to a finding of racial predominance. Bethune–Hill v. Virginia State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. ——, ——, 137 S.Ct. 788, 799, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017). And in any event, the evidence recounted in the text indicates that District 1's boundaries did conflict with traditional districting principles—for example, by splitting numerous counties and precincts. See supra, at 1469. So we would uphold the District Court's finding of racial predominance even under the (incorrect) legal standard the State proposes.

4 In the District Court, the parties also presented arguments relating to the first Gingles prerequisite, contesting whether the African–American community in the region was sufficiently large and compact to form a majority of a reasonably shaped district. The court chose not to decide that fact-intensive question. And aside from the State's unelaborated assertion that "[t]here is no question that the first factor was satisfied," Brief for Appellants 52, the parties have not briefed or argued the issue before us. We therefore have no occasion to address it.

5 North Carolina calls our attention to two expert reports on voting patterns throughout the State, but neither casts light on the relevant issue. The first (by Dr. Thomas Brunell) showed that some elections in many of the State's counties exhibited "statistically significant" racially polarized voting. App. 1001. The second (by Dr. Ray Block) found that in various elections across the State, white voters were "noticeably" less likely than black voters to support black candidates. Id., at 959. From those far-flung data points—themselves based only on past elections—the experts opined (to no one's great surprise) that in North Carolina, as in most States, there are discernible, non-random relationships between race and voting. But as the District Court found, see Harris v. McCrory, 159 F.Supp.3d 600, 624 (M.D.N.C.2016), that generalized conclusion fails to meaningfully (or indeed, at all) address the relevant local question: whether, in a new version of District 1 created without a focus on race, black voters would encounter "sufficient [ ]" white bloc-voting to "cancel [their] ability to elect representatives of their choice," Gingles, 478 U.S., at 56, 106 S.Ct. 2752. And so the reports do not answer whether the legislature needed to boost District 1's BVAP to avoid potential § 2 liability.

6 Justice ALITO charges us with "ignor[ing]" the State's political-gerrymander defense, making our analysis "like Hamlet without the prince." Post, at 1496 (opinion concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part) (hereinafter dissent); see post, at 1496, 1504. But we simply take the State's account for what it is: one side of a thoroughly two-sided case (and, as we will discuss, the side the District Court rejected, primarily on factual grounds). By contrast, the dissent consistently treats the State's version of events (what it calls "the Legislature's political strategy and the relationship between that strategy and [District 12's] racial composition," post, at 1496) as if it were a simple "fact of the matter"—the premise of, rather than a contested claim in, this case. See post, at 1492 – 1493, 1494, 1496, 1499 – 1500, 1500 – 1501, 1503. The dissent's narrative thus tracks, top-to-bottom and point-for-point, the testimony of Dr. Hofeller, the State's star witness at trial—so much so that the dissent could just have block-quoted that portion of the transcript and saved itself a fair bit of trouble. Compare post, at 1492 – 1496, with App. 2671–2755. Imagine (to update the dissent's theatrical reference) Inherit the Wind retold solely from the perspective of William Jennings Bryan, with nary a thought given to the competing viewpoint of Clarence Darrow.

7 As earlier noted, that inquiry is satisfied when legislators have "place[d] a significant number of voters within or without" a district predominantly because of their race, regardless of their ultimate objective in taking that step. See supra, at 1463 – 1464, and n. 1. So, for example, if legislators use race as their predominant districting criterion with the end goal of advancing their partisan interests—perhaps thinking that a proposed district is more "sellable" as a race-based VRA compliance measure than as a political gerrymander and will accomplish much the same thing—their action still triggers strict scrutiny. See Vera, 517 U.S., at 968–970, 116 S.Ct. 1941 (plurality opinion). In other words, the sorting of voters on the grounds of their race remains suspect even if race is meant to function as a proxy for other (including political) characteristics. See Miller, 515 U.S., at 914, 115 S.Ct. 2475.

8 Undeterred by these settled principles, the dissent undertakes to refind the facts of this case at every turn. See post, at 1491 – 1503. Indeed, the dissent repeatedly flips the appropriate standard of review—arguing, for example, that the District Court's is not "the only plausible interpretation" of one piece of contested evidence and that the State offered an "entirely natural" view of another. Post, at 1498 – 1499, 1502; see also post, at 1496, 1499 – 1500, 1500, 1503. Underlying that approach to the District Court's factfinding is an elemental error: The dissent mistakes the rule that a legislature's good faith should be presumed "until a claimant makes a showing sufficient to support th[e] allegation" of "race-based decisionmaking," Miller, 515 U.S., at 915, 115 S.Ct. 2475 for a kind of super-charged, pro-State presumption on appeal, trumping clear-error review. See post, at 1491 – 1492, n. 7.

9 The dissent's contrary reading of the preclearance submission—as reporting the redistricters' "decis[ion] not to construct District 12 as a majority-minority district," post, at 1498—is difficult to fathom. The language the dissent cites explains only why Rucho and Lewis rejected one particular way of creating such a district; the submission then relates their alternative (and, of course, successful) approach to attaining an over–50% BVAP. See App. 478–479.

10 Watt recalled that he laughed in response because the VRA required no such target. See id., at 2369. And he told Rucho that "the African–American community will laugh at you" too. Ibid. Watt explained to Rucho: "I'm getting 65 percent of the vote in a 40 percent black district. If you ramp my [BVAP] to over 50 percent, I'll probably get 80 percent of the vote, and[ ] that's not what the Voting Rights Act was designed to do." Ibid.

11 The court acknowledged that, in the earlier state-court trial involving District 12, Rucho denied making the comments that Watt recalled. See 159 F.Supp.3d, at 617–618. But the court explained that it could not "assess [the] credibility" of Rucho's contrary account because even though he was listed as a defense witness and present in the courtroom throughout the trial, the State chose not to put him on the witness stand. Id., at 618.

12 The dissent conjures a different way of explaining Watt's testimony. Perhaps, the dissent suggests, Rucho disclosed a majority-minority target to Watt, but Watt then changed Rucho's mind—and perhaps it was just a coincidence (or a mistake?) that Rucho still created a 50.7%- BVAP district. See post, at 1499 – 1500. But nothing in the record supports that hypothesis. See ibid. (relying exclusively on the State's preclearance submission to back up this story); supra, at 1475 – 1476, and n. 9 (correcting the dissent's misreading of that submission). And the State, lacking the dissent's creativity, did not think to present it at trial.

13 The dissent charges that this comparison is misleading, but offers no good reason why that is so. See post, at 1501 – 1502. It is quite true, as the dissent notes, that another part of District 12 (in Mecklenburg County) experienced a net increase in black voters even larger than the one in Guilford County. See post, at 1501 – 1502. (The net increases in the two counties thus totaled more than 35,000; they were then partially offset by net decreases in other counties in District 12.) But that is irrelevant to the point made here: Without the numerous black voters added to District 12 in Guilford County—where the evidence most clearly indicates voters were chosen based on race—the district would have fallen well shy of majority-minority status.

14 Hofeller did not dispute Ansolabehere's figures, but questioned his inference. Those striking patterns, the mapmaker claimed, were nothing more than the result of his own reliance on voting data from the 2008 Presidential election—because that information (i.e., who voted for Obama and who for McCain) tracked race better than it did party registration. See App. 1101, 1111–1114; cf. Cromartie II, 532 U.S. 234, 245, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (recognizing that "party registration and party preference do not always correspond"). As we have just recounted, however, the District Court had other reasons to disbelieve Hofeller's testimony that he used solely that electoral data to draw District 12's lines. See supra, at 1476 – 1477. And Ansolabehere contended that even if Hofeller did so, that choice of data could itself suggest an intent to sort voters by race. Voting results from a "single [Presidential] election with a Black candidate," Ansolabehere explained, would be a "problematic and unusual" indicator of future party preference, because of the racial dynamics peculiar to such a match-up. App. 341; see id., at 342–343. That data would, indeed, be much more useful as a reflection of an area's racial composition: "The Obama vote," Ansolabehere found, is "an extremely strong positive indicator of the location of Black registered voters" and, conversely, an "extremely strong negative indicator of the location of White registered voters." Id., at 342; see id., at 2546–2550.

15 The dissent responds that an alternative-map requirement "should not be too hard" for plaintiffs (or at least "sophisticated" litigants "like those in the present case") to meet. Post, at 1491 – 1492. But if the plaintiffs have already proved by a preponderance of the evidence that race predominated in drawing district lines, then we have no warrant to demand that they jump through additional evidentiary hoops (whether the exercise would cost a hundred dollars or a million, a week's more time or a year's). Or at least that would be so if we followed the usual rules. Underlying the dissent's view that we should not—that we should instead create a special evidentiary burden—is its belief that "litigation of this sort" often seeks to "obtain in court what [a political party] could not achieve in the political arena," post, at 1490, and so that little is lost by making suits like this one as hard as possible. But whatever the possible motivations for bringing such suits (and the dissent says it is not questioning "what occurred here," ibid.), they serve to prevent legislatures from taking unconstitutional districting action—which happens more often than the dissent must suppose. State lawmakers sometimes misunderstand the VRA's requirements (as may have occurred here with respect to § 5), leading them to employ race as a predominant districting criterion when they should not. See supra, at 1475 – 1476, and n. 10. Or they may resort to race-based districting for ultimately political reasons, leveraging the strong correlation between race and voting behavior to advance their partisan interests. See nn. 1, 7, supra. Or, finally—though we hope less commonly—they may simply seek to suppress the electoral power of minority voters. When plaintiffs meet their burden of showing that such conduct has occurred, there is no basis for subjecting them to additional—and unique—evidentiary hurdles, preventing them from receiving the remedy to which they are entitled.

1 I concur in the judgment of the Court regarding Congressional District 1. The State concedes that the district was intentionally created as a majority-minority district. See Brief for Appellants 44. And appellants have not satisfied strict scrutiny.

2 Article I, § 4, of the Constitution reserves to state legislatures the power to prescribe "[t]he Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives," subject to Congress's authority to "make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators."

3 According to polling data, around 90% of African–American voters have voted for the Democratic candidate for President in recent years. See https://ropercenter.cornell.edu/polls/us–elections/how–groups–voted/groups–voted–2016/ (all Internet materials as last visited May 19, 2017) (in 2016, 88%); https://ropercenter.cornell.edu/polls/us–elections/how–groups–voted/how–groups–voted–2012/ (in 2012, 93%); https://ropercenter.cornell.edu/polls/us–elections/how–groups–voted/how–groups–voted–2008/ (in 2008, 95%); https://ropercenter.cornell.edu/polls/us–elections/how–groups–voted/how–groups–voted–2004/ (in 2004, 88%); https://ropercenter.cornell.edu/polls/us–elections/how–groups–voted/how–groups–voted–2000/ (in 2000, 90%).

4 The challengers' failure to do so is especially glaring given that at least two alternative maps were introduced during the legislative debates over the 2011 map, see 2 Record 357–366, 402–411; App. 883–887, though neither party contends that those maps met the legislature's political goals.

5 Ignoring all of these well-founded reasons supporting the alternative-map requirement, the majority mischaracterizes my argument as, at bottom, resting on the proposition that "little is lost by making suits like this one as hard as possible." Ante, at 1480, n. 15. That is not my view, and it is richly ironic for the Court that announced the alternative-map requirement to accuse those who defend the requirement of erecting illegitimate and unnecessary barriers to the vindication of constitutional rights.

6 The majority cites Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996), as proof that the lack of an alternative-map requirement has not "made any difference" in our past cases. Ante, at 1479. Vera was decided before Cromartie II, 532 U.S. 234, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001), announced the alternative-map requirement, so its failure to mention that requirement is hardly surprising.

7 The majority accuses me of failing to accord proper deference to the District Court's factual findings and of disregarding the clear-error standard of review, ante, at 1474, n. 8, but that is nonsense. Unlike the majority, I simply follow Cromartie II by evaluating the District Court's findings in light of the plaintiffs' burden. See 532 U.S., at 241, 257, 121 S.Ct. 1452. The heavier a plaintiffs' evidentiary burden, the harder it is to find that plaintiffs have carried their burden—and the more likely that it would be clearly erroneous to find that they have. In this context, we are supposed to presume that the North Carolina Legislature acted in good faith and exercise "extraordinary caution" before rejecting the legislature's political explanation. Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915–916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995). Given that the State has offered a coherent and persuasive political explanation for District 12's boundaries, plaintiffs bear a "demanding" burden in attempting to prove racial predominance. Cromartie II, supra, at 241, 257, 121 S.Ct. 1452. Because the evidence they have put forward is so weak, see Part III–C, infra, they have failed to carry that burden, and it was clear error for the District Court to hold otherwise. See Cromartie II, supra, at 241, 257, 121 S.Ct. 1452 (applying the same clear-error analysis that I apply here).

8 This same basic shape was retained in the map proposed in the state legislature by the Democratic leadership and in the map submitted by the Southern Coalition for Social Justice. See 2 Record 402, 357.

9 A fifth district, District 2, appears to touch District 12 at the border of Guilford and Randolph Counties, but only to a de minimis extent.

10 District 12 was overpopulated by 2,847 people heading into the 2011 redistricting cycle. App. 1115; 2 Record 347.

11 North Carolina State Board of Elections, 11/02/2010 Official General Election Results—Statewide, http://er.ncsbe.gov/?election_dt =11/02/2010&county_id=0&office=FED&contest=0.

12 North Carolina State Board of Elections, 11/08/2016 Official General Election Results—Statewide, http://er.ncsbe.gov/?election_dt =11/08/2016&county_id=0&office=FED&contest=0.

13 As noted, Dr. Hofeller used the results of the 2008 Presidential election as a measure of party preference. In 2008, the Democratic candidate for President was then-Senator Barack Obama, the first black major party Presidential nominee, and it is true that President Obama won a higher percentage of the nationwide African–American vote in 2008 (95%) than did the Democratic Presidential candidates in 2000 (90%), 2004 (88%), and 2016 (88%). See supra, at 1488, n. 3. But as these figures show, the correlation between race and political party preference was very high in all these elections. Therefore, the use of 2008 statistics does not appear to have substantially affected the analysis.

14 Even two alternative redistricting plans offered prior to the enactment of the 2011 map—one submitted by the Southern Coalition for Social Justice and the other submitted by Democratic leaders in the state legislature—retained the basic shape of District 12 and resulted in black voters constituting 71.53% and 69.14% of registered Democrats, respectively. 2 Record 361 (Southern Coalition for Social Justice map), 406 (Congressional Fair and Legal map); see also App. 883–887, 2071 (Finding 34), 2145 (Finding 173).

15 To minimize jargon, I will use the term "precincts" to refer to vote tabulation districts (VTDs). See id., at 1609–1610, for an explanation of VTDs.

16 The District Court's description of the legislature's political strategy was cursory, and it spent no time analyzing the demographics of the region. See Harris v. McCrory, 159 F.Supp.3d 600, 618–619 (M.D.N.C.2016).

17 The majority concedes that this is a "thoroughly two-sided case," ante, at 1473, n. 6, yet the majority's opinion is thoroughly one sided. It offers no excuse for its failure to meaningfully describe—much less engage with—the State's political explanation for District 12's boundaries. Instead, it tries to change the subject, accusing me of treating the State's account as essentially uncontested. Ante, at 1473, n. 6. This is a hollow accusation. In this opinion, I lay out the evidence supporting the State's political explanation in Parts III–A and III–B, but I do not accept that account at face value. Instead, I go on to demonstrate that the plaintiffs' contrary arguments are exceedingly weak (Part III–C). Only after considering the evidence on both sides do I conclude that the State's explanation holds up.

18 That being said, Congressman Watt's testimony was double-hearsay: Congressman Watt testified about what Senator Rucho said someone else said. See App. 1345 (state trial court evidentiary ruling). For unknown reasons, Appellants failed to raise this objection below, but that only means that the testimony was admitted. The weight of that testimony is a different matter, and in general, hearsay should be viewed with great skepticism. Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. 412, 436, 9 L.Ed. 475 (1836) (majority opinion of Story, J.) (hearsay is "exceedingly infirm, unsatisfactory and intrinsically weak in its very nature and character"); Queen v. Hepburn, 7 Cranch 290, 296, 3 L.Ed. 348 (1813) (majority opinion of Marshall, C.J.) ("Its intrinsic weakness, its incompetency to satisfy the mind of the existence of the fact, and the frauds which might be practiced under its cover, combine to support the rule that hearsay evidence is totally inadmissible"); see also Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 298, 93 S.Ct. 1038, 35 L.Ed.2d 297 (1973).

19 Significantly, while the District Court doubted Dr. Hofeller's contention that politics, not race, dictated the boundaries of District 12 and that Dr. Hofeller was unaware of the relevant racial demographics in the region, see 159 F.Supp.3d, at 619–620, and n. 8, it did not dispute that only political data was displayed on his screen when he drew the district. The state trial court expressly found that only political data was displayed on Dr. Hofeller's screen. See App. 2150 (Finding 188).

20 The District Court relied on other evidence as well, but its probative value is so weak that even the majority does not cite it.

End of Document

New York Official Reports

32 Misc.3d 709, 927 N.Y.S.2d 548, 2011 N.Y. Slip Op. 21223

1 County of Nassau et al., Petitioners/Plaintiffs

v

State of New York et al., Respondents/Defendants.

Supreme Court, Albany County
June 20, 2011

CITE TITLE AS: County of Nassau v State of New York

HEADNOTE

Parties
Capacity to Sue
Municipalities Generally Lack Capacity to Challenge Acts of State

Plaintiffs, the County of Nassau and its election commissioners, lacked capacity to pursue a combined action and proceeding challenging the constitutionality of the Election Reform and Modernization Act of 2005 (L 2005, ch 181, as amended by L 2007, ch 506)—which, among other things, effectively prohibits the continued use of lever voting machines and provides for the use of electronic and optical scan machines—and a resolution of defendant Board of Elections. With few exceptions, municipalities and their officials lack capacity to challenge acts of the State and state legislation, either directly or in a representative capacity on behalf of their citizens. Here, plaintiffs' challenges failed to meet the only relevant exception, which applies where compliance with a state statute would force municipal officials to violate a constitutional proscription. The Constitution authorizes the Legislature to select methods of voting, including the use of electronic machines, and plaintiffs' concerns about disenfranchisement, bipartisan canvassing, secrecy and voter intent were meritless. Likewise, plaintiffs' objections to the particular machines certified by the Board did not confer capacity to challenge its resolution.

RESEARCH REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Constitutional Law § 136; Am Jur 2d, Municipal Corporations, Counties, and Other Political Subdivisions §§ 733, 746, 747; Am Jur 2d, Parties §§ 28, 392.

Carmody-Wait 2d, Parties §§ 19:3, 19:11.

NY Jur 2d, Constitutional Law § 54; NY Jur 2d, Counties, Towns, and Municipal Corporations § 224; NY Jur 2d, Parties § 16.

Siegel, NY Prac § 136.

ANNOTATION REFERENCE

See ALR Index under Counties; Elections and Voting; Parties.

FIND SIMILAR CASES ON WESTLAW

Database: NY-ORCS

Query: lack! /5 capacity standing /s county mun! & challenge /s state /4 legislation

APPEARANCES OF COUNSEL

John Ciampoli, County Attorney, Mineola, for petitioners/plaintiffs. Paul M. Collins, Albany, for New York State Board of *710 Elections and others, respondents/defendants. Eric T. Schneiderman, Attorney General, Albany (Bruce J. Boivin of counsel), for State of New York, respondent/defendant. 2

OPINION OF THE COURT

Michael C. Lynch, J.

In March, 2010, the County of Nassau and its two election commissioners (hereinafter the County plaintiffs), commenced this combined action/proceeding in the County of Nassau essentially challenging the constitutionality of the New York Election Reform and Modernization Act of 2005 (ERMA) (L 2005, ch 181, as amended by L 2007, ch 506) and the December 15, 2009 resolution of the New York State Board of Elections (hereinafter Board) certifying the use of electronic voting machines or systems pursuant to Election Law § 7-201.

By decision and order (Woodard, J.) dated October 13, 2010, the court granted the State of New York's (hereinafter State) application changing the venue of the entire action from Nassau County to the County of Albany. In so finding, the court referred the respective motions of the State and the Board seeking to dismiss the petition/complaint to Albany County for resolution. Those motions to dismiss are addressed in this decision.

Following oral argument in Albany County on March 18, 2011, and at the court's invitation, the parties submitted supplemental memoranda, as listed below, intended to address certain developments since the motions were filed.

In United States v New York State Bd. of Elections (06 CV 0263 [ND NY]), the Federal District Court issued various remedial orders including a May 20, 2010 order (Sharpe, J.) directing the County to utilize optical scan voting machines compliant with the Help America Vote Act (42 USC §§ 15301-15545) (HAVA) for the fall 2010 elections (see exhibit Nassau 39 annexed to State's motion to dismiss). As a predicate to issuing the injunction, the District Court found that lever voting machines utilized in New York were not in compliance with HAVA. As such, the District Court directed the County to accept and utilize HAVA-compliant optical scan voting systems. The County complied and utilized the ES & S scanners in the fall 2010 elections.

Following the County's appeal from the May 20, 2010 injunction order, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit issued an order, dated September 7, 2010, affirming the injunction. Pertinent here, the Second Circuit recognized that 711 the County had "commenced litigation in state court challenging *3 the constitutionality of ERMA under the constitution of New York State. Nothing is preventing Nassau from pursuing that litigation." The quoted phrase confirms that the present action/proceeding is not preempted by the federal litigation. Nor, as the State and Board claim, is the United States Attorney a necessary party in this litigation, given the Second Circuit's recognition that even if the County is successful in state court, the County would not be precluded "from filing suit in federal district court to dispute whether its lever voting machines are HAVA-compliant." The point of distinction is that the County plaintiffs' challenge in this litigation pertains to ERMA, not HAVA.

It is also important to recognize that article 9 of the Election Law was amended during 2010 to provide for the canvassing of ballots when ballot scanners have been utilized (L 2010, ch 163 [eff July 7, 2010]). While this legislation was enacted after the subject motions were filed, the issues presented will be addressed in accord with the law as it exists today (see Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v Adirondack League Club, 307 NY 475, 486-487 [1954], appeal dismissed 351 US 922 [1956]).

In 2007, ERMA was amended to require the replacement of the lever voting machines then utilized in New York elections with voting machines or systems compliant with Election Law § 7-202 and HAVA (L 2007, ch 506). Pursuant to Election Law § 7-202 (4), local boards of election are authorized to ""purchase direct recording electronic machines or optical scan machines." In effect, this legislation precludes the continued use of lever voting machines in New York. This mandate deflates the argument of the State and Board that the County plaintiffs failed to exhaust their administrative remedy by presenting lever voting machines as an alternative.

The Board is authorized to examine and certify the use of voting machines and systems pursuant to Election Law § 7-201. In so doing, the standard is to assure compliance with HAVA and Election Law § 7-202. The examination requires "a thorough review and testing of any electronic or computerized features of the machine or system" (Election Law § 7-201 [1]).

The County plaintiffs' core thesis is that the voting systems approved by the Board are not secure and thus compromise the voting process protected under the State Constitution (see preliminary statement in verified petition/complaint annexed as exhibit A to the County's notice of cross motion). During oral 712 argument, the County expanded on this premise by asserting the approved systems fail to comply with Election Law § 7-202 (1) (t), which specifies that a voting machine or system "not include any device or functionality potentially capable of *4 externally transmitting or receiving data via the internet or via radio waives or via other wireless means." The approved machines have both Ethernet ports and USB ports, features which the County plaintiffs contend are violative of Election Law § 7-202 (1) (t). The County plaintiffs have requested an evidentiary hearing to demonstrate that the approved systems do not comply with Election Law § 7-202. As explained during oral argument, the County plaintiffs maintain they do not object to the use of electronic voting machines per se, but challenge the approved machines as defective and subject to being compromised by electronic or computerized tampering.

As a threshold matter, the State and Board contend that the County plaintiffs lack the legal capacity to commence this lawsuit. The traditional rule, followed in New York, is that municipalities and their officials do not have legal capacity to challenge acts of the State and state legislation, either directly or in a representative capacity on behalf of their citizens (City of New York v State of New York, 86 NY2d 286, 289-290 [1995]; County of Albany v Hooker, 204 NY 1 [1912]). The only exception pertinent here is where compliance with a state statute would force municipal officials "to violate a constitutional proscription" (86 NY2d at 292 [citations omitted]). By compelling the County to utilize electronic voting machines, the County basically maintains that ERMA is forcing county officials to compromise the voting process protected under the State Constitution.

Specifically, the County plaintiffs allege six causes of action in their complaint: (1) that the use of unsecure electronic voting machines required by ERMA will disenfranchise voters in violation of article I, § 1 of the State Constitution; (2) that ERMA violates article II, § 8 of the State Constitution by preventing bipartisan canvassing of ballots; (3) that ERMA violates article II, § 8 because it requires local boards of election to delegate their canvassing authority to private vendors; (4) that the use of optical scan voting machines mandated by ERMA violates article II, § 7 by failing to preserve secrecy in voting; (5) that the electronic voting machines certified by the Board disregard voter intent by accepting ballots containing an overvote or undervote; and (6) that the Board's certification of voting systems 713 in December 2009, including the ES & S system utilized by the County during the 2010 election cycle, was arbitrary and capricious.

"Legislative enactments enjoy a presumption of constitutionality, imposing a heavy burden on a party trying to overcome it" (Matter of Griffiss Local Dev. Corp. v State of New York Auth. Budget Off., 85 AD3d 1402, 1403 [2011] [internal quotation marks and citations omitted]). *5

Article II, § 7 of the State Constitution specifies the manner of voting in elections "shall be by ballot, or by such other method as may be prescribed by law, provided that secrecy in voting be preserved." This constitutional authorization empowers the State Legislature to define alternate methods of voting. It follows that the State Constitution does not prohibit the use of electronic voting machines or systems; or mandate the use of lever voting machines. That the State Legislature, through ERMA, has opted to require the use of electronic voting machines is within its constitutional authority. The County plaintiffs' thesis that they are being compelled to disenfranchise voters through the use of these machines is simply not persuasive. The claim is akin to that of the city officials in the City of New York case asserting that inadequate state funding compelled them to compromise the constitutional rights of students to a viable education. In response, Judge Levine reasoned, as follows:

> "Surely, it cannot be persuasively argued that the City officials in question should be held accountable either under the Equal Protection Clause or the State Constitution's public Education Article by reason of the alleged State underfunding of the New York City school system over which they have absolutely no control" (City of New York at 295).

The same holds true here.

With respect to the second and third causes of action, the 2010 amendments to Election Law article 9, implement a canvassing process to accommodate bipartisan board review. This is not a situation where the bipartisan requirements of article II, § 8 have been implicated (compare Matter of Graziano v County of Albany, 3 NY3d 475, 481 [2004]). Similarly unconvincing is the County's contention ERMA compromises a voters right to secrecy protected under article II, § 7. Indeed, the statute expressly requires that approved voting machines or 714 systems "provide the voter an opportunity to privately and independently verify votes selected and the ability to privately and independently change such votes or correct any error before the ballot is cast and counted" (Election Law § 7-202 [1] [e]); and "be provided with a screen and hood or curtain or privacy features with equivalent function which shall be so made and adjusted as to conceal the voter and his or her action while voting" (Election Law § 7-202 [1] [m]). As for disregarding a voter's intent in an instance of an undervote or overvote, the County plaintiffs acknowledge in their complaint that the electronic voting machines include a display screen alerting voters of an undervote or overvote (verified petition complaint para 183; Election Law § 7-202 [1] [d]).

In sum, the County plaintiffs have failed to bring their constitutional claims *6 within any recognized exception and thus lack legal capacity to pursue these claims. The same holds true for their sixth cause of action pursuant to CPLR article 78 challenging the Board's certification as arbitrary and capricious. As noted above, the State Legislature has empowered the Board to examine and certify the propriety of the electronic voting machines (Election Law § 7-201). That the County plaintiffs object to the machines certified by the Board does not translate into legal capacity to challenge the Board's decision. Insofar as the County plaintiffs emphasize the restrictions defined in Election Law § 7-202 (1) (t), which are designed to prevent external tampering with the recorded vote through the Internet or other wireless means, the Board necessarily must have the means to input ballot information into the electronic voting machines, and the ability to preserve such data. Under Election Law § 9-102 (2) (c), voting machines may be equipped with "a removable electronic or computerized device" for recording the vote. That the electronic voting machines approved by the Board include Ethernet ports and USB ports does not sustain the County plaintiffs' assertion that these machines are compromised under Election Law § 7-202 (1) (t).

Since the County plaintiffs lack the legal capacity to pursue this litigation, the motions to dismiss the petition/complaint are granted, without costs.

102 S.Ct. 3211
Supreme Court of the United States

Mary Ellen CRAWFORD, a Minor, etc., et al., Petitioners

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF the CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

No. 81–38.
|
Argued March 22, 1982.
|
Decided June 30, 1982.

Synopsis

After California state court had ordered busing of students to remedy segregation in Los Angeles school district, voters of California adopted a constitutional amendment limiting state court-ordered busing for desegregation purposes to those instances in which a federal court would order busing to remedy a Fourteenth Amendment violation. The state trial court then ordered implementation of a revised desegregation plan and minority students appealed. The California Court of Appeal, 113 Cal.App.3d 633, 170 Cal.Rptr. 495, reversed and the California Supreme Court denied certiorari. The United States Supreme Court, Justice Powell, held that: (1) state constitutional amendment did not employ a racial classification; (2) repeal or modification of desegregation or antidiscrimination laws is not a presumptively invalid racial classification; (3) evidence sustained state court determination that the amendment was not an action with a discriminatory purpose; and (4) Fourteenth Amendment does not preclude a state, once it has chosen to do more than the Fourteenth Amendment requires, from later receding from that action.

Affirmed.

Justice Blackmun filed a concurring opinion in which Justice Brennan joined.

Justice Marshall filed a dissenting opinion.

West Headnotes (8)

[1] Constitutional Law Desegregation and integration in general

Fourteenth Amendment does not preclude a state, once it has chosen to do more in the area of desegregation than is required by the Fourteenth Amendment, from later receding from that position. U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Education Transportation for racial integration; busing

California constitutional amendment limiting state court-ordered busing of school students for desegregation to those cases in which a federal court would do so to remedy a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment only limits state courts when enforcing the State Constitution; the Amendment would not bar state court enforcement of state statutes requiring busing for desegregation or other purposes. West's Ann.Cal.Const.Art. 1, § 7.

10 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Busing

Education Transportation for racial integration; busing

California constitutional amendment limiting state court-ordered busing to situations in which a federal court would order such a remedy to correct a Fourteenth Amendment violation is not unconstitutional on the theory that it employs a racial classification or that it creates a dual court system because other state created rights may be vindicated in the state courts without limitation on remedies. U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14; West's Ann.Cal.Const.Art. 1, § 7.

11 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law School location

Neighborhood school policy does not offend the Fourteenth Amendment in itself. U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Constitutional Law Intentional or purposeful action

The simple repeal or modification of desegregation or antidiscrimination laws, without more, does not embody a presumptively invalid racial classification; if the purpose of repealing legislation is to disadvantage a racial minority, the repeal is unconstitutional. U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Constitutional Law Busing

Education Transportation for racial integration; busing

California constitutional amendment limiting state court-ordered busing for desegregation purposes to those situations in which a federal court would employ such a remedy to correct a Fourteenth Amendment violation was nothing more than a mere repeal of court orders which went beyond that standard and was not unconstitutional on the theory that it fundamentally altered the judicial system to require those seeking redress from racial isolation to be satisfied with less than full relief from a state court. West's Ann.Cal.Const.Art. 1, § 7; U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14.

22 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Education Transportation for racial integration; busing

Evidence sustained state court findings that constitutional amendment limiting state court-ordered busing for desegregation to those instances in which a federal court would order busing to correct a Fourteenth Amendment violation was not adopted for a discriminatory purpose. West's Ann.Cal.Const.Art. 1, § 7; U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14.

11 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Constitutional Law Intentional or purposeful action requirement

Constitutional Law Intentional or purposeful action

Law neutral on its face may be unconstitutional if motivated by a discriminatory purpose; in determining whether such a purpose is the motivating factor, racially disproportionate effect of official action provides an important starting point. U.S.C.A.Const.Amend. 14.

28 Cases that cite this headnote

*3212 527 Syllabus[*]

In a California state-court action seeking desegregation of the schools in the Los Angeles Unified School District (District), the trial court, in 1970, found de jure segregation in violation of both the State and Federal Constitutions and ordered the District to prepare a desegregation plan. The California Supreme Court affirmed, but based its decision solely upon the Equal Protection Clause of the State Constitution, which bars de facto as well as de jure segregation. On remand, the trial court approved a desegregation plan that included substantial mandatory pupil reassignment and busing. While the trial court was considering alternative new plans in 1979, the voters of California ratified an amendment (Proposition I) to the State Constitution which provides that state courts shall not order mandatory pupil assignment *3213 or transportation unless a federal court "would be permitted under federal decisional law" to do so to remedy a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. The trial court denied the District's request to halt all mandatory reassignment and busing, holding that Proposition I was not applicable in light of the court's 1970 finding of de jure segregation in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court then ordered implementation of a revised plan that again included substantial mandatory pupil reassignment and busing. The California Court of Appeal reversed, concluding that the trial court's 1970 findings of fact would not support the conclusion that the District had violated the Federal Constitution through intentional segregation. The Court of Appeal also held that Proposition I was constitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment and barred that part of the plan requiring mandatory student reassignment and busing.

