 I recognize, of course, that elsewhere we have imposed prohibitions on the consideration of race, but contexts are crucial in determining how we define "equal opportunity." Consider our decisions on peremptory jury challenges. There, as in politics, one race may not have had a fair shake from the other. But the differences between jury decisionmaking and political decisionmaking are, I believe, important ones. Politics includes choices between different sets of social values, choices that may ultimately turn on the ability of a particular group to enforce its demands through the ballot box. Jury decisionmaking is defined as a neutral process, the impartial application of law to a set of objectively discovered facts. To require racial balance in jury selection would risk redefining the jury's role. Without denying the possibility that race, especially as an imperfect proxy for experience, makes a difference in jury decisionmaking (and, in some cases, legitimately so), it seems to me that the better course is to ensure a fair shake by denying each side the right to make race-based selections. The cost of the alternative is simply too great. It is an entirely different matter, however, to recognize that racial groups, like all other groups, play a real and legitimate role in political decisionmaking. It involves nothing more than an acknowledgment of the reality that our concepts of common interest, geography, and personal allegiances are in many places simply too bound up with race to deny some room for a theory of representative democracy allowing for the consideration of racially conceived interests. A majority of the Court has never disagreed in principle with this position. See, e.g., Shaw I, 509 U.S. 630, 642, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2824, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (noting that race-conscious redistricting is not always unconstitutional); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 928–929, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 2497, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (o'CONNOR, J., concurring) (consideration of race in the redistricting process does not always violate the Constitution); ante, at 1951 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.) (noting that strict scrutiny does "not apply merely because redistricting is performed with consciousness of race").

6 Leaving aside the question whether such a catholic injury can be a violation of the Equal Protection Clause, there still might be a use of race that harms all district voters because it is used to an unreasonable degree. But see Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 489, 102 S.Ct. 752, 767, 70 L.Ed.2d 700 (1982). But the Court has never succeeded in identifying how much is too much, having adopted a "predominant purpose" test that amounts to a practical repudiation of any hope of devising a workable standard. See Part I–C, infra.

7 See Cannon v. North Carolina State Bd. of Ed., 917 F.Supp. 387, 391 (E.D.N.C.1996) (describing this "difficult area of the law" and predicting that it will "gain better definition by reason of an imminent decision by the Supreme Court of the United States [in Shaw II]"); Briffault, Race and Representation After Miller v. Johnson, 1995 U. Chi. Legal Forum 23, 50 (1995) ("[I]t is unclear what work the adjectives 'predominant' and 'overriding' do in the Supreme Court's test"); Karlan, Post-Shaw Era 287 (Miller "further unsettled the already unclear roadmap" of Shaw I); Issacharoff, Constitutional Contours 60 ("[T]he Court's facile reliance on standards of causation vaguely reminiscent of tort law does nothing to defer confronting the hard issue of acceptable standards of conduct").

8 Even in areas where there is no racial-bloc voting, the application of certain traditional districting principles may involve a legitimate consideration of race.

9 See Karst, Paths to Belonging: The Constitution and Cultural Identity, 64 N.C. L.Rev. 303, 347, 350 (1986) ("[T]he surest path to assimilation is participation in the larger society's activities and institutions. Voting is not just an expression of political preferences; it is an assertion of belonging to a political community...." "When legislative districts are defined in ways that exclude the possibility of significant minority representation, potential minority voters see that their votes are not worth casting. Yet electoral mobilization is vital ... to the group members' perceptions that they belong to the community"); Walzer, Pluralism in Political Perspective, in The Politics of Ethnicity 1, 18 (S. Thernstrom, A. Orlov, & O. Handlin eds.1982) ("[P]olitical life is in principle open, and this openness has served to diffuse the most radical forms of ethnic competition"); Kantowicz, Voting and Parties, in The Politics of Ethnicity, supra, at 29, 45 (noting that political successes and recognition made members of an ethnic group "feel that it belonged in the wider society ... [and brought] them inside the political system"); Mintz, Ethnicity and Leadership: An Afterword, in Ethnic Leadership in America 198 (J. Higham ed.1978) (concluding after reviewing several studies of ethnic politics that "we ignore at our peril the need to understand those processes by which being shortchanged ... politically can become any group's motto or battle standard"); cf. Karlan, Our Separatism 102 ("two generations of communist suppression and ethnic and religious tension in Yugoslavia did little to ensure stability, tolerance, or integration").

10 See, e.g., Nolan, Boston Mayoral Race Could Break Dominance of Ethnicity, Boston Globe, Apr. 9, 1993, p. 40 ("When Boston finishes choosing a new mayor, the city may discover that after centuries of immigration, ethnicity is no longer the dominant factor in its politics"); Black, Once–Solid Voting Blocks are Splitting in Boston, Boston Globe, Nov. 1, 1993, p. 1 (commenting that voters consider Menino's Italian descent "little more than a historical footnote" and observing that "ethnic voting has faded ... [a]s various groups enter the American economic and social mainstream ... [and] gain some semblance of [political] power"); D'Innocenzo, Gulotta Can't Count on Ethnicity, Newsday, Oct. 19, 1993, p. 97 (noting that "[t]he vowel at the end of Tom Gulotta's name may not matter in this year's county executive election as it once did" because "Italian–Americans in Nassau County are likely to go to the polls with more than ethnic favoritism in mind"; attributing the decline in ethnicity-based voting to the fact that "Nassau Italian–Americans feel less marginali [zed] as an ethnic group").

End of Document

113 S.Ct. 2217
Supreme Court of the United States

CHURCH OF the LUKUMI BABALU AYE, INC. and Ernesto Pichardo, Petitioners,
v.
CITY OF HIALEAH.

No. 91–948
|
Argued Nov. 4, 1992.
|
Decided June 11, 1993.

Synopsis
Church brought action challenging city ordinances dealing with ritual slaughter of animals. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida denied relief, 723 F.Supp. 1467, and church appealed. The Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed, 936 F.2d 586. On certiorari, the Supreme Court, Justice Kennedy, held that: (1) ordinances were not neutral; (2) ordinances were not of general applicability; and (3) governmental interest assertedly advanced by the ordinances did not justify the targeting of religious activity.

Reversed.

Justice Scalia filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment in which Chief Justice Rehnquist joined.

Justice Souter filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

Justice Blackmun filed an opinion concurring in the judgment in which Justice O'Connor joined.

West Headnotes (18)

[1] Constitutional Law Neutrality

Law that is neutral and of general applicability need not be justified by compelling government interest even if law has incidental effect of burdening particular religious practice. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

428 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Neutrality

Law which is not neutral and of general applicability must be justified by compelling governmental interest and must be narrowly tailored to advance that interest if it burdens religious practice. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

535 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Free Exercise of Religion

Protections of free exercise clause pertain if law at issue discriminates against some or all religious beliefs or regulates or prohibits conduct because it is undertaken for religious reasons. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

308 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Neutrality

If object of law is to infringe upon or restrict practices because of their religious motivation, law is not neutral and is invalid unless justified by compelling interest and narrowly tailored to advance that interest. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

408 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Constitutional Law Neutrality

To determine object of law which burdens religion, court must begin with its text, for minimum requirement of neutrality is that law not discriminate on its face; law lacks facial neutrality if it refers to religious practice without secular meaning discernible from the language or context. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

125 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Constitutional Law Neutrality; general applicability

Facial neutrality is not determinative of whether law violates free exercise clause, as that clause extends beyond facial discrimination and forbids subtle departures from neutrality and covert suppression of particular religious beliefs. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

230 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Constitutional Law Neutrality; general applicability

Official action that targets religious conduct for distinctive treatment cannot be shielded by mere compliance with requirement of facial neutrality, as free exercise clause protects against governmental hostility which is masked as well as overt. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

243 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Constitutional Law Religious Organizations in General

Ordinances regulating ritual animal sacrifice were not religiously neutral as they used the words "sacrifice" and "ritual," resolutions recited that residents and citizens of the city had expressed their concern that certain religions might propose to engage in practices which were inconsistent with public morals and reiterated the city's commitment to prohibit any and all such acts of any and all religious groups, ordinances defined "sacrifice" so as to exclude almost all killings of animals except for religious sacrifice, ordinances reached few if any killings other than those performed as religious sacrifice by particular church, and ordinances did not deal with hunting, slaughter of animals for foods, eradication of insects and pests, or euthanasia.

75 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Constitutional Law Freedom of Religion and Conscience

Adverse impact will not always lead to finding of impermissible targeting of religion, as social harm may have been legitimate concern of government for reasons quite apart from discrimination. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Constitutional Law First Amendment in General

Neutrality of law is suspect if First Amendment freedoms are curtailed to prevent isolated collateral harms not themselves prohibited by direct regulation. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Animals Regulation of slaughtering

Constitutional Law Religious Organizations in General

Although city ordinance governing slaughterhouses appeared to apply to substantial nonreligious conduct and not be overbroad, it was invalid on First Amendment grounds where it was part of a group of four ordinances which were passed for the purpose of suppressing animal sacrifices performed by church. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

41 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Constitutional Law Freedom of Religion and Conscience

All laws are selective to some extent, but categories of selection are of paramount concern when law has incidental effect of burdening religious practices, and inequality results when legislature decides that government interests it seeks to advance are worthy of being pursued only against conduct with a religious motivation. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

81 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Constitutional Law Burden on religion

Principle that government, in pursuit of legitimate interests, cannot in a selective manner impose burdens only on conduct motivated by religious belief is essential to protection of rights guaranteed by free exercise clause. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

153 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Animals Regulation of slaughtering
Constitutional Law Particular Issues and Applications

Ordinances dealing with ritual slaughter of animals were not of general applicability despite claim that they prevented cruelty to animals where they were underinclusive for those ends and failed to prohibit nonreligious conduct endangering the interests in a similar or greater degree than did religious ritual sacrifice. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

79 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] Animals Regulation of slaughtering
Constitutional Law Particular Issues and Applications

Ordinances intended to prohibit ritual slaughter of animals were not of general applicability despite claim that they were related to city's interest in public health which was threatened by disposal of animal carcasses in open public places and the consumption of uninspected meat, where they were underinclusive with respect to that interest as they did not deal with consumption of meat or disposal of carcasses by hunters and fishers. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] Constitutional Law Neutrality

Law burdening religious practice, not neutral or of general application, must undergo the most rigorous of scrutiny. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

122 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] Constitutional Law Freedom of Religion and Conscience

Law that targets religious conduct for distinctive treatment or advances legitimate governmental interest only against conduct with religious motivation survives strict scrutiny only in rare cases. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

116 Cases that cite this headnote

[18] Animals Regulation of slaughtering
Constitutional Law Particular Issues and Applications

Ordinances dealing with ritual slaughter of animals did not have compelling governmental interest which would justify their targeting of religious activity despite claims that they dealt with the city's interest in public health and the protection of cruelty to animals. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 1.

54 Cases that cite this headnote

*2219 Syllabus[*]

Petitioner church and its congregants practice the Santeria religion, which employs animal sacrifice as one of its principal forms of devotion. The animals are killed by cutting their carotid arteries and are cooked and eaten following all Santeria rituals except *2220 healing and death rites. After the church leased land in respondent city and announced plans to establish a house of worship and other facilities there, the city council held an emergency public session and passed, among other enactments, Resolution 87–66, which noted city residents' "concern" over religious practices inconsistent with public morals, peace, or safety, and declared the city's "commitment" to prohibiting such practices; Ordinance 87–40, which incorporates the Florida animal cruelty laws and broadly punishes "[w]hoever ... unnecessarily or cruelly ... kills any animal," and has been interpreted to reach killings for religious reasons; Ordinance 87–52, which defines "sacrifice" as "to unnecessarily kill ... an animal in a ... ritual ... not for the primary purpose of food consumption," and prohibits the "possess[ion], sacrifice, or slaughter" of an animal if it is killed in "any type of ritual" and there is an intent to use it for food, but exempts "any licensed [food] establishment" if the killing is otherwise permitted by law; Ordinance 87–71, which prohibits the sacrifice of animals, and defines "sacrifice" in the same manner as Ordinance 87–52; and Ordinance 87–72, which defines "slaughter" as "the killing of animals for food" and prohibits slaughter outside of areas zoned for slaughterhouses, but includes an exemption for "small numbers of hogs and/or cattle" when exempted by state law. Petitioners filed this suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging violations of their rights under, inter alia, the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. Although acknowledging that the foregoing ordinances are not religiously neutral, the District Court ruled for the city, concluding, among other things, that compelling governmental interests in preventing public health risks and cruelty to animals fully justified the absolute prohibition on ritual sacrifice accomplished by the ordinances, and that an exception to that prohibition for religious conduct would unduly interfere with fulfillment of the governmental interest because any more narrow restrictions would 521 be unenforceable as a result of the Santeria religion's secret nature. The Court of Appeals affirmed.

Held: The judgment is reversed.

936 F.2d 586, (CA 11 1991) reversed.

Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II–A–1, II–A–3, II–B, III, and IV, concluding that the laws in question were enacted contrary to free exercise principles, and they are void. Pp. 2225–30, 2231–34.

(a) Under the Free Exercise Clause, a law that burdens religious practice need not be justified by a compelling governmental interest if it is neutral and of general applicability. Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 108 L.Ed.2d 876. However, where such a law is not neutral or not of general application, it must undergo the most rigorous of scrutiny: It must be justified by a compelling governmental interest and must be narrowly tailored to advance that interest. Neutrality and general applicability are interrelated, and failure to satisfy one requirement is a likely indication that the other has not been satisfied. Pp. 2225–26.

(b) The ordinances' texts and operation demonstrate that they are not neutral, but have as their object the suppression of Santeria's central element, animal sacrifice. That this religious exercise has been targeted is evidenced by Resolution 87–66's statements of "concern" and "commitment," and by the use of the words "sacrifice" and "ritual" in Ordinances 87–40, 87–52, and 87–71. Moreover, the latter ordinances' various prohibitions, definitions, and exemptions demonstrate that they were "gerrymandered" with care to proscribe religious killings of animals by Santeria church members but to exclude almost all other animal killings. They also suppress much more religious conduct than is necessary to achieve their stated ends. The legitimate governmental interests in protecting the public health and preventing cruelty to animals could be addressed by restrictions stopping far short of a flat prohibition of all Santeria sacrificial practice, such as *2221 general regulations on the disposal of organic garbage, on the care of animals regardless of why they are kept, or on methods of slaughter. Although Ordinance 87–72 appears to apply to substantial nonreligious conduct and not to be overbroad, it must also be invalidated because it functions in tandem with the other ordinances to suppress Santeria religious worship. Pp. 2227–30.

(c) Each of the ordinances pursues the city's governmental interests only against conduct motivated by religious belief and thereby violates the requirement that laws burdening religious practice must be of general applicability. Ordinances 87–40, 87–52, and 87–71 are substantially underinclusive with regard to the city's interest in preventing crueltyto 522 animals, since they are drafted with care to forbid few animal killings but those occasioned by religious sacrifice, while many types of animal deaths or kills for nonreligious reasons are either not prohibited or approved by express provision. The city's assertions that it is "self-evident" that killing for food is "important," that the eradication of insects and pests is "obviously justified," and that euthanasia of excess animals "makes sense" do not explain why religion alone must bear the burden of the ordinances. These ordinances are also substantially underinclusive with regard to the city's public health interests in preventing the disposal of animal carcasses in open public places and the consumption of uninspected meat, since neither interest is pursued by respondent with regard to conduct that is not motivated by religious conviction. Ordinance 87–72 is underinclusive on its face, since it does not regulate nonreligious slaughter for food in like manner, and respondent has not explained why the commercial slaughter of "small numbers" of cattle and hogs does not implicate its professed desire to prevent cruelty to animals and preserve the public health. Pp. 2231–33.

(d) The ordinances cannot withstand the strict scrutiny that is required upon their failure to meet the Smith standard. They are not narrowly tailored to accomplish the asserted governmental interests. All four are overbroad or underinclusive in substantial respects because the proffered objectives are not pursued with respect to analogous nonreligious conduct and those interests could be achieved by narrower ordinances that burdened religion to a far lesser degree. Moreover, where, as here, government restricts only conduct protected by the First Amendment and fails to enact feasible measures to restrict other conduct producing substantial harm or alleged harm of the same sort, the governmental interests given in justification of the restriction cannot be regarded as compelling. Pp. 2233–34.

KENNEDY, J., delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, III, and IV, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., and WHITE, STEVENS, SCALIA, SOUTER, and THOMAS, JJ., joined, the opinion of the Court with respect to Part II–B, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., and WHITE, STEVENS, SCALIA, and THOMAS, JJ., joined, the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts II–A–1 and II–A–3, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., and STEVENS, SCALIA, and THOMAS, JJ., joined, and an opinion with respect to Part II–A–2, in which STEVENS, J., joined. SCALIA, J., filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., joined, post, p. ——. SOUTER, J., filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, post, p. ——. BLACKMUN, J., filed an opinion concurring in the judgment, in which O'CONNOR, J., joined, post, p. ——.

Attorneys and Law Firms

523 Douglas Laycock, Austin, TX, for petitioners.

Richard G. Garrett, Miami, FL, for respondent.

Opinion

2222 Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court, except as to Part II–A–2.[]

The principle that government may not enact laws that suppress religious belief or practice is so well understood that few violations are recorded in our opinions. Cf. McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 98 S.Ct. 1322, 55 L.Ed.2d 593 (1978); Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67, 73 S.Ct. 526, 97 L.Ed. 828 (1953). Concerned that this fundamental nonpersecution principle of the First Amendment was implicated here, however, we granted certiorari. 503 U.S. 935, 112 S.Ct. 1472, 117 L.Ed.2d 616 (1992).

524 Our review confirms that the laws in question were enacted by officials who did not understand, failed to perceive, or chose to ignore the fact that their official actions violated the Nation's essential commitment to religious freedom. The challenged laws had an impermissible object; and in all events the principle of general applicability was violated because the secular ends asserted in defense of the laws were pursued only with respect to conduct motivated by religious beliefs. We invalidate the challenged enactments and reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

I

A

This case involves practices of the Santeria religion, which originated in the 19th century. When hundreds of thousands of members of the Yoruba people were brought as slaves from western Africa to Cuba, their traditional African religion absorbed significant elements of Roman Catholicism. The resulting syncretion, or fusion, is Santeria, "the way of the saints." The Cuban Yoruba express their devotion to spirits, called orishas, through the iconography of Catholic saints, Catholic symbols are often present at Santeria rites, and Santeria devotees attend the Catholic sacraments. 723 F.Supp. 1467, 1469–1470 (SD Fla.1989); 13 Encyclopedia of Religion 66 (M. Eliade ed. 1987); 1 Encyclopedia of the American Religious Experience 183 (C. Lippy & P. Williams eds. 1988).

The Santeria faith teaches that every individual has a destiny from God, a destiny fulfilled with the aid and energy of the orishas. The basis of the Santeria religion is the nurture of a personal relation with the orishas, and one of the principal forms of devotion is an animal sacrifice. 13 Encyclopedia of Religion, supra, at 66. The sacrifice of animals as part of religious rituals has ancient roots. See generally 12 id., at 554–556. Animal sacrifice is mentioned throughout the Old Testament, see 14 Encyclopaedia Judaica 600, 600–605 525 (1971), and it played an important role in the practice of Judaism before destruction of the second Temple in Jerusalem, see id., at 605–612. In modern Islam, there is an annual sacrifice commemorating Abraham's sacrifice of a ram in the stead of his son. See C. Glassé, Concise Encyclopedia of Islam 178 (1989); 7 Encyclopedia of Religion, supra, at 456.

According to Santeria teaching, the orishas are powerful but not immortal. They depend for survival on the sacrifice. Sacrifices are performed at birth, marriage, and death rites, for the cure of the sick, for the initiation of new members and priests, and during an annual celebration. Animals sacrificed in Santeria rituals include chickens, pigeons, doves, ducks, guinea pigs, goats, sheep, and turtles. The animals are killed by the cutting of the carotid arteries in the neck. The sacrificed animal is cooked and eaten, except after healing and death rituals. See 723 F.Supp., at 1471–1472; 13 Encyclopedia of Religion, supra, at 66; M. González–Wippler, The Santeria Experience 105 (1982).

Santeria adherents faced widespread persecution in Cuba, so the religion and its *2223 rituals were practiced in secret. The open practice of Santeria and its rites remains infrequent. See 723 F.Supp., at 1470; 13 Encyclopedia of Religion, supra, at 67; M. González–Wippler, Santería: The Religion 3–4 (1989). The religion was brought to this Nation most often by exiles from the Cuban revolution. The District Court estimated that there are at least 50,000 practitioners in South Florida today. See 723 F.Supp., at 1470.

B

Petitioner Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. (Church), is a not-for-profit corporation organized under Florida law in 1973. The Church and its congregants practice the Santeria religion. The president of the Church is petitioner Ernesto Pichardo, who is also the Church's priest and holds the religious title of Italero, the second highest in the Santeria faith. In April 1987, the Church leased land in 526 the City of Hialeah, Florida, and announced plans to establish a house of worship as well as a school, cultural center, and museum. Pichardo indicated that the Church's goal was to bring the practice of the Santeria faith, including its ritual of animal sacrifice, into the open. The Church began the process of obtaining utility service and receiving the necessary licensing, inspection, and zoning approvals. Although the Church's efforts at obtaining the necessary licenses and permits were far from smooth, see 723 F.Supp., at 1477–1478, it appears that it received all needed approvals by early August 1987.

The prospect of a Santeria church in their midst was distressing to many members of the Hialeah community, and the announcement of the plans to open a Santeria church in Hialeah prompted the city council to hold an emergency public session on June 9, 1987. The resolutions and ordinances passed at that and later meetings are set forth in the Appendix following this opinion.

A summary suffices here, beginning with the enactments passed at the June 9 meeting. First, the city council adopted Resolution 87–66, which noted the "concern" expressed by residents of the city "that certain religions may propose to engage in practices which are inconsistent with public morals, peace or safety," and declared that "[t]he City reiterates its commitment to a prohibition against any and all acts of any and all religious groups which are inconsistent with public morals, peace or safety." Next, the council approved an emergency ordinance, Ordinance 87–40, which incorporated in full, except as to penalty, Florida's animal cruelty laws. Fla.Stat. ch. 828 (1987). Among other things, the incorporated state law subjected to criminal punishment "[w]hoever ... unnecessarily or cruelly ... kills any animal." § 828.12.

The city council desired to undertake further legislative action, but Florida law prohibited a municipality from enacting legislation relating to animal cruelty that conflicted with 527 state law. § 828.27(4). To obtain clarification, Hialeah's city attorney requested an opinion from the attorney general of Florida as to whether § 828.12 prohibited "a religious group from sacrificing an animal in a religious ritual or practice" and whether the city could enact ordinances "making religious animal sacrifice unlawful." The attorney general responded in mid-July. He concluded that the "ritual sacrifice of animals for purposes other than food consumption" was not a "necessary" killing and so was prohibited by § 828.12. Fla.Op.Atty.Gen. 87–56, Annual Report of the Atty.Gen. 146, 147, 149 (1988). The attorney general appeared to define "unnecessary" as "done without any useful motive, in a spirit of wanton cruelty or for the mere pleasure of destruction without being in any sense beneficial or useful to the person killing the animal." Id., at 149, n. 11. He advised that religious animal sacrifice was against state law, so that a city ordinance prohibiting it would not be in conflict. Id., at 151.

The city council responded at first with a hortatory enactment, Resolution 87–90, that noted its residents' "great concern regarding the possibility of public ritualistic animal sacrifices" *2224 and the state-law prohibition. The resolution declared the city policy "to oppose the ritual sacrifices of animals" within Hialeah and announced that any person or organization practicing animal sacrifice "will be prosecuted."

In September 1987, the city council adopted three substantive ordinances addressing the issue of religious animal sacrifice. Ordinance 87–52 defined "sacrifice" as "to unnecessarily kill, torment, torture, or mutilate an animal in a public or private ritual or ceremony not for the primary purpose of food consumption," and prohibited owning or possessing an animal "intending to use such animal for food purposes." It restricted application of this prohibition, however, to any individual or group that "kills, slaughters or sacrifices animals for any type of ritual, regardless of whether or not the flesh or blood of the animal is to be consumed." The ordinance 528 contained an exemption for slaughtering by "licensed establishment[s]" of animals "specifically raised for food purposes." Declaring, moreover, that the city council "has determined that the sacrificing of animals within the city limits is contrary to the public health, safety, welfare and morals of the community," the city council adopted Ordinance 87–71. That ordinance defined sacrifice as had Ordinance 87–52, and then provided that "[i]t shall be unlawful for any person, persons, corporations or associations to sacrifice any animal within the corporate limits of the City of Hialeah, Florida." The final Ordinance, 87–72, defined "slaughter" as "the killing of animals for food" and prohibited slaughter outside of areas zoned for slaughterhouse use. The ordinance provided an exemption, however, for the slaughter or processing for sale of "small numbers of hogs and/or cattle per week in accordance with an exemption provided by state law." All ordinances and resolutions passed the city council by unanimous vote. Violations of each of the four ordinances were punishable by fines not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding 60 days, or both.

Following enactment of these ordinances, the Church and Pichardo filed this action pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida. Named as defendants were the city of Hialeah and its mayor and members of its city council in their individual capacities. Alleging violations of petitioners' rights under, inter alia, the Free Exercise Clause, the complaint sought a declaratory judgment and injunctive and monetary relief. The District Court granted summary judgment to the individual defendants, finding that they had absolute immunity for their legislative acts and that the ordinances and resolutions adopted by the council did not constitute an official policy of harassment, as alleged by petitioners. 688 F.Supp. 1522 (SD Fla.1988).

After a 9–day bench trial on the remaining claims, the District Court ruled for the city, finding no violation of petitioners' 529 rights under the Free Exercise Clause. 723 F.Supp. 1467 (SD Fla.1989). (The court rejected as well petitioners' other claims, which are not at issue here.) Although acknowledging that "the ordinances are not religiously neutral," id., at 1476, and that the city's concern about animal sacrifice was "prompted" by the establishment of the Church in the city, id., at 1479, the District Court concluded that the purpose of the ordinances was not to exclude the Church from the city but to end the practice of animal sacrifice, for whatever reason practiced, id., at 1479, 1483. The court also found that the ordinances did not target religious conduct "on their face," though it noted that in any event "specifically regulating [religious] conduct" does not violate the First Amendment "when [the conduct] is deemed inconsistent with public health and welfare." Id., at 1483–1484. Thus, the court concluded that, at most, the ordinances' effect on petitioners' religious conduct was "incidental to [their] secular purpose and effect." Id., at 1484.

The District Court proceeded to determine whether the governmental interests underlying the ordinances were compelling and, if *2225 so, to balance the "governmental and religious interests." The court noted that "[t]his 'balance depends upon the cost to the government of altering its activity to allow the religious practice to continue unimpeded versus the cost to the religious interest imposed by the government activity.' " Ibid., quoting Grosz v. City of Miami Beach, 721 F.2d 729, 734 (CA 11 1983), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 827, 105 S.Ct. 108, 83 L.Ed.2d 52 (1984). The court found four compelling interests. First, the court found that animal sacrifices present a substantial health risk, both to participants and the general public. According to the court, animals that are to be sacrificed are often kept in unsanitary conditions and are uninspected, and animal remains are found in public places. 723 F.Supp., at 1474–1475, 1485. Second, the court found emotional injury to children who witness the sacrifice of animals. Id., at 1475–1476, 1485–1486. Third, the court found compelling the city's interest 530 in protecting animals from cruel and unnecessary killing. The court determined that the method of killing used in Santeria sacrifice was "unreliable and not humane, and that the animals, before being sacrificed, are often kept in conditions that produce a great deal of fear and stress in the animal." Id., at 1472–1473, 1486. Fourth, the District Court found compelling the city's interest in restricting the slaughter or sacrifice of animals to areas zoned for slaughterhouse use. Id., at 1486. This legal determination was not accompanied by factual findings.

Balancing the competing governmental and religious interests, the District Court concluded the compelling governmental interests "fully justify the absolute prohibition on ritual sacrifice" accomplished by the ordinances. Id., at 1487. The court also concluded that an exception to the sacrifice prohibition for religious conduct would " 'unduly interfere with fulfillment of the governmental interest' " because any more narrow restrictions—e.g., regulation of disposal of animal carcasses—would be unenforceable as a result of the secret nature of the Santeria religion. Id., at 1486–1487, and nn. 57–59. A religious exemption from the city's ordinances, concluded the court, would defeat the city's compelling interests in enforcing the prohibition. Id., at 1487.

The Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed in a one-paragraph per curiam opinion. Judgt. order reported at 936 F.2d 586 (1991). Choosing not to rely on the District Court's recitation of a compelling interest in promoting the welfare of children, the Court of Appeals stated simply that it concluded the ordinances were consistent with the Constitution. App. to Pet. for Cert. A2. It declined to address the effect of Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 108 L.Ed.2d 876 (1990), decided after the District Court's opinion, because the District Court "employed an arguably stricter standard" than that applied in Smith. App. to Pet. for Cert. A2, n. 1.

531 II

The Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment, which has been applied to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment, see Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303, 60 S.Ct. 900, 903, 84 L.Ed. 1213 (1940), provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof...." (Emphasis added). The city does not argue that Santeria is not a "religion" within the meaning of the First Amendment. Nor could it. Although the practice of animal sacrifice may seem abhorrent to some, "religious beliefs need not be acceptable, logical, consistent, or comprehensible to others in order to merit First Amendment protection." Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div., 450 U.S. 707, 714, 101 S.Ct. 1425, 1430, 67 L.Ed.2d 624 (1981). Given the historical association between animal sacrifice and religious worship, see supra, at 2, petitioners' assertion that animal sacrifice is an integral part of their religion "cannot be *2226 deemed bizarre or incredible." Frazee v. Illinois Dept. of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829, 834, n. 2, 109 S.Ct. 1514, 1518, n. 2, 103 L.Ed.2d 914 (1989). Neither the city nor the courts below, moreover, have questioned the sincerity of petitioners' professed desire to conduct animal sacrifices for religious reasons. We must consider petitioners' First Amendment claim.

[1] [2] In addressing the constitutional protection for free exercise of religion, our cases establish the general proposition that a law that is neutral and of general applicability need not be justified by a compelling governmental interest even if the law has the incidental effect of burdening a particular religious practice. Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, supra. Neutrality and general applicability are interrelated, and, as becomes apparent in this case, failure to satisfy one requirement is a likely indication that the other has not been satisfied. A law failing to satisfy these requirements must be justified by a compelling governmental interest and must be narrowly tailored to advance 532 that interest. These ordinances fail to satisfy the Smith requirements. We begin by discussing neutrality.

A

In our Establishment Clause cases we have often stated the principle that the First Amendment forbids an official purpose to disapprove of a particular religion or of religion in general. See, e.g., Board of Ed. of Westside Community Schools (Dist. 66) v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226, 248, 110 S.Ct. 2356, 2370–71, 110 L.Ed.2d 191 (1990) (plurality opinion); School Dist. of Grand Rapids v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 389, 105 S.Ct. 3216, 3225–26, 87 L.Ed.2d 267 (1985); Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 56, 105 S.Ct. 2479, 2489–90, 86 L.Ed.2d 29 (1985); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 106–107, 89 S.Ct. 266, 271–72, 21 L.Ed.2d 228 (1968); School Dist. of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 225, 83 S.Ct. 1560, 1573, 10 L.Ed.2d 844 (1963); Everson v. Board of Ed. of Ewing, 330 U.S. 1, 15–16, 67 S.Ct. 504, 511–12, 91 L.Ed. 711 (1947). These cases, however, for the most part have addressed governmental efforts to benefit religion or particular religions, and so have dealt with a question different, at least in its formulation and emphasis, from the issue here. Petitioners allege an attempt to disfavor their religion because of the religious ceremonies it commands, and the Free Exercise Clause is dispositive in our analysis.

[3] At a minimum, the protections of the Free Exercise Clause pertain if the law at issue discriminates against some or all religious beliefs or regulates or prohibits conduct because it is undertaken for religious reasons. See, e.g., Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 607, 81 S.Ct. 1144, 1148, 6 L.Ed.2d 563 (1961) (plurality opinion); Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67, 69–70, 73 S.Ct. 526, 527, 97 L.Ed. 828 (1953).

Indeed, it was "historical instances of religious persecution and intolerance that gave concern to those who drafted the Free Exercise Clause." Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 703, 106 S.Ct. 2147, 2154, 90 L.Ed.2d 735 (1986) (opinion of Burger, C.J.). See J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States §§ 991–992 (abridged ed. 1833) (reprint 1987); T. Cooley, Constitutional Limitations 467 (1868) (reprint 1972); McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 464, and n. 2, 81 S.Ct. 1153, 1156, and n. 2, 6 L.Ed.2d 393 (1961) (opinion of Frankfurter, J.); Douglas v. Jeannette, 319 U.S. 157, 179, 63 S.Ct. 882, 888, 87 L.Ed. 1324 (1943) (Jackson, J., concurring in result); 533 Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333, 342, 10 S.Ct. 299, 300, 33 L.Ed. 637 (1890). These principles, though not often at issue in our Free Exercise Clause cases, have played a role in some. In McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 98 S.Ct. 1322, 55 L.Ed.2d 593 (1978), for example, we invalidated a State law that disqualified members of the clergy from holding certain public offices, because it "impose[d] special disabilities on the basis of ... religious status," Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S., at 877, 110 S.Ct., at 1599. On the *2227 same principle, in Fowler v. Rhode Island, supra, we found that a municipal ordinance was applied in an unconstitutional manner when interpreted to prohibit preaching in a public park by a Jehovah's Witness but to permit preaching during the course of a Catholic mass or Protestant church service. See also Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U.S. 268, 272–273, 71 S.Ct. 325, 327–28, 95 L.Ed. 267 (1951). Cf. Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 102 S.Ct. 1673, 72 L.Ed.2d 33 (1982) (state statute that treated some religious denominations more favorably than others violated the Establishment Clause).

1

[4] [5] Although a law targeting religious beliefs as such is never permissible, McDaniel v. Paty, supra, 435 U.S., at 626, 98 S.Ct., at 1327–28 (plurality opinion); Cantwell v. Connecticut, supra, 310 U.S., at 303–304, 60 S.Ct., at 903 if the object of a law is to infringe upon or restrict practices because of their religious motivation, the law is not neutral, see Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, supra, 494 U.S., at 878–879, 110 S.Ct., at 1599–1600; and it is invalid unless it is justified by a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to advance that interest. There are, of course, many ways of demonstrating that the object or purpose of a law is the suppression of religion or religious conduct. To determine the object of a law, we must begin with its text, for the minimum requirement of neutrality is that a law not discriminate on its face. A law lacks facial neutrality if it refers to a religious practice without a secular meaning discernable from the language or context. Petitioners contend that three of the ordinances fail this test of facial neutrality because they use the words 534 "sacrifice" and "ritual," words with strong religious connotations. Brief for Petitioners 16–17. We agree that these words are consistent with the claim of facial discrimination, but the argument is not conclusive. The words "sacrifice" and "ritual" have a religious origin, but current use admits also of secular meanings. See Webster's Third New International Dictionary 1961, 1996 (1971). See also 12 Encyclopedia of Religion, at 556 ("[T]he word sacrifice ultimately became very much a secular term in common usage"). The ordinances, furthermore, define "sacrifice" in secular terms, without referring to religious practices.

[6] [7] We reject the contention advanced by the city, see Brief for Respondent 15, that our inquiry must end with the text of the laws at issue. Facial neutrality is not determinative. The Free Exercise Clause, like the Establishment Clause, extends beyond facial discrimination. The Clause "forbids subtle departures from neutrality," Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 452, 91 S.Ct. 828, 837, 28 L.Ed.2d 168 (1971), and "covert suppression of particular religious beliefs," Bowen v. Roy, supra, 476 U.S., at 703, 106 S.Ct., at 2154 (opinion of Burger, C.J.). Official action that targets religious conduct for distinctive treatment cannot be shielded by mere compliance with the requirement of facial neutrality. The Free Exercise Clause protects against governmental hostility which is masked, as well as overt. "The Court must survey meticulously the circumstances of governmental categories to eliminate, as it were, religious gerrymanders." Walz v. Tax Comm'n of New York City, 397 U.S. 664, 696, 90 S.Ct. 1409, 1425, 25 L.Ed.2d 697 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring).

[8] The record in this case compels the conclusion that suppression of the central element of the Santeria worship service was the object of the ordinances. First, though use of the words "sacrifice" and "ritual" does not compel a finding of improper targeting of the Santeria religion, the choice of these words is support for our conclusion. There are further respects in which the text of the city council's enactments discloses the improper attempt to target Santeria. 535 Resolution 87–66, adopted June 9, 1987, recited that "residents and citizens of the City of Hialeah have expressed their concern *2228 that certain religions may propose to engage in practices which are inconsistent with public morals, peace or safety," and "reiterate[d]" the city's commitment to prohibit "any and all [such] acts of any and all religious groups." No one suggests, and on this record it cannot be maintained, that city officials had in mind a religion other than Santeria.

[9] It becomes evident that these ordinances target Santeria sacrifice when the ordinances' operation is considered. Apart from the text, the effect of a law in its real operation is strong evidence of its object. To be sure, adverse impact will not always lead to a finding of impermissible targeting. For example, a social harm may have been a legitimate concern of government for reasons quite apart from discrimination. McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S., at 442, 81 S.Ct., at 1113–14. See, e.g., Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 25 L.Ed. 244 (1879); Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333, 10 S.Ct. 299, 33 L.Ed. 637 (1890). See also Ely, Legislative and Administrative Motivation in Constitutional Law, 79 Yale L.J. 1205, 1319 (1970). The subject at hand does implicate, of course, multiple concerns unrelated to religious animosity, for example, the suffering or mistreatment visited upon the sacrificed animals and health hazards from improper disposal. But the ordinances when considered together disclose an object remote from these legitimate concerns. The design of these laws accomplishes instead a "religious gerrymander," Walz v. Tax Comm'n of New York City, supra, 397 U.S., at 696, 90 S.Ct., at 1425 (Harlan, J., concurring), an impermissible attempt to target petitioners and their religious practices.

It is a necessary conclusion that almost the only conduct subject to Ordinances 87–40, 87–52, and 87–71 is the religious exercise of Santeria church members. The texts show that they were drafted in tandem to achieve this result. We begin with Ordinance 87–71. It prohibits the sacrifice of animals, but defines sacrifice as "to unnecessarily kill ... an animal in a public or private ritual or ceremony not for the 536 primary purpose of food consumption." The definition excludes almost all killings of animals except for religious sacrifice, and the primary purpose requirement narrows the proscribed category even further, in particular by exempting kosher slaughter, see 723 F.Supp., at 1480. We need not discuss whether this differential treatment of two religions is itself an independent constitutional violation. Cf. Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S., at 244–246, 102 S.Ct., at 1683–84. It suffices to recite this feature of the law as support for our conclusion that Santeria alone was the exclusive legislative concern. The net result of the gerrymander is that few if any killings of animals are prohibited other than Santeria sacrifice, which is proscribed because it occurs during a ritual or ceremony and its primary purpose is to make an offering to the orishas, not food consumption. Indeed, careful drafting ensured that, although Santeria sacrifice is prohibited, killings that are no more necessary or humane in almost all other circumstances are unpunished.

Operating in similar fashion is Ordinance 87–52, which prohibits the "possess [ion], sacrifice, or slaughter" of an animal with the "inten[t] to use such animal for food purposes." This prohibition, extending to the keeping of an animal as well as the killing itself, applies if the animal is killed in "any type of ritual" and there is an intent to use the animal for food, whether or not it is in fact consumed for food. The ordinance exempts, however, "any licensed [food] establishment" with regard to "any animals which are specifically raised for food purposes," if the activity is permitted by zoning and other laws. This exception, too, seems intended to cover kosher slaughter. Again, the burden of the ordinance, in practical terms, falls on Santeria adherents but almost no others: If the killing is—unlike most Santeria sacrifices—unaccompanied by the intent to use the animal for food, then it is not prohibited by Ordinance 87–52; if the killing is specifically for food but does not occur during the *2229 course of "any type of ritual," it again falls outside the prohibition; and if 537 the killing is for food and occurs during the course of a ritual, it is still exempted if it occurs in a properly zoned and licensed establishment and involves animals "specifically raised for food purposes." A pattern of exemptions parallels the pattern of narrow prohibitions. Each contributes to the gerrymander.

Ordinance 87–40 incorporates the Florida animal cruelty statute, Fla.Stat. § 828.12 (1987). Its prohibition is broad on its face, punishing "[w]hoever ... unnecessarily ... kills any animal." The city claims that this ordinance is the epitome of a neutral prohibition. Brief for Respondent 13–14. The problem, however, is the interpretation given to the ordinance by respondent and the Florida attorney general. Killings for religious reasons are deemed unnecessary, whereas most other killings fall outside the prohibition. The city, on what seems to be a per se basis, deems hunting, slaughter of animals for food, eradication of insects and pests, and euthanasia as necessary. See id., at 22. There is no indication in the record that respondent has concluded that hunting or fishing for sport is unnecessary. Indeed, one of the few reported Florida cases decided under § 828.12 concludes that the use of live rabbits to train greyhounds is not unnecessary. See Kiper v. State, 310 So.2d 42 (Fla.App.), cert. denied, 328 So.2d 845 (Fla.1975). Further, because it requires an evaluation of the particular justification for the killing, this ordinance represents a system of "individualized governmental assessment of the reasons for the relevant conduct," Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S., at 884, 110 S.Ct., at 1603. As we noted in Smith, in circumstances in which individualized exemptions from a general requirement are available, the government "may not refuse to extend that system to cases of 'religious hardship' without compelling reason." Ibid., quoting Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S., at 708, 106 S.Ct., at 2156 (opinion of Burger, C.J.). Respondent's application of the ordinance's test of necessity devalues religious reasons for killing by judging them to be of lesser import than nonreligious 538 reasons. Thus, religious practice is being singled out for discriminatory treatment. Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S., at 722, and n. 17, 106 S.Ct., at 2164, and n. 17 (STEVENS, J., concurring in part and concurring in result); id., at 708, 106 S.Ct. 2156 (opinion of Burger, C.J.); United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 264, n. 3, 102 S.Ct. 1051, 1059, n. 3, 71 L.Ed.2d 127 (1982) (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment).

We also find significant evidence of the ordinances' improper targeting of Santeria sacrifice in the fact that they proscribe more religious conduct than is necessary to achieve their stated ends. It is not unreasonable to infer, at least when there are no persuasive indications to the contrary, that a law which visits "gratuitous restrictions" on religious conduct, McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S., at 520, 81 S.Ct., at 1186 (opinion of Frankfurter, J.), seeks not to effectuate the stated governmental interests, but to suppress the conduct because of its religious motivation.

[10] The legitimate governmental interests in protecting the public health and preventing cruelty to animals could be addressed by restrictions stopping far short of a flat prohibition of all Santeria sacrificial practice.[*] If improper disposal, not the sacrifice itself, is the harm to be prevented, the city could have imposed a general regulation *2230 on the disposal of organic garbage. It did not do so. Indeed, counsel for the city conceded at oral argument that, under the ordinances, Santeria sacrifices would be illegal even if they occurred in licensed, inspected, and zoned slaughterhouses. Tr. of Oral Arg. 45. See also id., at 42, 48. Thus, these broad ordinances prohibit Santeria sacrifice even when it does not threaten the city'sinterest 539 in the public health. The District Court accepted the argument that narrower regulation would be unenforceable because of the secrecy in the Santeria rituals and the lack of any central religious authority to require compliance with secular disposal regulations. See 723 F.Supp., at 1486–1487, and nn. 58–59. It is difficult to understand, however, how a prohibition of the sacrifices themselves, which occur in private, is enforceable if a ban on improper disposal, which occurs in public, is not. The neutrality of a law is suspect if First Amendment freedoms are curtailed to prevent isolated collateral harms not themselves prohibited by direct regulation. See, e.g., Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147, 162, 60 S.Ct. 146, 151–52, 84 L.Ed. 155 (1939).

Under similar analysis, narrower regulation would achieve the city's interest in preventing cruelty to animals. With regard to the city's interest in ensuring the adequate care of animals, regulation of conditions and treatment, regardless of why an animal is kept, is the logical response to the city's concern, not a prohibition on possession for the purpose of sacrifice. The same is true for the city's interest in prohibiting cruel methods of killing. Under federal and Florida law and Ordinance 87–40, which incorporates Florida law in this regard, killing an animal by the "simultaneous and instantaneous severance of the carotid arteries with a sharp instrument"—the method used in kosher slaughter—is approved as humane. See 7 U.S.C. § 1902(b); Fla.Stat. § 828.23(7)(b) (1991); Ordinance 87–40, § 1. The District Court found that, though Santeria sacrifice also results in severance of the carotid arteries, the method used during sacrifice is less reliable and therefore not humane. See 723 F.Supp., at 1472–1473. If the city has a real concern that other methods are less humane, however, the subject of the regulation should be the method of slaughter itself, not a religious classification that is said to bear some general relation to it.

[11] Ordinance 87–72—unlike the three other ordinances—does appear to apply to substantial nonreligious conduct and 540 not to be overbroad. For our purposes here, however, the four substantive ordinances may be treated as a group for neutrality purposes. Ordinance 87–72 was passed the same day as Ordinance 87–71 and was enacted, as were the three others, in direct response to the opening of the Church. It would be implausible to suggest that the three other ordinances, but not Ordinance 87–72, had as their object the suppression of religion. We need not decide whether the Ordinance 87–72 could survive constitutional scrutiny if it existed separately; it must be invalidated because it functions, with the rest of the enactments in question, to suppress Santeria religious worship.

2

In determining if the object of a law is a neutral one under the Free Exercise Clause, we can also find guidance in our equal protection cases. As Justice Harlan noted in the related context of the Establishment Clause, "[n]eutrality in its application requires an equal protection mode of analysis." Walz v. Tax Comm'n of New York City, 397 U.S., at 696, 90 S.Ct., at 1425 (concurring opinion). Here, as in equal protection cases, we may determine the city council's object from both direct and circumstantial evidence. Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266, 97 S.Ct. 555, 563–64, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977). Relevant evidence includes, among other things, the historical background of the decision under challenge, the specific series of events leading to the enactment or official policy in question, and the legislative or administrative history, including contemporaneous *2231 statements made by members of the decisionmaking body. Id., at 267–268, 97 S.Ct., at 564–65. These objective factors bear on the question of discriminatory object. Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279, n. 24, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2296, n. 24, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979).

That the ordinances were enacted " 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' " their suppression of Santeria religious practice, id., at 279, 99 S.Ct., at 2296 is revealed by the events preceding their enactment. Although respondent claimed at oral argument 541 that it had experienced significant problems resulting from the sacrifice of animals within the city before the announced opening of the Church, Tr. of Oral Arg. 27, 46, the city council made no attempt to address the supposed problem before its meeting in June 1987, just weeks after the Church announced plans to open. The minutes and taped excerpts of the June 9 session, both of which are in the record, evidence significant hostility exhibited by residents, members of the city council, and other city officials toward the Santeria religion and its practice of animal sacrifice. The public crowd that attended the June 9 meetings interrupted statements by council members critical of Santeria with cheers and the brief comments of Pichardo with taunts. When Councilman Martinez, a supporter of the ordinances, stated that in prerevolution Cuba "people were put in jail for practicing this religion," the audience applauded. Taped excerpts of Hialeah City Council Meeting, June 9, 1987.

Other statements by members of the city council were in a similar vein. For example, Councilman Martinez, after noting his belief that Santeria was outlawed in Cuba, questioned: "[I]f we could not practice this [religion] in our homeland [Cuba], why bring it to this country?" Councilman Cardoso said that Santeria devotees at the Church "are in violation of everything this country stands for." Councilman Mejides indicated that he was "totally against the sacrificing of animals" and distinguished kosher slaughter because it had a "real purpose." The "Bible says we are allowed to sacrifice an animal for consumption," he continued, "but for any other purposes, I don't believe that the Bible allows that." The president of the city council, Councilman Echevarria, asked: "What can we do to prevent the Church from opening?"

Various Hialeah city officials made comparable comments. The chaplain of the Hialeah Police Department told the city council that Santeria was a sin, "foolishness," "an abomination to the Lord," and the worship of "demons." He advised 542 the city council: "We need to be helping people and sharing with them the truth that is found in Jesus Christ." He concluded: "I would exhort you ... not to permit this Church to exist." The city attorney commented that Resolution 87–66 indicated: "This community will not tolerate religious practices which are abhorrent to its citizens...." Ibid. Similar comments were made by the deputy city attorney. This history discloses the object of the ordinances to target animal sacrifice by Santeria worshippers because of its religious motivation.

3

In sum, the neutrality inquiry leads to one conclusion: The ordinances had as their object the suppression of religion. The pattern we have recited discloses animosity to Santeria adherents and their religious practices; the ordinances by their own terms target this religious exercise; the texts of the ordinances were gerrymandered with care to proscribe religious killings of animals but to exclude almost all secular killings; and the ordinances suppress much more religious conduct than is necessary in order to achieve the legitimate ends asserted in their defense. These ordinances are not neutral, and the court below committed clear error in failing to reach this conclusion.

B

[12] We turn next to a second requirement of the Free Exercise Clause, the rule *2232 that laws burdening religious practice must be of general applicability. Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S., at 879–881, 110 S.Ct., at 1600–1601. All laws are selective to some extent, but categories of selection are of paramount concern when a law has the incidental effect of burdening religious practice. The Free Exercise Clause "protect[s] religious observers against unequal treatment," Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Fla., 480 U.S. 136, 148, 107 S.Ct. 1046, 1053, 94 L.Ed.2d 190 (1987) (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment), and inequality results when a legislature decides that 543 the governmental interests it seeks to advance are worthy of being pursued only against conduct with a religious motivation.

[13] The principle that government, in pursuit of legitimate interests, cannot in a selective manner impose burdens only on conduct motivated by religious belief is essential to the protection of the rights guaranteed by the Free Exercise Clause. The principle underlying the general applicability requirement has parallels in our First Amendment jurisprudence. See, e.g., Cohen v. Cowles Media Co., 501 U.S. 663, 669–670, 111 S.Ct. 2513, 2518–2519, 115 L.Ed.2d 586 (1991); University of Pennsylvania v. EEOC, 493 U.S. 182, 201, 110 S.Ct. 577, 588–89, 107 L.Ed.2d 571 (1990); Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585, 103 S.Ct. 1365, 1371–72, 75 L.Ed.2d 295 (1983); Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S., at 245–246, 102 S.Ct., at 1683–84; Presbyterian Church in U.S. v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440, 449, 89 S.Ct. 601, 606, 21 L.Ed.2d 658 (1969). In this case we need not define with precision the standard used to evaluate whether a prohibition is of general application, for these ordinances fall well below the minimum standard necessary to protect First Amendment rights.

[14] Respondent claims that Ordinances 87–40, 87–52, and 87–71 advance two interests: protecting the public health and preventing cruelty to animals. The ordinances are underinclusive for those ends. They fail to prohibit nonreligious conduct that endangers these interests in a similar or greater degree than Santeria sacrifice does. The underinclusion is substantial, not inconsequential. Despite the city's proffered interest in preventing cruelty to animals, the ordinances are drafted with care to forbid few killings but those occasioned by religious sacrifice. Many types of animal deaths or kills for nonreligious reasons are either not prohibited or approved by express provision. For example, fishing—which occurs in Hialeah, see A. Khedouri & F. Khedouri, South Florida Inside Out 57 (1991)—is legal. Extermination of mice and rats within a home is also permitted. Florida law incorporated by Ordinance 87–40 sanctions 544 euthanasia of "stray, neglected, abandoned, or unwanted animals," Fla.Stat. § 828.058 (1987); destruction of animals judicially removed from their owners "for humanitarian reasons" or when the animal "is of no commercial value," § 828.073(4)(c)(2); the infliction of pain or suffering "in the interest of medical science," § 828.02; the placing of poison in one's yard or enclosure, § 828.08; and the use of a live animal "to pursue or take wildlife or to participate in any hunting," § 828.122(6)(b), and "to hunt wild hogs," § 828.122(6)(e).

The city concedes that "neither the State of Florida nor the City has enacted a generally applicable ban on the killing of animals." Brief for Respondent 21. It asserts, however, that animal sacrifice is "different" from the animal killings that are permitted by law. Ibid. According to the city, it is "self-evident" that killing animals for food is "important"; the eradication of insects and pests is "obviously justified"; and the euthanasia of excess animals "makes sense." Id., at 22. These ipse dixits do not explain why religion alone must bear the burden of the ordinances, when many of these secular killings fall within the city's interest in preventing the cruel treatment of animals.

*2233 [15] The ordinances are also underinclusive with regard to the city's interest in public health, which is threatened by the disposal of animal carcasses in open public places and the consumption of uninspected meat, see Brief for Respondent 32, citing 723 F.Supp., at 1474–1475, 1485. Neither interest is pursued by respondent with regard to conduct that is not motivated by religious conviction. The health risks posed by the improper disposal of animal carcasses are the same whether Santeria sacrifice or some nonreligious killing preceded it. The city does not, however, prohibit hunters from bringing their kill to their houses, nor does it regulate disposal after their activity. Despite substantial testimony at trial that the same public health hazards result from improper disposal of garbage by restaurants, see 11 Record 566, 545 590–591, restaurants are outside the scope of the ordinances. Improper disposal is a general problem that causes substantial health risks, 723 F.Supp., at 1485, but which respondent addresses only when it results from religious exercise.

The ordinances are underinclusive as well with regard to the health risk posed by consumption of uninspected meat. Under the city's ordinances, hunters may eat their kill and fishermen may eat their catch without undergoing governmental inspection. Likewise, state law requires inspection of meat that is sold but exempts meat from animals raised for the use of the owner and "members of his household and nonpaying guests and employees." Fla.Stat. § 585.88(1)(a) (1991). The asserted interest in inspected meat is not pursued in contexts similar to that of religious animal sacrifice.

Ordinance 87–72, which prohibits the slaughter of animals outside of areas zoned for slaughterhouses, is underinclusive on its face. The ordinance includes an exemption for "any person, group, or organization" that "slaughters or processes for sale, small numbers of hogs and/or cattle per week in accordance with an exemption provided by state law." See Fla.Stat. § 828.24(3) (1991). Respondent has not explained why commercial operations that slaughter "small numbers" of hogs and cattle do not implicate its professed desire to prevent cruelty to animals and preserve the public health. Although the city has classified Santeria sacrifice as slaughter, subjecting it to this ordinance, it does not regulate other killings for food in like manner.

We conclude, in sum, that each of Hialeah's ordinances pursues the city's governmental interests only against conduct motivated by religious belief. The ordinances "ha[ve] every appearance of a prohibition that society is prepared to impose upon [Santeria worshippers] but not upon itself." Florida Star v. B.J.F., 491 U.S. 524, 542, 109 S.Ct. 2603, 2614, 105 L.Ed.2d 443 (1989) (SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). This 546 precise evil is what the requirement of general applicability is designed to prevent.

III

[16] [17] [18] A law burdening religious practice that is not neutral or not of general application must undergo the most rigorous of scrutiny. To satisfy the commands of the First Amendment, a law restrictive of religious practice must advance " 'interests of the highest order' " and must be narrowly tailored in pursuit of those interests. McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S., at 628, 98 S.Ct., at 1328, quoting Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 1533, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972). The compelling interest standard that we apply once a law fails to meet the Smith requirements is not "water[ed] ... down" but "really means what it says." Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S., at 888, 110 S.Ct., at 1605. A law that targets religious conduct for distinctive treatment or advances legitimate governmental interests only against conduct with a religious motivation will survive strict scrutiny only in rare cases. It follows from what we have already said that these ordinances cannot withstand this scrutiny.

*2234 First, even were the governmental interests compelling, the ordinances are not drawn in narrow terms to accomplish those interests. As we have discussed, see supra, at 16–18, 21–24, all four ordinances are overbroad or underinclusive in substantial respects. The proffered objectives are not pursued with respect to analogous non-religious conduct, and those interests could be achieved by narrower ordinances that burdened religion to a far lesser degree. The absence of narrow tailoring suffices to establish the invalidity of the ordinances. See Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 U.S. 221, 232, 107 S.Ct. 1722, 1729, 95 L.Ed.2d 209 (1987).

Respondent has not demonstrated, moreover, that, in the context of these ordinances, its governmental interests are compelling. Where government restricts only conduct protected by the First Amendment and fails to enact feasible 547 measures to restrict other conduct producing substantial harm or alleged harm of the same sort, the interest given in justification of the restriction is not compelling. It is established in our strict scrutiny jurisprudence that "a law cannot be regarded as protecting an interest 'of the highest order' ... when it leaves appreciable damage to that supposedly vital interest unprohibited." Florida Star v. B.J.F., supra, 491 U.S., at 541–542, 109 S.Ct., at 2613–14 (SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (citation omitted). See Simon & Schuster, Inc. v. Members of N.Y. State Crime Victims Bd., 502 U.S. 105, 119–120, 112 S.Ct. 501, 510–11, 116 L.Ed.2d 476 (1991). Cf. Florida Star v. B.J.F., supra, at 540–541, 109 S.Ct., at 2612–13; Smith v. Daily Mail Publishing Co., 443 U.S. 97, 104–105, 99 S.Ct. 2667, 2671–72, 61 L.Ed.2d 399 (1979); id., at 110, 99 S.Ct., at 2674–75 (REHNQUIST, J., concurring in judgment). As we show above, see supra, at 21–24, the ordinances are underinclusive to a substantial extent with respect to each of the interests that respondent has asserted, and it is only conduct motivated by religious conviction that bears the weight of the governmental restrictions. There can be no serious claim that those interests justify the ordinances.

IV

The Free Exercise Clause commits government itself to religious tolerance, and upon even slight suspicion that proposals for state intervention stem from animosity to religion or distrust of its practices, all officials must pause to remember their own high duty to the Constitution and to the rights it secures. Those in office must be resolute in resisting importunate demands and must ensure that the sole reasons for imposing the burdens of law and regulation are secular. Legislators may not devise mechanisms, overt or disguised, designed to persecute or oppress a religion or its practices. The laws here in question were enacted contrary to these constitutional principles, and they are void.

Reversed.

548 APPENDIX TO OPINION OF THE COURT

City of Hialeah, Florida, Resolution No. 87–66, adopted June 9, 1987, provides:

> "WHEREAS, residents and citizens of the City of Hialeah have expressed their concern that certain religions may propose to engage in practices which are inconsistent with public morals, peace or safety, and
>
> "WHEREAS, the Florida Constitution, Article I, Declaration of Rights, Section 3, Religious Freedom, specifically states that religious freedom shall not justify practices inconsistent with public morals, peace or safety.
>
> "NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED BY THE MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF HIALEAH, FLORIDA, that:
>
> "1. The City reiterates its commitment to a prohibition against any and all acts of any and all religious groups which are *2235 inconsistent with public morals, peace or safety."