Held: Proposition I does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Pp. 3216–3222.

(a) This Court's decisions will not support the contention that once a State choses to do "more" than the Fourteenth Amendment requires, it may never recede. Such an interpretation of that Amendment would be destructive of a State's democratic processes and of its ability to experiment in dealing with the problems of a heterogeneous population. Proposition I does not embody, expressly or implicitly, a racial classification. 528 The simple repeal or modification of desegregation or antidiscrimination laws, without more, does not embody a presumptively invalid racial classification. Pp. 3216–3219.

(b) Proposition I cannot be characterized as something more than a mere repeal. Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 89 S.Ct. 557, 21 L.Ed.2d 616, distinguished. The State Constitution still places upon school boards a greater duty to desegregate than does the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor does Proposition I allocate governmental or judicial power on the basis of a discriminatory principle. A "dual court system"—one for the racial majority and one for the racial minority—is not established simply because civil rights remedies are different from those available in other areas. It was constitutional for the people of the State to determine that the Fourteenth Amendment's standard was more appropriate for California courts to apply in desegregation cases than the standard repealed by Proposition I. Pp. 3216–3219.

(c) Even if it could be assumed that Proposition I had a disproportionate adverse effect on racial minorities, there is no reason to differ with the state appellate court's conclusion that Proposition I in fact was not enacted with a discriminatory purpose. The purposes of the Proposition—chief among them the educational benefits of neighborhood schooling—are legitimate, nondiscriminatory objectives, and the state court characterized the claim of discriminatory intent on the part of millions of voters as but "pure speculation." Pp. 3221–3222.

113 Cal.App.3d 633, 170 Cal.Rptr. 495, affirmed.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Laurence H. Tribe argued the cause for petitioners. With him on the briefs were Fred Okrand, Mark D. Rosenbaum, Mary Ellen Gale, Bruce J. Ennis, E. Richard Larson, and Paul Hoffman.

G. William Shea argued the cause for respondents. With him on the brief for respondent Board of Education of City of Los Angeles were Peter W. James, David T. Peterson, Michael M. Johnson and Jerry F. Halverson. Cliff Fridkis filed a brief for respondent Bustop, Inc.

Solicitor General Lee argued the cause for the United States as amicus curiae urging affirmance. With him on the 529 brief were Assistant Attorney General Reynolds, Deputy Solicitor General Wallace, and *Richard G. Wilkins.

* Briefs of amici curiae urging reversal were filed by Steven Shiffrin for the African American Education Commission et al.; by Louis E. Wolcher, Mark N. Aaronson, Vilma S. Martinez, Peter Roos, William L. Robinson, and Norma J. Chachkin for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law et al.; and by Alan G. Marer, William T. Keogh, and Joseph Cotchett for Margaret Tinsley et al.

Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance were filed by George Deukmejian, Attorney General, Willard A. Shank, Chief Assistant Attorney General, Richard D. Martland, Assistant Attorney General, and Geoffrey L. Graybill, Deputy Attorney General, for the State of California; by Anthony D. Blankley for Congresswoman Bobbi Fiedler; and by G. Kip Edwards and Michael D. Torpey for the Palo Alto Unified School District.

Briefs of amici curiae were filed by John H. Larson, James W. Briggs, Allan B. McKittrick, and Steven J. Carnevale for the County of Los Angeles; by Leonard Sacks, for State Senator Alan Robbins; by Thomas F. Casey III for the Belmont School Distroct et al.; by Penn Foote for the California Teachers Association; by Robert H. Finch for the Citizens Legal Defense Alliance, Inc.; by Myron D. Alexander for the League of Women Voters of California; by John McTernan and George Slaff for the Members of the Bar of the State of California; and by Ronald A. Zumbrun and John H. Findley for the Pacific Legal Foundation.

Opinion

Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

An amendment to the California Constitution provides that state courts shall not order mandatory pupil assignment or transportation unless a federal court would do so to remedy a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. The question for our decision is whether this provision is itself in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

*3214 I

This litigation began almost 20 years ago in 1963, when minority students attending school in the Los Angeles Unified School District (District) filed a class action in state court 530 seeking desegregation of the District's schools.[1] The case went to trial some five years later, and in 1970 the trial court issued an opinion finding that the District was substantially segregated in violation of the State and Federal Constitutions. The court ordered the District to prepare a desegregation plan for immediate use. App. 139.

On the District's appeal, the California Supreme Court affirmed, but on a different basis. Crawford v. Board of Education, 17 Cal.3d 280, 130 Cal.Rptr. 724, 551 P.2d 28 (1976). While the trial court had found de jure segregation in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, see App. 117, 120–121, the California Supreme Court based its affirmance solely upon the Equal Protection Clause of the State Constitution.[2] The court explained that under the California Constitution "state school boards ... bear a constitutional obligation to take reasonable steps to alleviate segregation in the public schools, whether the segregation be 531 de facto or de jure in origin." 17 Cal.3d, at 290, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 730, 551 P.2d, at 34. The court remanded to the trial court for preparation of a "reasonably feasible" plan for school desegregation. Id., at 310, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 744, 551 P.2d, at 48.[3]

On remand, the trial court rejected the District's mostly voluntary desegregation plan but ultimately approved a second plan that included substantial mandatory school reassignment and transportation—"busing"—on a racial and ethnic basis.[4] The *3215 plan was put into effect in the fall of 1978, but after one year's experience, all parties to the litigation were dissatisfied. See 113 Cal.App.3d 633, 636, 170 Cal.Rptr. 495, 497 (1981). Although the plan continued in operation, the trial court began considering alternatives in October 1979.

In November 1979 the voters of the State of California ratified Proposition I, an amendment to the Due Process and 532 Equal Protection Clauses of the State Constitution.[5] Proposition I conforms the power of state courts to order busing to that exercised by the federal courts under the Fourteenth Amendment:

> "[N]o court of this state may impose upon the State of California or any public entity, board, or official any obligation or responsibility with respect to the use of pupil school assignment or pupil transportation, (1) except to remedy a specific violation by such party that would also constitute a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, and (2) unless a federal court would be permitted under federal decisional law to impose that obligation or responsibility upon such party to remedy the specific violation of the Equal Protection Clause...."[6]

533 Following approval of Proposition I, the District asked the Superior Court to halt all mandatory reassignment and busing of pupils. App. 185. On May 19, 1980, the court denied the District's application. The court reasoned that Proposition I was of no effect in this case in light of the court's 1970 finding of de jure segregation by the District in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Shortly thereafter, the court ordered implementation of a revised desegregation plan, one that again substantially relied upon mandatory pupil reassignment and transportation.[7]

*3216 The California Court of Appeal reversed. 113 Cal.App.3d 633, 170 Cal.Rptr. 495 (1981). The court found that the trial court's 1970 findings of fact would not support the conclusion that the District had violated the Federal Constitution through intentional segregation.[8] Thus, Proposition I 534 was applicable to the trial court's desegregation plan and would bar that part of the plan requiring mandatory student reassignment and transportation. Moreover, the court concluded that Proposition I was constitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment. Id., at 654, 170 Cal.Rptr., at 509. The court found no obligation on the part of the State to retain a greater remedy at state law against racial segregation than was provided by the Federal Constitution. Ibid. The court rejected the claim that Proposition I was adopted with a discriminatory purpose. Id., at 654–655, 170 Cal.Rptr., at 509.[9]

Determining Proposition I to be applicable and constitutional, the Court of Appeal vacated the orders entered by the Superior Court. The California Supreme Court denied hearing. App. to Pet. for Cert. 73a.[10] We granted certiorari. 454 U.S. 892, 102 S.Ct. 386, 70 L.Ed.2d 206 (1981).

535 II

[1] We agree with the California Court of Appeal in rejecting the contention that once a State chooses to do "more" than the Fourteenth Amendment requires, it may never recede.[11] We reject an interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment so destructive of a State's democratic processes and of its ability to experiment. This interpretation has no support in the decisions of this Court.

[2] Proposition I does not inhibit enforcement of any federal law or constitutional requirement. Quite the contrary, by its plain language the Proposition seeks only to embrace the requirements of the Federal Constitution with respect to mandatory school assignments and transportation. *3217 It would be paradoxical to conclude that by adopting the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the voters of the State thereby had violated it. Moreover, even after Proposition I, the California Constitution still imposes a greater duty of desegregation than does the Federal Constitution. The state courts of California continue to have an obligation under state law to order segregated school districts to use voluntary desegregation techniques, whether or not there has been a finding of intentional segregation. The school districts themselves retain a state-law obligation to 536 take reasonably feasible steps to desegregate, and they remain free to adopt reassignment and busing plans to effectuate desegregation.[12]

[3] Nonetheless, petitioners contend that Proposition I is unconstitutional on its face. They argue that Proposition I employs an "explicit racial classification" and imposes a "race-specific" burden on minorities seeking to vindicate state-created rights. By limiting the power of state courts to enforce the state-created right to desegregated schools, petitioners contend, Proposition I creates a "dual court system" that discriminates on the basis of race.[13] They emphasize that other state-created rights may be vindicated by the state courts without limitation on remedies. Petitioners argue that the "dual court system" created by Proposition I is unconstitutional unless supported by a compelling state interest.

[4] We would agree that if Proposition I employed a racial classification it would be unconstitutional unless necessary to further a compelling state interest. "A racial classification, regardless of purported motivation, is presumptively invalid 537 and can be upheld only upon an extraordinary justification." Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 272, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2292, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979). See McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 196, 85 S.Ct. 283, 290, 13 L.Ed.2d 222 (1964). But Proposition I does not embody a racial classification.[14] It neither says nor implies that persons are to be treated differently on account of their race. It simply forbids state courts to order pupil school assignment or transportation in the absence of a Fourteenth Amendment violation. The benefit it seeks to confer—neighborhood schooling—is made available regardless of race in the discretion of school boards.[15] Indeed, even if Proposition I had *3218 a racially discriminatory effect, in view of the demographic mix of the District it is not clear which race or races would be affected the most or in what way.[16] In addition, this Court previously has held that even when a neutral law has a disproportionately 538 adverse effect on a racial minority, the Fourteenth Amendment is violated only if a discriminatory purpose can be shown.[17]

[5] Similarly, the Court has recognized that a distinction may exist between state action that discriminates on the basis of race and state action that addresses, in neutral fashion, race-related matters.[18] This distinction is implicit in the Court's repeated statement that the Equal Protection Clause is not violated by the mere repeal of race-related legislation or policies that were not required by the Federal Constitution in the first place. In Dayton Bd. of Education v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406, 414, 97 S.Ct. 2766, 2772, 53 L.Ed.2d 851 (1977), we found that the school board's mere repudiation of an earlier resolution calling for desegregation did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment.[19] In Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 376, 87 S.Ct. 1627, 1631, 18 L.Ed.2d 830 (1967), and again in Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 390, n. 5, 89 S.Ct. 557, 560, n. 5, 21 L.Ed.2d 616 (1969), we were careful to note that the laws under review did more than "mere[ly] repeal" existing antidiscrimination legislation.[20] 539 In sum, the simple repeal or modification of desegregation or antidiscrimination laws, without more, never has been viewed as embodying a presumptively invalid racial classification.[21]

Were we to hold that the mere repeal of race-related legislation is unconstitutional, we would limit seriously the authority of States to deal with the problems of our 3219 heterogeneous population. States would be committed irrevocably to legislation that has proved unsuccessful or even harmful in practice. And certainly the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment would not be advanced by an interpretation that discouraged the States from providing greater protection to racial minorities.[22] Nor would the purposes of the Amendment be furthered by requiring the States to maintain legislation designed to ameliorate race relations or to protect racial minorities but which has produced just the opposite effects.[23] Yet these would be the results of requiring a State *540 to maintain legislation that has proved unworkable or harmful when the State was under no obligation to adopt the legislation in the first place. Moreover, and relevant to this case, we would not interpret the Fourteenth Amendment to require the people of a State to adhere to a judicial construction of their State Constitution when that Constitution itself vests final authority in the people.

III

[6] Petitioners seek to avoid the force of the foregoing considerations by arguing that Proposition I is not a "mere repeal." Relying primarily on the decision in Hunter v. Erickson, supra, they contend that Proposition I does not simply repeal a state-created right but fundamentally alters the judicial system so that "those seeking redress from racial isolation in violation of state law must be satisfied with less than full relief from a state court."[24] We do not view Hunter as controlling here, nor are we persuaded by petitioners' characterization of Proposition I as something more than a mere repeal.

In Hunter the Akron city charter had been amended by the voters to provide that no ordinance regulating real estate on the basis of race, color, religion, or national origin could take effect until approved by a referendum. As a result of the charter amendment, a fair housing ordinance, adopted by the City Council at an earlier date, was no longer effective. In holding the charter amendment invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court held that the charter amendment was not a simple repeal of the fair housing ordinance. The *541 amendment "not only suspended the operation of the existing ordinance forbidding housing discrimination, but also required the approval of the electors before any future [antidiscrimination] ordinance could take effect." 393 U.S., at 389–390, 89 S.Ct., at 559–560. Thus, whereas most ordinances regulating real property would take effect once enacted by the City Council, ordinances prohibiting racial discrimination in housing would be forced to clear an additional hurdle.[25] As such, the charter 3220 amendment placed an impermissible, "special burde[n] on racial minorities within the governmental process." Id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560–561.[26]

Hunter involved more than a "mere repeal" of the fair housing ordinance; persons seeking anti-discrimination housing laws —presumptively racial minorities—were "singled out for mandatory referendums while no other group ... face[d] that obstacle." James v. Valtierra, supra, 402 U.S. 137, 142, 91 S.Ct. 1331, 1334, 28 L.Ed.2d 678 (1971). By contrast, even on the assumption that racial minorities benefited from the busing required by state law, Proposition I is less than a "repeal" of the California Equal Protection Clause. As noted above, after Proposition I, the State Constitution still places upon school boards a greater duty to desegregate than does the Fourteenth Amendment.

Nor can it be said that Proposition I distorts the political process for racial reasons or that it allocates governmental or judicial power on the basis of a discriminatory principle. "The Constitution does not require things which are different in fact or opinion to be treated in law as though they were the *542 same." Tigner v. Texas, 310 U.S. 141, 147, 60 S.Ct. 879, 882, 84 L.Ed. 1124 (1940). Remedies appropriate in one area of legislation may not be desirable in another. The remedies available for violation of the antitrust laws, for example, are different than those available for violation of the Civil Rights Acts. Yet a "dual court system"—one for the racial majority and one for the racial minority—is not established simply because civil rights remedies are different from those available in other areas.[27] Surely it was constitutional for the California Supreme Court to caution that although "in some circumstances busing will be an appropriate and useful element in a desegregation plan," in other circumstances "its 'costs,' both in financial and educational terms, will render its use inadvisable." See n. 3, supra. It was equally constitutional for the people of the State to determine that the standard of the Fourteenth Amendment was more appropriate for California courts to apply in desegregation cases than the standard repealed by Proposition I.[28]

In short, having gone beyond the requirements of the Federal Constitution, the State was free to return in part to the standard prevailing generally throughout the United States. It could have conformed its law to the Federal Constitution in every respect. That it chose to pull back only in part, and by preserving a greater right to desegregation than exists under the Federal Constitution, most assuredly does not render the Proposition unconstitutional on its face.

543 IV

The California Court of Appeal also rejected petitioners' claim that Proposition I, if facially valid, was nonetheless unconstitutional because enacted with a discriminatory purpose. The court reasoned that the purposes of the Proposition were well stated *3221 in the Proposition itself.[29] Voters may have been motivated by any of these purposes, chief among them the educational benefits of neighborhood schooling. The court found that voters also may have considered that the extent of mandatory busing, authorized by state law, actually was aggravating rather than ameliorating the desegregation problem. See n. 1, supra. It characterized petitioners' claim of discriminatory intent on the part of millions of voters as but "pure speculation." 113 Cal.App.3d, at 655, 170 Cal.Rptr., at 509.

[7] In Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 87 S.Ct. 1627, 18 L.Ed.2d 830 (1967), the Court considered the constitutionality of another California Proposition. In that case, the California Supreme Court had concluded that the Proposition was unconstitutional because it gave the State's approval to private racial discrimination. This Court agreed, deferring to the findings made by the California court. The Court noted that the California court was "armed ... with the knowledge of the facts and circumstances concerning the passage and potential impact" of the Proposition and "familiar with the milieu in which that provision would operate." Id., at 378, 87 S.Ct., at 1633. Similarly, in this case, 544 again involving the circumstances of passage and the potential impact of a Proposition adopted at a statewide election, we see no reason to differ with the conclusions of the state appellate court.[30]

[8] Under decisions of this Court, a law neutral on its face still may be unconstitutional if motivated by a discriminatory purpose. In determining whether such a purpose was the motivating factor, the racially disproportionate effect of official action provides "an 'important starting point.' " Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S., at 274, 99 S.Ct., at 2293, quoting Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266, 97 S.Ct. 555, 563, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977).

Proposition I in no way purports to limit the power of state courts to remedy the effects of intentional segregation with its accompanying stigma. The benefits of neighborhood schooling are racially neutral. This manifestly is true in Los Angeles where over 75% of the public school body is composed of groups viewed as racial minorities. See nn. 1 and 16, supra. Moreover, the Proposition simply removes one means of achieving the state-created right to desegregated education. School districts retain the obligation to alleviate segregation regardless of cause. And the state courts still may order desegregation measures other than pupil school assignment or pupil transportation.[31]

545 *3222 Even if we could assume that Proposition I had a disproportionate adverse effect on racial minorities, we see no reason to challenge the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the voters of the State were not motivated by a discriminatory purpose. See 113 Cal.App.3d, at 654–655, 170 Cal.Rptr., at 509. In this case the Proposition was approved by an overwhelming majority of the electorate.[32] It received support from members of all races.[33] The purposes of the Proposition are stated in its text and are legitimate, nondiscriminatory objectives. In these circumstances, we will not dispute the judgment of the Court of Appeal or impugn the motives of the State's electorate.

Accordingly the judgment of the California Court of Appeal is Affirmed.

Justice BLACKMUN, with whom Justice BRENNAN joins, concurring.

While I join the opinion of the Court, I write separately to address what I believe are the critical distinctions between this case and Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896.

546 The Court always has recognized that distortions of the political process have special implications for attempts to achieve equal protection of the laws. Thus the Court has found particularly pernicious those classifications that threaten the ability of minorities to involve themselves in the process of self-government, for if laws are not drawn within a "just framework," Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 393, 89 S.Ct. 557, 562, 21 L.Ed.2d 616 (1969) (Harlan, J., concurring), it is unlikely that they will be drawn on just principles.

The Court's conclusion in Seattle followed inexorably from these considerations. In that case the statewide electorate reallocated decisionmaking authority to " 'mak[e] it more difficult for certain racial and religious minorities [than for other members of the community] to achieve legislation that is in their interest.' " Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, supra, at 470, 102 S.Ct., at 3195 (emphasis in original), quoting Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 562 (Harlan, J., concurring). The Court found such a political structure impermissible, recognizing that if a class cannot participate effectively in the process by which those rights and remedies that order society are created, that class necessarily will be "relegated, by state fiat, in a most basic way to second-class status." Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202, 233, 102 S.Ct. 2382, 2403, 72 L.Ed.2d 786 (1982) (BLACKMUN, J., concurring).

In my view, something significantly different is involved in this case. State courts do not create the rights they enforce; those rights originate elsewhere—in the state legislature, in the State's political subdivisions, or in the state constitution itself. When one of those rights is repealed, and therefore is rendered unenforceable in the courts, that action hardly can be said to restructure the State's decisionmaking mechanism. While the California electorate may have made it more difficult to achieve desegregation when it enacted Proposition I, to my mind it did so not by working a structural change in the political process so much as by simply repealing the right to invoke a judicial busing remedy. Indeed, ruling for petitioners 547 on a Hunter theory seemingly would mean that *3223 statutory affirmative-action or antidiscrimination programs never could be repealed, for a repeal of the enactment would mean that enforcement authority previously lodged in the state courts was being removed by another political entity.

In short, the people of California—the same "entity" that put in place the State Constitution, and created the enforceable obligation to desegregate—have made the desegregation obligation judicially unenforceable. The "political process or the decisionmaking mechanism used to address racially conscious legislation" has not been "singled out for peculiar and disadvantageous treatment," Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, 458 U.S., at 458, 102 S.Ct., at 3203 (emphasis in original), for those political mechanisms that create and repeal the rights ultimately enforced by the courts were left entirely unaffected by Proposition I. And I cannot conclude that the repeal of a state-created right—or, analogously, the removal of the judiciary's ability to enforce that right—" 'curtail[s] the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities.' " Supra, at 486, 102 S.Ct., at 3203, quoting United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 153, n. 4, 58 S.Ct. 778, 783–784, n. 4, 82 L.Ed. 1234 (1938).

Because I find Seattle distinguishable from this case, I join the opinion and judgment of the Court.

Justice MARSHALL, dissenting.

The Court today addresses two ballot measures, a state constitutional amendment, and a statutory initiative each of which is admittedly designed to substantially curtail, if not eliminate, the use of mandatory student assignment or transportation as a remedy for de facto segregation. In Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896 (Seattle), the Court concludes that Washington's Initiative 350, which effectively prevents school boards from ordering mandatory school assignment in the absence of a finding of de jure segregation within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, is unconstitutional because "it uses the racial nature of an issue to define the governmental decisionmaking 548 structure, and thus imposes substantial and unique burdens on racial minorities." Seattle, supra, at 470, 102 S.Ct., at 3195. Inexplicably, the Court simultaneously concludes that California's Proposition I, which effectively prevents a state court from ordering the same mandatory remedies in the absence of a finding of de jure segregation, is constitutional because "having gone beyond the requirements of the Federal Constitution, the State was free to return in part to the standard prevailing generally throughout the United States." Ante, at 3220. Because I fail to see how a fundamental redefinition of the governmental decisionmaking structure with respect to the same racial issue can be unconstitutional when the State seeks to remove the authority from local school boards, yet constitutional when the State attempts to achieve the same result by limiting the power of its courts, I must dissent from the Court's decision to uphold Proposition I.

I

In order to understand fully the implications of the Court's action today, it is necessary to place the facts concerning the adoption of Proposition I in their proper context. Nearly two decades ago, a unanimous California Supreme Court declared that "[t]he segregation of school children into separate schools because of their race, even though the physical facilities and the methods and quality of instruction in the several schools may be equal, deprives the children of the minority group of equal opportunities for education and denies them equal protection and due process of the law." Jackson v. Pasadena City School District, 59 Cal.2d 876, 880, 31 Cal.Rptr. 606, 608–609, 382 P.2d 878, 880–881 (1963). Recognizing that the "right to an equal opportunity for education and the harmful consequences of segregation" do not differ according to the cause of racial *3224 isolation, the California Supreme Court declined to adopt the distinction between de facto and de jure segregation engrafted by this Court on the Fourteenth Amendment. 549 Id., at 881, 31 Cal.Rptr., at 609–610, 382 P.2d, at 881–882. Instead, the court clearly held that "school boards [must] take steps, insofar as reasonably feasible, to alleviate racial imbalance in schools regardless of its cause." Id., at 881, 31 Cal.Rptr., at 610, 382 P.2d, at 882.

As the California Supreme Court subsequently explained, the duty established in Jackson does not require that "each school in a district ... reflect the racial composition of the district as a whole." Crawford v. Board of Education, 17 Cal.3d 280, 302, 130 Cal.Rptr. 724, 738, 551 P.2d 28, 42 (1976) (Crawford I). Rather, it is sufficient that school authorities "take reasonable and feasible steps to eliminate segregated schools, i.e., schools in which the minority student enrollment is so disproportionate as realistically to isolate minority students from other students and thus deprive minority students of an integrated educational experience." Id., at 303, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 739, 551 P.2d, at 43 (emphasis in original). Moreover, the California courts have made clear that the primary responsibility for implementing this state constitutional duty lies with local school boards. "[S]o long as a local school board initiates and implements reasonably feasible steps to alleviate school segregation in its district, and so long as such steps produce meaningful progress in the alleviation of such segregation, and its harmful consequences, ... the judiciary should [not] intervene in the desegregation process." Id., at 305–306, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 741, 551 P.2d, at 45. If, however, a school board neglects or refuses to implement meaningful programs designed to bring about an end to racial isolation in the public schools, "the court is left with no alternative but to intervene to protect the constitutional rights of minority children." Id., at 307, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 741, 551 P.2d, at 45. When judicial intervention is necessary, the court "may exercise broad equitable powers in formulating and supervising a plan which the court finds will insure meaningful progress to alleviate the harmful consequences of school segregation in the district." Id., at 307, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 742, 551 P.2d, at 46. Moreover, "once a school board defaults in its constitutional task, the court, in 550 devising a remedial order, is not precluded from requiring the busing of children as part of a reasonably feasible desegregation plan." Id., at 310, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 744, 551 P.2d, at 48.

Like so many other decisions protecting the rights of minorities, California's decision to eradicate the evils of segregation regardless of cause has not been a popular one. In the nearly two decades since the State Supreme Court's decision in Jackson, there have been repeated attempts to restrain school boards and courts from enforcing this constitutional guarantee by means of mandatory student transfers or assignments. In 1970, shortly after the San Francisco Unified School District voluntarily adopted a desegregation plan involving mandatory student assignment, the California Legislature enacted Education Code § 1009.5, Cal.Educ.Code Ann. § 1009.5, currently codified at Cal.Educ.Code Ann. § 35350 (West 1978), which provides that "[n]o governing board of a school district shall require any student or pupil to be transported for any purpose or for any reason without the written permission of the parent or guardian." In San Francisco Unified School District v. Johnson, 3 Cal.3d 937, 92 Cal.Rptr. 309, 479 P.2d 669 (1971), the California Supreme Court interpreted this provision only to bar a school district from compelling students, without parental consent, to use means of transportation furnished by the district. Construing the statute to prohibit nonconsensual assignment of students for the purpose of eradicating de jure or de facto segregation, the court concluded, would clearly violate both the State and the Federal Constitutions by "exorcising a method that in many circumstances is the sole and exclusive means of eliminating racial segregation in *3225 the schools." Id., at 943, 92 Cal.Rptr., at 311, 479 P.2d, at 671.

The very next year, opponents of mandatory student assignment for the purpose of achieving racial balance again attempted to eviscerate the state constitutional guarantee recognized in Jackson. Proposition 21, which was enacted by referendum in November 1972, stated that "[n]o public school 551 student shall, because of his race, creed, or color, be assigned to or be required to attend a particular school." Predictably, the California Supreme Court struck down Proposition 21 "for the same reasons set forth by us in Johnson." Santa Barbara School District v. Superior Court, 13 Cal.3d 315, 324, 118 Cal.Rptr. 637, 645, 530 P.2d 605, 613 (1975).

Finally, in 1979, the people of California enacted Proposition I. That Proposition, like all of the previous initiatives, effectively deprived California courts of the ability to enforce the state constitutional guarantee that minority children will not attend racially isolated schools by use of what may be "the sole and exclusive means of eliminating racial segregation in the schools," San Francisco Unified School District v. Johnson, supra, at 943, 92 Cal.Rptr., at 311, 479 P.2d, at 671, mandatory student assignment and transfer. Unlike the earlier attempts to accomplish this objective, however, Proposition I does not purport to prevent mandatory assignments and transfers when such measures are predicated on a violation of the Federal Constitution. Therefore, the only question presented by this case is whether the fact that mandatory transfers may still be made to vindicate federal constitutional rights saves this initiative from the constitutional infirmity presented in the previous attempts to accomplish this same objective. In my view, the recitation of the obvious—that a state constitutional amendment does not override federal constitutional guarantees—cannot work to deprive minority children in California of their federally protected right to the equal protection of the laws.

II

A

In Seattle, the Court exhaustively set out the relevant principles that control the present inquiry. We there found that a series of precedents, exemplified by Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 89 S.Ct. 557, 21 L.Ed.2d 616 (1969), and Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp. 710 (W.D.N.Y.1970) (three-judge court), summarily aff'd, 402 U.S. 935, 91 S.Ct. 1618, 29 L.Ed.2d 105 (1971), establish that the Fourteenth Amendment 552 prohibits a State from allocating "governmental power nonneutrally, by explicitly using the racial nature of a decision to determine the decisionmaking process." Seattle, 458 U.S., at 470, 102 S.Ct., at 3195 (emphasis in original). We concluded that "state action of this kind ... 'places special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process' ... thereby 'making it more difficult for certain racial and religious minorities [than for other members of the community] to achieve legislation that is in their interest.' " Ibid. (emphasis in original), quoting Hunter v. Erickson, supra, at 391, 395, 89 S.Ct., at 560, 562 (Harlan, J., concurring).

It is therefore necessary to determine whether Proposition I works a "nonneutral" reallocation of governmental power on the basis of the racial nature of the decision. This determination is also informed by our decision in Seattle. In that case we were presented with a statewide initiative which effectively precluded local school boards from ordering mandatory student assignment or transfer except where required to remedy a constitutional violation. We concluded that the initiative violated the Fourteenth Amendment because it reallocated decisionmaking authority over racial issues from the local school board to a "new and remote level of government." Seattle, at 483, 102 S.Ct., at 3202. In reaching this conclusion, we specifically affirmed three principles that are particularly relevant to the present inquiry.

First, we rejected the State's argument that a statewide initiative prohibiting mandatory *3226 student assignment has no "racial overtones" simply because it does not mention the words "race" or "integration." Seattle, at 471, 102 S.Ct., at 3195. We noted that "[n]either the initiative's sponsors, nor the District Court, nor the Court of Appeals had any difficulty perceiving the racial nature of the issue settled by Initiative 350." Ibid. In light of its language and the history surrounding its adoption, we found it "beyond reasonable dispute ... that the initiative was enacted ' "because of," not merely "in spite of," its adverse effects upon' busing for integration." 553 Ibid., quoting Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2296, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979). Moreover, we rejected the Solicitor General's remarkable contention, a contention also pressed here, that "busing for integration ... is not a peculiarly 'racial' issue at all." Seattle, at 471–472, 102 S.Ct., at 3196. While not discounting the value of an integrated education to non-minority students, we concluded that Lee v. Nyquist, supra, definitively established that "desegregation of the public schools ... at bottom inures primarily to the benefit of the minority, and is designed for that purpose," thereby bringing it within the Hunter doctrine. Seattle, 458 U.S., at 472, 102 S.Ct., at 3196.

Second, the Seattle Court determined that Initiative 350 unconstitutionally reallocated power from local school boards to the state legislature or the statewide electorate. After the enactment of Initiative 350, local school boards continued to exercise considerable discretion over virtually all educational matters, including student assignment. Those seeking to eradicate de facto segregation, however, were forced to "surmount a considerably higher hurdle than persons seeking comparable legislative action," Seattle, at 474, 102 S.Ct., at 3197, for instead of seeking relief from the local school board, those pursuing this racial issue were forced to appeal to a different and more remote level of government. Just as in Hunter v. Erickson, supra, where those interested in enacting fair housing ordinances were compelled to gain the support of a majority of the electorate, we held that this reallocation of governmental power along racial lines offends the Equal Protection Clause. Our holding was not altered by the fact that those seeking to combat de facto segregation could still pursue their cause by petitioning local boards to enact voluntary measures or by seeking action from the state legislature. Nor were we persuaded by the argument that no transfer of power had occurred because the State was ultimately responsible for the educational policy of local school boards We found it sufficient that Initiative 350 had deprived those seeking 554 to redress a racial harm of the right to seek a particularly effective form of redress from the level of government ordinarily empowered to grant the remedy.

Finally, the Court's decision in Seattle implicitly rejected the argument that state action that reallocates governmental power along racial lines can be immunized by the fact that it specifically leaves intact rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The fact that mandatory pupil reassignment was still available as a remedy for de jure segregation did not alter the conclusion that an unconstitutional reallocation of power had occurred with respect to those seeking to combat de facto racial isolation in the public schools.

B

In my view, these principles inexorably lead to the conclusion that California's Proposition I works an unconstitutional reallocation of state power by depriving California courts of the ability to grant meaningful relief to those seeking to vindicate the State's guarantee against de facto segregation in the public schools. Despite Proposition I's apparent neutrality, it is "beyond reasonable dispute," Seattle, at 471, 102 S.Ct., at 3195, and the majority today concedes, that "court-ordered busing in excess of that required by the Fourteenth Amendment ... prompted the initiation and probably the adoption of Proposition *3227 I." Ante, at 3218, n.18 (emphasis in original).[1] Because "minorities may consider busing for integration to be 'legislation that is in their interest,' " Seattle, at 474, 102 S.Ct., at 3197, quoting 555 Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 562 (Harlan, J., concurring), Proposition I is sufficiently "racial" to invoke the*Hunter* doctrine.[2]

Nor can there be any doubt that Proposition I works a substantial reallocation of state power. Prior to the enactment of Proposition I, those seeking to vindicate the rights enumerated by the California Supreme Court in Jackson v. Pasadena City School District, 59 Cal.2d 876, 31 Cal.Rptr. 606, 382 P.2d 878 (1963), just as those interested in attaining any other educational objective, followed a two-stage procedure. First, California's minority community could attempt to convince the local school board voluntarily to comply with its constitutional obligation to take reasonably feasible steps to eliminate racial isolation in the public schools. If the board was either unwilling or unable to carry out its constitutional duty, those seeking redress could petition the California state courts to require school officials to live up to their obligations. Busing could be required as part of a judicial remedial order. Crawford I, 17 Cal.3d, at 310, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 744, 551 P.2d, at 48.