City of Hialeah, Florida, Ordinance No. 87–40, adopted June 9, 1987, provides:

> "WHEREAS, the citizens of the City of Hialeah, Florida, have expressed great concern over the potential for animal sacrifices being conducted in the City of Hialeah; and
>
> "WHEREAS, Section 828.27, Florida Statutes, provides that 'nothing contained in this section shall prevent any county or municipality from enacting any ordinance relating to animal control or cruelty to animals which is identical to the provisions of this Chapter ... except as to penalty.'
>
> "NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT ORDAINED BY THE MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF HIALEAH, FLORIDA, that:
>
> 549 "Section 1. The Mayor and City Council of the City of Hialeah, Florida, hereby adopt Florida Statute, Chapter 828—'Cruelty to Animals' (copy attached hereto and made a part hereof), in its entirety (relating to animal control or cruelty to animals), except as to penalty.
>
> "Section 2. Repeal of Ordinances in Conflict.
>
> "All ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict herewith are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict.
>
> "Section 3. Penalties.
>
> "Any person, firm or corporation convicted of violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be punished by a fine, not exceeding $500.00, or by a jail sentence, not exceeding sixty (60) days, or both, in the discretion of the Court.
>
> "Section 4. Inclusion in Code.
>
> "The provisions of this Ordinance shall be included and incorporated in the Code of the City of Hialeah, as an addition or amendment thereto, and the sections of this Ordinance shall be re-numbered to conform to the uniform numbering system of the Code.
>
> "Section 5. Severability Clause.
>
> "If any phrase, clause, sentence, paragraph or section of this Ordinance shall be declared invalid or unconstitutional by the judge or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, such invalidity or unconstitutionality shall not effect any of the remaining phrases, clauses, sentences, paragraphs or sections of this ordinance.
>
> "Section 6. Effective Date.
>
> "This Ordinance shall become effective when passed by the City Council of the City of Hialeah and signed by the Mayor of the City of Hialeah."

City of Hialeah Resolution No. 87–90, adopted August 11, 1987, provides:

> "WHEREAS, the residents and citizens of the City of Hialeah, Florida, have expressed great concern regarding 550 the possibility of public ritualistic animal sacrifices in the City of Hialeah, Florida; and

"WHEREAS, the City of Hialeah, Florida, has received an opinion from the Attorney General of the State of Florida, concluding that public ritualistic animal sacrifices is [sic] a violation of the Florida State Statute on Cruelty to Animals; and

"WHEREAS, the Attorney General further held that the sacrificial killing of animals other than for the primary purpose of food consumption is prohibited under state law; and

"WHEREAS, the City of Hialeah, Florida, has enacted an ordinance mirroring state law prohibiting cruelty to animals.

"NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED BY THE MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF HIALEAH, FLORIDA, that:

"Section 1. It is the policy of the Mayor and City Council of the City of Hialeah, Florida, to oppose the ritual sacrifices of animals within the City of Hialeah, FLorida [sic]. Any individual or organization *2236 that seeks to practice animal sacrifice in violation of state and local law will be prosecuted."

City of Hialeah, Florida, Ordinance No. 87–52, adopted September 8, 1987, provides:

"WHEREAS, the residents and citizens of the City of Hialeah, Florida, have expressed great concern regarding the possibility of public ritualistic animal sacrifices within the City of Hialeah, Florida; and

"WHEREAS, the City of Hialeah, Florida, has received an opinion from the Attorney General of the State of Florida, concluding that public ritualistic animal sacrifice, other than for the primary purpose of food consumption, is a violation of state law; and 551 "WHEREAS, the City of Hialeah, Florida, has enacted an ordinance (Ordinance No. 87–40), mirroring the state law prohibiting cruelty to animals.

"WHEREAS, the City of Hialeah, Florida, now wishes to specifically prohibit the possession of animals for slaughter or sacrifice within the City of Hialeah, Florida.

"NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT ORDAINED BY THE MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF HIALEAH, FLORIDA, that:

"Section 1. Chapter 6 of the Code of Ordinances of the City of Hialeah, Florida, is hereby amended by adding thereto two (2) new Sections 6–8 'Definitions' and 6–9 'Prohibition Against Possession Of Animals For Slaughter Or Sacrifice', which is to read as follows:

"Section 6–8. Definitions

"1. Animal—any living dumb creature.

"2. Sacrifice—to unnecessarily kill, torment, torture, or mutilate an animal in a public or private ritual or ceremony not for the primary purpose of food consumption.

"3. Slaughter—the killing of animals for food.

"Section 6–9. Prohibition Against Possession of Animals for Slaughter Or Sacrifice.

"1. No person shall own, keep or otherwise possess, sacrifice, or slaughter any sheep, goat, pig, cow or the young of such species, poultry, rabbit, dog, cat, or any other animal, intending to use such animal for food purposes.

"2. This section is applicable to any group or individual that kills, slaughters or sacrifices animals for any type of ritual, regardless of whether or not the flesh or blood of the animal is to be consumed.

"3. Nothing in this ordinance is to be interpreted as prohibiting any licensed establishment from slaughtering for food purposes any animals which are specifically 552 raised for food purposes where such activity is properly zoned and/or permitted under state and local law and under rules promulgated by the Florida Department of Agriculture.

"Section 2. Repeal of Ordinance in Conflict.

"All ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict herewith are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict.

"Section 3. Penalties.

"Any person, firm or corporation convicted of violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be punished by a fine, not exceeding $500.00, or by a jail sentence, not exceeding sixty (60) days, or both, in the discretion of the Court.

"Section 4. Inclusion in Code.

"The provisions of this Ordinance shall be included and incorporated in the Code of the City of Hialeah, as an addition or amendment thereto, and the sections of this Ordinance shall be re-numbered to conform to the uniform numbering system of the Code.

"Section 5. Severability Clause.

"If any phrase, clause, sentence, paragraph or section of this Ordinance shall be declared invalid or unconstitutional by the judgement or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, such invalidity or unconstitutionality *2237 shall not effect any of the remaining phrases, clauses, sentences, paragraphs or sections of this ordinance.

"Section 6. Effective Date.

"This Ordinance shall become effective when passed by the City Council of the City of Hialeah and signed by the Mayor of the City of Hialeah."

City of Hialeah, Florida, Ordinance No. 87–71, adopted September 22, 1987, provides:

"WHEREAS, the City Council of the City of Hialeah, Florida, has determined that the sacrificing of animals 553 within the city limits is contrary to the public health, safety, welfare and morals of the community; and

"WHEREAS, the City Council of the City of Hialeah, Florida, desires to have qualified societies or corporations organized under the laws of the State of Florida, to be authorized to investigate and prosecute any violation(s) of the ordinance herein after set forth, and for the registration of the agents of said societies.

"NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT ORDAINED BY THE MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF HIALEAH, FLORIDA, that:

"Section 1. For the purpose of this ordinance, the word sacrifice shall mean: to unnecessarily kill, torment, torture, or mutilate an animal in a public or private ritual or ceremony not for the primary purpose of food consumption.

"Section 2. For the purpose of this ordinance, the word animal shall mean: any living dumb creature.

"Section 3. It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, corporations or associations to sacrifice any animal within the corporate limits of the City of Hialeah, Florida.

"Section 4. All societies or associations for the prevention of cruelty to animals organized under the laws of the State of Florida, seeking to register with the City of Hialeah for purposes of investigating and assisting in the prosecution of violations and provisions [sic] of this Ordinance, shall apply to the City Council for authorization to so register and shall be registered with the Office of the Mayor of the City of Hialeah, Florida, following approval by the City Council at a public hearing in accordance with rules and regulations (i.e., criteria) established by the City Council by resolution, and shall thereafter, be empowered to assist in the prosection of any violation of this Ordinance.

554 "Section 5. Any society or association for the prevention of cruelty to animals registered with the Mayor of the City of Hialeah, Florida, in accordance with the provisions of Section 4 hereinabove, may appoint agents for the purposes of investigating and assisting in the prosecution of violations and provisions [sic] of this Ordinance, or any other laws of the City of Hialeah, Florida, for the purpose of protecting animals and preventing any act prohibited hereunder.

"Section 6. Repeal of Ordinances in Conflict.

"All ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict herewith are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict.

"Section 7. Penalties.

"Any person, firm or corporation convicted of violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be punished by a fine, not exceeding $500.00, or by a jail sentence, not exceeding sixty (60) days, or both, in the discretion of the Court.

"Section 8. Inclusion in Code.

"The provisions of this Ordinance shall be included and incorporated in the Code of the City of Hialeah, as an addition or amendment thereto, and the sections of this Ordinance shall be re-numbered to conform to the uniform numbering system of the Code.

"Section 9. Severability Clause.

*2238 "If any phrase, clause, sentence, paragraph or section of this Ordinance shall be declared invalid or unconstitutional by the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, such invalidity or unconstitutionality shall not effect any of the remaining phrases, clauses, sentences, paragraphs or sections of this Ordinance.

"Section 10. Effective Date.

"This Ordinance shall become effective when passed by the City Council of the City of Hialeah and signed by the Mayor of the City of Hialeah."

555 City of Hialeah, Florida, Ordinance No. 87–72, adopted September 22, 1987, provides:

"WHEREAS, the City Council of the City of Hialeah, Florida, has determined that the slaughtering of animals on the premises other than those properly zoned as a slaughter house, is contrary to the public health, safety and welfare of the citizens of Hialeah, Florida.

"NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT ORDAINED BY THE MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF HIALEAH, FLORIDA, that:

"Section 1. For the purpose of this Ordinance, the word slaughter shall mean: the killing of animals for food.

"Section 2. For the purpose of this Ordinance, the word animal shall mean: any living dumb creature.

"Section 3. It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, corporations or associations to slaughter any animal on any premises in the City of Hialeah, Florida, except those properly zoned as a slaughter house, and meeting all the health, safety and sanitation codes prescribed by the City for the operation of a slaughter house.

"Section 4. All societies or associations for the prevention of cruelty to animals organized under the laws of the State of Florida, seeking to register with the City of Hialeah for purposes of investigating and assisting in the prosecution of violations and provisions [sic] of this Ordinance, shall apply to the City Council for authorization to so register and shall be registered with the Office of the Mayor of the City of Hialeah, Florida, following approval by the City Council at a public hearing in accordance with rules and regulations (i.e., criteria) established by the City Council by resolution, and shall thereafter, be empowered to assist in the prosection of any violations of this Ordinance.

556 "Section 5. Any society or association for the prevention of cruelty to animals registered with the Mayor of the City of Hialeah, Florida, in accordance with the provisions of Section 4 hereinabove, may appoint agents for the purposes of investigating and assisting in the prosecution of violations and provisions [sic] of this Ordinance, or any other laws of the City of Hialeah, Florida, for the purpose of protecting animals and preventing any act prohibited hereunder.

"Section 6. This Ordinance shall not apply to any person, group or organization that slaughters, or processes for sale, small numbers of hogs and/or cattle per week in accordance with an exemption provided by state law.

"Section 7. Repeal of Ordinances in Conflict.

"All ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict herewith are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict.

"Section 8. Penalties.

"Any person, firm or corporation convicted of violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be punished by a fine, not exceeding $500.00, or by a jail sentence, not exceeding sixty (60) days, or both, in the discretion of the Court.

"Section 9. Inclusion in Code.

"The provisions of this Ordinance shall be included and incorporated in the Code of the City of Hialeah, as an addition or amendment thereto, and the sections of *2239 this Ordinance shall be re-numbered to conform to the uniform numbering system of the Code.

"Section 10. Severability Clause.

"If any phrase, clause, sentence, paragraph or section of this Ordinance shall be declared invalid or unconstitutional by the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, such invalidity or unconstitutionality shall not effect any of the remaining phrases, clauses, sentences, paragraphs or sections of this ordinance.

557 "Section 11. Effective Date.

"This Ordinance shall become effective when passed by the City Council of the City of Hialeah and signed by the Mayor of the City of Hialeah."

Justice SCALIA, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE joins, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

The Court analyzes the "neutrality" and the "general applicability" of the Hialeah ordinances in separate sections (Parts II–A and II–B, respectively), and allocates various invalidating factors to one or the other of those sections. If it were necessary to make a clear distinction between the two terms, I would draw a line somewhat different from the Court's. But I think it is not necessary, and would frankly acknowledge that the terms are not only "interrelated," ante, 2226, but substantially overlap.

The terms "neutrality" and "general applicability" are not to be found within the First Amendment itself, of course, but are used in Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 108 L.Ed.2d 876 (1990), and earlier cases to describe those characteristics which cause a law that prohibits an activity a particular individual wishes to engage in for religious reasons nonetheless not to constitute a "law ... prohibiting the free exercise" of religion within the meaning of the First Amendment. In my view, the defect of lack of neutrality applies primarily to those laws that by their terms impose disabilities on the basis of religion (e.g., a law excluding members of a certain sect from public benefits, cf. McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 98 S.Ct. 1322, 55 L.Ed.2d 593 (1978)), see Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 703–704, 106 S.Ct. 2147, 2153–54, 90 L.Ed.2d 735 (1986) (opinion of Burger, C.J.); whereas the defect of lack of general applicability applies primarily to those laws which, though neutral in their terms, through their design, construction, or enforcement target the practices of a particular religion for discriminatory treatment, see Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67, 73 S.Ct. 526, 97 L.Ed. 828 (1953). But certainly a law that is not of general applicability (in the sense I 558 have described) can be considered "nonneutral"; and certainly no law that is nonneutral (in the relevant sense) can be thought to be of general applicability. Because I agree with most of the invalidating factors set forth in Part II of the Court's opinion, and because it seems to me a matter of no consequence under which rubric ("neutrality," Part II–A, or "general applicability," Part II–B) each invalidating factor is discussed, I join the judgment of the Court and all of its opinion except section 2 of Part II–A.

I do not join that section because it departs from the opinion's general focus on the object of the laws at issue to consider the subjective motivation of the lawmakers, i.e., whether the Hialeah City Council actually intended to disfavor the religion of Santeria. As I have noted elsewhere, it is virtually impossible to determine the singular "motive" of a collective legislative body, see, e.g., Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578, 636–639, 107 S.Ct. 2573, 2605–07, 96 L.Ed.2d 510 (1987) (dissenting opinion), and this Court has a long tradition of refraining from such inquiries, see, e.g., Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 130–131, 3 L.Ed. 162 (1810) (Marshall, C.J.); *2240 United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 383–384, 88 S.Ct. 1673, 1682–83, 20 L.Ed.2d 672 (1968).

Perhaps there are contexts in which determination of legislative motive must be undertaken. See, e.g., United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303, 66 S.Ct. 1073, 90 L.Ed. 1252 (1946). But I do not think that is true of analysis under the First Amendment (or the Fourteenth, to the extent it incorporates the First). See Edwards v. Aguillard, supra, 482 U.S., at 639, 107 S.Ct., at 2607 (SCALIA, J., dissenting). The First Amendment does not refer to the purposes for which legislators enact laws, but to the effects of the laws enacted: "Congress shall make no law ... prohibiting the free exercise [of religion]...." This does not put us in the business of invalidating laws by reason of the evil motives of their authors. Had the Hialeah City Council set out resolutely to suppress the practices of Santeria, but ineptly adopted ordinances that failed to do so, I do not see how those laws could be said to "prohibi[t] the free exercise" of 559 religion. Nor, in my view, does it matter that a legislature consists entirely of the pure-hearted, if the law it enacts in fact singles out a religious practice for special burdens. Had the ordinances here been passed with no motive on the part of any councilman except the ardent desire to prevent cruelty to animals (as might in fact have been the case), they would nonetheless be invalid.

Justice SOUTER, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

This case turns on a principle about which there is no disagreement, that the Free Exercise Clause bars government action aimed at suppressing religious belief or practice. The Court holds that Hialeah's animal-sacrifice laws violate that principle, and I concur in that holding without reservation.

Because prohibiting religious exercise is the object of the laws at hand, this case does not present the more difficult issue addressed in our last free-exercise case, Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 108 L.Ed.2d 876 (1990), which announced the rule that a "neutral, generally applicable" law does not run afoul of the Free Exercise Clause even when it prohibits religious exercise in effect. The Court today refers to that rule in dicta, and despite my general agreement with the Court's opinion I do not join Part II, where the dicta appear, for I have doubts about whether the Smith rule merits adherence. I write separately to explain why the Smith rule is not germane to this case and to express my view that, in a case presenting the issue, the Court should re-examine the rule Smith declared.

I

According to Smith, if prohibiting the exercise of religion results from enforcing a "neutral, generally applicable" law, the Free Exercise Clause has not been offended. Id., at 878–880, 110 S.Ct., at 1599–1601. I call this the Smith rule to distinguish it from the noncontroversial principle, also expressed in Smith though 560 established long before, that the Free Exercise Clause is offended when prohibiting religious exercise results from a law that is not neutral or generally applicable. It is this noncontroversial principle, that the Free Exercise Clause requires neutrality and general applicability, that is at issue here. But before turning to the relationship of Smith to this case, it will help to get the terms in order, for the significance of the Smith rule is not only in its statement that the Free Exercise Clause requires no more than "neutrality" and "general applicability," but also in its adoption of a particular, narrow conception of free-exercise neutrality.

That the Free Exercise Clause contains a "requirement for governmental neutrality," Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 220, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 1535–36, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972), is hardly a novel proposition; though the term does not appear in the First Amendment, our cases have used it as shorthand to describe, at least in part, what the Clause commands. *2241 See, e.g., Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of Cal., 493 U.S. 378, 384, 110 S.Ct. 688, 693, 107 L.Ed.2d 796 (1990); Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div., 450 U.S. 707, 717, 101 S.Ct. 1425, 1431, 67 L.Ed.2d 624 (1981); Yoder, supra, 406 U.S., at 220, 92 S.Ct., at 1535; Committee for Public Ed. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 792–793, 93 S.Ct. 2955, 2975, 37 L.Ed.2d 948 (1973); School Dist. of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 222, 83 S.Ct. 1560, 1571, 10 L.Ed.2d 844 (1963); see also McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 627–629, 98 S.Ct. 1322, 1328–1329, 55 L.Ed.2d 593 (1978) (plurality opinion) (invalidating a nonneutral law without using the term). Nor is there anything unusual about the notion that the Free Exercise Clause requires general applicability, though the Court, until today, has not used exactly that term in stating a reason for invalidation. See Fowler v. Rhode Island, 345 U.S. 67, 73 S.Ct. 526, 97 L.Ed. 828 (1953); cf. Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575, 585, 103 S.Ct. 1365, 1372, 75 L.Ed.2d 295 (1983); Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 245–246, 102 S.Ct. 1673, 1683–1684, 72 L.Ed.2d 33 (1982).[1]

561 While general applicability is, for the most part, self-explanatory, free-exercise neutrality is not self-revealing. Cf. Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 627, 112 S.Ct. 2649, 2676, 120 L.Ed.2d 467 (1992) (SOUTER, J., concurring) (considering Establishment Clause neutrality). A law that is religion neutral on its face or in its purpose may lack neutrality in its effect by forbidding something that religion requires or requiring something that religion forbids. Cf. McConnell & Posner, An Economic Approach to Issues of Religious Freedom, 56 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1, 35 (1989) ("[A] regulation is not neutral in an economic sense if, whatever its normal scope or its intentions, it arbitrarily imposes greater costs on religious than on comparable nonreligious activities"). A secular law, applicable to all, that prohibits consumption of alcohol, for example, will affect members of religions that require the use of wine differently from members of other religions and nonbelievers, disproportionately burdening the practice of, say, Catholicism or Judaism. Without an exemption for sacramental wine, Prohibition may fail the test of religion neutrality.[2]

It does not necessarily follow from that observation, of course, that the First Amendment requires an exemption from Prohibition; that depends on the meaning of neutrality as the Free Exercise Clause embraces it. The point here is the unremarkable one that our common notion of neutrality is broad enough to cover not merely what might be called formal neutrality, which as a free-exercise requirement 562 would only bar laws with an object to discriminate against religion, but also what might be called substantive neutrality, which, in addition to demanding a secular object, would generally require government to accommodate religious differences by exempting religious practices from formally neutral laws. See generally Laycock, Formal, Substantive, and Disaggregated *2242 Neutrality Toward Religion, 39 DePaul L.Rev. 993 (1990). If the Free Exercise Clause secures only protection against deliberate discrimination, a formal requirement will exhaust the Clause's neutrality command; if the Free Exercise Clause, rather, safeguards a right to engage in religious activity free from unnecessary governmental interference, the Clause requires substantive, as well as formal, neutrality.[3]

Though Smith used the term "neutrality" without a modifier, the rule it announced plainly assumes that free-exercise neutrality is of the formal sort. Distinguishing between laws whose "object" is to prohibit religious exercise and those that prohibit religious exercise as an "incidental effect," Smith placed only the former within the reaches of the Free Exercise Clause; the latter, laws that satisfy formal neutrality, Smith would subject to no free-exercise scrutiny at all, even when they prohibit religious exercise in application. 494 U.S., at 878, 110 S.Ct., at 1599. The four Justices who rejected the Smith rule, by contrast, read the Free Exercise Clause as embracing what I have termed substantive neutrality. The enforcement of a law "neutral on its face," they said, may "nonetheless offend [the Free Exercise Clause's] requirement 563 for government neutrality if it unduly burdens the free exercise of religion." Id., at 896, 110 S.Ct., at 1609 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J., joined by Brennan, Marshall, and BLACKMUN, JJ.) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). The rule these Justices saw as flowing from free-exercise neutrality, in contrast to the Smith rule, "requir[es] the government to justify any substantial burden on religiously motivated conduct by a compelling state interest and by means narrowly tailored to achieve that interest." Id., at 894, 110 S.Ct., at 1608 (emphasis added).

The proposition for which the Smith rule stands, then, is that formal neutrality, along with general applicability, are sufficient conditions for constitutionality under the Free Exercise Clause. That proposition is not at issue in this case, however, for Hialeah's animal-sacrifice ordinances are not neutral under any definition, any more than they are generally applicable. This case, rather, involves the noncontroversial principle repeated in Smith, that formal neutrality and general applicability are necessary conditions for free-exercise constitutionality. It is only "this fundamental nonpersecution principle of the First Amendment [that is] implicated here," ante, at 2222, and it is to that principle that the Court adverts when it holds that Hialeah's ordinances "fail to satisfy the Smith requirements," ante, at 2226. In applying that principle the Court does not tread on troublesome ground.

In considering, for example, whether Hialeah's animal-sacrifice laws violate free-exercise neutrality, the Court rightly observes that "[a]t a minimum, the protections of the Free Exercise Clause pertain if the law at issue discriminates against some or all religious beliefs or regulates or prohibits conduct because it is undertaken for religious reasons," ibid., and correctly finds Hialeah's laws to fail those standards. The question whether the protections of the Free Exercise Clause also pertain if the law at issue, though nondiscriminatory in its object, has the effect nonetheless of placing a burden on religious exercise is not before the Court 564 today, and the Court's intimations on the matter are therefore dicta.

The Court also rightly finds Hialeah's laws to fail the test of general applicability, and as *2243 the Court "need not define with precision the standard used to evaluate whether a prohibition is of general application, for these ordinances fall well below the minimum standard necessary to protect First Amendment rights," ante, at 2232, it need not discuss the rules that apply to prohibitions found to be generally applicable. The question whether "there are areas of conduct protected by the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment and thus beyond the power of the State to control, even under regulations of general applicability," Yoder, 406 U.S., at 220, 92 S.Ct., at 1535, is not before the Court in this case, and, again, suggestions on that score are dicta.

II

In being so readily susceptible to resolution by applying the Free Exercise Clause's "fundamental nonpersecution principle," ante, at 2222, this is far from a representative free-exercise case. While, as the Court observes, the Hialeah City Council has provided a rare example of a law actually aimed at suppressing religious exercise, ibid., Smith was typical of our free-exercise cases, involving as it did a formally neutral, generally applicable law. The rule Smith announced, however, was decidedly untypical of the cases involving the same type of law. Because Smith left those prior cases standing, we are left with a free-exercise jurisprudence in tension with itself, a tension that should be addressed, and that may legitimately be addressed, by reexamining the Smith rule in the next case that would turn upon its application.

A

In developing standards to judge the enforceability of formally neutral, generally applicable laws against the mandates of the Free Exercise Clause, the Court has addressed 565 the concepts of neutrality and general applicability by indicating, in language hard to read as not foreclosing the Smith rule, that the Free Exercise Clause embraces more than mere formal neutrality, and that formal neutrality and general applicability are not sufficient conditions for free-exercise constitutionality:

> "In a variety of ways we have said that '[a] regulation neutral on its face may, in its application, nonetheless offend the constitutional requirement for governmental neutrality if it unduly burdens the free exercise of religion.' " Thomas, 450 U.S., at 717 [101 S.Ct., at 1431] (quoting Yoder, 406 U.S., at 220 [92 S.Ct., at 1535]).
>
> "[T]o agree that religiously grounded conduct must often be subject to the broad police power of the State is not to deny that there are areas of conduct protected by the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment and thus beyond the power of the State to control, even under regulations of general applicability." Ibid.

Not long before the Smith decision, indeed, the Court specifically rejected the argument that "neutral and uniform" requirements for governmental benefits need satisfy only a reasonableness standard, in part because "[s]uch a test has no basis in precedent." Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Fla., 480 U.S. 136, 141, 107 S.Ct. 1046, 1049, 94 L.Ed.2d 190 (1987) (internal quotation marks omitted). Rather, we have said, "[o]ur cases have established that '[t]he free exercise inquiry asks whether government has placed a substantial burden on the observation of a central religious belief or practice and, if so, whether a compelling governmental interest justifies the burden.' " Swaggart Ministries, 493 U.S., at 384–385, 110 S.Ct., at 692–693 (quoting Hernandez v. Commissioner, 490 U.S. 680, 699, 109 S.Ct. 2136, 2148, 104 L.Ed.2d 766 (1989)).

Thus we have applied the same rigorous scrutiny to burdens on religious exercise resulting from the enforcement of formally neutral, generally applicable laws as we have applied to burdens caused by laws that single out religious exercise: 566 " 'only those interests *2244 of the highest order and those not otherwise served can overbalance legitimate claims to the free exercise of religion.' " McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S., at 628, 98 S.Ct., at 1328 (plurality opinion) (quoting Yoder, supra, 406 U.S., at 215, 92 S.Ct., at 1533). Compare McDaniel, supra, 435 U.S., at 628–629, 98 S.Ct., at 1328–1329 (plurality opinion) (applying that test to a law aimed at religious conduct) with Yoder, supra, 406 U.S., at 215–229, 92 S.Ct., at 1533–1540 (applying that test to a formally neutral, general law). Other cases in which the Court has applied heightened scrutiny to the enforcement of formally neutral, generally applicable laws that burden religious exercise include Hernandez v. Commissioner, supra, 490 U.S., at 699, 109 S.Ct., at 2149; Frazee v. Illinois Dept. of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829, 835, 109 S.Ct. 1514, 1518, 103 L.Ed.2d 914 (1989); Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n, supra, 480 U.S., at 141, 107 S.Ct., at 1049; Bob Jones Univ. v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 604, 103 S.Ct. 2017, 2035, 76 L.Ed.2d 157 (1983); United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 257–258, 102 S.Ct. 1051, 1055, 71 L.Ed.2d 127 (1982); Thomas, supra, 450 U.S., at 718, 101 S.Ct., at 1432; Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403, 83 S.Ct. 1790, 1793, 10 L.Ed.2d 965 (1963); and Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 304–307, 60 S.Ct. 900, 903–904, 84 L.Ed. 1213 (1940).

Though Smith sought to distinguish the free-exercise cases in which the Court mandated exemptions from secular laws of general application, see 494 U.S., at 881–885, 110 S.Ct., at 1601–1603, I am not persuaded. Wisconsin v. Yoder, and Cantwell v. Connecticut, according to Smith, were not true free-exercise cases but "hybrid[s]" involving "the Free Exercise Clause in conjunction with other constitutional protections, such as freedom of speech and of the press, or the right of parents ... to direct the education of their children." Smith, supra, 494 U.S., at 881, 882, 110 S.Ct., at 1601, 1602. Neither opinion, however, leaves any doubt that "fundamental claims of religious freedom [were] at stake." Yoder, supra, 406 U.S., at 221, 92 S.Ct., at 1536. See also Cantwell, supra, 310 U.S., at 303–307, 60 S.Ct., at 903–905.[4] 567 And the distinction Smith draws strikes me as ultimately untenable. If a hybrid claim is simply one in which another constitutional right is implicated, then the hybrid *2245 exception would probably be so vast as to swallow the Smith rule, and, indeed, the hybrid exception would cover the situation exemplified by Smith, since free speech and associational rights are certainly implicated in the peyote ritual. But if a hybrid claim is one in which a litigant would actually obtain an exemption from a formally neutral, generally applicable law under another constitutional provision, then there would have been no reason for the Court in what Smith calls the hybrid cases to have mentioned the Free Exercise Clause at all.

Smith sought to confine the remaining free-exercise exemption victories, which involved unemployment compensation 568 systems, see Frazee, supra; Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Fla., 480 U.S. 136, 107 S.Ct. 1046, 94 L.Ed.2d 190 (1987); Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div., 450 U.S. 707, 101 S.Ct. 1125, 67 L.Ed.2d 624 (1981); and Sherbert, supra, "stand[ing] for the proposition that where the State has in place a system of individual exemptions, it may not refuse to extend that system to cases of 'religious hardship' without compelling reason." 494 U.S., at 884, 110 S.Ct., at 1603. But prior to Smith the Court had already refused to accept that explanation of the unemployment compensation cases. See Hobbie, supra, 480 U.S., at 142, n. 7, 107 S.Ct., at 1049, n. 7; Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S. 693, 715–716, 106 S.Ct. 2147, 2160–2161, 90 L.Ed.2d 735 (1986) (opinion of BLACKMUN, J.); id., at 727–732, 106 S.Ct., at 2166–2169 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J., joined by Brennan and Marshall, JJ.); id., at 733, 106 S.Ct., at 2169 (WHITE, J., dissenting). And, again, the distinction fails to exclude Smith: "If Smith is viewed as a hypothetical criminal prosecution for peyote use, there would be an individual governmental assessment of the defendants' motives and actions in the form of a criminal trial." McConnell, Free Exercise Revisionism and the Smith Decision, 57 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1109, 1124 (1990). Smith also distinguished the unemployment compensation cases on the ground that they did not involve "an across-the-board criminal prohibition on a particular form of conduct." 494 U.S., at 884, 110 S.Ct., at 1603. But even Chief Justice Burger's plurality opinion in Bowen v. Roy, on which Smith drew for its analysis of the unemployment compensation cases, would have applied its reasonableness test only to "denial of government benefits" and not to "governmental action or legislation that criminalizes religiously inspired activity or inescapably compels conduct that some find objectionable for religious reasons," Bowen v. Roy, supra, 476 U.S., at 706, 106 S.Ct., at 2155 (opinion of Burger, C.J., joined by Powell and REHNQUIST, JJ.); to the latter category of governmental action, it would have applied the test employed in Yoder, which involved an across-the-board criminal prohibition and which Chief Justice Burger's opinion treated as an ordinary free-exercise 569 case. See Bowen v. Roy, 476 U.S., at 706–707, 106 S.Ct., at 2155–2156; id., at 705, n. 15, 106 S.Ct., at 2155, n. 15; Yoder, 406 U.S., at 218, 92 S.Ct., at 1534; see also McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S., at 628, n. 8, 98 S.Ct., at 1328, n. 8 (noting cases in which courts considered claims for exemptions from general criminal prohibitions, cases the Court thought were "illustrative of the general nature of free-exercise protections and the delicate balancing required by our decisions in [Sherbert and Yoder,] when an important state interest is shown").

As for the cases on which Smith primarily relied as establishing the rule it embraced, Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 25 L.Ed. 244 (1879), and Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586, 60 S.Ct. 1010, 84 L.Ed. 1375 (1940), see Smith, supra, 494 U.S., at 879, 110 S.Ct., at 1600, their subsequent treatment by the Court would seem to require rejection of the Smith rule. Reynolds, which in upholding the polygamy conviction of a Mormon stressed the evils it saw as associated with polygamy, see 98 U.S., at 166 ("polygamy leads to the patriarchal principle, and ... fetters the people in stationary despotism"); id., at 165, 168, has been read as consistent with the principle that religious conduct may be regulated by general or targeting law only if the conduct "pose[s] some substantial threat to public safety, peace or order." *2246 Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S., at 403, 83 S.Ct., at 1793; see also United States v. Lee, 455 U.S., at 257–258, 102 S.Ct., at 1055–1056; Bob Jones University, 461 U.S., at 603, 103 S.Ct., at 2034; Yoder, supra, 406 U.S., at 230, 92 S.Ct., at 1540. And Gobitis, after three Justices who originally joined the opinion renounced it for disregarding the government's constitutional obligation "to accommodate itself to the religious views of minorities," Jones v. Opelika, 316 U.S. 584, 624, 62 S.Ct. 1231, 1251, 86 L.Ed. 1691 (1942) (opinion of Black, Douglas, and Murphy, JJ.), was explicitly overruled in West Virginia Bd. of Ed. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642, 63 S.Ct. 1178, 1187, 87 L.Ed. 1628 (1943); see also id., at 643–644, 63 S.Ct., at 1187–1188 (Black and Douglas, JJ., concurring).

Since holding in 1940 that the Free Exercise Clause applies to the States, see Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 60 S.Ct. 900, 84 L.Ed. 1213, the Court repeatedly has stated that the Clause sets strict limits on the government's power to burden religious exercise, whether it is a law's object to do so or its unanticipated 570 effect. Smith responded to these statements by suggesting that the Court did not really mean what it said, detecting in at least the most recent opinions a lack of commitment to the compelling-interest test in the context of formally neutral laws. Smith, supra, 494 U.S., at 884–885, 110 S.Ct., at 1603. But even if the Court's commitment were that palid, it would argue only for moderating the language of the test, not for eliminating constitutional scrutiny altogether. In any event, I would have trouble concluding that the Court has not meant what it has said in more than a dozen cases over several decades, particularly when in the same period it repeatedly applied the compelling-interest test to require exemptions, even in a case decided the year before Smith. See Frazee v. Illinois Dept. of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829, 109 S.Ct. 1514, 103 L.Ed.2d 914 (1989).[5] In sum, it seems to me difficult to escape the conclusion 571 that, whatever Smith's virtues, *2247 they do not include a comfortable fit with settled law.

B

The Smith rule, in my view, may be reexamined consistently with principles of stare decisis. To begin with, the Smith rule was not subject to "full-dress argument" prior to its announcement. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 676–677, 81 S.Ct. 1684, 1703, 6 L.Ed.2d 1081 (1961) (Harlan, J., dissenting). The State of Oregon in Smith contended that its refusal to exempt religious peyote use survived the strict scrutiny required by "settled free exercise principles," inasmuch as the State had "a compelling interest in regulating" the practice of peyote use and could not "accommodate the religious practice without compromising 572 its interest." Brief for Petitioners in Smith, O.T. 1989, No. 88–1213, p. 5; see also id., at 5–36; Reply Brief for Petitioners in Smith, pp. 6–20. Respondents joined issue on the outcome of strict scrutiny on the facts before the Court, see Brief for Respondents in Smith, pp. 14–41, and neither party squarely addressed the proposition the Court was to embrace, that the Free Exercise Clause was irrelevant to the dispute. Sound judicial decisionmaking requires "both a vigorous prosecution and a vigorous defense" of the issues in dispute, Christiansburg Garment Co. v. EEOC, 434 U.S. 412, 419, 98 S.Ct. 694, 699, 54 L.Ed.2d 648 (1978), and a constitutional rule announced sua sponte is entitled to less deference than one addressed on full briefing and argument. Cf. Ladner v. United States, 358 U.S. 169, 173, 79 S.Ct. 209, 211, 3 L.Ed.2d 199 (1958) (declining to address "an important and complex" issue concerning the scope of collateral attack upon criminal sentences because it had received "only meagre argument" from the parties, and the Court thought it "should have the benefit of a full argument before dealing with the question").

The Smith rule's vitality as precedent is limited further by the seeming want of any need of it in resolving the question presented in that case. Justice O'CONNOR reached the same result as the majority by applying, as the parties had requested, "our established free exercise jurisprudence," 494 U.S., at 903, 110 S.Ct., at 1613, and the majority never determined that the case could not be resolved on the narrower ground, going instead straight to the broader constitutional rule. But the Court's better practice, one supported by the same principles of restraint that underlie the rule of stare decisis, is not to " 'formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied.' " Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 347, 56 S.Ct. 466, 483, 80 L.Ed. 688 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring) (quoting Liverpool, New York & Philadelphia S.S. Co. v. Commissioners of Emigration, 113 U.S. 33, 39, 5 S.Ct. 352, 355, 28 L.Ed. 899 (1885)). While I am not suggesting that the Smith Court lacked the power to announce its rule, I think a rule of law unnecessary to the outcome of a case, especially one not put 573 into play by the parties, approaches without more the sort of "dicta ... which may be followed if sufficiently persuasive but which are not controlling." Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 627, 55 S.Ct. 869, 873, 79 L.Ed. 1611 (1935); see also *2248 Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441, 454–455, 92 S.Ct. 1653, 1661–1662, 32 L.Ed.2d 212 (1972).

I do not, of course, mean to imply that a broad constitutional rule announced without full briefing and argument necessarily lacks precedential weight. Over time, such a decision may become "part of the tissue of the law," Radovich v. National Football League, 352 U.S. 445, 455, 77 S.Ct. 390, 395, 1 L.Ed.2d 456 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting), and may be subject to reliance in a way that new and unexpected decisions are not. Cf. Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 854–855, 112 S.Ct. 2791, 2808, 120 L.Ed.2d 674 (1992). Smith, however, is not such a case. By the same token, by pointing out Smith's recent vintage I do not mean to suggest that novelty alone is enough to justify reconsideration. "[S]tare decisis," as Justice Frankfurter wrote, "is a principle of policy and not a mechanical formula," Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106, 119, 60 S.Ct. 444, 451, 84 L.Ed. 604 (1940), and the decision whether to adhere to a prior decision, particularly a constitutional decision, is a complex and difficult one that does not lend itself to resolution by application of simple, categorical rules, but that must account for a variety of often competing considerations.

The considerations of full briefing, necessity, and novelty thus do not exhaust the legitimate reasons for reexamining prior decisions, or even for reexamining the Smith rule. One important further consideration warrants mention here, however, because it demands the reexamination I have in mind. Smith presents not the usual question of whether to follow a constitutional rule, but the question of which constitutional rule to follow, for Smith refrained from overruling prior free-exercise cases that contain a free-exercise rule fundamentally at odds with the rule Smith declared. Smith, indeed, announced its rule by relying squarely upon 574 the precedent of prior cases. See 494 U.S., at 878, 110 S.Ct., at 1600 ("Our decisions reveal that the ... reading" of the Free Exercise Clause contained in the Smith rule "is the correct one"). Since that precedent is nonetheless at odds with the Smith rule, as I have discussed above, the result is an intolerable tension in free-exercise law which may be resolved, consistently with principles of stare decisis, in a case in which the tension is presented and its resolution pivotal.

While the tension on which I rely exists within the body of our extant case law, a rereading of that case law will not, of course, mark the limits of any enquiry directed to reexamining the Smith rule, which should be reviewed in light not only of the precedent on which it was rested but also of the text of the Free Exercise Clause and its origins. As for text, Smith did not assert that the plain language of the Free Exercise Clause compelled its rule, but only that the rule was "a permissible reading" of the Clause. Ibid. Suffice it to say that a respectable argument may be made that the pre-Smith law comes closer to fulfilling the language of the Free Exercise Clause than the rule Smith announced. "[T]he Free Exercise Clause ..., by its terms, gives special protection to the exercise of religion," Thomas, 450 U.S., at 713, 101 S.Ct., at 1429, specifying an activity and then flatly protecting it against government prohibition. The Clause draws no distinction between laws whose object is to prohibit religious exercise and laws with that effect, on its face seemingly applying to both.

Nor did Smith consider the original meaning of the Free Exercise Clause, though overlooking the opportunity was no unique transgression. Save in a handful of passing remarks, the Court has not explored the history of the Clause since its early attempts in 1879 and 1890, see Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S., at 162–166, and Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333, 342, 10 S.Ct. 299, 300, 33 L.Ed. 637 (1890), attempts that recent scholarship makes clear were incomplete. See generally McConnell, *2249 *575 The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, 103 Harv.L.Rev. 1409 (1990).[6] The curious absence of history from our free-exercise decisions creates a stark contrast with our cases under the Establishment Clause, where historical analysis has been so prominent.[7]

This is not the place to explore the history that a century of free-exercise opinions have overlooked, and it is enough to note that, when the opportunity to reexamine Smith presents itself, we may consider recent scholarship raising serious questions about the Smith rule's consonance with the original understanding and purpose of the Free Exercise Clause. See McConnell, The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, supra; Durham, Religious Liberty and the Call of Conscience, 42 DePaul L.Rev. 71, 79–85 (1992); see also Office of Legal Policy, U.S. Dept. of Justice, Report to the Attorney General, Religious Liberty under the Free Exercise Clause 38–42 (1986) (predating Smith). There appears to be a strong argument from the 576 Clause's development in the First Congress, from its origins in the post-Revolution state constitutions and pre-Revolution colonial charters, and from the philosophy of rights to which the Framers adhered, that the Clause was originally understood to preserve a right to engage in activities necessary to fulfill one's duty to one's God, unless those activities threatened the rights of others or the serious needs of the State. If, as this scholarship suggests, the Free Exercise Clause's original "purpose [was] to secure religious liberty in the individual by prohibiting any invasions thereof by civil authority," School Dist. of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S., at 223, 83 S.Ct., at 1572, then there would be powerful reason to interpret the Clause to accord with its natural reading, as applying to all laws prohibiting religious exercise in fact, not just those aimed at its prohibition, and to hold the neutrality needed to implement such a purpose to be the substantive neutrality of our pre-Smith cases, not the formal neutrality sufficient for constitutionality under Smith.[8]

*2250 *577 The scholarship on the original understanding of the Free Exercise Clause is, to be sure, not uniform. See, e.g., Hamburger, A Constitutional Right of Religious Exemption: An Historical Perspective, 60 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 915 (1992); Bradley, Beguiled: Free Exercise Exemptions and the Siren Song of Liberalism, 20 Hofstra L.Rev. 245 (1991). And there are differences of opinion as to the weight appropriately accorded original meaning. But whether or not one considers the original designs of the Clause binding, the interpretive significance of those designs surely ranks in the hierarchy of issues to be explored in resolving the tension inherent in free-exercise law as it stands today.

III

The extent to which the Free Exercise Clause requires government to refrain from impeding religious exercise defines nothing less than the respective relationships in our constitutional democracy of the individual to government and to God. "Neutral, generally applicable" laws, drafted as they are from the perspective of the non-adherent, have the unavoidable potential of putting the believer to a choice between God and government. Our cases now present competing answers to the question when government, while pursuing secular ends, may compel disobedience to what one believes religion commands. The case before us is rightly decided without resolving the existing tension, which remains for another day when it may be squarely faced.

Justice BLACKMUN, with whom Justice O'CONNOR joins, concurring in the judgment.

The Court holds today that the city of Hialeah violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments when it passed a set of restrictive ordinances explicitly directed at petitioners' religious practice. With this holding I agree. I write separately to emphasize that the First Amendment's protection of religion extends beyond those rare occasions on which the government explicitly targets religion (or a particular religion) 578 for disfavored treatment, as is done in this case. In my view, a statute that burdens the free exercise of religion "may stand only if the law in general, and the State's refusal to allow a religious exemption in particular, are justified by a compelling interest that cannot be served by less restrictive means." Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 907, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 1615, 108 L.Ed.2d 876 (1990) (dissenting opinion). The Court, however, applies a different test. It applies the test announced in Smith, under which "a law that is neutral and of general applicability need not be justified by a compelling governmental interest even if the law has the incidental effect of burdening a particular religious practice." Ante, at 2226. I continue to believe that Smith was wrongly decided, because it ignored the value of religious freedom as an affirmative individual liberty and treated the Free Exercise Clause as no more than an antidiscrimination principle. See 494 U.S., at 908–909, 110 S.Ct., at 1616. Thus, while I agree with the result the Court reaches in this case, I arrive at that result by a different route.

When the State enacts legislation that intentionally or unintentionally places a burden upon religiously motivated practice, it must justify that burden by "showing that it is the least restrictive means of achieving some compelling state interest." Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div., 450 U.S. 707, 718, 101 S.Ct. 1425, 1432, 67 L.Ed.2d 624 (1981). See also Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 215, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 1533, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972). A State may no more create an underinclusive statute, one *2251 that fails truly to promote its purported compelling interest, than it may create an overinclusive statute, one that encompasses more protected conduct than necessary to achieve its goal. In the latter circumstance, the broad scope of the statute is unnecessary to serve the interest, and the statute fails for that reason. In the former situation, the fact that allegedly harmful conduct falls outside the statute's scope belies a governmental assertion that it has genuinely pursued an interest "of the highest order." Ibid. If the State's goal is important enough to prohibit religiously motivated activity, it 579 will not and must not stop at religiously motivated activity. Cf. Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 390, 98 S.Ct. 673, 683, 54 L.Ed.2d 618 (1978) (invalidating certain restrictions on marriage as "grossly underinclusive with respect to [their] purpose"); Supreme Court of N.H. v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 285, n. 19, 105 S.Ct. 1272, 1279, n. 19, 84 L.Ed.2d 205 (1985) (a rule excluding nonresidents from the bar of New Hampshire "is underinclusive ... because it permits lawyers who move away from the State to retain their membership in the bar").

In this case, the ordinances at issue are both overinclusive and underinclusive in relation to the state interests they purportedly serve. They are overinclusive, as the majority correctly explains, because the "legitimate govern mental interests in protecting the public health and preventing cruelty to animals could be addressed by restrictions stopping far short of a flat prohibition of all Santeria sacrificial practice." Ante, at 2229. They are underinclusive as well, because "[d]espite the city's proffered interest in preventing cruelty to animals, the ordinances are drafted with care to forbid few killings but those occasioned by religious sacrifice." Ante, at 2232. Moreover, the "ordinances are also underinclusive with regard to the city's interest in public health...." Ante, at 2233.

When a law discriminates against religion as such, as do the ordinances in this case, it automatically will fail strict scrutiny under Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 402–403, 407, 83 S.Ct. 1790, 1793, 1795, 10 L.Ed.2d 965 (1963) (holding that governmental regulation that imposes a burden upon religious practice must be narrowly tailored to advance a compelling state interest). This is true because a law that targets religious practice for disfavored treatment both burdens the free exercise of religion and, by definition, is not precisely tailored to a compelling governmental interest.

Thus, unlike the majority, I do not believe that "[a] law burdening religious practice that is not neutral or not of general application must undergo the most rigorous of scrutiny." Ante, at 2233. In my view, regulation that targets religion in this way, ipso facto, fails strict scrutiny. It is for this reason 580 that a statute that explicitly restricts religious practices violates the First Amendment. Otherwise, however, "[t]he First Amendment ... does not distinguish between laws that are generally applicable and laws that target particular religious practices." Smith, 494 U.S., at 894, 110 S.Ct., at 1608 (opinion concurring in judgment).

It is only in the rare case that a state or local legislature will enact a law directly burdening religious practice as such. See ibid. Because respondent here does single out religion in this way, the present case is an easy one to decide.

A harder case would be presented if petitioners were requesting an exemption from a generally applicable anticruelty law. The result in the case before the Court today, and the fact that every Member of the Court concurs in that result, does not necessarily reflect this Court's views of the strength of a State's interest in prohibiting cruelty to animals. This case does not present, and I therefore decline to reach, the question whether the Free Exercise Clause would require a religious exemption from a law that sincerely pursued the goal of protecting animals from cruel treatment. The number of organizations that have filed amicus briefs 2252 on behalf of this interest,[] however, demonstrates that it is not a concern to be treated lightly.

All Citations

508 U.S. 520, 113 S.Ct. 2217, 124 L.Ed.2d 472, 61 USLW 4587

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

* THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice SCALIA, and Justice THOMAS join all but Part II–A–2 of this opinion. Justice WHITE joins all but Part II–A of this opinion. Justice SOUTER joins only Parts I, III, and IV of this opinion.

* Respondent advances the additional governmental interest in prohibiting the slaughter or sacrifice of animals in areas of the city not zoned for slaughterhouses, see Brief for Respondent 28–31, and the District Court found this interest to be compelling, see 723 F.Supp. 1467, 1486 (SD Fla.1989). This interest cannot justify Ordinances 87–40, 87–52, and 87–71, for they apply to conduct without regard to where it occurs. Ordinance 87–72 does impose a locational restriction, but this asserted governmental interest is a mere restatement of the prohibition itself, not a justification for it. In our discussion, therefore, we put aside this asserted interest.

1 A law that is not generally applicable according to the Court's definition (one that "selective[ly] impose[s] burdens only on conduct motivated by religious belief," ante, at 2232) would, it seems to me, fail almost any test for neutrality. Accordingly, the cases stating that the Free Exercise Clause requires neutrality are also fairly read for the proposition that the Clause requires general applicability.

2 Our cases make clear, to look at this from a different perspective, that an exemption for sacramental wine use would not deprive Prohibition of neutrality. Rather, "[s]uch an accommodation [would] 'reflec[t] nothing more than the governmental obligation of neutrality in the face of religious differences.' " Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 235, n. 22, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 1543, n. 22, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972) (quoting Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 409, 83 S.Ct. 1790, 1796, 10 L.Ed.2d 965 (1963)); see also Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 627, 112 S.Ct. 2649, 2677, 120 L.Ed.2d 467 (1992) (SOUTER, J., concurring). The prohibition law in place earlier this century did in fact exempt "wine for sacramental purposes." National Prohibition Act, Title II, § 3, 41 Stat. 308.

3 One might further distinguish between formal neutrality and facial neutrality. While facial neutrality would permit discovery of a law's object or purpose only by analysis of the law's words, structure, and operation, formal neutrality would permit enquiry also into the intentions of those who enacted the law. Compare ante, at 2230–31 (opinion of KENNEDY, J., joined by STEVENS, J.) with ante, at 2239–40 (opinion of SCALIA, J., joined by REHNQUIST, C.J.). For present purposes, the distinction between formal and facial neutrality is less important than the distinction between those conceptions of neutrality and substantive neutrality.

4 Yoder, which involved a challenge by Amish parents to the enforcement against them of a compulsory school attendance law, mentioned the parental rights recognized in Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed. 1070 (1925), as Smith pointed out. See Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 881, n. 1, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 1601, n. 1, 108 L.Ed.2d 876 (1990) (citing Yoder, 406 U.S., at 233, 92 S.Ct., at 1542). But Yoder did so only to distinguish Pierce, which involved a substantive due process challenge to a compulsory school attendance law and which required merely a showing of " 'reasonable[ness].' " Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 233, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 1542, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972) (quoting Pierce, supra, 268 U.S., at 535, 45 S.Ct., at 573). Where parents make a "free exercise claim," the Yoder Court said, the Pierce reasonableness test is inapplicable and the State's action must be measured by a stricter test, the test developed under the Free Exercise Clause and discussed at length earlier in the opinion. See 406 U.S., at 233, 92 S.Ct., at 1542; id., at 213–229, 92 S.Ct., at 1532–1540. Quickly after the reference to parental rights, the Yoder opinion makes clear that the case involves "the central values underlying the Religion Clauses." Id., at 234, 92 S.Ct., at 1542. The Yoders raised only a free-exercise defense to their prosecution under the school-attendance law, id., at 209, and n. 4, 92 S.Ct., at 1530, and n. 4; certiorari was granted only on the free-exercise issue, id., at 207, 92 S.Ct., at 1529; and the Court plainly understood the case to involve "conduct protected by the Free Exercise Clause" even against enforcement of a "regulatio[n] of general applicability," id., at 220, 92 S.Ct., at 1535.

As for Cantwell, Smith pointed out that the case explicitly mentions freedom of speech. See 494 U.S., at 881, n. 1, 110 S.Ct., at 1601, n. 1 (citing Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 307, 60 S.Ct. 900, 905, 84 L.Ed. 1213 (1940)). But the quote to which Smith refers occurs in a portion of the Cantwell opinion (titled: "[s]econd," and dealing with a breach-of-peace conviction for playing phonograph records, see 310 U.S., at 307, 60 S.Ct., at 905) that discusses an entirely different issue from the section of Cantwell that Smith cites as involving a "neutral, generally applicable law" (titled: "[f]irst," and dealing with a licensing system for solicitations, see Cantwell, supra, 310 U.S., at 303–307, 60 S.Ct., at 903–905). See Smith, supra, 494 U.S., at 881, 110 S.Ct., at 1601.

5 Though Smith implied that the Court, in considering claims for exemptions from formally neutral, generally applicable laws, has applied a "water[ed] down" version of strict scrutiny, 494 U.S., at 888, 110 S.Ct., at 1605, that appraisal confuses the cases in which we purported to apply strict scrutiny with the cases in which we did not. We did not purport to apply strict scrutiny in several cases involving discrete categories of governmental action in which there are special reasons to defer to the judgment of the political branches, and the opinions in those cases said in no uncertain terms that traditional heightened scrutiny applies outside those categories. See O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 349, 107 S.Ct. 2400, 2404, 96 L.Ed.2d 282 (1987) ("[P]rison regulations ... are judged under a 'reasonableness' test less restrictive than that ordinarily applied to alleged infringements of fundamental constitutional rights"); Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503, 507, 106 S.Ct. 1310, 1313, 89 L.Ed.2d 478 (1986) ("Our review of military regulations challenged on First Amendment grounds is far more deferential than constitutional review of similar laws or regulations designed for civilian society"); see also Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361, 385–386, 94 S.Ct. 1160, 1174–1175, 39 L.Ed.2d 389 (1974); Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437, 462, 91 S.Ct. 828, 842, 28 L.Ed.2d 168 (1971). We also did not purport to apply strict scrutiny in several cases in which the claimants failed to establish a constitutionally cognizable burden on religious exercise, and again the opinions in those cases left no doubt that heightened scrutiny applies to the enforcement of formally neutral, general laws that do burden free exercise. See Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v. Board of Equalization of Cal., 493 U.S. 378, 384–385, 110 S.Ct. 688, 692–693, 107 L.Ed.2d 796 (1990) ("Our cases have established that [t]he free exercise inquiry asks whether government has placed a substantial burden on the observation of a central religious belief or practice and, if so, whether a compelling governmental interest justifies the burden") (internal quotation marks and citation omitted); Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Assn., 485 U.S. 439, 450, 108 S.Ct. 1319, 1326, 99 L.Ed.2d 534 (1988) ("[T]his Court has repeatedly held that indirect coercion or penalties on the free exercise of religion, not just outright prohibitions, are subject to [the] scrutiny" employed in Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 83 S.Ct. 1790, 10 L.Ed.2d 965 (1963)); see also Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, 606–607, 81 S.Ct. 1144, 1147–1148, 6 L.Ed.2d 563 (1961) (plurality opinion). Among the cases in which we have purported to apply strict scrutiny, we have required free-exercise exemptions more often than we have denied them. Compare Frazee v. Illinois Dept. of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829, 109 S.Ct. 1514, 103 L.Ed.2d 914 (1989); Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm'n of Fla., 480 U.S. 136, 107 S.Ct. 1046, 94 L.Ed.2d 190 (1987); Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div., 450 U.S. 707, 101 S.Ct. 1425, 67 L.Ed.2d 624 (1981); Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205, 92 S.Ct. 1526, 32 L.Ed.2d 15 (1972); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 60 S.Ct. 900, 84 L.Ed.2d 1213 (1940), with Hernandez v. Commissioner, 490 U.S. 680, 109 S.Ct. 2136, 104 L.Ed.2d 766 (1989); Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574, 103 S.Ct. 2017, 76 L.Ed.2d 157 (1983); United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252, 102 S.Ct. 1051, 71 L.Ed.2d 127 (1982). And of the three cases in which we found that denial of an exemption survived strict scrutiny (all tax cases), one involved the government's "fundamental, overriding interest in eradicating racial discrimination in education," Bob Jones Univ., supra, 461 U.S., at 604, 103 S.Ct., at 2035; in a second the Court "doubt[ed] whether the alleged burden ... [was] a substantial one," Hernandez, supra, 490 U.S., at 699, 109 S.Ct., at 2149; and the Court seemed to be of the same view in the third, see Lee, supra, 455

U.S., at 261, n. 12, 102 S.Ct., at 1057, n. 12. These cases, I think, provide slim grounds for concluding that the Court has not been true to its word.

6 Reynolds denied the free-exercise claim of a Mormon convicted of polygamy, and Davis v. Beason upheld against a free-exercise challenge a law denying the right to vote or hold public office to members of organizations that practice or encourage polygamy. Exactly what the two cases took from the Free Exercise Clause's origins is unclear. The cases are open to the reading that the Clause sometimes protects religious conduct from enforcement of generally applicable laws, see supra, at 2245–46 (citing cases); that the Clause never protects religious conduct from the enforcement of generally applicable laws, see Smith, 494 U.S., at 879, 110 S.Ct., at 1600; or that the Clause does not protect religious conduct at all, see Yoder, 406 U.S., at 247, 92 S.Ct., at 1549 (Douglas, J., dissenting in part); McConnell, The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, 103 Harv.L.Rev. 1409, 1488, and n. 404 (1990).

7 See Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421, 425–436, 82 S.Ct. 1261, 1264–1270, 8 L.Ed.2d 601 (1962); McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 431–443, 81 S.Ct. 1101, 1108–1114, 6 L.Ed.2d 393 (1961); Everson v. Board of Ed. of Ewing, 330 U.S. 1, 8–16, 67 S.Ct. 504, 508–511, 91 L.Ed. 711 (1947); see also Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577, 612–616, 622–626, 112 S.Ct. 2649, 2667, 120 L.Ed.2d 467 (1992) (SOUTER, J., concurring); Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 91–107, 105 S.Ct. 2479, 2507–2516, 86 L.Ed.2d 29 (1985) (REHNQUIST, J., dissenting); School Dist. of Abington v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 232–239, 83 S.Ct. 1560, 1576–1581, 10 L.Ed.2d 844 (1963) (Brennan, J., concurring); McGowan v. Maryland, supra, 366 U.S., at 459–495, 81 S.Ct., at 1153–1172 (Frankfurter, J., concurring); Everson, supra, 330 U.S., at 31–43, 67 S.Ct., at 519–525 (Rutledge, J., dissenting).

8 The Court today observes that "historical instances of religious persecution and intolerance ... gave concern to those who drafted the Free Exercise Clause." Ante, at 2226 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). That is no doubt true, and of course it supports the proposition for which it was summoned, that the Free Exercise Clause forbids religious persecution. But the Court's remark merits this observation: the fact that the Framers were concerned about victims of religious persecution by no means demonstrates that the Framers intended the Free Exercise Clause to forbid only persecution, the inference the Smith rule requires. On the contrary, the eradication of persecution would mean precious little to a member of a formerly persecuted sect who was nevertheless prevented from practicing his religion by the enforcement of "neutral, generally applicable" laws. If what drove the Framers was a desire to protect an activity they deemed special, and if "the [Framers] were well aware of potential conflicts between religious conviction and social duties," A. Adams & C. Emmerich, A Nation Dedicated to Religious Liberty 61 (1990), they may well have hoped to bar not only prohibitions of religious exercise fueled by the hostility of the majority, but prohibitions flowing from the indifference or ignorance of the majority as well.

* See Brief for Washington Humane Society in support of Respondent; Brief for People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, New Jersey Animal Rights Alliance, and Foundation for Animal Rights Advocacy in support of Respondent; Brief for Humane Society of the United States, American Humane Association, American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Animal Legal Defense Fund, Inc., and Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in support of Respondent; Brief for the International Society for Animal Rights, Citizens for Animals, Farm Animal Reform Movement, In Defense of Animals, Performing Animal Welfare Society, and Student Action Corps for Animals in support of Respondent; and Brief for the Institute for Animal Rights Law, American Fund for Alternatives to Animal Research, Farm Sanctuary, Jews for Animal Rights, United Animal Nations, and United Poultry Concerns in support of Respondent.

100 S.Ct. 1519
Supreme Court of the United States

CITY OF MOBILE, ALABAMA, et al., Applicants,

v.

Wiley L. BOLDEN et al.

Robert R. WILLIAMS et al., Applicants,

v.

Leila G. BROWN et al.

Nos. 77–1844, 78–357.
|
April 22, 1980.

Opinion

*1519 For opinions of the Court, see 100 S.Ct. 1490, 1519.

94 Mr. Justice BRENNAN, dissenting.

I dissent because I agree with Mr. Justice MARSHALL that proof of discriminatory impact is sufficient in these cases. I also dissent because, even accepting the plurality's premise that discriminatory purpose must be shown, I agree with Mr. Justice MARSHALL and Mr. Justice WHITE that the appellees have clearly met that burden.

103 Mr. Justice MARSHALL, dissenting.

The American ideal of political equality, conceived in the earliest days of our colonial existence and fostered by the 104 egalitarian language of the Declaration of Independence, could not forever tolerate the limitation of the right to vote to white propertied males. Our Constitution has been amended six times in the movement toward a democracy *1520 for more than the few,[1] and this Court has interpreted the Fourteenth Amendment to provide that "a citizen has a constitutionally protected right to participate in elections on an equal basis with other citizens in the jurisdiction," Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 336, 92 S.Ct. 995, 1000, 31 L.Ed.2d 274 (1972). The Court's decision today is in a different spirit. Indeed, a plurality of the Court concludes that, in the absence of proof of intentional discrimination by the State, the right to vote provides the politically powerless with nothing more than the right to cast meaningless ballots.

The District Court in both of these cases found that the challenged multimember districting schemes unconstitutionally diluted the Negro vote. These factual findings were upheld by the Court of Appeals, and the plurality does not question them. Instead, the plurality concludes that districting schemes do not violate the Equal Protection Clause unless it is proved that they were enacted or maintained for the purpose of minimizing or canceling out the voting potential of a racial minority. The plurality would require plaintiffs in vote-dilution cases to meet the stringent burden of establishing discriminatory intent within the meaning of Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976); Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977); and Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979). In my view, our vote-dilution decisions require only a showing of discriminatory impact to justify the invalidation of a multimember districting scheme, and, because they are premised on the fundamental interest in voting protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, the discriminatory-impact standard adopted by them is unaffected by Washington v. Davis, supra, and its progeny. Furthermore, an intent requirementis 105 inconsistent with the protection against denial or abridgment of the vote on account of race embodied in the Fifteenth Amendment and in § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 1973.[2] Even if, however, proof of discriminatory intent were necessary to support a vote-dilution claim, I would impose upon the plaintiffs a standard of proof less rigid than that provided by Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, supra.

I

The Court does not dispute the proposition that multimember districting can have the effect of submerging electoral minorities and overrepresenting electoral majorities.[3] It is 106 for this reason that we developed a strong preference for single-member *1521 districting in court-ordered reapportionment plans. See ante, at 66, n. 12, 100 S.Ct. at 1499, n. 12. Furthermore, and more important for present purposes, we decided a series of vote-dilution cases under the Fourteenth Amendment that were designed to protect electoral minorities from precisely the combination of electoral laws and historical and social factors found in the present cases.[4] In my view, the plurality's 1522 treatment of *107 these cases is fanciful. Although we have held that multimember districts are not unconstitutional per se, see*ante*, at 66, 100 S.Ct. at 1499, there is simply no basis for the plurality's conclusion that *108 under our prior cases proof of discriminatory intent is a necessary condition for the invalidation of multimember districting.

A

In Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 85 S.Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965), the first vote-dilution case to reach this Court, we stated explicitly that such a claim could rest on either discriminatory purpose or effect:

> "It might well be that, designedly or otherwise, a multi-member constituency apportionment scheme, under the circumstances of a particular case, would operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population." Id., at 439, 85 S.Ct., at 501 (emphasis added).

We reiterated these words in Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 16 L.Ed.2d 376 (1966), interpreted them as the correct test to apply to vote-dilution claims, and described the standard as one involving "invidious effect," id., at 88, 86 S.Ct., at 1294. We then held that the plaintiffs had failed to meet their burden of proof:

> "[T]he demonstration that a particular multi-member scheme effects an invidious result must appear from evidence in the record. . . . That demonstration was not made here. In relying on conjecture as to the effects of multi-member districting rather than demonstrated fact, the court acted in a manner more appropriate to the body responsible for drawing up the districting plan. Speculations do not supply evidence that the multi-member districting was designed to have or had the invidious effect necessary to a judgment of the unconstitutionality of the districting." Id., at 88–89, 86 S.Ct., at 1294–1295 (emphasis added) (footnote omitted).

It could not be plainer that the Court in Burns considered *109 discriminatory effect a sufficient condition for invalidating a multimember districting plan.

In Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971), we again repeated and applied the Fortson standard, 403 U.S., at 143, 144, 91 S.Ct., at 1869, but determined that the Negro community's lack of success at the polls was the result of partisan politics, not racial vote dilution. Id., at 150–155, 91 S.Ct., at 1872–1875. The Court stressed that both the Democratic and Republican Parties had nominated Negroes, and several had been elected. Negro candidates lost only when their entire party slate went down to defeat. Id., at 150, nn. 29–30, 91 S.Ct., at 1872, nn. 29–30, 152–153, 91 S.Ct., at 1873. In addition, the Court was impressed that there was no finding that officials had been unresponsive to Negro concerns. Id., at 152, n. 32, 155, 91 S.Ct., at 1875, n. 32.[5]

1523 More recently, in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), we invalidated the challenged multimember districting plans because their characteristics, when combined with historical and social factors, had the discriminatory effect of denying *110 the plaintiff Negroes and Mexican-Americans equal access to the political process. Id., at 765–770, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–2341. We stated that > "it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiffs' burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question—that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice." Id., at 765–766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339.

We held that the three-judge District Court had properly applied this standard in invalidating the multimember districting schemes in the Texas counties of Dallas and Bexar. The District Court had determined that the characteristics of the challenged electoral systems—multimember districts, a majority-vote requirement for nomination in a primary election, and a rule mandating that a candidate running for a position in a multimember district must run for a specified "place" on the ticket—though "neither in themselves improper nor invidious," reduced the electoral influence of Negroes and Mexican-Americans. Id., at 766, 93 S.Ct., at 2340.[6] The District Court identified a number of social and historical factors that, when combined with the Texas electoral structure, resulted in vote dilution: (1) a history of official racial discrimination in Texas, including discrimination inhibiting the registration, casting of ballots, and political participation of Negroes; (2) proof that minorities were still suffering the effects of past discrimination; (3) a history of gross underrepresentation of minority interests; (4) proof of official insensitivity to the needs of minority citizens, whose votes were not needed by those in power; (5) the recent use of racial campaign tactics; and (6) a cultural and language barrier inhibiting the participation of 111 Mexican-Americans. Id., at 766–770, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–2341. Based "on the totality of the circumstances," we affirmed the District Court's conclusion that the use of multimember districts excluded the plaintiffs "from effective participation in political life." Id., at 769, 93 S.Ct., at 2341.[7]

112 It is apparent that a showing of discriminatory intent in the creation or maintenance *1524 of multimember districts is as unnecessary after White as it was under our earlier vote-dilution decisions. Under this line of cases, an electoral districting plan is invalid if it has the effect of affording an electoral minority "less opportunity than . . . other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice," id., at 766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339. It is also apparent that the Court in White considered equal access to the political process as meaning more than merely allowing the minority the opportunity to vote. White stands for the proposition that an electoral system may not relegate an electoral minority to political impotence by diminishing the importance of its vote. The plurality's approach requiring proof of discriminatory purpose in the present cases is, then, squarely contrary to White and its predecessors.[8]

B

The plurality fails to apply the discriminatory-effect standard of White v. Regester because that approach conflicts with what the plurality takes to be an elementary principle of law. "[O]nly if there is purposeful discrimination," announces the 113 plurality, "can there be a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." Ante, at 66, 100 S.Ct., at 1499. That proposition is plainly overbroad. It fails to distinguish between two distinct lines of equal protection decisions: those involving suspect classifications, and those involving fundamental rights.

We have long recognized that under the Equal Protection Clause classifications based on race are "constitutionally suspect," Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 499, 74 S.Ct. 693, 694, 98 L.Ed. 884 (1954), and are subject to the "most rigid scrutiny," Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 216, 65 S.Ct. 193, 194, 89 L.Ed. 194 (1944), regardless of whether they infringe on an independently protected constitutional right. Cf. University of California Regents v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978). Under Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976), a showing of discriminatory purpose is necessary to impose strict scrutiny on facially neutral classifications having a racially discriminatory impact. Perhaps because the plaintiffs in the present cases are Negro, the plurality assumes that their vote-dilution claims are premised on the suspect-classification branch of our equal protection cases, and that under Washington v. Davis, supra, they are required to prove discriminatory intent. That assumption fails to recognize that our vote-dilution decisions are rooted in a different strand of equal protection jurisprudence.

Under the Equal Protection Clause, if a classification "impinges upon a fundamental *1525 right explicitly or implicitly protected by the Constitution, . . . strict judicial scrutiny" is required, San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 17, 93 S.Ct. 1278, 36 L.Ed.2d 16 (1973), regardless of whether the infringement was intentional.[9] As I will explain, our cases 114 recognize a fundamental right to equal electoral participation that encompasses protection against vote dilution. Proof of discriminatory purpose is, therefore, not required to support a claim of vote dilution.[10] The plurality's erroneous conclusion to the contrary is the result of a failure to recognize the central distinction between White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), and Washington v. Davis, supra : the former involved an infringement of a constitutionally protected right, while the latter dealt with a claim of racially discriminatory distribution of an interest to which no citizen has a constitutional entitlement.[11]

115 Nearly a century ago, the Court recognized the elementary proposition upon *1526 which our structure of civil rights is based: "[T]he political franchise of voting is . . . a fundamental political right, because preservative of all rights." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 370, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 1071, 30 L.Ed. 220 (1886). We reiterated that theme in our landmark decision in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 561–562, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 1381, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964), and stated that, because "the right of suffrage is a fundamental matter in a free and democratic society[,] . . . any alleged infringement of the right of citizens to vote must be carefully and meticulously scrutinized." Ibid. We realized that "the right of suffrage can be denied by a debasement or dilution of the weight of a citizen's vote just as effectively as by wholly prohibiting the free exercise of the franchise." Id., at 555, 84 S.Ct., at 1378. Accordingly, we recognized that the Equal Protection Clause protects "[t]he right of a citizen to equal representation and to have his vote weighted equally with those of all other citizens." Id., at 576, 84 S.Ct., at 1389. See also Wesberryv. 116 Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 17, 84 S.Ct. 526, 534, 11 L.Ed.2d 481 (1964); Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, 379–380, 83 S.Ct. 801, 807–808, 9 L.Ed.2d 821 (1963).[12]

Reynolds v. Sims and its progeny[13] focused solely on the discriminatory effects of malapportionment. They recognize that, when population figures for the representational districts of a legislature are not similar, the votes of citizens in larger districts do not carry as much weight in the legislature as do votes cast by citizens in smaller districts. The equal protection problem attacked by the "one person, one vote" principle is, then, one of vote dilution: under Reynolds, each citizen must have an "equally effective voice" in the election of representatives. Reynolds v. Sims, supra, 377 U.S., at 565, 84 S.Ct., at 1383. In the present cases, the alleged vote dilution, though caused by the combined effects of the electoral structure and social and historical factors rather than by unequal population distribution, is analytically the same concept: the unjustified abridgment of a fundamental right.[14] It follows, then, that a showing of discriminatory 117 intent is just as unnecessary under the vote-dilution approach adopted in Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 85 S.Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 1401 (1965), and applied in White v. Regester, *1527 supra, as it is under our reapportionment cases.[15]

118 Indeed, our vote-dilution cases have explicitly acknowledged that they are premised on the infringement of a fundamental right, not on the Equal Protection Clause's prohibition of racial discrimination. Our first vote-dilution decision, Fortson v. Dorsey, supra, involved a 1962 Georgia reapportionment statute that allocated the 54 seats of the Georgia Senate among the State's 159 counties. Thirty-three of the senatorial districts were made up of from one to eight counties each, and were single-member districts. The remaining 21 districts were allotted among the 7 most populous counties, with each county containing at least 2 districts and electing all of its senators by countywide vote. The plaintiffs, who were registered voters residing in two of the multidistrict counties,[16] argued that the apportionment plan on its face violated the Equal Protection Clause because countywide voting in the seven multidistrict counties denied their residents a vote equal to that of voters residing in single-member constituencies. 119 [17] We were unconvinced that the plan operated to dilute any Georgian's vote, and therefore upheld the facial validity of the scheme. We cautioned, however, that the Equal Protection Clause would not tolerate a multimember districting plan that "designedly or otherwise, *1528 . . . operate[d] to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population." 379 U.S., at 439, 85 S.Ct., at 501 (emphasis added).

The approach to vote dilution adopted in Fortson plainly consisted of a fundamental-rights analysis. If the Court had believed that the equal protection problem with alleged vote dilution was one of racial discrimination and not abridgment of the right to vote, it would not have accorded standing to the plaintiffs, who were simply registered voters of Georgia alleging that the state apportionment plan, as a theoretical matter, diluted their voting strength because of where they lived. To the contrary, we did not question their standing, and held against them solely because we found unpersuasive their claim on the merits. The Court did not reach this result by inadvertence; rather, we explicitly recognized that we had adopted a fundamental-rights approach when we stated that the Equal Protection Clause protected the voting strength of political as well as racial groups.

Until today, this Court had never deviated from this principle. We reiterated that our vote-dilution doctrine protects political groups in addition to racial groups in Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S., at 88, 86 S.Ct., at 1294, where we allowed a general class of qualified voters to assert such a vote-dilution claim. In Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971), we again explicitly recognized that political groups could raise such claims, id., at 143, 144, 91 S.Ct., at 1869. In White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), 120 the plaintiffs were Negroes and Mexican-Americans, and accordingly the Court had no reason to discuss whether non-minority plaintiffs could assert claims of vote dilution.[18] In a companion case to White, however, we again recognized that "political elements" were protected against vote dilution. Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 751, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 2330, 37 L.Ed.2d 298 (1973). Two years later, in Dallas County v. Reese, 421 U.S. 477, 95 S.Ct. 1706, 44 L.Ed.2d 312 (1975) (per curiam), we accorded standing to urban dwellers alleging vote dilution as to the election of the county commission and stated that multimember districting is unconstitutional if it "in fact operates impermissibly to dilute the voting strength of an identifiable element of the voting population." Id., at 480, 95 S.Ct., at 1708 (emphasis added). And in United Jewish Organizations v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 97 S.Ct. 996, 51 L.Ed.2d 229 (1977), the plurality opinion of Mr. Justice WHITE stated that districting plans were subject to attack if they diluted the vote of "racial or political groups." Id., at 167, 97 S.Ct., at 1010 (emphasis in original).[19]

Our vote-dilution decisions, then, involve the fundamental-interest branch, rather than the antidiscrimination branch, of our jurisprudence under the Equal Protection Clause. They recognize a substantive constitutional right to participate on an equal basis in the electoral process that cannot be denied or diminished for any reason, racial or otherwise, lacking quite substantial justification. They are premised on a rationale wholly apart from that underlying Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976). That decision involved application of a different equal protection principle, the prohibition on racial discrimination in the governmental distribution of interests 121 to which citizens have no constitutional entitlement.[20] Whatever *1529 may be the merits of applying motivational analysis to the allocation of constitutionally gratuitous benefits, that approach is completely misplaced where, as here, it is applied to the distribution of a constitutionally protected interest.[21]

122 Washington v. Davis, then, in no way alters the discriminatory-impact test developed in Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 85 S.Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965), and applied in White v. Regester, supra, to evaluate claims of dilution of the fundamental right to vote. In my view, that test is now, and always has been, the proper method of safeguarding against inequitable distribution of political influence.

The plurality's response is that my approach amounts to nothing less than a constitutional requirement of proportional representation for groups. See ante, at 75–80, 100 S.Ct., at 1504–1507. That assertion amounts to nothing more than a red herring: I explicitly reject the notion that the Constitution contains any such requirement. See n. 7, supra. The constitutional protection against vote dilution found in our prior cases does not extend to those situations in which a group has merely failed to elect representatives in proportion to its share of the population. To prove unconstitutional vote dilution, the group is also required to carry the far more onerous burden of demonstrating that it has been effectively fenced out of the political process. See ibid. Typical of the plurality's mischaracterization of my position is its assertion that I would provide protection against vote dilution for "every 'political group,' or at least every such group that is in the minority." Ante, at 75, 100 S.Ct., at 1504. The vote-dilution doctrine can logically apply only to groups whose electoral discreteness and insularity allow dominant political factions to ignore them. See nn. 7 and 19, supra. In short, the distinction between a requirement of proportional representation and the discriminatory-effect test I espouse is by no means a difficult one, and it is hard for me to understand why the plurality insists on ignoring it.

The plaintiffs in No. 77–1844 proved that no Negro had ever been elected to the Mobile City Commission, despite the fact that *1530 Negroes constitute about one-third of the electorate, and that the persistence of severe racial bloc voting made it highly 123 unlikely that any Negro could be elected at large in the foreseeable future. 423 F.Supp. 384, 387–389 (SD Ala.1976). Contrary to the plurality's contention, see ante, at 75–76, 100 S.Ct., at 1504, however, I do not find unconstitutional vote dilution in this case simply because of that showing. The plaintiffs convinced the District Court that Mobile Negroes were unable to use alternative avenues of political influence. They showed that Mobile Negroes still suffered pervasive present effects of massive historical, official and private discrimination, and that the City Commission had been quite unresponsive to the needs of the minority community. The City of Mobile has been guilty of such pervasive racial discrimination in hiring employees that extensive intervention by the Federal District Court has been required. 423 F.Supp., at 389, 400. Negroes are grossly underrepresented on city boards and committees. Id., at 389–390. The city's distribution of public services is racially discriminatory. Id., at 390–391. City officials and police were largely unmoved by Negro complaints about police brutality and a "mock lynching." Id., at 392. The District Court concluded that "[t]his sluggish and timid response is another manifestation of the low priority given to the needs of the black citizens and of the [commissioners'] political fear of a white backlash vote when black citizens' needs are at stake." Ibid. See also the dissenting opinion of my Brother WHITE, ante, p. 94, 100 S.Ct., p. 1514.

A requirement of proportional representation would indeed transform this Court into a "super-legislature," ante, at 76, 100 S.Ct., at 1505, and would create the risk that some groups would receive an undeserved windfall of political influence. In contrast, the protection against vote dilution recognized by our prior cases serves as a minimally intrusive guarantee of political survival for a discrete political minority that is effectively locked out of governmental decisionmaking processes.[22] So understood,the 124 doctrine hardly " 'create[s] substantive constitutional rights in the name of guaranteeing equal protection of the laws,' " ibid., p. 76, 100 S.Ct., at 1504, quoting San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S., at 33, 93 S.Ct., at 1296. Rather, the doctrine is a simple reflection of the basic principle that the Equal Protection Clause protects "[t]he right of a citizen to equal representation and to have his vote weighted equally with those of all other citizens." Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S., at 576, 84 S.Ct., at 1389.[23]

125 *1531 II

Section 1 of the Fifteenth Amendment provides:

> "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude."

Today the plurality gives short shrift to the argument that proof of discriminatory intent is not a necessary condition to relief under this Amendment. See ante, at 61–65, 100 S.Ct., at 1497–1499.[24] I have examined this issue in another context and reached the contrary result. Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 146–149, and nn. 3–5, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1366, 1367, and nn. 3–5, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976) (dissenting opinion). I continue to believe 126 that "a showing of purpose or of effect is alone sufficient to demonstrate unconstitutionality," id., at 149, n. 5, 96 S.Ct., at 1368, n. 5 and wish to explicate further why I find this standard appropriate for Fifteenth Amendment claims. First, however, it is necessary to address the plurality's apparent suggestion that the Fifteenth Amendment protects against only denial, and not dilution, of the vote.[25]

A

The Fifteenth Amendment does not confer an absolute right to vote. See ante, at 62, 100 S.Ct., at 1497. By providing that the right to vote cannot be discriminatorily "denied or abridged," however, the Amendment assuredly strikes down the diminution as well as the outright denial of the exercise of the franchise. An interpretation holding that the Amendment reaches only complete abrogation of the vote would render the Amendment essentially useless, since it is no difficult task to imagine schemes in which the Negro's marking of the ballot is a meaningless exercise.

The Court has long understood that the right to vote encompasses protection against vote dilution. "[T]he right to have one's vote counted" is of the same importance as "the right to put a ballot in a box." United States v. Mosley, 238 U.S. 383, 386, 35 S.Ct. 904, 905, 59 L.Ed. 1355 (1915). See United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 61 S.Ct. 1031, 85 L.Ed. 1368 (1941); Swafford *1532 v. Templeton, 185 U.S. 487, 22 S.Ct. 783, 46 L.Ed. 1005 (1902); Wiley v. Sinkler, 179 U.S. 58, 21 S.Ct. 17, 45 L.Ed. 84 (1900); Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651, 4 S.Ct. 152, 28 L.Ed. 274 (1884). The right to vote is protected against the diluting effect of ballot-box stuffing. United States v. Saylor, 322 U.S. 385, 64 S.Ct. 1101, 88 L.Ed. 1341 (1944); Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371, 25 L.Ed. 717 (1880). Indeed, this Court has explicitly recognized that the Fifteenth Amendment protects against vote dilution. In Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 73 S.Ct. 809, 97 L.Ed. 1152 (1953), and 127 Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 64 S.Ct. 757, 88 L.Ed. 987 (1944), the Negro plaintiffs did not question their access to the ballot for general elections. Instead they argued, and the Court recognized, that the value of their votes had been diluted by their exclusion from participation in primary elections and in the slating of candidates by political parties. The Court's struggles with the concept of "state action" in those decisions were necessarily premised on the understanding that vote dilution was a claim cognizable under the Fifteenth Amendment.

Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 84 S.Ct. 603, 11 L.Ed.2d 512 (1964), recognized that an allegation of vote dilution resulting from the drawing of district lines stated a claim under the Fifteenth Amendment. The plaintiffs in that case argued that congressional districting in New York violated the Fifteenth Amendment because district lines had been drawn in a racially discriminatory fashion. Each plaintiff had access to the ballot; their complaint was that because of intentional discrimination they resided in a district with population characteristics that had the effect of diluting the weight of their votes. The Court treated this claim as cognizable under the Fifteenth Amendment. More recently, in United Jewish Organizations v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 97 S.Ct. 996, 51 L.Ed.2d 229 (1977), we again treated an allegation of vote dilution arising from a redistricting scheme as stating a claim under the Fifteenth Amendment. See id., at 155, 161–162, 165–168, 97 S.Ct., at 1007, 1008, 1009–1011 (opinion of WHITE, J.). Indeed, in that case Mr. Justice STEWART found no Fifteenth Amendment violation in part because the plaintiffs had failed to prove "that the redistricting scheme was employed . . . to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of a minority class or interest; or otherwise to impair or burden the opportunity of affected persons to participate in the political process." Id., at 179, 97 S.Ct., at 1017 (STEWART, J., joined by POWELL, J., concurring in judgment) (citing, e. g., White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973); Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 85 S.Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965); Wright v. Rockefeller, supra. See also Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960).

128 It is plain, then, that the Fifteenth Amendment shares the concept of vote dilution developed in such Fourteenth Amendment decisions as Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964), and Fortson v. Dorsey, supra. In fact, under the Court's unified view of the protections of the right to vote accorded by disparate portions of the Constitution, the concept of vote dilution is a core principle of the Seventeenth and Nineteenth Amendments as well as the Fourteenth and Fifteenth:

> "The Fifteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying or abridging a Negro's right to vote. The Nineteenth amendment does the same for women. If a State in a statewide election weighted the male vote more heavily than the female vote or the white vote more heavily than the Negro vote, none could successfully contend that that discrimination was allowable. See Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461 [73 S.Ct. 809, 97 L.Ed. 1152]. . . . Once the geographical unit for which a representative is to be chosen is designated, all who participate in the election are to have an equal vote—whatever their race, whatever their sex, whatever their occupation, whatever their income, and wherever their home may be in *1533 that geographical unit. This is required by the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.
>
> —
>
> "The conception of political equality from the Declaration of Independence, to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, to the Fifteenth, Seventeenth, and Nineteenth Amendments can mean only one thing—one person, one vote." Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S., at 379, 381, 83 S.Ct., at 808, 809.

The plurality's suggestion that the Fifteenth Amendment reaches only outright denial of the ballot is wholly inconsistent not only with our prior decisions, but also with the gloss the plurality would place upon the Fourteenth Amendment's protection against vote dilution. As I explained in Part I, supra, I strongly disagree with the plurality's conclusion that our 129 Fourteenth Amendment vote-dilution decisions have been based upon the Equal Protection Clause's prohibition of racial discrimination. Be that as it may, the plurality at least does not dispute that the Fourteenth Amendment's language—that "[n]o State shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws"—protects against dilution, as well as outright denial, of the right to vote on racial grounds, even though the Amendment does not mention any right to vote and speaks only of the denial, and not the diminution, of rights. Yet, when the plurality construes the language of the Fifteenth Amendment—which explicitly acknowledges the right to vote and prohibits its denial or abridgment on account of race—it seemingly would accord protection against only the absolute abrogation of the ballot.

An interpretation of the Fifteenth Amendment limiting its prohibitions to the outright denial of the ballot would convert the words of the Amendment into language illusory in symbol and hollow in substance. Surely today's decision should not be read as endorsing that interpretation.[26]

B

The plurality concludes that our prior decisions establish the principle that proof of discriminatory intent is a necessary element of a Fifteenth Amendment claim.[27] In contrast, I 130 continue to adhere to my conclusion in Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 148, n. 4, 96 S.Ct., at 1367, n. 4 (dissenting opinion), that "[t]he Court's decisions relating to the relevance of purpose-and/or-effect analysis in testing the constitutionality of legislative enactments are somewhat less than a seamless web." As I there explained, at various times the Court's decisions have seemed to adopt three inconsistent approaches: (1) that purpose alone is the test for unconstitutionality; (2) that effect alone is the test; and (3) that purpose or effect, either alone or in combination, is sufficient to show unconstitutionality. Ibid. In my view, our Fifteenth Amendment jurisprudence on the necessity of proof of discriminatory purpose is no less unsettled than was our approach to the importance of such proof in Fourteenth Amendment racial discrimination cases prior to Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976). What is called for in the present cases is a fresh consideration—similar to our inquiry *1534 in Washington v. Davis, supra, with regard to Fourteenth Amendment discrimination claims—of whether proof of discriminatory purpose is necessary to establish a claim under the Fifteenth Amendment. I will first justify my conclusion that our Fifteenth Amendment precedents do not control the outcome of this issue, and then turn to an examination of how the question should be resolved.

1

The plurality cites Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347, 35 S.Ct. 926, 59 L.Ed. 1340 (1915); Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960); Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 84 S.Ct. 603, 11 L.Ed.2d 512 (1964); Lassiter v. Northampton Election Bd., 360 U.S. 45, 79 S.Ct. 985, 3 L.Ed.2d 1072 (1959); and Lane v. Wilson, 307 U.S. 268, 59 S.Ct. 872, 83 L.Ed. 1281 (1939), as holding that proof of discriminatory purpose is necessary to support a Fifteenth Amendment claim. To me, these decisions indicate confusion, not resolution of this issue. As the plurality suggests, ante, at 62, 100 S.Ct., at 1497, the Court in Guinn v. United States, supra, did examine the purpose of a "grandfather clause" in the course of invalidating it. Yet 24 years later, in Lane v. Wilson, supra, at 277, 59 S.Ct., at 876, the Court 131 struck down a more sophisticated exclusionary scheme because it "operated unfairly" against Negroes. In accord with the prevailing doctrine of the time, see Arizona v. California, 283 U.S. 423, 455, and n. 7, 51 S.Ct. 522, and n. 7, 75 L.Ed. 1154 (1931), the Court in Lane seemingly did not question the motives of public officials.

In upholding the use of a literacy test for voters in Lassiter v. Northampton Election Bd., supra, the Court apparently concluded that the plaintiff had failed to prove either discriminatory purpose or effect. Gomillion v. Lightfoot, supra, can be read as turning on proof of discriminatory motive, but the Court also stressed that the challenged redrawing of municipal boundaries had the "essential inevitable effect" of removing Negro voters from the city, id., 364 U.S., at 341, 81 S.Ct., at 127, and that "the inescapable human effect of this essay in geometry and geography is to despoil colored citizens, and only colored citizens, of their theretofore enjoyed voting rights," id., at 347, 81 S.Ct., at 130. Finally, in Wright v. Rockefeller, supra, the plaintiffs alleged only purposeful discriminatory redistricting, and therefore the Court had no reason to consider whether proof of discriminatory effect would satisfy the Fifteenth Amendment.[28]

The plurality ignores cases suggesting that discriminatory purpose is not necessary to support a Fifteenth Amendment claim. In Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 73 S.Ct. 809, 97 L.Ed. 1152 (1953), a case in which no majority opinion was issued, three Justices approvingly discussed two decisions of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit[29] holding "that no election machinery could be sustained if its purpose or effect was to deny Negroes on account of their race an effective voice in the governmental affairs of their country, state, or community." Id., at 466, 73 S.Ct., at 812 (opinion of Black, J., joined by Douglas and Burton, JJ.) (emphasis added). More recently, in rejecting a First Amendment challenge to a federal statute providing 132 criminal penalties for knowing destruction of a Selective Service registration certificate, the Court in United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 383, 88 S.Ct. 1673, 1682, 20 L.Ed.2d 672 (1968), stated that "[i]t is a familiar principle of constitutional law that this Court will not strike down an otherwise constitutional statute on the basis of an alleged illicit legislative motive." The Court in O'Brien, supra, at 385, 88 S.Ct., at 1683, interpreted Gomillion v. Lightfoot, supra, as turning on the discriminatory effect, and not the alleged discriminatory purpose, of the challenged redrawing of municipal *1535 boundaries. Three years later, in Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217, 224–225, 91 S.Ct. 1940, 1944–1945, 29 L.Ed.2d 438 (1971), the Court relied on O'Brien to support its refusal to inquire whether a city had closed its swimming pools to avoid racial integration. As in O'Brien, the Court in Palmer, supra, at 225, 91 S.Ct., at 1945, interpreted Gomillion v. Lightfoot as focusing "on the actual effect" of the municipal boundary change, and not upon what motivated the city to redraw its borders. See also Wright v. Council of City of Emporia, 407 U.S. 451, 461–462, 92 S.Ct. 2196, 2202, 2203, 33 L.Ed.2d 51 (1972).

In holding that racial discrimination claims under the Equal Protection Clause must be supported by proof of discriminatory intent, the Court in Washington v. Davis, supra, signaled some movement away from the doctrine that such proof is irrelevant to constitutional adjudication. Although the Court, 426 U.S., at 242–244 and n. 11, 96 S.Ct., at 2048–2050, and n. 11, attempted mightily to distinguish Palmer v. Thompson, supra, its decision was in fact based upon a judgment that, in light of modern circumstances, the Equal Protection Clause's ban on racial discrimination in the distribution of constitutional gratuities should be interpreted as prohibiting only intentional official discrimination.[30]

These vacillations in our approach to the relevance of discriminatory purpose belie the plurality's determination that our prior decisions require such proof to support Fifteenth Amendment claims. To the contrary, the Court today is in 133 the same unsettled position with regard to the Fifteenth Amendment as it was four years ago in Washington v. Davis, supra, regarding the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition of racial discrimination. The absence of old answers mandates a new inquiry.

2

The Court in Washington v. Davis required a showing of discriminatory purpose to support racial discrimination claims largely because it feared that a standard based solely on disproportionate impact would unduly interfere with the far ranging governmental distribution of constitutional gratuities.[31] Underlying the Court's decision was a determination that, since the Constitution does not entitle any person to such governmental benefits, courts should accord discretion to those officials who decide how the government shall allocate its scarce resources. If the plaintiff proved only that governmental distribution of constitutional gratuities had a disproportionate effect on a racial minority, the Court was willing to presume that the officials who approved the allocation scheme either had made an honest error or had foreseen that the decision would have a discriminatory impact and had found persuasive, legitimate reasons for imposing it nonetheless. These assumptions about the good faith of officials allowed the Court to conclude that, standing alone, a showing that a governmental policy had a racially discriminatory impact did not indicate that the affected minority had suffered the stigma, frustration, and unjust treatment prohibited 134 under the suspect-classification branch of our equal protection jurisprudence.

Such judicial deference to official decisionmaking has no place under the Fifteenth Amendment. Section 1 of that Amendment differs from the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition on racial discrimination in two crucial respects: it explicitly recognizes the right to vote free of hindrances related to race, and it sweeps no *1536 further. In my view, these distinctions justify the conclusion that proof of racially discriminatory impact should be sufficient to support a claim under the Fifteenth Amendment. The right to vote is of such fundamental importance in the constitutional scheme that the Fifteenth Amendment's command that it shall not be "abridged" on account of race must be interpreted as providing that the votes of citizens of all races shall be of substantially equal weight. Furthermore, a disproportionate-impact test under the Fifteenth Amendment would not lead to constant judicial intrusion into the process of official decisionmaking. Rather, the standard would reach only those decisions having a discriminatory effect upon the minority's vote. The Fifteenth Amendment cannot tolerate that kind of decision, even if made in good faith, because the Amendment grants racial minorities the full enjoyment of the right to vote, not simply protection against the unfairness of intentional vote dilution along racial lines.[32]

In addition, it is beyond dispute that a standard based solely upon the motives of official decision-makers creates significant problems of proof for plaintiffs and forces the inquiring court to undertake an unguided, tortious look into the minds of officials in the hope of guessing why certain policies were adopted and others rejected. See 135 Palmer v. Thomp son, 403 U.S., at 224–225, 91 S.Ct., at 1944–1945; United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S., at 382–386, 88 S.Ct., at 1681–1684; cf. Keyes v. School District No. 1, Denver, Colo., 413 U.S. 189, 224, 227, 93 S.Ct. 2686, 2705, 2706, 37 L.Ed.2d 548 (1973) (POWELL, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). An approach based on motivation creates the risk that officials will be able to adopt policies that are the products of discriminatory intent so long as they sufficiently mask their motives through the use of subtlety and illusion. Washington v. Davis is premised on the notion that this risk is insufficient to overcome the deference the judiciary must accord to governmental decisions about the distribution of constitutional gratuities. That risk becomes intolerable, however, when the precious right to vote protected by the Fifteenth Amendment is concerned.

I continue to believe, then, that under the Fifteenth Amendment an "[e]valuation of the purpose of a legislative enactment is just too ambiguous a task to be the sole tool of constitutional analysis. . . . [A] demonstration of effect ordinarily should suffice. If, of course, purpose may conclusively be shown, it too should be sufficient to demonstrate a statute's unconstitutionality." Beer v. United States, 425 U.S., at 149–150, n. 5, 96 S.Ct., at 1368, n. 5 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting). The plurality's refusal in this case even to consider this approach bespeaks an indifference to the plight of minorities who, through no fault of their own, have suffered diminution of the right preservative of all other rights.[33]

136 *1537 III

If it is assumed that proof of discriminatory intent is necessary to support the vote-dilution claims in these cases, the question becomes what evidence will satisfy this requirement.[34]

The plurality assumes, without any analysis, that these cases are appropriate for the application of the rigid test developed in Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S., at 279, 99 S.Ct., at 2296, requiring that "the decisionmaker . . . selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' its adverse effects upon an identifiable group." In my view, the Feeney standard creates a burden of proof far too extreme to apply in vote-dilution cases.[35]

137 This Court has acknowledged that the evidentiary inquiry involving discriminatory intent must necessarily vary depending upon the factual context. See Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S., at 264–268, 97 S.Ct., at 562–565; Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S., at 253, 96 S.Ct., at 2054 (STEVENS, J., concurring). One useful evidentiary tool, long recognized by the common law, is the presumption that "[e]very man must be taken to contemplate the probable consequences of the act he does." Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East. 277, 280, 103 Eng.Rep. 579, 580–581 (K.B.1808). The Court in Feeney, supra, at 279, n. 25, 99 S.Ct., at 2296, n. 25, acknowledged that proof of foreseeability of discriminatory consequences could raise a "strong inference that the adverse effects were desired," but refused to treat this presumption as conclusive in cases alleging discriminatory distribution of constitutional gratuities.

I would apply the common-law foreseeability presumption to the present cases. The plaintiffs surely proved that maintenance of the challenged multimember districting would have the foreseeable effect of perpetuating the submerged electoral influence of Negroes, and that this discriminatory effect could be corrected by implementation of a single-member districting plan.[36] Because the foreseeable disproportionate impact was so severe, the burden of proof should have shifted to the defendants, and they should have been required to show that they refused to modify the districting schemes in spite of, not because of, their severe discriminatory effect. See Feeney, supra, at 284, 99 S.Ct., at 2299 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting). Reallocation of the burden of proof is especially appropriate in these cases, where the challenged state action *1538 infringes the exercise of a fundamental right. The defendants would carry their burden of proof only if they showed that they considered submergence 138 of the Negro vote a detriment, not a benefit, of the multimember systems, that they accorded minority citizens the same respect given to whites, and that they nevertheless decided to maintain the systems for legitimate reasons. Cf. Mt. Healthy City Board of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 287, 97 S.Ct. 568, 576, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977); Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., supra, at 270–271, n. 21, 97 S.Ct., at 566, n. 21.

This approach recognizes that

> "[f]requently the most probative evidence of intent will be objective evidence of what actually happened rather than evidence describing the subjective state of mind of the actor. For normally the actor is presumed to have intended the natural consequences of his deeds. This is particularly true in the case of governmental action which is frequently the product of compromise, of collective decisionmaking, and of mixed motivation." Washington v. Davis, supra, 426 U.S., at 253, 96 S.Ct., at 2054 (STEVENS, J., concurring).

Furthermore, if proof of discriminatory purpose is to be required in these cases, this standard would comport with my view that the degree to which the government must justify a decision depends upon the importance of the interests infringed by it. See San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S., at 109–110, 93 S.Ct., at 1335, 1336 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting).[37]

139 The plurality also fails to recognize that the maintenance of multimember districts in the face of foreseeable discriminatory consequences strongly suggests that officials are blinded by "racially selective sympathy and indifference."[38] Like outright racial hostility, selective racial indifference reflects a belief that the concerns of the minority are not worthy of the same degree of attention paid to problems perceived by whites. When an interest as fundamental as voting is diminished along racial lines, a requirement that discriminatory purpose must be proved should be satisfied by a showing that official action was produced by this type of pervasive bias. In the present cases, the plaintiffs presented strong evidence of such bias: they showed that Mobile officials historically discriminated against Negroes, that there are pervasive present effects of this past discrimination, and that officials have not been responsive to the needs of the minority community. It takes only the smallest of inferential leaps to conclude that the decisions to maintain multimember districting having obvious discriminatory effects represent, at the very least, selective racial *1539 sympathy and indifference resulting in the frustration of minority desires, the stigmatization of the minority as second-class citizens, and the perpetuation of inhumanity.[39]

140 IV

The American approach to government is premised on the theory that, when citizens have the unfettered right to vote, 141 public officials will make decisions by the democratic accommodation of competing beliefs, not by deference to the mandates of the powerful. The American approach to civil rights is premised on the complementary theory that the unfettered right to vote is preservative of all other rights. The theoretical foundations for these approaches are shattered where, as in the present cases, the right to vote is granted in form, but denied in substance.

It is time to realize that manipulating doctrines and drawing improper distinctions under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, as well as under Congress' remedial legislation enforcing those Amendments, make this Court an accessory to the perpetuation of racial discrimination. The plurality's requirement of proof of intentional discrimination, so inappropriate in today's cases, may represent an attempt to bury the legitimate concerns of the minority beneath the soil of a doctrine almost as impermeable as it is specious. If so, the superficial tranquility created by such measures can be but short-lived. If this Court refuses to honor our long-recognized principle that the Constitution "nullifies sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination," Lane v. Wilson, 307 U.S., at 275, 59 S.Ct., at 876, it cannot expect the victims of discrimination to respect political channels of seeking redress. I dissent.

All Citations

446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1519 (Mem), 64 L.Ed.2d 47

Footnotes

1 U.S.Const., Amdts. 15, 17, 19, 23, 24, 26.

2 I agree with the plurality, see ante, at 60–61, 100 S.Ct. at 1496–1497, that the prohibition on denial or infringement of the right to vote contained in § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973, contains the same standard as the Fifteenth Amendment. I disagree with the plurality's construction of that Amendment, however. See Part II, infra.

3 The Court does not quarrel with the generalization that in many instances an electoral minority will fare worse under multimember districting than under single-member districting. Multimember districting greatly enhances the opportunity of the majority political faction to elect all representatives of the district. In contrast, if the multimember district is divided into several single-member districts, an electoral minority will have a better chance to elect a candidate of its choice, or at least to exert greater political influence. It is obvious that the greater the degree to which the electoral minority is homogeneous and insular and the greater the degree that bloc voting occurs along majority-minority lines, the greater will be the extent to which the minority's voting power is diluted by multimember districting. See E. Banfield & J. Wilson, City Politics 91–96, 303–308 (1963); R. Dixon, Jr., Democratic Representation 12, 476–484, 503–527 (1968); Bonapfel, Minority Challenges to At-Large Elections: The Dilution Problem, 10 Ga.L.Rev. 353, 358–360 (1976); Derfner, Racial Discrimination and the Right to Vote, 26 Vand.L.Rev. 523, 553–555 (1973); Comment, Effective Representation and Multimember Districts, 68 Mich.L.Rev. 1577, 1577–1579 (1970). Recent empirical studies have documented the validity of this generalization. See Berry & Dye, The Discriminatory Effects of At-Large Elections, 7 Fla.St.U.L.Rev. 85, 113–122 (1979); Jones, The Impact of Local Election Systems on Black Political Representation, 11 Urb.Aff.Q. 345 (1976); Karnig, Black Resources and City Council Representation, 41 J.Pol. 134 (1979); Karnig, Black Representation on City Councils: The Impact of District Elections and Socioeconomic Factors, 12 Urb.Aff.Q. 223 (1976); Sloan, "Good Government" and the Politics of Race, 17 Soc.Prob. 161 (1969); The Impact of Municipal Reformism: A Symposium, 59 Soc.Sci.Q. 117 (1978).

The electoral schemes in these cases involve majority-vote, numbered-post, and staggered-term requirements. See Bolden v. City of Mobile, 423 F.Supp. 384, 386–387 (SD Ala.1976); Brown v. Moore, 428 F.Supp. 1123, 1126–1127 (SD Ala.1976). These electoral rules exacerbate the vote-dilutive effects of multimember districting. A requirement that a candidate must win by a majority of the vote forces a minority candidate who wins a plurality of votes in the general election to engage in a run off election with his nearest competitor. If the competitor is a member of the dominant political faction, the minority candidate stands little chance of winning in the second election. A requirement that each candidate must run for a particular "place" or "post" creates head-to-head contests that minority candidates cannot survive. When a number of positions on a governmental body are to be chosen in the same election, members of a minority will increase the likelihood of election of a favorite candidate by voting only for him. If the remainder of the electorate splits its votes among the other candidates, the minority's candidate might well be elected by the minority's "single-shot voting." If the terms of officeholders are staggered, the opportunity for single-shot voting is decreased. See City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980); Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297, 1305 (CA5 1973) (en banc), aff'd on other grounds, sub nom. East Carroll Parish School Bd. v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636, 96 S.Ct. 1083, 47 L.Ed.2d 296 (1976) (per curiam); Bonapfel, supra ; Derfner, supra.

4 The plurality notes that at-large elections were instituted in cities as a reform measure to correct corruption and inefficiency in municipal government, and suggests that it "may be a rash assumption" to apply vote-dilution concepts to a municipal government elected in that fashion. See ante, at 70, and n. 15, 100 S.Ct. at 1502, and n. 15. To the contrary, local governments are not exempt from the constitutional requirement to adopt representational districting ensuring that the votes of each citizen will have equal weight. Avery v. Midland County, 390 U.S. 474, 88 S.Ct. 1114, 20 L.Ed.2d 45 (1968). Indeed, in Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 142, n. 14, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1364, n. 14, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976), and Abate v. Mundt, 403 U.S. 182, 184, n. 2, 91 S.Ct. 1904, 1906, n. 2, 29 L.Ed.2d 399 (1971), we assumed that our vote-dilution doctrine applied to local governments.

Furthermore, though municipalities must be accorded some discretion in arranging their affairs, see Abate v. Mundt, supra, there is all the more reason to scrutinize assertions that municipal, rather than state, multi-member districting dilutes the vote of an electoral minority:

"In statewide elections, it is possible that a large minority group in one multi-member district will be unable to elect any legislators, while in another multi-member district where the same group is a slight majority, they will elect the entire slate of legislators. Thus, the multi-member electoral system may hinder a group in one district but prove an advantage in another. In at-large elections in cities this is not possible. There is no way to balance out the discrimination against a particular minority group because the entire city is one huge election district. The minority's loss is absolute." Berry & Dye, supra n. 3, at 87.

That at-large elections were instituted as part of a "reform" movement in no way ameliorates these harsh effects. Moreover, in some instances the efficiency and breadth of perspective supposedly resulting from a reform structure of municipal government are achieved at a high cost. In a white-majority city in which severe racial bloc voting is common, the citywide view allegedly inculcated in city commissioners by at-large elections need not extend beyond the white community, and the efficiency of the commission form of government can be achieved simply by ignoring the concerns of the powerless minority.

It would be a mistake, then, to conclude that municipal at-large elections provide an inherently superior representational scheme. See also n. 3, supra; Chapman v. Meier, 372 F.Supp. 371, 388–392 (ND 1974) (three-judge court) (Bright, J., dissenting), rev'd, 420 U.S. 1, 95 S.Ct. 751, 42 L.Ed.2d 766 (1975). It goes without saying that a municipality has the freedom to design its own governance system. When that system is subjected to constitutional attack, however, the question is whether it was enacted or maintained with a discriminatory purpose or has a discriminatory effect, not whether it comports with one or another of the competing notions about "good government."

5 As the plurality notes, see ante, at 66, 100 S.Ct., at 1499, we indicated in Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S., at 149, 91 S.Ct., at 1872, that multimember districts were unconstitutional if they were "conceived or operated as purposeful devices to further racial or economic discrimination." The Court in Whitcomb did not, however, suggest that discriminatory purpose was a necessary condition for the invalidation of multimember districting. Our decision in Whitcomb, supra, at 143, 91 S.Ct., at 1869, acknowledged the continuing validity of the discriminatory-impact test adopted in Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 439, 85 S.Ct. 498, 501, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965), and restated it as requiring plaintiffs to prove that "multi-member districts unconstitutionally operate to dilute or cancel the voting strength of racial or political elements." Whitcomb, supra, 403 U.S., at 144, 91 S.Ct., at 1869 (emphasis added).

Abate v. Mundt, supra, decided the same day as Whitcomb, provides further evidence that Whitcomb did not alter the discriminatory-effects standard developed in earlier cases. In Abate, supra, at 184, n. 2, 91 S.Ct., at 1906, n. 2, we rejected the argument that a multimember districting scheme had a vote-dilutive effect because "[p]etitioners . . . have not shown that these multi-member districts, by themselves, operate to impair the voting strength of particular racial or political elements . . ., see Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 88, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 1294, 16 L.Ed.2d 376 (1966)."

6 See n. 3, supra.

7 White v. Regester, makes clear the distinction between the concepts of vote dilution and proportional representation. We have held that, in order to prove an allegation of vote dilution, the plaintiffs must show more than simply that they have been unable to elect candidates of their choice. See 412 U.S., at 765–766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339; Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, at 149–150, 153, 91 S.Ct., at 1872, 1873. The Constitution, therefore, does not contain any requirement of proportional representation. Cf. United Jewish Organizations v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 97 S.Ct. 966, 51 L.Ed.2d 229 (1977); Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 37 L.Ed.2d 298 (1973). When all that is proved is mere lack of success at the polls, the Court will not presume that members of a political minority have suffered an impermissible dilution of political power. Rather, it is assumed that these persons have means available to them through which they can have some effect on governmental decisionmaking. For example, many of these persons might belong to a variety of other political, social, and economic groups that have some impact on officials. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it may be assumed that officials will not be improperly influenced by such factors as the race or place of residence of persons seeking governmental action. Furthermore, political factions out of office often serve as watchdogs on the performance of the government, bind together into coalitions having enhanced influence, and have the respectability necessary to affect public policy.

Unconstitutional vote dilution occurs only when a discrete political minority whose voting strength is diminished by a districting scheme proves that historical and social factors render it largely incapable of effectively utilizing alternative avenues of influencing public policy. See n. 19, infra. In these circumstances, the only means of breaking down the barriers encasing the political arena is to structure the electoral districting so that the minority has a fair opportunity to elect candidates of its choice.

The test for unconstitutional vote dilution, then, looks only to the discriminatory effects of the combination of an electoral structure and historical and social factors. At the same time, it requires electoral minorities to prove far more than mere lack of success at the polls.

We have also spoken of dilution of voting power in cases arising under the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973 et seq. Under § 5 of that Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, a state or local government covered by the Act may not enact new electoral procedures having the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color. We have interpreted this provision as prohibiting any retrogression in Negro voting power. Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1363, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976). In some cases, we have labeled such retrogression a "dilution" of the minority vote. See, e. g., City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980). Vote dilution under § 5, then, involves a standard different from that applied in cases such as White v. Regester, supra, in which diminution of the vote violating the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendment is alleged.

8 The plurality's approach is also inconsistent with our statement in Dallas County v. Reese, 421 U.S. 477, 480, 95 S.Ct. 1706, 1707, 44 L.Ed.2d 312 (1975) (per curiam), that multimember districting violates the Equal Protection Clause if it "in fact operates impermissibly to dilute the voting strength of an identifiable element of the voting population." See also Chapman v. Meier, 420 U.S., at 17, 95 S.Ct., at 761.

9 See Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600 (1969) (right to travel); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964) (right to vote); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, 83 S.Ct. 814, 9 L.Ed.2d 811 (1963); and Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 76 S.Ct. 585, 100 L.Ed. 891 (1956) (right to fair access to criminal process). Under the rubric of the fundamental right of privacy, we have recognized that individuals have freedom from unjustified governmental interference with personal decisions involving marriage, Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374, 98 S.Ct. 673, 54 L.Ed.2d 618 (1978); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1967); procreation, Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942); contraception, Carey v. Population Services International, 431 U.S. 678, 97 S.Ct. 2010, 52 L.Ed.2d 675 (1977); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S.

438, 92 S.Ct. 1029, 31 L.Ed.2d 349 (1972); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 328, 13 L.Ed.2d 339 (1965); abortion, Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 93 S.Ct. 705, 35 L.Ed.2d 147 (1973); family relationships, Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 64 S.Ct. 438, 88 L.Ed. 645 (1944); and child rearing and education, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 45 S.Ct. 571, 69 L.Ed. 1070 (1925); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923). See also Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494, 97 S.Ct. 1932, 52 L.Ed.2d 675 (1977).

10 As the present cases illustrate, a requirement of proof of discriminatory intent seriously jeopardizes the free exercise of the fundamental right to vote. Although the right to vote is indistinguishable for present purposes from the other fundamental rights our cases have recognized, see n. 9, supra, surely the plurality would not require proof of discriminatory purpose in those cases. The plurality fails to articulate why the right to vote should receive such singular treatment. Furthermore, the plurality refuses to recognize the disutility of requiring proof of discriminatory purpose in fundamental rights cases. For example, it would make no sense to require such a showing when the question is whether a state statute regulating abortion violates the right of personal choice recognized in Roe v. Wade, supra. The only logical inquiry is whether, regardless of the legislature's motive, the statute has the effect of infringing that right. See, e. g., Planned Parenthood of Central Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52, 96 S.Ct. 2831, 49 L.Ed.2d 788 (1976).

11 Judge Wisdom of the Court of Appeals below recognized this distinction in a companion case, see Nevett v. Sides, 571 F.2d 209, 231–234 (CA5 1978) (specially concurring opinion). See also Comment, Proof of Racially Discriminatory Purpose Under the Equal Protection Clause: Washington v. Davis, Arlington Heights, Mt. Healthy, and Williamsburgh, 12 Harv.Civ.Rights-Civ.Lib.L.Rev. 725, 758, n. 175 (1977); Note, Racial Vote Dilution in Multimember Districts: The Constitutional Standard After Washington v. Davis, 76 Mich.L.Rev. 694, 722–726 (1978); Comment, Constitutional Challenges to Gerrymanders, 45 U.Chi.L.Rev. 845, 869–877 (1978).

> Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976), involved alleged racial discrimination in public employment. By describing interests such as public employment as constitutional gratuities, I do not, of course, mean to suggest that their deprivation is immune from constitutional scrutiny. Indeed, our decisions have referred to the importance of employment, see Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88, 116, 96 S.Ct. 1895, 1911, 48 L.Ed.2d 495 (1976); Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, 43 S.Ct., at 626; Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33, 41, 36 S.Ct. 7, 10, 60 L.Ed. 131 (1915), and we have explicitly recognized that in some circumstances public employment falls within the categories of liberty and property protected by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, see, e. g., Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134, 94 S.Ct. 1633, 40 L.Ed.2d 15 (1974); Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 92 S.Ct. 2694, 33 L.Ed.2d 570 (1972). The Court has not held, however, that a citizen has a constitutional right to public employment.

12 We have not, however, held that the Fourteenth Amendment contains an absolute right to vote. As we explained in Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 92 S.Ct. 995, 31 L.Ed.2d 274 (1972):

> "In decision after decision, this Court has made clear that a citizen has a constitutionally protected right to participate in elections on an equal basis with other citizens in the jurisdiction. [Citing cases.] This 'equal right to vote' . . . is not absolute; the States have the power to impose voter qualifications, and to regulate access to the franchise in other ways. . . . But, as a general matter, 'before that right [to vote] can be restricted, the purpose of the restriction and the assertedly overriding interests served by it must meet close constitutional scrutiny.' " Id., at 336, 92 S.Ct., at 1000 (quoting Evans v. Cornman, 398 U.S. 419, 426, 422, 90 S.Ct. 1752, 1756, 1754, 26 L.Ed.2d 370 (1970)).

13 Avery v. Midland County, 390 U.S. 474, 88 S.Ct. 1114, 20 L.Ed.2d 45 (1968), applied the equal-representation standard of Reynolds v. Sims, to local governments. See also, e. g., Connor v. Finch, 431 U.S. 407, 97 S.Ct. 1828, 52 L.Ed.2d 465 (1977); Lockport v. Citizens for Community Action, 430 U.S. 259, 97 S.Ct. 1047, 51 L.Ed.2d 313 (1977); Hadley v. Junior College Dist., 397 U.S. 50, 90 S.Ct. 791, 25 L.Ed.2d 45 (1970).

14 In attempting to limit Reynolds v. Sims to its facts, see ante, at 77–79, 100 S.Ct., at 1505–1506, the plurality confuses the nature of the constitutional right recognized in that decision with the means by which that right can be violated. Reynolds held that under the Equal Protection Clause each citizen must be accorded an essentially equal voice in the election of representatives. The Court determined that unequal population distribution in a multi-district representational scheme was one readily ascertainable means by which this right was abridged. The Court certainly did not suggest, however, that violations of the right to effective political participation mattered only if they were caused by malapportionment.

The plurality's assertion to the contrary in this case apparently would require it to read Reynolds as recognizing fair apportionment as an end in itself, rather than as simply a means to protect against vote dilution.

15 Proof of discriminatory purpose has been equally unnecessary in our decisions assessing whether various impediments to electoral participation are inconsistent with the fundamental interest in voting. In the seminal case, Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663, 86 S.Ct. 1079, 16 L.Ed.2d 169 (1966), we invalidated a $1.50 poll tax imposed as a precondition to voting. Relying on our decision two years earlier in Reynolds v. Sims, see Harper, supra, at 667–668, 670, 86 S.Ct., at 1083, we determined that "the right to vote is too precious, too fundamental to be so burdened or conditioned," 383 U.S., at 670, 86 S.Ct., at 1083. We analyzed the right to vote under the familiar standard that "where fundamental rights and liberties are asserted under the Equal Protection Clause, classifications which might invade or restrain them must be closely scrutinized and carefully confined." Ibid. In accord with Harper, we have applied heightened scrutiny in assessing the imposition of filing fees, e. g., Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 94 S.Ct. 1315, 39 L.Ed.2d 702 (1974); limitations on who may participate in elections involving specialized governmental entities, e. g., Kramer v. Union School District, 395 U.S. 621, 89 S.Ct. 1886, 23 L.Ed.2d 583 (1969); durational residency requirements, e. g., Dunn v. Blumstein, supra; enrollment time limitations for voting in party primary elections, e. g., Kusper v. Pontikes, 414 U.S. 51, 94 S.Ct. 303, 38 L.Ed.2d 260 (1973); and restrictions on candidate access to the ballot, e. g., Illinois Elections Bd. v. Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. 173, 99 S.Ct. 983, 59 L.Ed.2d 230 (1979).