Whereas Initiative 350 attempted to deny minority children the first step of this procedure, Proposition I eliminates by fiat the second stage: the ability of California courts to order meaningful compliance with the requirements of the State Constitution. After the adoption of Proposition I, the only method of enforcing against a recalcitrant school board the state constitutional duty to eliminate racial isolation is to petition either the state legislature or the electorate as a whole. Clearly, the rules of the game have been significantly 556 changed for those attempting to vindicate this state constitutional right.[3]

The majority seeks to conceal the unmistakable effects of Proposition I by calling it a "mere repeal" of the State's earlier commitment to do " 'more' than the Fourteenth Amendment requires." Ante, at 3216. Although *3228 it is true that we have never held that the "mere repeal of an existing [anti-discrimination] ordinance violates the Fourteenth Amendment," Hunter v. Erickson, supra, at 390, n.5, 89 S.Ct., at 560, n.5, it is equally clear that the reallocation of governmental power created by Proposition I is not a "mere repeal" within the meaning of any of our prior decisions.

In Dayton Bd. of Education v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406, 97 S.Ct. 2766, 53 L.Ed.2d 851 (1977), the new members of the Dayton Board of Education repudiated a resolution drafted by their predecessors admitting the Board's role in the establishment of a segregated school system and calling for various remedial actions. In 557 concluding that the Board was constitutionally permitted to withdraw its own prior mea culpa, this Court was careful to note that "[t]he Board had not acted to undo operative regulations affecting the assignment of pupils or other aspects of the management of school affairs. " Id., at 413, 97 S.Ct., at 2772 (emphasis added). Therefore, the only time that this Court has squarely held that a "mere repeal" did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment, it was presented with a situation where a governmental entity rescinded its own prior statement of policy without affecting any existing educational policy. It is no surprise that such conduct passed constitutional muster.

By contrast, in Seattle, Hunter, and Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 87 S.Ct. 1627, 18 L.Ed.2d 830 (1967),[4] the three times that this Court has explicitly rejected the argument that a proposed change constituted a "mere repeal" of an existing policy, the alleged rescission was accomplished by a governmental entity other than the entity that had taken the initial action, and resulted in a drastic alteration of the substantive effect of existing policy. This case falls squarely within this latter category. To be sure, the right to be free from racial isolation in the public schools remains unaffected by Proposition I. See ante, at 3217; see, McKinny v. Oxnard Union High School District Board of Trustees, 31 Cal.3d 79, 92–93, 181 Cal.Rptr. 549, 556, 642 P.2d 460, 467 (1982). But Proposition I does repeal the power of the state court to enforce this existing constitutional guarantee through the use of mandatory pupil assignment and transfer.

The majority asserts that the Fourteenth Amendment does not "require the people of a State to adhere to a judicial construction of their State Constitution when that Constitution itself vests final authority in the people." Ante, at 3219. A state court's authority to order appropriate remedies for 558 state constitutional violations, however, is no more based on the "final authority" of the people than the power of the local Seattle School Board to make decisions regarding pupil assignment is premised on the State's ultimate control of the educational process. Rather, the authority of California courts to order mandatory student assignments in this context springs from the same source as the authority underlying other remedial measures adopted by state and federal courts in the absence of statutory authorization: the "courts power to provide equitable relief" to remedy a constitutional violation. Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1, 30, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 1283, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971); Crawford I, 17 Cal.3d, at 307, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 742, 551 P.2d, at 46 ("a trial court may exercise broad equitable powers in formulating and supervising a plan which the court finds will insure meaningful progress to alleviate ... school segregation"). Even assuming that the source of a court's power to remedy a constitutional violation can be traced back to "the people," the majority's conclusion that "the people" can therefore confer that remedial power on a discriminatory basis is *3229 plainly inconsistent with our prior decisions. In*Hunter v. Erickson*, 393 U.S., at 392, 89 S.Ct., at 561, we struck down the referendum at issue even though the people of Akron, Ohio, undoubtedly retained "final authority" for all legislation. Similarly, in Seattle we concluded that the reallocation of power away from local school boards offended the Equal Protection Clause even though the State of Washington "is ultimately responsible for providing education within its borders." 458 U.S., at 477, 102 S.Ct., at 3199. The fact that this change was enacted through popular referendum, therefore, cannot immunize it from constitutional review. See*Lucas v. Colorado General Assembly*, 377 U.S. 713, 736–737, 84 S.Ct. 1459, 1473–1474, 12 L.Ed.2d 632 (1964).

As in Seattle, Hunter, and Reitman, Proposition I's repeal of the state court's enforcement powers was the work of an independent governmental entity, and not of the state courts themselves. That this repeal drastically alters the substantive 559 rights granted by existing policy is patently obvious from the facts of this litigation.[5] By prohibiting California courts from ordering mandatory student assignment when necessary to eliminate racially isolated schools, Proposition I has placed an enormous barrier between minority children and the effective enjoyment of their constitutional rights, a barrier that is not placed in the path of those who seek to vindicate other rights granted by state law. This Court's precedents demonstrate that, absent a compelling state interest, which respondents have hardly demonstrated, such a discriminatory barrier cannot stand.[6]

560 The fact that California attempts to cloak its discrimination in the mantle of the Fourteenth Amendment does not alter this result. Although it might seem "paradoxical" to some Members of this Court that a referendum that adopts the wording of the Fourteenth Amendment might violate it, the paradox is specious.

Because of the Supremacy Clause, Proposition I would have precisely the same legal effect if it contained no reference to the Fourteenth Amendment. The lesson of Seattle is that a State, in prohibiting conduct that is not required by the Fourteenth Amendment, may nonetheless create a discriminatory reallocation of governmental power that does violate equal protection. The fact that some less effective avenues remain open to those interested in mandatory student assignment to eliminate racial isolation, like the fact that the voters in Hunter conceivably might have enacted fair housing *3230 legislation, or that those interested in busing to eliminate racial isolation in Seattle conceivably might use the State's referendum process, does not justify the discriminatory reallocation of governmental decisionmaking.

In this case, the reallocation of power occurs in the judicial process—the major arena minorities have used to ensure the protection of rights "in their interest." Hunter v. Erickson, supra, at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563 (Harlan, J., concurring). Certainly, Hunter and Seattle cannot be distinguished on the ground that they concerned the reallocation of legislative power, whereas Proposition I redistributes the inherent power of a court to tailor the remedy to the violation. As we have long recognized, courts too often have been "the sole practicable avenue open to a minority to petition for redress of grievances." NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 430, 83 S.Ct. 328, 336, 9 L.Ed.2d 405 (1963). See Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S., at 377, 87 S.Ct., at 1632 (invalidating state constitutional amendment because "[t]he right to discriminate, including the right to discriminate on racial grounds, was now embodied in the State's basic charter, immune from legislative, executive, 561 or judicial regulation at any level of the state government") (emphasis added). It is no wonder, as the present case amply illustrates, that whatever progress has been made towards the elimination of de facto segregation has come from the California courts. Indeed, Proposition I, by denying full access to the only branch of government that has been willing to address this issue meaningfully, is far worse for those seeking to vindicate the plainly unpopular cause of racial integration in the public schools than a simple reallocation of an often unavailable and unresponsive legislative process. To paraphrase, "[i]t surely is an excessively formal exercise ... to argue that the procedural revisions at issue in Hunter [and Seattle] imposed special burdens on minorities, but that the selective allocation of decisionmaking authority worked by [Proposition I] does not erect comparable political obstacles." Seattle, 458 U.S., at 475, n. 17, 102 S.Ct., at 3197, n. 17.

III

Even if the effects of Proposition I somehow can be distinguished from the enactments at issue in Hunter and Seattle, the result reached by the majority today is still plainly inconsistent with our precedents. Because it found that the segregation of the California public schools violated the Fourteenth Amendment, the state trial court never considered whether Proposition I was itself unconstitutional because it was the product of discriminatory intent. Despite the absence of any factual record on this issue, the Court of Appeal rejected petitioners' argument that the law was motivated by a discriminatory intent on the ground that the recitation of several potentially legitimate purposes in the legislation's preamble rendered any claim that it had been enacted for an invidious purpose "pure speculation." 113 Cal.App.3d 633, 655, 170 Cal.Rptr. 495, 509 (1981).

In Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266, 97 S.Ct. 555, 564, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977), we declared that "[d]etermining 562 whether invidious discriminatory purpose was a motivating factor demands a sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence of intent as may be available." Petitioners assert that the disproportionate impact of Proposition I, combined with the circumstances surrounding its adoption and the history of opposition to integration cited supra, at 3223–3225, clearly indicates the presence of discriminatory intent. See Brief for Petitioners 64–96. Yet despite the fact that no inquiry has been conducted into these allegations by either the trial or the appellate court, this Court, in its haste to uphold the banner of "neighborhood schools," affirms a factual determination that was never made. Such blind allegiance to the conclusory statements of a *3231 lower court is plainly forbidden by our prior decisions.[7]

IV

Proposition I is in some sense "better" than the Washington initiative struck down in Seattle.[8] In their generosity, California voters have allowed those seeking racial balance to petition the very school officials who have steadfastly maintained the color line at the schoolhouse door to comply voluntarily with their continuing state constitutional duty to desegregate. At the same time, the voters have deprived minorities of the only method of redress that has proved effective—the full remedial powers of the state judiciary. In the name of the State's "ability to experiment," ante, at 3216, the Court today allows this placement of yet another burden 563 in the path of those seeking to counter the effects of nearly three centuries of racial prejudice. Because this decision is neither justified by our prior decisions nor consistent with our duty to guarantee all citizens the equal protection of the laws, I must dissent.

All Citations

458 U.S. 527, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 73 L.Ed.2d 948, 5 Ed. Law Rep. 82

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 In 1980 the District included 562 schools with 650,000 students in an area of 711 square miles. In 1968 when the case went to trial, the District was 53.6% white, 22.6% black, 20% Hispanic, and 3.8% Asian and other. By October 1980 the demographic composition had altered radically: 23.7% white, 23.3% black, 45.3% Hispanic, and 7.7% Asian and other. See 113 Cal.App.3d 633, 642, 170 Cal.Rptr. 495, 501 (1981).

2 "The findings in this case adequately support the trial court's conclusion that the segregation in the defendant school district is de jure in nature. We shall explain, however, that we do not rest our decision on this characterization because we continue to adhere to our conclusion in [Jackson v. Pasadena City School Dist., 59 Cal.2d 876, 31 Cal.Rptr. 606, 382 P.2d 878 (1963)] that school boards in California bear a constitutional obligation to take reasonably feasible steps to alleviate school segregation 'regardless of its cause.' " Crawford v. Board of Education, 17 Cal.3d, at 285, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 726, 551 P.2d, at 30. The court explained that federal cases were not controlling:

> "In focusing primarily on ... federal decisions ... defendant ignores a significant line of California decisions, decisions which authoritatively establish that in this state school boards do bear a constitutional obligation to take reasonable steps to alleviate segregation in the public schools, whether the segregation be de facto or de jure in origin." Id., at 290, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 729–730, 551 P.2d, at 33–34.

3 In stating general principles to guide the trial court on remand, the State Supreme Court discussed the 'busing' question: "While critics have sometimes attempted to obscure the issue, court decisions time and time again emphasized that "busing" is not a constitutional end in itself but is simply one potential tool which may be utilized to satisfy a school district's constitutional obligation in this field.... [I]n some circumstances busing will be an appropriate and useful element in a desegregation plan, while in other instances its 'costs,' both in financial and educational terms, will render its use inadvisable." Id., at 309, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 743, 551 P.2d, at 47. It noted as well that a state court should not intervene to speed the desegregation process so long as the school board takes "reasonably feasible steps to alleviate school segregation," id., at 305, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 741, 551 P.2d, at 45, and that "a court cannot properly issue a 'busing' order so long as a school district continues to meet its constitutional obligations." Id., at 310, 130 Cal.Rptr., at 744, 551 P.2d, at 48.

4 The plan provided for the mandatory reassignment of approximately 40,000 students in the fourth through eighth grades. Some of these children were bused over long distances requiring daily round-trip bus rides of as long as two to four hours. In addition, the plan provided for the voluntary transfer of some 30,000 students.

> Respondent Bustop, Inc., unsuccessfully sought to stay implementation of the plan. See Bustop, Inc. v. Board of Education, 439 U.S. 1380, 99 S.Ct. 40, 58 L.Ed.2d 88 (1978) (REHNQUIST, J., in chambers); Bustop, Inc. v. Board of Education, 439 U.S. 1384, 99 S.Ct. 44, 58 L.Ed.2d 92 (1978) (POWELL, J., in chambers).

5 Proposition I was placed before the voters following a two-thirds vote of each house of the state legislature. Cal.Const., Art. 18, § 1. The State Senate approved the Proposition by a vote of 28 to 6, the State Assembly by a vote of 62 to 17. The voters favored the Proposition by a vote of 2,433,312 (68.6%) to 1,112,923 (31.4%). The Proposition received a majority of the vote in each of the State's 58 counties and in 79 of the State's 80 assembly districts. California Secretary of State, Statement of the Vote, November 6, 1979, Election 3–4, 43–49.

6 Proposition I added a lengthy proviso to Art. 1, § 7(a), of the California Constitution. Following passage of Proposition I, § 7 now provides, in relevant part:

> "(a) A person may not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law or denied equal protection of the laws; provided, that nothing contained herein or elsewhere in this Constitution imposes upon the State of California or any public entity, board, or official any obligations or responsibilities which exceed those imposed by the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution with respect to the use of pupil school assignment or pupil transportation. In enforcing this subdivision or any other provision of this Constitution, no court of this state may impose upon the State of California or any public entity, board, or official any obligation or responsibility with respect to the use of pupil school assignment or pupil transportation, (1) except to remedy a specific violation by such party that would also constitute a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution, and (2) unless a federal court would be permitted under federal decisional law to impose that obligation or responsibility upon such party to remedy the specific violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution.
>
> —
>
> "Nothing herein shall prohibit the governing board of a school district from voluntarily continuing or commencing a school integration plan after the effective date of this subdivision as amended.
>
> "In amending this subdivision, the Legislature and people of the State of California find and declare that this amendment is necessary to serve compelling public interests, including those of making the most effective use of the limited financial resources now and prospectively available to support public education, maximizing the educational opportunities and protecting the health and safety of all public school pupils, enhancing the ability of parents to participate in the educational process, preserving harmony and tranquility in this state and its public schools, preventing the waste of scarce fuel resources, and protecting the environment."

7 The Superior Court ordered the immediate implementation of the revised plan. The District was unsuccessful in its effort to gain a stay of the plan pending appeal. See Board of Education v. Superior Court, 448 U.S. 1343, 101 S.Ct. 21, 65 L.Ed.2d 1166 (1980) (REHNQUIST, J., in chambers).

8 "When the 1970 findings of the trial court are reviewed in the light of the correct applicable federal law, it is apparent that no specific segregative intent with discriminatory purpose was found. The thrust of the findings of the trial court was that passive maintenance by the Board of a neighborhood school system in the face of widespread residential racial imbalance amounted to de jure segregation in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.... But a school board has no duty under the Fourteenth Amendment to meet and overcome the effect of population movements." 113 Cal.App.3d, at 645–646, 170 Cal.Rptr., at 503.

9 The Court of Appeal also rejected the claim that Proposition I deprived minority children of a "vested right" to desegregated education in violation of due process. See id., at 655–656, 170 Cal.Rptr., at 509–510. Petitioners no longer advance this claim.

10 On March 16, 1981, the District directed that mandatory pupil reassignment under the Superior Court's revised plan be terminated on April 20, 1981. On that date, parents of children who had been reassigned were given the option of returning their children to neighborhood schools. According to respondent Board of Education, approximately 7,000 pupils took this option of whom 4,300 were minority students. Brief for Respondent Board of Education 10.

The state courts refused to enjoin termination of the plan. On April 17, 1981, however, the United States District Court for the Central District of California issued a temporary restraining order preventing termination of the plan. Los Angeles NAACP v. Los Angeles Unified School District, 513 F.Supp. 717. The District Court found that there was a "fair chance" that intentional segregation by the District could be demonstrated. Id., at 720. The District Court's order was vacated on the following day by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. Los Angeles Unified School District v.

District Court, 650 F.2d 1004 (1981). On remand the District Court denied the District's motion to dismiss. This ruling has been certified for interlocutory appeal. See Brief for Respondent Board of Education 10, n. 4.

On September 10, 1981, the Superior Court approved a new, voluntary desegregation plan.

11 Respondent Bustop, Inc., argues that far from doing "more" than the Fourteenth Amendment requires, the State actually violated the Amendment by assigning students on the basis of race when such assignments were not necessary to remedy a federal constitutional violation. See Brief for Respondent Bustop, Inc., 10–18. We do not reach this contention.

12 In this respect this case differs from the situation presented in Washington v. Seattle School District No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896.

In an opinion delivered after Proposition I was enacted, the California Supreme Court stated that "the amendment neither releases school districts from their State Constitutional obligation to take reasonably feasible steps to alleviate segregation regardless of its cause, nor divests California courts of authority to order desegregation measures other than pupil school assignment or pupil transportation." McKinny v. Oxnard Union High School District Board of Trustees, 31 Cal.3d 79, 92–93, 181 Cal.Rptr. 549, 566, 642 P.2d 460, 467 (1982). Moreover, the Proposition only limits state courts when enforcing the State Constitution. Thus, the Proposition would not bar state-court enforcement of state statutes requiring busing for desegregation or for any other purpose. Cf. Brown v. Califano, 201 U.S.App.D.C. 235, 244, 627 F.2d 1221, 1230 (1980) (legislation limiting power of federal agency to require busing by local school boards held constitutional in view of the "effective avenues for desegregation" left open by the legislation).

13 "[I]t is racial discrimination in the judicial apparatus of the state, not racial discrimination in the state's schools, that petitioners challenge under the Fourteenth Amendment in this case." Brief for Petitioners 48.

14 In Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 89 S.Ct. 557, 21 L.Ed.2d 616 (1969), the Court invalidated a city charter amendment which placed a special burden on racial minorities in the political process. The Court considered that although the law was neutral on its face, "the reality is that the law's impact falls on the minority." Id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560. In light of this reality and the distortion of the political process worked by the charter amendment, the Court considered that the amendment employed a racial classification despite its facial neutrality. In this case the elements underlying the holding in Hunter are missing. See infra.

15 A neighborhood school policy in itself does not offend the Fourteenth Amendment. See Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 28, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 1282, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971) ("Absent a constitutional violation there would be no basis for judicially ordering assignment of students on a racial basis. All things being equal, with no history of discrimination, it might well be desirable to assign pupils to schools nearest their homes"). Cf. 20 U.S.C. § 1701: "(a) The Congress declares it to be the policy of the United States that—(1) all children enrolled in public schools are entitled to equal educational opportunity without regard to race, color, sex, or national origin; and (2) the neighborhood is the appropriate basis for determining public school assignments."

16 In the Los Angeles School District, white students are now the racial minority, see n. 1, supra. Similarly, in Los Angeles County, racial minorities, including those of Spanish origin, constitute the majority of the population. See U.S. Dept. of Commerce, 1980 Census of Population and Housing, California, Advance Reports 6 (Mar.1981).

17 See Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 238–248, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 2046–2052, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976); Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 265, 97 S.Ct. 555, 563, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977); James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137, 141, 91 S.Ct. 1331, 1333, 28 L.Ed.2d 678 (1971).

18 Proposition I is not limited to busing for the purpose of racial desegregation. It applies neutrally to "pupil school assignment or pupil transportation" in general. Even so, it is clear that court-ordered busing in excess of that required by the Fourteenth Amendment, as one means of desegregating schools, prompted the initiation and probably the adoption of Proposition I.

19 See Dayton Bd. of Ed. v. Brinkman, 443 U.S., at 531, n. 5, 99 S.Ct., at 2976, n. 5 ("Racial imbalance, we noted in Dayton I, is not per se a constitutional violation, and rescission of prior resolutions proposing desegregation is unconstitutional only if the resolutions were required in the first place by the Fourteenth Amendment").

20 In Hunter we noted that "we do not hold that mere repeal of an existing [antidiscrimination] ordinance violates the Fourteenth Amendment." 393 U.S., at 390, n. 5, 89 S.Ct., at 560, n. 5. In Reitman the Court held that California Proposition 14 was unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment not because it repealed two pieces of antidiscrimination legislation, but because the Proposition involved the State in private racial discrimination: "Here we are dealing with a provision which does not just repeal an existing law forbidding private racial discriminations. Section 26 was intended to authorize, and does authorize, racial discrimination in the housing market." 387 U.S., at 380–381, 87 S.Ct., at 1634.

21 Of course, if the purpose of repealing legislation is to disadvantage a racial minority, the repeal is unconstitutional for this reason. See Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 87 S.Ct. 1627, 18 L.Ed.2d 830 (1967).

22 See Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217, 228, 91 S.Ct. 1940, 1946, 29 L.Ed.2d 438 (1971) ("To hold ... that every public facility or service, once opened, constitutionally 'locks in' the public sponsor so that it may not be dropped ... would plainly discourage the expansion and enlargement of needed services in the long run") (BURGER, C. J., concurring); Reitman v. Mulkey, supra, 387 U.S., at 395, 87 S.Ct., at 1641 ("Opponents of state antidiscrimination statutes are now in a position to argue that such legislation should be defeated because, if enacted, it may be unrepealable") (Harlan, J., dissenting).

23 In his dissenting opinion in Reitman v. Mulkey, supra, at 395, 87 S.Ct., at 1641, Justice Harlan remarked upon the need for legislative flexibility when dealing with the "delicate and troublesome problems of race relations." He noted:

> "The lines that have been and must be drawn in this area, fraught as it is with human sensibilities and frailties of whatever race or creed, are difficult ones. The drawing of them requires understanding, patience, and compromise, and is best done by legislatures rather than by courts. When legislation in this field is unsuccessful there should be wide opportunities for legislative amendment, as well as for change through such processes as the popular initiative and referendum." 387 U.S., at 395–396, 87 S.Ct., at 1641.

24 Tr. of Oral Arg. 6. See id., at 7–8 ("The fact that a state may be free to remove a right or remove a duty, does not mean that it has the same freedom to leave the right in place but simply, in a discriminatory way we argue, provide less than full judicial remedy").

25 "In the case before us ... the city of Akron has not attempted to allocate governmental power on the basis of any general principle. Here, we have a provision that has the clear purpose of making it more difficult for certain racial and religious minorities to achieve legislation that is in their interest." 393 U.S., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563 (Harlan, J., concurring).

26 The Hunter Court noted that although "the law on its face treats Negro and white, Jew and gentile in an identical manner," id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560, a charter amendment making it more difficult to pass antidiscrimination legislation could only disadvantage racial minorities in the governmental process.

27 Petitioners contend that Proposition I only restricts busing for the purpose of racial discrimination. The Proposition is neutral on its face, however, and respondents—as well as the State in its amicus brief—take issue with petitioners' interpretation of the provision.

28 Similarly, a "dual constitution" is not established when the State chooses to go beyond the requirements of the Federal Constitution in some areas but not others. Nor is a "dual executive branch" created when an agency is given enforcement powers in one area but not in another. Cf. Brown v. Califano, 201 U.S.App.D.C. 235, 627 F.2d 1221 (1980) (upholding federal legislation prohibiting a federal executive agency, but not local school officials or federal courts, from requiring busing).

29 The Proposition contains its own statement of purpose:

> "[T]he Legislature and people of the State of California find and declare that this amendment is necessary to serve compelling public interests, including those of making the most effective use of the limited financial resources now and prospectively available to support public education, maximizing the educational opportunities and protecting the health and safety of all public school pupils, enhancing the ability of parents to participate in the educational process, preserving harmony and tranquility in this state and its public schools, preventing the waste of scarce fuel, resources, and protecting the environment."

30 Cf. Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S., at 253, 96 S.Ct., at 2054 ("The extent of deference that one pays to the trial court's determination of the factual issue, and indeed, the extent to which one characterizes the intent issue as a question of fact or a question of law, will vary in different contexts.") (STEVENS, J., concurring).

31 In Brown v. Califano, supra, the Court of Appeals found that a federal statute preventing the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) from requiring busing "to a school other than the school which is nearest the student's home," 42 U.S.C. § 2000d, was not unconstitutional. HEW retained authority to encourage school districts to desegregate through other means, and the enforcement powers of the Department of Justice were left untouched. The court therefore concluded that the limits on HEW's ability to order mandatory busing did not have a discriminatory effect. And, having done so, it refused to inquire into legislative motivation: "Absent discriminatory effect, judicial inquiry into legislative motivation is unnecessary, as well as undesirable." 201 U.S.App.D.C., at 248, 627 F.2d, at 1234 (footnote omitted).

32 Cf. Washington v. Davis, supra, at 253, 96 S.Ct., at 2054 (STEVENS, J., concurring) ("It is unrealistic ... to invalidate otherwise legitimate action simply because an improper motive affected the deliberation of a participant in the decisional process. A law conscripting clerics should not be invalidated because an atheist voted for it").

33 Proposition I received support from 73.9% of the voters in Los Angeles County which has a "minority" population—including persons of Spanish origin—of over 50%. California Secretary of State, Statement of the Vote, November 6, 1979, Election 3. See n. 16, supra. By contrast, the Proposition received its smallest percentage of the vote in Humboldt and Marin Counties which are nearly all-white in composition.

1 Just as in Seattle, the fact that other types of student transfers conceivably might be prohibited does not alter this conclusion: "Neither the initiative's sponsors, nor the District Court, nor the Court of Appeals had any difficulty perceiving the racial nature of the issue settled by" Proposition I. Seattle, at 471, 102 S.Ct., at 3195. Indeed in their response to the petition for certiorari, respondents characterized Proposition I as addressing but "one narrow area: the power of a state court to order mandatory student assignment or transportation as a desegregation remedy." Brief in Opposition 9.

2 It is therefore irrelevant whether the "benefits of neighborhood schooling are racially neutral," as the majority asserts. Ante, at 3221; see ante, at 3218. In Seattle, 458 U.S., at 472, 102 S.Ct., at 3196, we specifically rejected the argument that because some minorities as well as whites supported the initiative, it could not be considered a racial classification.

3 There can be no question that the practical effect of Proposition I will be to deprive state courts of "the sole and exclusive means of eliminating racial segregation in the schools." San Francisco Unified School District v. Johnson, 3 Cal.3d 937, 943, 92 Cal.Rptr. 309, 311, 479 P.2d 669, 671 (1971). As we have often noted, "bus transportation has long been an integral part of all public educational systems, and it is unlikely that a truly effective remedy could be devised without continued reliance upon it." North Carolina Board of Ed. v. Swann, 402 U.S. 43, 46, 91 S.Ct. 1284, 1286, 28 L.Ed.2d 586 (1971). Moreover, Proposition I prevents a state court from ordering school officials to take any action respecting pupil school assignment, as well as pupil transportation. Presumably, state courts could not design a remedy involving the "pairing" or "clustering" of schools, even if such a remedy did not involve any "busing." In the present case, the state trial court found that the voluntary programs proposed by the Los Angeles School Board were "constitutionally suspect" because they "place[d] the burden of relieving the racial isolation of the minority student upon the minority student." App. 160. Consequently, since "a voluntary program would not serve to integrate the community's schools," Seattle, 458 U.S., at 473, n. 16, 102 S.Ct., at 3197, n. 16, Proposition I, like the measures at issue in Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp. 710 (W.D.N.Y.1970) (three-judge court), summarily aff'd, 402 U.S. 935, 91 S.Ct. 1618, 29 L.Ed.2d 105 (1971), and Seattle, precludes the effective enjoyment by California's minority children of their right to eliminate racially isolated schools.

4 In Reitman v. Mulkey, this Court struck down another California ballot measure, granting every resident the absolute constitutional right to sell or rent his property to whomever he or she chooses. We held that the provision amounted to an unconstitutional authorization of private discrimination.

5 Indeed Proposition I by its express terms allows for the modification of existing plans upon the application of any interested person. Art. 1, § 7(a).

6 As the majority notes, Proposition I states that the "people of the State of California find and declare that this amendment is necessary to serve compelling public interests," including, inter alia, "making the most efficient use of ... limited financial resources," protecting the "health and safety" of all students, preserving "harmony and tranquility," and "protecting the environment." Ante, at 3215, n. 6. These purported justifications, while undoubtedly meritorious, are clearly insufficient to sustain the racial classification established by Proposition I. As we have often noted, racial classifications may only be upheld where "necessary, and not merely rationally related, to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy." McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 196, 85 S.Ct. 283, 290, 13 L.Ed.2d 222 (1964). It goes without saying that a self-serving conclusory statement of necessity will not suffice to fulfill this burden. See Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1, 28, 29–31, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 1282, 1283, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971) (rejecting a similar list of justifications for establishing a racial classification). "In any event, [respondents] have failed to show that the purpose[s] they impute to the [Proposition] could not be accomplished by alternative methods, not involving racial distinctions." Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp., at 720.

Parenthetically, it is interesting to note that the allegedly compelling interest in establishing "neighborhood schools" so often referred to by the majority appears nowhere in the official list of justifications. The absence of any mention of this supposed justification is not surprising in light of the fact that the Proposition's ban on student "assignment" effectively prevents desegregation remedies that would not require a student to leave his "neighborhood." See n. 3, supra.

7 The majority's reliance on Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 87 S.Ct. 1627, 18 L.Ed.2d 830 (1967), is therefore misplaced. How can any deference be given to the state court's "knowledge of the facts and circumstances concerning the passage and potential impact" of Proposition I, id., at 378, 87 S.Ct., at 1633, when no such findings were ever made.

8 Initiative 350, however, at least did "not hinder [the] State from enforcing [the State] Constitution." Seattle, 458 U.S., at 490, n. 3, 102 S.Ct., at 3205, n. 3 (POWELL, J., dissenting).

End of Document

138 S.Ct. 1916
Supreme Court of the United States

Beverly R. GILL, et al., Appellants

v.

William WHITFORD, et al.

No. 16–1161
|
Argued Oct. 3, 2017.
|
Decided June 18, 2018.

Synopsis

Background: Democratic voters filed § 1983 action against members of Wisconsin Elections Commission, claiming that state legislative redistricting plan drafted and enacted by Republican-controlled Wisconsin legislature was unconstitutional partisan gerrymander that systematically diluted voting strength of Democratic voters statewide based on their political beliefs, in violation of Equal Protection Clause and First Amendment rights of association and free speech, by two gerrymandering techniques known as "cracking," or dividing party's supporters among multiple districts so they fell short of majority in each one, and "packing," or concentrating one party's backers in a few districts that they won by overwhelming margins. After trial before a three-judge panel of the United States District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, Ripple, Circuit Judge, sitting by designation, 218 F.Supp.3d 837, judgment was entered for plaintiffs, an injunction was entered, 2017 WL 383360, and plaintiffs' motion to amend the judgment was granted, 2017 WL 2623104. Consideration of jurisdiction for direct appeal was postponed by the Supreme Court, and the judgment was stayed.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Chief Justice Roberts, held that:

[1] voters' allegations, that the redistricting plan caused them to suffer statewide harm to their interests in their collective representation in state legislature and in influencing legislature's overall composition and policymaking, did not support Article III standing;

[2] evidence of an efficiency gap, and similar measures of partisan asymmetry, did not address the effect that a gerrymander had on the votes of particular citizens, as required for injury-in-fact element for Article III standing; but

[3] Supreme Court would not direct dismissal of voters' claims, and instead would remand the case so voters would have opportunity to prove concrete and particularized injuries.

Vacated and remanded.

Justice Kagan filed a concurring opinion, in which Justices Ginsburg, Breyer, and Sotomayor joined.

Justice Thomas filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, in which Justice Gorsuch joined.