To be sure, we have approved some limitations on the right to vote. Compare, e. g., Salyer Land Co. v. Tulare Water District, 410 U.S. 719, 93 S.Ct. 1224, 35 L.Ed.2d 659 (1973), with Kramer v. Union School District, supra. We have never, however, required a showing of discriminatory purpose to support a claim of infringement of this fundamental interest. To the contrary, the Court has accepted at face value the purposes articulated for a qualification of this right, and has invalidated such a limitation under the Equal Protection Clause only if its purpose either lacked sufficient substantiality when compared to the individual interests affected or could have been achieved by less restrictive means. See, e. g., Dunn v. Blumstein, supra, at 335, 337, 343–360, 92 S.Ct., at 999, 1000, 1003–1012.

The approach adopted in this line of cases has been synthesized with the one-person, one-vote doctrine of Reynolds v. Sims, in the following fashion: "It has been established in recent years that the Equal Protection Clause confers the substantive right to participate on an equal basis with other qualified voters whenever the State has adopted an electoral process for determining who will represent any segment of the State's population." San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 59, n. 2, 93 S.Ct. 1278, 1310, n. 2, 36 L.Ed.2d 16 (1973) (STEWART, J., concurring) (citing Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964); Kramer v. Union School District, supra; Dunn v. Blumstein, supra). It is plain that this standard requires no showing of discriminatory purpose to trigger strict scrutiny of state interference with the right to vote.

16 See Dorsey v. Fortson, 228 F.Supp. 259, 261 (ND Ga.1964) (three-judge court), rev'd, 379 U.S. 433, 85 S.Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 629 (1965).

17 Specifically, the plaintiffs contended that countywide voting in the multidistrict counties could, as a matter of mathematics, result in the nullification of the unanimous choice of the voters of one district. Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S., at 436–437, 85 S.Ct., at 499–500.

18 The same is true of our most recent case discussing vote dilution, Wise v. Lipscomb, 437 U.S. 535, 98 S.Ct. 2493, 57 L.Ed.2d 411 (1978).

19 In contrast to a racial group, however, a political group will bear a rather substantial burden of showing that it is sufficiently discrete to suffer vote dilution. See Dallas County v. Reese, 421 U.S. 477, 95 S.Ct. 1706, 44 L.Ed.2d 312 (1975) (per curiam) (allowing city dwellers to attack a countywide multimember district). See generally Comment, Effective Representation and Multimember Districts, 68 Mich.L.Rev. 1577, 1594–1596 (1970).

20 The dispute in Washington v. Davis, concerned alleged racial discrimination in public employment, an interest to which no one has a constitutional right, see n. 11, supra. In that decision, the Court held only that "the invidious quality of a law claimed to be racially discriminatory must ultimately be traced to a racially discriminatory purpose." 426 U.S., at 240, 96 S.Ct., at 2048 (emphasis added). The Court's decisions following Washington v. Davis have also involved alleged discrimination in the allocation of interests falling short of constitutional rights. Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979) (alleged sex discrimination in public employment); Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977) (alleged racial discrimination in zoning). As explained in Feeney, supra, "[w]hen some other independent right is not at stake . . . and when there is no 'reason to infer antipathy,' . . . it is presumed that 'even improvident decisions will eventually be rectified by the democratic process.' " 442 U.S., at 272, 97 S.Ct., at 567 (quoting Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93, 97, 99 S.Ct. 939, 943, 59 L.Ed.2d 171 (1979)).

21 Professor Ely has recognized this distinction:

> "The danger I see is . . . that the Court, in its newfound enthusiasm for motivation analysis, will seek to export it to fields where it has no business. It therefore cannot be emphasized too strongly that analysis of motivation is appropriate only to claims of improper discrimination in the distribution of goods that are constitutionally gratuitous (that is, benefits to which people are not entitled as a matter of substantive constitutional right). . . . However, where what is denied is something to which the complainant has a substantive constitutional right —either because it is granted by the terms of the Constitution, or because it is essential to the effective functioning of a democratic government—the reasons it was denied are irrelevant. It may become important in court what justifications counsel for the state can articulate in support of its denial or nonprovision, but the reasons that actually inspired the denial never can: To have a right to something is to have a claim on it irrespective of why it is denied. It would be a tragedy of the first order were the Court to expand its burgeoning awareness of the relevance of motivation into the thoroughly mistaken notion that a denial of a constitutional right does not count as such unless it was intentional." Ely, The Centrality and Limits of Motivation Analysis, 15 San Diego L.Rev. 1155, 1160–1161 (1978) (emphasis in original) (footnotes omitted).

22 It is at this point that my view most diverges from the position expressed by my Brother STEVENS, ante, p. 83, 100 S.Ct., p. 1508. He would strictly scrutinize state action having an adverse impact on an individual's right to vote. In contrast, he would apply a less stringent standard to state action diluting the political influence of a group. See ante, at 83–85, 100 S.Ct., at 1508–1509. The facts of the present cases, however, demonstrate that severe and persistent racial bloc voting, when coupled with the inability of the minority effectively to participate in the political arena by alternative means, can effectively disable the individual Negro as well as the minority community as a whole. In these circumstances, Mr. Justice STEVENS' distinction between the rights of individuals and the political strength of groups becomes illusory.

23 The foregoing disposes of any contention that, merely by citing Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 84 S.Ct. 603, 11 L.Ed.2d 512 (1964), the Court in Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S., at 240, 96 S.Ct., at 2047, and Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S., at 264, 97 S.Ct., at 562, intended to bring vote-dilution cases within the discriminatory-purpose requirement. Wright v. Rockefeller, supra, was a racial gerrymander case, and the plaintiffs had alleged only that they were the victims of an intentional scheme to draw districting lines discriminatorily. In focusing solely on whether the plaintiffs had proved intentional discrimination, the Court in Wright v. Rockefeller was merely limiting the scope of its inquiry to the issue raised by the plaintiffs. If Wright v. Rockefeller had been brought after this Court had decided our vote-dilution decisions, the plaintiffs perhaps would have recognized that, in addition to a claim of intentional racial gerrymandering, they could allege an equally sufficient cause of action under the Equal Protection Clause—that the districting lines had the effect of diluting their vote.

> Wright v. Rockefeller, then, treated proof of discriminatory purpose as a sufficient condition to trigger strict scrutiny of a districting scheme, but had no occasion to consider whether such proof was necessary to invoke that standard. Its citations in Washington v. Davis, supra, and Arlington Heights, supra, were useful to show the relevancy, but not the necessity, of evidence of discriminatory intent. These citations are in no way inconsistent with my view that proof of discriminatory purpose is not a necessary condition to the invalidation of multimember districts that dilute the vote of racial or political elements.
>
> In addition, any argument that, merely by citing Wright v. Rockefeller, the Court in Washington v. Davis and Arlington Heights intended to apply the discriminatory-intent requirement to vote-dilution claims is premised on two unpalatable assumptions. First, because the discussion of Wright v. Rockefeller was unnecessary to the resolution of the issues in both of those decisions, the argument assumes that the Court in both cases decided important issues in brief dicta. Second, the argument assumes that the Court twice intended covertly to overrule the discriminatory-effects test applied in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), without even citing White. Neither assumption is tenable.

24 It is important to recognize that only the four Members of the plurality are committed to this view. In addition to my Brother BRENNAN and myself, my Brother STEVENS expressly states that proof of discriminatory effect can be a sufficient condition to support the invalidation of districting, see ante, at 90, 100 S.Ct., at 1512. My Brother WHITE finds the proof of discriminatory purpose in these cases sufficient to support the decisions of the Courts of Appeals, and accordingly he does not reach the issue whether proof of discriminatory impact, standing alone, would suffice under the Fifteenth Amendment. By Brother BLACKMUN also expresses no view on this issue, since he too finds the proof of discriminatory intent sufficient to support the findings of violations of the Constitution.

25 The plurality states that "[h]aving found that Negroes in Mobile 'register and vote without hindrance,' the District Court and Court of Appeals were in error in believing that the appellants invaded the protection of that Amendment in the present case." Ante, at 65, 100 S.Ct., at 1499.

26 Indeed, five Members of the Court decline the opportunity to ascribe to this view. In addition to my Brother BRENNAN and myself, my Brother STEVENS expressly states that the Fifteenth Amendment protects against diminution as well as denial of the ballot, see ante, at 84, and n. 3, 100 S.Ct., at 1509, and n. 3. The dissenting opinion of my Brother WHITE and the separate opinion of my Brother BLACKMUN indicate that they share this view.

27 The plurality does not attempt to support this proposition by relying on the history surrounding the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment. I agree that we should resolved the issue of the relevancy of proof of discriminatory purpose and effect by examining our prior decisions and by considering the appropriateness of alternative standards in light of contemporary circumstances. That was, of course, the approach used in Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976), to evaluate that issue with regard to Fourteenth Amendment racial discrimination claims.

28 See n. 23, supra.

29 Rice v. Elmore, 165 F.2d 387 (1947), cert. denied, 333 U.S. 875, 68 S.Ct. 905, 92 L.Ed. 1151 (1948), and Baskin v. Brown, 174 F.2d 391 (1949).

30 See nn. 20, 21, supra, and accompanying text.

31 The Court stated:

> "A rule that a statute designed to serve neutral ends is nevertheless invalid, absent compelling justification, if in practice it benefits or burdens one race more than another would be far reaching and would raise serious questions about, and perhaps invalidate, a whole range of tax, welfare, public service, regulatory, and licensing statutes that may be more burdensome to the poor and to the average black than to the more affluent white." 426 U.S., at 248, 96 S.Ct., at 2051.

See n. 20, supra.

32 Even if a municipal policy is shown to dilute the right to vote, however, the policy will not be struck down if the city shows that it serves highly important local interests and is closely tailored to effectuate only those interests. See Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 92 S.Ct. 995, 31 L.Ed.2d 274 (1972). Cf. Abate v. Mundt, 403 U.S. 182, 88 S.Ct. 1114, 20 L.Ed.2d 45 (1971).

33 In my view, the standard of White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), see n. 7, supra, and accompanying text, is the proper test under both the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments for determining whether a districting scheme has the unconstitutional effect of diluting the Negro vote. It is plain that the District Court in both of the cases before us made the "intensely local appraisal" necessary under White, supra, at 769, 93 S.Ct., at 2341, and correctly decided that the at-large electoral schemes for the Mobile City Commission and County School Board violated the White standard. As I earlier note with respect to No. 77–1844, see supra, at 122–123, 100 S.Ct., at 1530, the District Court determined: (1) that Mobile Negroes still suffered pervasive present effects of massive historical official and private discrimination; (2) that the City Commission and County School Board had been quite unresponsive to the needs of the minority community; (3) that no Negro had ever been elected to either body, despite the fact that Negroes constitute about one-third of the electorate; (4) that the persistence of severe racial bloc voting made it highly unlikely that any Negro could be elected at large to either body in the foreseeable future; and (5) that no state policy favored at-large elections, and the local preference for that scheme was outweighed by the fact that the unconstitutional vote dilution could be corrected only by the imposition of single-member districts. Bolden v. City of Mobile, 423 F.Supp. 384 (SD Ala.1976); Brown v. Moore, 428 F.Supp. 1123 (SD Ala.1976). The Court of Appeals affirmed these findings in all respects. Bolden v. City of Mobile, 571 F.2d 238 (CA5 1978); Brown v. Moore, 575 F.2d 298 (CA5 1978). See also the dissenting opinion of my Brother WHITE, ante, p. 94, 100 S.Ct., p. 1514.

34 The statutes providing for at-large election of the members of the two governmental bodies involved in these cases, see n. 33, supra, have been in effect since the days when Mobile Negroes were totally disenfranchised by the Alabama Constitution of 1901. The District Court in both cases found, therefore, that the at-large schemes could not have been adopted for discriminatory purposes. Bolden v. City of Mobile, 423 F.Supp., at 386, 397; Brown v. Moore, 428 F.Supp., at 1126–1127, 1138. The issue is, then, whether officials have maintained these electoral systems for discriminatory purposes. Cf. Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S., at 257–258, 267–271, and n. 17, 97 S.Ct., at 559, 564–566, and n. 17.

35 As the dissenting opinion of my Brother WHITE demonstrates, however, the facts of these cases compel a finding of unconstitutional vote dilution even under the plurality's standard.

36 Indeed, the District Court in the present cases concluded that the evidence supported the plaintiffs' position that unconstitutional vote dilution was the natural and foreseeable consequence of the maintenance of the challenged multimember districting. Brown v. Moore, 428 F.Supp., at 1138; Bolden v. City of Mobile, 423 F.Supp., at 397–398.

37 Mr. Justice STEVENS acknowledges that both discriminatory intent and discriminatory effect are present in No. 77–1844. See ante, at 92–94, 100 S.Ct. at 1513–1514. Nonetheless, he finds no constitutional violation, apparently because he believes that the electoral structure of Mobile conforms to a commonly used scheme, the discriminatory impact is in his view not extraordinary, and the structure is supported by sufficient noninvidious justifications so that it is neither wholly irrational nor entirely motivated by discriminatory animus. To him, racially motivated decisions in this setting are an inherent part of the political process and do not involve invidious discrimination.

> The facts of the present cases, however, indicate that in Mobile considerations of race are far more powerful and pernicious than are considerations of other divisive aspects of the electorate. See at 1530, supra. In Mobile, as elsewhere, "the experience of Negroes . . . has been different in kind, not just in degree, from that of other ethnic groups." University of California Regents v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 400, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 2805, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978) (opinion of MARSHALL, J.). An approach that accepts intentional discrimination against Negroes as merely an aspect of "politics as usual" strikes at the very hearts of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

38 Brest, The Supreme Court, 1975 Term—Forword: In Defense of the Antidiscrimination Principle, 90 Harv.L.Rev. 1, 7 (1976). See also Note, Racial Vote Dilution in Multimember Districts: The Constitutional Standard After Washington v. Davis, 76 Mich.L.Rev. 694, 716–719 (1978).

39 The plurality, ante, at 74–75, n. 21, 100 S.Ct., at 1504, n. 21, indicates that on remand the lower courts are to examine the evidence in these cases under the discriminatory-intent standard of Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979), and may conclude that this test is met by proof of the refusal of Mobile's state-legislative delegation to stimulate the passage of legislation changing Mobile's city government into a mayor-council system in which council members are elected from single-member districts. The plurality concludes, then, only that the District Court and the Court of Appeals in each of the present cases evaluated the evidence under an improper legal standard, and not that the evidence fails to support a claim under Feeney, supra. When the lower courts examine these cases under the Feeney standard, they should, of course, recognize the relevancy of the plaintiffs' evidence that vote dilution was a foreseeable and natural consequence of the maintenance of the challenged multimember districting, and that officials have apparently exhibited selective racial sympathy and indifference. Cf. Dayton Board of Education v. Brinkman, 443 U.S. 526, 99 S.Ct. 2971, 61 L.Ed.2d 720 (1979); Columbus Board of Education v. Penick, 443 U.S. 449, 99 S.Ct. 2941, 61 L.Ed.2d 666 (1979).

Finally, it is important not to confuse the differing views the plurality and I have on the elements of proving unconstitutional vote dilution. The plurality concludes that proof of intentional discrimination, as defined in Feeney, supra, is necessary to support such a claim. The plurality finds this requirement consistent with the statement in White v. Regester, 412 U.S., at 766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339, that unconstitutional vote dilution does not occur simply because a minority has not been able to elect representatives in proportion to its voting potential. The extra necessary element, according to the plurality, is a showing of discriminatory intent. In the plurality's view, the evidence presented in White going beyond mere proof of under-representation of the minority properly supported an inference that the multimember districting scheme in question was tainted with a discriminatory purpose.

The plurality's approach should be satisfied, then, by proof that an electoral scheme enacted with a discriminatory purpose effected a retrogression in the minority's voting power. Cf. Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1363, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976). The standard should also be satisfied by proof that a scheme maintained for a discriminatory purpose has the effect of submerging minority electoral influence below the level it would have under a reasonable alternative scheme.

The plurality does not address the question whether proof of discriminatory-effect is necessary to support a vote-dilution claim. It is clear from the above, however, that if the Court at some point creates such a requirement, it would be satisfied by proof of mere disproportionate impact. Such a requirement would be far less stringent than the burden of proof required under the rather rigid discriminatory effects test I find in White v. Regester, supra. See n. 7, supra, and accompanying text.

New York Official Reports

KeyCite Yellow Flag - Negative Treatment
Distinguished by Andrews, Pusateri, Brandt, Shoemaker & Roberson, P.C. v. Niagara County Sewer District No. 1, N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept., March 19, 2010

86 N.Y.2d 286, 655 N.E.2d 649, 631
N.Y.S.2d 553, 103 Ed. Law Rep. 1146

City of New York et al., Appellants,

v.

State of New York et al., Respondents.

Court of Appeals of New York
117B
Argued February 16, 1995;

Decided June 15, 1995

CITE TITLE AS: City of New York v State of New York

SUMMARY

Appeal, by permission of the Court of Appeals, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the First Judicial Department, entered November 15, 1994, which modified, on the law, and, as modified, affirmed an order of the Supreme Court (Leland DeGrasse, J.; opn 162 Misc 2d 493), entered in New York County, granting a motion by defendants State of New York, Ralph J. Marino as Majority Leader and Temporary President of the Senate, and Clarence D. Rappleyea, Jr., as Minority Leader of the Assembly, to dismiss the complaint to the extent of dismissing the entire complaint on the ground plaintiffs lack the legal capacity to sue and dismissing plaintiffs' second cause of action and so much of the third cause of action as was based solely upon a statutory violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 for failure to state a cause of action. The modification consisted of fully granting defendants' motion to dismiss to the extent of dismissing the first cause of action and the remainder of the third cause of action for the additional reason of failure to state a cause of action.

City of New York v State of New York, 205 AD2d 272, affirmed.

HEADNOTES

Schools
State Aid to School Districts
Capacity of Municipalities to Challenge Constitutionality of State's School Funding Scheme

(1) The City of New York, Board of Education of the City, its Mayor and Chancellor of the City School District (municipal plaintiffs) lack capacity to bring an action against the State and various State officials challenging the constitutionality of the present State statutory scheme for funding public education. Municipalities and other local governmental corporate entities and their officers lack capacity to mount constitutional challenges to acts of the State and State legislation. This general incapacity to sue flows from judicial recognition of the juridical as well as political relationship between those entities and the State. Municipal corporate bodies--counties, towns and school districts--are merely subdivisions of the State, created by the State for the convenient carrying out of the State's governmental powers and responsibilities as its agents. As purely creatures or agents of the State, municipal corporate bodies cannot have the right to contest the actions of their principal or creator affecting them in their governmental capacity or 287 as representatives of their inhabitants. The only recognized exceptions to the general rule barring local governmental challenges to State legislation are: an express statutory authorization to bring such a suit; where the State legislation adversely affects a municipality's proprietary interest in a specific fund of moneys; where the State statute impinges upon "Home Rule" powers of a municipality constitutionally guaranteed under article IX of the State Constitution; and where the municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription. Here, however, the municipal plaintiffs have failed to bring their claims within any recognized exception to the general rule that municipalities lack capacity to sue the State and their action must be dismissed.

TOTAL CLIENT SERVICE LIBRARY REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Municipal Corporations, Counties, and Other Political Subdivisions, §§ 98, 99.

NY Jur 2d, Counties, Towns, and Municipal Corporations, §§ 107, 213.

ANNOTATION REFERENCES

See ALR Index under Municipal Corporations.

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Paul A. Crotty, Corporation Counsel of New York City (Leonard Koerner, Lorna B. Goodman, Pamela Seider Dolgow, David B. Goldin, Elizabeth S. Natrella, Florence A. Hutner and Shari M. Goodstein of counsel), and Cleary, Gottlieb, Steen & Hamilton, New York City (Evan A. Davis, Lawrence T. Gresser, Denise C. Morgan and Marcia L. Narine of counsel), for appellants.

I. In accord with controlling precedent on this issue (see, Board of Educ. v Nyquist, 57 NY2d 27 [1982], appeal dismissed 459 US 1138 [1983]), the municipal plaintiffs have capacity to bring this action.

II. The complaint states a valid cause of action, sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss, under the Education Article of the New York Constitution. (People v New York City Tr. Auth., 59 NY2d 343; Gertler v Goodgold, 107 AD2d 481, 66 NY2d 946; 288 Cohn v Lionel Corp., 21 NY2d 559; Kober v Kober, 16 NY2d 191; Board of Educ. v Nyquist, 57 NY2d 27, 459 US 1138; People v Bing, 76 NY2d 331; People v Ryan, 274 NY 149; Ware v Valley Stream High School Dist., 75 NY2d 114.)

Manes v Goldin, 400 F Supp 23, 423 n, 400 F Supp 23, 423 US 1068; Davis v Rosenblatt, 159 AD2d 163, 79 NY2d 822; Maresca v Cuomo, 64 NY2d 242, 474 US 802.)

Dennis C. Vacco, Attorney-General, New York City (Mark G. Peters, Victoria A. Graffeo, Andrea Green, Harvey J. Golubock, Jeffrey I. Slonim and Clement J. Colucci of counsel), for respondents.

I. Plaintiffs are creations of the State and therefore lack capacity to sue their creator. (Community Bd. 7 v Schaffer, 84 NY2d 148; Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283; Village of Herkimer v Axelrod, 58 NY2d 1069; Town of Black Brook v State of New York, 41 NY2d 486; Board of Educ. v Regan, 87 AD2d 1001, 58 NY2d 1005; Matter of Town of Moreau v County of Saratoga, 142 AD2d 864; Grumet v Board of Educ., 187 AD2d 16, 81 NY2d 705; Caruso v State of New York, 188 AD2d 874; Coleman v Miller, 307 US 433; Williams v Mayor, 289 US 36.)

II. Under the Federal Civil Rights Act, plaintiffs cannot challenge the State's education funding system. (United States v State of Alabama, 791 F2d 1450, cert denied sub nom. Board of Trustees v Alabama State Bd. of Educ., 479 US 1085; Community Bd. 7 v Schaffer, 84 NY2d 148; Hudson Val. Freedom Theatre v Heimbach, 671 F2d 702, 459 US 857; Town of Riverhead v New York State Dept. of Envtl. Conservation, 193 AD2d 667; City of New York v Heckler, 578 F Supp 1109, 742 F2d 729, affd sub nom. Bowen v City of New York, 476 US 467; Town of Brookline v Operation Rescue, 762 F Supp 1521.)

III. Plaintiffs' underlying complaint fails to state a cause of action.

Stroock & Stroock & Lavan, New York City (Alan M. Klinger and Adam S. Grace of counsel), Rhonda Weingarten and Frederick K. Reich for United Federation of Teachers, amicus curiae.

I. The amended complaint states a cause of action under the Education Article of the New York Constitution. 289 (Board of Educ. v Nyquist, 57 NY2d 27; Campaign for Fiscal Equity v State of New York, 205 AD2d 272; Plyler v Doe, 457 US 202; Wisconsin v Yoder, 406 US 205.)

II. Appellants have the capacity to bring this action because the State's actions are forcing them to violate the Education Article. (Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283; Campaign for Fiscal Equity v State of New York, 162 Misc 2d 493; Matter of Wiltwyck School for Boys v Hill, 11 NY2d 182; Herman v Board of Educ., 234 NY 196; Matter of Board of Educ. v City of Buffalo, 32 AD2d 98; Union Free School Dist. v Jackson, 93 Misc 2d 53; Matter of Brown v Union Free School Dist. No. 8, 88 Misc 2d 755, 59 AD2d 761.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Levine, J.

The City of New York, Board of Education of the City, its Mayor and Chancellor of the City School District (hereinafter the municipal plaintiffs) have brought this action against the State and various State officials seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. They allege three causes of action in their amended complaint: (1) that the present State statutory scheme for funding public education denies the school children of New York City their educational rights guaranteed by the Education Article of the State Constitution (NY Const, art XI, § 1); (2) that the State's funding of public schools provides separate and unequal treatment for the public schools of New York City in violation of the Equal Protection Clauses of the Federal and State Constitutions (US Const 14th Amend; NY Const, art I, § 11); and (3) that the disparate impact of the State's funding scheme for public education on members of racial and ethnic minority groups in New York City violates title VI of the Federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 USC § 2000d et seq.) as amended and its implementing regulations.

We agree with the courts below that the municipal plaintiffs lack the legal capacity to bring this suit against the State. Despite their contrary claims, the traditional principle throughout the United States has been that municipalities and other local governmental corporate entities and their officers lack capacity to mount constitutional challenges to acts of the State and State legislation. This general incapacity to sue flows from judicial recognition of the juridical as well as political relationship between those entities and the State. Constitutionally as well as a matter of historical fact, municipal 290 corporate bodies--counties, towns and school districts--are merely subdivisions of the State, created by the State for the convenient carrying out of the State's governmental powers and responsibilities as its agents. Viewed, therefore, by the courts as purely creatures or agents of the State, it followed that municipal corporate bodies cannot have the right to contest the actions of their principal or creator affecting them in their governmental capacity or as representatives of their inhabitants. Thus, the United States Supreme Court has held:

" 'A municipal corporation is simply a political subdivision of the State, and exists by virtue of the exercise of the power of the State through its legislative department. The legislature could at any time terminate the existence of the corporation itself, and provide other and different means for the government of the district comprised within the limits of the former city. The city is the creature of the State.' " (Trenton v New Jersey, 262 US 182, 189-190, quoting Worcester v Street Ry. Co., 196 US 539, 548.)

"The distinction between the municipality as an agent of the State for governmental purposes and as an organization to care for local needs in a private or proprietary capacity has been applied in various branches of the law of municipal corporations" (id., at 191 [challenge to New Jersey statute under Due Process and Contract Clauses of the US Constitution]).

"A municipal corporation, created by a state for the better ordering of government, has no privileges or immunities under the federal constitution which it may invoke in opposition to the will of its creator" (Williams v Mayor, 289 US 36, 40 [Cardozo, J.] [Equal Protection Clause challenge to Maryland statute]).

New York has long followed the Federal rationale for finding that municipalities lack the capacity to bring suit to invalidate State legislation (see, County of Albany v Hooker, 204 NY 1; City of New York v Village of Lawrence, 250 NY 429; Robertson v Zimmermann, 268 NY 52). As stated in Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v Adirondack League Club (307 NY 475, appeal dismissed 351 US 922): 291

"The courts of this State from very early times have consistently applied the Federal rule in holding that political power conferred by the Legislature confers no vested right as against the government itself. ... The concept of the supreme power of the Legislature over its creatures has been respected and followed in many decisions." (Id., at 488.)

The rationale was succinctly described in Matter of County of Cayuga v McHugh (4 NY2d 609):

"Counties, as civil divisions of a State, had their origin in England and were formed to aid in the more convenient administration of government .... So it is today that counties are mere political subdivisions of the State, created by the State Legislature and possessing no more power save that deputed to them by that body." (Id., at 614.)

Moreover, our Court has extended the doctrine of no capacity to sue by municipal corporate bodies to a wide variety of challenges based as well upon claimed violations of the State Constitution (see, Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v Adirondack League Club, supra; City of New York v Village of Lawrence, supra; County of Albany v Hooker, supra).

Municipal officials and members of municipal administrative or legislative boards suffer the same lack of capacity to sue the State with the municipal corporate bodies they represent (see, Williams v Mayor, 289 US 36, supra). As we held in Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v Adirondack League Club (307 NY, at 489, supra):

"As we have pointed out, the district board has no special character different from that of the State. Its only purpose is to construct reservoirs and that, concededly, is a State purpose in the interest of public health, safety and welfare (Conservation Law, § 431). Not only as a board, but also as individuals, the plaintiffs are without power to challenge the validity of the act or the Constitution" (emphasis supplied).

The only exceptions to the general rule barring local governmental challenges to State legislation which have been identified in the case law are: (1) an express statutory authorization to bring such a suit (County of Albany v Hooker, 204 NY, at 9, supra); (2) where the State legislation adversely affects a municipality's proprietary interest in a specific fundof 292 moneys (County of Rensselaer v Regan, 173 AD2d 37, affd 80 NY2d 988; Matter of Town of Moreau v County of Saratoga, 142 AD2d 864); (3) where the State statute impinges upon "Home Rule" powers of a municipality constitutionally guaranteed under article IX of the State Constitution (Town of Black Brook v State of New York, 41 NY2d 486); and (4) where "the municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription" (Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283, 287 [citing Board of Educ. v Allen, 20 NY2d 109, affd 392 US 236]).

The arguments by the municipal plaintiffs favoring their capacity to sue are unpersuasive. First, they contend that our decision in Levittown (Board of Educ., Levittown Union Free School Dist. v Nyquist, 57 NY2d 27) constitutes controlling precedent in favor of their capacity to sue. As the municipal plaintiffs have virtually conceded, however, when Levittown reached the Court of Appeals, the State did not appeal on the capacity to sue issue. The issue of lack of capacity to sue does not go to the jurisdiction of the court, as is the case when the plaintiffs lack standing. Rather, lack of capacity to sue is a ground for dismissal which must be raised by motion and is otherwise waived (CPLR 3211 [a] [3]; [e]). It follows, then, that if the defense of lack of capacity to sue can be waived by merely failing to raise it, it may also be abandoned on appeal and, in fact, was abandoned by the State when its appeal in Levittown reached our Court. Therefore, the Levittown decision is not precedent for the municipal plaintiffs' capacity to sue in this case.

Alternatively, the municipal plaintiffs argue that our decision in Community Bd. 7 v Schaffer (84 NY2d 148) supports their capacity to sue in this case. To be sure, Community Bd. 7 held that a municipal body's capacity to sue may arise by necessary implication. However, Community Bd. 7 unequivocally holds that, in the absence of express authority to bring the specific action in question the plaintiff must establish a legislative intent to confer such capacity to sue by inference. "Governmental entities created by legislative enactment present similar capacity problems. Being artificial creatures of statute, such entities have neither an inherent nor a common-law right to sue. Rather, the right to sue, if it exists at all, must be derived from the relevant enabling legislation or some other concrete statutory predicate" (id., at 155-156 [emphasis 293 supplied]). Thus, in Community Bd. 7, even though the plaintiff had an identifiable functional responsibility in the subject matter of the lawsuit, this Court concluded it lacked capacity to bring the suit because various inclusions or omissions in the enabling legislation negated any inference of a legislative intent to confer that power (id., at 157-158).

The municipal plaintiffs have not pointed to any express statutory language or legislative history which would necessarily imply that the Legislature intended to confer upon them the capacity to bring a suit challenging State legislation. The fact that the Legislature has expressly conferred the power to sue upon the City or the City School District in furtherance of their general statutory municipal or educational responsibilities is clearly insufficient from which to imply authority to bring suit against the State itself to declare that the public school funding scheme enacted by the Legislature is unconstitutional (see, County of Albany v Hooker, 204 NY 1, supra [discussing extensively the difference between the general power to sue by a municipal corporation, and the same municipality's lack of capacity to sue its creator, the State]). Indeed, from early times municipalities have had the statutory general power to sue and be sued in their own name (see, People v Ingersoll, 58 NY 1, 28-31; see also, County Law § 51 [current authority for counties to sue in their own name]), but that power has always been limited "[i]n political and governmental matters [because] municipalities are the representatives of the sovereignty of the State, and auxiliary to it" (People v Ingersoll, 58 NY, at 29, supra). Moreover, in view of the manifest improbability that the Legislature would have intended to authorize the municipal plaintiffs to challenge the constitutionality of its own public school funding allocation formula, the evidence from "necessary implication" would have to be particularly strong to support capacity to sue here, and it certainly is not. Hence, Community Bd. 7 v Schaffer does not provide a precedential basis for capacity to sue here.

Next, the municipal plaintiffs argue that the lack of capacity to sue doctrine only applies to (1) statutory restrictions on a municipality's power; and (2) State-mandated compulsion to make expenditures. This contention ignores our precedents in which lack of capacity to sue has applied to block challenges to a far wider variety of State actions having differing adverse impacts on local governmental bodies and their constituents (see, Matter of County of Cayuga v McHugh, supra; Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v Adirondack League Club, supra; 294 Robertson v Zimmermann, supra; and County of Albany v Hooker, supra). County of Albany v Hooker is particularly instructive because it involved a claim quite analogous to the claims of the municipal plaintiffs in the instant case. Albany County relied upon a 1905 Amendment to the State Constitution authorizing the State to incur debts of up to $50 million for improvements to State highways (204 NY 1, 5, supra). To pay the principal and interest on such debts, the amendment provided for the creation of a sinking fund made up of at least half State moneys and the remainder from counties and towns where the improvements were located. The amendment guaranteed that enabling statutes would equitably apportion the highway improvements among the counties (id.). Not unlike the claim here of an unfair allocation of educational funding violating the State Constitution, in County of Albany v Hooker, the county challenged 1911 State legislation providing for highway improvements elsewhere in the State, as violating the constitutional mandate for equitable apportionment of highway improvements. This Court determined that the County of Albany lacked the capacity to bring the suit. We recognized that the underlying purpose of the action was to vindicate the interests and rights of the inhabitants of the county to a fair apportionment of the public moneys devoted to highway improvement (id., at 17). We held in Hooker, however, that counties lack the capacity to sue the State to protect such rights of or redress such wrongs or injuries to their citizens (id., at 14). The holding in County of Albany v Hooker is directly on point regarding the lack of capacity of the municipal plaintiffs to sue in the instant case.

"With no fund or property in existence, the title to which is in the county, and no funds or property in the possession of another to which the county is entitled to possession, and the entire subject being one of governmental and public policy, independent of the corporate rights of the county, the action cannot be maintained by the plaintiff, and the wrong, if any, created and existing by the acts of the legislature, must be corrected by the legislature, or by an action where the people, as distinguished from a municipal corporate body, are before the court" (id., at 18-19).

The only remaining argument made by the municipal plaintiffs in favor of their capacity to sue is that they are challenging legislation which adversely affects the City's proprietary 295 interests. Clearly, however, they fail to point to any specific fund in which they are entitled to a proprietary interest. Their claim is merely to a greater portion of the general State funds which the Legislature chooses to appropriate for public education. Accordingly, they lack a proprietary interest in a fund or property to which their claims relate and cannot ground capacity to sue on that basis (see, County of Albany v Hooker, supra) under the criteria set in Matter of Town of Moreau v County of Saratoga (142 AD2d 864, supra) and County of Rensselaer v Regan (173 AD2d 37, supra). Finding a proprietary interest of the City of New York sufficient to confer capacity to sue without regard to a cognizable right in a specific fund would create a municipal power to sue the State in any dispute over the appropriate amount of State aid to a governmental subdivision or the appropriate State/local mix of shared governmental expenses. The narrow proprietary interest exception would then ultimately swallow up the general rule barring suit against the State by local governments.

Although not a point advanced by the municipal plaintiffs on this appeal, the dissent seeks to bring this case within the already noted exception to the lack of capacity to sue rule, where municipal officials contend that " 'if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription' " (dissenting opn, at 298-299 [quoting Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283, 287, supra] [emphasis supplied]). The dissent fails to cite to any specific constitutional proscription", that is, prohibition, that the State school funding formula forces the municipal officials to violate. Surely, it cannot be persuasively argued that the City officials in question should be held accountable either under the Equal Protection Clause or the State Constitution's public Education Article by reason of the alleged State underfunding of the New York City school system over which they have absolutely no control (see, Athanson v Grasso, 411 F Supp 1153).

Thus, the municipal plaintiffs have failed to bring their claims within any recognized exception to the general rule that municipalities lack capacity to sue the State and their action must be dismissed. We decline the invitation to erode that general rule. Our adherence to that rule is not, as suggested by the dissent "a regression into formalism and rigidity" (dissenting opn, at 303). The lack of capacity of municipalities to sue the State is a necessary outgrowth of separation 296 of powers doctrine: it expresses the extreme reluctance of courts to intrude in the political relationships between the Legislature, the State and its governmental subdivisions.

The order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, with costs.

Ciparick, J.

(Dissenting). I respectfully dissent. If our complex, collaborative system of education is to work, and if local control and autonomy at the school district and Board of Education level is to have real meaning, the Legislature and other governmental officials responsible for maintaining the educational system cannot be immunized from accountability in a suit of this nature. The Legislature has delegated virtually all of the day-to-day responsibilities involving the provision of education and the management of educational affairs to local authorities. When these local entities are unable to fulfill their constitutional and statutory obligations because of the State's failure to carry out its own constitutional obligations, a substantive right to sue has been and must continue to be recognized (see, Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283, 287; Board of Educ. v Allen, 20 NY2d 109, 118; Board of Educ., Levittown Union Free School Dist. v Nyquist, 83 AD2d 217, 234, mod 57 NY2d 27). Accordingly, we would hold that the New York City Board of Education and the Chancellor of the City School District (school plaintiffs) have the capacity to bring this action. We also would hold that New York City and its Mayor (city plaintiffs) have capacity to bring this suit for reasons we discuss below.

This is a declaratory judgment action challenging the constitutionality and legality of New York State's current statutory methodology for financing public education. Supreme Court dismissed plaintiffs' complaint in its entirety for lack of capacity to sue. The Appellate Division agreed, reasoning that "units of municipal government, as political subdivisions created by the State, lack the capacity (with very limited exceptions not applicable here) to challenge in a lawsuit the constitutionality of State legislative enactments affecting them (Town of Black Brook v State of New York, 41 NY2d 486, 488; Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283, 287)" (205 AD2d 272, 277-278).

I.

Although courts often use the terms interchangeably, the concepts of capacity to sue and standing are distinct (see, 297 Community Bd. 7 v Schaffer, 84 NY2d 148, 155). Capacity to sue "concerns a litigant's power to appear and bring its grievance before the court" (id., at 155). Standing is "designed to ensure that the party seeking relief has a sufficiently cognizable stake in the outcome" so as to cast the controversy "' "in a form traditionally capable of judicial resolution" ' " (id., at 154-155 [quoting Society of Plastics Indus. v County of Suffolk, 77 NY2d 761, 772]). "Capacity, or the lack thereof, sometimes depends purely upon a litigant's status" (Community Bd. 7, supra, at 155). For instance, an infant or an individual adjudicated incompetent may be disqualified from seeking relief in court (id.).

The question of capacity to sue often arises when governmental entities, which are creatures of statute, attempt to sue. In that context, the right to sue, " if it exists at all, must be derived from the relevant enabling legislation or some other concrete statutory predicate" (id., at 156 [citing Matter of Pooler v Public Serv. Commn., 58 AD2d 940, affd on mem below 43 NY2d 750; Matter of Flacke v Freshwater Wetlands Appeals Bd., 53 NY2d 537]).

We first address the capacity of the school plaintiffs. Plaintiff Board of Education's authority to sue is well recognized in case law. This Court has observed that the Board of Education of the City of New York is not a mere department of government, but "an independent corporate body" which "may sue and be sued in its corporate name" (Matter of Divisich v Marshall, 281 NY 170, 173) "in all matters relating to the control and management of the schools " (Gunnison v Board of Educ., 176 NY 11, 17; see also, Matter of Fleischmann v Graves, 235 NY 84). As to whether the City Board of Education can sue the State in matters relating to the control and management of the schools, we conclude that the answer is yes based on our examination of relevant authority.

In Board of Educ. v Allen (20 NY2d 109), several local Boards of Education challenged the constitutionality of a State statute permitting school authorities to loan textbooks free of charge to children enrolled in parochial schools. This Court stated: "The cases holding that a public body has no standing to challenge a State statute restricting its governmental powers are not in point (e.g., City of Buffalo v. State Bd. of Equalization, 26 A D 2d 213; County of Albany v. Hooker, 204 N. Y. 1, 9-10; Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v. Adirondack League Club, 307 N. Y. 475, 487; St. Clair v. 298 Yonkers Raceway, 13 N Y 2d 72, 76, cert. den. 375 U. S. 970) " (id., at 118). The reason for our conclusion, we stated, was adequately set forth in the opinion by Special Term:

"Granted there is apparent substantial authority prohibiting a municipality or agency of the State from challenging a State statute (Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v. Adirondack League Club, 307 N. Y. 475), but the rule could be subject to some conditions and limitations, which appear particularly appropriate in the pending matter. A school district and its Board of Education is more than a mere agent of the State. It is an entity performing a State purpose pursuant to the mandate of the People as directed by their Constitution. (N. Y. Const., art. XI, § 1; Education Law, § 2, subd. 14; Matter of Divisich v. Marshall, 281 N. Y. 170.)" (Board of Educ. v Allen, 51 Misc 2d 297, 299 [emphasis added].)

We further noted in Allen that the plaintiffs were not seeking to augment their powers, but were "asking for a court determination (in the form of a declaratory judgment) concerning whether they are legally authorized to spend public money for purposes purporting to be authorized by [the] statute", and that "[t]he right of a local Board of Education to sue the State Commissioner of Education has frequently been upheld including actions involving the question of constitutionality of State statutes. (Matter of Board of Educ. of Cent. School Dist. No. 2 v. Allen, 14 A D 2d 429; Matter of Bethlehem Union Free School Dist. v. Wilson, 303 N. Y. 107; Matter of Board of Educ. of Union Free School Dist. No. 3 v. Allen, 6 A D 2d 316, affd. 6 N Y 2d 871.)" (20 NY2d, at 118.)

Here, as in Allen, school plaintiffs are not attempting to augment their powers, but instead seek a determination in the form of a declaratory judgment that the State is not in compliance with its constitutional obligations. School plaintiffs complain that the statutory scheme for funding public education fails to provide them with sufficient resources to enable them to discharge their obligations under the Education Article of the State Constitution. This case thus falls squarely within a well-defined exception to the general rule of lack of capacity to sue which arises where "municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a 299 constitutional proscription" (see, Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283, 287; Allen, supra).

A more recent recognition of the right of local school authorities to sue the State occurred in Levittown (83 AD2d 217, 234, mod 57 NY2d 27, supra). The plaintiffs there were the City of New York and the Boards of Education of various property-poor school districts, including New York City, Buffalo, Rochester, and Syracuse. The State defendants challenged the plaintiffs' capacity to sue in the lower courts. The Appellate Division ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, stating:

"Two of defendants' threshold contentions--both fastening upon aspects of justiciability ... --merit summary dispatch. The various boards of education have standing to make the current challenge (see Board of Educ. v Allen, 20 NY2d 109, affd 392 US 236), and, in view of the 'expanding scope of standing' ... the school children represented by their parents have similar status" (Levittown, 83 AD2d 217, 233-234 [citations omitted]).

Although the Levittown Appellate Division used the term standing, as courts often do, the Court was clearly addressing the capacity issue as evidenced by its citation to Allen.

On appeal, this Court reached the merits, stating that it was our responsibility "to adjudicate contentions that actions taken by the Legislature and the executive fail to conform to the mandates of the Constitutions which constrain the activities of all three branches" (57 NY2d, at 39). Although the Levittown defendants did not argue lack of capacity before this Court, there is no question in my mind that the Appellate Division's decision, which stands for the proposition that the State can be sued in a declaratory judgment action challenging the constitutionality of the public school funding scheme, was correct and should be followed here.

In our view, the majority's extremely limited application of the general rule of lack of capacity is inappropriate here because it undermines the power and autonomy of local Boards of Education. Public education in New York is a complex, collaborative enterprise between a decentralized State authority and autonomous local districts endowed with broad powers and responsibilities for the management and control of day-to-day educational affairs:

"Our State Constitution mandates that the 'legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support 300 of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this state may be educated' (N. Y. Const., art. XI, § 1; emphasis supplied). The Legislature has imposed this duty in cities upon local boards of education (Education Law, § 2554)." (Matter of Wiltwyck School for Boys v Hill, 11 NY2d 182, 191 [emphasis added]; see also, Herman v Board of Educ., 234 NY 196, 202 ["The board of education is the agency to which the state delegates the power and duty of controlling the schools in the district"].)

The right to sue logically and necessarily derives from this statutory state of affairs. Indeed, how are local school districts to discharge their many duties if they are powerless to hold the State responsible where, as here, it is claimed that the State is failing to carry out its own constitutional mandate with respect to funding public education? For our system of education to work, there must be accountability.

Contrary to the majority's view, local school districts and Boards of Education are not mere "artificial creatures of statute" (majority opn, at 292); rather, they are substantially autonomous entities entrusted with carrying out a State purpose, and they possess broad powers and duties delegated to them by the State through Education Law § 2554. The City Board of Education is charged with the general administration and control of all aspects of educational affairs. Among other powers, duties, and responsibilities, it is empowered to create, abolish, and maintain positions, divisions, boards, bureaus, etc. (Education Law § 2554 [2]); appoint superintendents, examiners, directors, principals, teachers, nurses, etc. (id.); take care, custody, control and safekeeping of all school property and dispose of and sell all property (Education Law § 2554 [4], [5]); lease property for school accommodations (Education Law § 2554 [6]); purchase and furnish equipment, books, textbooks, furniture, and other supplies as may be necessary for the use of children (Education Law § 2554 [7]); establish, maintain and equip libraries and playgrounds (Education Law § 2554 [10]); and, authorize the general courses of study in schools and approve the content of such courses (Education Law § 2554 [11]). The powers and duties delegated to plaintiff Board of Education have also been delegated to plaintiff Chancellor through Education Law § 2590-h (17).

The majority's reliance on several older United States SupremeCourt 301 decisions which merely state the general rule that municipal corporations are but agents of the State have little persuasive value in the specific context of this modern-day challenge to the constitutionality of the State's public school financing scheme (see, majority opn, at 290).[1] The cases cited by the majority fail to reflect the Supreme Court's more recently expressed view that local school districts are not mere arms of the State, but actually possess a significant degree of independence and autonomy which must be recognized and respected.

In Milliken v Bradley (418 US 717), the Supreme Court rejected interdistrict busing as a remedy for unconstitutional segregation in the Detroit, Michigan, public school system. The District Court in Milliken, as does the majority here, took a narrow view of local school districts as mere political subdivisions established for administrative convenience (see, id., at 741). The Supreme Court soundly rejected this analytical approach as "contrary to the history of public education in our country" (id., at 741). The Supreme Court noted that in Michigan, as in this State, school districts are formally considered "instrumentalities of the State and subordinate to its State Board of Education and its legislature" (id., at 726, n 5). Nonetheless, while Michigan school districts were instrumentalities of the State in theory, in practice the Michigan educational structure actually endowed them with "a large measure of local control" (id., at 742) over day-to-day educational affairs, as evidenced by their statutory powers to acquire real and personal property, hire and contract with personnel, borrow money, determine the length of school terms, determine courses of study, make rules and regulations for operating schools, and so on (id., at 742, n 20). Thus, although school districts are, in theory, creatures of the State, the State's theoretical supremacy must sometimes give way to the realities of local control and autonomy, most especially in the area of education:

"No single tradition in public education is more deeply rooted than local control over the operation of schools; local autonomy has long been thought essential both to the maintenance of community 302 concern and support for public schools and to [the] quality of the educational process. See Wright v. Council of the City of Emporia, 407 U. S., at 469. Thus, in San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U. S. 1, 50 (1973), we observed that local control over the educational process affords citizens an opportunity to participate in decisionmaking, permits the structuring of school programs to fit local needs, and encourages 'experimentation, innovation, and a healthy competition for educational excellence.' " (Id., at 741-742.)

In Washington v Seattle School Dist. No. 1 (458 US 457), the Supreme Court permitted a local school district to assert the Fourteenth Amendment to invalidate a State initiative aimed at banning the use of mandatory busing as a means of promoting integration in Washington's public schools. The Court acknowledged the State's formal authority over local school districts, but found it highly significant that "Washington has chosen to meet its educational responsibilities primarily through 'state and local officials, boards, and committees,' ... and the responsibility to devise and tailor educational programs to suit local needs has emphatically been vested in the local school boards" (id., at 477-478 [citations omitted]; see also, Lawrence County v Lead-Deadwood School Dist., 469 US 256 [Supreme Court permitted a South Dakota county to assert the Supremacy Clause to preempt State law limiting discretion to use Federal funds]).

The Supreme Court of Kentucky has addressed the precise issue before us today, holding that local school districts have capacity to sue the legislature in the context of a constitutional challenge to the public school financing scheme (see, Rose v Council for Better Educ., 790 SW2d 186, 201, n 16). Notably, the court rejected the same "sterile logic" the majority resurrects today--that local Boards of Education are creatures of the State who cannot sue the State (id., at 200). We agree with the Kentucky court's reasoning that such a rule would be illogical in light of the many broad and specific powers conferred upon school districts by the legislature and the absence of any statutory restriction on the right of local boards to sue (id.). The Kentucky court stated, in words that could not be more fitting here:

"The subject matter of this lawsuit is whether the General Assembly has complied with its constitutional 303 duty to provide an 'efficient' system of common schools in Kentucky. Who is better qualified, who is more knowledgeable, who is more duty-bound, than the local school boards to raise the question? If the General Assembly is not adequately meeting its responsibility, how can the local boards meet theirs?" (Id., at 200.)

As the Kentucky Supreme Court stated, "a lawsuit to declare an education system unconstitutional falls within the authority, if not the duty, of local school boards to fulfill their statutory responsibilities, no matter who the defendants are" (id., at 201).

The majority's extensive quotation of Black Riv. (307 NY 475, supra) reflects a regression into formalism and rigidity (majority opn, at 291). As the majority notes, we held in that case that the plaintiff river regulating district " 'has no special character different from that of the State.' " (Id., at 291 [quoting Black Riv., supra, at 489].) Just the opposite is true here. Local school districts and their Boards of Education have a "special character" and place in our State; they cannot be equated with the purely governmental subdivisions at issue in the cases the majority relies upon. As we stated in Levittown:

" 'For all of the nearly two centuries that New York has had public schools, it has utilized a statutory system whereby citizens at the local level, acting as part of school district units containing people with a community of interest and a tradition of acting together to govern themselves, have made the basic decisions on funding and operating their own schools. Through the years, the people of this State have remained true to the concept that the maximum support of the public schools and the most informed, intelligent and responsive decision-making as to the financing and operation of those schools is generated by giving citizens direct and meaningful control over the schools that their children attend' " (Board of Educ., Levittown Union Free School Dist. v Nyquist, 57 NY2d 27, 46, supra).

In our view, the majority's refusal to infer capacity to sue on the part of the school plaintiffs rests on a foundational premise--the State's legal supremacy--that simply cannot be reconciled with reality and actual practice. Local school districts 304 and Boards of Education possess substantial independence and control, the significance of which must be recognized and respected rather than ignored.

II.

A governmental entity's capacity to bring suit may be inferred as a necessary incident of its powers and responsibilities, provided that no clear legislative intent negates review (see, Matter of City of New York v City Civ. Serv. Commn., 60 NY2d 436, 444-445). We have stated that the authority to bring a particular claim may be inferred when the agency in question has "functional responsibility within the zone of interest to be protected" (id., at 445). In Community Bd. 7 (supra), we concluded that the petitioner community board had such functional responsibility. The petitioner was challenging a City agency's decision denying it "access to certain documents which, arguably, might be useful in carrying out its statutorily mandated responsibility to study the land use proposal and to make appropriate recommendations to the Borough President and Planning Department" (84 NY2d, at 157 [emphasis added]).[2] The inquiry did not end there, however, and we ultimately concluded that even though petitioner had functional responsibilities within the "zone of interest", other factors negated the inference of capacity, including the actual "terms and history of [petitioner's] own enabling legislation" and its "limited role in the land use planning process" (id., at 157).

Nonetheless, applying this inferred authority standard here, it is clear that the school plaintiffs' authority to sue defendants must be inferred as a necessary incident of their broad powers and responsibilities in all matters relating to the control and management of the schools and in light of the State's decentralized role in our educational structure. School plaintiffs satisfy the "zone of interest" test, as they possess the requisite "policy-making authority and functional responsibility" from which the capacity to sue may be inferred (see, City of New York, 60 NY2d, at 442; Community Bd. 7, supra; cf., Matter of Bradford Cent. School Dist. v Ambach, 56 NY2d 158, 163-164). Moreover, neither the majority nor defendants 305 point to anything negating the inference of capacity on the part of the school plaintiffs in this case. To the contrary, the comprehensive nature of the school plaintiffs' powers and duties unequivocally supports a finding of capacity to sue here.

In conclusion, the City Board of Education is responsible for providing a constitutionally adequate education to the students in its charge. If, as alleged in this case, the current statutory public school financing scheme is so flawed that it effectively prevents the Board from carrying out its responsibilities within its "zone of interest", then the right to seek a declaratory judgment aimed at correcting those flaws must be inferred (see, Community Bd. 7, supra; City of New York, supra; Board of Educ. v Allen, supra; Board of Educ., Levittown Union Free School Dist. v Nyquist, 83 AD2d 217, supra; Rose v Council for Better Educ., supra).

Accordingly, we would hold that the school plaintiffs have capacity to bring this declaratory judgment action challenging the constitutionality of the public school financing system.

III.

Finally, we address the city plaintiffs' capacity to sue. The New York City Charter expressly authorizes the City to sue and be sued, and states in pertinent part:

"Except as otherwise provided in this chapter or other law, the corporation counsel shall have the right to institute actions in law or equity and any proceedings provided by law in any court, local, state or national, to maintain, defend and establish the rights, interests, revenues, property, privileges, franchises or demands of the city or of any part or portion thereof, or of the people thereof" (NY City Charter § 394 [c]).

Thus, New York City, through its Corporation Counsel, may bring suit to protect and vindicate the rights, property, and revenues of the City and its citizens.

The city plaintiffs are responsible for the maintenance and support of public schools in the City School District and have distinct functional responsibilities within the zone of interest to be protected. The City is under a statutory obligation to provide substantial financial support for its school children (see, Education Law § 2576), and if the educational financing 306 system is constitutionally infirm, as is alleged here, the City is obviously affected, as it is saddled with, among other things, an increased financial burden. Moreover, the New York City Charter imposes significant responsibilities on the City with respect to education (see, NY City Charter §§ 520-523). The city plaintiffs' capacity to bring this suit in order to protect the rights, property and revenue of the City must be inferred from these responsibilities and from its financial obligations (see, Community Bd. 7, supra; City of New York, supra).

Accordingly, we would reverse the order of the Appellate Division and reinstate plaintiffs' complaint in its entirety.

Judges Simons, Titone and Bellacosa concur with Judge Levine; Judge Ciparick dissents in a separate opinion in which Judge Smith concurs; Chief Judge Kaye taking no part.
Order affirmed, with costs. 307

Footnotes

1 We consider the majority's heavy reliance on County of Albany v Hooker (204 NY 1) even less persuasive. That case was decided in 1912, well before Allen and other cases which developed the exceptions to the general rule of lack of capacity to sue were decided, and did not even involve educational issues or school entities as plaintiffs.

2 In Community Bd. 7 we noted that the "zone of interest" test, as used in the capacity context, "is related but not identical to the 'zone of interest' analysis that is traditionally applied in the allied area of standing" (84 NY2d, at 156).

655 N.E.2d 649, 631 N.Y.S.2d 553, 103 Ed. Law Rep. 1146

End of Document

984 F.3d 213
United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit.

Julio CLERVEAUX, Chevon Dos Reis, Eric Goodwin, Jose Vitelio Gregorio, Dorothy Miller, Hillary Moreau, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Spring Valley Branch, Plaintiffs-Appellees,

v.

EAST RAMAPO CENTRAL SCHOOL DISTRICT, Defendant-Appellant.[1]

Docket No. 20-1668
|
August Term, 2020
|
Argued: August 19, 2020
|
Decided: January 6, 2021

Synopsis

Background: Interest group and minority registered voters brought action against school district, alleging that the at-large election system to elect members of the board of education resulted in minority vote dilution in violation of the Voting Rights Act. After a bench trial, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Cathy Seibel, J., 462 F.Supp.3d 368, concluded that the Voting Rights Act was violated. School district appealed.

Holdings: The Court of Appeals, Pooler, Circuit Judge, held that:

[1] vote-dilution claims do not require a showing of racial causation;

[2] political science professor's methodology for estimating voter race was admissible expert testimony;

[3] the District Court was not required to give more weight to school district's expert than political science professor; and

[4] various factors in totality-of-the-circumstances analysis supported vote-dilution claim.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes (35)

[1] Federal Courts Questions of Law in General

The Court of Appeals is required to see to the proper application of governing legal principles under a de novo standard of review.

[2] Federal Courts Definite and firm conviction of mistake

A finding is clearly erroneous only if the reviewing court is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Federal Courts "Clearly erroneous" standard of review in general

The question under the "clearly erroneous" standard is not whether the reviewing court would reach the same findings from the same record.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

An amendment to the Voting Rights Act was enacted to make clear that a violation based on vote dilution could be proved by showing discriminatory effect alone and to adopt a "results test" as opposed to the intent test. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[5] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

If a plaintiff successfully shows that (1) the minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single member district, (2) that it is politically cohesive, and (3) that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate, the court must next assess whether the totality of the circumstances supports the plaintiff's vote-dilution claim under the Voting Rights Act. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[6] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The factors relevant to determining whether a totality of the circumstances supports a Voting Rights Act violation based on vote dilution include: the history of voting-related discrimination, the extent to which voting in the elections is racially polarized, the extent to which voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group are used, the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes, the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination, the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns, and the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[7] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Two factors that are probative in some vote-dilution cases to determining whether a totality of the circumstances supports a Voting Rights Act violation are: (1) evidence demonstrating that elected officials are unresponsive to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group, and (2) evidence that the policy underlying the State's or the political subdivision's use of the contested practice or structure is tenuous. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[8] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The factors for determining whether a totality of the circumstances supports a Voting Rights Act violation based on vote dilution are neither exclusive nor comprehensive; no specified number of factors need be proved, and it is not necessary for a majority of the factors to favor one position or another. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[9] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The only facts that must be proven without exception for a vote-dilution claim under the Voting Rights Act are the following preconditions: (1) the minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single member district, (2) that it is politically cohesive, and (3) that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[10] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The factors considered under the totality-of-the-circumstances stage of the analysis for whether there is a Voting Rights Act violation based on vote dilution are not strict requirements; the factors on the whole must support a vote-dilution finding, but no single specific factor or definite number of factors must be proven. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[11] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Vote-dilution claims under the Voting Rights Act do not rise or fall on racial causation; still, racial causation may be sufficient—though not necessary—to find a Voting Rights Act violation.

Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[12] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Vote-dilution claims under the Voting Rights Act do not require a showing of racial causation; racial causation is one factor, of many, to be considered when assessing the totality of the circumstances. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[13] Federal Courts Expert evidence and witnesses

A district court's decision to admit expert testimony is reviewed for abuse of discretion.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[14] Evidence Expert Evidence

Federal Courts Expert evidence and witnesses

The question of what weight to accord expert opinion is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the factfinder, and the reviewing court will not second guess that decision on appeal absent a basis in the record to think that discretion has been abused.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[15] Evidence Daubert and Frye tests as to reliability in general

There is no requirement that an inquiry into reliability of expert testimony under Daubert take any specific form. Fed. R. Evid. 702.

[16] Evidence Daubert and Frye tests as to reliability in general

In assessing reliability of expert testimony, the district court may consider, in addition to the factors listed in the rule of evidence, factors enumerated in Daubert, some or all of which might prove helpful in determining the reliability of a particular scientific theory or technique; these factors are: (1) whether the methodology or theory has been or can be tested, (2) whether the methodology or theory has been subjected to peer review and publication, (3) the methodology's error rate, and (4) whether the methodology or technique has gained general acceptance in the relevant scientific community. Fed. R. Evid. 702.

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] Evidence Particular Experiments, Tests, and Studies

Political science professor's methodology for estimating voter race for precinct-level populations, used to determine how racial groups voted in board of education elections, could be tested, which supported admission of expert testimony in vote-dilution case, despite contention that professor failed to preserve spreadsheet needed to replicate analysis; school district's expert began replicating analysis and was able to reproduce results, and professor credibly testified that no interim spreadsheet existed. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301; Fed. R. Evid. 702.

[18] Evidence Particular Experiments, Tests, and Studies

Political science professor's methodology for estimating voter race for precinct-level populations, used to determine how racial groups voted in board of education elections, was subjected to peer review, which supported admission of expert testimony in vote-dilution case; there were several peer-reviewed articles, including one that proposed use of methodology for voting-rights litigation, and another article authored by one of school district's experts supported conclusion that methodology could assign race to registrants in a voter file where quantity was not present and then aggregate individuals by geographic unit such as voting precinct. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301; Fed. R. Evid. 702.

[19] Evidence Particular Experiments, Tests, and Studies

Political science professor's methodology for estimating voter race for precinct-level populations, used to determine how racial groups voted in board of education elections, did not have high potential rate of error, which supported admission of expert testimony in vote-dilution case, despite contention that professor was required to generate error rates for his analysis; two studies found that self-reported race matched with race estimates over 90% of the time, and error rates were not necessary to calculate separately because methodology provided racial probabilities, and thus error rates were built into the model. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301; Fed. R. Evid. 702.

[20] Evidence Particular Experiments, Tests, and Studies

Political science professor's methodology for estimating voter race for precinct-level populations, used to determine how racial groups voted in board of education elections, had been generally accepted by scientific or academic community, and thus expert testimony was admissible in vote-dilution case; even if methodology was novel in voting-rights litigation, it was not otherwise novel, as there were numerous studies validating use of methodology, and case was uniquely suited for use of methodology based on fact that school district was very diverse and highly segregated. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301; Fed. R. Evid. 702.

[21] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Evidence Conflicts with Other Evidence

District court was not required to give more weight to school district's expert than it did to political science professor in determining best methodology for estimating voter race for precinct-level populations, used to determine how racial groups voted in board of education elections for purposes of vote-dilution case; school district's expert's data was less precise than professor's data, which was pulled from actual voter file and used information on actual voters in precinct, and school district's expert's data was overinclusive, reflecting information on all eligible voters rather than actual voters. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[22] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Voting in school district elections was racially polarized, which was factor that supported vote-dilution claim in totality-of-the-circumstances analysis, despite contention that public-private school divide, rather than race, was primary driver of election results; there was a near-perfect correlation between race and school type, such that public-school community could be viewed as vehicle for advancing distinctively minority interests, candidates did not campaign on specific policies, and only minority candidates put forward by organization, which precluded minority-preferred candidates, were those private-school community believed would be easy to control. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[23] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

A finding of vote dilution depends upon a searching practical evaluation of the past and present reality. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[24] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

A finding of racial animus on the part of individuals or communities is not necessary for a Voting Rights Act violation based on vote dilution. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[25] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Leaders from private-school, Orthodox community excluded minority-preferred candidates and minority voices from slating process for candidates for board of education, which was factor that supported vote-dilution claim in totality-of-the-circumstances analysis; even though some minority candidates had appeared on private-school slate, there was no open call for candidates, only candidates with some personal connection to leaders' organization were introduced, vetted, and supported, and white, private-school community leaders found minority candidate acceptable because he would further their interests. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[26] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The focus is properly on whether minority-preferred, not simply minority, candidates have been slated in a candidate slating process, as a factor in addressing a vote dilution claim under the Voting Rights Act. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[27] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Consideration of the lack of minority input in a candidate slating process is both appropriate and important, as a factor in addressing a vote dilution claim under the Voting Rights Act. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[28] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

It is not enough that minority candidates were occasionally slated; courts must instead assess whether minorities were permitted to enter into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner, when addressing vote-dilution claims under the Voting Rights Act. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[29] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Courts focus primarily on the elected office at issue, when addressing the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction, as a factor for a vote-dilution claim in the totality-of-the-circumstances analysis. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[30] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Courts consider not only whether minority candidates have been elected, but whether minority residents can elect their preferred candidates, as a factor for a vote-dilution claim in the totality-of-the-circumstances analysis. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[31] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The election of a few minority candidates does not necessarily foreclose the possibility of dilution of the Black vote, in violation of the Voting Rights Act, because majority citizens might evade the Act by manipulating the election of a "safe" minority candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[32] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

For ten-year period, no minority-preferred candidate won a contested election for school district's board of education, which was factor that supported vote-dilution claim in totality-of-the-circumstances analysis; even though minority candidates had won some contested races, every candidate of color who won was either considered "safe" by white slating organization or affected by special circumstances, such as need to comply with state-imposed monitor's instructions of having at least one public-school parent on board or attorney's advice that it would be good for case to have minority run. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[33] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Minority success may be discounted when it is meant to thwart successful challenges to electoral schemes on dilution grounds under the Voting Rights Act, and there is no requirement that such efforts postdate litigation. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[34] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Evidence Compromise or settlement

District court could rely on board of education members' actions in failing to provide minority members with accurate settlement information, when addressing whether policy underlying school district's use of the challenged practice in elections was tenuous, as a factor that supported vote-dilution claim in totality-of-the-circumstances analysis; evidence from settlement negotiations were admissible to demonstrate bad faith, and bad faith on school district's part was probative of whether school district's reasons for maintaining at-large voting were tenuous. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301; Fed. R. Evid. 408.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[35] Evidence Bad faith

Evidence of settlement negotiations may be used to demonstrate bad faith. Fed. R. Evid. 408.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

218 Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Seibel, J.)

Attorneys and Law Firms

RANDALL M. LEVINE, Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP (David J. Butler, William S.D. Cravens, Clara Kollm, David B. Salmons, Bryan Killian, Stephanie Schuster, on the brief), Washington, D.C., for Defendant-Appellant East Ramapo Central School District.

CHARLES S. DAMERON, Latham & Watkins LLP (Andrew Clubok, Claudia T. Salomon, Corey A. Calabrese, Marc N. Zubick, Russell D. Mangas, on the brief), Washington, D.C., for Plaintiffs-Appellees.

Arthur N. Eisenberg, Perry M. Grossman, New York Civil Liberties Union Foundation (on the brief), New York, N.Y., for Plaintiffs-Appellees.

Nathan Lewin, Lewin & Lewin, LLP, Washington, D.C., for Agudath Israel of America, amicus curiae.

Before: POOLER, HALL, and CHIN, Circuit Judges.

Opinion

POOLER, Circuit Judge:

Few rights are more sacred than the right to vote. Indeed, the right to vote is preservative of all other rights, see Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 370, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220 (1886), but historically it has not been granted equally in this country. To rectify this deprivation, Congress passed the Voting Rights Act. Section 2 of that statute prohibits states or political subdivisions from structuring elections "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account 219 of race or color," such that minority citizens "have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 52 U.S.C. § 10301. In doing so, the Voting Rights Act fulfills the promise of the Fifteenth Amendment—that no citizen shall be denied the right to vote based on "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." U.S. Const. amend. XV.

East Ramapo Central School District ("District") appeals from the May 25, 2020 decision and order of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York (Seibel, J.), issued following a bench trial, holding that the at-large election system used by the District to elect members to its Board of Education ("Board") resulted in dilution of black and Latino residents' votes in violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 52 U.S.C. § 10301. On appeal, the District argues that: Section 2 requires a finding that racial motivations caused the election results; the district court abused its discretion in admitting and relying on Plaintiffs' expert's findings, which used data derived through Bayesian Improved Surname Geocoding ("BISG") rather than the more traditional Citizen Voting Age Population ("CVAP") data; and the totality of the circumstances does not support a finding of impermissible vote dilution.

We reject these arguments. We hold that Section 2 does not require racial causation, though the existence or absence of such causation is a relevant factor for consideration. We further hold that the district court did not err in concluding that the analysis using BISG is reliable and superior to analysis using CVAP. Lastly, we hold that the totality of the circumstances supports the finding of a Section 2 violation given the near-perfect correlation between race and school-type; the scant evidence supporting the District's claim that policy preferences, not race, caused election results; the Board's blatant neglect of minority needs; the lack of minority-preferred success in elections; the exclusive, white-dominated slating organization[2]; and evidence suggesting the District acted in bad faith throughout the litigation.

The order of the district court enjoining Board elections until the District proposes and executes a remedial plan, before us through an interlocutory appeal, is accordingly affirmed. On December 23, 2020, the District moved to stay the district court's injunction pending the resolution of this appeal. As this opinion resolves the appeal and affirms the district court's order, the District's motion is denied as moot.

BACKGROUND

I. Factual Background[3]

A. The District and Board Elections

Plaintiffs-Appellees are the Spring Valley Branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Julio Clerveaux, Chevon Dos Reis, Eric Goodwin, and Dorothy Miller, who are minorities and registered voters in the District. Since 2008, every candidate these individuals have voted for has lost. In addition, Dos Reis and Goodwin unsuccessfully ran for the Board in 2017 with the perceived support of the public-school community, a group of residents interested in 220 improving the conditions of public schools in the District.

The District is a highly segregated political subdivision of New York State located in Rockland County. The population in the District is approximately 65.7% white, 19.1% black, 10.7% Latino, and 3.3% Asian. During the 2017-2018 school year, approximately 8,843 students attended public schools, while 29,279 students attended private schools. The private-school community consists primarily of white Orthodox and Hasidic Jewish residents who educate their children in yeshivas, while the public-school community consists of primarily black and Latino residents whose children attend public schools. The correlation between race and school attended in the District is near perfect: 92% of public-school students are black or Latino, while 98% of private-school students are white.

The District is governed by a Board, which consists of nine members whose responsibilities include selecting the Superintendent of Schools and approving other personnel, setting the budget and levying taxes, establishing policies, and evaluating and communicating the progress and needs of the District to the public and others. As of early 2020, the Board members were: Harry Grossman, president; Sabrina Charles-Pierre, vice president; Mark Berkowitz; Carole Anderson, appointed on an interim basis due to the resignation of Bernard L. Charles, Jr.; Joel Freilich; Ashley Leveille; Yoel T. Trieger; Ephraim Weissmandl; and Yehuda Weissmandl.

Board elections are staggered so that three seats, each carrying a three-year term, are open every year (absent special circumstances, such as death or resignation of a member, in which case an extra seat may be available that year). Candidates run for a specific, individually numbered seat. The elections are at-large, meaning that all eligible voters in the District vote in each race. The following table summarizes the results of Board elections from 2008-2018 (with "W" designating white candidates, "B" designating black candidates, and "L" designating Latino candidates).[4]

221

Yr.	Seat 1		Seat 2		Seat 3		Seat 4	TOTAL VOTE COUNT
2008	Aaron Wieder (W) (6,261)*	Steve White (W) (2,415)	Moshe Hopstein (W) (6,543)*		Nathan Rothschild (W) (5,103)*			9,163
2009	Morris Kohn (W) (8,768)*	Leonardo Vera (L) (4,548)	Carolyn Watson (W) (566)	Margaret Hatton (W) (4,216)	Eliyahu Solomon (W) (8,578)*	Emilia White (B) (4,149)	Richard Stone (W) (9,224)*	13,708
2010	Antonio Luciano (W) (7,622)	Moses Freidman (W) (7,926)*	Stephen Price (W) (13,612)*		Suzanne Young-Mercer (B) (13,839)*			16,056
2011	Moshe Hopstein (W) (9,904)*	M. Hatton (W) (7,907)	Yehuda Weissmandl (W) (9,923)*	A. Luciano (W) (7,909)	Daniel Schwartz (W) (9,947)*	Carole Anderson (B) (7,818)	Joanne Thompson (B) (13,958)*	18,206
2012	Hiram Rivera (L) (6,315)	Jacob Lefkowitz (W) (8,474)*	Kim Foskew (W) (6,276)*	E. Solomon (W) (8,460)*	Yonah Rothman (W) (8,521)*	J. Thompson (B) (6,335)		15,091
2013	Maraluz Curado (L) (6,806)*	Margaret Tuck (B) (5,244)	Eustache Clerveaux (B) (5,085)	Pierre Germain (B) (6,899)*	Robert Forrest (B) (5,175)	Bernard Charles (B) (6,833)*		12,317
2014	M. Hopstein (W) (2,388)*		Harry Grossman (W) (2,652)*		Yakov Engel (W) (2,381)*		Y. Weissmandl (W) (2,379)*	4,998
2015	Sabrina Charles-Pierre (B) (4,600)	Jacob Lefkowitz (W) (6,380)*	Alan Jones (B) (408)	Y. Rothman (W) (6,523) *	Natashia Morales (L) (4,864)	S. White (W) (4,615)	Yisroel Eisenbach (W) (556)	Juan Pablo Ramirez (L) (6,293)*	11,694
2016	B. Charles (B) (7,973)*	K. Foskew (W) (5,972)	P. Germain (B) (7,860)*	Juan Fields (B) (4,137)	Y. Weissmandl (W) (7,626)*	N. Morales (L) (4,401))	S. Charles-Pierre (B) (5,014)*	12,311
2017	Alexandra Manigo (W) (4,964)	Mark Berkowitz (W) (9,158)*	Eric Goodwin (B) (4,930)	H. Grossman (W) (9,137)*	Joel Frielich (W) (9,530)*	Chevon Dos Reis (L) (4,503)		14,343
2018	S. Charles-Pierre (B) (9,180)*		Yoel Trieger (W) (7,179)*	Miriam Moster (W) (1,996)	E. Weissmandl (W) (6,977)*	Joselito Cintron (L) (2,308)		9,714

*Key: An * denotes the election winner, Bold denotes the incumbent candidate*

B. The Slating Organization

Influential members of the white, private-school community have an informal slating process by which preferred Board candidates are selected, endorsed, promoted, and elected. Rabbi Yehuda Oshry, an influential Orthodox community leader, selects and approves candidates, controls access to the slating process, and submits petitions on behalf of candidates. Private-school advocate Shaya Glick also helps select candidates and publicizes their candidacy. Yakov Horowitz, a leader in the Orthodox community, connects potential candidates to Rabbi Oshry and approves candidates. The slating organization (the "Organization") has secured victory for the white community's preferred candidate 222 in each contested election. Although some minority candidates have been slated by the Organization and have won seats on the Board, minority voters did not prefer these candidates.

The Organization does not hold an open call for candidates, and only those with connections to the Organization or its leaders have been introduced, vetted, and selected. When vetted, candidates were not asked about their policy views. Multiple successful private-school candidates did not campaign or spend money to get elected; rather, they simply were approved by Rabbi Rosenfeld, Rabbi Oshry, or Glick.

For instance, Charles, a black man who won multiple Board elections after being slated by the Organization, was connected to Rabbi Rosenfeld through a mutual acquaintance. Rabbi Rosenfeld met with Charles, but he did not ask Charles about his policy platform. Rabbi Rosenfeld did, however, require interviews with Charles's running mates, and Charles needed Rabbi Rosenfeld's approval to add his running mates to his slate.

Charles's situation contrasts with that of public-school candidate and plaintiff Goodwin. Goodwin "genuinely impressed" a former Board member from the private-school community, but he was nonetheless not introduced to anyone in the Orthodox community for endorsement. Supp. App'x at 94. Charles believed that "when it comes to running for the school board ... you're either working with [the] white community or you're working with the other community." Supp. App'x at 146.

C. Minority Board Members

Minority candidates have won seven out of thirty-two contested Board elections in the District from 2005 to 2018. However, from 2008 to 2018, no minority-preferred candidate won a contested Board election, and each minority candidate who did win did so with the approval and support of the Organization.

Most notable are Charles and Pierre Germain, both black men who won four of the elections analyzed. Both were vetted and endorsed by the Organization. Neither candidate campaigned in, nor sought to appeal to the public-school community given that they had already secured the Organization's endorsement and with it the support of the white community. Minority voters did not support Charles and Germain. Once elected, Charles and Germain allied with private-school interests and against public-school interests. For example, Charles did not support the appointment of Charles-Pierre, a black woman, to the Board because he believed she was aligned with public-school advocates. Charles testified that Charles-Pierre was "on the opposing side" and "the lamb who will certainly lead to a slaughter of this board." Trial Tr. at 1851:5-8. While Germain supported Charles-Pierre, he told his fellow Board members that "we can have better control of Sabrina than the Spanish girl," a reference to another public-school community candidate who Germain considered "aggressive." Supp. App'x at 96-97. In addition, Charles "went along" with the decision of other Board members to appoint a less experienced, white individual to the Board over a black retired District principal who held two master's degrees, despite the pervasive spelling and grammatical errors in the white candidate's two-paragraph application. Supp. App'x at 150.

Two other minority candidates, Maraluz Corado and Juan Pablo Ramirez, won with the support of the white community in 2013 and 2015, respectively. Both resigned from the Board shortly thereafter. The Board appointed Grossman to fill Corado's seat, choosing him over a minority candidate who had also applied to fill the seat. 223 In appointing Grossman, the Board did not interview him publicly, as was required by the District's protocol.

The Board appointed Charles-Pierre to fill Ramirez's seat after a state-appointed monitor pressed the Board to include a public-school parent. Charles-Pierre subsequently won an uncontested election in 2016. Grossman told Charles-Pierre that Yehuda Weissmandl had said, "The only reason [Charles-Pierre] is there and ran unopposed is because the board wants to do what [the state-appointed monitor] said." NAACP v. E. Ramapo Cent. Sch. Dist., 462 F. Supp. 3d 368, 393 (S.D.N.Y. 2020) (alterations in original) (internal quotation marks omitted). Charles-Pierre was reminded repeatedly that her presence on the Board was up to the whims of Grossman and the Orthodox community. For instance, when admonishing Charles-Pierre for supporting a candidate he did not like to fill a Board vacancy, Grossman told Charles-Pierre, "If there really was any desire by anybody to remove you from the [B]oard, all that would need to be done was to run a candidate against you in May .... [The] Orthodox community could just have voted you out in May. WE [sic] told them that you were good and not to run a candidate." Supp. App'x at 248. Charles-Pierre complained that the Board kept her in the dark, made her look stupid, and criticized her. In a message to other Board members, Grossman said that while Charles-Pierre "has a voice," "[r]ealistically, ... she has zero control or influence on direction." Supp. App'x at 169.

In 2019, Ashley Leveille, a black public-school candidate, won a contested race. This occurred after Grossman sent a message to Horowitz in April 2018 regarding this very litigation, saying, "Spoke to David Butler today. He asked me to convey message that it would be good for the case to have a minority to run against Sabrina that the community could support." Supp. App'x at 128. David Butler is counsel for the District in the present litigation. Originally, Leveille ran unopposed. At that time, another candidate, Pastor Jose Cintron, was collecting signatures to run for Yehuda Weissmandl's seat. Yehuda Weissmandl then decided to run again, so Cintron instead ran for the same seat Leveille sought to fill. After Cintron switched seats, Rabbi Oshry collected signatures for his campaign, and Grossman reached out to the Organization members in support of the campaign. Cintron told Leveille that if he ran against her, "they're going to give me the seat." Trial Tr. at 1776:1. Leveille understood "they" to refer to the Jewish community because Cintron told her he had been meeting with the rabbis. Accordingly, Leveille and Cintron both believed Leveille would lose. But on election day and to her surprise, Leveille won because voter turnout among the white population in the District was unusually low.

D. The Board's Favoritism Towards Private-School Interests

In 2014, a state-appointed monitor investigated the Board's activities and made the "[m]ost disturbing" finding that the "Board appears to favor the interests of private schools over public schools." Supp. App'x at 280. "Beginning in 2009[,] [the] Board made draconian spending cuts to public school programs and services in order to balance its budgets." Supp. App'x at 280. Meanwhile, "spending on programs benefitting private schools increased." Supp. App'x at 284. "No meaningful effort [was] made to distribute [the] pain of deep budget cuts fairly among private and public schools." Supp. App'x at 284. The monitor found the problem of private-school bias to be "compounded by the Board's failure to conduct meetings in an open and transparent way." Supp. App'x at 285. The monitor further observed that the District's leaders responded poorly to disapproval, branding critics as "anti-Semitic" 224 and "political opponents." Supp. App'x at 287.

The Board's actions support the monitor's findings of favoritism towards private schools. For example, the Board closed two public schools over minority opposition and made a sweetheart deal with a yeshiva to sell it one of the closed schools at a discounted price. In addition, the Board increased nonmandated private-school services, such as transportation, without restoring public schools' budgets to pre-cut levels. In fact, from 2017 to 2019, the District paid yeshiva contractors to bus 1,172 more private-school students than were even registered to use private-school transportation services, creating $832,584 in unsubstantiated costs. The Board also made accommodations at Board meetings for Yiddish-speaking parents but did not do so for Spanish-speaking parents, resulting in New York State issuing a corrective action plan.

The Board also repeatedly failed to respond to public-school concerns. Olivia Castor, a former public-school student now attending law school, attested to the fact that around March 2013, she had gathered and presented responses from her classmates on the quality of their education to the Board during a Board meeting. The Board did not respond, and during the presentation itself, Board members ignored Castor and gave her no attention. When Castor attempted to discuss inadequacies in students' schedules using her classmates' genuine but redacted schedules as examples, the Board accused Castor of falsifying the schedules.

In a hallway during the meeting, the Board's attorney, without provocation, directed profanity and threatening language at a seventeen-year-old black student on the honor roll. The student was distressed by the incident, and Castor informed the Board of the occurrence and requested that the attorney be removed from his position. The Board, however, did not address the incident.

Similarly, the Board failed to act timely after the former District Superintendent, Joel Klein, made derogatory comments about immigrant students. Klein stated that the influx of "illegal" immigrants from "the southern border" would skew the District's graduation rates "because we know everyone [sic] of these kids are dropping out." Supp. App'x at 238-39. Klein proposed flimsy, nonsubstantive programming for the immigrant students because according to him, the students "want to learn the language, they want free lunch, breakfast and whatever else they can get." Supp. App'x at 239. The Board nevertheless left Klein in place for more than a year after the comments were made until state-appointed monitors worked with the Board president to find a replacement.

II. Procedural History

A. Commencement of the Lawsuit

Plaintiffs filed suit on November 16, 2017. Plaintiffs challenged the District's use of at-large voting for Board elections on the ground that it denies black and Latino citizens equal opportunity to participate in the political process and elect candidates of their choice, in violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 52 U.S.C. § 10301. Plaintiffs requested the district court enter an order declaring the at-large method violated Section 2; enjoining the District from conducting further elections using at-large voting; ordering the implementation of a single-member ward election system; and requiring compliance with Section 2 for all future elections.

B. Expert Findings and Admissibility Challenges

1. Plaintiffs' Expert: Dr. Matthew Barreto

Dr. Matthew A. Barreto, a professor of political science at the University of California, 225 Los Angeles, served as Plaintiffs' expert. Dr. Barreto, working with his colleague Dr. Loren Collingwood, sought "to examine whether evidence of racially polarized voting exists in elections for East Ramapo and to determine if black and Latino eligible voters have their electoral interest blocked by a combination of institutional arrangements and white bloc-voting." Supp. App'x at 351. Dr. Barreto concluded that there was "very strong evidence of racially polarized voting" in Board elections from 2013 to 2018; that minority-preferred candidates had not won a single contested election during that time; and that the electoral system in the District contains many features known to reduce minority voter participation and the opportunities to elect minority-preferred candidates. Supp. App'x at 351-52. Dr. Barreto found that blacks and Latinos voted cohesively and that whites voted in a bloc in favor of the winning candidate in each election.

To determine how groups voted, Dr. Barreto and Dr. Collingwood used ecological inference ("EI") models, which draw an inference of how groups vote based on an analysis of aggregate ecological data, such as precinct vote totals. Dr. Barreto used two EI models. The first is King's Ecological Inference ("King's EI"), and the second is row by column Ecological Inference ("EI:RxC"). Both work by "regressing candidate choice against racial demographics within the aggregate precinct" to find voting patterns by race. Supp. App'x at 409. King's EI does this by running "a 2-by-2 analysis of each candidate and each racial group, in iterations, whereas [EI:RxC] allows multiple rows and multiple columns to be estimated simultaneously." Supp. App'x at 409. Both methods were used "in tandem to provide greater confidence in results." Supp. App'x at 409.

The aggregate ecological data input into King's EI or EI:RxC can come from a few source methodologies. Dr. Barreto used BISG. In broad strokes, BISG can provide a probability assessment of an individual's race based on the individual's surname and location. BISG does this by using Census Bureau data to determine what percentage of the national population with the individual's surname is black, white, Latino, Asian, or other. That national data is then combined with Census Bureau data pertaining to the individual's geographic "block" (which covers the geographic distance of roughly one city block) to see what percentage of the residents in that block area is black, white, Latino, Asian, or other. Combining these datapoints "provides a probabilistic prediction of individual ethnicity." App'x at 1368. "Concordance between self-reported race/ethnicity and BISG estimates is typically 90 to 96 percent for the four largest racial/ethnic groups." App'x at 1377.

Take the following illustrative example. If we sought to determine the probability that an individual with the surname Smith living in New York City was black, white, Latino, Asian, or other, we would first look at the Census Bureau data to see what percentage of individuals in the United States with the surname Smith fall into one of these groups. We then look at our specific Smith's residential block in New York City to determine what percentage of residents on this block are black, white, Latino, Asian, or other. Cross-referencing these percentages can provide a probability estimate as to whether Smith is black, white, Latino, Asian, or other.

BISG allowed Dr. Barreto to compile and input actual voter data, as opposed to using CVAP data, which is data of all eligible voters.[5] Dr. Barreto started with 226 each voter's "file," which contains the voter's name and address. Supp. App'x at 44-45. He then used the "Who Are You" or "WRU" software, created by scholars Kosuke Imai and Kabir Khanna, "to estimate the probability that a voter is white, black, Latino, or other, using a combination of surname and geolocation." Supp. App'x at 352. This yielded a reliable estimate of each actual voter's race or ethnicity, which was aggregated at the precinct level to assess the racial composition of each precinct. Once Dr. Barreto estimated the racial composition at the precinct level, Dr. Barreto used both King's EI and EI:RxC to estimate what percentage of the white vote, the black vote, and the Latino vote each candidate in Board elections received.

2. The District's Expert: Dr. John Alford

Dr. John Alford, a professor of political science at Rice University, served as the District's primary expert. Contrary to Dr. Barreto, Dr. Alford concluded that the evidence does not support a finding of minority voter cohesion or legally significant, racially polarized voting in the District. While Dr. Alford also used EI, he used CVAP for the source data. As mentioned above, CVAP data consists of "a precinct-level summary of the racial breakdown of the eligible voter population." App'x at 1073. CVAP data comes from the American Community Survey, which is completed by two percent of the population, for each of five years, creating "what's called a 10 percent sample." Trial Tr. at 256:14-257:2 (internal quotation marks omitted). CVAP data provides racial composition within Census Bureau geographic blocks, but these geographic blocks do not align with precinct boundaries.

3. The District Court's Admissibility Determination

Before trial, the District moved to exclude Dr. Barreto's expert testimony. The district court issued an oral decision finding the testimony admissible and denying the motion. While the District made numerous arguments as to the reliability of BISG data, the district court repeatedly noted that these arguments went to the weight of the evidence as opposed to its admissibility. The district court further informed the parties that it would make its decision as to reliability following trial.

As to admissibility, the district court addressed each of the four factors set forth in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S.Ct. 2786, 125 L.Ed.2d 469 (1993). With respect to the first factor—whether the theory or technique could be tested—the district court concluded that it could. The District's primary argument was that Dr. Barreto had not turned over all the materials necessary to replicate his analysis. But the district court dismissed this argument, pointing out that "one of the District's experts was able to get the script to run on the 2015 voter data but was never asked to complete the EI analysis." App'x at 896-97; see also Supp. App'x at 15-16 (one of the District's experts testifying that he "ran the script" and "got it to run"). The district court also found that Dr. Alford admitted to being able to independently run the analysis.

With respect to the second factor—whether the theory or technique has been subject to peer review—the district court found that the use of BISG on precinct-level voter data had been peer reviewed. It cited to an article authored by scholars Imai and Khanna, which proposed the use of BISG for voting rights litigation. With respect to the third factor—the error rate of the methodology—the district court found the methodology to be admissible given the strong concordance, from ninety 227 to ninety-six percent, between self-reported race and BISG estimates.

With respect to the fourth factor—whether the methodology has been generally accepted by the academic or scientific community—the district court did not explicitly address the factor. The district court discussed academic articles involving the use of BISG; the District argued these articles did not support Plaintiffs' use of BISG, but the district court found that the helpfulness of the articles goes to their weight of persuasiveness, not their admissibility.

Ultimately, the district court concluded that there "are indications of scientific reliability supporting the opinions' admissibility," and "Plaintiffs have made a sufficient showing that I should hear the testimony and give it whatever weight I find it deserves." App'x at 893. Accordingly, the district court admitted Dr. Barreto's testimony and determined that it would revisit how much weight to give the testimony following the trial.

C. The Trial

A bench trial was held across the span of seventeen days. The witnesses at trial included the parties' experts, Dr. Barreto and Dr. Alford; members of the public-school community; Plaintiffs; former and current Board members; and influential private-school community leaders involved in slating, such as Hersh Horowitz and Rabbi Oshry.[6]

D. The District Court's Decision

Following the bench trial, the district court ruled in favor of Plaintiffs, holding that the at-large Board elections violated Section 2 and resulted in impermissible vote dilution for black and Latino residents.

In reaching this conclusion, the district court relied on the testimony of Dr. Barreto and discounted the testimony of Dr. Alford, primarily because it considered the analysis using BISG to be superior to that using CVAP. Accordingly, the district court concluded that, as Dr. Barreto found, the District's black and Latino communities were politically cohesive and that the white majority votes as a bloc in Board elections such that no minority-preferred candidate won a contested election since 2008.

The district court also found several Board members and witnesses associated with the private school community not credible. For instance, the district court concluded that Grossman "seems to have no compunction about compromising his legal obligations when it suits his purposes." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 396. Grossman was impeached at least three times. He also testified that he was not aware of any slating organization in the District, but numerous pieces of testimony indicated that he clearly participated in slating with Horowitz, Oshry, and Glick. In addition, the district court found Yehuda Weissmandl not credible. He denied the existence of a slating organization and testified unconvincingly that a text message he sent saying that he "personally got the blessing for [their] slate" through an influential Rabbi's son was not about the Board slate. Supp. App'x at 85. Weissmandl testified that he "[didn't] know what [he] was referring to." Supp. App'x at 86. Weissmandl similarly testified that, despite having 228 sent an email with the note, "[P]lease respond ASAP as we discussed" and "one choice" in connection with filling a Board vacancy, he did not know what he meant by "one choice." Trial Tr. at 1125:1-22. Weissmandl was impeached twice.

The district court also found the totality of the circumstances weighed firmly in Plaintiffs' favor. In relevant part, while the district court found no evidence of official discrimination in the District and no overt or subtle racial appeals in campaigning, it concluded that the racially polarized voting in the District was not explained by policy preferences. The district court also found that an exclusive slating process tightly controlled by a few white individuals existed in the District. The district court further concluded that while there had been some minority success in elections, the only minority candidates who had won were those perceived as "safe" by the Organization, while other minority-preferred candidates had not succeeded. NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 409-10. The district court also found that white Board members had lied to minority Board members about settlement negotiations regarding this lawsuit and considered this evidence of some Board members' bad faith in wanting to maintain the at-large voting system.

As a result of Plaintiffs' success in proving a Section 2 violation, the district court enjoined the District from holding any further elections under its at-large system, including the election that was scheduled to take place in June 2020. The District timely appealed.

DISCUSSION

[1] [2] [3] "[The] resolution of the question of vote dilution is a fact intensive enterprise to be undertaken by the district court. And while we are required to see to the proper application of governing legal principles under a de novo standard of review, we are constrained to apply a clearly erroneous standard of review to the district court's ultimate findings of vote dilution, thereby preserving the benefit of the trial court's particular familiarity with the indigenous political reality without endangering the rule of law." Goosby v. Town Bd., 180 F.3d 476, 492 (2d Cir. 1999) (internal quotation marks, brackets, and citation omitted). A finding is clearly erroneous only if the reviewing court "is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Atlantic Specialty Ins. Co. v. Coastal Envt'l Grp., Inc., 945 F.3d 53, 63 (2d Cir. 2019) (internal quotation marks omitted). As Chief Justice Roberts recently acknowledged in a concurrence:

> The question is not whether we would reach the same findings from the same record. These District Court findings entailed primarily ... factual work and therefore are reviewed only for clear error. Clear error review follows from a candid appraisal of the comparative advantages of trial courts and appellate courts. While we review transcripts for a living, they listen to witnesses for a living. While we largely read briefs for a living, they largely assess the credibility of parties and witnesses for a living.

June Med. Servs. L.L.C. v. Russo, —— U.S. ——, 140 S. Ct. 2103, 2141, 207 L.Ed.2d 566 (2020) (Roberts, C.J., concurring) (internal alterations, citations, and quotation marks omitted).

Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act provides in its entirety that:

> (a) No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of 229 the guarantees set forth in section 10303(f)(2) of this title, as provided in subsection (b).
>
> (b) A violation of subsection (a) is established if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by subsection (a) in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population.

52 U.S.C. § 10301.

[4] Congress amended the Voting Rights Act in 1982 to clarify that plaintiffs need not prove intent to discriminate. Id.; see also Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 35, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). The Supreme Court, in a decision two years before the amendment, held that minority voters must prove that state actors had adopted or maintained the challenged electoral mechanism with discriminatory intent. See Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980). Congress acted in 1982 to "make clear that a violation could be proved by showing discriminatory effect alone" and adopting a "results test" as opposed to the intent test used in Bolden. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 35, 106 S.Ct. 2752; see also S. Rep. No. 97-417, at 28 (1982), as reprinted in 1982 U.S.C.C.A.N. 177, 179, 205 (hereinafter "1982 Senate Report") ("[T]he specific intent of this amendment is that the plaintiffs may choose to establish discriminatory results without proving any kind of discriminatory purpose. ... If as a result of the challenged practice or structure plaintiffs do not have an equal opportunity to participate in the political processes and to elect candidates of their choice, there is a violation of this section." (emphasis added) (footnotes omitted)).

The Supreme Court set forth the framework for analyzing claims of unlawful vote dilution in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25. There, a majority of the Court held that a plaintiff must establish three "necessary preconditions" when bringing a Section 2 vote dilution claim: (1) "that [the minority group] is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single member district"; (2) "that it is politically cohesive"; and (3) "that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it—in the absence of special circumstances, such as the minority candidate running unopposed—usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Id. at 50-51, 106 S.Ct. 2752.

[5] [6] [7] If a plaintiff successfully shows the Gingles preconditions, the court must next assess whether the totality of the circumstances, based on the following factors, supports the plaintiff's claim:

> the history of voting-related discrimination in the State or political subdivision; the extent to which voting in the elections of the State or political subdivision is racially polarized; the extent to which the State or political subdivision has used voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group, such as unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, and prohibitions against bullet voting; the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes; 230 the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process; the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns; and the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction.

Id. at 44-45, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (citing 1982 Senate Report at 28-29). These factors (the "Senate Factors") come from the Senate Judiciary Committee Report accompanying the passage of the 1982 amendment. Two other factors in the Senate Judiciary Committee Report (the "Additional Factors") are also probative in some cases: (1) "evidence demonstrating that elected officials are unresponsive to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group"; and (2) evidence "that the policy underlying the State's or the political subdivision's use of the contested practice or structure is tenuous." Id. at 45, 106 S.Ct. 2752.

[8] This list of nine factors is "neither exclusive nor comprehensive." Goosby, 180 F.3d at 492. "[N]o specified number of factors need be proved, and [ ] it is not necessary for a majority of the factors to favor one position or another." Id. "[T]he ultimate conclusions about equality or inequality of opportunity were intended by Congress to be judgments resting on comprehensive, not limited, canvassing of relevant facts." Id. (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

In the present case, the District first argues that Section 2 requires a showing that racial motivations caused the election results at issue. Second, the District contends that Plaintiffs have failed to show the second and third Gingles preconditions, which includes a challenge to the district court's decision to admit and find reliable Dr. Barreto's expert analysis and testimony. Third, the District argues that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that a totality of the circumstances supports their claim because Senate Factors 2, 4, 7, and Additional Factor 9 weigh in favor of the District, not Plaintiffs. We address each argument in turn.

I. There is no requirement that a plaintiff must prove racial animus to establish a Section 2 vote-dilution claim.

Our Circuit considered an argument similar to that the District makes here in Goosby v. Town Board, 180 F.3d at 493. There, the defendant Town Board of the Town of Hempstead, New York ("the Town Board") argued that political partisanship, and not race, explained the adverse election results. Id. Therefore, the Town Board claimed that the white bloc voting patterns in the elections could not be legally significant under the third Gingles precondition. Id. Our Circuit acknowledged that the splintered Gingles Court left open the issue of what role causation plays in Section 2 analyses following Congress's 1982 amendment. We held that the best reading of the Court's various opinions in Gingles counsels for consideration of alternative causal explanations like the Town Board's political-partisanship claim "under the 'totality of the circumstances' analysis rather than as part of the third Gingles precondition." Id.

The District, however, is not concerned with where in the analysis causation is analyzed. Instead, the District urges us to hold that a plaintiff bringing a Section 2 Voting Rights Act claim must prove, at some point, that racial animus caused the challenged election result. Appellants' Br. at 37 ("There must be evidence that racial 231 animus is a but-for cause of election results ...." (emphasis in original)).

[9] [10] That is not so. The District's argument rests on a fundamental misunderstanding of our precedent, Supreme Court precedent, and the framework for Section 2 claims. See Gingles, 478 U.S. at 47, 106 S.Ct. 2752; id. at 100-01, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (O'Connor, J., concurring); Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491-92; 1982 Senate Report at 15-16, 27-28, 36-37. The only facts that must be proven without exception for a Section 2 claim are the Gingles preconditions; this is why they are termed "preconditions." All three preconditions are necessary, but are not sufficient, for a Section 2 violation. Those factors considered under the totality-of-the-circumstances stage of the analysis, on the other hand, are not strict requirements. The factors on the whole must support a vote-dilution finding. But no single specific factor or definite number of factors must be proven. See Goosby, 180 F.3d at 492. Nor must a majority of the factors favor the plaintiff for a Section 2 claim to succeed. Id. When combined with the Gingles preconditions, any one factor or combination of factors may be sufficient, but are not necessary in whole or part, for a Section 2 violation.

[11] Goosby holds that the absence or existence of racial causation is a factor properly considered at the totality-of-the-circumstances step. Id. at 493 ("We think the best reading of the several opinions in Gingles, however, is one that treats causation as irrelevant in the inquiry into the three Gingles preconditions but relevant in the totality of circumstances inquiry." (citation omitted)); see also Lewis v. Alamance County, N.C., 99 F.3d 600, 615 n.12 (4th Cir. 1996) (causation is relevant to the totality of the circumstances inquiry and irrelevant when considering the Gingles preconditions); Uno v. City of Holyoke, 72 F.3d 973, 983 (1st Cir. 1995) (non-racial reasons for divergent voting patterns to be considered under totality of circumstances test); Nipper v. Smith, 39 F.3d 1494, 1524 (11th Cir. 1994) (courts consider racial and non-racial explanations for community voting patterns under the totality of the circumstances). Causation is just one of many factors courts consider in determining whether "the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by [Section 2] in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 52 U.S.C. § 10301. Section 2 claims do not rise or fall on racial causation.[7] Still, racial causation may be sufficient—though not necessary—to find a Section 2 violation.

This understanding is in accordance with the legislative intent as well. A causation 232 requirement would entail demonstrating that racial animus caused the election results at issue. Indeed, the District's primary argument on appeal is that at-large voting for Board elections does not violate Section 2 because of the absence of " 'racial animus' on the part of Orthodox Jewish voters." Appellant's Br. at 26. But Congress rejected precisely such a showing when it drafted the 1982 amendments. Congress considered "the intent test [to be] unnecessarily divisive because it involves charges of racism on the part of individual officials or entire communities." 1982 Senate Report at 36 (emphasis added); see also Christopher S. Elmendorf, Making Sense of Section 2, 160 U. Pa. L. Rev. 377, 424 (2012) (explaining that the 1982 amendments addressed what Congress "found objectionable in the Bolden plurality's intent requirement" and that "[r]elief under Section 2 ought not to require 'brand[ing] individuals as racist' " (quoting 1982 Senate Report at 36)). The legislative record flatly contradicts the District's assertion that Congress only rejected the intent test for officials and still sought to require proof of " 'race-based motivation' on the part of the electorate who exploit the challenged practice." Appellant's Br. at 31 (emphasis omitted). Contrary to the District's claims, requiring a showing of racial causation would contravene Congress's unmistakable intent.

For this reason, the District's reliance on Bostock v. Clayton County, —— U.S. ——, 140 S. Ct. 1731, 207 L.Ed.2d 218 (2020), is not persuasive. The District focuses on Section 2's language prohibiting the denial or abridgement of the right to vote "on account of race or color" and argues that similar language in Title VII (which prohibits discrimination "because of" sex) was interpreted in Bostock to require but-for causation, see Bostock, 140 S. Ct. at 1739. As an initial point, the District fails to acknowledge that the Supreme Court has elsewhere interpreted "because of" language to not require proof of race-based intent in the Title VII context. See Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 432, 91 S.Ct. 849, 28 L.Ed.2d 158 (1971) (recognizing that Title VII claims may be proved based on a disparate impact). Regardless, however, the Supreme Court has "not hesitated to give a different reading to the same language—whether appearing in separate statutes or in separate provisions of the same statute—if there is strong evidence that Congress did not intend the language to be used uniformly." Smith v. City of Jackson, 544 U.S. 228, 260-61, 125 S.Ct. 1536, 161 L.Ed.2d 410 (2005) (O'Connor, J., concurring in the judgment). Here, the unique context of the Voting Rights Act and Congress's clear desire not to require a showing of racial animus indicate that "on account of race or color" should not be interpreted to require but-for causation.

[12] In sum, our precedent and the legislative history make manifest that Section 2 claims do not require a showing of racial causation. Racial causation is one factor, of many, to be considered when assessing the totality of the circumstances. Goosby, 180 F.3d at 493. The existence of such causation may be sufficient for a Section 2 violation, but it is not necessary. See id. at 492, 493.

II. The second and third Gingles preconditions are met.

The District next contends that Plaintiffs failed to adduce sufficient evidence to satisfy the second and third Gingles preconditions of whether black and Latino residents voted cohesively and whether the white majority voted as a bloc to defeat minority-preferred candidates. Specifically, the District argues that the district court improperly admitted and relied on the testimony 233 and findings of Dr. Barreto, Plaintiffs' expert, establishing that black and Latino residents were politically cohesive and that white residents voted as a bloc.

[13] [14] [15] We review the district court's decision to admit Dr. Barreto's expert testimony for abuse of discretion. See Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137, 152, 119 S.Ct. 1167, 143 L.Ed.2d 238 (1999); Restivo v. Hessemann, 846 F.3d 547, 575 (2d Cir. 2017).[8] Similarly, "[t]he question of what weight to accord expert opinion is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the factfinder, and we will not second guess that decision on appeal absent a basis in the record to think that discretion has been abused." Pope v. County of Albany, 687 F.3d 565, 581 (2d Cir. 2012).

A. The district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting Dr. Barreto's testimony.

[16] "In assessing reliability, the district court should consider the indicia of reliability identified in [Federal Rule of Evidence] 702, namely, (1) that the testimony is grounded on sufficient facts or data; (2) that the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and (3) that the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case." United States v. Williams, 506 F.3d 151, 160 (2d Cir. 2007) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). In addition to these factors, the district court may consider those enumerated in Daubert, "some or all of which might prove helpful in determining the reliability of a particular scientific theory or technique." Kumho, 526 U.S. at 141, 119 S.Ct. 1167 (internal quotation marks omitted) (citing Daubert, 509 U.S. at 593-94, 113 S.Ct. 2786). These factors are: (1) whether the methodology or theory has been or can be tested; (2) whether the methodology or theory has been subjected to peer review and publication; (3) the methodology's error rate; and (4) whether the methodology or technique has gained general acceptance in the relevant scientific community. Daubert, 509 U.S. at 593-94, 113 S.Ct. 2786.

Although the District argues that the BISG methodology fails to satisfy the Daubert test, the district court properly considered the Daubert factors and did not exceed its discretion by admitting Dr. Barreto's expert testimony.

1. Whether the methodology could be tested

[17] Turning to the first Daubert factor, the District argues that Dr. Barreto's analysis "cannot be tested," is "unprecedented," and claims that he "destroyed his bespoke data sets before trial." Appellant's Br. at 56-57. The district court rejected these arguments and correctly concluded that the BISG methodology Dr. Barreto used could be tested. This is borne out by the fact that one of the District's experts, Dr. Stevenson, began replicating the analysis as to the 2015 voter data and was able to get the scripts to run and reproduce the results, NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 391, though he was never asked to complete the full EI analysis. Dr. Alford also indicated that he could have independently run the 234 BISG model. Additionally, the district court described how Dr. Barreto "validated his analysis using other methodologies," and that all five of these validation methods "supported his conclusions." Id. at 385.

Although the District on appeal claims that Dr. Barreto failed to preserve "a spreadsheet whose rows identified voters by surname, address, and race probabilities" needed to replicate his analysis, Appellant's Br. at 55, the district court found that Dr. Barreto credibly testified that no such spreadsheet exists. Dr. Barreto explained that no "interim printout of BISG race estimates" existed because "[t]hose are just generated in the background of the [WRU] program, and as those BISG estimates get generated, they then just get plugged into the precincts and then the precinct analysis is done." Supp. App'x at 54. Dr. Barreto testified that he had "turned over everything that [he] ran and detailed how the script could be used to generate those race estimates." Supp. App'x at 54. Given that the District's experts admitted to being able to replicate the analysis and the absence of evidence as to any requisite interim spreadsheet, the district court properly concluded that the BISG methodology could be tested.

2. Whether the methodology had been peer-reviewed

[18] Turning to the second Daubert factor, the district court properly concluded that the use of BISG to estimate voter race for precinct-level populations has been subjected to peer review. The district court supported this finding by referencing several peer-reviewed articles, see NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 383, including one written by Imai and Khanna that proposed the use of BISG for voting-rights litigation. As Dr. Barreto explained, the purpose of this article was "to see if [the BISG methodology] could improve our estimates of race and ethnicity at the precinct level." Supp. App'x at 49 (emphasis added); see also App'x at 1372 ("We now estimate voter turnout by racial category and validate our estimates against actual turnout by race at the precinct and congressional district levels in Florida." (emphasis added)). Imai and Khanna were successful and concluded that BISG "enables academic researchers and litigators to conduct more reliable ecological inference in states where registered voters are not asked to report their race." App'x at 1374. The district court found that Dr. Barreto "applied BISG in the manner proposed in the academic literature." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 384.

Other evidence, such as a footnote in an article co-authored by one of the District's experts, also supports the conclusion that BISG could "assign a race to registrants in a voter file where this quantity is not present and then aggregate these individuals by geographic unit such as a voting precinct." App'x at 1276 n.21 (emphasis added).[9] Thus, the district court did not err in finding that the BISG methodology as used by Dr. Barreto had been subjected to peer review.

3. The error rate

[19] Turning to the third Daubert factor, the District argues that the BISG methodology has a high potential rate of error. This is untrue. The district court discussed two studies finding that "self-reported race matched with ... BISG race estimate[s]" over 90% of the time: one study found that the probability was 95% for Hispanics and 93% for blacks and 235 whites and the other found a range of 90-96%. NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 383. The District does not challenge this concordance finding but instead argues that Dr. Barreto did not calculate error ranges when using BISG to estimate racial probability of District voters.

The District fails to understand how the BISG methodology works. As the district court recognized, error rates are not necessary to calculate separately in the BISG analysis because BISG provides racial probabilities—that is, the likelihood that an individual is black, white, Latino, or other. As such, error rates are "built into the model." App'x at 969.[10] While miscoding (i.e., improperly coding a white person as having a higher probability of being black, or vice versa) can occur, Dr. Barreto said that this had "no impact on the conclusions [he drew] at all" because he followed "the prescribed methodology of aggregating those probabilities down to a precinct." Supp. App'x at 56. In other words, Dr. Barreto was "not attempting to look at one individual on the file and say this person is black, white, or Hispanic. ... So where there might be an error, the literature suggests that those things often cancel out and that's why you aggregate the probabilities and then your estimates are extremely accurate." Supp. App'x at 56. Accordingly, the District's assertion that Dr. Barreto was required to generate error rates for his analysis is unfounded. The district court properly found that the strong concordance between BISG results and self-reported race or ethnicity supports the reliability of Dr. Barreto's methodology.

4. Whether the methodology has been generally accepted by the scientific or academic community

[20] Finally, while the use of BISG may be novel in voting-rights litigation, it certainly is not otherwise novel. The record is replete with studies validating the use of BISG, which the district court cited in finding the methodology reliable. The district court found that BISG "has been extensively validated by experts," and that "[m]any respected scholars have used and validated BISG in the political science context and across a variety of disciplines." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 383; see also id. at 392 ("The method has been endorsed by respected social scientists in leading publications."). Although the district court acknowledged "[t]his may be the first time that voter-preference estimates based on BISG have been admitted into evidence at a VRA trial," id. at 392, the court thoughtfully considered how this case was uniquely suited for the use of BISG data based on the fact that the District was very diverse and highly segregated: "BISG is particularly reliable for use in the District because of its unique characteristics," id. at 384. While this may indeed be the first time that the BISG methodology was admitted at a VRA trial,[11] as the district court aptly explained, "[t]here must always be a first time." Id. at 392. This is especially true when the new method is superior to 236 the old method with respect to the case at hand. See id. at 387 ("[G]iven the unique characteristics of the District, BISG is a better data set than CVAP for use as an input for ecological inference, and Dr. Barreto therefore used the superior methodology."). There is more than enough evidence indicating the acceptance of the BISG methodology in the scientific or academic community.

In conclusion, because the district court has significant latitude in deciding how to determine reliability, see Restivo, 846 F.3d at 575-56, and because the district court conducted a thorough review of the Daubert factors, see NAACP, 462

F. Supp. 3d at 382-92; see also App'x at 885-903 (district court's oral ruling on Daubert motions), the district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting Dr. Barreto's expert testimony.

B. The district court did not abuse its discretion by according more weight to Dr. Barreto's expert testimony than it did to Dr. Alford's expert testimony.

[21] The district court ultimately relied on Dr. Barreto's testimony and discounted Dr. Alford's, finding that "given the unique characteristics of the District, BISG is a better data set than CVAP for use as an input for ecological inference, and Dr. Barreto therefore used the superior methodology." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 387. As discussed above, we review for abuse of discretion the weight a district court assigns to expert testimony. Pope, 687 F.3d at 581.

Here, the district court's ultimate decision to give greater weight to Dr. Barreto's testimony was not an abuse of discretion, and the factual findings underpinning its determination were not clearly erroneous. As the district court explained, it found the BISG data set more reliable than CVAP for three main reasons. NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 387-88.

First, CVAP data is less precise than BISG data because CVAP data comes from the American Community Survey which contains all eligible voters in a district, whereas BISG data is pulled from the actual voter file. CVAP data is derived from a sample of only approximately ten percent of the population, see Trial Tr. 256:14-257:2, thus, applying that data to the entire district population requires extrapolation. That may yield inaccurate results. Dr. Barreto's BISG methodology uses data as to the actual voters in the District, so no such extrapolation would be required. This makes BISG a more reliable and precise data set.

Second, CVAP data is less precise than BISG data because of geographic misalignment between CVAP data and the data needed for analyzing voting patterns in a precinct. CVAP data provides racial proportions within census block groups, but census blocks are smaller geographically than precincts, see Brian Amos, Michael P. McDonald, Russell Watkins, When Boundaries Collide, 81 Pub. Opinion Q. 385, 387 (2017), thereby causing a misalignment. Because BISG data, however, uses information on actual voters in the precinct, the BISG methodology generates racial probabilities at the precinct level, making it superior for analyzing voting patterns in a precinct.

Finally, CVAP data is overinclusive. Because CVAP data reflects information on all eligible voters, rather than actual voters like BISG does, CVAP data overestimates voter turnout. Even Dr. Alford acknowledged flaws with using CVAP data as a proxy for voter turnout. Dr. Alford cited Dr. Barreto's research on the turnout-estimation issues with CVAP data and explained that using some form of double equation regression or double equation EI 237 could have addressed those issues. However, there is no evidence that Dr. Alford applied any such double equation regression or EI. Even if he had, Dr. Barreto testified that CVAP "still start[s] with an incorrect input variable" of "all citizen adults," so that issue would not have been cured. Supp. App'x at 175.

Any one of these three reasons, which are all supported by sound factual findings drawn from sufficient record evidence, suffices to support the district court's conclusion that BISG is the superior data set, at least in this case. Therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion by concluding Dr. Barreto's expert testimony and analysis was more reliable than that of Dr. Alford.

In sum, because Dr. Barreto's expert findings of political cohesion amongst black and Latino voters and of a white voting bloc are admissible and reliable and were afforded greater weight than those of Dr. Alford, the district court did not clearly err in concluding that Plaintiffs have adduced sufficient evidence to establish the second and third Gingles preconditions.

III. Senate Factors 2, 4, 7, and Additional Factor 9 weigh in favor of Plaintiffs.

The District's final contention is that Plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that a totality of the circumstances supports their vote-dilution claim. On appeal, the District does not challenge the district court's findings as to Senate Factors 1, 3, 5, 6, and Additional Factor 8. Those findings, in any event, are fully supported in the record. The District challenges only the district court's findings that Senate Factors 2, 4, 7, and Additional Factor 9 weigh in Plaintiffs' favor.

A. Senate Factor 2

[22] Senate Factor 2 requires courts to consider "the extent to which voting in the elections of the State or political subdivisions is racially polarized." Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491 (quoting Gingles, 478 U.S. at 44-45, 106 S.Ct. 2752). It is under this factor that racial causation or alternative explanations, such as partisanship, are properly considered. Id. at 493.

The District argues, as it did before the district court, that the primary driver of election results is not race, but rather, the public-private school divide. The District claims that a majority of voters prefer policies, such as lower property taxes and increased benefits to private-school students, that private-school candidates support.

[23] The district court did not clearly err when it found that the Board election results were caused by race and not policy preferences. There is a near-perfect correlation between race and schooltype. While correlation is not necessarily causation, the circumstances indicate that schooltype is a proxy for race. Those policies favorable to the private-school community come at the cost of the public-school community. This is apparent from facts in the record, including the Board's closure of two public schools over minority opposition; the Board's subsequent attempt to sell one of the school's buildings to a yeshiva at a deep discount; and the increase in nonmandated private-school transportation while public school cuts were left unrestored. It defies reality to say that those who vote for private-school-friendly policies would be ignorant that the brunt of these policies is borne by minority children. And a finding of vote dilution "depends upon a searching practical evaluation of the past and present reality." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 45, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). 238 Given this evidence, the public-school community "can be viewed as a vehicle for advancing distinctively minority interests." League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Clements, 999 F.2d 831, 861 (5th Cir. 1993).

In addition, as the district court found, there is scant—if any—evidence that Board candidates campaigned on specific policies, a fact that seriously undermines the District's policy-preferences argument. There is no evidence in the record to suggest that private-school candidates campaigned on specific pro-private-school policies, to the extent that they campaigned at all, and there is no evidence that public-school candidates advocated for raising taxes or cutting private-school services. The District does not dispute the absence of this evidence and instead argues that campaigning on particular policies was unnecessary because the voters knew what policies the private-school candidates supported. Even if the voters assumed what the private-school candidates stood for, the leaders who slated these candidates did not ensure that candidates aligned with their policy views. Multiple candidates slated by the Organization testified that they were not asked about their policy positions; the Organization essentially selects election winners by virtue of adding them to the private-school slate. The fact that candidates were not asked about policy positions casts serious doubt on the argument that policy preferences drove election results.

More broadly, the existence of an organization that has precluded minority-preferred candidates itself supports the finding that Factor 2 weighs in favor of Plaintiffs.[12] In Goosby, we found it probative that "blacks simply are unable to have any preferred candidate elected to the Town Board, given the historical success of the Republican party in all Town Board elections" because no black candidate, besides a "black crony" of the County Chairman, had been slated by the Republican party. 180 F.3d at 496. Here, too, the only minority candidates put forward by the Organization are those the private-school community believed would be easy to control. See, e.g., Supp. App'x at 96 (Germain reading an email he wrote in which he indicated he would support Charles-Pierre because "we can have better control of Sabrina than the Spanish girl"); Supp. App'x at 248 (Grossman telling Charles-Pierre that "[i]f there really was any desire by anybody to remove you from the [B]oard, all that would need to be done was to run a candidate against you in May").

Furthermore, the record is replete with evidence that the private-school-run Board was chronically unresponsive to public-school concerns. When a public-school student approached the Board about deficiencies in public-school students' schedules, she was accused of lying and ignored. Supp. App'x at 474-78. The Board also neglected to act after its attorney threatened an innocent student. It likewise dilly-dallied when the former District Superintendent made seemingly derisive comments about immigrant students, leaving the Superintendent in place for over a year despite condemnation from the public-school community and taking action only when the monitor intervened. Moreover, the Board routinely favored private-school students over public-school students. And though the Board cut public-school services in the name of budget balancing, it paid yeshiva contractors to bus 1,172 more 239 students than registered, yielding unsubstantiated expenses to the tune of $832,584. We must agree with the state-imposed monitor that such blatant favoritism on the part of the Board is "[m]ost disturbing." Supp. App'x at 280. The Board's lack of responsiveness further supports rejecting the policy-preferences argument. See Goosby, 180 F.3d at 497.