West Headnotes (18)

[1] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

Federal Civil Procedure Rights of third parties or public

A plaintiff seeking relief in federal court must first demonstrate that he has Article III standing to do so, including that he has a personal stake in the outcome, distinct from a generally available grievance about government. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

55 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

The threshold requirement for Article III standing, under which a plaintiff must have a personal stake in the outcome, distinct from a generally available grievance about government, ensures that federal courts act as judges, and do not engage in policymaking properly left to elected representatives. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

53 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] States Compactness; contiguity; gerrymandering in general

Taking political considerations into account in fashioning a state legislative reapportionment plan is not sufficient to invalidate it as a partisan gerrymander, because districting inevitably has and is intended to have substantial political consequences.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Political Questions

Failure of political will does not justify unconstitutional remedies, because the power of federal judges to say what the law is rests not on the default of politically accountable officers, but is instead grounded in and limited by the necessity, for Article III jurisdiction, of resolving, according to legal principles, a plaintiff's particular claim of legal right. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

To ensure that the Federal Judiciary respects the proper and properly limited role of the courts in a democratic society, a plaintiff may not invoke federal-court jurisdiction unless he can show a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

28 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

Federal Civil Procedure Rights of third parties or public

A federal court is not a forum for generalized grievances, and the requirement, for federal jurisdiction, that a plaintiff show a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy ensures that courts exercise power that is judicial in nature. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

45 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

Federal Civil Procedure Causation; redressability

The requirement, for federal jurisdiction, that a plaintiff show a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy is enforced by insisting that a plaintiff satisfy a three-part test for Article III standing: (1) he suffered an injury in fact; (2) the injury is fairly traceable to the challenged conduct of the defendant; and (3) the injury is likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

121 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

Foremost among the requirements for Article III standing is injury in fact, which requires a plaintiff's pleading and proof that he has suffered the invasion of a legally protected interest that is concrete and particularized, i.e., which affects the plaintiff in a personal and individual way. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

88 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Election Law Nature and source of right

Election Law Persons entitled to bring contest

A person's right to vote is individual and personal in nature, and thus, voters who allege facts showing disadvantage to themselves as individuals have Article III standing to sue to remedy that disadvantage. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

55 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

To extent that vote dilution was Wisconsin Democratic voters' alleged harm from Republican-controlled Wisconsin legislature's alleged partisan gerrymandering in state legislative redistricting plan, that injury was district specific because the disadvantage to a voter as an individual resulted from the boundaries of the particular district in which he resided, and thus, a voter's remedy had to be limited to the inadequacy that produced his injury in fact as element for Article III standing, which remedy would be revision of the boundaries of the voter's own district. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

48 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Constitutional Law Elections

A plaintiff who alleges that he is the object of a racial gerrymander, i.e., a drawing of legislative district lines on the basis of race, has Article III standing to assert only that his own district has been so gerrymandered. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

17 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Constitutional Law Elections

A plaintiff who complains of racial gerrymandering, but who does not live in a gerrymandered district, asserts only a generalized grievance against governmental conduct of which he or she does not approve, which is not sufficient to support Article III standing. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

29 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

Plaintiffs who complain of racial gerrymandering in their State cannot sue to invalidate the whole State's legislative districting map; such complaints must proceed district-by-district.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

Allegation of Wisconsin Democratic voters, that Republican-controlled Wisconsin legislature's alleged partisan gerrymandering in state legislative redistricting plan caused them to suffer statewide harm to their interests in their collective representation in state legislature and in influencing legislature's overall composition and policymaking, did not involve individual and personal injury of the kind required for Article III standing; such allegation presented an undifferentiated, generalized grievance. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

At pleading stage, Wisconsin Democratic voters sufficiently alleged particularized harm, as required for injury-in-fact element for Article III standing in action alleging partisan gerrymandering in Republican-controlled Wisconsin legislature's state legislative redistricting plan, by alleging that the plan diluted the influence of their votes as a result of packing or cracking in their legislative districts. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

Assuming that Wisconsin Democratic voters' partisan gerrymandering claims were justiciable, injury in fact, as element for voters' Article III standing, depended on effect of Republican-controlled Wisconsin legislature's state legislative redistricting plan, not mapmakers' intent, and required a showing of a burden on plaintiffs' votes that was actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

Assuming that Democratic voters' partisan gerrymandering claims, arising from Republican-controlled Wisconsin legislature's state legislative redistricting plan, were justiciable, evidence of an efficiency gap, and similar measures of partisan asymmetry, did not address effect that a gerrymander had on votes of particular citizens, as required for injury-in-fact element for Article III standing; partisan-asymmetry metrics such as efficiency gap measured something else entirely, i.e., effect that a gerrymander had on the fortunes of political parties. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

26 Cases that cite this headnote

[18] Federal Courts Particular cases

States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

States Judgment and relief in general

Supreme Court, upon determining that Wisconsin Democratic voters had failed to demonstrate their Article III standing in action alleging partisan gerrymandering in Republican-controlled Wisconsin legislature's state legislative redistricting plan, would not direct dismissal of voters' claims, and instead would remand the case to three-judge District Court so that voters would have opportunity to prove concrete and particularized injuries using evidence that would tend to demonstrate a burden on their individual votes; the case was unusual because it concerned an unsettled kind of claim the Court had not agreed upon, for which contours and justiciability were unresolved, and four voters alleged that they lived in districts in which Democrats like them had been packed or cracked. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 3, § 2, cl. 1.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

*1919 Syllabus[*]

48 Members of the Wisconsin Legislature are elected from single-member legislative districts. Under the Wisconsin Constitution, the legislature must redraw the boundaries of those districts following each census. After the 2010 census, the legislature passed a new districting plan known as Act 43. Twelve Democratic voters, the plaintiffs in this case, alleged that Act 43 *1920 harms the Democratic Party's ability to convert Democratic votes into Democratic seats in the legislature. They asserted that Act 43 does this by "cracking" certain Democratic voters among different districts in which those voters fail to achieve electoral majorities and "packing" other Democratic voters in a few districts in which Democratic candidates win by large margins. The plaintiffs argued that the degree to which packing and cracking has favored one political party over another can be measured by an "efficiency gap" that compares each party's respective "wasted" votes—i.e., votes cast for a losing candidate or for a winning candidate in excess of what that candidate needs to win—across all legislative districts. The plaintiffs claimed that the statewide enforcement of Act 43 generated an excess of wasted Democratic votes, thereby violating the plaintiffs' First Amendment right of association and their Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection. The defendants, several members of the state election commission, moved to dismiss the plaintiffs' claims. They argued that the plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of Act 43 as a whole because, as individual voters, their legally protected interests extend only to the makeup of the legislative district in which they vote. The three-judge District Court denied the defendants' motion and, following a trial, concluded that Act 43 was an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander. Regarding standing, the court held that the plaintiffs had suffered a particularized injury to their equal protection rights.

Held : The plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate Article III standing. Pp. 1926 – 1934.

(a) Over the past five decades this Court has repeatedly been asked to decide what judicially enforceable limits, if any, the Constitution sets on partisan gerrymandering. Previous attempts at an answer have left few clear landmarks for addressing the question and have generated 49 conflicting views both of how to conceive of the injury arising from partisan gerrymandering and of the appropriate role for the Federal Judiciary in remedying that injury. See Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 37 L.Ed.2d 298, Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 92 L.Ed.2d 85, Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158

L.Ed.2d 546, and League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609. Pp. 1926 – 1929.

(b) A plaintiff may not invoke federal-court jurisdiction unless he can show "a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy," Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663. That requirement ensures that federal courts "exercise power that is judicial in nature," Lance v. Coffman, 549 U.S. 437, 439, 441, 127 S.Ct. 1194, 167 L.Ed.2d 29. To meet that requirement, a plaintiff must show an injury in fact—his pleading and proof that he has suffered the "invasion of a legally protected interest" that is "concrete and particularized," i.e., which "affect[s] the plaintiff in a personal and individual way." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560, and n. 1, 112 S.Ct. 2130, 119 L.Ed.2d 351.

The right to vote is "individual and personal in nature," Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 561, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506, and "voters who allege facts showing disadvantage to themselves as individuals have standing to sue" to remedy that disadvantage, Baker, 369 U.S., at 206, 82 S.Ct. 691. The plaintiffs here alleged that they suffered such injury from partisan gerrymandering, which works through the "cracking" and "packing" of voters. To the extent that the plaintiffs' alleged harm is the dilution of their votes, that injury is *1921 district specific. An individual voter in Wisconsin is placed in a single district. He votes for a single representative. The boundaries of the district, and the composition of its voters, determine whether and to what extent a particular voter is packed or cracked. A plaintiff who complains of gerrymandering, but who does not live in a gerrymandered district, "assert[s] only a generalized grievance against governmental conduct of which he or she does not approve." United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 745, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635.

The plaintiffs argue that their claim, like the claims presented in Baker and Reynolds, is statewide in nature. But the holdings in those cases were expressly premised on the understanding that the injuries giving rise to those claims were "individual and personal in nature," Reynolds, 377 U.S., at 561, 84 S.Ct. 1362 because the claims were brought by voters who alleged "facts showing disadvantage to themselves as individuals," Baker, 369 U.S., at 206, 82 S.Ct. 691. The plaintiffs' mistaken insistence that the claims in Baker and Reynolds were "statewide in nature" rests on a failure to distinguish injury from remedy. In those malapportionment cases, the only way to vindicate an individual plaintiff's right to an equally weighted vote was through a wholesale "restructuring of the geographical distribution of seats in a state legislature." Reynolds, 377 U.S., at 561, 84 S.Ct. 1362. Here, the plaintiffs' claims turn on allegations that their 50 votes have been diluted. Because that harm arises from the particular composition of the voter's own district, remedying the harm does not necessarily require restructuring all of the State's legislative districts. It requires revising only such districts as are necessary to reshape the voter's district. This fits the rule that a "remedy must of course be limited to the inadequacy that produced the injury in fact that the plaintiff has established." Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 357, 116 S.Ct. 2174, 135 L.Ed.2d 606.

The plaintiffs argue that their legal injury also extends to the statewide harm to their interest "in their collective representation in the legislature," and in influencing the legislature's overall "composition and policymaking." Brief for Appellees 31. To date, however, the Court has not found that this presents an individual and personal injury of the kind required for Article III standing. A citizen's interest in the overall composition of the legislature is embodied in his right to vote for his representative. The harm asserted by the plaintiffs in this case is best understood as arising from a burden on their own votes. Pp. 1928 – 1932.

(c) Four of the plaintiffs in this case pleaded such a particularized burden. But as their case progressed to trial, they failed to pursue their allegations of individual harm. They instead rested their case on their theory of statewide injury to Wisconsin Democrats, in support of which they offered three kinds of evidence. First, they presented testimony pointing to the lead plaintiff's hope of achieving a Democratic majority in the legislature. Under the Court's cases to date, that is a collective political interest, not an individual legal interest. Second, they produced evidence regarding the mapmakers' deliberations as they drew district lines. The District Court relied on this evidence in concluding that those mapmakers sought to understand the partisan effect of the maps they were drawing. But the plaintiffs' establishment of injury in fact turns on effect, not intent, and requires a showing of a burden on the plaintiffs' votes that is "actual or imminent, not 'conjectural' or 'hypothetical.' " Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S., at 560, 112 S.Ct. 2130. Third, the plaintiffs presented partisan-asymmetry *1922 studies showing that Act 43 had skewed Wisconsin's statewide map in favor of Republicans. Those studies do not address the effect that a gerrymander has on the votes of particular citizens. They measure instead the effect that a gerrymander has on the fortunes of political parties. That shortcoming confirms the fundamental problem with the plaintiffs' case as presented on this record. It is a case about group political interests, not individual legal rights. Pp. 1931 – 1934.

(d) Where a plaintiff has failed to demonstrate standing, this Court usually directs dismissal. See, e.g., DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 354, 126 S.Ct. 1854, 164 L.Ed.2d 589. Here, however, where the case concerns an unsettled kind of claim that the Court has not agreed upon, the contours and 51 justiciability of which are unresolved, the case is remanded to the District Court to give the plaintiffs an opportunity to prove concrete and particularized injuries using evidence that would tend to demonstrate a burden on their individual votes. Cf. Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 264–265, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1265, 191 L.Ed.2d 314. Pp. 1933 – 1934.

218 F.Supp.3d 837, vacated and remanded.

ROBERTS, C.J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which KENNEDY, GINSBURG, BREYER, ALITO, SOTOMAYOR, and KAGAN, JJ., joined, and in which THOMAS and GORSUCH, JJ., joined except as to Part III. KAGAN, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which GINSBURG, BREYER, and SOTOMAYOR, JJ., joined. THOMAS, J., filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, in which GORSUCH, J., joined.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Misha Tseytlin, for Appellants.

Erin E. Murphy, for Wisconsin State Senate, et al. as amici curiae supporting appellants.

Paul Smith, Washington, DC, for Appellees.

Brad D. Schimel, Attorney General, Kevin M. LeRoy, Deputy Solicitor General, State of Wisconsin, Department of Justice, Madison, WI, Misha Tseytlin, Solicitor General, Ryan J. Walsh, Chief Deputy Solicitor General, Amy C. Miller, Assistant Solicitor General, Brian P. Keenan, Assistant Attorney General, for Appellants.

Jessica Ring Amunson, Jenner & Block LLP, Paul M. Smith, J. Gerald Hebert, Danielle M. Lang, Campaign Legal Center, Washington, DC, Michele Odorizzi, Mayer Brown, LLP, Nicholas O. Stephanopoulos, University of Chicago Law School, Ruth M. Greenwood, Annabelle E. Harless, Campaign Legal Center, Chicago, IL, Douglas M. Poland, Rathje & Woodward, LLC, Madison, WI, Peter G. Earle, Law Office of Peter G. Earle, Milwaukee, WI, for Appellees.

Kathryn Cahoy, Covington & Burling LLP, Redwood Shores, CA, KeAndra Barlow, Covington & Burling LLP, Los Angeles, CA, Mark W. Mosier, Ryan Mowery, Alec Webley, Covington & Burling LLP, Washington, DC, for Amicus Curiae.

Opinion

Chief Justice ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

52 The State of Wisconsin, like most other States, entrusts to its legislature the periodic task of redrawing the boundaries 53 of the State's legislative districts. A group of *1923 Wisconsin Democratic voters filed a complaint in the District Court, alleging that the legislature carried out this task with an eye to diminishing the ability of Wisconsin Democrats to convert Democratic votes into Democratic seats in the legislature. 54 The plaintiffs asserted that, in so doing, the legislature had infringed their rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

[1] [2] But a plaintiff seeking relief in federal court must first demonstrate that he has standing to do so, including that he has "a personal stake in the outcome," Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962), distinct from a "generally available grievance about government," Lance v. Coffman, 549 U.S. 437, 439, 127 S.Ct. 1194, 167 L.Ed.2d 29 (2007) (per curiam). That threshold requirement "ensures that we act as judges, and do not engage in policymaking properly left to elected representatives." Hollingsworth v. Perry, 570 U.S. 693, 700, 133 S.Ct. 2652, 186 L.Ed.2d 768 (2013). Certain of the plaintiffs before us alleged that they had such a personal stake in this case, but never followed up with the requisite proof. The District Court and this Court therefore lack the power to resolve their claims. We vacate the judgment and remand the case for further proceedings, in the course of which those plaintiffs may attempt to demonstrate standing in accord with the analysis in this opinion.

I

Wisconsin's Legislature consists of a State Assembly and a State Senate. Wis. Const., Art. IV, § 1. The 99 members of the Assembly are chosen from single districts that must "consist of contiguous territory and be in as compact form as practicable." § 4. State senators are likewise chosen from single-member districts, which are laid on top of the State Assembly districts so that three Assembly districts form one Senate district. See § 5; Wis. Stat. § 4.001 (2011).

The Wisconsin Constitution gives the legislature the responsibility to "apportion and district anew the members of the senate and assembly" at the first session following each census. Art. IV, § 3. In recent decades, however, that responsibility has just as often been taken up by federal courts. Following the census in 1980, 1990, and 2000, federal courts drew the State's legislative districts when the Legislature 55 and the Governor—split on party lines—were unable to agree on new districting plans. The legislature has broken the logjam just twice in the last 40 years. In 1983, a Democratic legislature passed, and a Democratic Governor signed, a new districting plan that remained in effect until the 1990 census. See 1983 Wis. Laws ch. 4. In 2011, a Republican legislature passed, and a Republican Governor signed, the districting plan at issue here, known as Act 43. See Wis. Stat. §§ 4.009, 4.01–4.99; 2011 Wis. Laws ch. 4. Following the passage of Act 43, Republicans won majorities in the State Assembly in the 2012 and 2014 elections. In 2012, Republicans won 60 Assembly seats with 48.6% of the two-party statewide vote for Assembly candidates. In 2014, Republicans won 63 Assembly seats with 52% of the statewide vote. 218 F.Supp.3d 837, 853 (W.D.Wis.2016).

In July 2015, twelve Wisconsin voters filed a complaint in the Western District of Wisconsin challenging Act 43. The plaintiffs identified themselves as "supporters of the public policies espoused by the Democratic Party and of Democratic Party candidates." 1 App. 32, Complaint ¶ 15. They alleged that Act 43 is a partisan gerrymander that "unfairly favor[s] Republican voters and candidates," and that it does so by "cracking" and "packing" *1924 Democratic voters around Wisconsin. Id., at 28–30, ¶¶ 5–7. As they explained:

> "Cracking means dividing a party's supporters among multiple districts so that they fall short of a majority in each one. Packing means concentrating one party's backers in a few districts that they win by overwhelming margins." Id., at 29, ¶ 5.

Four of the plaintiffs—Mary Lynne Donohue, Wendy Sue Johnson, Janet Mitchell, and Jerome Wallace—alleged that they lived in State Assembly districts where Democrats have been cracked or packed. Id., at 34–36, ¶¶ 20, 23, 24, 26; see id., at 50–53, ¶¶ 60–70 (describing packing and cracking in Assembly Districts 22, 26, 66, and 91). All of the plaintiffs 56 also alleged that, regardless of "whether they themselves reside in a district that has been packed or cracked," they have been "harmed by the manipulation of district boundaries" because Democrats statewide "do not have the same opportunity provided to Republicans to elect representatives of their choice to the Assembly." Id., at 33, ¶ 16.

The plaintiffs argued that, on a statewide level, the degree to which packing and cracking has favored one party over another can be measured by a single calculation: an "efficiency gap" that compares each party's respective "wasted" votes across all legislative districts. "Wasted" votes are those cast for a losing candidate or for a winning candidate in excess of what that candidate needs to win. Id., at 28–29, ¶ 5. The plaintiffs alleged that Act 43 resulted in an unusually large efficiency gap that favored Republicans. Id., at 30, ¶ 7. They also submitted a "Demonstration Plan" that, they asserted, met all of the legal criteria for apportionment, but was at the same time "almost perfectly balanced in its partisan consequences." Id., at 31, ¶ 10. They argued that because Act 43 generated a large and unnecessary efficiency gap in favor of Republicans, it violated the First Amendment right of association of Wisconsin Democratic voters and their Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection. The plaintiffs named several members of the state election commission as defendants in the action. Id., at 36, ¶¶ 28–30.

The election officials moved to dismiss the complaint. They argued, among other things, that the plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge the constitutionality of Act 43 as a whole because, as individual voters, their legally protected interests extend only to the makeup of the legislative districts in which they vote. A three-judge panel of the District Court, see 28 U.S.C. § 2284(a), denied the defendants' motion. In the District Court's view, the plaintiffs "identif[ied] their injury as not simply their inability to elect a representative in their own districts, but also their reduced opportunity to be represented by Democratic legislators across 57 the state." Whitford v. Nichol, 151 F.Supp.3d 918, 924 (W.D.Wis.2015). It therefore followed, in the District Court's opinion, that "[b]ecause plaintiffs' alleged injury in this case relates to their statewide representation, ... they should be permitted to bring a statewide claim." Id., at 926.

The case proceeded to trial, where the plaintiffs presented testimony from four fact witnesses. The first was lead plaintiff William Whitford, a retired law professor at the University of Wisconsin in Madison. Whitford testified that he lives in Madison in the 76th Assembly District, and acknowledged on cross-examination that this is, under any plausible circumstances, a heavily Democratic district. Under Act 43, the Democratic share of the Assembly vote in Whitford's district is 81.9%; under the plaintiffs' ideal map —their Demonstration Plan—the projected Democratic share 1925 of the Assembly vote in Whitford's district would be 82%. 147 Record 35–36. Whitford therefore conceded that Act 43 had not "affected [his] ability to vote for and elect a Democrat in [his] district." Id., at 37. Whitford testified that he had nevertheless suffered a harm "relate[d] to [his] ability to engage in campaign activity to achieve a majority in the Assembly and the Senate." Ibid. As he explained, "[t]he only practical way to accomplish my policy objectives is to get a majority of the Democrats in the Assembly and the Senate ideally in order to get the legislative product I prefer." Id., at 33.

The plaintiffs also presented the testimony of legislative aides Adam Foltz and Tad Ottman, as well as that of Professor Ronald Gaddie, a political scientist who helped design the Act 43 districting map, regarding how that map was designed and adopted. In particular, Professor Gaddie testified about his creation of what he and the District Court called "S curves": color-coded tables of the estimated partisan skew of different draft redistricting maps. See 218 F.Supp.3d, at 850, 858. The colors corresponded with assessments regarding whether different districts tilted Republican *58 or Democratic under various statewide political scenarios. The S curve for the map that was eventually adopted projected that "Republicans would maintain a majority under any likely voting scenario," with Democrats needing 54% of the statewide vote to secure a majority in the legislature. Id., at 852.

Finally, the parties presented testimony from four expert witnesses. The plaintiffs' experts, Professor Kenneth Mayer and Professor Simon Jackman, opined that—according to their efficiency-gap analyses—the Act 43 map would systematically favor Republicans for the duration of the decade. See id., at 859–861. The defendants' experts, Professor Nicholas Goedert and Sean Trende, opined that efficiency gaps alone are unreliable measures of durable partisan advantage, and that the political geography of Wisconsin currently favors Republicans because Democrats —who tend to be clustered in large cities—are inefficiently distributed in many parts of Wisconsin for purposes of winning elections. See id., at 861–862.

At the close of evidence, the District Court concluded—over the dissent of Judge Griesbach—that the plaintiffs had proved a violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The court set out a three-part test for identifying unconstitutional gerrymanders: A redistricting map violates the First Amendment and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment if it "(1) is intended to place a severe impediment on the effectiveness of the votes of individual citizens on the basis of their political affiliation, (2) has that effect, and (3) cannot be justified on other, legitimate legislative grounds." Id., at 884.

The court went on to find, based on evidence concerning the manner in which Act 43 had been adopted, that "one of the purposes of Act 43 was to secure Republican control of the Assembly under any likely future electoral scenario for the remainder of the decade." Id., at 896. It also found that the "more efficient distribution of Republican voters has *59 allowed the Republican Party to translate its votes into seats with significantly greater ease and to achieve—and preserve —control of the Wisconsin legislature." Id., at 905. As to the third prong of its test, the District Court concluded that the burdens the Act 43 map imposed on Democrats could not be explained by "legitimate state prerogatives [or] neutral factors." Id., at 911. The court recognized that "Wisconsin's political geography, particularly the high concentration of Democratic voters in urban 1926 centers like Milwaukee and Madison, affords the Republican Party a natural, but modest, advantage in the districting process," but found that this inherent geographic disparity did not account for the magnitude of the Republican advantage. Id., at 921, 924.

Regarding standing, the court held that the plaintiffs had a "cognizable equal protection right against state-imposed barriers on [their] ability to vote effectively for the party of [their] choice." Id., at 928. It concluded that Act 43 "prevent[ed] Wisconsin Democrats from being able to translate their votes into seats as effectively as Wisconsin Republicans," and that "Wisconsin Democrats, therefore, have suffered a personal injury to their Equal Protection rights." Ibid. The court turned away the defendants' argument that the plaintiffs' injury was not sufficiently particularized by finding that "[t]he harm that the plaintiffs have experienced ... is one shared by Democratic voters in the State of Wisconsin. The dilution of their votes is both personal and acute." Id., at 930.

Judge Griesbach dissented. He wrote that, under this Court's existing precedents, "partisan intent" to benefit one party rather than the other in districting "is not illegal, but is simply the consequence of assigning the task of redistricting to the political branches." Id., at 939. He observed that the plaintiffs had not attempted to prove that "specific districts ... had been gerrymandered," but rather had "relied on statewide data and calculations." Ibid. And he argued that the plaintiffs' proof, resting as it did on statewide 60 data, had "no relevance to any gerrymandering injury alleged by a voter in a single district." Id., at 952. On that basis, Judge Griesbach would have entered judgment for the defendants.

The District Court enjoined the defendants from using the Act 43 map in future elections and ordered them to have a remedial districting plan in place no later than November 1, 2017. The defendants appealed directly to this Court, as provided under 28 U.S.C. § 1253. We stayed the District Court's judgment and postponed consideration of our jurisdiction. 582 U.S. 914, 137 S.Ct. 2268, 198 L.Ed.2d 698 (2017).

II

A

Over the past five decades this Court has been repeatedly asked to decide what judicially enforceable limits, if any, the Constitution sets on the gerrymandering of voters along partisan lines. Our previous attempts at an answer have left few clear landmarks for addressing the question. What our precedents have to say on the topic is, however, instructive as to the myriad competing considerations that partisan gerrymandering claims involve. Our efforts to sort through those considerations have generated conflicting views both of how to conceive of the injury arising from partisan gerrymandering and of the appropriate role for the Federal Judiciary in remedying that injury.

[3] Our first consideration of a partisan gerrymandering claim came in Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 37 L.Ed.2d 298 (1973). There a group of plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of a Connecticut redistricting plan that "consciously and overtly adopted and followed a policy of 'political fairness,' which aimed at a rough scheme of proportional representation of the two major political parties." Id., at 738, 93 S.Ct. 2321. To that end, the redistricting plan broke up numerous towns, "wiggl[ing] and joggl[ing]" district boundary lines in order to "ferret out pockets of each party's strength." Id., at 738, and n. 3, 752, 61 n. 18, 93 S.Ct. 2321. *1927 The plaintiffs argued that, notwithstanding the rough population equality of the districts, the plan was unconstitutional because its consciously political design was "nothing less than a gigantic political gerrymander." Id., at 752, 93 S.Ct. 2321. This Court rejected that claim. We reasoned that it would be "idle" to hold that "any political consideration taken into account in fashioning a reapportionment plan is sufficient to invalidate it," because districting "inevitably has and is intended to have substantial political consequences." Id., at 752–753, 93 S.Ct. 2321.

Thirteen years later came Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986). Unlike the bipartisan gerrymander at issue in Gaffney, the allegation in Bandemer was that Indiana Republicans had gerrymandered Indiana's legislative districts "to favor Republican incumbents and candidates and to disadvantage Democratic voters" through what the plaintiffs called the "stacking" (packing) and "splitting" (cracking) of Democrats. 478 U.S., at 116–117, 106 S.Ct. 2797 (plurality opinion). A majority of the Court agreed that the case before it was justiciable. Id., at 125, 127, 106 S.Ct. 2797. The Court could not, however, settle on a standard for what constitutes an unconstitutional partisan gerrymander.

Four Justices would have required the Bandemer plaintiffs to "prove both intentional discrimination against an identifiable political group and an actual discriminatory effect on that group." Id., at 127, 106 S.Ct. 2797. In that plurality's view, the plaintiffs had failed to make a sufficient showing on the latter point because their evidence of unfavorable election results for Democrats was limited to a single election cycle. See id., at 135, 106 S.Ct. 2797.

Three Justices, concurring in the judgment, would have held that the "Equal Protection Clause does not supply judicially manageable standards for resolving purely political gerrymandering claims." Id., at 147, 106 S.Ct. 2797 (opinion of O'Connor, J.). Justice O'Connor took issue, in particular, with the plurality's focus on factual questions concerning "statewide 62 electoral success." Id., at 158, 106 S.Ct. 2797. She warned that allowing district courts to "strike down apportionment plans on the basis of their prognostications as to the outcome of future elections or future apportionments invites 'findings' on matters as to which neither judges nor anyone else can have any confidence." Id., at 160, 106 S.Ct. 2797.

Justice Powell, joined by Justice Stevens, concurred in part and dissented in part. In his view, the plaintiffs' claim was not simply that their "voting strength was diluted statewide," but rather that "certain key districts were grotesquely gerrymandered to enhance the election prospects of Republican candidates." Id., at 162, 169, 106 S.Ct. 2797. Thus, he would have focused on the question "whether the boundaries of the voting districts have been distorted deliberately and arbitrarily to achieve illegitimate ends." Id., at 165, 106 S.Ct. 2797.

Eighteen years later, we revisited the issue in Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158 L.Ed.2d 546 (2004). In that case the plaintiffs argued that Pennsylvania's Legislature had created "meandering and irregular" congressional districts that "ignored all traditional redistricting criteria, including the preservation of local government boundaries," in order to provide an advantage to Republican candidates for Congress. Id., at 272–273, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (plurality opinion) (brackets omitted).

The Vieth Court broke down on numerous lines. Writing for a four-Justice plurality, Justice Scalia would have held that the plaintiffs' claims were nonjusticiable *1928 because there was no "judicially discernible and manageable standard" by which to decide them. Id., at 306, 124 S.Ct. 1769. On those grounds, the plurality affirmed the dismissal of the claims. Ibid. Justice KENNEDY concurred in the judgment. He noted that "there are yet no agreed upon substantive principles of fairness in districting," and that, consequently, "we have no basis on which to define clear, manageable, and politically neutral standards for measuring the particular burden" on constitutional rights. Id., at 307–308, 124 S.Ct. 1769. He rejected the principle advanced by the plaintiffs—that "a majority of voters 63 in [Pennsylvania] should be able to elect a majority of [Pennsylvania's] congressional delegation"—as a "precept" for which there is "no authority." Id., at 308, 124 S.Ct. 1769. Yet Justice KENNEDY recognized the possibility that "in another case a standard might emerge that suitably demonstrates how an apportionment's de facto incorporation of partisan classifications burdens" representational rights. Id., at 312, 124 S.Ct. 1769.

Four Justices dissented in three different opinions. Justice Stevens would have permitted the plaintiffs' claims to proceed on a district-by-district basis, using a legal standard similar to the standard for racial gerrymandering set forth in Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996). See 541 U.S., at 335–336, 339, 124 S.Ct. 1769. Under this standard, any district with a "bizarre shape" for which the only possible explanation was "a naked desire to increase partisan strength" would be found unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause. Id., at 339, 124 S.Ct. 1769. Justice Souter, joined by Justice GINSBURG, agreed that a plaintiff alleging unconstitutional partisan gerrymandering should proceed on a district-by-district basis, as "we would be able to call more readily on some existing law when we defined what is suspect at the district level." See id., at 346–347, 124 S.Ct. 1769.

Justice BREYER dissented on still other grounds. In his view, the drawing of single-member legislative districts—even according to traditional criteria—is "rarely ... politically neutral." Id., at 359, 124 S.Ct. 1769. He therefore would have distinguished between gerrymandering for passing political advantage and gerrymandering leading to the "unjustified entrenchment" of a political party. Id., at 360–361, 124 S.Ct. 1769.

The Court last took up this question in League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (LULAC). The plaintiffs there challenged a mid-decade redistricting map passed by the Texas Legislature. As in Vieth, a majority of the Court could find no justiciable standard by which to resolve the plaintiffs' partisan gerrymandering claims. Relevant to this case, an amicus brief 64 in support of the LULAC plaintiffs proposed a "symmetry standard" to "measure partisan bias" by comparing how the two major political parties "would fare hypothetically if they each ... received a given percentage of the vote." 548 U.S., at 419, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.). Justice KENNEDY noted some wariness at the prospect of "adopting a constitutional standard that invalidates a map based on unfair results that would occur in a hypothetical state of affairs." Id., at 420, 126 S.Ct. 2594. Aside from that problem, he wrote, the partisan bias standard shed no light on "how much partisan dominance is too much." Ibid. Justice KENNEDY therefore concluded that "asymmetry alone is not a reliable measure of unconstitutional partisanship." Ibid.

Justice Stevens would have found that the Texas map was a partisan gerrymander *1929 based in part on the asymmetric advantage it conferred on Republicans in converting votes to seats. Id., at 466–467, 471–473, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part). Justice Souter, writing for himself and Justice GINSBURG, noted that he would not "rule out the utility of a criterion of symmetry," and that "further attention could be devoted to the administrability of such a criterion at all levels of redistricting and its review." Id., at 483–484, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part).

B

[4] At argument on appeal in this case, counsel for the plaintiffs argued that this Court can address the problem of partisan gerrymandering because it must : The Court should exercise its power here because it is the "only institution in the United States" capable of "solv[ing] this problem." Tr. of Oral Arg. 62. Such invitations must be answered with care. "Failure of political will does not justify unconstitutional remedies." Clinton v. City of New York, 524 U.S. 417, 449, 118 S.Ct. 2091, 141 L.Ed.2d 393 (1998) (KENNEDY, J., concurring). Our power as judges to "say what the law is," Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 177, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803), rests not on the default of politically accountable 65 officers, but is instead grounded in and limited by the necessity of resolving, according to legal principles, a plaintiff's particular claim of legal right.

Our considerable efforts in Gaffney, Bandemer, Vieth, and LULAC leave unresolved whether such claims may be brought in cases involving allegations of partisan gerrymandering. In particular, two threshold questions remain: what is necessary to show standing in a case of this sort, and whether those claims are justiciable. Here we do not decide the latter question because the plaintiffs in this case have not shown standing under the theory upon which they based their claims for relief.

[5] [6] [7] [8] To ensure that the Federal Judiciary respects "the proper—and properly limited—role of the courts in a democratic society," Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 750, 104 S.Ct. 3315, 82 L.Ed.2d 556 (1984), a plaintiff may not invoke federal-court jurisdiction unless he can show "a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy." Baker, 369 U.S., at 204, 82 S.Ct. 691. A federal court is not "a forum for generalized grievances," and the requirement of such a personal stake "ensures that courts exercise power that is judicial in nature." Lance, 549 U.S., at 439, 441, 127 S.Ct. 1194. We enforce that requirement by insisting that a plaintiff satisfy the familiar three-part test for Article III standing: that he "(1) suffered an injury in fact, (2) that is fairly traceable to the challenged conduct of the defendant, and (3) that is likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision." Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 578 U.S. 330, 338, 136 S.Ct. 1540, 1547, 194 L.Ed.2d 635 (2016). Foremost among these requirements is injury in fact—a plaintiff's pleading and proof that he has suffered the "invasion of a legally protected interest" that is "concrete and particularized," i.e., which "affect [s] the plaintiff in a personal and individual way." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560, and n. 1, 112 S.Ct. 2130, 119 L.Ed.2d 351 (1992).