[24] When taken together, the evidence supports the district court's finding in favor of Plaintiffs on Senate Factor 2. The near-perfect correlation between race and school-type, along with the political realities in the District, suggest that "the majority is voting against candidates for reasons of race." See NAACP v. City of Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d 1002, 1015 (2d Cir. 1995).[13] Additionally, the dearth of evidence that candidates campaigned on specific policies, the Organization's slating process that excludes minority-preferred candidates, and the Board's unresponsiveness to public school concerns all support the conclusion of the district court that the election results are "not best explained by" policy preferences. Goosby, 180 F.3d at 497 (internal quotation marks omitted).[14]

B. Senate Factor 4

[25] The fourth Senate Factor assesses, "if there is a candidate slating process, whether the members of the minority group have been denied access to that process." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 37, 106 S.Ct. 2752. The district court found that leaders from the private-school, Orthodox community run an exclusive slating process with no input from minorities. There is no open call for candidates, and only candidates with some personal connection to the Organization are introduced, vetted, and supported by it. Even public-school candidates considered impressive by private-school community members were denied an opportunity to be slated. And to the extent any minority candidates were slated, they were either not minority-preferred, perceived to be "safe," or the result of unusual circumstances, as discussed with respect to Senate Factor 7. The slated candidates always prevailed in contested elections. As a result, the district court concluded that "blacks and Latinos did not have the opportunity to participate in the private school slating process, which was tightly controlled by a few white individuals." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 406.

The District does not challenge the existence of the slating process on appeal. Instead, the District argues that minority candidates have appeared on the private-school slate, and that this is all that is required. According to the District, the district court's focus on the lack of input from minorities and the failure to slate minority-preferred candidates was erroneous. 240 The District points to Bernard Charles as evidence that minority candidates were actively involved in the slating process, and it reiterates its policy-preferences argument to justify the failure to slate minority-preferred candidates.

[26] We first take up the District's argument that the lack of minority input and the failure to slate minority-preferred candidates are irrelevant facts. In light of the governing precedent, this argument falls flat. Our Circuit made clear in Goosby that the focus is properly on whether minority-preferred, not simply minority, candidates have been slated. See 180 F.3d at 496 (stressing that the failure to slate black candidates meant that "blacks simply are unable to have any preferred candidate elected to the Town Board" (emphasis added)).

[27] [28] Additionally, Supreme Court precedent indicates that consideration of the lack of minority input is both appropriate and important. In White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), the Court focused on evidence showing that black residents were "generally not permitted to enter into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner" such that a finding of vote dilution was proper. Id. at 767, 93 S.Ct. 2332. And the Gingles Court emphasized that courts reviewing vote-dilution claims must take a functional view of the political process. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 45, 106 S.Ct. 2752. For these reasons, it is not enough that minority candidates were occasionally slated. Courts must instead assess, as the district court did in this case, whether minorities were "permitted to enter into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner." White, 412 U.S. at 767, 93 S.Ct. 2332 (emphases added).

Here, the largely uncontested facts that the district court relied on, such as the failure to conduct open calls for candidates, the inside connections necessary to be slated, the vetting process, and the use of only "safe" or politically or legally expedient minority candidates, all support the finding that minority candidates and residents were denied meaningful access to the slating process. These facts underscore the significant control of the white private-school leaders over the slating process, which worked to exclude minority interests and viewpoints from the slate and ultimately the Board.

Bernard Charles's situation does not alter this conclusion. Although Charles was accepted by the Organization after being vetted, Charles testified that Rabbi Rosenfeld's approval to add running mates to the slate was required. Thus, Charles's involvement in slating was nominal. Regardless, however, any say Charles had in the selection of his running mates is a slender reed upon which to lean. The evidence suggests that the white, private-school community leaders found Charles acceptable because he would further their interests. Charles's situation thus does not undermine the finding that minorities were effectively excluded from the slating process. In Goosby as well, we discounted the slating of a black candidate because he was selected over a minority-preferred candidate and was a "crony" of the chairman. Goosby, 180 F.3d at 496; cf. Velasquez v. City of Abilene, 725 F.2d 1017, 1022-23 (5th Cir. 1984) (considering "relevant and substantial" any evidence "that the minority candidates slated by [an organization] were not true representatives of the minority population in the city of Abilene").

As for the District's claim that policy preferences explain why minority-preferred candidates were not slated, we reject this argument for the same reasons given with respect to Senate Factor 2. The candidates approved for the private-school slate, such as Charles, were not asked 241 about any specific policy platforms before being slated, and there is no evidence that public-school candidates advocated for increasing taxes or decreasing private-school services while campaigning.

For these reasons, the district court did not err in concluding that the Organization excludes minority-preferred candidates and minority voices from the slating process. Senate Factor 4 weighs in favor of Plaintiffs.

C. Senate Factor 7

[29] [30] [31] Senate Factor 7 considers "the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 37, 106 S.Ct. 2752. We focus primarily on the elected office at issue. See Goosby, 180 F.3d at 497. We consider not only whether minority candidates have been elected, but whether minority residents can "elect their preferred candidates." Id. at 495-97 (emphases added) (discounting the placement of a black attorney on Town Board and minority success in exogenous elections because the candidates were not preferred by black residents). Similarly, "the election of a few minority candidates does not necessarily foreclose the possibility of dilution of the black vote, in violation of this section," because "majority citizens might evade the section ... by manipulating the election of a 'safe' minority candidate." 1982 Senate Report at 29 n.115 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). The Senate Report cites favorably to Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297, 1307 (5th Cir. 1973), which held that minority success may be discounted if it results from "politicians, who, apprehending that the support of a black candidate would be politically expedient, campaign to insure his election" or efforts to "thwart successful challenges to electoral schemes on dilution grounds."

[32] The district court concluded that this factor weighs in favor of Plaintiffs because, although minority candidates have won some contested races, between 2008 and 2018, no minority-preferred candidate won a contested election. The court held that "every candidate of color who won was either perceived as 'safe' by the white slating [O]rganization or affected by special circumstances." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 409.

The District challenges this conclusion on two grounds. First, the District argues that the district court erroneously focused on whether minority-preferred candidates, as opposed to minority candidates, have succeeded. Second, it argues that the district court misapplied the safe-candidate doctrine. We reject both grounds.

The District's belief that the subject of our inquiry is minority candidates, not minority-preferred candidates, is wrong as a matter of law. "Were we to hold that a minority candidate's success at the polls is conclusive proof of a minority group's access to the political process, we would merely be inviting attempts to circumvent the Constitution." Zimmer, 485 F.2d at 1307. And contrary to the District's assertion, the text of Section 2 expressly focuses on whether "members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b) (emphasis added). Consistent with this language, our Circuit in Goosby discounted election results when minority, but not minority-preferred, candidates prevailed. 180 F.3d at 495-97. Therefore, the district court properly focused on whether minority-preferred candidates were successful.

The district court also did not err in finding that the successful minority candidates have been perceived as "safe" or 242 otherwise resulted from unusual circumstances. The district court primarily discussed four candidates in its analysis: Charles, Germain, Charles-Pierre, and Leveille.

Charles and Germain, two black men who won four of six contested elections, were heavily vetted and slated by the Organization. They were not minority-preferred candidates. Once elected, they aligned with the white majority and took positions counter to minority interests. For instance, Charles did not support the appointment of Charles-Pierre because she was "on the opposing side," Trial Tr. at 1851:5-8, and Germain only supported her because he thought the Board could maintain "better control" of Charles-Pierre than the other public-school candidate, whom he dubbed "the Spanish girl," Supp. App'x at 96-97. In addition, Charles went along with Board members' choice to appoint a less qualified white applicant with an error-riddled application over a black candidate with two master's degrees and extensive experience. The district court thus properly discounted Charles and Germain's election, just as the Goosby Court discounted the election of a slated black candidate not preferred by the black community who then failed to respond to the community's needs.

Charles-Pierre was selected after Board members recognized that they needed to follow the state-imposed monitor's instructions of having at least one public-school parent on the Board. After her election, Grossman constantly reminded Charles-Pierre that she could be removed at the Orthodox community's will, and he believed she had "zero control or influence." Supp. App'x at 169. Because this evidence indicates that Charles-Pierre was selected to assuage the state monitor, it was appropriate to discount her election as well. See Zimmer, 485 F.2d at 1307 (explaining that minority success attributable to politicians who support minority candidates because it is "politically expedient" would not undermine a vote-dilution finding).

The latest successful minority candidate, Leveille, was elected in 2019. The district court found that her election was "engineered," NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 406, a finding supported by the record. In 2018, counsel for the District suggested that "it would be good for th[is] case to have a minority to run against [Charles-Pierre] that the community could support." Supp. App'x at 128.[15] Originally, Leveille and another minority candidate, Pastor Cintron, were running unopposed for different seats. When Yehuda Weissmandl decided to run again for the seat Cintron was running for, Cintron switched to run against Leveille. The Organization purported to support Cintron. Cintron told Leveille that the rabbis promised him the election if he ran against Leveille, and both he and Leveille believed he would win. But because voter turnout was unusually low at polling places in white areas, Leveille won. These facts more than adequately support the district court's finding that the victory was engineered.

[33] The District does not challenge these facts in arguing that the district court erred. Instead, it argues that the district court misapplied the safe-candidate doctrine, which it says "allows courts to discount suspicious elections of a minority candidate after a Section 2 case has been 243 filed." Appellant's Br. at 42. But this assertion has no basis in the case law. Zimmer, the precedent upon which Congress and the Supreme Court relied for the safe-candidate doctrine, contains no such requirement. Zimmer states that minority success may be discounted when it is meant to "thwart successful challenges to electoral schemes on dilution grounds" without any requirement that such efforts postdate litigation. See Zimmer, 485 F.2d at 1307.

For these reasons, the district court did not err in focusing on minority-preferred candidates' success and in finding that the successful minority candidates were perceived as safe. Thus, Senate Factor 7 weighs in favor of Plaintiffs.

D. Additional Factor 9

The final factor at issue is Additional Factor 9, which asks "whether the policy underlying the ... political subdivision's use of ... [the challenged] practice or procedure is tenuous." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 37, 106 S.Ct. 2752. The district court held that this factor favors Plaintiffs because, although the District reasonably believed that it was required by state law to use at-large voting, "there is evidence that the dominant Board members and the Organization have a desire to adhere to the current system despite its discriminatory effect and went to extraordinary lengths to preserve that system to maintain political power." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 416. The district court relied on facts such as the District's witnesses' disingenuity, the apparent engineering of Leveille's victory, and Board members' failure to give the Board's public-school representatives accurate settlement information. Id. at 416-17. As to the settlement discussions, Grossman affirmatively misled minority Board members such as Charles-Pierre and Leveille. When asked why Board members needed to go to court, Grossman said it was because "Judge [Seibel] wants to talk/yell at us" and that the district court "wants to force us to do what the NAACP wants," when in fact it was to attend a settlement conference. D. Ct. Dkt. No. 553-1 ¶ 9. Leveille was also left off emails and other communications pertaining to settlement proposals. D. Ct. Dkt. No. 551-3 ¶¶ 6-8.

[34] The District does not challenge the district court's credibility findings or reliance on Leveille's election, facts which in any event are substantiated in the record. Nor does the District challenge the factual finding that Board members were affirmatively misled about settlement negotiations. The District's only argument as to Additional Factor 9 is that the district court improperly relied on out-of-court settlement negotiations to reach speculative presumptions about Board members' motivations.

[35] There was nothing improper about the district court's reliance on the Board members' actions in failing to provide minority Board members with accurate settlement information. Evidence pertaining to settlement negotiations may be used when "offered for a purpose other than to prove the validity, invalidity, or amount of a disputed claim." Fed. R. Evid. 408 advisory committee's note to 2006 amendment. Accordingly, evidence of settlement negotiations may be used to demonstrate bad faith. Id. (citing Athey v. Farmer's Ins. Exch., 234 F.3d 357, 362 (8th Cir. 2000)). And bad faith on the District's part is probative of whether the District's reasons for maintaining at-large voting are tenuous. The district court thus appropriately relied on this evidence and correctly concluded that Additional Factor 244 9 favors Plaintiffs.[16]

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the district court is affirmed. As mentioned above, the District's motion for a stay of the district court's injunction is dismissed as moot.

All Citations

984 F.3d 213, 385 Ed. Law Rep. 83, 114 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 679

Footnotes

1 The Clerk of Court is directed to amend the caption to the above.

2 A slate is a list of candidates for nomination or election. We use the term "slating organization" to refer to a group that designates candidates for a slate.

3 These facts are drawn from the district court's decision and order, supplemented as necessary by the record.

4 The summary table was referenced in the district court's decision and order.

5 Barreto did, however, use CVAP data to cross-check his BISG analysis.

6 According to the district court, "leading up to and during trial, Rabbi Oshry went to great lengths to avoid testifying." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 404 n.49. In fact, the district court initially found Oshry in contempt for his failure to appear and testify at trial as instructed. Id. The district court purged the contempt order and vacated the warrant when Oshry finally appeared. Id.

7 Some of our sister circuits have similarly expressed that courts may consider evidence of racial causation in resolving Section 2 claims but that such causation is not required to succeed on Section 2 claims. See Lewis, 99 F.3d at 615 n.12 (explaining that causation is "relevant" to the totality of the circumstances inquiry); Nipper, 39 F.3d at 1524 (explaining that "a violation of Section 2 may be established ... without proof of discriminatory intent" but that an inquiry into causation may be relevant when the record suggests that "disparate electoral results [are] principally caused by a factor other than race" (footnote omitted)). Legal scholars have categorized our Circuit as one of the many that permit, but do not require, consideration of racial causation. See Christopher S. Elmendorf, Kevin M. Quinn & Marisa A. Abrajano, Racially Polarized Voting, 83 U. Chi. L. Rev. 587, 614-15 (2016) (explaining that, in many circuits, racial causation "is only one consideration among many to be weighed, either as part of the Gingles analysis or at the totality-of-the-circumstances stage." (footnotes omitted)).

8 The District argues that we should apply de novo review because the district court did not analyze the Daubert factors. The District mischaracterizes the record. Although it did not explicitly cite Daubert by name, the district court did in fact address the Daubert factors when it rendered an oral decision on the District's pretrial motion to exclude Dr. Barreto's expert testimony. To the extent the District considers this oral decision insufficient to satisfy the district court's gatekeeping role, we disagree. There is no requirement that an inquiry into reliability take any specific form. See Restivo, 846 F.3d at 576 (explaining the Daubert inquiry is a "flexible one" (internal quotation marks omitted)).

9 Although the author of this footnote testified at trial that it was aspirational, the district court did not credit this testimony because it contradicted his published work. This determination was not an abuse of discretion. See Pope, 687 F.3d at 581.

10 The District points to the Imai and Khanna article as evidence that BISG studies in the literature include error rates. But the Imai and Khanna study was meant to validate whether BISG gave accurate predictions, and it was for this end that error rates were generated in that study.

11 At least one other court has found such evidence reliable enough to be admitted in a case involving a Section 2 challenge to an at-large voting system. See United States v. City of Eastpointe, 378 F. Supp. 3d 589, 612-13 (E.D. Mich. 2019). This case, however, was resolved by consent decree before trial, see No. 17-CV-10079, 2019 WL 2647355 (E.D. Mich. June 26, 2019), motion for relief from judgment denied, 2020 WL 127953, at *1 (E.D. Mich. Jan. 10, 2020).

12 Although consideration of slating organizations is the focus of Senate Factor 4, discussed below, the presence of a well-established slating organization can be probative of racial polarization.

13 We note, as the district court explicitly did, that this finding does not suggest "that the white bloc voters harbor conscious racial animus." NAACP, 462 F. Supp. 3d at 400. As we explained previously, a finding of racial animus on the part of individuals or communities is not necessary for a Section 2 violation. Accordingly, to the extent the District argues that its "Jewish residents are not White supremacists," Appellant's Br. at 81, that fact has no bearing on our analysis.

14 We also reject the District's suggestion that purportedly anti-Semitic comments made by Plaintiff Goodwin and public-school candidate Steven White explain why voters rejected public-school candidates. While the state-imposed monitor found it typical of the Board to brand critics as anti-Semitic, we pass no judgment on whether that is what the District is doing in making this argument here. Even assuming arguendo their comments could be interpreted as anti-Semitic, Goodwin ran for a Board seat once and White ran twice. At most, then, these comments contributed to the defeat of minority-preferred candidates in three out of thirty-two contested races analyzed.

15 The fact that the District's counsel purportedly gave this "advice" to the District is deeply troubling. Considering Section 2 case law directs courts to look past such disingenuous ploys, it is bad legal advice. More disturbing, however, is that the advice appears to be directed at aiding the District in flouting the well-established and clear intent of the Voting Rights Act. Such deceptive posturing has no place in the legal profession.

16 To the extent the District argues that its reasons are not tenuous because it has a legitimate basis for at-large elections, that argument is meritless. In Goosby, there was no evidence that at-large voting was implemented for discriminatory purposes, and some legitimate bases for maintaining that system were offered at trial. 180 F.3d at 488, 490. But we nonetheless agreed with the district court that the Town Board sought to "cling" to at-large voting for improper reasons. Id. at 497.

End of Document

New York Official Reports

94 N.Y.2d 1, 720 N.E.2d 850, 698
N.Y.S.2d 574, 1999 N.Y. Slip Op. 08345

Michael Cohen et al., as Members of the New York State Legislature, Respondents,

v.

State of New York, Appellant.

Court of Appeals of New York
145
Argued August 24, 1999;

Decided October 14, 1999

CITE TITLE AS: Cohen v State of New York

SUMMARY

Appeal, on constitutional grounds, from a judgment of the Supreme Court (Richard D. Huttner, J.), entered May 24, 1999 in Kings County, declaring chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 unconstitutional as violative of the separation of powers doctrine and article III, § 6 of the New York State Constitution.

Cohen v State of New York, 180 Misc 2d 643, reversed.

HEADNOTES

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Statute Withholding Legislators' Salaries until State Budget is Passed-- Prospective Alteration of Salaries

(1) Chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, which provides that if the Legislature has not passed a State budget by the first day of any fiscal year, then the salaries of its members shall be withheld and not paid until legislative passage of a State budget has occurred, whereupon the legislators shall receive the pay which had been withheld, is not facially unconstitutional, does not violate article III, § 6 of the State Constitution, and does not breach the governmental separation of powers doctrine. In seeking facial nullification, plaintiffs, legislators who were in office and voted against chapter 635 and others who were not yet in office, bear the burden of demonstrating that in any degree and in every conceivable application, the challenged law suffers 2 wholesale constitutional impairment; however, the Constitution lays no constraint on the authority of one Legislature by enactment of general law to make provision prospectively for allowances to be received by the officers and members of the two houses during a succeeding legislative term, and the withholding-of-salary protocol is general, purely prospective, and does not suffer from the potentiality that legislators' votes might be manipulated by promises of reward or threats of punishment effectuated through changes in salaries or allowances. Moreover, the statutorily authorized temporary withholding of net payments of legislative salaries operates by force of law and off a neutral pivot.

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Statute Withholding Legislators' Salaries until State Budget is Passed-- Fixing of Salaries by Law

(2) By chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, which provides that if the Legislature has not passed a State budget by the first day of any fiscal year, then the salaries of its members shall be withheld and not paid until legislative passage of a State budget has occurred, whereupon the legislators shall receive the pay which had been withheld, the Legislature prospectively "fixed by law" an annual salary for its members (see, NY Const, art III, § 6). The law imposes a discipline within the Legislative branch itself regarding the timing and method of only its own net compensation, and does not interject an all-or-nothing infirmity, because the "contingent" nature of its adopted timing-of-payment formula does not "un-fix" the salary, in constitutional terms. The Legislature holds the constitutional key prospectively to authorize that legislators' salaries be paid in one final lump sum at the end of a legislative session--after the work of that branch has concluded and all its responsibilities discharged. Since it may do that, it surely could do what chapter 635 prescribes, which is a lesser of the greater power. This is particularly so since the release of net checks and realization of payment is accomplished simply by passage of an annual State budget, a principal constitutional duty prescribed for each legislative session. Thus, chapter 635 can in no way be viewed as a facial abridgement of the protections and specifications of article III, § 6 of the State Constitution; on the contrary, it satisfies the constitutional payment mandate, and serves as an incentive to complete constitutional budget obligations in a timely fashion.

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Statute Withholding Legislators' Salaries until State Budget is Passed-- Separation of Powers

(3) Chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, which provides that if the Legislature has not passed a State budget by the first day of any fiscal year, then the salaries of its members shall be withheld and not paid until legislative passage of a State budget has occurred, whereupon the legislators shall receive the pay which had been withheld, does not violate the principle of separation of powers; rather, it adds procedural oil to the delicately calibrated mechanism by which a budget is enacted. The Legislature, as a branch of government, must have "finally acted on" the appropriations submitted by the Governor before individual legislators may be paid, and that inducement does not require that the Legislature pass the Governor's budget; only that it pass some budget. The plaintiffs in this case, legislators who were in office and voted against chapter 635 and others who were not yet in office, sue as individuals, not as the Legislative branch of government; however, it is the correlative oversight of each lawmaking branch over one another--in essence a dependency, rather than a separation--that balances the overall 3 power to protect the public's interests, not those individuals who occupy the offices of those branches at varying times. Although chapter 635 pinpoints a particular interdependence of the Legislature and Executive with respect to the budget-making process, it does not impermissibly merge or shift the powers between those two branches. In the end, the Legislature always does the legislating. It is institutional interdependence, rather than functional independence that best summarizes the idea of protecting liberty by fragmenting power.

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Statute Withholding Legislators' Salaries until State Budget is Passed-- Separation of Powers

(4) Chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, which provides that if the Legislature has not passed a State budget by the first day of any fiscal year, then the salaries of its members shall be withheld and not paid until legislative passage of a State budget has occurred, whereupon the legislators shall receive the pay which had been withheld, does not violate the principle of separation of powers, and even assuming that the law does recalibrate some of the negotiating leverage between the Legislative and Executive branches of government, that shift has occurred as a direct result of the Legislature's own bicameral action. Its official work was done qua branch of the government, and the Legislature has decided to restrict itself and discipline its own work and power in this fashion; that is not a cognizable separation of powers problem. Without a State budget or without messages of necessity and interim authorizations or continuing concurrent resolutions, no State expenditures could be made to anyone, including legislators. Thus, after a fiscal year concludes, and until a new budget is passed for the following year, the payment of compensation to legislators is inescapably contingent and dependent upon the extant Executive's discretionary powers. Chapter 635 does not create or result in "extortionate economic pressure," since there is no substantially different economic duress created by chapter 635 than that which is inherent in the ordinary lawmaking process, budget-related and otherwise. When the plaintiffs, legislators who were in office and voted against chapter 635 and others who were not yet in office, object to "economic pressure," they are essentially attacking the fundamental, albeit rambunctious, realities of the political structure and process, including how public monies shall be allocated; however, no basis within the judicial review function supports the extraordinary superintendence and judicial nullification of chapter 635 that plaintiffs facially seek.

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Statute Withholding Legislators' Salaries until State Budget is Passed-- Role of State Comptroller

(5) Chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, which provides that if the Legislature has not passed a State budget by the first day of any fiscal year, then the salaries of its members shall be withheld and not paid until legislative passage of a State budget has occurred, whereupon the legislators shall receive the pay which had been withheld, does not inject an unconstitutional delegation of power to the State Comptroller, who is authorized to determine if the budget is "sufficient for the ongoing operation and support of state government and local assistance," since the Comptroller's defined involvement fits within and fulfills his independent fiscal role as a vital part of the constitutional machinery for assuring accountability in the expenditure of State funds. By chapter 635, the Legislature has plainly confirmed the Comptroller's customary responsibility for ensuring the availability of 4 revenues that would be expended through the enacted appropriations bills, and this reinforcement in no way authorizes the Comptroller to "determine" when legislators shall be paid. Rather, that determination remains exclusively within the control, timing and power of the bicameral Legislature itself, acting as a branch of government when it enacts a timely budget, as is its constitutional duty.

TOTAL CLIENT SERVICE LIBRARY REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Constitutional Law, §§ 109, 112, 113, 123, 246, 250, 258-260, 264-266, 270, 275, 288, 289, 293; States, Territories, and Dependencies, §§ 62, 64.

McKinney's, NY Const, art III, § 6.

NY Jur 2d, Constitutional Law, §§ 42, 43, 151, 155, 160, 162-164, 175, 176, 186; State of New York, §§ 19, 21, 22, 131.

ANNOTATION REFERENCES

See ALR Index under Legislature; Separation of Powers; States.

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Eliot Spitzer, Attorney General, Albany (Preeta D. Bansal, Peter H. Schiff, Victor Paladino and Julie M. Sheridan of counsel), for appellant.

I. Chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 complies with article III, § 6 of the State Constitution. (Dunlea v Anderson, 66 NY2d 265; New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut, 40 NY2d 250; Finn v City of New York, 282 NY 153; Civil Serv. Empls. Assn. v Regan, 71 NY2d 653; United Cerebral Palsy Assns. v Cuomo, 966 F2d 743, 506 US 999; McGowan v Burstein, 71 NY2d 729; Caplin & Drysdale v United States, 491 US 617; Matter of Altamore v Barrios-Paoli, 90 NY2d 378; Matter of Roske v Keyes, 46 AD2d 366; National Assn. of Ind. Insurers v State of New York, 89 NY2d 950.) II. Chapter 635 is consistent with the doctrine of separation of powers and does not interfere with the Legislature's deliberative process. (Bourquin v Cuomo, 85 NY2d 781; Matter of Nicholas v Kahn, 47 NY2d 24; Rapp v Carey, 44 NY2d 157; People ex rel. Burby v Howland, 155 NY 270; Matter of New York State Inspection, Sec. & Law Enforcement Empls. v Cuomo, 64 NY2d 233; Loving v United States, 517 US 748; Boreali v Axelrod, 71 NY2d 1; Matter of County of Oneida v Berle, 49 NY2d 515; Saxton v Carey, 44 NY2d 545; Matter of Broidrick v Lindsay, 39 NY2d 641.) III. Chapter 635 does not interfere 5 with respondents' First Amendment rights. (Clarke v United States, 886 F2d 404, 915 F2d 699; Bond v Floyd, 385 US 116; Miller v Town of Hull, 878 F2d 523, 493 US 976.) IV. Chapter 635 does not impair any contractual right to be paid in violation of article I, § 10 of the United States Constitution. (Association of Surrogates & Supreme Ct. Reporters within City of N. Y. v State of New York, 940 F2d 766, 502 US 1058; Association of Surrogates & Supreme Ct. Reporters within City of N. Y. v State of New York, 79 NY2d 39; Dodge v Board of Educ., 302 US 74; Cook v City of Binghamton, 48 NY2d 323; Matter of Handy v County of Schoharie, 244 AD2d 842; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v State of New York, 11 NY2d 504; People ex rel. City of New York v Nixon, 229 NY 356; Levy Leasing Co. v Siegel, 258 US 242; Kinney v Connecticut Judicial Dept., 974 F2d 313; Condell v Bress, 983 F2d 415, 507 US 1032.) V. The Comptroller's limited role under chapter 635 does not violate the State Constitution or the separation of powers of doctrine. (Matter of McCall v Barrios-Paoli, 93 NY2d 99; Blue Cross & Blue Shield v McCall, 89 NY2d 160; Matter of Crosson v Regan, 192 AD2d 109; Matter of New York Cent. R. R. Co. v Tremaine, 243 App Div 181; City of New York v State of New York, 40 NY2d 659; People ex rel. Grannis v Roberts, 163 NY 70; County of Rensselaer v Regan, 151 Misc 2d 552, 173 AD2d 37, 80 NY2d 988; Wein v State of New York, 39 NY2d 136; Wein v Carey, 41 NY2d 498; Matter of Altamore v Barrios-Paoli, 90 NY2d 378.) VI. Respondents are not denied property without due process. (Alliance of Am. Insurers v Chu, 77 NY2d 573; Board of Regents of State Colls. v Roth, 408 US 564.)

Kaye, Scholer, Fierman, Hays & Handler, L. L. P., New York City (James D. Herschlein and Phillip A. Geraci of counsel), and Wolfson & Carroll (John W. Carroll of counsel), for respondents.

I. Chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 violates article III, § 6 of the State Constitution. (New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut, 40 NY2d 250.) II. Chapter 635 violates the separation of powers doctrine. (Matter of County of Oneida v Berle, 49 NY2d 515; Matter of King v Cuomo, 81 NY2d 247.) III. Chapter 635 unconstitutionally delegates authority to the Comptroller. (County of Rensselaer v Regan, 151 Misc 2d 552, 173 AD2d 37, 80 NY2d 988; Matter of Big Apple Food Vendors' Assn. v Street Vendor Review Panel, 90 NY2d 402; Matter of Levine v Whalen, 39 NY2d 510; Matter of Chemical Specialties Mfrs. Assn. v Jorling, 85 NY2d 382.) IV. Chapter 635 punishes the legislators for expression protected by the First Amendment. (Bond v Floyd, 385 US 116; Clarke v United 6 States, 886 F2d 404, 915 F2d 699.) V. Chapter 635 violates the legislators' rights against impairment of contracts under article I, § 10 of the United States Constitution. (Association of Surrogates & Supreme Ct. Reporters within City of N. Y. v State of New York, 79 NY2d 39; United States Trust Co. v New Jersey, 431 US 1; Fisk v Jefferson Police Jury, 116 US 131; People ex rel. City of New York v Nixon, 229 NY 356; Haley v Pataki, 883 F Supp 816; Association of Surrogates & Supreme Ct. Reporters within City of N. Y. v State of New York, 940 F2d 766, 502 US 1058.) VI. Chapter 635 deprives the legislators of their property in violation of the Due Process Clauses of the Federal and State Constitutions. (Board of Regents of State Colls. v Roth, 408 US 564; Sniadach v Family Fin. Corp., 395 US 337; Toney v Burris, 829 F2d 622; Lynch v United States, 292 US 571.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Bellacosa, J.

(1) This appeal by the State comes directly to this Court (CPLR 5601 [b] [2]) from a Supreme Court judgment of unconstitutionality of chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998. The Act is challenged solely on a facial basis. We reverse and declare the statute constitutional. It does not violate article III, § 6 of the State Constitution, nor does it breach the governmental separation of powers doctrine. Also, it does not impinge on other constitutional protections asserted by plaintiffs.

I.

On December 18, 1998, the Legislature passed and the Governor approved chapter 635. It states in pertinent part:

"1. ... if legislative passage of the budget as defined in subdivision three of this section has not occurred prior to the first day of any fiscal year, the net amount of any such bi-weekly salary installment payments to be paid on or after such day shall be withheld and not paid until such legislative passage of the budget has occurred ....

"3. 'Legislative passage of the budget', solely for the purposes of this section ... shall mean that the appropriation bill or bills submitted by the governor ... have been finally acted on by both houses of the legislature in accordance with article seven of the state constitution and the state comptroller has 7 determined that such appropriation bill or bills that have been finally acted on by the legislature are sufficient for the ongoing operation and support of state government and local assistance for the ensuing fiscal year" (L 1998, ch 635, §§ 1, 2, amending Legislative Law § 5 [emphasis added]).

Plaintiffs include individuals who were in office and voted against passage of chapter 635, and others who were not yet in office at the time of its passage. These 14 individuals started a hybrid CPLR article 78/declaratory judgment lawsuit in April 1999 seeking: (1) a declaration of unconstitutionality of chapter 635; (2) a declaration of the unconstitutional nature of certain of the Governor's actions; and (3) a permanent injunction against the withholding of legislative salaries. During the course of the litigation in the nisi prius court, plaintiffs limited their case to a pure declaratory judgment action, with requested relief directed solely at the constitutionality of the statute. The submissions of the respective parties were treated accordingly as cross motions for summary judgment.

Supreme Court held that chapter 635 violated the separation of powers doctrine and article III, § 6 of the New York State Constitution, but did not identify any particular constitutional provision as the flaw in its separation of powers conclusion.

The State defendants answer with six appellate arguments. They demonstrate cogently that: (1) chapter 635 complies with article III, § 6 of the New York State Constitution; (2) it conforms to separation of powers principles; (3) the specified role given to the Comptroller does not constitute an unconstitutional delegation of responsibility; (4) the statute does not interfere with plaintiffs' First Amendment rights; (5) it does not impair their Federal Contracts Clause rights; and (6) it does not violate plaintiffs' due process rights.

At this appeal stage of the controversy, we take judicial notice that the 1999-2000 budget negotiations concluded in early August 1999 with Legislative concordance and Gubernatorial acquiescence; Comptroller certification that the appropriations bills were sufficient to cover the State's approved expenditures followed, within hours after enactment.

II.

This Court's well-established review power with respect to matters of this kind marks the boundaries of the analysis required to decide this appeal. Because the plaintiffs seek facial 8 invalidation of chapter 635, they must initially overcome the presumption of constitutionality accorded to all enactments of a co-equal Branch of government (see, Dunlea v Anderson, 66 NY2d 265, 267-268; see generally, City of New York v State of New York, 76 NY2d 479; Hotel Dorset Co. v Trust for Cultural Resources, 46 NY2d 358; see also, National Assn. of Ind. Insurers v State of New York, 89 NY2d 950, 952 [quoting Alliance of Am. Insurers v Chu, 77 NY2d 573, 585]). In seeking facial nullification, plaintiffs bear the burden to demonstrate that "in any degree and in every conceivable application," the law suffers wholesale constitutional impairment (McGowan v Burstein, 71 NY2d 729, 733).

Statutes are quintessentially the product of the democratic lawmaking process. These threshold hurdles are, therefore, erected in the public interest to provide a prudent set of procedural safeguards for enactors and defenders of statutes. They are set in place doctrinally and precedentially because of a fundamental premise that "[b]alancing the myriad requirements imposed by both the State and the Federal Constitution is a function entrusted to the Legislature ..., the elective representatives of the people" (Matter of Wolpoff v Cuomo, 80 NY2d 70, 79).

This Court's application of these principles, within standard constitutional review perspectives, convinces us that Supreme Court's decision fails to adhere to these rigorous considerations.

III.

Our analysis examines first a threshold component affecting this case-- article III, § 6 of the State Constitution. It provides in pertinent part:

"Each member of the legislature shall receive for his services a like annual salary, to be fixed by law ... Neither the salary of any member nor any other allowance so fixed may be increased or diminished during, and with respect to, the term for which he shall have been elected, nor shall he be paid or receive any other extra compensation."

This Court has examined the constitutionality of earlier legislative salary arrangements in relation to this fixed star. In New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut (40 NY2d 250), the Court invalidated the system of awarding allowances to legislators for varied services in a particular fiscal year, as part of the budget process in that same year. This Court recognized that: 9

"the prohibition against increases and decreases in legislators' compensation and emoluments during their terms of office would serve two salutary purposes-- (1) to avoid a conflict of interest by removing from legislators the authority to vote themselves financial benefits at the expense of the public treasury, and (2) to forestall the possibility of manipulation of legislators' votes by promises of reward or threats of punishment effectuated through changes in salaries or allowances" (New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut, supra, at 258 [emphasis added]).

Significantly, the Court held that "the Constitution lays no constraint on the authority of one Legislature by enactment of general law to make provision prospectively for allowances to be received by the officers and members of the two houses during a succeeding legislative term or terms" (New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut, supra, at 261 [emphasis added]).

Later, in Dunlea v Anderson (66 NY2d 265, supra), this Court upheld the salary increase for legislators in the 1985-1986 fiscal year, authorized by the Laws of 1984. The Court reaffirmed that article III, § 6 "does not prohibit one Legislature ... from increasing the salaries of the next term's members. Neither its language nor the intention of its drafters compel a contrary interpretation" (Dunlea v Anderson, supra, at 268). Indeed, the Court noted that when the current article III, § 6 was approved, the Constitution was specifically amended to provide the flexibility of allowing a salary to be fixed by legislators themselves:

"The purpose of empowering the Legislature to determine its own compensation ... was to avoid 'repeat[ing] the error of inflexibility' that had resulted from 'fixing the compensation of legislators and legislative leaders in the Constitution, and thus fail[ing] to provide for changing conditions and circumstances' " (Dunlea v Anderson, supra, at 268; see also, Finn v City of New York, 282 NY 153, 157).

Dunlea built on Steingut's holding that constitutional constraints do not generally prohibit prospective adjustments. It then distinguished Steingut by emphasizing that the judicially stricken allowances in the latter case were effective 10 during the same fiscal year in which they were appropriated. The Court also observed that the selective awards could be directly tied to votes on particular bills and were within the unilateral control of one legislative house leader, not the Legislature itself as a bicameral Branch of the government (see, Dunlea v Anderson, supra, at 268; see also,

New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut, supra, at 260).

We likewise adhere to Steingut's definitive holding and guidance, while acknowledging its key distinguishing features. Demonstrably, the "manipulation" potentiality cautioned against in Steingut is not present at all in this case. Here, the withholding-of-salary protocol is general and purely prospective (see, New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut, supra, at 258). Moreover, the statutorily authorized temporary withholding of net payments of legislative salaries operates by force of law and off a neutral pivot. The statutory consequence does not occur by selective whim, or as a constitutionally questionable quid pro quo within the enactment year.

(2) By chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, the Legislature prospectively "fixed by law" an annual salary for its members (NY Const, art III, § 6). The law imposes a discipline within the Legislative Branch itself regarding the timing and method of only its own net compensation (see, Finn v City of New York, supra, at 157). This mechanism does not interject an all-or-nothing infirmity because the "contingent" nature of its adopted timing-of-payment formula does not "un-fix" the salary, in constitutional terms.

Until 1948, legislative salaries were primarily "fixed" on a constitutionally permissible per diem basis, conditioned upon service; payment was made from time to time during the legislative session and the balance paid on final adjournment (see, Dunlea v Anderson, supra, at 268; see also, "The Compensation of Public Officials: Judges and Legislators", Report of Temporary State Commn to Review the Compensation Received by Members of the Legislature and Judiciary [1972]).

The Legislature, even now, holds the constitutional key prospectively to authorize that legislators' salaries be paid in one final lump sum at the end of a legislative session--after the work of that Branch has concluded and all its responsibilities discharged. Since it may do that, it surely could do what chapter 635 prescribes which is a lesser of the greater power. This is particularly so since the release of net checks and realization of payment is accomplished simply by passage of an 11 annual State budget, a principal constitutional duty prescribed for each legislative session (NY Const, art VII, § 4).

Thus, chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 can in no way be viewed as a facial abridgement of the protections and specifications of article III, § 6 of the State Constitution. On the contrary, it satisfies the constitutional payment mandate, as delineated by this Court's controlling precedents and guideposts, and serves as an incentive to complete constitutional budget obligations in a timely fashion.

IV.

The separation of powers question asserted by plaintiffs and adopted by the Supreme Court must next be considered. The trial court reached its conclusion that chapter 635 breached this principle with daunting words and images:

"The law impermissibly tips the fragile balance of powers that is the keystone of our system of government by threatening to impose on the Legislature a budget that is not the product of thoughtful deliberation and debate. To place any legislator or anyone in any branch of government under undue economic pressure in exercising his or her judgment, while expecting that person to act in accordance with his or her oath of office is illogical, unsound, and unconstitutional" (180 Misc 2d 643, 647-648).

These flourishes are no substitute for an analytically justified basis to invalidate chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998.

The doctrine has deep, seminal roots in the constitutional distribution of powers among the three coordinate branches of government (see, NY Const, art III, § 1; art IV, § 1; art VI, § 1; Clark v Cuomo, 66 NY2d 185, 189). Article III, § 1, plainly declares: "The legislative power of this state shall be vested in the senate and assembly," which traditionally requires "that the Legislature make the critical policy decisions" (Bourquin v Cuomo, 85 NY2d 781, 784; see, Breitel, The Lawmakers, in 2 Benjamin N. Cardozo Memorial Lectures, at 776).

The courts are vested with a unique role and review power over the constitutionality of legislation (see, Marbury v Madison, 1 Cranch [5 US] 137 [1803]) which includes being the final arbiter of true separation of powers disputes (compare, Matter of King v Cuomo, 81 NY2d 247; Matter of Wolpoff v Cuomo, supra; Clark v Cuomo, supra; Bourquin v Cuomo, supra). But, 12 as our precedents demonstrate, the courts have their limitations, too, either doctrinally imposed or self-imposed. The restraints have evolved for prudential reasons, from an appreciation of the prescribed and proportioned role of the Judiciary, and out of an acknowledged interdependency in the fulfillment of plenary governmental responsibility.

Here, the process affected by chapter 635 is " '[l]egislative passage of the [annual] budget' " in a timely fashion (L 1998, ch 635, § 2, adding Legislative Law § 5 [3]), a paramount State interest and goal (NY Const, art VII, § 4). The give-and-take compromises between the two essential lawmaking bodies over public revenues and their expenditures, by virtue of respective constitutional mandates to them, inextricably intertwines the Legislative and Executive Branches in a system of checks and balances. The objective of this specific constitutional investiture of power in those two Branches clearly contemplates a dynamic process and, ultimately, a joint venture designed to serve the common good.

The Governor proposes a budget, recommending appropriations (NY Const, art VII, § 3), and the Legislature may strike out or reduce items, as well as propose its own additions (NY Const, art VII, § 4). The Governor's proposals, if enacted by the Legislature (both Houses acting in harmony), shall become law without further Executive action; appropriations for the Legislature and Judiciary and any proposed additional appropriations, however, are subject to the Governor's further action (NY Const, art VII, § 4).

(3) Chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 adds procedural oil to this delicately calibrated mechanism. The Legislature, as a Branch of government, must have "finally acted on" the appropriations submitted by the Governor before individual legislators may be paid. The inducement does not require that the Legislature pass the Governor's budget; only that it pass a budget (see, Senate Debate Transcripts, at 6622-6629, 6625-6626, Bill Jacket, L 1998, ch 635).

We further examine and now apply these principles to this lawsuit. The plaintiffs sue in this case as individuals, not as the Legislative Branch of government. They object to chapter 635 because, they say, it "permits the Governor to maximize his constitutional powers at the expense of the Legislature's." They hypothesize a situation where the Governor could submit a budget as late as possible and thus minimize debate and deliberation on the Executive proposals, in view of the 13 potentiality that legislators' paychecks might be withheld should the debate continue, as occurred this year, without timely resolution by a legislative budget enactment. The plaintiffs complain that such a strategic initiative or thrust might hurry or dictate acquiescence by some legislators, and thus might constitute a violation of the separation of powers principle. They view this potentiality as a legally cognizable and constitutionally impermissible transfer of power from the Legislature to the Executive. We disagree and conclude that their arguments fail for various reasons.

First, all the legislators and the Legislature itself are entitled to the presumption that they act only in accordance with and fulfillment of their oaths of office. We fully accord them that presumption and respect. Next, one of the plain purposes of the separation of powers theory is to guard against one Branch seeking to maximize power (see, Breitel, The Lawmakers, in 2 Benjamin N. Cardozo Memorial Lectures, at 798). It is the correlative oversight of each lawmaking Branch over one another--in essence a dependency, rather than a separation--that balances the overall power to protect the public's interests, not those individuals who occupy the offices of those Branches at varying times (see, e.g., Matter of King v Cuomo, 81 NY2d 247, 254, supra; see generally, The Federalist, Nos. 47, 48 [Madison]).

Although chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 pinpoints a particular interdependence of the Legislature and Executive with respect to the budget-making process, it does not impermissibly merge or shift the powers between those two Branches. The leverage of negotiating positions is not the theoretical or functional equivalent of lawfully allocated governmental authority. In the end, the Legislature always does the legislating (see, Breitel, The Lawmakers, in 2 Benjamin N. Cardozo Memorial Lectures, at 779). This enduring role is highlighted by the fact that, despite the purported "sledgehammer" of chapter 635 (see, Senate Debate Transcripts, at 6622-6629, 6626, Bill Jacket, op. cit.), the 1999-2000 budget negotiations were concluded only after the second longest budget delay in the State's history.

The balance wheels of the system are delicate, since the ultimate goal is to avoid the "whole power of one department [being] exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another" (The Federalist, No. 47 [Madison] [emphasis in original]; see also, Plaut v Spendthrift Farm, 514 US 211). Yet, "it is institutional interdependence rather than functional 14 independence that best summarizes the American idea of protecting liberty by fragmenting power" (Tribe, American Constitutional Law, at 20 [2d ed] [emphasis in original]; see also, 4 Lincoln, The Constitutional History of New York, at 494, 497). The genius of the system is synergy and not "separation," in the common connotation of that latter word.

(4) Furthermore, assuming that the law does recalibrate some of the negotiating leverage, that shift has occurred as a direct result of the Legislature's own bicameral action. Its official work was done qua Branch of the government, and the approved Act enjoys the ordinarily presumed validity of law, especially against a facial attack. The Legislature has decided to restrict itself and discipline its own work and power in this fashion. That is not a cognizable separation of powers problem in these circumstances, contrary to the novel restriction that the dissent would place on the Legislative Branch prospectively regulating its own affairs and proceedings. Rather, we view the adopted control mechanism as a credit to the Legislative Branch's internal management practices, not a mark of some ultra vires surrender of power to any other Branch. Moreover, it should not be overlooked that, by this statutory change, both Houses came together with an identical bill in an effort and as an incentive to fulfill in a timely fashion their prescribed budget-related duties to the People of the State.

Another aspect of the motive behind the legislation is noteworthy. The self-imposed prod to attain the paramount State interest in achieving a timely budget is highly significant because achievement of that goal would guarantee salaries of all public employees being paid on time. Other entities, such as school districts, would also receive their State funds on time, thus avoiding the heavy interim borrowing burdens that are otherwise incurred. The argument of those who attack the statute does not come to grips with the unassailable fact that without a State budget or without messages of necessity and interim authorizations or continuing concurrent resolutions, no State expenditures could be made to anyone, including legislators. Thus, after a fiscal year concludes, and until a new budget is passed for the following year, the payment of compensation to legislators is inescapably contingent and dependent upon the extant Executive's discretionary powers (see, NY Const, art VII, § 5).

We have elsewhere declared that it is unwise for the courts "to substitute our own determination for that of the Legislature even if we would have struck a slightly different balance on 15 our own," for it "is not the role of this, or indeed any, court to second-guess the determinations of the Legislature, the elective representatives of the people, in this regard" (Matter of Wolpoff v Cuomo, 80 NY2d 70, 79, supra). That wisdom remains a compelling injunction for this Court to honor and be guided by in this instance. There should be no misunderstanding, however, that when and where the Constitution requires the courts to act within prescribed authority, we do not hesitate to decide even the most sensitive governmental disputes (see, e.g., New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut, supra; Matter of King v Cuomo, supra).

Just as the plaintiffs theorize about scenarios where the Governor may "force" legislators into budgetary submission, competing hypotheses may be composed. For example, the Legislature could simply have stricken some of the Governor's proposed appropriations and offered no additions of its own. The State would then have had an instant budget over which the Governor would have had no subsequent, separate, constitutionally assigned role. The mere potentiality of this--and other--alternative hypotheses defeats the plaintiffs' facial challenge, and answers the dissent's conclusory assertion in this regard. We note that plaintiffs have adverted emphatically to Matter of King v Cuomo (supra), as a justification for the courts to intervene in this dispute. They miss a critical distinction, however, in the analysis and application of that case. The instant case is about whether the challenged statute is intrinsically a constitutional affront to the separation of powers doctrine. Matter of King v Cuomo, on the other hand, was a dispute about the very process itself of how enactments become law. There, the explicitly prescribed method of making law was at issue and at stake, and this Court found a fundamental deviation from the constitutional prescriptions. That decision is not at all apt here.

Finally, contrary to the assertion of those who would invalidate chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, the Act does not create or result in "extortionate economic pressure." We discern no substantially different economic duress created by chapter 635 than that which is inherent in the ordinary lawmaking process, budget-related and otherwise. Indeed, "the legislative process is deliberately exposed to the buffeting and the pressures of outside interests. This lends a responsiveness to the needs of the community as expressed by those interested" (Breitel, The Lawmakers, in 2 Benjamin N. Cardozo Memorial Lectures, at 777 [emphasis added]). A fortiori, the adoption of 16 a regimen and incentive predicated upon one Branch's own resonance to a more efficacious discharge of its allocated and collective constitutional duties should not be disturbed by this Court.

Neither external nor internal pressures carry an inherent constitutional virus. We are satisfied that this rhetorical argument cannot justify this Court's substitution of its preferences for how the Legislature should handle efforts that seek to affect its work (see, Matter of Wolpoff v Cuomo, supra, at 79). When the plaintiffs object to "economic pressure," they are essentially attacking the fundamental, albeit rambunctious, realities of the political structure and process, including how public monies shall be allocated.

In the end, this issue and aspect of the lawsuit boil down to a debate about the constitutional calibration and allocation of lawmaking powers that underpin the prevailing system of governance in this State. No basis within the judicial review function supports the extraordinary superintendence and judicial nullification of chapter 635 that plaintiffs facially seek. This is not a case where a losing faction of legislators can secure from the courts the very result they failed to achieve in their one House of the Legislature, through legitimate debate and political persuasion (see generally, The Federalist No. 10 [Madison]).

V.

(5) The plaintiffs further complain that chapter 635's provision for the Comptroller to determine whether the budget is "sufficient for the ongoing operation and support of state government and local assistance" injects an unconstitutional delegation or power into the lawmaking process. We view this aspect of the case with the requisite "commonsense perspective" (Bourquin v Cuomo, supra, at 785; see also, National Assn. of Ind. Insurers v State of New York, supra, 89 NY2d, at 952 [quoting Alliance of Am. Insurers v Chu, 77 NY2d 573, 585]). That approach supports the conclusion that the Comptroller's defined involvement fits within and fulfills his independent fiscal role as "a vital part of the constitutional machinery for assuring accountability in the expenditure of [State] funds" (Matter of McCall v Barrios-Paoli, 93 NY2d 99, 104).

Indeed, the State Constitution requires that the Comptroller "audit all vouchers before payment and all official accounts" (art V, § 1). "The payment of any money of the state, or of any money under its control ... except upon audit by the 17 comptroller, shall be void" (id.), and the Legislature may assign duties "incidental to the performance of these functions" (id.). Thus, the Comptroller is required to "[s]uperintend the fiscal concerns of the state" (State Finance Law § 8 [1]) and "[k]eep, audit and state all accounts in which the state is interested" (State Finance Law § 8 [2]). By chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998, the Legislature has plainly confirmed the Comptroller's customary responsibility for ensuring the availability of revenues that would be expended through the enacted appropriations bills. This reinforcement in no way authorizes the Comptroller to "determine" when legislators shall be paid. That determination remains exclusively within the control, timing and power of the bicameral Legislature itself, acting as a Branch of Government when it enacts a timely budget, as is its constitutional duty.

Realistically, the Comptroller's virtually immediate certification following the legislatively enacted budget in August refutes, in any event, plaintiffs' theoretical and facially invoked constitutional concerns. His actions demonstrate the non-substantive nature--in the lawmaking sense--of the formal pre-audit imprimatur by that independent State officer.

VI.

Additional arguments from all sides have been considered, and we find them to be without constitutional import in this case. The manner of enactment and the content and effect of chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 neither violate nor implicate plaintiffs' First Amendment, Contracts Clause, or due process rights.

Accordingly, the judgment of Supreme Court should be reversed, without costs, and chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 should be declared constitutional.

Smith, J.

(Dissenting). Because I believe that chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 violates the State constitutional guarantee that "[e]ach member of the legislature shall receive for his services a like annual salary, to be fixed by law" (NY Const, art III, § 6), I dissent and vote to affirm the order of the Supreme Court (180 Misc 2d 643).

On December 1, 1998, the New York State Assembly passed legislation (Assembly Bill A 11464) to amend 18 Legislative Law § 5 to raise the salaries of the members of the Legislature.[1] The bill raised the annual legislative salary by 38%, from $57,500 to $79,500. It passed the State Senate the following day. Although passed by the Legislature and delivered to the Governor, the Governor withheld signature of the bill until the Legislature also passed and delivered to him Senate Bill S 7880. This latter bill provided that if the State's budget was not enacted and approved by the State Comptroller by the start of each fiscal year (April 1), the net salaries of the Legislature would be withheld by the Comptroller until a budget was enacted.

On December 18, 1998, the Legislature passed Senate Bill S 7880, and, on that same day, the Governor signed both bills into law (L 1998, ch 630; L 1998, ch 635 [hereinafter collectively referred to as "Chapter 635"]). The 38% legislative salary increase went into effect on January 1, 1999, the first day of the succeeding legislative term.

Prior to the enactment of Chapter 635, Legislative Law § 5 (1) made Legislators' salaries unconditionally payable in 26 bi-weekly installments. Chapter 635 amended Legislative Law § 5 (1) to currently provide that Legislators' salaries:

"shall be payable in twenty-six bi-weekly installments provided, however, that if legislative passage of the budget as defined in [Legislative Law § 5 (3)] has not occurred prior to the first day of any fiscal year, the net amount of any such bi-weekly salary installment payments to be paid on or after such day shall be withheld and not paid until such legislative passage of the budget has occurred whereupon bi-weekly salary installment payments shall resume and an amount equal to the accrued, withheld and unpaid installments shall be promptly paid to each member" (L 1998, ch 635, § 1).

Chapter 635 similarly provides for the withholding of legislative allowances (L 1998, ch 635, § 3).

To avoid dispute in the event that Chapter 635's withholding provision is triggered, Chapter 635 (2) defines "legislative passage of the budget" as the point in time when the appropriation bill(s) submitted by the Governor:

"have been finally acted on by both houses of the 19 legislature in accordance with article seven of the state constitution and the state comptroller has determined that such appropriation bill or bills that have been finally acted on by the legislature are sufficient for the ongoing operation and support of state government and local assistance for the ensuing fiscal year. In addition, legislation submitted by the governor pursuant to section three of article seven of the state constitution determined necessary by the legislature for the effective implementation of such appropriation bill or bills shall have been acted on" (L 1998, ch 635, § 2, adding Legislative Law § 5 [3]).

In January 1999, the Governor, as required by article VII of the Constitution, presented for legislative approval his proposed budget for fiscal year 1999-2000. Because the Legislature was unable to reach a consensus on the Governor's budget bill by April 1, 1999, the withholding provision of Chapter 635 was triggered and the Legislature's pay withheld.[2]

On April 19, 1999, a group of 14 Legislators, 11 of whom had voted against the passage of Chapter 635 and three of whom were newly elected members, commenced this CPLR article 78 proceeding in Supreme Court, Kings County, naming as respondents the Governor, the State Comptroller and the State. In their petition, the Legislators set forth six causes of action challenging the constitutionality of Chapter 635 under the State and Federal Constitutions. The Legislators also moved for preliminary and permanent injunctive relief, as well as final judgment on the merits. In support, each submitted affidavits setting forth the personal financial hardships that they and their families had and would suffer from the State's continued withholding of their annual pay.

On May 21, 1999, Supreme Court agreed with the Legislators and declared Chapter 635 to be unconstitutional. The court concluded that Chapter 635' s intentional infliction of personal financial hardship upon some Legislators encroached upon the institutional independence of the Legislature as a whole. Because of Chapter 635's potential effect on the balance of governmental power, Supreme Court concluded that it violates the doctrine of separation of powers and the State constitutional 20 guarantee that Legislators' salaries remain fixed (NY Const, art III, § 6; see, 180 Misc 2d 643, 647). The State respondents then brought the instant appeal directly to this Court (see, CPLR 5601 [b] [2]).

The 1777 Constitution, the State's first, made no provision for the salary of Legislators. Since the Constitution of 1821, however, the Constitution has provided for legislative compensation. The 1821 Constitution provided that Legislators should receive compensation, to be paid out of the public treasury, but with no increase to take effect during the year in which the compensation was made and with no increase beyond the sum of $3 per day.

The 1777 Constitution also required that Legislators meet property qualifications. An 1845 amendment eliminated all property qualifications for holding public office.

The Constitution of 1846 provided that Legislators receive a sum not exceeding $3 per day for their services and an aggregate compensation not exceeding $300, except in cases of impeachment. Until 1947, legislative salaries were set by the People in the Constitution. Following 1947, the Legislature itself, with the approval of the Governor, set its own salary.

Throughout New York State's history, there has been a struggle over legislative compensation. Some have felt that members of the Legislature should serve with minimum or no compensation. Those favoring this view have felt that Legislators should have some other means of supporting themselves. Other persons have felt that without adequate compensation, those without independent resources could not stand for election or become members of the Legislature, thus excluding a great number of people from public service.[3]

In 1946, the Final Report of the New York State Joint Legislative Committee on Legislative Methods, Practices, Procedures and Expenditures recommended that the salaries of the Legislators be increased from $2,500 to a figure more 21 commensurate with the work required.[4] The report also recommended that the inflexibility of setting legislative salaries in the Constitution be eliminated and that, instead, the authority to raise legislative salaries be placed with the Legislature, and checked by gubernatorial consent.[5] The report concluded, "In revising legislative salaries the Legislature and the Governor would necessarily always be guided by public opinion."[6] When, in 1947, the People authorized the Legislature to set its own salary with the approval of the Governor, it was with the recognition that the Legislature needed to be able to adequately compensate itself and that this right would not be abused in view of the force of public opinion.

The individual Legislators represent the People of the State of New York. In return, the State Constitution provides that each member of the Legislature shall be compensated for his or her services (NY Const, art III, § 6). By placing legislative compensation beyond the political fray, the People of this State have expressed their interest in achieving legislative pay stability. To that end, article III, § 6 of the New York State Constitution provides, in pertinent part, "Each member of the legislature shall receive for his services a like annual salary, to be fixed by law."[7]

By its plain and unambiguous terms, article III, § 6 mandates that legislative salaries be "fixed by law" in like amount (NY Const, art III, § 6). This same provision also provides, in equally unambiguous terms, that once fixed, legislative salaries be "receive[d]" (id.).

Like its counterpart in the Federal Constitution (US Const, art I, § 6), article III, § 6 of the State Constitution provides a critical element of governmental stability by prescribing stability 22 in legislative salaries and emoluments. Just as the Federal Constitution places receipt of congressional compensation beyond the reach of the political fray (see, US Const, art I, § 6 ["The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law"]), article III, § 6 requires that the legislative salary be received (see, Dunlea v Anderson, 66 NY2d 265, 268, citing NY Const, art III, § 6 ["With the amendment of section 6, a legislator now 'receive(s) for his services a like annual salary, to be fixed by law' "]). When triggered, Chapter 635, on its face, violates this State constitutional prescription by rendering the receipt of the legislative salary conditional upon the passage of an April 1 budget.

Since 1928, the Constitution has given to the Governor primary authority in preparing a budget. Thus, article VII, § 1 requires the Governor to obtain from the Executive Branch an estimate of expenses. The Governor then prepares a budget which he submits to the Legislature (NY Const, art VII, § 2). That budget must contain "a complete plan of expenditures proposed to be made before the close of the ensuing fiscal year" (NY Const, art VII, § 2). In addition to this plan, the Governor must submit appropriation bills and proposed legislation (NY Const, art VII, § 3). The Legislature may not consider any other appropriation bill until all of the Governor's bills have been disposed (NY Const, art VII, § 5). While the Legislature may add to, strike out, or reduce items in the Governor's appropriation bills, the revisions are subject to the Governor's veto (NY Const, art VII, §§ 3, 6).

The budgetary process mandated by the Constitution requires that the Governor submit appropriation bills and proposed legislation for an entire fiscal year. The budgetary process itself requires the making of political choices. To the extent that a Legislator's salary depends on agreement regarding what monies should be spent and for what purposes, Chapter 635 introduces an improper mixture of legislative salaries with the merits of un-passed legislation.

Moreover, when one Legislature increases the salary of the next, but then withholds it after a term begins because of the failure to pass legislation, it, in effect, decreases that salary. This also renders Chapter 635 unconstitutional on its face. In my view, no Legislature can exercise this type of control over another. The Constitution permits one Legislature to increase the salary given to the next, but not to make that salary dependent on any passage of legislation, including the State's budget. 23

This Court has previously described two salutary purposes underlying article III, § 6. In New York Pub. Interest Research Group v Steingut (40 NY2d 250, 258), this Court stated:

"Here, it may be assumed that the prohibition against increases and decreases in legislators' compensation and emoluments during their terms of office would serve two salutary purposes--(1) to avoid a conflict of interest by removing from legislators the authority to vote themselves financial benefits at the expense of the public treasury, and (2) to forestall the possibility of manipulation of legislators' votes by promises of reward or threats of punishment effectuated through changes in salaries or allowances."

In The Federalist, No. 73, Alexander Hamilton argued that the President of the United States should receive a salary that could neither be increased nor diminished during his term of office, thus freeing him to perform his duties without regard to financial considerations. He stated:

"The legislature, with a discretionary power over the salary and emoluments of the Chief Magistrate, could render him as obsequious to their will as they might think proper to make him. ... There are men who could neither be distressed nor won into a sacrifice of their duty; but this stern virtue is the growth of few soils; and in the main it will be found that a power over a man's support is a power over his will. ...

"The legislature, on the appointment of a President, is once for all to declare what shall be the compensation for his services during the time for which he shall have been elected. This done, they will have no power to alter it, either by increase or diminution, till a new period of service by a new election commences. They can neither weaken his fortitude by operating on his necessities, nor corrupt his integrity by appealing to his avarice."

The reasoning applied by Alexander Hamilton to the President's compensation applies with equal force to legislative salaries here.

Article III, § 6 is violated by this non-constitutional enactment that thwarts its purpose of removing personal financial 24 considerations from legislative proposals. It is not an answer to say that the Legislature can determine the time when to pay salaries to its members. That is not the issue before us. The issue is whether the receipt of salaries may be tied to the passage of specific legislation. In my view, it cannot. To that end, article III, § 6 requires both that legislative salaries be fixed and received.

As for the argument that this Court should refrain from deciding this issue that involves a dispute between the executive and legislative branches of government and between elements within the legislative branch, it is precisely the constitutional role of the judiciary to resolve such disputes.[8] The Court of Appeals has in the past been called upon to resolve conflicts between the Governor and the Legislature. One such conflict occurred in 1928 between Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Legislature over the budget. In 1928, the executive budget had become a part of the State Constitution. In 1929, however, the Legislature adopted an amended budget which required the spending of certain lump sums that could not be changed without the consent of the Chairmen of the Senate Finance and Assembly Ways and Means Committees. When the bill was passed again over the Governor's veto, the Governor sued. This Court upheld the position of the Governor and concluded that the legislative action was unconstitutional.[9]

In sum, Chapter 635, on its face, is unconstitutional because it authorizes one Legislature to decrease the salary paid to another Legislature during its term of office by first giving and then withholding compensation. It also reverses the historical will of the People, expressed by constitutional amendments in 1845 and 1947, that there be neither property qualifications nor financial incentives provided to the members of the Legislature when deciding issues on the merits in accordance with the democratic process.

For these reasons, I dissent and vote to affirm the order of the Supreme Court.

Chief Judge Kaye and Judges Levine, Ciparick, Wesley 25 and Rosenblatt concur with Judge Bellacosa; Judge Smith dissents and votes to affirm in a separate opinion.

Judgment reversed, without costs, and judgment granted declaring chapter 635 of the Laws of 1998 constitutional. 26

Footnotes

1 Chapter 630 of the Laws of 1998.

2 Passage of the New York State budget did not occur until August 4, 1999, whereupon, in accordance with Chapter 635's formula, the net salaries of the Legislators were finally received.

3 Reports of the Proceedings and Debates of the Constitutional Convention of 1821, Assembled for the Purpose of Amending the Constitution, at 419-424.

Proceedings and Debates of New York State Constitutional Convention held in 1867 and 1868, vol I, at 761; vol V, at 3456-3457, 3591-3593.

Revised Record of New York State Constitutional Convention of 1915, vol II, at 1203-1245; vol III, at 2353-2366 (Apr. 6 to Sept. 10, 1915).

Final Report of New York State Joint Legislative Committee on Legislative Methods, Practices, Procedures and Expenditures, 1946 NY Legis Doc No. 31, at 169-171.

4 1946 NY Legis Doc No. 31, at 169-170.

5 Id., at 169-170.

6 Id., at 171.

7 The relevant portion of article III, § 6 states: “Each member of the legislature shall receive for his services a like annual salary, to be fixed by law. He shall also be reimbursed for his actual traveling expenses in going to and returning from the place in which the legislature meets, not more than once each week while the legislature is in session. ... Neither the salary of any member nor any other allowance so fixed may be increased or diminished during, and with respect to, the term for which he shall have been elected, nor shall he be paid or receive any other extra compensation. The provisions of this section and laws enacted in compliance therewith shall govern and be exclusively controlling, according to their terms. Members shall continue to receive such salary and additional allowance as heretofore fixed and provided in this section, until changed by law pursuant to this section.”

8 See generally, The Federalist, No. 78; Marbury v Madison, 1 Cranch [5 US] 137.

9 See, People v Tremaine, 252 NY 27, 45.

End of Document

KeyCite Yellow Flag - Negative Treatment
Distinguished by Alexander v. South Carolina State Conference of the NAACP, U.S.S.C., May 23, 2024

137 S.Ct. 1455
Supreme Court of the United States

Roy COOPER, Governor of North Carolina, et al., appellants
v.
David HARRIS, et al.

No. 15–1262
|
Argued Dec. 5, 2016.
|
Decided May 22, 2017.

Synopsis
Background: Registered voters brought action challenging the redistricting of two North Carolina congressional districts as racial gerrymanders in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. After a bench trial, a three-judge panel of the United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina, Roger L. Gregory, Circuit Judge, 159 F.Supp.3d 600, ruled in favor of voters. Probable jurisdiction was noted.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Justice Kagan, held that:

[1] deference to District Court's findings, under clearly erroneous standard of review, was warranted;

[2] finding that race was predominant factor in drawing one district as majority-minority district was not clearly erroneous;

[3] State lacked strong basis in evidence for believing that it needed a majority-minority district in order to avoid liability under § 2 of Voting Rights Act (VRA) for vote dilution; and [4] finding that racial gerrymandering rather than political gerrymandering was predominant factor in drawing the other district as majority-minority district was not clearly erroneous.

Affirmed.

Justice Thomas filed a concurring opinion.

Justice Alito filed an opinion concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part, in which Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Kennedy joined.

Justice Gorsuch took no part in the consideration or decision of the case.

West Headnotes (22)

[1] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limits racial gerrymanders in legislative districting plans, preventing a State, in the absence of sufficient justification, from separating its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

20 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Equal protection
Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

When a voter sues state officials, alleging the race-based drawing of lines in legislative districting plans, in violation of equal protection, a two-step analysis is called for: (1) the voter must prove that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district, and (2) if racial considerations predominated over others, the design of the district must withstand strict scrutiny, and the burden thus shifts to the State to prove that its race-based sorting of voters serves a compelling interest and is narrowly tailored to that end. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

62 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Election Law Weight and sufficiency

To show that race was the predominant factor in legislative redistricting, as first step of analysis for equal protection violation, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the legislature subordinated other factors, such as compactness, respect for political subdivisions, and partisan advantage, to racial considerations, and the plaintiff may make the required showing through direct evidence of legislative intent, circumstantial evidence of a district's shape and demographics, or a mix of both. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

31 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A plaintiff succeeds in showing that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district, as first step of analysis for an equal protection, even if the evidence reveals that a legislature elevated race to the predominant criterion in order to advance other goals, including political ones. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

36 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Election Law Vote Dilution

The prohibition, in § 2 of the VRA, of any standard, practice, or procedure that results in a denial or abridgement of the right to vote on account of race, extends to vote dilution brought about by the dispersal of a group's members into legislative districts in which they constitute an ineffective minority of voters. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

17 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

When a State invokes the VRA to justify a race-based legislative districting plan, it must show, to meet the narrow tailoring requirement for surviving strict scrutiny for an equal protection violation, that it had a strong basis in evidence for concluding that the VRA required its action, or said otherwise, the State must establish that it had good reasons to think that it would transgress the VRA if it did not draw race-based district lines; that strong basis or good reasons standard gives States breathing room to adopt reasonable compliance measures that may prove, in perfect hindsight, not to have been needed. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, §§ 2(a), 5, 52 U.S.C.A. §§ 10301(a), 10304.

19 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

A three-judge District Court's assessment of a State's legislative districting plan, which is challenged as a racial gerrymander that violates equal protection, warrants significant deference on direct appeal to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court retains full power to correct the District Court's errors of law, but the District Court's findings of fact, most notably, as to whether racial considerations predominated in drawing district lines, are subject to review only for clear error. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1253, 2284(a); Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 52(a)(6), 28 U.S.C.A.

12 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Federal Courts "Clearly erroneous" standard of review in general

Under the clearly erroneous standard of review for a trial court's findings of fact, the reviewing court cannot reverse just because it would have decided the matter differently, and a finding that is plausible in light of the full record, even if another is equally or more so, must govern. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 52(a)(6), 28 U.S.C.A.

45 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Judgment Persons Concluded

Three-judge District Court reasonably determined, in action brought by registered voters asserting that State's congressional redistricting for two districts constituted racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, that two voters were not members of civil rights organizations that were plaintiffs in a state court action that challenged the same two districts as racial gerrymanders, so that state court's judgment did not have claim preclusion or issue preclusion effect, assuming that voters' membership in the organizations, if proven, could give rise to preclusive effect; dueling contentions of the two voters and the State turned on intricate issues about organizations' membership policies, and nothing in State's evidence clearly rebutted voters' testimony that they never joined any of the organizations. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Res Judicata Persons not parties or privies

Res Judicata Particular Interests of and Relations Between Persons

One person's lawsuit generally does not bar another's based on claim preclusion or issue preclusion, no matter how similar they are in substance, but when plaintiffs in two cases have a special relationship, a judgment against one can indeed bind both.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[11] Federal Courts "Clearly erroneous" standard of review in general

The rule that a trial court's factual findings are reviewed for clear error contains no exception for findings that diverge from those made in another court, and whatever findings are under review receive the benefit of deference, without regard to whether a court in a separate suit has seen the matter differently. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 52(a)(6), 28 U.S.C.A.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Federal Courts Review of federal district courts

Factual findings of three-judge District Court, which ruled after bench trial that State's congressional redistricting plan for two districts constituted racial gerrymandering in violation of equal protection, would receive deference from Supreme Court under clearly erroneous standard of review, rather than the searching review sought by State as appellant, even if a state court had seen the matter differently in a separate action challenging the same districts; however, state court's decision was not wholly irrelevant, since it was common sense that, all else equal, a finding was more likely to be plainly wrong if some judges disagreed with it. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1253, 2284(a); Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 52(a)(6), 28 U.S.C.A.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Federal Courts Conflicting or undisputed evidence

The very premise of clear error review is that there are often two permissible or plausible views of the evidence. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 52(a)(6), 28 U.S.C.A.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Finding of three-judge District Court that race was predominant factor motivating state legislature's decision to place a significant number of African-American voters within a particular district, for congressional redistricting, was not clearly erroneous, and thus, strict scrutiny for equal protection violation was required; State's mapmakers purposefully established a racial target that African-Americans should make up no less than a majority of district's voting-age population so as to comply with VRA's prohibition of vote dilution, and the announced racial target subordinated other districting criteria and produced boundaries amplifying divisions between blacks and whites. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1253, 2284(a); Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

When race furnishes the overriding reason for choosing one map over others during legislative redistricting, a further showing of inconsistency between the enacted plan and traditional redistricting criteria is unnecessary to a finding of racial predominance, so that strict scrutiny for an equal protection violation is required. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[16] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Assuming that complying with the VRA was a compelling interest for racial gerrymandering in legislative redistricting, State did not have a strong basis in evidence for believing that it needed to draw a congressional district as an African-American majority-minority district in order to avoid liability under § 2 of VRA for vote dilution, and thus, there was an equal protection violation under strict scrutiny because such racial gerrymandering was not narrowly tailored to State's objective; electoral history provided no evidence that a § 2 plaintiff could demonstrate effective white block-voting that usually would be sufficient to defeat the preferred candidate of African-Americans, as one of the prerequisites for vote dilution claim, and there was no meaningful legislative inquiry into whether a new district with an enlarged population, that was created without a focus on race, could lead to § 2 liability. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

19 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

There are three threshold conditions for proving vote dilution under § 2 of the VRA: (1) a minority group must be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in some reasonably configured legislative district; (2) the minority group must be politically cohesive; and (3) a district's white majority must vote sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

52 Cases that cite this headnote

[18] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

The ability of a legislature to draw a majority-minority electoral district does not mean that the legislature is required to do so, in order to avoid liability for vote dilution under § 2 of the VRA, where a crossover district would also allow the minority group to elect its favored candidates. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

30 Cases that cite this headnote

[19] Election Law Vote Dilution

A state legislature, when redistricting, need not determine precisely what percent minority population § 2 of the VRA demands in order to avoid vote dilution. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[20] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Finding of three-judge District Court that racial gerrymandering rather than political gerrymandering was predominant factor motivating state legislature's decision to place a significant number of African-American voters within a particular district, for congressional redistricting, was not clearly erroneous, and thus, strict scrutiny for equal protection violation was required; district was approximately the right size before redistricting, racial lines were followed in further slimming down district and adding a couple of knobs to its snakelike body, addition of 35,000 African-American voters and subtraction of 50,000 white voters produced sizeable jump in black voting-age population (BVAP) from 43.8% to 50.7%, and architects of redistricting plan repeatedly described the influx of African-American voters into the district as a measure to ensure preclearance under § 5 of VRA, not a side-effect of political gerrymandering. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1253, 2284(a); Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10304.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[21] Federal Courts Credibility and impeachment

It is a proper for a reviewing court, in applying the clearly erroneous standard of review, to give singular deference to a trial court's judgments about the credibility of witnesses, because the various cues that bear so heavily on the listener's understanding of and belief in what is said are lost on an appellate court later sifting through a paper record. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 52(a)(6), 28 U.S.C.A.

27 Cases that cite this headnote

[22] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Election Law Weight and sufficiency

To establish that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular electoral district, so that strict scrutiny for an equal protection violation is required, the plaintiffs are not required to offer an alternative districting plan that achieves the legislature's claimed political considerations; rather, an alternative map is merely an evidentiary tool to show that an equal protection violation has occurred, and neither its presence nor its absence can itself resolve a racial gerrymandering claim. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

11 Cases that cite this headnote

1459 Syllabus [*]

285 The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prevents a State, in the absence of "sufficient justification," from "separating its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race." Bethune–Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. ——, ——, 137 S.Ct. 788, 797, 197 L.Ed.2d 85. When a voter sues state officials for drawing such race-based lines, this Court's decisions call for a two-step analysis. First, the plaintiff must prove that "race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762. Second, if racial considerations did predominate, the State must prove that its race-based sorting of voters serves a "compelling interest" and is "narrowly tailored" to that end, Bethune–Hill, 580 U.S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 800. This Court has long assumed that one compelling interest is compliance with the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA or Act). When a State invokes the VRA to justify race-based districting, it must show (to meet the "narrow tailoring" requirement) that it had "good reasons" for concluding that the statute required its action. Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1274, 191 L.Ed.2d 314. A district court's factual findings made in the course of this two-step inquiry are reviewed only for clear error. See Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 52(a)(6); Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 242, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (Cromartie II).

This case concerns North Carolina's redrawing of two congressional districts, District 1 and District 12, after the 2010 census. Prior to that redistricting, neither district had a majority black voting-age population (BVAP), but both consistently elected the candidates preferred by most African–American voters. The new map significantly altered both District 1 and District 12. The State needed to add almost 100,000 people to District 1 to comply with the one-person-one-vote principle, and it chose to take most of those people from heavily black areas of Durham—increasing the district's BVAP from 48.6% to 52.7%. The State also reconfigured District 12, increasing its BVAP from 43.8% to 50.7%. Registered voters in those districts (here called "the plaintiffs") filed suit against North Carolina officials (collectively, "the State" or "North Carolina"), complaining of impermissible racial gerrymanders. 286 A three-judge District Court held both districts unconstitutional. It found that racial considerations predominated in the drawing of District 1's lines and rejected the State's claim that this action was justified by the VRA. As for District 12, the court again found that race predominated, and it explained that the State made no attempt to justify its attention to race in designing that district.

Held:

1. North Carolina's victory in a similar state-court lawsuit does not dictate the disposition of this case or alter the applicable standard of review. Before this case was filed, a state trial court rejected a claim by several civil rights groups that *1460 Districts 1 and 12 were unlawful racial gerrymanders. The North Carolina Supreme Court affirmed that decision under the state-court equivalent of clear error review. The State claims that the plaintiffs are members of the same organizations that brought the earlier case, and thus precluded from raising the same questions anew. But the State never satisfied the District Court that the alleged affiliation really existed. And because the District Court's factual finding was reasonable, it defeats North Carolina's attempt to argue for claim or issue preclusion here.

The State's backup argument about the proper standard of review also falls short. The rule that a trial court's factual findings are reviewed only for clear error contains no exception for findings that diverge from those made in another court. See Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 52(a)(6). Although the state court's decision is certainly relevant, the premise of clear error review is that there are often "two permissible views of the evidence." Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 574, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518. Even assuming that the state court's findings capture one such view, the only question here is whether the District Court's assessment represents another. Pp. 1467 – 1468.

2. The District Court did not err in concluding that race furnished the predominant rationale for District 1's redesign and that the State's interest in complying with the VRA could not justify that consideration of race. Pp. 1468 – 1472.

(a) The record shows that the State purposefully established a racial target for the district and that the target "had a direct and significant impact" on the district's configuration, Alabama, 575 U.S., at ——, 135 S.Ct. at 1271 subordinating other districting criteria. Faced with this body of evidence, the District Court did not clearly err in finding that race predominated in drawing District 1; indeed, it could hardly have concluded anything but. Pp. 1468 – 1469.

(b) North Carolina's use of race as the predominant factor in designing District 1 does not withstand strict scrutiny. The State argues 287 that it had good reasons to believe that it had to draw a majority-minority district to avoid liability for vote dilution under § 2 of the VRA. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25, identifies three threshold conditions for proving such a vote-dilution claim: (1) A "minority group" must be "sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority" in some reasonably configured legislative district, id., at 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752; (2) the minority group must be "politically cohesive," id., at 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752; and (3) a district's white majority must "vote[ ] sufficiently as a bloc" to usually "defeat the minority's preferred candidate," ibid. If a State has good reason to think that all three of these conditions are met, then so too it has good reason to believe that § 2 requires drawing a majority-minority district. But if not, then not.

Here, electoral history provided no evidence that a § 2 plaintiff could demonstrate the third Gingles prerequisite. For nearly 20 years before the new plan's adoption, African–Americans made up less than a majority of District 1's voters, but their preferred candidates scored consistent victories. District 1 thus functioned as a "crossover" district, in which members of the majority help a "large enough" minority to elect its candidate of choice. Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 13, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (plurality opinion). So experience gave the State no reason to think that the VRA required it to ramp up District 1's BVAP.

The State counters that because it needed to substantially increase District *1461 1's population, the question facing the state mapmakers was not whether the then-existing District 1 violated § 2, but whether the future District 1 would do so if drawn without regard to race. But that reasoning, taken alone, cannot justify the State's race-based redesign of the district. Most important, the State points to no meaningful legislative inquiry into the key issue it identifies: whether a new, enlarged District 1, created without a focus on race, could lead to § 2 liability. To have a strong basis to conclude that § 2 demands race-based measures to augment a district's BVAP, the State must evaluate whether a plaintiff could establish the Gingles preconditions in a new district created without those measures. Nothing in the legislative record here fits that description. And that is no accident: The redistricters believed that this Court's decision in Strickland mandated a 50%-plus BVAP in District 1. They apparently reasoned that if, as Strickland held, § 2 does not require crossover districts (for groups insufficiently large under Gingles), then § 2 also cannot be satisfied by crossover districts (for groups meeting Gingles ' size condition). But, as this Court's § 2 jurisprudence makes clear, unless each of the three Gingles prerequisites is established, "there neither has been a wrong nor can be a remedy." Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 41, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388. North Carolina's belief that it was compelled to redraw District 1 (a successful crossover district) as a 288 majority-minority district thus rested on a pure error of law. Accordingly, the Court upholds the District Court's conclusion that the State's use of race as the predominant factor in designing District 1 does not withstand strict scrutiny. Pp. 1469 – 1472.

3. The District Court also did not clearly err by finding that race predominated in the redrawing of District 12. Pp. 1472 – 1481.

(a) The district's legality turns solely on which of two possible reasons predominantly explains its reconfiguration. The plaintiffs contended at trial that North Carolina intentionally increased District 12's BVAP in the name of ensuring preclearance under § 5 of the VRA. According to the State, by contrast, the mapmakers moved voters in and out of the district as part of a "strictly" political gerrymander, without regard to race. After hearing evidence supporting both parties' accounts, the District Court accepted the plaintiffs'.

Getting to the bottom of a dispute like this one poses special challenges for a trial court, which must make " 'a sensitive inquiry' " into all " 'circumstantial and direct evidence of intent' " to assess whether the plaintiffs have proved that race, not politics, drove a district's lines. Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541, 546, 119 S.Ct. 1545, 143 L.Ed.2d 731 (Cromartie I). This Court's job is different—and generally easier. It affirms a trial court's factual finding as to racial predominance so long as the finding is "plausible"; it reverses only when "left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Anderson, 470 U.S., at 573–574, 105 S.Ct. 1504. In assessing a finding's plausibility, moreover, the Court gives singular deference to a trial court's judgments about the credibility of witnesses. See Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 52(a)(6). Applying those principles here, the evidence at trial—including live witness testimony subject to credibility determinations—adequately supports the District Court's conclusion that race, not politics, accounted for District 12's reconfiguration. And contrary to the State's view, the court had no call to dismiss this challenge just because the plaintiffs did not proffer an alternative design for District 12. Pp. 1472 – 1474.

(b) By slimming the district and adding a couple of knobs to its snakelike body, *1462 North Carolina added 35,000 African–Americans and subtracted 50,000 whites, turning District 12 into a majority-minority district. State Senator Robert Rucho and State Representative David Lewis—the chairs of the two committees responsible for preparing the revamped plan—publicly stated that racial considerations lay behind District 12's augmented BVAP. Specifically, Rucho and Lewis explained that because part of Guilford County, a jurisdiction covered by § 5 of the VRA, lay in the district, they had increased the district's BVAP to ensure preclearance of the plan. Dr. Thomas Hofeller, their hired mapmaker, confirmed that intent. The State's preclearance submission 289 to the Justice Department indicated a similar determination to concentrate black voters in District 12. And, in testimony that the District Court found credible, Congressman Mel Watt testified that Rucho disclosed a majority-minority target to him in 2011. Hofeller testified that he had drawn District 12's lines based on political data, and that he checked the racial data only after he drew a politics-based line between adjacent areas in Guilford County. But the District Court disbelieved Hofeller's asserted indifference to the new district's racial composition, pointing to his contrary deposition testimony and a significant contradiction in his trial testimony. Finally, an expert report lent circumstantial support to the plaintiffs' case, showing that, regardless of party, a black voter in the region was three to four times more likely than a white voter to cast a ballot within District 12's borders.

The District Court's assessment that all this evidence proved racial predominance clears the bar of clear error review.

Maybe this Court would have evaluated the testimony differently had it presided over the trial; or then again, maybe it would not have. Either way, the Court is far from having a "definite and firm conviction" that the District Court made a mistake in concluding from the record before it that racial considerations predominated in District 12's design. Pp. 1474 – 1478.

(c) Finally, North Carolina argues that when race and politics are competing explanations of a district's lines, plaintiffs must introduce an alternative map that achieves a State's asserted political goals while improving racial balance. Such a map can serve as key evidence in a race-versus-politics dispute, but it is hardly the only means to disprove a State's contention that politics drove a district's lines. In this case, the plaintiffs' introduction of mostly direct and some circumstantial evidence gave the District Court a sufficient basis, sans any map, to resolve the race-or-politics question. Although a plaintiff will sometimes need an alternative map, as a practical matter, to make his case, such a map is merely an evidentiary tool to show that an equal protection violation has occurred; neither its presence nor its absence can itself resolve a racial gerrymandering claim.

North Carolina claims that a passage of this Court's opinion in Cromartie II makes an alternative map essential in cases like this one, but the reasoning of Cromartie II belies that reading. The Court's opinion nowhere attempts to explicate or justify the categorical rule that the State claims to find there, and the entire thrust of the opinion runs counter to an inflexible counter-map requirement. Rightly understood, the passage on which the State relies had a different and narrower point: Given the weak evidence of a racial gerrymander offered in Cromartie II, only maps that would actually show what the plaintiffs' had not could carry the day. This case, in contrast, turned not on the possibility 290 of creating more optimally constructed districts, but on direct evidence *1463 of the General Assembly's intent in creating the actual District 12—including many hours of trial testimony subject to credibility determinations. That evidence, the District Court plausibly found, itself satisfied the plaintiffs' burden of debunking North Carolina's politics defense. Pp. 1478 – 1481.

159 F.Supp.3d 600, affirmed.

KAGAN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which THOMAS, GINSBURG, BREYER, and SOTOMAYOR, JJ., joined. THOMAS, J., filed a concurring opinion. ALITO, J., filed an opinion concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part, in which ROBERTS, C.J., and KENNEDY, J., joined. GORSUCH, J., took no part in the consideration or decision of the case.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Paul D. Clement, Washington, DC, for the appellants.

Marc E. Elias, Washington, DC, for appellees.

Nicole A. Saharsky, for the United States as amicus curiae, by special leave of the Court, supporting the appellees.

Thomas A. Farr, Phillip J. Strach, Michael D. McKnight, Ogletree, Deakins, Nash Smoak & Stewart, P.C., Raleigh, NC, Paul D. Clement, Erin E. Murphy, Michael D. Lieberman, Kirkland & Ellis LLP, Washington, DC, Alexander M. Peters, North Carolina Department of Justice, for appellants.

Kevin J. Hamilton, William B. Stafford, Abha Khanna, Perkins Coie LLP, Seattle, WA, Edwin M. Speas, Jr., Caroline P. Mackie, Poyner Spruill LLP, Raleigh, NC, Marc E. Elias, John M. Devaney, Bruce V. Spiva, Perkins Coie LLP, Washington, DC, for appellees David Harris & Christine Bowser.

Justice KAGAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

291 The Constitution entrusts States with the job of designing congressional districts. But it also imposes an important constraint: A State may not use race as the predominant factor in drawing district lines unless it has a compelling reason. In this case, a three-judge District Court ruled that North Carolina officials violated that bar when they created two districts whose voting-age populations were majority black. Applying a deferential standard of review to the factual findings underlying that decision, we affirm.

I

A

[1] [2] The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limits racial gerrymanders in legislative districting plans. It prevents a State, in the absence of "sufficient justification," from "separating its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race." Bethune–Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. ——, ——, 137 S.Ct.

788, 797, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017) (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted). When a voter sues state officials for drawing such race-based lines, our decisions call for a two-step analysis.

[3] [4] First, the plaintiff must prove that "race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995). That entails demonstrating *1464 that the legislature "subordinated" other factors—compactness, respect for political subdivisions, partisan advantage, what have you—to "racial considerations." Ibid. The plaintiff may make the required showing through "direct evidence" of legislative intent, "circumstantial evidence of a district's shape and demographics," or a mix of both. Ibid.[1]

292 Second, if racial considerations predominated over others, the design of the district must withstand strict scrutiny. See Bethune–Hill, 580 U.S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 800. The burden thus shifts to the State to prove that its race-based sorting of voters serves a "compelling interest" and is "narrowly tailored" to that end. Ibid. This Court has long assumed that one compelling interest is complying with operative provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA or Act), 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 52 U.S.C. § 10301 et seq. See, e.g., Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 915, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II).

[5] Two provisions of the VRA—§ 2 and § 5—are involved in this case. §§ 10301, 10304. Section 2 prohibits any "standard, practice, or procedure" that "results in a denial or abridgement of the right ... to vote on account of race." § 10301(a). We have construed that ban to extend to "vote dilution"—brought about, most relevantly here, by the "dispersal of [a group's members] into districts in which they constitute an ineffective minority of voters." Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 46, n. 11, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). Section 5, at the time of the districting in dispute, worked through a different mechanism. Before this Court invalidated its coverage formula, see Shelby County v. Holder, 570 U.S. ——, 133 S.Ct. 2612, 186 L.Ed.2d 651 (2013), that section required certain jurisdictions (including various North Carolina counties) to pre-clear voting changes with the Department of Justice, so as to forestall "retrogression" in the ability of racial minorities to elect their preferred candidates, Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976).

[6] When a State invokes the VRA to justify race-based districting, it must show (to meet the "narrow tailoring" requirement) that it had "a strong basis in evidence" for concluding that the statute required its action. 293 Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1274, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015). Or said otherwise, the State must establish that it had "good reasons" to think that it would transgress the Act if it did not draw race-based district lines. Ibid. That "strong basis" (or "good reasons") standard gives States "breathing room" to adopt reasonable compliance measures that may prove, in perfect hindsight, not to have been needed. Bethune–Hill, 580 U.S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 802.

[7] [8] A district court's assessment of a districting plan, in accordance with the two-step inquiry just described, warrants significant deference on appeal to this Court.[2] We of course retain full power to *1465 correct a court's errors of law, at either stage of the analysis. But the court's findings of fact—most notably, as to whether racial considerations predominated in drawing district lines—are subject to review only for clear error. See Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 52(a)(6); Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 242, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (Cromartie II); id., at 259, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (THOMAS, J., dissenting). Under that standard, we may not reverse just because we "would have decided the [matter] differently." Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985). A finding that is "plausible" in light of the full record—even if another is equally or more so—must govern. Id., at 574, 105 S.Ct. 1504.

B

This case concerns North Carolina's most recent redrawing of two congressional districts, both of which have long included substantial populations of black voters. In its current incarnation, District 1 is anchored in the northeastern part of the State, with appendages stretching both south and west (the latter into Durham). District 12 begins in the south-central part of the State (where it takes in a large part of Charlotte) and then travels northeast, zig-zagging much 294 of the way to the State's northern border. (Maps showing the districts are included in an appendix to this opinion.) Both have quite the history before this Court.

We first encountered the two districts, in their 1992 versions, in Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993). There, we held that voters stated an equal protection claim by alleging that Districts 1 and 12 were unwarranted racial gerrymanders. See id., at 642, 649, 113 S.Ct. 2816. After a remand to the District Court, the case arrived back at our door. See Shaw II, 517 U.S. 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207. That time, we dismissed the challenge to District 1 for lack of standing, but struck down District 12. The design of that "serpentine" district, we held, was nothing if not race-centric, and could not be justified as a reasonable attempt to comply with the VRA. Id., at 906, 116 S.Ct. 1894; see id., at 911–918, 116 S.Ct. 1894.

The next year, the State responded with a new districting plan, including a new District 12—and residents of that district brought another lawsuit alleging an impermissible racial gerrymander. A District Court sustained the claim twice, but both times this Court reversed. See Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541, 119 S.Ct. 1545, 143 L.Ed.2d 731 (1999) (Cromartie I); Cromartie II, 532 U.S. 234, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430. Racial considerations, we held, did not predominate in designing the revised District 12. Rather, that district was the result of a political gerrymander—an effort to engineer, mostly "without regard to race," a safe Democratic seat. Id., at 245, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

The State redrew its congressional districts again in 2001, to account for population changes revealed in the prior year's census. Under the 2001 map, which went unchallenged in court, neither District 1 nor District 12 had a black voting-age population (called a "BVAP") that was a majority of the whole: The former had a BVAP of around 48%, the latter a BVAP of around 43%. See App. 312, 503. Nonetheless, in five successive general elections conducted in those reconfigured districts, all the candidates preferred by most African–American voters won their contests—and by some handy margins. In District 1, black voters' candidates of 295 choice garnered *1466 as much as 70% of the total vote, and never less than 59%. See 5 Record 636, 638, 641, 645, 647 (Pls. Exh. 112). And in District 12, those candidates won with 72% of the vote at the high end and 64% at the low. See id., at 637, 640, 643, 646, 650.

Another census, in 2010, necessitated yet another congressional map—(finally) the one at issue in this case. State Senator Robert Rucho and State Representative David Lewis, both Republicans, chaired the two committees jointly responsible for preparing the revamped plan. They hired Dr. Thomas Hofeller, a veteran political mapmaker, to assist them in redrawing district lines. Several hearings, drafts, and revisions later, both chambers of the State's General Assembly adopted the scheme the three men proposed.

The new map (among other things) significantly altered both District 1 and District 12. The 2010 census had revealed District 1 to be substantially underpopulated: To comply with the Constitution's one-person-one-vote principle, the State needed to place almost 100,000 new people within the district's boundaries. See App. 2690; Evenwel v. Abbott, 578 U.S. ——, ——, 136 S.Ct. 1120, 1124, 194 L.Ed.2d 291 (2016) (explaining that "[s]tates must draw congressional districts with populations as close to perfect equality as possible"). Rucho, Lewis, and Hofeller chose to take most of those people from heavily black areas of Durham, requiring a finger-like extension of the district's western line. See Appendix, infra. With that addition, District 1's BVAP rose from 48.6% to 52.7%. See App. 312–313. District 12, for its part, had no need for significant total-population changes: It was overpopulated by fewer than 3,000 people out of over 730,000. See id., at 1150. Still, Rucho, Lewis, and Hofeller decided to reconfigure the district, further narrowing its already snakelike body while adding areas at either end —most relevantly here, in Guilford County. See Appendix, infra ; App. 1164. Those changes appreciably shifted the racial composition of District 12: As the district gained some 35,000 African–Americans of voting 296 age and lost some 50,000 whites of that age, its BVAP increased from 43.8% to 50.7%. See 2 Record 349 (Fourth Affidavit of Dan Frey, Exh. 5); id., at 416 (Exh. 11).

Registered voters in the two districts (David Harris and Christine Bowser, here called "the plaintiffs") brought this suit against North Carolina officials (collectively, "the State" or "North Carolina"), complaining of impermissible racial gerrymanders. After a bench trial, a three-judge District Court held both districts unconstitutional. All the judges agreed that racial considerations predominated in the design of District 1. See Harris v. McCrory, 159 F.Supp.3d 600, 611 (M.D.N.C.2016). And in then applying strict scrutiny, all rejected the State's argument that it had a "strong basis" for thinking that the VRA compelled such a race-based drawing of District 1's lines. Id., at 623. As for District 12, a majority of the panel held that "race predominated" over all other factors, including partisanship. Id., at 622. And the court explained that the State had failed to put forward any reason, compelling or otherwise, for its attention to race in designing that district. See ibid. Judge Osteen dissented from the conclusion that race, rather than politics, drove District 12's lines—yet still characterized the majority's view as "[e]minently reasonable." Id., at 640.

The State filed a notice of appeal, and we noted probable jurisdiction. McCrory v. Harris, 579 U.S. ——, 136 S.Ct. 2512, 195 L.Ed.2d 838 (2016).

*1467 II

[9] We address at the outset North Carolina's contention that a victory it won in a very similar state-court lawsuit should dictate (or at least influence) our disposition of this case. As the State explains, the North Carolina NAACP and several other civil rights groups challenged Districts 1 and 12 in state court immediately after their enactment, charging that they were unlawful racial gerrymanders. See Brief for Appellants 19–20. By the time the plaintiffs before us filed this action, the state trial court, in Dickson v. Rucho, had rejected 297 those claims—finding that in District 1 the VRA justified the General Assembly's use of race and that in District 12 race was not a factor at all. See App. 1969. The North Carolina Supreme Court then affirmed that decision by a 4–3 vote, applying the state-court equivalent of clear error review. See Dickson v. Rucho, 368 N.C. 481, 500, 781 S.E.2d 404, 419 (2015), modified on denial of reh'g, 368 N.C. 673, 789 S.E.2d 436 (2016), cert. pending, No. 16–24. In this Court, North Carolina makes two related arguments based on the Dickson litigation: first, that the state trial court's judgment should have barred this case altogether, under familiar principles of claim and issue preclusion; and second, that the state court's conclusions should cause us to conduct a "searching review" of the decision below, rather than deferring (as usual) to its factual findings. Reply Brief 6.

[10] The State's preclusion theory rests on an assertion about how the plaintiffs in the two cases are affiliated. As the State acknowledges, one person's lawsuit generally does not bar another's, no matter how similar they are in substance. See Taylor v. Sturgell, 553 U.S. 880, 892–893, 128 S.Ct. 2161, 171 L.Ed.2d 155 (2008) (noting the "deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court"). But when plaintiffs in two cases have a special relationship, a judgment against one can indeed bind both. See id., at 893–895, 128 S.Ct. 2161 (describing six categories of qualifying relationships). The State contends that Harris and Bowser, the plaintiffs here, are members of organizations that were plaintiffs in Dickson. And according to North Carolina, that connection prevents the pair from raising anew the questions that the state court previously resolved against those groups. See Brief for Appellants 20–21.

But North Carolina never satisfied the District Court that the alleged affiliation really existed. When the State argued that its preclusion theory entitled it to summary judgment, Harris and Bowser responded that they were not members of any of the organizations that had brought the 298 Dickson suit. See 3 Record 1577–1582 (Defs. Motion for Summary Judgment); 4 Record 101–106 (Pls. Opposition to Motion for Summary Judgment). The parties' dueling contentions turned on intricate issues about those groups' membership policies (e.g., could Harris's payment of dues to the national NAACP, or Bowser's financial contribution to the Mecklenburg County NAACP, have made either a member of the state branch?). Because of those unresolved "factual disputes," the District Court denied North Carolina's motion for summary judgment. 4 Record 238 (July 29, 2014 Order). And nothing in the subsequent trial supported the State's assertion about Harris's and Bowser's organizational ties: Indeed, the State chose not to present any further evidence relating to the membership issue. Based on the resulting record, the District Court summarily rejected the State's claim that Harris and Bowser were something other than independent plaintiffs. See 159 F.Supp.3d, at 609.

*1468 That conclusion defeats North Carolina's attempt to argue for claim or issue preclusion here. We have no basis for assessing the factual assertions underlying the State's argument any differently than the District Court did. Nothing in the State's evidence clearly rebuts Harris's and Bowser's testimony that they never joined any of the Dickson groups. We need not decide whether the alleged memberships would have supported preclusion if they had been proved. It is enough that the District Court reasonably thought they had not.

[11] [12] [13] The State's back-up argument about our standard of review also falls short. The rule that we review a trial court's factual findings for clear error contains no exception for findings that diverge from those made in another court. See Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 52(a)(6) ("Findings of fact ... must not be set aside unless clearly erroneous"); see also Hernandez v. New York, 500 U.S. 352, 369, 111 S.Ct. 1859, 114 L.Ed.2d 395 (1991) (plurality opinion) (applying the same standard to a state court's findings). Whatever findings are under review receive the benefit of 299 deference, without regard to whether a court in a separate suit has seen the matter differently. So here, we must ask not which court considering Districts 1 and 12 had the better view of the facts, but simply whether the court below's view is clearly wrong. That does not mean the state court's decision is wholly irrelevant: It is common sense that, all else equal, a finding is more likely to be plainly wrong if some judges disagree with it. Cf. Glossip v. Gross, 576 U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 2726, 2740, 192 L.Ed.2d 761 (2015) (noting that we are even less likely to disturb a factual determination when "multiple trial courts have reached the same finding"). But the very premise of clear error review is that there are often "two permissible"—because two "plausible"—"views of the evidence." Anderson, 470 U.S., at 574, 105 S.Ct. 1504; see supra, at 1465. Even assuming the state court's findings capture one such view, the District Court's assessment may yet represent another. And the permissibility of the District Court's account is the only question before us.

III

With that out of the way, we turn to the merits of this case, beginning (appropriately enough) with District 1. As noted above, the court below found that race furnished the predominant rationale for that district's redesign. See supra, at 1466 – 1467. And it held that the State's interest in complying with the VRA could not justify that consideration of race. See supra, at 1466 – 1467. We uphold both conclusions.

A

[14] Uncontested evidence in the record shows that the State's mapmakers, in considering District 1, purposefully established a racial target: African–Americans should make up no less than a majority of the voting-age population. See 159 F.Supp.3d, at 611–614. Senator Rucho and Representative Lewis were not coy in expressing that goal. They repeatedly told their colleagues that District 1 had to be majority-minority, so as to comply with the VRA. During a Senate 300 debate, for example, Rucho explained that District 1 "must include a sufficient number of African–Americans" to make it "a majority black district." App. 689–690. Similarly, Lewis informed the House and Senate redistricting committees that the district must have "a majority black voting age population." Id., at 606. And that objective was communicated in no uncertain terms to the legislators' consultant. Dr. Hofeller testified multiple times at trial that *1469 Rucho and Lewis instructed him "to draw [District 1] with a [BVAP] in excess of 50 percent." 159 F.Supp.3d, at 613; see, e.g., ibid. ("Once again, my instructions [were] that the district had to be drawn at above 50 percent").

Hofeller followed those directions to the letter, such that the 50%-plus racial target "had a direct and significant impact" on District 1's configuration. Alabama, 575 U.S., at ——, 135 S.Ct., at 1271. In particular, Hofeller moved the district's borders to encompass the heavily black parts of Durham (and only those parts), thus taking in tens of thousands of additional African–American voters. That change and similar ones, made (in his words) to ensure that the district's racial composition would "add[ ] up correctly," deviated from the districting practices he otherwise would have followed. App. 2802. Hofeller candidly admitted that point: For example, he testified, he sometimes could not respect county or precinct lines as he wished because "the more important thing" was to create a majority-minority district. Id., at 2807; see id., at 2809. The result is a district with stark racial borders: Within the same counties, the portions that fall inside District 1 have black populations two to three times larger than the portions placed in neighboring districts. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 19; cf. Alabama, 575 U.S., at —— – ——, 135 S.Ct., at 1271–1272 (relying on similar evidence to find racial predominance).

[15] Faced with this body of evidence—showing an announced racial target that subordinated other districting criteria and produced boundaries amplifying divisions between blacks 301 and whites—the District Court did not clearly err in finding that race predominated in drawing District 1. Indeed, as all three judges recognized, the court could hardly have concluded anything but. See 159 F.Supp.3d, at 611 (calling District 1 a "textbook example" of race-based districting).[3]

B

[16] The more substantial question is whether District 1 can survive the strict scrutiny applied to racial gerrymanders. As noted earlier, we have long assumed that complying with the VRA is a compelling interest. See supra, at 1463 – 1464. And we have held that race-based districting is narrowly tailored to that objective if a State had "good reasons" for thinking that the Act demanded such steps. See supra, at 1464. North Carolina argues that District 1 passes muster under that standard: The General Assembly (so says the State) had "good reasons to believe it needed to draw [District 1] as a majority-minority district to avoid Section 2 liability" for vote dilution. Brief for Appellants 52. We now turn to that defense.

1470 [17] This Court identified, in Thornburg v. Gingles, three threshold conditions for proving vote dilution under § 2 of the VRA. See 478 U.S., at 50–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752. First, a "minority group" must be "sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority" in some reasonably configured legislative district. Id., at 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Second, the minority *302 group must be "politically cohesive." Id., at 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752. And third, a district's white majority must "vote [ ] sufficiently as a bloc" to usually "defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Ibid. Those three showings, we have explained, are needed to establish that "the minority [group] has the potential to elect a representative of its own choice" in a possible district, but that racially polarized voting prevents it from doing so in the district as actually drawn because it is "submerg[ed] in a larger white voting population." Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993). If a State has good reason to think that all the "Gingles preconditions" are met, then so too it has good reason to believe that § 2 requires drawing a majority-minority district. See Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 978, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion). But if not, then not.

Here, electoral history provided no evidence that a § 2 plaintiff could demonstrate the third Gingles prerequisite—effective white bloc-voting.[4] For most of the twenty years prior to the new plan's adoption, African–Americans had made up less than a majority of District 1's voters; the district's BVAP usually hovered between 46% and 48%. See 159 F.Supp.3d, at 606; App. 312. Yet throughout those two decades, as the District Court noted, District 1 was "an extraordinarily safe district for African–American preferred candidates." 159 F.Supp.3d, at 626. In the closest election during that period, African–Americans' candidate of choice *303 received 59% of the total vote; in other years, the share of the vote garnered by those candidates rose to as much as 70%. See supra, at 1465 – 1466. Those victories (indeed, landslides) occurred because the district's white population did not "vote [ ] sufficiently as a bloc" to thwart black voters' preference, Gingles, 478 U.S., at 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752; rather, a meaningful number of white voters joined a politically cohesive black community to elect that group's favored candidate. In the lingo of voting law, District 1 functioned, election year in and election year out, as a "crossover" district, in which members of the majority help a "large enough" minority to elect its candidate of choice. Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 13, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (2009) (plurality opinion). When voters act in that way, "[i]t is difficult to see how the majority-bloc-voting requirement could be met"—and hence how § 2 liability could be established. Id., at 16, 129 S.Ct. 1231. So experience gave the State no reason to think that the VRA required it to ramp up District 1's BVAP.

The State counters that, in this context, past performance is no guarantee of future results. See Brief for Appellants 57–58; Reply Brief 19–20. Recall here that the State had to redraw its whole congressional map following the 2010 census. See supra, at 1465 – 1466. And in particular, 1471 the State had to add nearly 100,000 new people to District 1 to meet the one-person-one-vote standard. See supra, at 1466. That meant about 13% of the voters in the new district would never have voted there before. See App. 2690; Reply Brief 20. So, North Carolina contends, the question facing the state mapmakers was not whether the then-existing District 1 violated § 2. Rather, the question was whether the future District 1 would do so if drawn without regard to race. And that issue, the State claims, could not be resolved by "focusing myopically on past elections." Id., at 19.

But that reasoning, taken alone, cannot justify North Carolina's race-based redesign of District 1. True enough, a legislature undertaking a redistricting must assess whether *304 the new districts it contemplates (not the old ones it sheds) conform to the VRA's requirements. And true too, an inescapable influx of additional voters into a district may suggest the possibility that its former track record of compliance can continue only if the legislature intentionally adjusts its racial composition. Still, North Carolina too far downplays the significance of a longtime pattern of white crossover voting in the area that would form the core of the redrawn District 1. See Gingles, 478 U.S., at 57, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (noting that longtime voting patterns are highly probative of racial polarization). And even more important, North Carolina can point to no meaningful legislative inquiry into what it now rightly identifies as the key issue: whether a new, enlarged District 1, created without a focus on race but however else the State would choose, could lead to § 2 liability. The prospect of a significant population increase in a district only raises—it does not answer—the question whether § 2 requires deliberate measures to augment the district's BVAP. (Indeed, such population growth could cut in either direction, depending on who comes into the district.) To have a strong basis in evidence to conclude that § 2 demands such race-based steps, the State must carefully evaluate whether a plaintiff could establish the Gingles preconditions—including effective white bloc-voting—in a new district created without those measures. We see nothing in the legislative record that fits that description.[5]

[18] 305 And that absence is no accident: Rucho and Lewis proceeded under a wholly different theory—arising not from Gingles but from Bartlett v. Strickland—of what § 2 demanded in drawing District 1. Strickland involved a geographic area in which African–Americans could not form a majority of a reasonably compact district. See 556 U.S., at 8, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plurality opinion). The African–American *1472 community, however, was sizable enough to enable the formation of a crossover district, in which a substantial bloc of black voters, if receiving help from some white ones, could elect the candidates of their choice. See supra, at 1470 – 1471. A plurality of this Court, invoking the first Gingles precondition, held that § 2 did not require creating that district: When a minority group is not sufficiently large to make up a majority in a reasonably shaped district, § 2 simply does not apply. See 556 U.S., at 18–20, 129 S.Ct. 1231. Over and over in the legislative record, Rucho and Lewis cited Strickland as mandating a 50%-plus BVAP in District 1. See App. 355–356, 363–364, 472–474, 609–610, 619, 1044. They apparently reasoned that if, as Strickland held, § 2 does not require crossover districts (for groups insufficiently large under Gingles), then § 2 also cannot be satisfied by crossover districts (for groups in fact meeting Gingles ' size condition). In effect, they concluded, whenever a legislature can draw a majority-minority district, it must do so—even if a crossover district would also allow the minority group to elect its favored candidates. See 1 Tr. 21–22 (counsel's explanation that "the [S]tate interpreted" Strickland to say that, in order to protect African–Americans' electoral 306 strength and thus avoid § 2 liability, the BVAP in District 1 "need [ed] to be above 50 percent").

That idea, though, is at war with our § 2 jurisprudence —Strickland included. Under the State's view, the third Gingles condition is no condition at all, because even in the absence of effective white bloc-voting, a § 2 claim could succeed in a district (like the old District 1) with an under–50% BVAP. But this Court has made clear that unless each of the three Gingles prerequisites is established, "there neither has been a wrong nor can be a remedy." Growe, 507 U.S., at 41, 113 S.Ct. 1075. And Strickland, far from supporting North Carolina's view, underscored the necessity of demonstrating effective white bloc-voting to prevail in a § 2 vote-dilution suit. The plurality explained that "[i]n areas with substantial crossover voting," § 2 plaintiffs would not "be able to establish the third Gingles precondition" and so "majority-minority districts would not be required." 556 U.S., at 24, 129 S.Ct. 1231; see also ibid. (noting that States can "defend against alleged § 2 violations by pointing to crossover voting patterns and to effective crossover districts"). Thus, North Carolina's belief that it was compelled to redraw District 1 (a successful crossover district) as a majority-minority district rested not on a "strong basis in evidence," but instead on a pure error of law. Alabama, 575 U.S., at ——, 135 S.Ct., at 1274.

[19] In sum: Although States enjoy leeway to take race-based actions reasonably judged necessary under a proper interpretation of the VRA, that latitude cannot rescue District 1. We by no means "insist that a state legislature, when redistricting, determine precisely what percent minority population [§ 2 of the VRA] demands." Ibid. But neither will we approve a racial gerrymander whose necessity is supported by no evidence and whose raison d'être is a legal mistake. Accordingly, we uphold the District Court's conclusion that North Carolina's use of race as the predominant factor in designing District 1 does not withstand strict scrutiny.

307 IV

[20] We now look west to District 12, making its fifth(!) appearance before this Court. This time, the district's legality turns, and turns solely, on which of two possible reasons predominantly explains its most recent reconfiguration. The plaintiffs contended at trial that the General *1473 Assembly chose voters for District 12, as for District 1, because of their race; more particularly, they urged that the Assembly intentionally increased District 12's BVAP in the name of ensuring preclearance under the VRA's § 5. But North Carolina declined to mount any defense (similar to the one we have just considered for District 1) that § 5's requirements in fact justified race-based changes to District 12—perhaps because § 5 could not reasonably be understood to have done so, see n. 10, infra. Instead, the State altogether denied that racial considerations accounted for (or, indeed, played the slightest role in) District 12's redesign. According to the State's version of events, Senator Rucho, Representative Lewis, and Dr. Hofeller moved voters in and out of the district as part of a "strictly" political gerrymander, without regard to race. 6 Record 1011. The mapmakers drew their lines, in other words, to "pack" District

12 with Democrats, not African–Americans. After hearing evidence supporting both parties' accounts, the District Court accepted the plaintiffs'.[6]

308 Getting to the bottom of a dispute like this one poses special challenges for a trial court. In the more usual case alleging a racial gerrymander—where no one has raised a partisanship defense—the court can make real headway by exploring the challenged district's conformity to traditional districting principles, such as compactness and respect for county lines. In Shaw II, for example, this Court emphasized the "highly irregular" shape of then-District 12 in concluding that race predominated in its design. 517 U.S., at 905, 116 S.Ct. 1894 (internal quotation marks omitted). But such evidence loses much of its value when the State asserts partisanship as a defense, because a bizarre shape—as of the new District 12—can arise from a "political motivation" as well as a racial one. Cromartie I, 526 U.S., at 547, n. 3, 119 S.Ct. 1545. And crucially, political and racial reasons are capable of yielding similar oddities in a district's boundaries. That is because, of course, "racial identification is highly correlated with political affiliation." Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 243, 121 S.Ct. 1452. As a result of those redistricting realities, a trial court has a formidable task: It must make "a sensitive inquiry" into all "circumstantial and direct evidence of intent" to assess whether the plaintiffs have managed to disentangle race from politics and prove that the former drove a district's lines. Cromartie I, 526 U.S., at 546, 119 S.Ct. 1545 (internal quotation marks omitted).[7]

*1474 309 [21] Our job is different—and generally easier. As described earlier, we review a district court's finding as to racial predominance only for clear error, except when the court made a legal mistake. See supra, at 1464 – 1465. Under that standard of review, we affirm the court's finding so long as it is "plausible"; we reverse only when "left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Anderson, 470 U.S., at 573–574, 105 S.Ct. 1504; see supra, at 1465. And in deciding which side of that line to come down on, we give singular deference to a trial court's judgments about the credibility of witnesses. See Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 52(a)(6). That is proper, we have explained, because the various cues that "bear so heavily on the listener's understanding of and belief in what is said" are lost on an appellate court later sifting through a paper record. Anderson, 470 U.S., at 575, 105 S.Ct. 1504.[8]

In light of those principles, we uphold the District Court's finding of racial predominance respecting District 12. The evidence offered at trial, including live witness testimony subject to credibility determinations, adequately supports 310 the conclusion that race, not politics, accounted for the district's reconfiguration. And no error of law infected that judgment: Contrary to North Carolina's view, the District Court had no call to dismiss this challenge just because the plaintiffs did not proffer an alternative design for District 12 as circumstantial evidence of the legislature's intent.

A

Begin with some facts and figures, showing how the redistricting of District 12 affected its racial composition. As explained above, District 12 (unlike District 1) was approximately the right size as it was: North Carolina did not—indeed, could not—much change its total population. See supra, at 1466. But by further slimming the district and adding a couple of knobs to its snakelike body (including in Guilford County), the General Assembly incorporated tens of thousands of new voters and pushed out tens of thousands of old ones. And those changes followed racial lines: To be specific, the new District 12 had 35,000 more African–Americans of voting age and 50,000 fewer whites of that age. (The difference was made up of voters from other racial categories.) See *1475 ibid. Those voter exchanges produced a sizable jump in the district's BVAP, from 43.8% to 50.7%. See ibid. The Assembly thus turned District 12 (as it did District 1, see supra, at 1468 – 1469) into a majority-minority district.

As the plaintiffs pointed out at trial, Rucho and Lewis had publicly stated that racial considerations lay behind District 12's augmented BVAP. In a release issued along with their draft districting plan, the two legislators ascribed that change to the need to achieve preclearance of the plan under § 5 of the VRA. See App. 358. At that time, § 5 covered Guilford County and thus prohibited any "retrogression in the [electoral] position of racial minorities" there. Beer, 425 U.S., at 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357; see 31 Fed.Reg. 5081 (1966). And part of Guilford County lay within District 12, which meant that the Department of Justice would closely scrutinize that district's 311 new lines. In light of those facts, Rucho and Lewis wrote: "Because of the presence of Guilford County in the Twelfth District, we have drawn our proposed Twelfth District at a [BVAP] level that is above the percentage of [BVAP] found in the current Twelfth District." App. 358. According to the two legislators, that race-based "measure w[ould] ensure preclearance of the plan." Ibid.

Thus, the District Court found, Rucho's and Lewis's own account "evince[d] intentionality" as to District 12's racial composition: Because of the VRA, they increased the number of African–Americans. 159 F.Supp.3d, at 617.

Hofeller confirmed that intent in both deposition testimony and an expert report. Before the redistricting, Hofeller testified, some black residents of Guilford County fell within District 12 while others fell within neighboring District 13. The legislators, he continued, "decided to reunite the black community in Guilford County into the Twelfth." App. 558; see id., at 530–531. Why? Hofeller responded, in language the District Court emphasized: "[I]n order to be cautious and draw a plan that would pass muster under the Voting Rights Act." Id., at 558; see 159 F.Supp.3d, at 619. Likewise, Hofeller's expert report highlighted the role of the VRA in altering District 12's lines. "[M]indful that Guilford County was covered" by § 5, Hofeller explained, the legislature "determined that it was prudent to reunify [the county's] African–American community" into District 12. App. 1103. That change caused the district's compactness to decrease (in expert-speak, it "lowered the Reock Score"), but that was a sacrifice well worth making: It would "avoid the possibility of a[VRA] charge" that would "inhibit [ ] preclearance." Ibid.

The State's preclearance submission to the Justice Department indicated a similar determination to concentrate black voters in District 12. "One of the concerns of the Redistricting Chairs," North Carolina there noted, had to do with the Justice Department's years-old objection to "a failure by 312 the State to create a second majority minority district" (that is, in addition to District 1). Id., at 478. The submission then went on to explain that after considering alternatives, the redistricters had designed a version of District 12 that would raise its BVAP to 50.7%. Thus, concluded the State, the new District 12 "increases[ ] the African–American community's ability to elect their candidate of choice." Id., at 479. In the District Court's view, that passage once again indicated that making District 12 majority-minority was no "mere coincidence," but a deliberate attempt to avoid perceived obstacles to preclearance. 159 F.Supp.3d, at 617.[9]

*1476 And still there was more: Perhaps the most dramatic testimony in the trial came when Congressman Mel Watt (who had represented District 12 for some 20 years) recounted a conversation he had with Rucho in 2011 about the district's future make-up. According to Watt, Rucho said that "his leadership had told him that he had to ramp the minority percentage in [District 12] up to over 50 percent to comply with the Voting Rights Law." App. 2369; see id., at 2393. And further, that it would then be Rucho's "job to go and convince the African–American community" that such a racial target "made sense" under the Act. Ibid.; see id., at 2369.[10] The District Court credited Watt's testimony about 313 the conversation, citing his courtroom demeanor and "consistent recollection" under "probing cross-examination." 159 F.Supp.3d, at 617–618.[11] In the court's view, Watt's account was of a piece with all the other evidence—including the redistricters' on-the-nose attainment of a 50% BVAP—indicating that the General Assembly, in the name of VRA compliance, deliberately redrew District 12 as a majority-minority district. See id., at 618.[12]

The State's contrary story—that politics alone drove decisionmaking—came into the trial mostly through Hofeller's testimony. Hofeller explained that Rucho and Lewis instructed him, first and foremost, to make the map as a whole "more favorable to Republican candidates." App. 2682. One agreed-on stratagem in that effort was to pack the historically Democratic District 12 with even more Democratic voters, thus leaving surrounding districts more reliably Republican. See id., at 2682–2683, 2696–2697. To that end, Hofeller recounted, he drew District 12's new boundaries based on political data—specifically, the voting behavior of precincts in the 2008 Presidential election between Barack Obama and John McCain. See id., at 2701–2702. Indeed, he claimed, he displayed only this data, and no racial data, 314 on his computer screen while mapping the district. See id., at 2721. In part of his testimony, Hofeller further stated that the Obama–McCain election data explained *1477 (among other things) his incorporation of the black, but not the white, parts of Guilford County then located in District 13. See id., at 2824. Only after he drew a politics-based line between those adjacent areas, Hofeller testified, did he "check[ ]" the racial data and "f[ind] out" that the resulting configuration of District 12 "did not have a[§ 5] issue." Id., at 2822.