[9] We have long recognized that a person's right to vote is "individual and personal in nature." Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 561, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964). Thus, "voters who allege facts showing 66 disadvantage to themselves as individuals have standing to sue" to remedy that disadvantage. Baker, 369 U.S., at 206, 82 S.Ct. 691. The plaintiffs in *1930 this case alleged that they suffered such injury from partisan gerrymandering, which works through "packing" and "cracking" voters of one party to disadvantage those voters. 1 App. 28–29, 32–33, Complaint ¶¶ 5, 15. That is, the plaintiffs claim a constitutional right not to be placed in legislative districts deliberately designed to "waste" their votes in elections where their chosen candidates will win in landslides (packing) or are destined to lose by closer margins (cracking). Id., at 32–33, ¶ 15.

[10] To the extent the plaintiffs' alleged harm is the dilution of their votes, that injury is district specific. An individual voter in Wisconsin is placed in a single district. He votes for a single representative. The boundaries of the district, and the composition of its voters, determine whether and to what extent a particular voter is packed or cracked. This "disadvantage to [the voter] as [an] individual[ ]," Baker, 369 U.S., at 206, 82 S.Ct. 691 therefore results from the boundaries of the particular district in which he resides. And a plaintiff's remedy must be "limited to the inadequacy that produced [his] injury in fact." Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 357, 116 S.Ct. 2174, 135 L.Ed.2d 606 (1996). In this case the remedy that is proper and sufficient lies in the revision of the boundaries of the individual's own district.

[11] [12] [13] For similar reasons, we have held that a plaintiff who alleges that he is the object of a racial gerrymander—a drawing of district lines on the basis of race —has standing to assert only that his own district has been so gerrymandered. See United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 744–745, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995). A plaintiff who complains of gerrymandering, but who does not live in a gerrymandered district, "assert[s] only a generalized grievance against governmental conduct of which he or she does not approve." Id., at 745, 115 S.Ct. 2431. Plaintiffs who complain of racial gerrymandering in their State cannot sue to invalidate the whole State's legislative districting map; such complaints 67 must proceed "district by district." Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 262, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1265, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015).

The plaintiffs argue that their claim of statewide injury is analogous to the claims presented in Baker and Reynolds, which they assert were "statewide in nature" because they rested on allegations that "districts throughout a state [had] been malapportioned." Brief for Appellees 29. But, as we have already noted, the holdings in Baker and Reynolds were expressly premised on the understanding that the injuries giving rise to those claims were "individual and personal in nature," Reynolds, 377 U.S., at 561, 84 S.Ct. 1362 because the claims were brought by voters who alleged "facts showing disadvantage to themselves as individuals," Baker, 369 U.S., at 206, 82 S.Ct. 691.

The plaintiffs' mistaken insistence that the claims in Baker and Reynolds were "statewide in nature" rests on a failure to distinguish injury from remedy. In those malapportionment cases, the only way to vindicate an individual plaintiff's right to an equally weighted vote was through a wholesale "restructuring of the geographical distribution of seats in a state legislature." Reynolds, 377 U.S., at 561, 84 S.Ct. 1362; see, e.g., Moss v. Burkhart, 220 F.Supp. 149, 156–160 (W.D.Okla.1963) (directing the county-by-county reapportionment of the Oklahoma Legislature), aff'd sub nom. Williams v. Moss, 378 U.S. 558, 84 S.Ct. 1907, 12 L.Ed.2d 1026 (1964) (per curiam).

Here, the plaintiffs' partisan gerrymandering claims turn on allegations that their *1931 votes have been diluted. That harm arises from the particular composition of the voter's own district, which causes his vote—having been packed or cracked—to carry less weight than it would carry in another, hypothetical district. Remedying the individual voter's harm, therefore, does not necessarily require restructuring all of the State's legislative districts. It requires revising only such districts as are necessary to reshape the voter's district—so that the voter may be unpacked or uncracked, as the case may be. Cf. 68 Alabama Legislative Black Caucus, 575 U.S., at 262–263, 135 S.Ct., at 1265. This fits the rule that a "remedy must of course be limited to the inadequacy that produced the injury in fact that the plaintiff has established." Lewis, 518 U.S., at 357, 116 S.Ct. 2174.

[14] The plaintiffs argue that their legal injury is not limited to the injury that they have suffered as individual voters, but extends also to the statewide harm to their interest "in their collective representation in the legislature," and in influencing the legislature's overall "composition and policymaking." Brief for Appellees 31. But our cases to date have not found that this presents an individual and personal injury of the kind required for Article III standing. On the facts of this case, the plaintiffs may not rely on "the kind of undifferentiated, generalized grievance about the conduct of government that we have refused to countenance in the past." Lance, 549 U.S., at 442, 127 S.Ct. 1194. A citizen's interest in the overall composition of the legislature is embodied in his right to vote for his representative. And the citizen's abstract interest in policies adopted by the legislature on the facts here is a nonjusticiable "general interest common to all members of the public." Ex parte Levitt, 302 U.S. 633, 634, 58 S.Ct. 1, 82 L.Ed. 493 (1937) (per curiam).

We leave for another day consideration of other possible theories of harm not presented here and whether those theories might present justiciable claims giving rise to statewide remedies. Justice KAGAN's concurring opinion endeavors to address "other kinds of constitutional harm," see post, at 1938, perhaps involving different kinds of plaintiffs, see post, at 1938 – 1939, and differently alleged burdens, see post, at 81. But the opinion of the Court rests on the understanding that we lack jurisdiction to decide this case, much less to draw speculative and advisory conclusions regarding others. See Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75, 90, 67 S.Ct. 556, 91 L.Ed. 754 (1947) (noting that courts must "respect the limits of [their] unique authority" and engage in "[j]udicial exposition ... only when necessary to decide definite issues between litigants"). The reasoning of this Court 69 with respect to the disposition of this case is set forth in this opinion and none other. And the sum of the standing principles articulated here, as applied to this case, is that the harm asserted by the plaintiffs is best understood as arising from a burden on those plaintiffs' own votes. In this gerrymandering context that burden arises through a voter's placement in a "cracked" or "packed" district.

C

[15] Four of the plaintiffs in this case—Mary Lynne Donohue, Wendy Sue Johnson, Janet Mitchell, and Jerome Wallace—pleaded a particularized burden along such lines. They alleged that Act 43 had "dilut[ed] the influence" of their votes as a result of packing or cracking in their legislative districts. See 1 App. 34–36, Complaint ¶¶ 20, 23, 24, 26. The facts necessary to establish standing, however, must not only be alleged at the pleading stage, but also proved at trial. See Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S., at 561, 112 S.Ct. 2130. As the proceedings in the *1932 District Court progressed to trial, the plaintiffs failed to meaningfully pursue their allegations of individual harm. The plaintiffs did not seek to show such requisite harm since, on this record, it appears that not a single plaintiff sought to prove that he or she lives in a cracked or packed district. They instead rested their case at trial—and their arguments before this Court—on their theory of statewide injury to Wisconsin Democrats, in support of which they offered three kinds of evidence.

First, the plaintiffs presented the testimony of the lead plaintiff, Professor Whitford. But Whitford's testimony does not support any claim of packing or cracking of himself as a voter. Indeed, Whitford expressly acknowledged that Act 43 did not affect the weight of his vote. 147 Record 37. His testimony points merely to his hope of achieving a Democratic majority in the legislature—what the plaintiffs describe here as their shared interest in the composition of "the legislature as a whole." Brief for Appellees 32. 70 Under our cases to date, that is a collective political interest, not an individual legal interest, and the Court must be cautious that it does not become "a forum for generalized grievances." Lance, 549 U.S., at 439, 441, 127 S.Ct. 1194.

Second, the plaintiffs provided evidence regarding the mapmakers' deliberations as they drew district lines. As the District Court recounted, the plaintiffs' evidence showed that the mapmakers "test[ed] the partisan makeup and performance of districts as they might be configured in different ways." 218 F.Supp.3d, at 891. Each of the mapmakers' alternative configurations came with a table that listed the number of "Safe" and "Lean" seats for each party, as well as "Swing" seats. Ibid. The mapmakers also labeled certain districts as ones in which "GOP seats [would be] strengthened a lot," id., at 893; 2 App. 344, or which would result in "Statistical Pick Ups" for Republicans. 218 F.Supp.3d, at 893 (alterations omitted). And they identified still other districts in which "GOP seats [would be] strengthened a little," "weakened a little," or were "likely lost." Ibid.

[16] The District Court relied upon this evidence in concluding that, "from the outset of the redistricting process, the drafters sought to understand the partisan effects of the maps they were drawing." Id., at 895. That evidence may well be pertinent with respect to any ultimate determination whether the plaintiffs may prevail in their claims against the defendants, assuming such claims present a justiciable controversy. But the question at this point is whether the plaintiffs have established injury in fact. That turns on effect, not intent, and requires a showing of a burden on the plaintiffs' votes that is "actual or imminent, not 'conjectural' or 'hypothetical.' " Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S., at 560, 112 S.Ct. 2130.

Third, the plaintiffs offered evidence concerning the impact that Act 43 had in skewing Wisconsin's statewide political map in favor of Republicans. This evidence, which made up the heart of the plaintiffs' case, was derived from partisan-asymmetry studies similar to those discussed in LULAC. 71 The plaintiffs contend that these studies measure deviations from "partisan symmetry," which they describe as the "social scientific tenet that [districting] maps should treat parties symmetrically." Brief for Appellees 37. In the District Court, the plaintiffs' case rested largely on a particular measure of partisan asymmetry—the "efficiency gap" of wasted votes. See supra, at 1923 – 1924. That measure was first developed in two academic articles published shortly before the initiation of this lawsuit. See Stephanopoulos & McGhee, *1933 Partisan Gerrymandering and the Efficiency Gap, 82 U. Chi. L. Rev. 831 (2015); McGhee, Measuring Partisan Bias in Single–Member District Electoral Systems, 39 Leg. Studies Q. 55 (2014).

The plaintiffs asserted in their complaint that the "efficiency gap captures in a single number all of a district plan's cracking and packing." 1 App. 28–29, Complaint ¶ 5 (emphasis deleted). That number is calculated by subtracting the statewide sum of one party's wasted votes from the statewide sum of the other party's wasted votes and dividing the result by the statewide sum of all votes cast, where "wasted votes" are defined as all votes cast for a losing candidate and all votes cast for a winning candidate beyond the 50% plus one that ensures victory. See Brief for Eric McGhee as Amicus Curiae 6, and n. 3. The larger the number produced by that calculation, the greater the asymmetry between the parties in their efficiency in converting votes into legislative seats. Though they take no firm position on the matter, the plaintiffs have suggested that an efficiency gap in the range of 7% to 10% should trigger constitutional scrutiny. See Brief for Appellees 52–53, and n. 17.

[17] The plaintiffs and their amici curiae promise us that the efficiency gap and similar measures of partisan asymmetry will allow the federal courts—armed with just "a pencil and paper or a hand calculator"—to finally solve the problem of partisan gerrymandering that has confounded the Court for decades. Brief for Heather K. Gerken et al. as Amici Curiae 72 27 (citing Wang, Let Math Save Our Democracy, N.Y. Times, Dec. 5, 2015). We need not doubt the plaintiffs' math. The difficulty for standing purposes is that these calculations are an average measure. They do not address the effect that a gerrymander has on the votes of particular citizens. Partisan-asymmetry metrics such as the efficiency gap measure something else entirely: the effect that a gerrymander has on the fortunes of political parties.

Consider the situation of Professor Whitford, who lives in District 76, where, defendants contend, Democrats are "naturally" packed due to their geographic concentration, with that of plaintiff Mary Lynne Donohue, who lives in Assembly District 26 in Sheboygan, where Democrats like her have allegedly been deliberately cracked. By all accounts, Act 43 has not affected Whitford's individual vote for his Assembly representative—even plaintiffs' own demonstration map resulted in a virtually identical district for him. Donohue, on the other hand, alleges that Act 43 burdened her individual vote. Yet neither the efficiency gap nor the other measures of partisan asymmetry offered by the plaintiffs are capable of telling the difference between what Act 43 did to Whitford and what it did to Donohue. The single statewide measure of partisan advantage delivered by the efficiency gap treats Whitford and Donohue as indistinguishable, even though their individual situations are quite different.

That shortcoming confirms the fundamental problem with the plaintiffs' case as presented on this record. It is a case about group political interests, not individual legal rights. But this Court is not responsible for vindicating generalized partisan preferences. The Court's constitutionally prescribed role is to vindicate the individual rights of the people appearing before it.

III

[18] In cases where a plaintiff fails to demonstrate Article III standing, we usually direct the dismissal of the plaintiff's claims. See, e.g., 73 DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 354, 126 S.Ct. 1854, 164 L.Ed.2d 589 (2006). This is not the *1934 usual case. It concerns an unsettled kind of claim this Court has not agreed upon, the contours and justiciability of which are unresolved. Under the circumstances, and in light of the plaintiffs' allegations that Donohue, Johnson, Mitchell, and Wallace live in districts where Democrats like them have been packed or cracked, we decline to direct dismissal.

We therefore remand the case to the District Court so that the plaintiffs may have an opportunity to prove concrete and particularized injuries using evidence—unlike the bulk of the evidence presented thus far—that would tend to demonstrate a burden on their individual votes. Cf. Alabama Legislative Black Caucus, 575 U.S., at 264–265, 135 S.Ct., at 1266 (remanding for further consideration of the plaintiffs' gerrymandering claims on a district-by-district basis). We express no view on the merits of the plaintiffs' case. We caution, however, that "standing is not dispensed in gross": A plaintiff's remedy must be tailored to redress the plaintiff's particular injury. Cuno, 547 U.S., at 353, 126 S.Ct. 1854.

The judgment of the District Court is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice KAGAN, with whom Justice GINSBURG, Justice BREYER, and Justice SOTOMAYOR join, concurring.
The Court holds today that a plaintiff asserting a partisan gerrymandering claim based on a theory of vote dilution must prove that she lives in a packed or cracked district in order to establish standing. See ante, at 1929 – 1932. The Court also holds that none of the plaintiffs here have yet made that required showing. See ante, at 1931 – 1932.

I agree with both conclusions, and with the Court's decision to remand this case to allow the plaintiffs to prove that they live in packed or cracked districts, see ante, at 1933 – 1934. I write to address in more detail what kind of evidence the 74 present plaintiffs (or any additional ones) must offer to support that allegation. And I write to make some observations about what would happen if they succeed in proving standing—that is, about how their vote dilution case could then proceed on the merits. The key point is that the case could go forward in much the same way it did below: Given the charges of statewide packing and cracking, affecting a slew of districts and residents, the challengers could make use of statewide evidence and seek a statewide remedy.

I also write separately because I think the plaintiffs may have wanted to do more than present a vote dilution theory. Partisan gerrymandering no doubt burdens individual votes, but it also causes other harms. And at some points in this litigation, the plaintiffs complained of a different injury—an infringement of their First Amendment right of association. The Court rightly does not address that alternative argument: The plaintiffs did not advance it with sufficient clarity or concreteness to make it a real part of the case. But because on remand they may well develop the associational theory, I address the standing requirement that would then apply. As I'll explain, a plaintiff presenting such a theory would not need to show that her particular voting district was packed or cracked for standing purposes because that fact would bear no connection to her substantive claim. Indeed, everything about the litigation of that claim—from standing on down to remedy—would be statewide in nature.

Partisan gerrymandering, as this Court has recognized, is "incompatible with democratic 1935 principles." Arizona State Legislature v. Arizona Independent Redistricting Comm'n, 576 U.S. 787, 791, 135 S.Ct. 2652, 2658, 192 L.Ed.2d 704 (2015) (quoting Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 292, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158 L.Ed.2d 546 (2004) (plurality opinion); alterations omitted). More effectively every day, that practice enables politicians to entrench themselves in power against the people's will. And only the courts can do anything to remedy the problem, because gerrymanders benefit those who control the political branches. None of those facts gives judges any excuse to *75 disregard Article III's demands. The Court is right to say they were not met here. But partisan gerrymandering injures enough individuals and organizations in enough concrete ways to ensure that standing requirements, properly applied, will not often or long prevent courts from reaching the merits of cases like this one. Or from insisting, when they do, that partisan officials stop degrading the nation's democracy.

I

As the Court explains, the plaintiffs' theory in this case focuses on vote dilution. See ante, at 1930 – 1931 ("Here, the plaintiffs' partisan gerrymandering claims turn on allegations that their votes have been diluted"); see also ante, at 1929 – 1930, 1931 – 1932. That is, the plaintiffs assert that Wisconsin's State Assembly Map has caused their votes "to carry less weight than [they] would carry in another, hypothetical district." Ante, at 1931. And the mechanism used to wreak that harm is "packing" and "cracking." Ante, at 1929 – 1930. In a relatively few districts, the mapmakers packed supermajorities of Democratic voters—well beyond the number needed for a Democratic candidate to prevail. And in many more districts, dispersed throughout the State, the mapmakers cracked Democratic voters—spreading them sufficiently thin to prevent them from electing their preferred candidates. The result of both practices is to "waste" Democrats' votes. Ibid.

The harm of vote dilution, as this Court has long stated, is "individual and personal in nature." Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 561, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964); see ante, at 1930 – 1931. It arises when an election practice—most commonly, the drawing of district lines—devalues one citizen's vote as compared to others. Of course, such practices invariably affect more than one citizen at a time. For example, our original one-person, one-vote cases considered how malapportioned maps "contract[ed] the value" of urban citizens' votes while "expand[ing]" the value of rural citizens' votes. *76 Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 7, 84 S.Ct. 526, 11 L.Ed.2d 481 (1964). But we understood the injury as giving diminished weight to each particular vote, even if millions were so touched. In such cases, a voter living in an overpopulated district suffered "disadvantage to [herself] as [an] individual [ ]": Her vote counted for less than the votes of other citizens in her State. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 206, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962); see ante, at 1930 – 1931. And that kind of disadvantage is what a plaintiff asserting a vote dilution claim—in the one-person, one-vote context or any other—always alleges.

To have standing to bring a partisan gerrymandering claim based on vote dilution, then, a plaintiff must prove that the value of her own vote has been "contract[ed]." Wesberry, 376 U.S., at 7, 84 S.Ct. 526. And that entails showing, as the Court holds, that she lives in a district that has been either packed or cracked. See ante, at 1931 – 1932. For packing and cracking are the ways in which a partisan gerrymander dilutes votes. Cf. Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 153–154, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993) (explaining 1936 that packing or cracking can also support racial vote dilution claims). Consider the perfect form of each variety. When a voter resides in a packed district, her preferred candidate will win no matter what; when a voter lives in a cracked district, her chosen candidate stands no chance of prevailing. But either way, such a citizen's vote carries less weight—has less consequence—than it would under a neutrally drawn map. See ante, at 1929 – 1930, 1931. So when she shows that her district has been packed or cracked, she proves, as she must to establish standing, that she is "among the injured." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 563, 112 S.Ct. 2130, 119 L.Ed.2d 351 (1992) (quoting Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U.S. 727, 735, 92 S.Ct. 1361, 31 L.Ed.2d 636 (1972)); see ante, at 1931 – 1932.

In many partisan gerrymandering cases, that threshold showing will not be hard to make. Among other ways of proving packing or cracking, a plaintiff could produce an alternative map (or set of alternative maps)—comparably consistent with traditional districting principles—under which her vote would carry more weight. Cf. ante, at 1933 (suggesting 77 how an alternative map may shed light on vote dilution or its absence); Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 258, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (discussing the use of alternative maps as evidence in a racial gerrymandering case); Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S. 285, 317–322, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 1478–1482, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017) (same); Brief for Political Geography Scholars as Amici Curiae 12–14 (describing computer simulation techniques for devising alternative maps). For example, a Democratic plaintiff living in a 75%-Democratic district could prove she was packed by presenting a different map, drawn without a focus on partisan advantage, that would place her in a 60%-Democratic district. Or conversely, a Democratic plaintiff residing in a 35%-Democratic district could prove she was cracked by offering an alternative, neutrally drawn map putting her in a 50–50 district. The precise numbers are of no import. The point is that the plaintiff can show, through drawing alternative district lines, that partisan-based packing or cracking diluted her vote.

Here, the Court is right that the plaintiffs have so far failed to make such a showing. See ante, at 1931 – 1933. William Whitford was the only plaintiff to testify at trial about the alleged gerrymander's effects. He expressly acknowledged that his district would be materially identical under any conceivable map, whether or not drawn to achieve partisan advantage. See ante, at 1932, 1931 – 1933. That means Wisconsin's plan could not have diluted Whitford's own vote. So whatever other claims he might have, see infra, at 1937 – 1939, Whitford is not "among the injured" in a vote dilution challenge. Lujan, 504 U.S., at 563, 112 S.Ct. 2130 (quoting Sierra Club, 405 U.S., at 735, 92 S.Ct. 1361). Four other plaintiffs differed from Whitford by alleging in the complaint that they lived in packed or cracked districts. But for whatever reason, they failed to back up those allegations with evidence as the suit proceeded. See ante, at 1931 – 1932. So they too did not show the injury—a less valuable vote—central to their vote dilution theory.

That problem, however, may be readily fixable. The Court properly remands this case to the District Court "so 78 that the plaintiffs may have an opportunity" to "demonstrate a burden on their individual votes." Ante, at 1934. That means the plaintiffs—both the four who initially made those assertions and any others (current or newly joined)—now can introduce evidence that their individual districts were packed or cracked. And if the plaintiffs' more general charges have a basis in fact, that evidence may well be at hand. *1937 Recall that the plaintiffs here alleged—and the District Court found, see 218 F.Supp.3d 837, 896 (W.D.Wis.2016)—that a unified Republican government set out to ensure that Republicans would control as many State Assembly seats as possible over a decade (five consecutive election cycles). To that end, the government allegedly packed and cracked Democrats throughout the State, not just in a particular district (see, e.g., Benisek v. Lamone, post, p. 155 (per curiam)) or region. Assuming that is true, the plaintiffs should have a mass of packing and cracking proof, which they can now also present in district-by-district form to support their standing. In other words, a plaintiff residing in each affected district can show, through an alternative map or other evidence, that packing or cracking indeed occurred there. And if (or to the extent) that test is met, the court can proceed to decide all distinctive merits issues and award appropriate remedies.

When the court addresses those merits questions, it can consider statewide (as well as local) evidence. Of course, the court below and others like it are currently debating, without guidance from this Court, what elements make up a vote dilution claim in the partisan gerrymandering context. But assume that the plaintiffs must prove illicit partisan intent —a purpose to dilute Democrats' votes in drawing district lines. The plaintiffs could then offer evidence about the mapmakers' goals in formulating the entire statewide map (which would predictably carry down to individual districting decisions). So, for example, the plaintiffs here introduced proof that the mapmakers looked to partisan voting data when drawing districts throughout the State—and that they graded draft maps according to the amount of advantage 79 those maps conferred on Republicans. See 218 F.Supp.3d, at 890–896. This Court has explicitly recognized the relevance of such statewide evidence in addressing racial gerrymandering claims of a district-specific nature. "Voters," we held, "of course[ ] can present statewide evidence in order to prove racial gerrymandering in a particular district." Alabama

Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, 575 U.S. 254, 263, 135 S.Ct. 1257, 1265, 191 L.Ed.2d 314 (2015). And in particular, "[s]uch evidence is perfectly relevant" to showing that mapmakers had an invidious "motive" in drawing the lines of "multiple districts in the State." Id., at 266–267, 135 S.Ct., at 1267. The same should be true for partisan gerrymandering.

Similarly, cases like this one might warrant a statewide remedy. Suppose that mapmakers pack or crack a critical mass of State Assembly districts all across the State to elect as many Republican politicians as possible. And suppose plaintiffs residing in those districts prevail in a suit challenging that gerrymander on a vote dilution theory. The plaintiffs might then receive exactly the relief sought in this case. To be sure, remedying each plaintiff's vote dilution injury "requires revising only such districts as are necessary to reshape [that plaintiff's] district—so that the [plaintiff] may be unpacked or uncracked, as the case may be." Ante, at 16. But with enough plaintiffs joined together—attacking all the packed and cracked districts in a statewide gerrymander—those obligatory revisions could amount to a wholesale restructuring of the State's districting plan. The Court recognizes as much. It states that a proper remedy in a vote dilution case "does not necessarily require restructuring all of the State's legislative districts." Ibid. (emphasis added). Not necessarily—but possibly. It all depends on how much redistricting is needed to cure all the packing and cracking that the mapmakers have done.

II

Everything said so far relates only to suits alleging that a partisan gerrymander *1938 dilutes individual votes. That is the 80 way the Court sees this litigation. See ante, at 1929 – 1932. And as I'll discuss, that is the most reasonable view. See infra, at 1939 – 1940. But partisan gerrymanders inflict other kinds of constitutional harm as well. Among those injuries, partisan gerrymanders may infringe the First Amendment rights of association held by parties, other political organizations, and their members. The plaintiffs here have sometimes pointed to that kind of harm. To the extent they meant to do so, and choose to do so on remand, their associational claim would occasion a different standing inquiry than the one in the Court's opinion.

Justice KENNEDY explained the First Amendment associational injury deriving from a partisan gerrymander in his concurring opinion in Vieth, 541 U.S. 267, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158 L.Ed.2d 546. "Representative democracy," Justice KENNEDY pointed out, is today "unimaginable without the ability of citizens to band together" to advance their political beliefs. Id., at 314, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (opinion concurring in judgment) (quoting California Democratic Party v. Jones, 530 U.S. 567, 574, 120 S.Ct. 2402, 147 L.Ed.2d 502 (2000)). That means significant "First Amendment concerns arise" when a State purposely "subject[s] a group of voters or their party to disfavored treatment." 541 U.S., at 314, 124 S.Ct. 1769. Such action "burden[s] a group of voters' representational rights." Ibid.; see id., at 315, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (similarly describing the "burden[ ] on a disfavored party and its voters" and the "burden [on] a group's representational rights"). And it does so because of their "political association," "participation in the electoral process," "voting history," or "expression of political views." Id., at 314–315, 124 S.Ct. 1769.

As so formulated, the associational harm of a partisan gerrymander is distinct from vote dilution. Consider an active member of the Democratic Party in Wisconsin who resides in a district that a partisan gerrymander has left untouched (neither packed nor cracked). His individual vote carries no less weight than it did before. But if the gerrymander ravaged the party he works to support, then he indeed suffers harm, as do all other involved members of that party. This 81 is the kind of "burden" to "a group of voters' representational rights" Justice KENNEDY spoke of. Id., at 314, 124 S.Ct. 1769. Members of the "disfavored party" in the State, id., at 315, 124 S.Ct. 1769 deprived of their natural political strength by a partisan gerrymander, may face difficulties fundraising, registering voters, attracting volunteers, generating support from independents, and recruiting candidates to run for office (not to mention eventually accomplishing their policy objectives). See Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 791–792, and n. 12, 103 S.Ct. 1564, 75 L.Ed.2d 547 (1983) (concluding that similar harms inflicted by a state election law amounted to a "burden imposed on ... associational rights"). And what is true for party members may be doubly true for party officials and triply true for the party itself (or for related organizations). Cf. California Democratic Party, 530 U.S., at 586, 120 S.Ct. 2402 (holding that a state law violated state political parties' First Amendment rights of association). By placing a state party at an enduring electoral disadvantage, the gerrymander weakens its capacity to perform all its functions.

And if that is the essence of the harm alleged, then the standing analysis should differ from the one the Court applies.

Standing, we have long held, "turns on the nature and source of the claim asserted." Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 500, 95 S.Ct. 2197, 45 L.Ed.2d 343 (1975). Indeed, that idea lies at the root of today's opinion. It is because the Court views the harm *1939 alleged as vote dilution that it (rightly) insists that each plaintiff show packing or cracking in her own district to establish her standing. See ante, at 1929 – 1932; supra, at 1935 – 1936. But when the harm alleged is not district specific, the proof needed for standing should not be district specific either. And the associational injury flowing from a statewide partisan gerrymander, whether alleged by a party member or the party itself, has nothing to do with the packing or cracking of any single district's lines. The complaint in such a case is instead that the gerrymander has burdened the ability of like-minded people across the State to affiliate in a political party 82 and carry out that organization's activities and objects. See supra, at 1937 – 1939. Because a plaintiff can have that complaint without living in a packed or cracked district, she need not show what the Court demands today for a vote dilution claim. Or said otherwise: Because on this alternative theory, the valued association and the injury to it are statewide, so too is the relevant standing requirement.

On occasion, the plaintiffs here have indicated that they have an associational claim in mind. In addition to repeatedly alleging vote dilution, their complaint asserted in general terms that Wisconsin's districting plan infringes their "First Amendment right to freely associate with each other without discrimination by the State based on that association." 1 App. 61, Complaint ¶ 91. Similarly, the plaintiffs noted before this Court that "[b]eyond diluting votes, partisan gerrymandering offends First Amendment values by penalizing citizens because of ... their association with a political party." Brief for Appellees 36 (internal quotation marks omitted). And finally, the plaintiffs' evidence of partisan asymmetry well fits a suit alleging associational injury (although, as noted below, that was not how it was used, see infra, at 1939 – 1940). As the Court points out, what those statistical metrics best measure is a gerrymander's effect "on the fortunes of political parties" and those associated with them. Ante, at 1933.

In the end, though, I think the plaintiffs did not sufficiently advance a First Amendment associational theory to avoid the Court's holding on standing. Despite referring to that theory in their complaint, the plaintiffs tried this case as though it were about vote dilution alone. Their testimony and other evidence went toward establishing the effects of rampant packing and cracking on the value of individual citizens' votes. Even their proof of partisan asymmetry was used for that purpose—although as noted above, it could easily have supported the alternative theory of associational 83 harm, see supra, at 1939. The plaintiffs joining in this suit do not include the State Democratic Party (or any related statewide organization). They did not emphasize their membership in that party, or their activities supporting it. And they did not speak to any tangible associational burdens—ways the gerrymander had debilitated their party or weakened its ability to carry out its core functions and purposes, see supra, at 1937 – 1939. Even in this Court, when disputing the State's argument that they lacked standing, the plaintiffs reiterated their suit's core theory: that the gerrymander "intentionally, severely, durably, and unjustifiably dilutes Democratic votes." Brief for Appellees 29–30. Given that theory, the plaintiffs needed to show that their own votes were indeed diluted in order to establish standing.

But nothing in the Court's opinion prevents the plaintiffs on remand from pursuing an associational claim, or from satisfying the different standing requirement that theory would entail. The Court's *1940 opinion is about a suit challenging a partisan gerrymander on a particular ground—that it dilutes the votes of individual citizens. That opinion "leave[s] for another day consideration of other possible theories of harm not presented here and whether those theories might present justiciable claims giving rise to statewide remedies." Ante, at 1931. And in particular, it leaves for another day the theory of harm advanced by Justice KENNEDY in Vieth : that a partisan gerrymander interferes with the vital "ability of citizens to band together" to further their political beliefs. 541 U.S., at 314, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (quoting California Democratic Party, 530 U.S., at 574, 120 S.Ct. 2402). Nothing about that injury is "generalized" or "abstract," as the Court says is true of the plaintiffs' dissatisfaction with the "overall composition of the legislature." Ante, at 1931. A suit raising an associational theory complains of concrete "burdens on a disfavored party" and its members as they pursue their political interests and goals. Vieth, 541 U.S., at 315, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.); see supra, at 1937 – 1939. 84 And when the suit alleges that a gerrymander has imposed those burdens on a statewide basis, then its litigation should be statewide too—as to standing, liability, and remedy alike.

III

Partisan gerrymandering jeopardizes "[t]he ordered working of our Republic, and of the democratic process." Vieth, 541 U.S., at 316, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.). It enables a party that happens to be in power at the right time to entrench itself there for a decade or more, no matter what the voters would prefer. At its most extreme, the practice amounts to "rigging elections." Id., at 317, 124 S.Ct. 1769 (internal quotation marks omitted). It thus violates the most fundamental of all democratic principles—that "the voters should choose their representatives, not the other way around." Arizona State Legislature, 576 U.S., at 824, 135 S.Ct., at 2677 (quoting Berman, Managing Gerrymandering, 83 Texas L. Rev. 781 (2005)).

And the evils of gerrymandering seep into the legislative process itself. Among the amicus briefs in this case are two from bipartisan groups of congressional members and state legislators. They know that both parties gerrymander. And they know the consequences. The congressional brief describes a "cascade of negative results" from excessive partisan gerrymandering: indifference to swing voters and their views; extreme political positioning designed to placate the party's base and fend off primary challenges; the devaluing of negotiation and compromise; and the impossibility of reaching pragmatic, bipartisan solutions to the nation's problems. Brief for Bipartisan Group of Current and Former Members of Congress as Amici Curiae 4; see id., at 10–23. The state legislators tell a similar story. In their view, partisan gerrymandering has "sounded the death-knell of bipartisanship," creating a legislative environment that is "toxic" and "tribal [ ]." Brief for Bipartisan Group of 65 Current and Former State Legislators as Amici Curiae 6, 25.

85 I doubt James Madison would have been surprised. What, he asked when championing the Constitution, would make the House of Representatives work? The House must be structured, he answered, to instill in its members "an habitual recollection of their dependence on the people." The Federalist No. 57, p. 352 (C. Rossiter ed. 1961). Legislators must be "compelled to anticipate the moment" when their "exercise of [power] is to be reviewed." Ibid. When that moment does not come—when legislators can entrench themselves in office despite the people's will—the foundation *1941 of effective democratic governance dissolves.

And our history offers little comfort. Yes, partisan gerrymandering goes back to the Republic's earliest days; and yes, American democracy has survived. But technology makes today's gerrymandering altogether different from the crude linedrawing of the past. New redistricting software enables pinpoint precision in designing districts. With such tools, mapmakers can capture every last bit of partisan advantage, while still meeting traditional districting requirements (compactness, contiguity, and the like). See Brief for Political Science Professors as Amici Curiae 28. Gerrymanders have thus become ever more extreme and durable, insulating officeholders against all but the most titanic shifts in the political tides. The 2010 redistricting cycle produced some of the worst partisan gerrymanders on record. Id., at 3. The technology will only get better, so the 2020 cycle will only get worse.

Courts have a critical role to play in curbing partisan gerrymandering. Over fifty years ago, we committed to providing judicial review in the redistricting arena, because we understood that "a denial of constitutionally protected rights demands judicial protection." Reynolds, 377 U.S., at 566, 84 S.Ct. 1362. Indeed, the need for judicial review is at its most urgent in these cases. For here, politicians' incentives conflict with voters' interests, leaving citizens without any political remedy 86 for their constitutional harms. Of course, their dire need provides no warrant for courts to disregard Article III. Because of the way this suit was litigated, I agree that the plaintiffs have so far failed to establish their standing to sue, and I fully concur in the Court's opinion. But of one thing we may unfortunately be sure. Courts—and in particular this Court—will again be called on to redress extreme partisan gerrymanders. I am hopeful we will then step up to our responsibility to vindicate the Constitution against a contrary law.

Justice THOMAS, with whom Justice GORSUCH joins, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I join Parts I and II of the Court's opinion because I agree that the plaintiffs have failed to prove Article III standing. I do not join Part III, which gives the plaintiffs another chance to prove their standing on remand. When a plaintiff lacks standing, our ordinary practice is to remand the case with instructions to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. E.g., Lance v. Coffman, 549 U.S. 437, 442, 127 S.Ct. 1194, 167 L.Ed.2d 29 (2007) (per curiam); DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 354, 126 S.Ct. 1854, 164 L.Ed.2d 589 (2006); United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 747, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995). The Court departs from our usual practice because this is supposedly "not the usual case." Ante, at 1933 – 1934. But there is nothing unusual about it. As the Court explains, the plaintiffs' lack of standing follows from long-established principles of law. See ante, at 1929 – 1932. After a year and a half of litigation in the District Court, including a 4–day trial, the plaintiffs had a more-than-ample opportunity to prove their standing under these principles. They failed to do so. Accordingly, I would have remanded this case with instructions to dismiss.

All Citations

585 U.S. 48, 138 S.Ct. 1916, 201 L.Ed.2d 313, 86 USLW 4415, 18 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 5845, 2018 Daily Journal D.A.R. 5768, 27 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 373

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

KeyCite Yellow Flag - Negative Treatment
Superseded by Statute as Stated in U.S. v. State of N.C., E.D.N.C., February 8, 1996

91 S.Ct. 849
Supreme Court of the United States

Willie S. GRIGGS et al., Petitioners,
v.
DUKE POWER COMPANY.

No. 124
|
Argued Dec. 14, 1970.
|
Decided March 8, 1971.

Synopsis

Class action by Negro employees against employer alleging that employment practices violated Civil Rights Act. The United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina, at Greensboro, 292 F.Supp. 243, dismissed complaint, and plaintiffs appealed. The Court of Appeals, 420 F.2d 1225, affirmed, in part, reversed in part, and remanded, holding that in absence of a discriminatory purpose, requirement of high school education or passing of a standardized general intelligence test as a condition of employment in or transfer to jobs was permitted by the Civil Rights Act, and rejecting claim that because such requirements operated to render ineligible a markedly disproportionate number of Negroes, they were unlawful under the Act unless shown to be job-related. Certiorari was granted. The Supreme Court, Mr. Chief Justice Burger, held that employer was prohibited by provisions of Act pertaining to employment opportunities from requiring a high school education or passing of a standardized general intelligence test as a condition of employment in or transfer to jobs, where neither standard was shown to be significantly related to successful job performance, both requirements operated to disqualify Negroes at a substantially higher rate than white applicants, and jobs in question formerly had been filled only by white employees as part of a long-standing practice of giving preference to whites.

Reversed.

Mr. Justice Brennan took no part in consideration or decision of case.

West Headnotes (9)

[1] Civil Rights Purpose and construction in general

Civil Rights Discrimination by reason of race, color, ethnicity, or national origin, in general

Objective of Congress in enacting provisions of Civil Rights Act pertaining to employment opportunities was to achieve equality of employment opportunities and remove barriers that operated in the past to favor an identifiable group of white employees over other employees. Civil Rights Act of 1964, §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

223 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Civil Rights Disparate impact

Under provisions of Civil Rights Act pertaining to employment opportunities, practices, procedures, or tests neutral on their face, and even neutral in terms of intent, cannot be maintained if they operate to "freeze" the status quo of prior discriminatory employment practices. Civil Rights Act of 1964, §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

395 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Civil Rights Affirmative Action; Remedial Measures

Congress did not intend by provisions of Civil Rights Act pertaining to employment opportunities to guarantee a job to every person regardless of qualifications; the Act does not command that any person be hired simply because he was formerly subject of discrimination, or because he is a member of a minority group; discriminatory preference for any group, minority or majority, is precisely and only what Congress has proscribed; what is required by Congress is removal of artificial, arbitrary, and unnecessary barriers to employment when barriers operate invidiously to discriminate on basis of race or other impermissible classification. Civil Rights Act of 1964, §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

606 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Civil Rights Disparate impact

Provisions of Civil Rights Act pertaining to employment opportunities proscribe not only overt discrimination but also practices that are fair in form, but discriminatory in operation. Civil Rights Act of 1964 §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

292 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Civil Rights Discrimination by reason of race, color, ethnicity, or national origin, in general

Civil Rights Disparate impact

If an employment practice which operates to exclude Negroes cannot be shown to be related to job performance, the practice is prohibited by provisions of Civil Rights Act pertaining to employment opportunities. Civil Rights Act of 1964, §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

110 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Civil Rights Disparate impact

Civil Rights Educational requirements; ability tests

Good intent or absence of discriminatory intent does not redeem employment procedures or testing mechanisms that operate as "built-in headwinds" for minority groups and are unrelated to measuring job capability. Civil Rights Act of 1964, §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

841 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Administrative Law and Procedure Employment discrimination

Civil Rights Administrative Agencies and Proceedings

Administrative interpretation of Civil Rights Act by enforcing agency is entitled to great deference. Civil Rights Act of 1964, §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

284 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Civil Rights Disparate impact

Civil Rights Educational requirements; ability tests

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's construction of section of Civil Rights Act authorizing use of any professionally developed ability test that is not designed, intended, or used to discriminate because of race to require that employment tests be job-related comports with congressional intent. Civil Rights Act of 1964, § 703(h), 42 U.S.C.A. § 2000e–2(h).

180 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Civil Rights Disparate impact

Civil Rights Educational requirements; ability tests

Employer was prohibited, by provisions of Civil Rights Act pertaining to employment opportunities, from requiring a high school education or passing of a standardized general intelligence test as a condition of employment in or transfer to jobs, where neither standard was shown to be significantly related to successful job performance, both requirements operated to disqualify Negroes at a substantially higher rate than white applicants, and the jobs in question formerly had been filled only by white employees as part of a long-standing practice of giving preference to whites. Civil Rights Act of 1964, §§ 701 et seq., 703(a) (2), (h), 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000e et seq., 2000e–2(a) (2), (h).

719 Cases that cite this headnote

Attorneys and Law Firms

*850 425 Jack Greenberg, New York City, for petitioners.

*851 George W. Ferguson, Jr., for respondent.

Lawrence M. Cohen for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, as amicus curiae.

Opinion

Mr. Chief Justice BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

We granted the writ in this case to resolve the question whether an employer is prohibited by the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Title VII, from requiring a high school education 426 or passing of a standardized general intelligence test as a condition of employment in or transfer to jobs when (a) neither standard is shown to be significantly related to successful job performance, (b) both requirements operate to disqualify Negroes at a substantially higher rate than white applicants, and (c) the jobs in question formerly had been filled only by white employees as part of a longstanding practice of giving preference to whites.[1]

Congress provided, in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, for class actions for enforcement of provisions of the Act and this proceeding was brought by a group of incumbent Negro employees against Duke Power Company. All the petitioners are employed at the Company's Dan River Steam Station, a power generating facility located at Draper, North Carolina. At the time this action was instituted, the Company had 95 employees at the Dan River Station, 14 of whom were Negroes; 13 of these are petitioners here.

The District Court found that prior to July 2, 1965, the effective date of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the 427 Company openly discriminated on the basis of race in the hiring and assigning of employees at its Dan River plant. The plant was organized into five operating departments: (1) Labor, (2) Coal Handling, (3) Operations, (4) Maintenance, and (5) Laboratory and Test. Negroes were employed only in the Labor Department where the highest paying jobs paid less than the lowest paying jobs in the other four 'operating' departments in which only whites were employed.[2] Promotions were normally made within each department on the basis of job seniority. Transferees into a department usually began in the lowest position.

In 1955 the Company instituted a policy of requiring a high school education for initial assignment to any department except Labor, and for transfer from the Coal Handling to any 'inside' department (Operations, Maintenance, or Laboratory). When the Company abandoned its policy of restricting Negroes to the Labor Department in 1965, completion of high school also was made a prerequisite to transfer from Labor to any other department. From the time the high school requirement was instituted to the time of trial, however, white employees hired before the time of the high school education requirement continued to perform satisfactorily and achieve promotions in the 'operating' *852 departments. Findings on this score are not challenged.

The Company added a further requirement for new employees on July 2, 1965, the date on which Title VII became effective. To qualify for placement in any but the Labor Department it become necessary to register satisfactory scores on two professionally prepared aptitude 428 tests, as well as to have a high school education. Completion of high school alone continued to render employees eligible for transfer to the four desirable departments from which Negroes had been excluded if the incumbent had been employed prior to the time of the new requirement. In September 1965 the Company began to permit incumbent employees who lacked a high school education to qualify for transfer from Labor or Coal Handling to an 'inside' job by passing two tests—the Wonderlic Personnel Test, which purports to measure general intelligence, and the Bennett Mechanical Comprehension Test. Neither was directed or intended to measure the ability to learn to perform a particular job or category of jobs. The requisite scores used for both initial hiring and transfer approximated the national median for high school graduates.[3]

The District Court had found that while the Company previously followed a policy of overt racial discrimination in a period prior to the Act, such conduct had ceased. The District Court also concluded that Title VII was intended to be prospective only and, consequently, the impact of prior inequities was beyond the reach of corrective action authorized by the Act.

The Court of Appeals was confronted with a question of first impression, as are we, concerning the meaning of Title VII. After careful analysis a majority of that court concluded that a subjective test of the employer's intent should govern, particularly in a close case, and that in this case there was no showing of a discriminatory purpose in the adoption of the diploma and test requirements. On this basis, the Court of Appeals concluded there was no violation of the Act.

429 The Court of Appeals reversed the District Court in part, rejecting the holding that residual discrimination arising from prior employment practices was insulated from remedial action.[4] The Court of Appeals noted, however, that the District Court was correct in its conclusion that there was no showing of a racial purpose or invidious intent in the adoption of the high school diploma requirement or general intelligence test and that these standards had been applied fairly to whites and Negroes alike. It held that, in the absence of a discriminatory purpose, use of such requirements was permitted by the Act. In so doing, the Court of Appeals rejected the claim that because these two requirements operated to render ineligible a markedly disproportionate number of Negroes, they were unlawful under Title VII unless shown to be job related.[5] We *853 granted the writ on these claims. 399 U.S. 926, 90 S.Ct. 2238, 26 L.Ed.2d 791.

[1] [2] The objective of Congress in the enactment of Title VII is plain from the language of the statute. It was to achieve equality of employment opportunities and remove 430 barriers that have operated in the past to favor an identifiable group of white employees over other employees. Under the Act, practices, procedures, or tests neutral on their face, and even neutral in terms of intent, cannot be maintained if they operate to 'freeze' the status quo of prior discriminatory employment practices.

[3] The Court of Appeals' opinion, and the partial dissent, agreed that, on the record in the present case, 'whites register far better on the Company's alternative requirements' than Negroes.[6] 420 F.2d 1225, 1239 n. 6. This consequence would appear to be directly traceable to race. Basic intelligence must have the means of articulation to manifest itself fairly in a testing process. Because they are Negroes, petitioners have long received inferior education in segregated schools and this Court expressly recognized these differences in Gaston County v. United States, 395 U.S. 285, 89 S.Ct. 1720, 23 L.Ed.2d 309 (1969). There, because of the inferior education received by Negroes in North Carolina, this Court barred the institution of a literacy test for voter registration on the ground that the test would abridge the right to vote indirectly on account of race. Congress did not intend by Title VII, however, to guarantee a job to every person regardless of qualifications. In short, the Act does not command that any 431 person be hired simply because he was formerly the subject of discrimination, or because he is a member of a minority group. Discriminatory preference for any group, minority or majority, is precisely and only what Congress has proscribed. What is required by Congress is the removal of artificial, arbitrary, and unnecessary barriers to employment when the barriers operate invidiously to discriminate on the basis of racial or other impermissible classification.

[4] [5] Congress has now provided that tests or criteria for employment or promotion may not provide equality of opportunity merely in the sense of the fabled offer of milk to the stork and the fox. On the contrary, Congress has now required that the posture and condition of the job-seeker be taken into account. It has—to resort again to the fable—provided that the vessel in which the milk is proffered be one all seekers can use. The Act proscribes not only overt discrimination but also practices that are fair in form, but discriminatory in operation. The touchstone is business necessity. If an employment practice which operates to exclude Negroes cannot be shown to be related to job performance, the practice is prohibited.

On the record before us, neither the high school completion requirement nor the general intelligence test is shown to bear a demonstrable relationship to successful performance of the jobs for which it was used. Both were adopted, as the Court of Appeals noted, without meaningful study of their relationship to job-performance ability. Rather, a vice president of the Company testified, the requirements were instituted on the Company's judgment that they generally would improve the overall quality of the work force.

*854 The evidence, however, shows that employees who have not completed high school or taken the tests have continued to perform satisfactorily and make progress in departments for which the high school and test criteria 432 are now used.[7] The promotion record of present employees who would not be able to meet the new criteria thus suggests the possibility that the requirements may not be needed even for the limited purpose of preserving the avowed policy of advancement within the Company. In the context of this case, it is unnecessary to reach the question whether testing requirements that take into account capability for the next succeeding position or related future promotion might be utilized upon a showing that such longrange requirements fulfill a genuine business need. In the present case the Company has made no such showing.

[6] The Court of Appeals held that the Company had adopted the diploma and test requirements without any 'intention to discriminate against Negro employees.' 420 F.2d, at 1232. We do not suggest that either the District Court or the Court of Appeals erred in examining the employer's intent; but good intent or absence of discriminatory intent does not redeem employment procedures or testing mechanisms that operate as 'built-in headwinds' for minority groups and are unrelated to measuring job capability.

The Company's lack of discriminatory intent is suggested by special efforts to help the undereducated employees through Company financing of two-thirds the cost of tuition for high school training. But Congress directed the thrust of the Act to the consequences of employment practices, not simply the motivation. More than that, Congress has placed on the employer the burden of showing that any given requirement must have a manifest relationship to the employment in question.

433 The facts of this case demonstrate the inadequacy of broad and general testing devices as well as the infirmity of using diplomas or degrees as fixed measures of capability. History is filled with examples of men and women who rendered highly effective performance without the conventional badges of accomplishment in terms of certificates, diplomas, or degrees. Diplomas and tests are useful servants, but Congress has mandated the commonsense proposition that they are not to become masters of reality.

The Company contends that its general intelligence tests are specifically permitted by s 703(h) of the Act.[8] That section authorizes the use of 'any professionally developed ability test' that is not 'designed, intended or used to discriminate because of race * * *.' (Emphasis added.)

[7] The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, having enforcement responsibility, has issued guidelines interpreting s 703(h) to permit only the use of job-related tests.[9] The administrative *855 interpretation of the 434 Act by the enforcing agency is entitled to great deference. See, e.g., United States v. City of Chicago, 400 U.S. 8, 91 S.Ct. 18, 27 L.Ed.2d 9 (1970); Udall v. Tallman, 380 U.S. 1, 85 S.Ct. 792, 13 L.Ed.2d 616 (1965); Power Reactor Development Co. v. Electricians, 367 U.S. 396, 81 S.Ct. 1529, 6 L.Ed.2d 924 (1961). Since the Act and its legislative history support the Commission's construction, this affords good reason to treat the guidelines as expressing the will of Congress.

Section 703(h) was not contained in the House version of the Civil Rights Act but was added in the Senate during extended debate. For a period, debate revolved around claims that the bill as proposed would prohibit all testing and force employers to hire unqualified persons simply because they were part of a group formerly subject to job discrimination.[10] Proponents of Title VII sought throughout the debate to assure the critics that the Act would have no effect on job-related tests. Senators Case of New Jersey and Clark of Pennsylvania, comanagers of the bill on the Senate floor, issued a memorandum explaining that the proposed Title VII 'expressly protects the employer's right to insist that any prospective applicant, Negro or white, must meet the applicable job qualifications. Indeed, the very purpose of title VII is to promote hiring on the basis of job qualifications, rather than on the basis of race or color.' 110 Cong.Rec. 7247.[11] (Emphasis added.) Despite 435 these assurances, Senator Tower of Texas introduced an amendment authorizing 'professionally developed ability tests.' Proponents of Title VII opposed the amendment because, as written, it would permit an employer to give any test, 'whether it was a good test or not, so long as it was professionally designed. Discrimination could actually exist under the *856 guise of compliance with the statute.' 110 Cong.Rec. 13504 (remarks of Sen. Case).

[8] The amendment was defeated and two days later Senator Tower offered a substitute amendment which was adopted verbatim and is now the testing provision of s 703(h). Speaking for the supporters of Title VII, Senator Humphrey, who had vigorously opposed the first amendment, endorsed the substitute amendment, stating: 'Senators on both sides of the aisle who were deeply interested in title VII have examined the text of this 436 amendment and have found it to be in accord with the intent and purpose of that title.' 110 Cong.Rec. 13724. The amendment was then adopted.[12] From the sum of the legislative history relevant in this case, the conclusion is inescapable that the EEOC's construction of s 703(h) to require that employment tests be job related comports with congressional intent.

[9] Nothing in the Act precludes the use of testing or measuring procedures; obviously they are useful. What Congress has forbidden is giving these devices and mechanisms controlling force unless they are demonstrably a reasonable measure of job performance. Congress has not commanded that the less qualified be preferred over the better qualified simply because of minority origins. Far from disparaging job qualifications as such, Congress has made such qualifications the controlling factor, so that race, religion, nationality, and sex become irrelevant. What Congress has commanded is that any tests used must measure the person for the job and not the person in the abstract.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is, as to that portion of the judgment appealed from, reversed.

Mr. Justice BRENNAN took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

All Citations

401 U.S. 424, 91 S.Ct. 849, 28 L.Ed.2d 158, 3 Fair Empl.Prac.Cas. (BNA) 175, 3 Empl. Prac. Dec. P 8137, 88 P.U.R.3d 90

Footnotes

1 The Act provides:

'Sec. 703. (a) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer—

'(2) to limit, segregate, or classify his employees in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect his status as an employee, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

'(h) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, it shall not be an unlawful employment practice for an employer * * * to give and to act upon the results of any professionally developed ability test provided that such test, its administration or action upon the results is not designed, intended or used to discriminate because of race, color, religion, sex or national origin. * * *' 78 Stat. 255, 42 U.S.C. s 2000e—2.

2 A Negro was first assigned to a job in an operating department in August 1966, five months after charges had been filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The employee, a high school graduate who had begun in the Labor Department in 1953, was promoted to a job in the Coal Handling Department.

3 The test standards are thus more stringent than the high school requirement, since they would screen out approximately half of all high school graduates.

4 The Court of Appeals ruled that Negroes employed in the Labor Department at a time when there was no high school or test requirement for entrance into the higher paying departments could not now be made subject to those requirements, since whites hired contemporaneously into those departments were never subject to them. The Court of Appeals also required that the seniority rights of those Negroes be measured on a plantwide, rather than a departmental, basis. However, the Court of Appeals denied relief to the Negro employees without a high school education or its equivalent who were hired into the Labor Department after institution of the educational requirement.

5 One member of that court disagreed with this aspect of the decision, maintaining, as do the petitioners in this Court, that Title VII prohibits the use of employment criteria that operate in a racially exclusionary fashion and do not measure skills or abilities necessary to performance of the jobs for which those criteria are used

6 In North Carolina, 1960 census statistics show that, while 34% of white males had completed high school, only 12% of Negro males had done so. U.S. Bureau of the Census, U.S. Census of Population: 1960, Vol. 1, Characteristics of the Population, pt. 35, Table 47.

Similarly, with respect to standardized tests, the EEOC in one case found that use of a battery of tests, including the Wonderlic and Bennett tests used by the Company in the instant case, resulted in 58% of whites passing the tests, as compared with only 6% of the blacks. Decision of EEOC, CCH Empl.Prac. Guide, 17,304.53 (Dec. 2, 1966). See also Decision of EEOC 70—552, CCH Empl.Prac. Guide, 6139 (Feb. 19, 1970).

7 For example, between July 2, 1965, and November 14, 1966, the percentage of white employees who were promoted but who were not high school graduates was nearly identical to the percentage of nongraduates in the entire white work force.

8 Section 703(h) applies only to tests. It has no applicability to the high school diploma requirement.

9 EEOC Guidelines on Employment Testing Procedures, issued August 24, 1966, provide:

'The Commission accordingly interprets 'professionally developed ability test' to mean a test which fairly measures the knowledge or skills required by the particular job or class of jobs which the applicant seeks, or which fairly affords the employer a chance to measure the applicant's ability to perform a particular job or class of jobs. The fact that a test was prepared by an individual or organization claiming expertise in test preparation does not, without more, justify its use within the meaning of Title VII.'

The EEOC position has been elaborated in the new Guidelines on Employee Selection Procedures, 29 CFR s 1607, 35 Fed.Reg. 12333 (Aug. 1, 1970). These guidelines demand that employers using tests have available 'data demonstrating that the test is predictive of or significantly correlated with important elements of work behavior which comprise or are relevant to the job or jobs for which candidates are being evaluated.' Id., at s 1607.4(c).

10 The congressional discussion was prompted by the decision of a hearing examiner for the Illinois Fair Employment Commission in Myart v. Motorola Co. (The decision is reprinted at 110 Cong.Rec. 5662.) That case suggested that standardized tests on which whites performed better than Negroes could never be used. The decision was taken to mean that such tests could never be justified even if the needs of the business required them. A number of Senators feared that Title VII might produce a similar result. See remarks of Senators Ervin, 110 Cong.Rec. 5614—5616; Smathers, id., at 5999—6000; Holland, id., at 7012—7013; Hill, id., at 8447; Tower, id., at 9024; Talmadge, id., at 9025—9026; Fulbright, id., at 9599—9600; and Ellender, id., at 9600.

11 The Court of Appeals majority, in finding no requirement in Title VII that employment tests be job related, relied in part on a quotation from an earlier Clark-Case interpretative memorandum addressed to the question of the constitutionality of Title VII. The Senators said in that memorandum:

'There is no requirement in title VII that employers abandon bona fide qualification tests where, because of differences in background and education, members of some groups are able to perform better on these tests than members of other groups. An employer may set his qualifications as high as he likes, he may test to determine which applicants have these qualifications, and he may hire, assign, and promote on the basis of test performance.' 110 Cong.Rec. 7213.

However, nothing there stated conflicts with the later memorandum dealing specifically with the debate over employer testing, 110 Cong.Rec. 7247 (quoted from in the text above), in which Senators Clark and Case explained that tests which measure 'applicable job qualifications' are permissible under Title VII. In the earlier memorandum Clark and Case assured the Senate that employers were not to be prohibited from using tests that determine qualifications. Certainly a reasonable interpretation of what the Senators meant, in light of the subsequent memorandum directed specifically at employer testing, was that nothing in the Act prevents employers from requiring that applicants be fit for the job.

12 Senator Tower's original amendment provided in part that a test would be permissible 'if * * * in the case of any individual who is seeking employment with such employer, such test is designed to determine or predict whether such individual is suitable or trainable with respect to his employment in the particular business or enterprise involved * * *.' 110 Cong.Rec. 13492. This language indicates that Senator Tower's aim was simply to make certain that job-related tests would be permitted. The opposition to the amendment was based on its loose wording which the proponents of Title VII feared would be susceptible of misinterpretation. The final amendment, which was acceptable to all sides, could hardly have required less of a job relation than the first.

113 S.Ct. 1075
Supreme Court of the United States

Joan GROWE, Secretary of State of Minnesota, et al., Appellants,

v.

James EMISON et al.

No. 91–1420
|
Argued Nov. 2, 1992.
|
Decided Feb. 23, 1993.

Synopsis

Action was brought seeking declaratory and injunctive relief barring use of allegedly fragmented districts for future elections and adoption of new districts. A three judge panel of the United States District Court for the District of Minnesota, Lay, Circuit Judge, and Magnuson, J., 782 F.Supp. 427, held that redistricting plan adopted by state court fragmented minority voting interest and failed to provide affirmative relief necessary to adequately protect minority voting rights under the Voting Rights Act, and adopted different plan containing super-majority minority senate district for a city. Appeal was taken. The Supreme Court, Justice Scalia, held that district court had erred in not deferring to state court's timely efforts to redraw legislative and congressional districts, and (2) district court had erred in concluding that state court's legislative plan violated Voting Rights Act.

Reversed and remanded.

West Headnotes (10)

[1] Federal Courts Federal-state relations, questions of state law, and parallel state proceedings

When federal and state courts find themselves exercising concurrent jurisdiction over same subject matter, federal court generally need neither abstain (i.e. dismiss case before it) nor defer to state proceedings (i.e. withhold action until state proceedings have concluded).

30 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Federal Courts Pullman abstention
Federal Courts Stay

Pullman doctrine, recognizing that federal courts should not prematurely resolve constitutionality of state statute, calls for deferral of federal suit pending conclusion of state proceedings, rather than abstention in form of dismissal of federal suit.

26 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] States Evidence in general
United States Judicial review and enforcement

Absent evidence that appropriate state bodies will fail timely to perform duty of apportioning federal congressional and state legislative districts, following new census results, federal court must neither affirmatively obstruct state reapportionment nor permit federal litigation to be used to impede it. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 2, cl. 3.

38 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment
States Judicial intervention and immunity in general

Federal district court erred by issuing injunction prohibiting any state court plan implementation of state legislative and federal congressional redistricting, while affording Legislature time to complete plan it was preparing; requirement that federal courts defer to state redistricting efforts applied to courts as well as legislatures. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 2, cl. 3.

45 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Courts Restraining Particular Proceedings

Federal district court could not enjoin state court from proceeding with plan for state legislative and federal congressional redistricting, even though federal lawsuit challenging existing districts claimed violation of Voting Rights Act, while state lawsuit did not. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 2, cl. 3; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

30 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Courts Restraining Particular Proceedings

Federal courts could not enjoin state court adoption of plan for state legislative and federal congressional redistricting, so as to narrow choice of applicable plans to one being adopted pursuant to federal litigation or one being adopted by state legislature, on grounds that 90–day period during which unsuccessful state litigants could appeal state court plan would create problems of establishing definitive districts in time for elections; requirement that districts be established in time for elections did not mandate that time be allowed for judicial review. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 2, cl. 3; 51 M.S.A., Rules Civ.App.Proc., Rule 104.01.

19 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Courts Restraining Particular Proceedings

Federal district court erred by issuing injunction prohibiting implementation of plan for state legislative redistricting, adopted by state court; after state court entered that order, federal court was limited under full faith and credit statute to entertaining federal court complaints relating to legislative redistricting only to extent those claims challenged state court's plan. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1738; U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 2, cl. 3.

35 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Courts Restraining Particular Proceedings

Federal Courts Reapportionment

Federal court considering challenge to existing congressional districts erred by not deferring to state court's timely consideration of congressional reapportionment, and issuing injunction having effect of preventing state court from developing redistricting plan. U.S.C.A. Const. Art. 1, § 2, cl. 3.

24 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] States Dilution of voting power in general

Requirements for successful vote dilution claim with respect to proposed multimember district, announced in Thornberg v. Gingles, applied as well to voter fragmentation claim involving single member district. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

134 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] States Compactness; contiguity; gerrymandering in general

Voter fragmentation had not been established, as necessary to support noncompact super-majority minority state legislative district comprising areas north and south of downtown business district; no statistical showing had been made of a minority group that was politically cohesive, or that there was white majority bloc voting. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

159 Cases that cite this headnote

*1076 25 Syllabus[*]

Shortly after a group of Minnesota voters filed a state-court action against the Minnesota Secretary of State and other election officials, appellee voters filed a similar action against essentially the same officials in the Federal District Court. Both suits alleged that, in light of the 1990 census results, the State's congressional and legislative districts were malapportioned, in violation of the Federal and State Constitutions; the federal suit contained the additional claim that the current districts diluted the vote of minority groups in Minneapolis, in violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Both suits sought declaration that the current districts were unlawful, and judicial construction of new districts if the state legislature failed to act. After the state legislature adopted a new legislative districting plan, which contained numerous drafting errors, a second federal action was filed raising constitutional challenges to the new legislative districts; the two federal suits were consolidated. The District Court set a deadline for the legislature to act on redistricting plans, but refused to abstain or defer to the state-court proceedings. The state court, having found the new legislative districts defective because of the drafting errors, issued a preliminary legislative redistricting plan correcting most of those errors, to be held in abeyance pending further action by the legislature. Before the state court could take additional action, the District Court stayed the state-court proceedings; this Court vacated that stay. When the Governor vetoed the legislature's effort to correct the defective legislative redistricting plan, and to adopt new congressional districts, the state court issued a final order adopting its legislative plan, and held hearings on the congressional plans submitted by the parties. Before the state court could issue a congressional plan, however, the District Court adopted its own redistricting *1077 plans, both legislative and congressional, and permanently enjoined interference with state implementation of those plans. The District Court found, in effect, that the state court's legislative plan violated the Voting Rights Act because it did not contain a "super-majority minority" Senate district; its own plan contained such a district, designed to create a majority composed of at least three separately identifiable minority groups.

26 Held:

1. The District Court erred in not deferring to the state court's timely efforts to redraw the legislative and congressional districts. States have the primary duty and responsibility to perform that task, and federal courts must defer their action when a State, through its legislative or judicial branch, has begun in timely fashion to address the issue. Scott v. Germano, 381 U.S. 407, 85 S.Ct. 1525, 14 L.Ed.2d 477 (1965). Absent evidence that these branches cannot timely perform their duty, a federal court cannot affirmatively obstruct, or permit federal litigation to impede, state reapportionment. Judged by these principles, the District Court erred in several respects: It set a deadline for reapportionment directed only to the state legislature, instead of to the legislature and courts; it issued an injunction that treated the state court's provisional legislative plan as "interfering" in the reapportionment process; it failed to give the state court's final order adopting a legislative plan legal effect under the principles of federalism and comity embodied in the full faith and credit statute; and it actively prevented the state court from issuing its own congressional plan, although it appears that the state court was prepared to do so. Pp. 1080–1083.

2. The District Court erred in its conclusion that the state court's legislative plan violated § 2 of the Voting Rights Act. The three prerequisites that were identified in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986), as necessary to establish a vote-dilution claim with respect to a multimember districting plan—a minority group that is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district, minority political cohesion, and majority bloc voting that enables defeat of the minority's preferred candidate—are also necessary to establish a vote-fragmentation claim with respect to a single-member district. In the present case, even making the dubious assumption that the minority voters were geographically compact, the record contains no statistical or anecdotal evidence of majority bloc voting or minority political cohesion among the distinct ethnic and language minority groups the District Court combined in the new district. The Gingles preconditions were not only ignored but were on this record unattainable. Pp. 1083–1085.

782 F.Supp. 427, reversed and remanded.

SCALIA, J., delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court.

Attorneys and Law Firms

John R. Tunheim, St. Paul, MN, for appellants.

27 Sol. Gen. Kenneth W. Starr, Washington, DC, as amicus curiae for U.S. supporting the appellants.

Bruce Donald Willis, Minneapolis, MN, for appellees.

Opinion

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case raises important issues regarding the propriety of the District Court's pursuing reapportionment of Minnesota's state legislative and federal congressional districts in the face of Minnesota state-court litigation seeking similar relief, and regarding the District Court's conclusion that the state court's legislative plan violated § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 1973.

I

In January 1991, a group of Minnesota voters filed a state-court action against the Minnesota Secretary of State and other officials *1078 responsible for administering elections, claiming that the State's congressional and legislative districts were malapportioned, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution and Article 4, § 2, of the Minnesota Constitution. Cotlow v. Growe, No. C8–91–985. The plaintiffs asserted that the 1990 federal census results revealed a significant change in the distribution of the state population, and requested that the court declare the current districts unlawful and draw new districts if the legislature failed to do so. In February, the parties stipulated that, in light of the new census, the challenged districting plans were 28 unconstitutional. The Minnesota Supreme Court appointed a Special Redistricting Panel (composed of one appellate judge and two district judges) to preside over the case.