The District Court, however, disbelieved Hofeller's asserted indifference to the new district's racial composition. The court recalled Hofeller's contrary deposition testimony—his statement (repeated in only slightly different words in his expert report) that Rucho and Lewis "decided" to shift African–American voters into District 12 "in order to" ensure preclearance under § 5. See 159 F.Supp.3d, at 619–620; App. 558. And the court explained that even at trial, Hofeller had given testimony that undermined his "blame it on politics" claim. Right after asserting that Rucho and Lewis had told him "[not] to use race" in designing District 12, Hofeller added a qualification: "except perhaps with regard to Guilford County." Id., at 2791; see id., at 2790. As the District Court understood, that is the kind of "exception" that goes pretty far toward swallowing the rule. District 12 saw a net increase of more than 25,000 black voters in Guilford County, relative to a net gain of fewer than 35,000 across the district: So the newly added parts of that county played a major role in pushing the district's BVAP over 50%. See id., at 384, 500–502.[13] The District 315 Court came away from Hofeller's self-contradictory testimony unpersuaded that this decisive influx of black voters was an accident. Whether the racial make-up of the county was displayed on his computer screen or just fixed in his head, the court thought, Hofeller's denial of race-based districting "r[ang] hollow." 159 F.Supp.3d, at 620, n. 8.

Finally, an expert report by Dr. Stephen Ansolabehere lent circumstantial support to the plaintiffs' race-not-politics case. Ansolabehere looked at the six counties overlapping with District 12—essentially the region from which the mapmakers could have drawn the district's population. The question he asked was: Who from those counties actually ended up in District 12? The answer he found was: Only 16% of the region's white registered voters, but 64% of the black ones. See App. 321–322. Ansolabehere next controlled for party registration, but discovered that doing so made essentially no difference: For example, only 18% of the region's white Democrats wound up in District 12, whereas 65% of the black Democrats did. See id., at 332. The upshot was that, regardless of party, a black voter was three to four times more likely than a white voter to cast his ballot within District 12's borders. See ibid. Those stark disparities led Ansolabehere to conclude that "race, and not party," was "the dominant factor" in District 12's design. Id., at 337.[14] His report, *1478 as the District Court held, thus tended to 316 confirm the plaintiffs' direct evidence of racial predominance. See 159 F.Supp.3d, at 620–621.

The District Court's assessment that all this evidence proved racial predominance clears the bar of clear error review. The court emphasized that the districting plan's own architects had repeatedly described the influx of African–Americans into District 12 as a § 5 compliance measure, not a side-effect of political gerrymandering. And those contemporaneous descriptions comported with the court's credibility determinations about the trial testimony—that Watt told the truth when he recounted Rucho's resolve to hit a majority-BVAP target; and conversely that Hofeller skirted the truth (especially as to Guilford County) when he claimed to have followed only race-blind criteria in drawing district lines. We cannot disrespect such credibility judgments. See Anderson, 470 U.S., at 575, 105 S.Ct. 1504 (A choice to believe "one of two or more witnesses, each of whom has told a coherent and facially plausible story that is not contradicted by extrinsic evidence," can "virtually never be clear error"). And more generally, we will not take it upon ourselves to weigh the trial evidence as if we were the first to hear it. See id., at 573, 105 S.Ct. 1504 (A "reviewing court oversteps" under Rule 52(a) "if it undertakes to duplicate the role of the lower court"). No doubt other interpretations of that evidence were permissible. Maybe we would have evaluated the testimony differently 317 had we presided over the trial; or then again, maybe we would not have. Either way—and it is only this which matters—we are far from having a "definite and firm conviction" that the District Court made a mistake in concluding from the record before it that racial considerations predominated in District 12's design.

B

The State mounts a final, legal rather than factual, attack on the District Court's finding of racial predominance. When race and politics are competing explanations of a district's lines, argues North Carolina, the party challenging the district must introduce a particular kind of circumstantial evidence: "an alternative [map] that achieves the legislature's political objectives while improving racial balance." Brief for Appellants 31 (emphasis deleted). That is true, the State says, irrespective of what other evidence is in the case—so even if the plaintiff offers powerful direct proof that the legislature adopted the map it did for racial reasons. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 8. Because the plaintiffs here (as all agree) did not present such a counter-map, *1479 North Carolina concludes that they cannot prevail. The dissent echoes that argument. See post, at 1488 – 1491.

We have no doubt that an alternative districting plan, of the kind North Carolina describes, can serve as key evidence in a race-versus-politics dispute. One, often highly persuasive way to disprove a State's contention that politics drove a district's lines is to show that the legislature had the capacity to accomplish all its partisan goals without moving so many members of a minority group into the district. If you were really sorting by political behavior instead of skin color (so the argument goes) you would have done—or, at least, could just as well have done—this. Such would-have, could-have, and (to round out the set) should-have arguments are a familiar means of undermining a claim that an action was based on a permissible, rather than a prohibited, ground. 318 See, e.g., Miller–El v. Dretke, 545 U.S. 231, 249, 125 S.Ct. 2317, 162 L.Ed.2d 196 (2005) ("If that were the [real] explanation for striking [juror] Warren[,] the prosecutors should have struck [juror] Jenkins" too).

But they are hardly the only means. Suppose that the plaintiff in a dispute like this one introduced scores of leaked emails from state officials instructing their mapmaker to pack as many black voters as possible into a district, or telling him to make sure its BVAP hit 75%. Based on such evidence, a court could find that racial rather than political factors predominated in a district's design, with or without an alternative map. And so too in cases lacking that kind of smoking gun, as long as the evidence offered satisfies the plaintiff's burden of proof. In Bush v. Vera, for example, this Court upheld a finding of racial predominance based on "substantial direct evidence of the legislature's racial motivations"—including credible testimony from political figures and statements made in a § 5 preclearance submission—plus circumstantial evidence that redistricters had access to racial, but not political, data at the "block-by-block level" needed to explain their "intricate" designs. See 517 U.S., at 960–963, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (plurality opinion). Not a single Member of the Court thought that the absence of a counter-map made any difference. Similarly, it does not matter in this case, where the plaintiffs' introduction of mostly direct and some circumstantial evidence—documents issued in the redistricting process, testimony of government officials, expert analysis of demographic patterns—gave the District Court a sufficient basis, sans any map, to resolve the race-or-politics question.

[22] A plaintiff's task, in other words, is simply to persuade the trial court—without any special evidentiary prerequisite—that race (not politics) was the "predominant consideration in deciding to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Alabama, 575 U.S., at ——, 135 S.Ct., at 1265 (internal quotation marks omitted); cf. Bethune–Hill, 580 U.S., at ——, ——, 137 S.Ct., at 798, 799 (rejecting a similar effort to elevate one form of "persuasive circumstantial evidence" in a dispute respecting 319 racial predominance to a "mandatory precondition" or "threshold requirement" of proof). That burden of proof, we have often held, is "demanding." E.g., Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 241, 121 S.Ct. 1452. And because that is so, a plaintiff will sometimes need an alternative map, as a practical matter, to make his case. But in no area of our equal protection law have we forced plaintiffs to submit one particular form of proof to prevail. See Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266–268, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977) (offering a varied and non-exhaustive list of "subjects *1480 of proper inquiry in determining whether racially discriminatory intent existed"). Nor would it make sense to do so here. The Equal Protection Clause prohibits the unjustified drawing of district lines based on race. An alternative map is merely an evidentiary tool to show that such a substantive violation has occurred; neither its presence nor its absence can itself resolve a racial gerrymandering claim.[15]

320 North Carolina insists, however, that we have already said to the contrary—more particularly, that our decision in Cromartie II imposed a non-negotiable "alternative-map requirement." Brief for Appellants 31. As the State observes, Cromartie II reversed as clearly erroneous a trial court's finding that race, rather than politics, predominated in the assignment of voters to an earlier incarnation of District 12. See 532 U.S., at 241, 121 S.Ct. 1452; supra, at 1465 – 1466. And as the State emphasizes, a part of our opinion faulted the Cromartie plaintiffs for failing to offer a convincing account of how the legislature could have accomplished its political goals other than through the map it chose. See 532 U.S., at 257–258, 121 S.Ct. 1452. We there stated:

> "In a case such as this one where majority-minority districts ... are at issue and where racial identification correlates highly with political affiliation, 333 the party attacking the legislatively drawn boundaries must show at the least that the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles. That party must also show that those districting alternatives would have brought about significantly greater racial balance." Id., at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

According to North Carolina, that passage alone settles this case, because it makes an alternative map "essential" to a finding that District 12 (a majority-minority district in which race and partisanship are correlated) was a racial gerrymander. Reply Brief 11. Once again, the dissent says the same. See post, at 1489.

321 But the reasoning of Cromartie II belies that reading. The Court's opinion nowhere *1481 attempts to explicate or justify the categorical rule that the State claims to find there. (Certainly the dissent's current defense of that rule, see post, at 1489 – 1491, was nowhere in evidence.) And given the strangeness of that rule—which would treat a mere form of evidence as the very substance of a constitutional claim, see supra, at 1478 – 1480—we cannot think that the Court adopted it without any explanation. Still more, the entire thrust of the Cromartie II opinion runs counter to an inflexible counter-map requirement. If the Court had adopted that rule, it would have had no need to weigh each piece of evidence in the case and determine whether, taken together, they were "adequate" to show "the predominance of race in the legislature's line-drawing process." 532 U.S., at 243–244, 121 S.Ct. 1452. But that is exactly what Cromartie II did, over a span of 20 pages and in exhaustive detail. Item by item, the Court discussed and dismantled the supposed proof, both direct and circumstantial, of race-based redistricting. All that careful analysis would have been superfluous—that dogged effort wasted—if the Court viewed the absence or inadequacy of a single form of evidence as necessarily dooming a gerrymandering claim.

Rightly understood, the passage from Cromartie II had a different and narrower point, arising from and reflecting the evidence offered in that case. The direct evidence of a racial gerrymander, we thought, was extremely weak: We said of one piece that it "says little or nothing about whether race played a predominant role" in drawing district lines; we said of another that it "is less persuasive than the kinds of direct evidence we have found significant in other redistricting cases." Id., at 253–254, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (emphasis deleted). Nor did the report of the plaintiffs' expert impress us overmuch: In our view, it "offer[ed] little insight into the legislature's true motive." Id., at 248, 121 S.Ct. 1452. That left a set of arguments of the would-have-could-have variety. For example, the plaintiffs 322 offered several maps purporting to "show how the legislature might have swapped" some mostly black and mostly white precincts to obtain greater racial balance "without harming [the legislature's] political objective." Id., at 255, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (internal quotation marks omitted). But the Court determined that none of those proposed exchanges would have worked as advertised—essentially, that the plaintiffs' "you could have redistricted differently" arguments failed on their own terms. See id., at 254–257, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Hence emerged the demand quoted above, for maps that would actually show what the plaintiffs' had not. In a case like Cromartie II—that is, one in which the plaintiffs had meager direct evidence of a racial gerrymander and needed to rely on evidence of forgone alternatives—only maps of that kind could carry the day. Id., at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

But this case is most unlike Cromartie II, even though it involves the same electoral district some twenty years on. This case turned not on the possibility of creating more optimally constructed districts, but on direct evidence of the General Assembly's intent in creating the actual District 12, including many hours of trial testimony subject to credibility determinations. That evidence, the District Court plausibly found, itself satisfied the plaintiffs' burden of debunking North Carolina's "it was really politics" defense; there was no need for an alternative map to do the same job. And we pay our precedents no respect when we extend them far beyond the circumstances for which they were designed.

V

Applying a clear error standard, we uphold the District Court's conclusions that *1482 racial considerations predominated in designing both District 1 and District 12. For District 12, that is all we must do, because North Carolina has made no attempt to justify race-based districting there. For District 1, we further uphold the District Court's decision that § 2 of the VRA gave North Carolina no good reason to reshuffle 323 voters because of their race. We accordingly affirm the judgment of the District Court.

It is so ordered.

Justice GORSUCH took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

APPENDIX

325

Congressional District 1 (Enacted 2011)

326

Congressional District 12 (Enacted 2011)

*1485 Justice THOMAS, concurring.

327 I join the opinion of the Court because it correctly applies our precedents under the Constitution and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), 52 U.S.C. § 10301 et seq. I write briefly to explain the additional grounds on which I would affirm the three-judge District Court and to note my agreement, in particular, with the Court's clear-error analysis.

As to District 1, I think North Carolina's concession that it created the district as a majority-black district is by itself sufficient to trigger strict scrutiny. See Brief for Appellants 44; see also, e.g., Bethune–Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. ——, —— – ——, 137 S.Ct. 788, 803–804, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). I also think that North Carolina cannot satisfy strict scrutiny based on its efforts to comply with § 2 of the VRA. See ante, at 1469. In my view, § 2 does not apply to redistricting and therefore cannot justify a racial gerrymander. See *1486 Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 922–923, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment).

As to District 12, I agree with the Court that the District Court did not clearly err when it determined that race was North Carolina's predominant motive in drawing the district. See ante, at 1474. This is the same conclusion I reached when we last reviewed District 12. Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 267, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (Cromartie II) (dissenting opinion). The Court reached the contrary conclusion in Cromartie II only by misapplying our deferential standard for reviewing factual findings. See id., at 259–262, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Today's decision does not repeat Cromartie II 's error, and indeed it confines that case to its particular facts. It thus represents a welcome course correction to this Court's application of the clear-error standard.

Justice ALITO, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and Justice KENNEDY join, concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part.

A precedent of this Court should not be treated like a disposable household item—say, a paper plate or napkin—to be 328 used once and then tossed in the trash. But that is what the Court does today in its decision regarding North Carolina's 12th Congressional District: The Court junks a rule adopted in a prior, remarkably similar challenge to this very same congressional district.

In Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (Cromartie II), the Court considered the constitutionality of the version of District 12 that was adopted in 1997. Id., at 238, 121 S.Ct. 1452. That district had the same basic shape as the district now before us, and the challengers argued that the legislature's predominant reason for adopting this configuration was race. Ibid. The State responded that its motive was not race but politics. Id., at 241, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Its objective, the State insisted, was to create a district in which the Democratic candidate would win. See ibid.; Brief for State Appellants in Easley v. Cromartie, O.T. 2000, Nos. 99–1864, 99–1865, p. 25. Rejecting that explanation, a three-judge court found that the legislature's predominant motive was racial, specifically to pack African–Americans into District 12. See Cromartie v. Hunt, 133 F.Supp.2d 407, 420 (E.D.N.C.2000). But this Court held that this finding of fact was clearly erroneous. Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 256, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

A critical factor in our analysis was the failure of those challenging the district to come forward with an alternative redistricting map that served the legislature's political objective as well as the challenged version without producing the same racial effects. Noting that race and party affiliation in North Carolina were "highly correlated," id., at 243, 121 S.Ct. 1452 we laid down this rule:

> "In a case such as this one ..., the party attacking the legislatively drawn boundaries must show at the least that the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles. 329 That party must also show that those districting alternatives would have brought about significantly greater racial balance. Appellees failed to make any such showing here." Id., at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

Now, District 12 is back before us. After the 2010 census, the North Carolina Legislature, with the Republicans in the majority, drew the present version of District 12. The challengers contend that this version violates equal protection because the predominant motive of the legislature *1487 was racial: to pack the district with African–American voters. The legislature responds that its objective was political: to pack the district with Democrats and thus to increase the chances of Republican candidates in neighboring districts.

You might think that the Cromartie II rule would be equally applicable in this case, which does not differ in any relevant particular, but the majority executes a stunning about-face. Now, the challengers' failure to produce an alternative map that meets the Cromartie II test is inconsequential. It simply "does not matter." Ante, at 1479.

This is not the treatment of precedent that state legislatures have the right to expect from this Court. The failure to produce an alternative map doomed the challengers in Cromartie II, and the same should be true now. Partisan gerrymandering is always unsavory, but that is not the issue here. The issue is whether District 12 was drawn predominantly because of race. The record shows that it was not.[1]

I

Under the Constitution, state legislatures have "the initial power to draw districts for federal elections." 330 Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 275, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158 L.Ed.2d 546 (2004) (plurality opinion).[2] This power, of course, must be exercised in conformity with the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. And because the Equal Protection Clause's "central mandate is racial neutrality in governmental decisionmaking," Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 904, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), "effort[s] to separate voters into different districts on the basis of race" must satisfy the rigors of strict scrutiny. Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 649, 653, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (Shaw I).

We have stressed, however, that courts are obligated to "exercise extraordinary caution in adjudicating claims that a State has drawn district lines on the basis of race." Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. "Federal-court review of districting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions," and "the good faith of a state legislature must be presumed." Id., at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. A legislature will "almost always be aware of racial demographics" during redistricting, but evidence of such awareness does not show that the legislature violated equal protection. Id., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Instead, the Court has held, "[r]ace must not simply have been a motivation for the drawing of a majority-minority district, but the predominant factor motivating the legislature's districting decision." Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 241, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted; emphasis in original).

This evidentiary burden "is a demanding one." Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, although "[t]he legislature's motivation is ... a factual question," Hunt v. Cromartie, 526

U.S. 541, 549, 119 S.Ct. 1545, 143 L.Ed.2d 731 (1999) (Cromartie I), an appellate court conducting clear-error review must always keep in mind the heavy evidentiary obligation 1488 borne by those challenging a districting plan. See Cromartie II, *331 supra, at 241, 257, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Recognizing "the intrusive potential of judicial intervention into the legislative realm," Miller, supra, at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475 we have warned that courts must be very cautious about imputing a racial motive to a State's redistricting plan.

II

That caution "is especially appropriate ... where the State has articulated a legitimate political explanation for its districting decision, and the voting population is one in which race and political affiliation are highly correlated." Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 242, 121 S.Ct. 1452. We have repeatedly acknowledged the problem of distinguishing between racial and political motivations in the redistricting context. See id., at 242, 257–258, 121 S.Ct. 1452; Cromartie I, supra, at 551–552, 119 S.Ct. 1545; Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 967–968, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion).

The problem arises from the confluence of two factors. The first is the status under the Constitution of partisan gerrymandering. As we have acknowledged, "[p]olitics and political considerations are inseparable from districting and apportionment," Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 753, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 37 L.Ed.2d 298 (1973), and it is well known that state legislative majorities very often attempt to gain an electoral advantage through that process. See Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 129, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986). Partisan gerrymandering dates back to the founding, see Vieth, supra, at 274–276, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (plurality opinion), and while some might find it distasteful, "[o]ur prior decisions have made clear that a jurisdiction may engage in constitutional political gerrymandering, even if it so happens that the most loyal Democrats happen to be black Democrats and even if the State were conscious of that fact." Cromartie I, supra, at 551, 119 S.Ct. 1545 (emphasis in original); Vera, supra, at 964, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (plurality opinion).

The second factor is that "racial identification is highly correlated with political affiliation" in many jurisdictions. Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 243, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (describing correlation in North Carolina). This phenomenon makes it difficult to distinguish *332 between political and race-based decisionmaking. If around 90% of African–American voters cast their ballots for the Democratic candidate, as they have in recent elections,[3] a plan that packs Democratic voters will look very much like a plans that packs African–American voters. "[A] legislature may, by placing reliable Democratic precincts within a district without regard to race, end up with a district containing more heavily African–American precincts, but the reasons would be political rather than racial." Id., at 245, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

A

We addressed this knotty problem in Cromartie II, which, as noted, came to us 1489 after the District Court had held a trial and found as a fact that the legislature's predominant reason for drawing District 12 was race, not politics. Id., at 239–241, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Our review for clear error in that case did not exhibit the same diffidence as today's decision. We carefully examined each piece of direct and circumstantial evidence on which the District Court had relied and conceded that this evidence provided support for the court's finding. Id., at 257, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Then, at the end of our opinion, we stated:

> "We can put the matter more generally as follows: In a case such as this one where majority-minority districts (or the approximate equivalent) are at issue and where racial identification correlates highly with political affiliation, the party attacking the legislatively drawn boundaries must show at the least that the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles. That party must also show that those districting alternatives would have brought about significantly greater racial balance." Id., at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452.

Because the plaintiffs had "failed to make any such showing," we held that the District Court had clearly erred in finding that race predominated in drawing District 12. Ibid.

Cromartie II plainly meant to establish a rule for use in a broad class of cases and not a rule to be employed one time only. We stated that we were "put [ting] the matter more generally" and were describing what must be shown in cases "where majority-minority districts (or the approximate equivalent) are at issue and where racial identification correlates highly with political affiliation." Ibid. We identified who would carry the burden of the new rule ("the party attacking the legislatively drawn boundaries") and what that party must show (that "the legislature could have achieved its legitimate political objectives in alternative ways that are comparably consistent with traditional districting principles" while achieving "significantly greater racial balance"). Ibid. And we reversed the finding of racial predominance due to the plaintiffs' failure to carry the burden established by this evidentiary rule. Ibid.

Here, too, the plaintiffs failed to carry that burden. In this case, as in Cromartie II, the plaintiffs allege a racial gerrymander, and the State's defense is that political motives explain District 12's boundaries. In such a case, Cromartie II instructed, plaintiffs must submit an alternative redistricting map demonstrating that the legislature could have achieved its political goals without the racial effects giving rise to the racial gerrymandering allegation. But in spite of this instruction, plaintiffs in this case failed to submit such a 334 map.[4] See Brief for Appellees 31–36. Based on what we said in Cromartie II about the same type of claim involving the same congressional district, reversal should be a foregone conclusion. It turns out, however, that the Cromartie II rule was good for one use only. Even in a case involving the very same district, it is tossed aside.

B

The alternative-map requirement deserves better. It is a logical response to *1490 the difficult problem of distinguishing between racial and political motivations when race and political party preference closely correlate.

This is a problem with serious institutional and federalism implications. When a federal court says that race was a legislature's predominant purpose in drawing a district, it accuses the legislature of "offensive and demeaning" conduct. Miller, 515 U.S., at 912, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Indeed, we have said that racial gerrymanders "bea[r] an uncomfortable resemblance to political apartheid." Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 647, 113 S.Ct. 2816. That is a grave accusation to level against a state legislature.

In addition, "[f]ederal-court review of districting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions" because "[i]t is well settled that reapportionment is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State." Miller, supra, at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 242, 121 S.Ct. 1452. When a federal court finds that race predominated in the redistricting process, it inserts itself into that process. That is appropriate—indeed, constitutionally required—if the legislature truly did draw district boundaries on the basis of race. But if a court mistakes a political gerrymander for a racial gerrymander, it illegitimately invades a traditional domain of state authority, 335 usurping the role of a State's elected representatives. This does violence to both the proper role of the Judiciary and the powers reserved to the States under the Constitution.

There is a final, often-unstated danger where race and politics correlate: that the federal courts will be transformed into weapons of political warfare. Unless courts "exercise extraordinary caution" in distinguishing race-based redistricting from politics-based redistricting, Miller, supra, at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475 they will invite the losers in the redistricting process to seek to obtain in court what they could not achieve in the political arena. If the majority party draws districts to favor itself, the minority party can deny the majority its political victory by prevailing on a racial gerrymandering claim. Even if the minority party loses in court, it can exact a heavy price by using the judicial process to engage in political trench warfare for years on end.

Although I do not imply that this is what occurred here, this case does reflect what litigation of this sort can look like. This is the fifth time that North Carolina's 12th Congressional District has come before this Court since 1993, and we have almost reached a new redistricting cycle without any certainty as to the constitutionality of North Carolina's current redistricting map. Given these dangers, Cromartie II was justified in crafting an evidentiary rule to prevent false positives.[5]

C

The majority nevertheless absolves the challengers of their failure to submit an alternative map. It argues that an alternative map cannot be "the only means" of proving 336 racial predominance, and it concludes from this that an alternative map "does not matter in this case." Ante, at 1479 (emphasis in original). But even if *1491 there are cases in which a plaintiff could prove a racial gerrymandering claim without an alternative map, they would be exceptional ones in which the evidence of racial predominance is overwhelming. This most definitely is not one of those cases, see Part III–C, infra, and the plaintiffs' failure to produce an alternative map mandates reversal. Moreover, even in an exceptional case, the absence of such a map would still be strong evidence that a district's boundaries were determined by politics rather than race.[6] The absence of a map would "matter." Cf. ante, at 1479.

The majority questions the legitimacy of the alternative-map requirement, ante, at 1478 – 1480, and n. 15, but the rule is a sound one. It rests on familiar principles regarding the allocation of the burdens of production and persuasion and the assessment of evidence. First, in accordance with the general rule in civil cases, plaintiffs in a case like this bear the burden of proving that the legislature's motive was unconstitutional. Second, what must be shown is not simply that race played a part in the districting process but that it played the predominant role. Third, a party challenging a districting plan must overcome the strong presumption that the plan was drawn for constitutionally permissible reasons. Miller, supra, at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475. Fourth, when those responsible for adopting a challenged plan contend that the plan was devised for partisan political ends, they are making an admission that may not sit well with voters, so the explanation should not be lightly dismissed. Cf. Fed. Rule Evid. 804(b)(3). And finally, the Cromartie II rule takes into account the difficulty of proving a negative.

337 For challengers like those in the present case, producing a map that meets the Cromartie II test should not be hard if the predominant reason for a challenged plan really was race and not politics. Plaintiffs mounting a challenge to a districting plan are almost always sophisticated litigants who have the assistance of experts, and that is certainly true in the present case. Today, an expert with a computer can easily churn out redistricting maps that control for any number of specified criteria, including prior voting patterns and political party registration. Therefore, if it is indeed possible to find a map that meets the Cromartie II test, it should not be too hard for the challengers to do so. The State, on the other hand, cannot prove that no map meeting the Cromartie II test can be drawn. Even if a State submits, say, 100 alternative maps that fail the test, that would not prove that no such map could pass it. The relative ease with which the opposing parties can gather evidence is a familiar consideration in allocating the burden of production. See 1 C. Mueller & L. Kirkpatrick, Federal Evidence § 63, p. 316 (2d ed. 1994); 21 C. Wright & K. Graham, Federal Practice and Procedure § 5122, pp. 556–557 (1977).

III

Even if we set aside the challengers' failure to submit an alternative map, the District Court's finding that race predominated in the drawing of District 12 is clearly erroneous. The State offered strong and coherent evidence that politics, not race, was the legislature's predominant aim, and the evidence supporting the District Court's contrary finding is weak and manifestly inadequate in light of the high *1492 evidentiary standard that our cases require challengers to meet in order to prove racial predominance.[7]

338 My analysis will proceed in three steps. First, I will discuss what the legislature's mapmaker did and why this approach is entirely consistent with his stated political objectives. Then, I will explain why this approach inevitably had the racial effect to which the challengers object. Finally, I will address the evidence of racial predominance on which the majority relies and show why it is inadequate to sustain the District Court's judgment.

A

In order to understand the mapmaker's approach, the first element to be kept in mind is that the basic shape of District 12 was legitimately taken as a given. When a new census requires redistricting, it is a common practice to start with the plan used in the prior map and to change the boundaries of the prior districts only as needed to comply with the one-person, one-vote mandate and to achieve other desired ends. This approach honors settled expectations and, if the prior plan survived legal challenge, minimizes the risk that the new plan will be overturned. And that is the approach taken by the veteran mapmaker in the present case, Dr. Thomas Hofeller. App. 523 ("the normal starting point is always from the existing districts").

Dr. Hofeller began with the prior version of District 12 even though that version had a strange, serpentine shape. 339 Cromartie I, 526 U.S., at 544, 119 S.Ct. 1545; App. 1163. That design has a long history. It was first adopted in 1992, and subsequent redistricting plans have built on the 1992 plan. Ibid. In Cromartie II, we sustained the constitutionality of the 1997 version of District 12, which featured the same basic shape. See 532 U.S., at 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452. And retention of this same basic shape is not challenged in this case.[8]

Using the prior design as his starting point, Dr. Hofeller assumed that District 12 would remain a "strong Democratic distric[t]." App. 521. He stated that he drew "the [overall redistricting] plan to ... have an increased number of competitive districts for GOP candidates," id., at 520, and that he therefore moved more Democratic voters into District 12 in order to "increase Republican opportunities in the surrounding districts," id., at 1606.

*1493 Under the map now before us, District 12 is bordered by four districts.[9] Running counterclockwise, they are: District 5 to the northwest; District 9 to the southwest; District 8 to the southeast; and District 6 to the northeast. See Appendix, ante. According to Dr. Hofeller, the aim was to make these four districts—considered as a whole—more secure for Republicans. App. 1606, 2696.

To do this, Dr. Hofeller set out in search of pockets of Democratic voters that could be moved into District 12 from areas adjoining or very close to District 12's prior boundaries. Of the six counties through which District 12 passes, the three most heavily Democratic (and also the most populous) are Forsyth, Guilford, and Mecklenburg, which contain the major population centers of Winston–Salem, Greensboro, and Charlotte, respectively. See 7 Record 480–482; App. 1141. As a measure of voting preferences, Dr. Hofeller used 340 the results of the then-most recent Presidential election, i.e., the election of 2008. Id., at 1149, 2697, 2721–2722. In that election, these three counties voted strongly for the Democratic candidate, then-Senator Barack Obama, while the other three counties, Cabarrus, Davidson, and Rowan, all voted for the Republican candidate, Senator John McCain. See 4 Record 1341–1342.

Two of the three Democratic counties, Forsyth and Guilford, are located at the northern end of District 12, while the other Democratic county, Mecklenburg, is on the southern end. See Appendix, ante. The middle of the district (often called the "corridor") passes through the three more Republican-friendly counties—Cabarrus, Davidson, and Rowan. Ibid. Thus, if a mapmaker sat down to increase the proportion of Democrats in District 12 and to reduce the proportion in neighboring districts, the most obvious way to do that was to pull additional Democrats into the district from the north and south (the most populous and heavily Democratic counties) while shifting Republican voters out of the corridor.

That, in essence, is what Dr. Hofeller did—as the majority acknowledges. Ante, at 1466 (Dr. Hofeller "narrow[ed District 12's] already snakelike body while adding areas at either end"); App. 1150 (Table 1), 1163. Dr. Hofeller testified that he sought to shift parts of Mecklenburg County out of Districts 8 and 9 (in order to reduce the percentage of Democrats in these two districts) and that this required him to increase the coverage of Mecklenburg County in District 12. Id., at 1142–1143, 1607, 2753.

Dr. Hofeller testified that he also had political plans for the current map's District 6, which differed substantially from the version in the prior map. Dr. Hofeller wanted to improve the Republicans' prospects in this new district by minimizing its coverage of Guilford County's Democratic population. Id., at 1143, 1607, 2693, 2697, 2752. That also meant increasing the population of Guilford County Democrats in District 12. Id., at 1143, 1607, 2697.

341 This influx of Democratic voters from the two most populous counties in District 12 required shedding voters elsewhere in order to comply with this Court's mandate of one-person, one-vote, see Kirkpatrick v. Preisler, 394 U.S. 526, 530–531, 89 S.Ct. 1225, 22 L.Ed.2d 519 (1969),[10] and the population removed had to be added to a bordering district. App. 523. Parts of *1494 Davidson and Rowan Counties were therefore shifted to District 5, id., at 1143, 1150 (Table 1), but Dr. Hofeller testified that this would not have been sufficient to satisfy the one-person, one-vote standard, so he also had to move voters from heavily Democratic Forsyth County into District 5, id., at 1143, 2697, 2752–2753. Doing so did not undermine his political objective, he explained, because District 5 "was stronger [for Republicans] to begin with and could take those [Forsyth] Democratic precincts" without endangering Republican chances in the district. Id., at 2753; see also id., at 2697. The end result was that, under the new map now at issue, the three major counties in the north and south constitute a larger percentage of District 12's total population, while the corridor lost population. See id., at 1150 (Table 1), 2149 (Finding 187).

A comparison of the 2008 Presidential election vote under the old and new versions of the districts shows the effect of Dr. Hofeller's map. District 8 (which, of the four districts bordering District 12 under the 2011 map, was the most Democratic district) saw a drop of almost 11% in the Democratic vote under the new map. See 2 Record 354, 421. District 9 saw a drop in the percentage of registered Democrats, id., at 350, 417, although the vote percentage for the Democratic Presidential candidate remained essentially the same (increasing by 0.39%). Id., at 354, 421. District 5, which was heavily Republican under the prior map and was redrawn to absorb Democrats from Forsyth County, saw about a 7–point swing in favor of the Democratic candidate,

342 but it remained a strong Republican district. Ibid. New District 6 is less susceptible to comparison because its boundaries are completely different from the district bearing that number under the old plan, but the new District 6 was solidly Republican, with a Republican Presidential vote percentage of nearly 56%. Ibid. As stated by the state court that considered and rejected the same constitutional challenge now before us:

> "By increasing the number of Democratic voters in the 2011 Twelfth Congressional District located in Mecklenburg and Guilford Counties, the 2011 Congressional Plan created other districts that were more competitive for Republican candidates as compared to the 2001 versions of these districts...." App. 2150 (Finding 191).

The results of subsequent congressional elections show that Dr. Hofeller's plan achieved its goal. In 2010, prior to the adoption of the current plan, Democrats won 7 of the 13 districts, including District 8.[11] But by 2016, Republicans controlled 10 of the 13 districts, including District 8, and all the Republican candidates for the House of Representatives won their races with at least 56% of the vote.[12] In accordance with the map's design, the only Democratic seats remaining after 2016 were in Districts 1, 4, and 12. Id., at 521.

In sum, there is strong evidence in the record to support Dr. Hofeller's testimony that the changes made to the 2001 map were designed to maximize Republican opportunities.

343 B

I now turn to the connection between the mapmaker's strategy and the effect on *1495 the percentage of African–Americans in District 12.

As we recognized in Cromartie II, political party preference and race are highly correlated in North Carolina generally and in the area of Congressional District 12 in particular. App. 2022 (state trial court finding that "racial identification correlates highly with political affiliation" in North Carolina). The challenger's expert, Dr. Stephen Ansolabehere, corroborated this important point. Dr. Ansolabehere calculated the statewide correlation between race and voting in 2008[13] and found a correlation of 0.8, which is "very high." Id., at 342, 352 (Table 1). See also J. Levin, J. Fox, & D. Forde, Elementary Statistics in Social Research 370 (12th ed. 2014); R. Witte & J. Witte, Statistics 138 (10th ed. 2015).

In the area of District 12, the correlation is even higher. There, Dr. Ansolabehere found that the correlation "approach[ed] 1," App. 342, that is, almost complete overlap. These black Democrats also constitute a supermajority of Democrats in the area covered by the district. Under the 2001 version of District 12—which was drawn by Democrats and was never challenged as a racial gerrymander—black registered voters constituted 71.44% of Democrats in the district. 2 Record 350; see also App. 2145 (Finding 173).[14] 344 What this means is that a mapmaker seeking to pull Democrats into District 12 would unavoidably pull in a very large percentage of African–Americans.

The distribution of Democratic voters magnified this effect. Dr. Hofeller's plan required the identification of areas of Democratic strength that were near District 12's prior boundaries. Dr. Hofeller prepared maps showing the distribution of Democratic voters by precinct,[15] see id., at 1148–1149, 1176–1177, 1181, and those maps show that these voters were highly concentrated around the major urban areas of Winston–Salem (in Forsyth County), Greensboro (in Guilford County), and Charlotte (in Mecklenburg County). Dr. Ansolabehere, the challengers' expert, prepared maps showing the distribution of black registered voters in these same counties, see id., at 322–328; 1 Record 128–133, and a comparison of these two sets of maps reveals that the clusters of Democratic voters generally overlap with those of registered black voters. In other words, the population of nearby Democrats who could be moved into District 12 was heavily black.

*1496 The upshot is that, so long as the legislature chose to retain the basic shape of District 12 and to increase the number of Democrats in the district, it was inevitable that the Democrats brought in would be disproportionately black.

None of this should come as a surprise. After all, when the basic shape of District 12 was created after the 1990 census, the express goal of the North Carolina Legislature was to create a majority-minority district. See Shaw I, 509 U.S., at 633–636, 113 S.Ct. 2816. It has its unusual shape because it was 345 originally designed to capture pockets of black voters. See Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 905–906, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (Shaw II). Although the legislature has modified the district since then, see Cromartie I, 526 U.S., at 544, 119 S.Ct. 1545 (describing changes from the 1991 version to the 1997 version), "it retains its basic 'snakelike' shape and continues to track Interstate 85." Ibid.; 1 Record 35 (Appellees' Complaint) ("Congressional District 12 has existed in roughly its current form since 1992, when it was drawn as a majority African–American district ..."); see also App. 1163 (showing the 1997, 2001, and 2011 versions of District 12). The original design of the district was devised to ensure a high concentration of black voters, and as long as the basic design is retained (as it has been), one would expect that to continue.

While plaintiffs failed to offer any alternative map, Dr. Hofeller produced a map showing what District 12 would have looked like if his computer was programmed simply to maximize the Democratic vote percentage in the district, while still abiding by the requirement of one-person, one-vote. Id., at 1148. The result was a version of District 12 that is very similar to the version approved by the North Carolina Legislature. See id., at 1175; id., at 1615–1618. Indeed, this maximum-Democratic plan had a black voting age population of 50.73%, which is actually higher than District 12's black voting age population of 50.66%. Id., at 1154 (Table 5).

Thus, the increase in the black voting age population of District 12 is easily explained by a coherent (and generally successful) political strategy. Cromartie II, 532 U.S., at 245, 121 S.Ct. 1452 ("[A] legislature may, by placing reliable Democratic precincts within a district without regard to race, end up with a district containing more heavily African–American precincts, but the reasons would be political rather than racial").

Amazingly, a reader of the majority opinion (and the opinion of the District Court) would remain almost entirely ignorant of the legislature's political strategy and the relationship between that strategy and the racial composition of 346 District 12.[16] The majority's analysis is like Hamlet without the prince.[17]

*1497 C

The majority focuses almost all its attention on a few references to race by those responsible for the drafting and adoption of the redistricting plan. But the majority reads far too much into these references. First, what the plaintiffs had to prove was not simply that race played some role in the districting process but that it was the legislature's predominant consideration. Second, as I have explained, a court must exercise "extraordinary caution" before finding that a state legislature's predominant reason for a districting plan was racial. Miller, 515 U.S., at 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475. This means that comments should not be taken out of context and given the most sinister possible meaning. Third, the findings of the state courts in a virtually identical challenge to District 12 are entitled to respectful consideration. A North Carolina trial court, after hearing much the same evidence as the court below, found that the legislature's predominant motive was political, not racial. That decision was affirmed by the North Carolina Supreme Court. Dickson v. Rucho, 367 N.C. 542, 766 S.E.2d 238 (2014), vacated and remanded, 347 575 U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 1843, 191 L.Ed.2d 719 aff'd on remand, 368 N.C. 481, 781 S.E.2d 404 (2015), cert. pending, No. 16–24. Even if the judgment in the state case does not bar the present case under the doctrine of res judicata, see ante, at 1466 – 1468, the state-court finding illustrates the thinness of the plaintiffs' proof.

Finally, it must be kept in mind that references to race by those responsible for drawing or adopting a redistricting plan are not necessarily evidence that the plan was adopted for improper racial reasons. Under our precedents, it is unconstitutional for the government to consider race in almost any context, and therefore any mention of race by the decisionmakers may be cause for suspicion. We have said, however, that that is not so in the redistricting context. For one thing, a State like North Carolina that was either wholly or partially within the coverage of § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 could not redistrict without heeding that provision's prohibition against racial retrogression, see 52 U.S.C. § 10304(b); Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. ——, ——– ——, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1263–1263, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015), and therefore race had to be kept in mind. In addition, all legislatures must also take into account the possibility of a challenge under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act claiming that a plan illegally dilutes the voting strength of a minority community. See League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 425, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006). If a State ultimately concludes that it must take race into account in order to comply with the Voting Rights Act, it must show that it had a " 'strong basis in evidence' in support of the (race-based) choice that it has made." Alabama Legislative Black Caucus, supra, at ——, 135 S.Ct., at 1274. But those involved in the redistricting process may legitimately make statements about Voting Rights Act compliance before deciding that the Act does not provide a need for race-based districting. And it is understandable for such individuals to explain that a race-neutral plan happens to satisfy the criteria on which Voting Rights Act challengers might insist. In 348 short, because of the Voting Rights Act, consideration and discussion of the racial effects of a plan may be expected.

1

The June 17, 2011, Statement

I begin with a piece of evidence that the majority does not mention, namely, the very first item cited by the District Court in support of its racial-predominance finding. *1498 This evidence consisted of a June 17, 2001, statement by Senator Rucho and Representative Lewis, the state legislators who took the lead in the adoption of the current map. In that statement, Rucho and Lewis referred to "constructing [Voting Rights Act] majority black districts." App. 1025. Seizing upon the use of the plural term "districts," the court below seemed to think that it had found a smoking gun. Harris v. McCrory, 159 F.Supp.3d 600, 616 (M.D.N.C.2016). The State had insisted that its plan drew only one majority-minority congressional district, District 1, but since the June 17 statement "clearly refers to multiple districts that are now majority minority," ibid., the court below viewed the statement as telling evidence that an additional congressional district, presumably District 12, had been intentionally designed to be a majority-minority district and was thus based on race.

There is a glaring problem with this analysis: The June 17 statement was about state legislative districts, not federal congressional districts. See App. 1024–1033. The United States, as amicus curiae in support of plaintiffs, concedes that the District Court made a mistake by relying on the June 17 statement. Brief for United States 27, n. 13. The majority, by contrast, tries to ignore this error. But the District Court gave the June 17 statement pride-of-place in its opinion, mentioning it first in its analysis, and the District Court seemed to think that this evidence was particularly significant, stating that the reference to multiple districts was not "the result of happenstance, a mere slip of the 349 pen." 159 F.Supp.3d, at 616. The District Court's error shows a troubling lack of precision.

2

The § 5 Preclearance Request

Under § 5 of the Voting Rights Act, North Carolina requested preclearance from the Department of Justice shortly after the Legislature approved the new congressional plan. Id., at 608. In its preclearance application, the State noted that "[o]ne of the concerns of the Redistricting Chairs was that in 1992, the Justice Department had objected to the 1991 Congressional Plan because of a failure by the State to create a second majority minority district." App. 478. The application says that the Redistricting Chairs "sought input from Congressman [Mel] Watt[, the African–American incumbent who represented District 12,] regarding options for re-drawing his district," and that after this consultation, "the Chairs had the impression that Congressman Watt would oppose any redrawing of the Twelfth District ... as originally contemplated by the 1992 Justice Department objection." Ibid. The Chairs drew District 12 "[b]ased in part on this input from Congressman Watt." Id., at 478–479. Two sentences later in the same paragraph, the application observed that the black voting age population for District 12 went up from 43.77% to 50.66% and that therefore the district "maintains, and in fact increases, the African–American community's ability to elect their candidate of choice in District 12." Id., at 479.

According to the majority, this statement shows a "determination to concentrate black voters in District 12." Ante, at 1462. In fact, it shows no such thing. The statement explains that Senator Rucho and Representative Lewis decided not to construct District 12 as a majority-minority district—as the 1992 Justice Department had demanded—"[b]ased in part on" the input they received from Congressman Watt, 350 whom they thought "would oppose" drawing the district "as originally contemplated by the 1992 Justice Department objection." App. 478–479. If anything, *1499 this document cuts against a finding of racial predominance.

The statement's matter-of-fact reference to the increase in District 12's black voting age population hardly shows that the legislature altered District 12 for the purpose of causing this increase. An entirely natural interpretation is that the Redistricting Chairs simply reported this fact so that it would be before the Justice Department in the event that the Department had renewed Voting Rights Act concerns. Only by reading a great deal between the lines and adopting the most sinister possible interpretation can the statement be viewed as pointed evidence of a predominantly racial motive.

3

The Mel Watt Testimony

In both the District Court and the state trial court, Congressman Watt testified that, while the redistricting plan was being developed, Senator Rucho invited him to his home to discuss the new boundaries of District 12. Id., at 2368–2369, 1343–1344. According to Congressman Watt, Senator Rucho said that the Republican leadership wanted him to "ramp the 12th Congressional District up to over 50 percent black" because "they believed it was required ... by the Voting Rights Act." Id., at 1344, 2369, 2393. In the state proceedings, Senator Rucho denied making any such statement, id., at 1703, and another state legislator present at the meeting, Representative Ruth Samuelson, gave similar testimony, id., at 1698. Neither Senator Rucho nor Representative Samuelson testified in federal court (although their state court testimony was made part of the federal record). See id., at 2847. But the District Court credited Congressman Watt's testimony based on its assessment of his demeanor 351 and the consistency of his recollection, 159 F.Supp.3d, at 617–618, and I accept that credibility finding for purposes of our review.[18]

But even assuming that Congressman Watt's recollection was completely accurate, all that his testimony shows is that legislative leaders at one point in the process thought that they had to draw District 12 as a majority-minority district in order to comply with the Voting Rights Act; it does not show that they actually did draw District 12 with the goal of creating a majority-minority district. And as explained in the discussion of the preclearance request above, Senator Rucho and Representative Lewis stated that they ultimately turned away from the creation of a majority-minority district after consulting with Congressman Watt. "Based in part on this input from Congressman Watt," they said they decided not to draw the district as the 1992 Department of Justice had suggested—that is, as a majority-minority district. App. 478–479.

This account is fully consistent with Congressman Watt's testimony about his *1500 meeting with Senator Rucho. Congressman Watt noted that Senator Rucho was uncomfortable with the notion of increasing the black voting age population, id., at 2369, 2393, and Congressman Watt testified that he told Senator Rucho that he was opposed to the idea, 352 id., at 1345, 2369, 2393. So it makes sense that Senator Rucho was dissuaded from taking that course by Congressman Watt's reaction. And Dr. Hofeller consistently testified that he was never asked to meet a particular black voting age population target, see Part III–C–5, infra, and that the only data displayed on his screen when he drew District 12 was political data. See infra, at 1500, n. 19. Thus, Congressman Watt's testimony, even if taken at face value, is entirely consistent with what the preclearance request recounts: After initially contemplating the possibility of drawing District 12 as a majority-minority district, the legislative leadership met with Congressman Watt, who convinced them not to do so.

4

Dr. Hofeller's Statements About Guilford County

Under the prior map, both Guilford County and the Greensboro African–American community were divided between the 12th and 13th Districts. This had been done, Dr. Hofeller explained, "to make both the Old 12th and 13th Districts strongly Democratic." App. 1103; see also id., at 555, 2821; 1 Record 132–133 (showing racial demographics of Guilford precincts under 2001 and 2011 maps). But the Republican legislature wanted to make the area surrounding District 12 more Republican. The new map eliminated the old 13th District and created a new district bearing that number farther to the east. The territory to the north of Greensboro that had previously been in the 13th District was placed in a new district, District 6, which was constructed to be a Republican-friendly district, and the new map moved more of the Greensboro area into the new District 12. This move was entirely consistent with the legislature's stated goal of concentrating Democrats in the 12th District and making the surrounding districts hospitable to Republican candidates.

Dr. Hofeller testified that the placement of the Greensboro African–American community in the 12th District was the result of this political strategy. He stated that the portion 353 of Guilford County absorbed by District 12 "wasn't moved into CD 12 because it had a substantial black population. It was moved into CD 12 because it had a substantial Democratic political voting record...." App. 2824. And Dr. Hofeller maintained that he was never instructed to draw District 12 as a majority-minority district or to increase the district's black voting age population. See, e.g., id., at 520, 556–558, 1099, 1603–1604, 2682–2683, 2789. Instead, he testified that political considerations determined the boundaries of District 12 and that the only data displayed on his computer screen when he drew the challenged map was voting data from the 2008 Presidential election.[19] Id., at 1149, 2697, 2721–2722.

Dr. Hofeller acknowledged, however, that there had been concern about the possibility of a Voting Rights Act challenge *1501 to this treatment of the Greensboro African–American community. Guilford County was covered by § 5 of the Voting Rights Act, and as noted, § 5 prohibits retrogression. Under the old map, the Guilford County African–American community was split between the old District 13 and District 12, and in both of those districts, black voters were able to elect the candidates of their choice by allying with white Democratic voters. Under the new map, however, if the Greensboro black community had been split between District 12 and the new Republican-friendly District 6, the black voters in the latter district would be unlikely to elect the candidate of their choice. Placing the African–American community in District 12 avoided this consequence. Even Congressman Watt conceded that there were potential § 5 354 concerns relating to the black community in Guilford County. Id., at 2387–2388.

The thrust of many of Dr. Hofeller's statements about the treatment of Guilford County was that the reuniting of the Greensboro black community in District 12 was nothing more than a welcome byproduct of his political strategy. He testified that he first drew the district based on political considerations and then checked to ensure that Guilford County's black population was not fractured. Id., at 2822 ("[W]hen we checked it, we found that we did not have an issue in Guilford County with fracturing the black ... community"); see also id., at 556, 2821, 2823. This testimony is entirely innocuous.

There is no doubt, however, that Dr. Hofeller also made a few statements that may be read to imply that concern about Voting Rights Act litigation was part of the motivation for the treatment of Guilford County. He testified at trial that he "was instructed [not] to use race in any form except perhaps with regard to Guilford County." Id., at 2791 (emphasis added). See id., at 1103 (the legislature "determined that it was prudent to reunify the African–American community in Guilford County"); id., at 558 ("[I]t was decided to reunite the black community in Guilford County into the Twelfth").

These statements by Dr. Hofeller convinced the District Court that the drawing of District 12 was not a "purely ... politically driven affair." 159 F.Supp.3d, at 619. But in order to prevail, the plaintiffs had to show much more—that race was the predominant reason for the drawing of District 12, and these few bits of testimony fall far short of that showing.

Our decision in Cromartie II illustrates this point. In that case, the legislature's mapmaker made a statement that is remarkably similar to Dr. Hofeller's. Gerry Cohen, the "legislative staff member responsible for drafting districting plans," reported: " 'I have moved Greensboro Black community 355 into the 12th, and now need to take [about] 60,000 out of the 12th. I await your direction on this.' " 532 U.S., at 254, 121 S.Ct. 1452. This admission did not persuade the Court that the legislature's predominant motive was racial. The majority ignores this obvious parallel with Cromartie II.

Moreover, in an attempt to magnify the importance of the treatment of Guilford County, the majority plays games with statistics. It states that "District 12 saw a net increase of more than 25,000 black voters in Guilford County, relative to a net gain of fewer than 35,000 across the district: So the newly added parts of that county played a major role in pushing the district's BVAP over 50%." Ante, at 1477.

This is highly misleading. First, since the black voting age population of District 12 is just barely over 50%—specifically, 50.66%—almost any decision that increased the number of voting age blacks in District 12 could be said to have "played a *1502 major role in pushing the district's BVAP over 50%."

Second, the majority provides the total number of voting age blacks added to District 12 from Guilford County (approximately 25,000) alongside the total number of voting age blacks added to the district (approximately 35,000), and this has the effect of making Guilford County look like it is the overwhelming contributor to the district's net increase in black voting age population. In truth, Mecklenburg County was by far the greatest contributor of voting age blacks to District 12 in both absolute terms (approximately 147,000) and in terms of new voting age blacks (approximately 37,000). See App. 384, 500–502. Indeed, if what matters to the majority is how much individual counties increased District 12's black voting age population percentage, Davidson County deserves attention as well, since the portion of the county within District 12 lost over 26,000 more voting age whites than blacks. Ibid. That is greater than the net number of voting age blacks added to the district by Guilford County or Mecklenburg County. Ibid. As with so much in 356 the majority opinion, the issue here is more nuanced—and much more favorable to the State—than the majority would have it seem.

5

The July 1, 2011, Statement

For reasons similar to those just explained, the majority makes far too much of a statement issued by Senator Rucho and Representative Lewis on July 1, 2011, when the new districting plan was proposed. Particularly in light of Dr. Hofeller's later testimony about the legislature's partisan objectives, it is apparent that this statement does not paint an entirely reliable picture of the legislature's aims. The statement begins with this proclamation: "From the beginning, our goal has remained the same: the development of fair and legal congressional and legislative districts," id., at 353, and the statement seriously downplays the role of politics in the map-drawing process, acknowledging only that "we have not been ignorant of the partisan impacts of the districts we have created," id., at 361.

The statement discusses the treatment of Guilford County in a section with the heading "Compliance with the Voting Rights Act." Id., at 355–358. In that section, Rucho and Lewis state: "Because of the presence of Guilford County in the Twelfth District, we have drawn our proposed Twelfth District at a black voting age level that is above the percentage of black voting age population found in the current Twelfth District. We believe that this measure will ensure preclearance of the plan." Id., at 358.

The majority and the District Court interpret this passage to say that Rucho and Lewis decided to move black voters from Guilford County into District 12 in order to ward off Voting Rights Act liability. Ante, at 1475 ("Because of the VRA, [Rucho and Lewis] increased the number of African–Americans" in District 12 (citing 159 F.Supp.3d, at 617; emphasis 357 in original)). But that is hardly the only plausible interpretation. The statement could just as easily be understood as "an explanation by [the] legislature that because they chose to add Guilford County back into CD 12, the district ended up with an increased ability to elect African–American candidates, rather than the legislature explaining that they chose to add Guilford County back into CD 12 because of the [racial] results that addition created." Id., at 635 (Osteen, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (emphasis in original). And because we are obligated to presume the good faith of the North Carolina Legislature, this latter interpretation is the appropriate one.

*1503 But even if one adopts the majority's interpretation, it adds little to the analysis. The majority's close and incriminating reading of a statement issued to win public support for the new plan may represent poetic justice: Having attempted to blur the partisan aim of the new District 12, the legislature is hoisted on its own petard. But poetic justice is not the type of justice that we are supposed to dispense. This statement is some evidence that race played a role in the drawing of District 12, but it is a mistake to give this political statement too much weight.

Again, we made precisely this point in Cromartie II. There, the "legislative redistricting leader," then-Senator Roy Cooper, testified before a legislative committee that the proposed plan " 'provides for ... racial and partisan balance.' " 532 U.S., at 253, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (emphasis added). The District Court read the statement literally and concluded that the district had been drawn with a racial objective. Ibid. But this Court dismissed the statement, reasoning that although "the phrase shows that the legislature considered race, along with other partisan and geographic considerations; ... it says little or nothing about whether race played a predominant role comparatively speaking." Ibid.

What was good in Cromartie II should also be good here.

358 6

Dr. Ansolabehere's Testimony

Finally, the majority cites Dr. Ansolabehere's testimony that black registered voters in the counties covered by District 12 were more likely to be drawn into District 12 than white registered voters and that black registered Democrats were more likely to be pulled in than white registered Democrats. Ante, at 1477 – 1478.

There is an obvious flaw in Dr. Ansolabehere's analysis. He assumed that, if race was not the driving force behind the drawing of District 12, "white and black registered voters would have approximately the same likelihood of inclusion in a given Congressional District." App. 2597 (internal quotation marks omitted). But that would be true only if black and white voters were evenly distributed throughout the region, and his own maps showed that this was not so. See id., at 322–328; 1 Record 128–133. Black voters were concentrated in the cities located at the north and south ends of the district and constituted a supermajority of Democrats in the area covered by District 12. See Part III–B, supra. As long as the basic shape of the district was retained, moving Democrats from areas outside but close to the old district boundaries naturally picked up far more black Democrats than white Democrats.

This explanation eluded Dr. Ansolabehere because he refused to consider either the implications of the political strategy that the legislature claimed to have pursued or the effects of the changes to District 12 on the surrounding districts. App. 2578–2582. The result was a distorted—and largely useless—analysis.

IV

Reviewing the evidence outlined above,[20] two themes emerge. First, District 12's borders and racial composition 359 are readily explained by political considerations and the effects of the legislature's political strategy on the demographics of District 12. Second, the majority largely ignores *1504 this explanation, as did the court below, and instead adopts the most damning interpretation of all available evidence.

Both of these analytical maneuvers violate our clearly established precedent. Our cases say that we must " 'exercise extraordinary caution' " " 'where the State has articulated a legitimate political explanation for its districting decision,' " Cromartie II, supra, at 242, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (emphasis deleted); the majority ignores that political explanation. Our cases say that "the good faith of a state legislature must be presumed," Miller, 515 U.S., at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475; the majority presumes the opposite. And Cromartie II held that plaintiffs in a case like this are obligated to produce a map showing that the legislature could have achieved its political objectives without the racial effect seen in the challenged plan; here, the majority junks that rule and says that the plaintiffs' failure to produce such a map simply "does not matter." Ante, at 1479.

The judgment below regarding District 12 should be reversed, and I therefore respectfully dissent.

All Citations

581 U.S. 285, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837, 85 USLW 4257, 17 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 4613, 2017 Daily Journal D.A.R. 4666, 26 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 581

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 A plaintiff succeeds at this stage even if the evidence reveals that a legislature elevated race to the predominant criterion in order to advance other goals, including political ones. See Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 968–970, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion) (holding that race predominated when a legislature deliberately "spread[ ] the Black population" among several districts in an effort to "protect[ ] Democratic incumbents"); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 914, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (stating that the "use of race as a proxy" for "political interest[s]" is "prohibit[ed]").

2 Challenges to the constitutionality of congressional districts are heard by three-judge district courts, with a right of direct appeal to this Court. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 2284(a), 1253.

3 The State's argument to the contrary rests on a legal proposition that was foreclosed almost as soon as it was raised in this Court. According to the State, racial considerations cannot predominate in drawing district lines unless there is an "actual conflict" between those lines and "traditional districting principles." Brief for Appellants 45. But we rejected that view earlier this Term, holding that when (as here) race furnished "the overriding reason for choosing one map over others," a further showing of "inconsistency between the enacted plan and traditional redistricting criteria" is unnecessary