In March, a second group of plaintiffs filed an action in federal court against essentially the same defendants, raising similar challenges to the congressional and legislative districts. Emison v. Growe, 782 F.Supp. 427. The Emison plaintiffs (who include members of various racial minorities) in addition raised objections to the legislative districts under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973, alleging that those districts needlessly fragmented two Indian reservations and divided the minority population of Minneapolis. The suit sought declaratory relief and continuing federal jurisdiction over any legislative efforts to develop new districts. A three-judge panel was appointed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284(a).

While the federal and state actions were getting underway, the Minnesota Legislature was holding public hearings on, and designing, new legislative districts. In May, it adopted a new legislative districting plan, Chapter 246, Minn.Stat. §§ 2.403–2.703 (Supp.1991), and repealed the prior 1983 apportionment. It was soon recognized that Chapter 246 contained many technical errors—mistaken compass directions, incorrect street names, noncontiguous districts, and a few instances of double representation. By August, committees of the legislature had prepared curative legislation, Senate File 1596 and House File 1726 (collectively, Senate File 1596), but the legislature, which had adjourned in late May, was not due to reconvene until January 6, 1992.

Later in August, another group of plaintiffs filed a second action in federal court, again against the Minnesota Secretary of State. Benson v. Growe, No. 4–91–603. The Benson plaintiffs, who include the Republican minority leaders of the Minnesota Senate and House, raised federal and state constitutional challenges to Chapter 246, but no Voting 29 Rights Act allegations. The Benson action was consolidated with the Emison suit; the Cotlow plaintiffs, as well as the Minnesota House of Representatives and State Senate, intervened.

With the legislature out of session, the committees' proposed curative measures for Chapter 246 pending, and the state court in Cotlow considering many of the same issues, the District Court granted the defendants' motion to defer further proceedings pending action by the Minnesota Legislature. It denied, however, defendants' motion to abstain in light of the Cotlow suit, or to allow the state court first to review any legislative action or, if the legislature failed to act, to allow the state court first to issue a court-ordered redistricting plan. The District Court set a January 20, 1992, deadline for the state legislature's action on both redistricting plans, and appointed special masters to develop contingent plans in the event the legislature failed to correct Chapter 246 or to reapportion Minnesota's eight congressional districts.

Meanwhile, the Cotlow panel concluded (in October) that Chapter 246, applied as written (i.e., with its drafting errors), violated both the State and Federal Constitutions, and invited the parties to submit alternative legislative plans based on Chapter 246. It also directed the parties to submit by mid-October written arguments on any Chapter 246 violations of the Voting Rights Act. In late *1079 November, the state court issued an order containing its preliminary legislative redistricting plan—essentially Chapter 246 with the technical corrections (though not the stylistic corrections) contained in Senate File 1596. (Since no party had responded to its order concerning Voting Rights Act violations, the court concluded that Chapter 246 did not run afoul of that Act.) It proposed putting its plan into effect on January 21, 1992, if the legislature had not acted by then. Two weeks later, after further argument, the Cotlow panel indicated it 30 would release a revised and final version of its legislative redistricting plan in a few days.

In early December, before the state court issued its final plan, the District Court stayed all proceedings in the Cotlow case, and enjoined parties to that action from "attempting to enforce or implement any order of the ... Minnesota Special Redistricting Panel which has proposed adoption of a reapportionment plan relating to state redistricting or Congressional redistricting." App. to Juris. Statement 154. The court explained its action as necessary to prevent the state court from interfering with the legislature's efforts to redistrict and with the District Court's jurisdiction. It mentioned the Emison Voting Rights Act allegations as grounds for issuing the injunction, which it found necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, see 28 U.S.C. § 1651. One judge dissented.

Four days later the state court issued an order containing its final legislative plan, subject to the District Court's injunction and still conditioned on the Legislature's failure to adopt a lawful plan. The same order provided, again subject to the District Court's injunction, that congressional redistricting plans be submitted by mid-January. The obstacle of the District Court injunction was removed on January 10, 1992, when, upon application of the Cotlow plaintiffs, we vacated the injunction. 502 U.S. 1022, 112 S.Ct. 855, 116 L.Ed.2d 764.

When the legislature reconvened in January, both Houses approved the corrections to Chapter 246 contained in Senate File 1596 and also adopted a congressional redistricting plan that legislative committees had drafted the previous October. The Governor, however, vetoed the legislation. On January 30, the state court issued a final order adopting its legislative plan and requiring that plan to be used for the 1992 primary and general elections. By February 6, pursuant to an order issued shortly after this Court vacated the injunction, the parties had submitted their proposals for congressional redistricting, and on February 17 the state court held hearings on the competing plans.

31 Two days later, the District Court issued an order adopting its own legislative and congressional districting plans and permanently enjoining interference with state implementation of those plans. 782 F.Supp. 427, 448–449 (Minn.1992). The Emison panel found that the state court's modified version of Chapter 246 "fails to provide the equitable relief necessary to cure the violation of the Voting Rights Act," id., at 440, which in its view required at least one "super-majority minority" Senate district, a district in which the minority constitutes a clear majority. The District Court rejected Chapter 246 as a basis for its plan, and instead referred to state policy as expressed in the Minnesota Constitution and in a resolution adopted by both Houses of the legislature. See Minn. Const., Art. 4, § 2; H.R.Con.Res. No. 2, 77th Leg., Reg.Sess. (1991). Judge MacLaughlin dissented in part. The District Court was unanimous, however, in its adoption of a congressional redistricting plan, after concluding that the preexisting 1982 plan violated Art. I, § 2, of the Federal Constitution. Although it had received the same proposed plans submitted to the state court earlier that month, it used instead a congressional plan prepared by its special masters. Finally, the District Court retained jurisdiction to ensure adoption of its reapportionment *1080 plans and to enforce the permanent injunction.

In early March, the state court indicated that it was "fully prepared to release a congressional plan" but that the federal injunction prevented it from doing so. In its view, the federal plan reached population equality "without sufficient regard for the preservation of municipal and county boundaries." App. to Juris.Statement 445–446.

Appellants sought a stay of the District Court's February order pending this appeal. Justice BLACKMUN granted the stay with respect to the legislative redistricting plan. No. 91–1420 (Mar. 11, 1992) (in chambers). We noted probable jurisdiction. 503 U.S. 958, 112 S.Ct. 1557, 118 L.Ed.2d 206 (1992).

32 II

In their challenge to both of the District Court's redistricting plans, appellants contend that, under the principles of Scott v. Germano, 381 U.S. 407, 85 S.Ct. 1525, 14 L.Ed.2d 477 (1965) (per curiam), the court erred in not deferring to the Minnesota Special Redistricting Panel's proceedings. We agree.

[1] [2] The parties do not dispute that both courts had jurisdiction to consider the complaints before them. Of course federal courts and state courts often find themselves exercising concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject matter, and when that happens a federal court generally need neither abstain (i.e., dismiss the case before it) nor defer to the state proceedings (i.e., withhold action until the state proceedings have concluded). See McClellan v. Carland, 217 U.S. 268, 282, 30 S.Ct. 501, 504, 54 L.Ed. 762 (1910). In rare circumstances, however, principles of federalism and comity dictate otherwise. We have found abstention necessary, for example, when the federal action raises difficult questions of state law bearing on important matters of state policy, or when federal jurisdiction has been invoked to restrain ongoing state criminal proceedings. See Colorado River Water Conservation Dist. v. United States, 424 U.S. 800, 814–817, 96 S.Ct. 1236, 1244–1246, 47 L.Ed.2d 483 (1976) (collecting examples). We have required deferral, causing a federal court to "sta[y] its hands," when a constitutional issue in the federal action will be mooted or presented in a different posture following conclusion of the state-court case. Railroad Comm'n of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496, 501, 61 S.Ct. 643, 645, 85 L.Ed. 971 (1941).[1]

33 In the reapportionment context, the Court has required federal judges to defer consideration of disputes involving redistricting where the State, through its legislative or judicial branch, has begun to address that highly political task itself. In Germano, a Federal District Court invalidated Illinois' Senate districts and entered an order requiring the State to submit to the court any revised Senate districting scheme it might adopt. An action had previously been filed in state court attacking the same districting scheme. In that case the Illinois Supreme Court held (subsequent to the federal court's order) that the Senate districting scheme was invalid, but expressed confidence that the General Assembly would enact a lawful plan during its then current session, scheduled to end in July 1965. The Illinois Supreme Court retained jurisdiction to ensure that the upcoming 1966 general elections would be conducted pursuant to a constitutionally valid plan.

*1081 This Court disapproved the District Court's action. The District Court "should have stayed its hand," we said, and in failing to do so overlooked this Court's teaching that state courts have a significant role in redistricting. 381 U.S., at 409, 85 S.Ct., at 1527.

> "The power of the judiciary of a State to require valid reapportionment or to formulate a valid redistricting plan has not only been recognized by this Court but appropriate action by the States in such cases has been specifically encouraged.
>
> "...The case is remanded with directions that the District Court enter an order fixing a reasonable time within which the appropriate agencies of the State of Illinois, including its Supreme Court, may validly redistrict the Illinois State Senate; provided that the same be accomplished within ample time to permit such plan to be utilized in the 1966 election...." Ibid. (citations omitted).

[3] 34 Today we renew our adherence to the principles expressed in Germano, which derive from the recognition that the Constitution leaves with the States primary responsibility for apportionment of their federal congressional and state legislative districts. See U.S. Const., Art. I, § 2. "We say once again what has been said on many occasions: reapportionment is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State through its legislature or other body, rather than of a federal court." Chapman v. Meier, 420 U.S. 1, 27, 95 S.Ct. 751, 766, 42 L.Ed.2d 766 (1975). Absent evidence that these state branches will fail timely to perform that duty, a federal court must neither affirmatively obstruct state reapportionment nor permit federal litigation to be used to impede it.

[4] Judged by these principles, the District Court's December injunction of state-court proceedings, vacated by this Court in January, was clear error. It seems to have been based upon the mistaken view that federal judges need defer only to the Minnesota Legislature and not at all to the State's courts. Thus, the January 20 deadline the District Court established was described as a deadline for the legislature, ignoring the possibility and legitimacy of state judicial redistricting. And the injunction itself treated the state court's provisional legislative redistricting plan as "interfering" in the reapportionment process. But the doctrine of Germano prefers both state branches to federal courts as agents of apportionment. The Minnesota Special Redistricting Panel's issuance of its plan (conditioned on the legislature's failure to enact a constitutionally acceptable plan in January), far from being a federally enjoinable "interference," was precisely the sort of state judicial supervision of redistricting we have encouraged. See Germano, 381 U.S., at 409, 85 S.Ct., at 1526 (citing cases).

[5] Nor do the reasons offered by the District Court for its actions in December and February support departure from the Germano principles. It is true that the Emison plaintiffs alleged that the 1983 legislative districting scheme violated 35 the Voting Rights Act, while the Cotlow complaint never invoked that statute. Germano, however, does not require that the federal and state-court complaints be identical; it instead focuses on the nature of the relief requested: reapportionment of election districts. Minnesota can have only one set of legislative districts, and the primacy of the State in designing those districts compels a federal court to defer.

[6] The District Court also expressed concern over the lack of time for orderly appeal, prior to the State's primaries, of any judgment that might issue from the state court, noting that Minnesota allows the losing party 90 days to appeal. See Minn.Rule Civ.App.Proc. 104.01. We fail to see the relevance of the speed of appellate review. Germano requires only that the state agencies adopt a constitutional plan "within ample time ... to be utilized in the [upcoming] election," 381 U.S., at 409, 85 S.Ct., at 1527. It does not require appellate review of the plan prior to the election, and such a requirement would ignore the reality that States *1082 must often redistrict in the most exigent circumstances—during the brief interval between completion of the decennial federal census and the primary season for the general elections in the next even-numbered year. Our consideration of this appeal, long after the Minnesota primary and final elections have been held, itself reflects the improbability of completing judicial review before the necessary deadline for a new redistricting scheme.

[7] It may be useful to describe what ought to have happened with respect to each redistricting plan. The state court entered its judgment adopting its modified version of Chapter 246 in late January (nearly three weeks before the federal court issued its opinion). That final order, by declaring the legislature's version of Chapter 246 unconstitutional and adopting a legislative plan to replace it, altered the status quo: The state court's plan became the law of Minnesota. At the very least, the elementary principles of federalism and comity embodied in the full faith and credit statute, 36 28 U.S.C. § 1738, obligated the federal court to give that judgment legal effect, rather than treating it as simply one of several competing legislative redistricting proposals available for the District Court's choosing. See Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Locomotive Engineers, 398 U.S. 281, 286, 296, 90 S.Ct. 1739, 1742, 1747, 26 L.Ed.2d 234 (1970). In other words, after January 30 the federal court was empowered to entertain the Emison plaintiffs' claims relating to legislative redistricting only to the extent those claims challenged the state court's plan. Cf. Wise v. Lipscomb, 437 U.S. 535, 540, 98 S.Ct. 2493, 2497, 57 L.Ed.2d 411 (1978) (opinion of WHITE, J.).

[8] With respect to the congressional plan, the District Court did not ignore any state-court judgment, but only because it had actively prevented such a judgment from issuing. The wrongfully entered December injunction prevented the Special Redistricting Panel from developing a contingent plan for congressional redistricting, as it had for legislative redistricting prior to the injunction. The state court's December order to the parties for mid-January submission of congressional plans was rendered a nullity by the injunction, which was not vacated until January 10. The net effect was a delay of at least a few weeks in the submissions to the state court, and in hearings on those submissions. A court may not acknowledge Germano in one breath and impede a state court's timely development of a plan in the next. It would have been appropriate for the District Court to establish a deadline by which, if the Special Redistricting Panel had not acted, the federal court would proceed. But the January 20 deadline that the District Court established here was explicitly directed solely at the legislature. The state court was never given a time by which it should decide on reapportionment, legislative or congressional, if it wished to avoid federal intervention.

Of course the District Court would have been justified in adopting its own plan if it had been apparent that the state court, through no fault of the District Court itself, would not develop a redistricting plan in time for the primaries. 37 Germano requires deferral, not abstention. But in this case, in addition to the fact that the federal court itself had been (through its injunction) a cause of the state court's delay, it nonetheless appeared that the state court was fully prepared to adopt a congressional plan in as timely a manner as the District Court. The Special Redistricting Panel received the same plans submitted to the federal court, and held hearings on those plans two days before the federal court issued its opinion. The record simply does not support a conclusion that the state court was either unwilling or unable to adopt a congressional plan in time for the elections.[2] What occurred here was not a last-minute federal-court rescue of *1083 the Minnesota electoral process, but a race to beat the Minnesota Special Redistricting Panel to the finish line. That would have been wrong, even if the Panel had not been tripped earlier in the course. The District Court erred in not deferring to the state court's timely consideration of congressional reapportionment.

III

[9] [10] The District Court concluded that there was sufficient evidence to prove minority vote dilution in a portion of the city of Minneapolis, in violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973.[3] 782 F.Supp., at 439. Choosing not 38 to apply the preconditions for a vote-dilution violation set out by this Court for challenges to multimember districts, see Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986), the court instead proceeded directly to the "totality of circumstances" test in § 2(b) and found unlawful dilution. It rejected, as a basis for its redistricting plan, Chapter 246, Chapter 246 as modified by Senate File 1596, and the state court's version of Chapter 246, and adopted instead its special masters' legislative plan, which includes a Senate district stretching from south Minneapolis, around the downtown area, and then into the northern part of the city in order to link minority populations. This oddly shaped creation, Senate District 59, is 43 percent black and 60 percent minority, including at least three separately identifiable minority groups.[4] In the District Court's view, based on "[j]udicial experience, as well as the results of past elections," a super-majority minority Senate district in Minneapolis was required in order for a districting scheme to comply with the 39 Voting Rights Act. 782 F.Supp., at 440. We must review this analysis because, if it is correct, the District Court was right to deny effect to the state-court legislative redistricting plan.

As an initial matter, it is not clear precisely which legislative districting plan produced the vote dilution that necessitated the super-majority remedy. For almost a decade prior to the 1992 election season, the only legislative districting plan that had been in use in Minnesota was the 1983 plan, which all parties agreed was unconstitutional in light of the 1990 census. More importantly, the state court had declared the 1983 plan to be unconstitutional in its final order of January 30. Once that order issued, the Emison *1084 plaintiffs' claims that the 1983 plan violated the Voting Rights Act became moot, unless those claims also related to the superseding plan. But no party to this litigation has ever alleged that either Chapter 246, or the modified version of Chapter 246 adopted by the state court, resulted in vote dilution. The District Court did not hold a hearing or request written argument from the parties on the § 2 validity of any particular plan; nor does the District Court's discussion focus on any particular plan.

Although the legislative plan that in the court's view produced the § 2 "dilution" violation is unclear, the District Court did clearly conclude that the state court's plan could not remedy that unspecified violation because it "fail[ed] to provide the affirmative relief necessary to adequately protect minority voting rights." Id., at 448. The District Court was of the view, in other words, as the dissenting judge perceived, see id., at 452, and n. 6 (MacLaughlin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), that any legislative plan lacking a super-majority minority Senate district in Minneapolis violated § 2. We turn to the merits of this position.

Our precedent requires that, to establish a vote-dilution claim with respect to a multimember districting plan (and 40 hence to justify a super-majority districting remedy), a plaintiff must prove three threshold conditions: first, "that [the minority group] is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district"; second, "that it is politically cohesive"; and third, "that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Gingles, 478 U.S., at 50–51, 106 S.Ct., at 2766–2767. We have not previously considered whether these Gingles threshold factors apply to a § 2 dilution challenge to a single-member districting scheme, a so-called "vote fragmentation" claim. See id., at 46–47, n. 12, 106 S.Ct., at 2764, n. 12. We have, however, stated on many occasions that multimember districting plans, as well as at-large plans, generally pose greater threats to minority-voter participation in the political process than do single-member districts, see, e.g., id., at 47, and n. 13, 106 S.Ct., at 2764, and n. 13; id., at 87, 106 S.Ct., at 2785 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment); Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 616–617, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 3274–3275, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1982); see also Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 88, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 1294, 16 L.Ed.2d 376 (1966)—which is why we have strongly preferred single-member districts for federal-court-ordered reapportionment, see, e.g., Connor v. Finch, 431 U.S. 407, 415, 97 S.Ct. 1828, 1834, 52 L.Ed.2d 465 (1977). It would be peculiar to conclude that a vote-dilution challenge to the (more dangerous) multimember district requires a higher threshold showing than a vote-fragmentation challenge to a single-member district. Certainly the reasons for the three Gingles prerequisites continue to apply: The "geographically compact majority" and "minority political cohesion" showings are needed to establish that the minority has the potential to elect a representative of its own choice in some single-member district, see Gingles, supra, at 50, n. 17, 106 S.Ct., at 2765, n. 17. And the "minority political cohesion" and "majority bloc voting" showings are needed to establish that the challenged districting thwarts a distinctive minority vote by submerging it in a larger white voting population, see Gingles, supra, at 51, 106 S.Ct., at 2766. Unless these 41 points are established, there neither has been a wrong nor can be a remedy.[5]

*1085 In the present case, even if we make the dubious assumption that the minority voters were "geographically compact," there was quite obviously a higher-than-usual need for the second of the Gingles showings. Assuming (without deciding) that it was permissible for the District Court to combine distinct ethnic and language minority groups for purposes of assessing compliance with § 2, when dilution of the power of such an agglomerated political bloc is the basis for an alleged violation, proof of minority political cohesion is all the more essential. See Badillo v. Stockton, 956 F.2d

884, 891 (CA9 1992); Concerned Citizens of Hardee County v. Hardee County Bd. of Comm'rs, 906 F.2d 524 (CA 11 1990); Campos v. Baytown, 840 F.2d 1240, 1244 (CA5 1988), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 905, 109 S.Ct. 3213, 106 L.Ed.2d 564 (1989). Since a court may not presume bloc voting within even a single minority group, see Gingles, supra, at 46, 106 S.Ct., at 2764, it made no sense for the District Court to (in effect) indulge that presumption as to bloc voting within an agglomeration of distinct minority groups.

We are satisfied that in the present case the Gingles preconditions were not only ignored but were unattainable. As the District Court acknowledged, the record simply "contains no statistical evidence" of minority political cohesion (whether of one or several minority groups) or of majority bloc voting in Minneapolis. 782 F.Supp., at 436, n. 30. And even anecdotal evidence is lacking. Recognizing this void, the court relied on an article identifying bloc voting as a 42 national phenomenon that is " 'all but inevitable.' " Ibid., quoting Howard & Howard, The Dilemma of the Voting Rights Act—Recognizing the Emerging Political Equality Norm, 83 Colum.L.Rev. 1615, 1625 (1983). A law review article on national voting patterns is no substitute for proof that bloc voting occurred in Minneapolis. Cf. Gingles, 478 U.S., at 58–61, 106 S.Ct., at 2770–2771 (summarizing statistical and anecdotal evidence in that case). Section 2 "does not assume the existence of racial bloc voting; plaintiffs must prove it." Id., at 46, 106 S.Ct., at 2764.

* * *

The District Court erred in not deferring to the state court's efforts to redraw Minnesota's state legislative and federal congressional districts. Its conclusion that the state court's legislative districting plan (which it treated as merely one available option) violated § 2 of the Voting Rights Act was also erroneous. Having found these defects, we need not consider the other points of error raised by appellants.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded with instructions to dismiss.

So ordered.

All Citations

507 U.S. 25, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388, 61 USLW 4163

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 We have referred to the Pullman doctrine as a form of "abstention," see 312 U.S., at 501–502, 61 S.Ct., at 645–646. To bring out more clearly, however, the distinction between those circumstances that require dismissal of a suit and those that require postponing consideration of its merits, it would be preferable to speak of Pullman "deferral." Pullman deferral recognizes that federal courts should not prematurely resolve the constitutionality of a state statute, just as Germano deferral recognizes that federal courts should not prematurely involve themselves in redistricting.

2 Although under Minnesota law legislative districts must be drawn before precinct boundaries can be established, see Minn.Stat. § 204B.14, subd. 3 (Supp.1991), congressional districts were not needed in advance of the March 3 precinct caucuses. Congressional district conventions did not take place until late April and early May.

3 That section provides:

"(a) No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 1973b(f)(2) of this title, as provided in subsection (b) of this section.

"(b) A violation of subsection (a) of this section is established if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by subsection (a) of this section in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." 42 U.S.C. § 1973.

4 These percentages refer to total population. To establish whether a § 2 violation has occurred (which presumably requires application of the same standard that measures whether a § 2 violation has been remedied) other courts have looked to, not the district's total minority population, but the district's minority population of voting age. See, e.g., Romero v. Pomona, 883 F.2d 1418, 1425–1426, and n. 13 (CA9 1989) (citing cases). Gingles itself repeatedly refers to the voting population, see, e.g., 478 U.S., at 48, 50, 106 S.Ct., at 2765, 2766. We have no need to pass upon this aspect of the District Court's opinion.

5 Gingles expressly declined to resolve whether, when a plaintiff alleges that a voting practice or procedure impairs a minority's ability to influence, rather than alter, election results, a showing of geographical compactness of a minority group not sufficiently large to constitute a majority will suffice. Gingles, supra, at 46–47, n. 12, 106 S.Ct., at 2764, n. 12. We do not reach that question in the present case either: Although the Emison plaintiffs alleged both vote dilution and minimization of vote influence (in the 1983 plan), the District Court considered only the former issue in reviewing the state court's plan.

786 Fed.Appx. 705 (Mem)
This case was not selected for publication in West's Federal Reporter.
See Fed. Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1 generally governing citation of judicial decisions issued on or after Jan. 1, 2007. See also U.S.Ct. of App. 9th Cir. Rule 36-3.
United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit.

Don HIGGINSON, Plaintiff-Appellant,

v.

Xavier BECERRA, in his official capacity as Attorney General of California; City of Poway, Defendants-Appellees, California League of United Latin American Citizens; et al., Intervenor-Defendants-Appellees.

No. 19-55275
|
Argued and Submitted November 5, 2019 Pasadena, California
|
FILED December 4, 2019

Attorneys and Law Firms

William Consovoy, Jeffrey Matthew Harris, Bryan K. Weir, Consovoy McCarthy PLLC, Arlington, VA, for Plaintiff - Appellant

Joshua A. Klein, Deputy Solicitor General, AGCA - Office of the Attorney General, Oakland, CA, Amie L. Medley, Deputy Attorney General, AGCA-Office of the California Attorney General, Los Angeles, CA, for Defendant - Appellee Xavier Becerra

Alan Brian Fenstermacher, Attorney, Rutan & Tucker, LLP, Costa Mesa, CA, for Defendant - Appellee City of Poway

Denise Hulett, Esquire, Attorney, Tanya Gabrielle Pellegrini, Attorney, Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Sacramento, CA, Julia Gomez Hernandez, Attorney, Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Los Angeles, CA, Winifred V. Kao, Jonathan Stein, Counsel, Asian Law Caucus, San Francisco, CA, Molly Peach Matter, Attorney, Amend Law LLC, Burton, WA, for Intervenors-Defendants - Appellees

Erin Chapman, Hogan Lovells US LLP, Washington, DC, for Amicus Curiae FairVote

Justin Levitt, Loyola Law School, Los Angeles, CA, for Amicus Curiae J. Morgan Kousser

Chad W. Dunn, Brazil & Dunn, Austin, TX, for Amicus Curiae UCLA Voting Rights Project

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, William Q. Hayes, District Judge, Presiding, D.C. No. 3:17-cv-02032-WQH-MSB

Before: MURGUIA and HURWITZ, Circuit Judges, and GUIROLA,[*] District Judge.

706 MEMORANDUM[]

Don Higginson appeals the district court's dismissal on remand of his complaint for failure to state a claim. See Higginson v. Becerra, 363 F. Supp. 3d 1118 (S.D. Cal. 2019).[1] We have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Agreeing with the decision of the California Court of Appeal in Sanchez v. City of Modesto, 145 Cal.App.4th 660, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 821 (2006), we affirm.

In June 2017, the City of Poway, California received a letter from a private attorney threatening a lawsuit, claiming the City had violated the California Voting Rights Act ("CVRA"), Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14025–32. In response, the City Council determined that instead of defending the threatened litigation and incurring significant expenses in doing so, it would adopt a resolution that would transition the City from at-large to district-based elections.

Higginson's complaint alleges that he, a resident of the City, lives in a racially gerrymandered electoral district because: (1) "[t]he City would not have switched from at-large elections to single-district[ ] elections but for the prospect of liability under the CVRA;" and (2) "[t]he CVRA makes race the predominant factor in drawing electoral districts" by compelling a political subdivision to "abandon its at-large system based on the existence of racially polarized voting and nothing more."

Reviewed de novo and viewed in the light most favorable to him, the allegations of the operative complaint fail to plausibly state that Higginson is a victim of racial gerrymandering. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009); In re Nat'l Football League's Sunday Ticket Antitrust Litig., 933 F.3d 1136, 1149 (9th Cir. 2019) (stating standard of review). Racial gerrymandering occurs when a political subdivision "intentionally assign[s] citizens to a district on the basis of race without sufficient justification." Abbott v. Perez, —— U.S. ——, 138 S. Ct. 2305, 2314, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018) (citing Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993)). Plaintiff alleges no facts concerning the City's motivations for placing him or any other Poway voter in any particular electoral district. See Bethune-Hill v. Va. State Bd. of Elections, —— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 788, 797, 197 L.Ed.2d 85 (2017) ("[A] plaintiff alleging racial gerrymandering bears the burden 'to show ... that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district.' ") (quoting Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995)). Similarly, he fails to cite any language in the CVRA that mandates how electoral districts can or should be drawn. See Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14025–32.

The operative complaint does not allege that the City or the CVRA "distribute[d] burdens or benefits on the basis of individual racial classifications." 707 Parents Involved in Cmty. Sch. v. Seattle Sch. Dist. No. 1, 551 U.S. 701, 720, 127 S.Ct. 2738, 168 L.Ed.2d 508 (2007). Although a finding of racially polarized voting triggers the application of the CVRA, it is well settled that governments may adopt measures designed "to eliminate racial disparities through race-neutral means." Texas Dep't of Hous. & Cmty. Affairs v. Inclusive Cmtys. Project, Inc., —— U.S. ——, 135 S. Ct. 2507, 2524, 192 L.Ed.2d 514 (2015); see also Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 958, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality) ("Strict scrutiny does not apply merely because redistricting is performed with consciousness of race.").

Because Plaintiff's allegations do not trigger strict scrutiny, see Cooper v. Harris, —— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 1455, 1464, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017), and he does not contend the City lacked a rational basis for its actions, see FCC v. Beach Commc'ns, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 314–15, 113 S.Ct. 2096, 124 L.Ed.2d 211 (1993), he fails to state a claim for relief. He also therefore was not entitled to injunctive relief. See Short v. Brown, 893 F.3d 671, 675–76 (9th Cir. 2018).

AFFIRMED.

All Citations

786 Fed.Appx. 705 (Mem)

Footnotes

* The Honorable Louis Guirola, Jr., United States District Judge for the Southern District of Mississippi, sitting by designation.

 This disposition is not appropriate for publication and is not precedent except as provided by Ninth Circuit Rule 36-3.

1 We previously held that Plaintiff has standing to assert an as-applied challenge to the City's adoption of Map 133, the district-based electoral map adopted by the City in October 2017. Higginson v. Becerra, 733 F. App'x 402, 403 (9th Cir. 2018).

End of Document

125 S.Ct. 1141
Supreme Court of the United States

Garrison S. JOHNSON, Petitioner,

v.

CALIFORNIA et al.

No. 03–636.
|
Argued Nov. 2, 2004.
|
Decided Feb. 23, 2005.

Synopsis

Background: African–American state prison inmate brought § 1981 and § 1983 equal-protection action against corrections officials, challenging unwritten policy of placing new or transferred inmates with cellmates of same race during initial evaluation. The United States District Court for the Central District of California, Kim M. Wardlaw, J., granted officials' motion to dismiss. Inmate appealed. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, 207 F.3d 650, reversed in part and remanded. On remand, the District Court, Consuelo B. Marshall, C.J., granted summary judgment for officials. Inmate again appealed. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, 321 F.3d 791, affirmed. Certiorari was granted.

[Holding:] The United States Supreme Court, Justice O'Connor, held that strict scrutiny standard of review, rather than "reasonably related to legitimate penological interest" standard, governed inmate's challenge.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice Ginsburg filed concurring opinion joined by Justices Souter and Breyer.

Justice Stevens filed dissenting opinion.

Justice Thomas filed dissenting opinion joined by Justice Scalia.

The Chief Justice took no part in the decision of the case.

West Headnotes (2)

[1] Constitutional Law Race, National Origin, or Ethnicity

Under strict scrutiny standard of review, as applied to government-imposed racial classification challenged on equal protection grounds, government has burden of proving that classification is narrowly tailored measure that furthers compelling governmental interest. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

387 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Prisons

Prisons Race

Strict scrutiny standard of review rather than "reasonably related to legitimate penological interest" standard governed inmate's equal-protection challenge to state corrections department's unwritten policy of placing new or transferred inmates double-celled during initial 60–day evaluation with cellmates of same race; corrections officials had to demonstrate that policy, assertedly adopted to prevent violence caused by racial gangs, was narrowly tailored to address necessities of prison security and discipline. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

392 Cases that cite this headnote

1142 *499 Syllabus [*]

The California Department of Corrections' (CDC) unwritten policy of racially segregating prisoners in double cells for up to 60 days each time they enter a new correctional facility is based on the asserted rationale that it prevents violence caused by racial gangs. Petitioner Johnson, an African–American inmate who has been intermittently double-celled under the policy's terms ever since his 1987 incarceration, filed this suit alleging that the policy violates his Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection. The District Court ultimately granted defendant former CDC officials summary judgment on grounds that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The Ninth Circuit affirmed, holding that the policy's constitutionality should be reviewed under the deferential standard articulated in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64, not under strict scrutiny, and that the policy survived Turner scrutiny.

Held: Strict scrutiny is the proper standard of review for an equal protection challenge to the CDC's policy. Pp. 1146–1152.

(a) Because the CDC's policy is "immediately suspect" as an express racial classification, Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 642, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511, the Ninth Circuit erred in failing to apply strict scrutiny and thereby to require the CDC to demonstrate that the policy is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest, see Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158. "[A]ll racial classifications [imposed by government] ... must be analyzed ... under strict scrutiny," ibid., in order to " 'smoke out' illegitimate *1143 uses of race by assuring that [government] is pursuing a goal important enough to warrant [such] a highly suspect tool," Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493, 109 S.Ct. 706, 102 L.Ed.2d 854. The CDC's claim that its policy should be exempt from this categorical rule because it is "neutral"—i.e., because all prisoners are "equally" segregated—ignores this Court's repeated command that "racial classifications receive close scrutiny even when they may be said to burden or benefit the races equally," Shaw, supra, at 651, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Indeed, the Court rejected the notion that separate can ever be equal—or "neutral"—50 years ago in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873, and refuses to resurrect it today. The Court has previously applied a heightened standard of review in evaluating racial segregation in prisons. Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. 333, 88 S.Ct. 994, 19 L.Ed.2d 1212. The need for strict scrutiny is no less important here. By perpetuating 500 the notion that race matters most, racial segregation of inmates "may exacerbate the very patterns of [violence that it is] said to counteract." Shaw, supra, at 648, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Virtually all other States and the Federal Government manage their prison systems without reliance on racial segregation. In fact, the United States argues that it is possible to address prison security concerns through individualized consideration without using racial segregation, unless it is warranted as a necessary and temporary response to a serious threat of race-related violence. As to transferees, in particular, whom the CDC has already evaluated at least once, it is not clear why more individualized determinations are not possible. Pp. 1146–1148.

(b) The Court declines the CDC's invitation to make an exception to the categorical strict scrutiny rule and instead to apply Turner's deferential review standard on the ground that the CDC's policy applies only in the prison context. The Court has never applied the Turner standard—which asks whether a regulation that burdens prisoners' fundamental rights is "reasonably related" to "legitimate penological interests," 482 U.S., at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254—to racial classifications. Turner itself did not involve such a classification, and it cast no doubt on Lee. That is unsurprising, as the Court has applied the Turner test only to rights that are "inconsistent with proper incarceration." Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 131, 123 S.Ct. 2162, 156 L.Ed.2d 162. The right not to be discriminated against based on one's race is not susceptible to Turner's logic because it is not a right that need necessarily be compromised for the sake of proper prison administration. On the contrary, compliance with the Fourteenth Amendment's ban on racial discrimination is not only consistent with proper prison administration, but also bolsters the legitimacy of the entire criminal justice system. Cf. Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 99, 106 S.Ct. 1712, 90 L.Ed.2d 69. Deference to the particular expertise of officials managing daily prison operations does not require a more relaxed standard here. The Court did not relax the standard of review for racial classifications in prison in Lee, and it refuses to do so today. Rather, it explicitly reaffirms that the "necessities of prison security and discipline," Lee, supra, at 334, 88 S.Ct. 994, are a compelling government interest justifying only those uses of race that are narrowly tailored to address those necessities, see, e.g., Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 353, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304. Because Turner's standard would allow prison officials to use race-based policies even when there are race-neutral means to accomplish the same goal, and even when the race-based policy *1144 does not in practice advance that goal, it is too lenient a standard to ferret out invidious uses of race. Contrary to the CDC's protest, strict scrutiny will not render prison administrators unable to address legitimate problems of race-based violence in prisons. On remand, the CDC will have the burden of demonstrating that its policy is 501 narrowly tailored with regard to new inmates as well as transferees. Pp. 1148–1152.

(c) The Court does not decide whether the CDC's policy violates equal protection, but leaves it to the Ninth Circuit, or the District Court, to apply strict scrutiny in the first instance.

See, e.g., Consolidated Rail Corporation v. Gottshall, 512 U.S. 532, 557–558, 114 S.Ct. 2396, 129 L.Ed.2d 427. P. 1152.

321 F.3d 791, reversed and remanded.

O'CONNOR, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which KENNEDY, SOUTER, GINSBURG, and BREYER, JJ., joined. GINSBURG, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which SOUTER and BREYER, JJ., joined, post, p. 1152. STEVENS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, post, p. 1153. THOMAS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which SCALIA, J., joined, post, p. 1157. REHNQUIST, C.J., took no part in the decision of the case.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Bert H. Deixler, Counsel of Record, Charles S. Sims, Lois D. Thompson, Tanya L. Forsheit, Lee K. Crawford, Proskauer Rose LLP, Los Angeles, CA, Counsel for Petitioner.

Bill Lockyer, Attorney General of the State of California, Manuel M. Medeiros, Solicitor General, Robert R. Anderson, Chief Assistant Attorney General, Frances T. Grunder, Senior Assistant Attorney General, Counsel of Record, Sara Turner, Supervising Deputy Attorney General, San Francisco, CA, Counsel for Respondents Gomez and Rowland.

Opinion

Justice O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

502 The California Department of Corrections (CDC) has an unwritten policy of racially segregating prisoners in double cells in reception centers for up to 60 days each time they enter a new correctional facility. We consider whether strict scrutiny is the proper standard of review for an equal protection challenge to that policy.

I

A

CDC institutions house all new male inmates and all male inmates transferred from other state facilities in reception centers for up to 60 days upon their arrival. During that time, prison officials evaluate the inmates to determine their ultimate placement. Double-cell assignments in the reception centers are based on a number of factors, predominantly race. In fact, the CDC has admitted that the chances of an inmate being assigned a cellmate of another race are " '[p]retty close' " to zero percent. App. to Pet. for Cert. 3a. The CDC further subdivides prisoners within each racial group. Thus, Japanese–Americans are housed separately from Chinese–Americans, and northern California Hispanics are separated from southern California Hispanics.

The CDC's asserted rationale for this practice is that it is necessary to prevent violence caused by racial gangs. Brief for Respondents 1–6. It cites numerous incidents of racial violence in CDC facilities and identifies five major prison gangs in *1145 the State: Mexican Mafia, Nuestra Familia, Black Guerilla Family, Aryan Brotherhood, and Nazi Low Riders. Id., at 2. The CDC also notes that prison-gang culture is violent and murderous. Id., at 3. An associate warden testified 503 that if race were not considered in making initial housing assignments, she is certain there would be racial conflict in the cells and in the yard. App. 215a. Other prison officials also expressed their belief that violence and conflict would result if prisoners were not segregated. See, e.g., id., at 305a–306a. The CDC claims that it must therefore segregate all inmates while it determines whether they pose a danger to others. See Brief for Respondents 29.

With the exception of the double cells in reception areas, the rest of the state prison facilities—dining areas, yards, and cells—are fully integrated. After the initial 60–day period, prisoners are allowed to choose their own cellmates. The CDC usually grants inmate requests to be housed together, unless there are security reasons for denying them.

B

Garrison Johnson is an African–American inmate in the custody of the CDC. He has been incarcerated since 1987 and, during that time, has been housed at a number of California prison facilities. Fourth Amended Complaint 3, Record, Doc. No. 78. Upon his arrival at Folsom prison in 1987, and each time he was transferred to a new facility thereafter, Johnson was double-celled with another African–American inmate. See ibid.

Johnson filed a complaint pro se in the United States District Court for the Central District of California on February 24, 1995, alleging that the CDC's reception-center housing policy violated his right to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment by assigning him cellmates on the basis of his race. He alleged that, from 1987 to 1991, former CDC Director James Rowland instituted and enforced an unconstitutional policy of housing inmates according to race. Second Amended Complaint 2–4, Record, Doc. No. 21. Johnson made the same allegations against former Director James Gomez for the period from 1991 until the filing of his complaint. Ibid. The District Court dismissed his complaint 504 for failure to state a claim. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed and remanded, holding that Johnson had stated a claim for racial discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Johnson v. California, 207 F.3d 650, 655 (2000).

On remand, Johnson was appointed counsel and granted leave to amend his complaint. On July 5, 2000, he filed his Fourth Amended Complaint. Record, Doc. No. 81. Johnson claimed that the CDC's policy of racially segregating all inmates in reception-center cells violated his rights under the Equal Protection Clause. Johnson sought damages, alleging that former CDC Directors Rowland and Gomez, in their individual capacities, violated his constitutional rights by formulating and implementing the CDC's housing policy. He also sought injunctive relief against former CDC Director Stephen Cambra.

Johnson has consistently challenged, and the CDC has consistently defended, the policy as a whole—as it relates to both new inmates and inmates transferred from other facilities. Johnson was first segregated in 1987 as a new inmate when he entered the CDC facility at Folsom. Since 1987, he has been segregated each time he has been transferred to a new facility. Thus, he has been subject to the CDC's policy both as a new inmate and as an inmate transferred from one facility to another.

After discovery, the parties moved for summary judgment. The District Court *1146 granted summary judgment to the defendants on grounds that they were entitled to qualified immunity because their conduct was not clearly unconstitutional. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed. 321 F.3d 791 (2003). It held that the constitutionality of the CDC's policy should be reviewed under the deferential standard we articulated in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64 (1987)—not strict scrutiny. 321 F.3d, at 798–799. Applying Turner, it held that Johnson had the burden of refuting the "common-sense connection" between the policy and 505 prison violence. 321 F.3d, at 802. Though it believed this was a "close case," id., at 798, the Court of Appeals concluded that the policy survived Turner's deferential standard, 321 F.3d, at 807.

The Court of Appeals denied Johnson's petition for rehearing en banc. Judge Ferguson, joined by three others, dissented on grounds that "[t]he panel's decision ignore[d] the Supreme Court's repeated and unequivocal command that all racial classifications imposed by the government must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny, and fail[ed] to recognize that [the] Turner analysis is inapplicable in cases, such as this one, in which the right asserted is not inconsistent with legitimate penological objectives." 336 F.3d 1117 (2003) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). We granted certiorari to decide which standard of review applies. 540 U.S. 1217, 124 S.Ct. 1505, 158 L.Ed.2d 151 (2004).

II

A

[1] We have held that "all racial classifications [imposed by government] ... must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny." Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995) (emphasis added). Under strict scrutiny, the government has the burden of proving that racial classifications "are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests." Ibid. We have insisted on strict scrutiny in every context, even for so-called "benign" racial classifications, such as race-conscious university admissions policies, see Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003), race-based preferences in government contracts, see Adarand, supra, at 226, 115 S.Ct. 2097, and race-based districting intended to improve minority representation, see Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 650, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993).

The reasons for strict scrutiny are familiar. Racial classifications raise special fears that they are motivated by an invidious purpose. Thus, we have admonished time and 506 again that, "[a]bsent searching judicial inquiry into the justification for such race-based measures, there is simply no way of determining ... what classifications are in fact motivated by illegitimate notions of racial inferiority or simple racial politics." Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493, 109 S.Ct. 706, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989) (plurality opinion). We therefore apply strict scrutiny to all racial classifications to " 'smoke out' illegitimate uses of race by assuring that [government] is pursuing a goal important enough to warrant use of a highly suspect tool." Ibid.[1]

The CDC claims that its policy should be exempt from our categorical rule because 1147 it is "neutral"—that is, it "neither benefits nor burdens one group or individual more than any other group or individual." Brief for Respondents 16. In other words, strict scrutiny should not apply because all prisoners are "equally" segregated. The CDC's argument ignores our repeated command that "racial classifications receive close scrutiny even when they may be said to burden or benefit the races equally." Shaw, supra, at 651, 113 S.Ct. 2816. Indeed, we rejected the notion that separate can ever be equal—or "neutral"—50 years ago in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954), and we refuse to resurrect it today. See also Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 113 L.Ed.2d 411 (1991) (rejecting the argument that race-based peremptory challenges were permissible because they applied equally to white and black jurors and holding that "[i]t is axiomatic that racial classifications do not become legitimate on the assumption that all persons suffer them in equal degree").

We have previously applied a heightened standard of review in evaluating racial segregation in prisons. In Lee v. *507 Washington, 390 U.S. 333, 88 S.Ct. 994, 19 L.Ed.2d 1212 (1968) (per curiam), we upheld a three-judge court's decision striking down Alabama's policy of segregation in its prisons. Id., at 333–334, 88 S.Ct. 994. Alabama had argued that desegregation would undermine prison security and discipline, id., at 334, 88 S.Ct. 994, but we rejected that contention. Three Justices concurred "to make explicit something that is left to be gathered only by implication from the Court's opinion"—"that prison authorities have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails." Ibid. (emphasis added). The concurring Justices emphasized that they were "unwilling to assume that state or local prison authorities might mistakenly regard such an explicit pronouncement as evincing any dilution of this Court's firm commitment to the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition of racial discrimination." Ibid.

[2] The need for strict scrutiny is no less important here, where prison officials cite racial violence as the reason for their policy. As we have recognized in the past, racial classifications "threaten to stigmatize individuals by reason of their membership in a racial group and to incite racial hostility." Shaw, supra, at 643, 113 S.Ct. 2816 (citing J.A. Croson Co., supra, at 493, 109 S.Ct. 706 (plurality opinion); emphasis added). Indeed, by insisting that inmates be housed only with other inmates of the same race, it is possible that prison officials will breed further hostility among prisoners and reinforce racial and ethnic divisions. By perpetuating the notion that race matters most, racial segregation of inmates "may exacerbate the very patterns of [violence that it is] said to counteract." Shaw, supra, at 648, 113 S.Ct. 2816; see also Trulson & Marquart, The Caged Melting Pot: Toward an Understanding of the Consequences of Desegregation in Prisons, 36 Law & Soc. Rev. 743, 774 (2002) (in a study of prison desegregation, finding that "over [10 years] the rate of violence between inmates segregated by race in double cells surpassed the rate among those *508 racially integrated"). See also Brief for Former State Corrections Officials as Amici Curiae 19 (opinion of former corrections officials from six States that "racial integration of cells tends to diffuse racial tensions and thus diminish interracial violence" and that "a blanket 1148 policy of racial segregation of inmates is contrary to sound prison management").

The CDC's policy is unwritten. Although California claimed at oral argument that two other States follow a similar policy, see Tr. of Oral Arg. 30–31, this assertion was unsubstantiated, and we are unable to confirm or deny its accuracy.[2] Virtually all other States and the Federal Government manage their prison systems without reliance on racial segregation. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 24. Federal regulations governing the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) expressly prohibit racial segregation. 28 CFR § 551.90 (2004) ("[BOP] staff shall not discriminate *509 against inmates on the basis of race, religion, national origin, sex, disability, or political belief. This includes the making of administrative decisions and providing access to work, housing and programs"). The United States contends that racial integration actually "leads to less violence in BOP's institutions and better prepares inmates for re-entry into society." Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 25. Indeed, the United States argues, based on its experience with the BOP, that it is possible to address "concerns of prison security through individualized consideration without the use of racial segregation, unless warranted as a necessary and temporary response to a race riot or other serious threat of race-related violence." Id., at 24. As to transferees, in particular, whom the CDC has already evaluated at least once, it is not clear why more individualized determinations are not possible.

Because the CDC's policy is an express racial classification, it is "immediately suspect." Shaw, 509 U.S., at 642, 113 S.Ct. 2816; see also Washington v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 485, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896 (1982). We therefore hold that the Court of Appeals erred when it failed to apply strict scrutiny to the CDC's policy and to require the CDC to demonstrate that its policy is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest.

B

The CDC invites us to make an exception to the rule that strict scrutiny applies to all racial classifications, and instead to apply the deferential standard of review articulated in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64 (1987), because its segregation policy applies only *1149 in the prison context. We decline the invitation. In Turner, we considered a claim by Missouri prisoners that regulations restricting inmate marriages and inmate-to-inmate correspondence were unconstitutional. Id., at 81, 107 S.Ct. 2254. We rejected the prisoners' argument that the regulations should be subject to strict scrutiny, asking instead whether the regulation that burdened the prisoners' 510 fundamental rights was "reasonably related" to "legitimate penological interests." Id., at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254.

We have never applied Turner to racial classifications. Turner itself did not involve any racial classification, and it cast no doubt on Lee. We think this unsurprising, as we have applied Turner's reasonable-relationship test only to rights that are "inconsistent with proper incarceration." Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 131, 123 S.Ct. 2162, 156 L.Ed.2d 162 (2003); see also Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 817, 822, 94 S.Ct. 2800, 41 L.Ed.2d 495 (1974) ("[A] prison inmate retains those First Amendment rights that are not inconsistent with his status as a prisoner or with the legitimate penological objectives of the corrections system"). This is because certain privileges and rights must necessarily be limited in the prison context. See O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 348, 107 S.Ct. 2400, 96 L.Ed.2d 282 (1987) (" '[L]awful incarceration brings about the necessary withdrawal or limitation of many privileges and rights, a retraction justified by the considerations underlying our penal system' " (quoting Price v. Johnston, 334 U.S. 266, 285, 68 S.Ct. 1049, 92 L.Ed. 1356 (1948))). Thus, for example, we have relied on Turner in addressing First Amendment challenges to prison regulations, including restrictions on freedom of association, Overton, supra; limits on inmate correspondence, Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 121 S.Ct. 1475, 149 L.Ed.2d 420 (2001); restrictions on inmates' access to courts, Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 116 S.Ct. 2174, 135 L.Ed.2d 606 (1996); restrictions on receipt of subscription publications, Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 109 S.Ct. 1874, 104 L.Ed.2d 459 (1989); and work rules limiting prisoners' attendance at religious services, Shabazz, supra. We have also applied Turner to some due process claims, such as involuntary medication of mentally ill prisoners, Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 110 S.Ct. 1028, 108 L.Ed.2d 178 (1990); and restrictions on the right to marry, Turner, supra.

The right not to be discriminated against based on one's race is not susceptible to the logic of Turner. It is not a right that need necessarily be compromised for the sake of proper prison administration. On the contrary, compliance with the Fourteenth Amendment's ban on racial discriminationis 511 not only consistent with proper prison administration, but also bolsters the legitimacy of the entire criminal justice system. Race discrimination is "especially pernicious in the administration of justice." Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545, 555, 99 S.Ct. 2993, 61 L.Ed.2d 739 (1979). And public respect for our system of justice is undermined when the system discriminates based on race. Cf. Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 99, 106 S.Ct. 1712, 90 L.Ed.2d 69 (1986) ("[P]ublic respect for our criminal justice system and the rule of law will be strengthened if we ensure that no citizen is disqualified from jury service because of his race"). When government officials are permitted to use race as a proxy for gang membership and violence without demonstrating a compelling government interest and proving that their means are narrowly tailored, society as a whole suffers. For similar reasons, we have not used Turner to evaluate Eighth Amendment claims of cruel and unusual punishment in prison. We judge violations *1150 of that Amendment under the "deliberate indifference" standard, rather than Turner's "reasonably related" standard. See Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 738, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002) (asking whether prison officials displayed " 'deliberate indifference' to the inmates' health or safety" where an inmate claimed that they violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment (quoting Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 8, 112 S.Ct. 995, 117 L.Ed.2d 156 (1992))). This is because the integrity of the criminal justice system depends on full compliance with the Eighth Amendment. See Spain v. Procunier, 600 F.2d 189, 193–194 (C.A.9 1979) (Kennedy, J.) ("[T]he full protections of the eighth amendment most certainly remain in force [in prison]. The whole point of the amendment is to protect persons convicted of crimes. ... Mechanical deference to the findings of state prison officials in the context of the eighth amendment would reduce that provision to a nullity in precisely the context where it is most necessary").

In the prison context, when the government's power is at its apex, we think that searching judicial review of racial classifications is necessary to guard against invidious discrimination. 512 Granting the CDC an exemption from the rule that strict scrutiny applies to all racial classifications would undermine our "unceasing efforts to eradicate racial prejudice from our criminal justice system." McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 309, 107 S.Ct. 1756, 95 L.Ed.2d 262 (1987) (internal quotation marks omitted).

The CDC argues that "[d]eference to the particular expertise of prison officials in the difficult task of managing daily prison operations" requires a more relaxed standard of review for its segregation policy. Brief for Respondents 18. But we have refused to defer to state officials' judgments on race in other areas where those officials traditionally exercise substantial discretion. For example, we have held that, despite the broad discretion given to prosecutors when they use their peremptory challenges, using those challenges to strike jurors on the basis of their race is impermissible. See Batson, supra, at 89–96, 106 S.Ct. 1712. Similarly, in the redistricting context, despite the traditional deference given to States when they design their electoral districts, we have subjected redistricting plans to strict scrutiny when States draw district lines based predominantly on race. Compare generally Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158 L.Ed.2d 546 (2004) (partisan gerrymandering), with Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (racial gerrymandering).

We did not relax the standard of review for racial classifications in prison in Lee, and we refuse to do so today. Rather, we explicitly reaffirm what we implicitly held in Lee: The "necessities of prison security and discipline," 390 U.S., at 334, 88 S.Ct. 994, are a compelling government interest justifying only those uses of race that are narrowly tailored to address those necessities. See Grutter, 539 U.S., at 353, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Lee for the principle that "protecting prisoners from violence might justify narrowly tailored racial discrimination"); J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S., at 521, 109 S.Ct. 706 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment) (citing Lee for the proposition that "only a social emergency rising to the level of imminent danger to life and limb—for 513 example, a prison race riot, requiring temporary segregation of inmates —can justify an exception to the principle embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment that '[o]ur Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens' " (quoting *1151 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting))); see also Pell, 417 U.S., at 823, 94 S.Ct. 2800 ("[C]entral to all other corrections goals is the institutional consideration of internal security within the corrections facilities themselves").

Justice THOMAS would subject race-based policies in prisons to Turner's deferential standard of review because, in his view, judgments about whether race-based policies are necessary "are better left in the first instance to the officials who run our Nation's prisons." Post, at 1168. But Turner is too lenient a standard to ferret out invidious uses of race. Turner requires only that the policy be "reasonably related" to "legitimate penological interests." 482 U.S., at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254. Turner would allow prison officials to use race-based policies even when there are race-neutral means to accomplish the same goal, and even when the race-based policy does not in practice advance that goal. See, e.g., 321 F.3d, at 803 (case below) (reasoning that, under Turner, the Court of Appeals did "not have to agree that the policy actually advances the CDC's legitimate interest, but only [that] 'defendants might reasonably have thought that the policy would advance its interests' "). See also Turner, supra, at 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254 (warning that Turner is not a "least restrictive alternative test" (internal quotation marks omitted)).

For example, in Justice THOMAS' world, prison officials could segregate visiting areas on the ground that racial mixing would cause unrest in the racially charged prison atmosphere. Under Turner, "[t]he prisoner would have to prove that there would not be a riot[.] [But] [i]t is certainly 'plausible' that such a riot could ensue: our society, as well as our prisons, contains enough racists that almost any interracial interaction could potentially lead to conflict." 514 336 F.3d, at 1120 (case below) (Ferguson, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc). Indeed, under Justice THOMAS' view, there is no obvious limit to permissible segregation in prisons. It is not readily apparent why, if segregation in reception centers is justified, segregation in the dining halls, yards, and general housing areas is not also permissible. Any of these areas could be the potential site of racial violence. If Justice THOMAS' approach were to carry the day, even the blanket segregation policy struck down in Lee might stand a chance of survival if prison officials simply asserted that it was necessary to prison management. We therefore reject the Turner standard for racial classifications in prisons because it would make rank discrimination too easy to defend.

The CDC protests that strict scrutiny will handcuff prison administrators and render them unable to address legitimate problems of race-based violence in prisons. See also post, at 1161–1162, 1170–1171 (THOMAS, J., dissenting). Not so. Strict scrutiny is not "strict in theory, but fatal in fact." Adarand, 515 U.S., at 237, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (internal quotation marks omitted); Grutter, 539 U.S., at 326–327, 123 S.Ct. 2325 ("Although all governmental uses of race are subject to strict scrutiny, not all are invalidated by it"). Strict scrutiny does not preclude the ability of prison officials to address the compelling interest in prison safety. Prison administrators, however, will have to demonstrate that any race-based policies are narrowly tailored to that end. See id., at 327, 123 S.Ct. 2325 ("When race-based action is necessary to further a compelling governmental interest, such action does not violate the constitutional guarantee of equal protection so long as the narrow-tailoring requirement is *1152 also satisfied").[3]

515 The fact that strict scrutiny applies "says nothing about the ultimate validity of any particular law; that determination is the job of the court applying strict scrutiny." Adarand, supra, at 229–230, 115 S.Ct. 2097. At this juncture, no such determination has been made. On remand, the CDC will have the burden of demonstrating that its policy is narrowly tailored with regard to new inmates as well as transferees. Prisons are dangerous places, and the special circumstances they present may justify racial classifications in some contexts. Such circumstances can be considered in applying strict scrutiny, which is designed to take relevant differences into account.

III

We do not decide whether the CDC's policy violates the Equal Protection Clause. We hold only that strict scrutiny is the proper standard of review and remand the case to allow the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, or the District Court, to apply it in the first instance. See Consolidated Rail Corporation v. Gottshall, 512 U.S. 532, 557–558, 114 S.Ct. 2396, 129 L.Ed.2d 427 (1994) (reversing and remanding for the lower court to apply the correct legal standard in the first instance); Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1031–1032, 112 S.Ct. 2886, 120 L.Ed.2d 798 (1992) (same). The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE took no part in the decision of this case.

Justice GINSBURG, with whom Justice SOUTER and Justice BREYER join, concurring.

516 I join the Court's opinion, subject to the reservation expressed in Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 344–346, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003) (GINSBURG, J., concurring).

The Court today resoundingly reaffirms the principle that state-imposed racial segregation is highly suspect and cannot be justified on the ground that " 'all persons suffer [the separation] in equal degree.' " Ante, at 1147 (quoting Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 113 L.Ed.2d 411 (1991)). While I join that declaration without reservation, I write separately to express again my conviction that the same standard of review ought not control judicial inspection of every official race classification. As I stated most recently in Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 301, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257 (2003) (dissenting opinion): "Actions designed to burden groups long denied full citizenship stature are not sensibly ranked with measures *1153 taken to hasten the day when entrenched discrimination and its aftereffects have been extirpated." See also Grutter, 539 U.S., at 344–346, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (GINSBURG, J., concurring); Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 271–276, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995) (GINSBURG, J., dissenting).

There is no pretense here, however, that the California Department of Corrections (CDC) installed its segregation policy to "correct inequalities." See Wechsler, The Nationalization of Civil Liberties and Civil Rights, Supp. to 12 Tex. Q. 10, 23 (1968). Experience in other States and in federal prisons, see ante, at 1148; post, at 1154–1155 (STEVENS, J., dissenting), strongly suggests that CDC's race-based assignment of new inmates and transferees, administratively convenient as it may be, is not necessary to the safe management of a penal institution.

Disagreeing with the Court that "strict scrutiny" properly applies to any and all racial classifications, see ante, at 1146–1148, 1150–1151, 1151–1152, but agreeing that the stereotypical classification at hand warrants rigorous scrutiny, I join the Court's opinion.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

517 In my judgment a state policy of segregating prisoners by race during the first 60 days of their incarceration, as well as the first 60 days after their transfer from one facility to another, violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The California Department of Corrections (CDC) has had an ample opportunity to justify its policy during the course of this litigation, but has utterly failed to do so whether judged under strict scrutiny or the more deferential standard set out in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64 (1987). The CDC had no incentive in the proceedings below to withhold evidence supporting its policy; nor has the CDC made any offer of proof to suggest that a remand for further factual development would serve any purpose other than to postpone the inevitable. I therefore agree with the submission of the United States as amicus curiae that the Court should hold the policy unconstitutional on the current record.

The CDC's segregation policy[1] is based on a conclusive presumption that housing inmates of different races together creates an unacceptable risk of racial violence. Under the policy's logic, an inmate's race is a proxy for gang membership, and gang membership is a proxy for violence. The 518 CDC, however, has offered scant empirical evidence or expert opinion to justify this use of race under even a minimal level of constitutional scrutiny. The presumption underlying the policy is undoubtedly overbroad. The CDC has made no effort to prove what fraction of new or transferred inmates are members of race-based gangs, nor has it shown more generally that interracial violence is disproportionately *1154 greater than intraracial violence in its prisons. Proclivity toward racial violence unquestionably varies from inmate to inmate, yet the CDC applies its blunderbuss policy to all new and transferred inmates housed in double cells regardless of their criminal histories or records of previous incarceration. Under the CDC's policy, for example, two car thieves of different races—neither of whom has any history of gang involvement, or of violence, for that matter—would be barred from being housed together during their first two months of prison. This result derives from the CDC's inflexible judgment that such integrated living conditions are simply too dangerous. This Court has never countenanced such racial prophylaxis.

To establish a link between integrated cells and violence, the CDC relies on the views of two state corrections officials. They attested to their belief that double-celling members of different races would lead to violence and that this violence would spill out into the prison yards. One of these officials, an associate warden, testified as follows:

> "[W]ith the Asian population, the control sergeants have to be more careful than they do with Blacks, Whites, and Hispanics because, for example, you cannot house a Japanese inmate with a Chinese inmate. You cannot. They will kill each other. They won't even tell you about it. They will just do it. The same with Laotians, Vietnamese, Cambodians, Filipinos. You have to be very careful about housing other Asians with other Asians. It's very culturally heavy." App. 189a.

519 Such musings inspire little confidence. Indeed, this comment supports the suspicion that the policy is based on racial stereotypes and outmoded fears about the dangers of racial integration. This Court should give no credence to such cynical, reflexive conclusions about race. See, e.g., Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429, 432, 104 S.Ct. 1879, 80 L.Ed.2d 421 (1984) ("Classifying persons according to their race is more likely to reflect racial prejudice than legitimate public concerns; the race, not the person, dictates the category"); Watson v. Memphis, 373 U.S. 526, 536, 83 S.Ct. 1314, 10 L.Ed.2d 529 (1963) (rejecting the city's plea for delay in desegregating public facilities when "neither the asserted fears of violence and tumult nor the asserted inability to preserve the peace was demonstrated at trial to be anything more than personal speculations or vague disquietudes of city officials").

The very real risk that prejudice (whether conscious or not) partly underlies the CDC's policy counsels in favor of relaxing the usual deference we pay to corrections officials in these matters. We should instead insist on hard evidence, especially given that California's policy is an outlier when compared to nationwide practice. The Federal Bureau of Prisons administers 104 institutions; no similar policy is applied in any of them. Countless state penal institutions are operated without such a policy. An amici brief filed by six former state corrections officials with an aggregate of over 120 years of experience managing prison systems in Wisconsin, Georgia, Oklahoma, Kansas, Alaska, and Washington makes clear that a blanket policy of even temporary segregation runs counter to the great weight of professional opinion on sound prison management. See Brief for Former State Corrections Officials as Amici Curiae 19. Tellingly, the CDC can only point to two other States, Texas and Oklahoma, that use racial status in assigning inmates in prison reception areas. It is doubtful from the record that these States' policies have the same broad and inflexible sweep as California's, and this is ultimately beside the point. What is important is that the Federal Government *1155 and the vast 520 majority of States address the threat of interracial violence in prisons without resorting to the expedient of segregation.

In support of its policy, the CDC offers poignant evidence that its prisons are infested with violent race-based gangs. The most striking of this evidence involves a series of riots that took place between 1998 and 2001 at Pelican Bay State Prison. That prison houses some of the State's most violent criminal offenders, including "validated" gang members who have been transferred from other prisons. The riots involved both interracial and intraracial violence. In the most serious incident, involving 250–300 inmates, "Southern Hispanic" gang members, joined by some white inmates, attacked a number of black inmates.

Our judicial role, however, requires that we scratch below the surface of this evidence, lest the sheer gravity of a threat be allowed to authorize any policy justified in its name. Upon inspection, the CDC's post hoc, generalized evidence of gang violence is only tenuously related to its segregation policy. Significantly, the CDC has not cited a single specific incident of interracial violence between cellmates—much less a pattern of such violence—that prompted the adoption of its unique policy years ago. Nor is there any indication that antagonism between cellmates played any role in the more recent riots the CDC mentions. And despite the CDC's focus on prison gangs and its suggestion that such gangs will recruit new inmates into committing racial violence during their 60–day stays in the reception centers, the CDC has cited no evidence of such recruitment, nor has it identified any instances in which new inmates committed racial violence against other new inmates in the common areas, such as the yard or the cafeteria. Perhaps the CDC's evidence might provide a basis for arguing that at Pelican Bay and other facilities that have experienced similar riots, some race-conscious measures are justified if properly tailored. See Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. 333, 334, 88 S.Ct. 994, 19 L.Ed.2d 1212 (1968) (Black, J., concurring). But even if the incidents cited by the CDC, 521 which occurred in the general prison population, were relevant to the conditions in the reception centers, they provide no support for the CDC's decision to apply its segregation policy to all of its reception centers, without regard for each center's security level or history of racial violence. Nor do the incidents provide any support for a policy applicable only to cellmates, while the common areas of the prison in which the disturbances occurred remain fully integrated.

Given the inherent indignity of segregation and its shameful historical connotations, one might assume that the CDC came to its policy only as a last resort. Distressingly, this is not so: There is no evidence that the CDC has ever experimented with, or even carefully considered, race-neutral methods of achieving its goals. That the policy is unwritten reflects, I think, the evident lack of deliberation that preceded its creation.

Specifically, the CDC has failed to explain why it could not, as an alternative to automatic segregation, rely on an individualized assessment of each inmate's risk of violence when assigning him to a cell in a reception center. The Federal Bureau of Prisons and other state systems do so without any apparent difficulty. For inmates who are being transferred from one facility to another—who represent approximately 85% of those subject to the segregation policy—the CDC can simply examine their prison records to determine if they have any known gang affiliations or if they have ever engaged in or threatened *1156 racial violence. For example, the CDC has had an opportunity to observe petitioner for almost 20 years; surely the CDC could have determined his placement without subjecting him to a period of segregation.[2] For new inmates, assignments can be based on their 522 presentence reports, which contain information about offense conduct, criminal record, and personal history—including any available information about gang affiliations. In fact, state law requires the county probation officer to transmit a presentence report to the CDC along with an inmate's commitment papers. See Cal.Penal Code Ann. § 1203c (West 2004); Cal. Rule of Court 4.411(d) (Criminal Cases) (West Supp.2004).

Despite the rich information available in these records, the CDC considers these records only rarely in assigning inmates to cells in the reception centers. The CDC's primary explanation for this is administrative inefficiency —the records, it says, simply do not arrive in time. The CDC's counsel conceded at oral argument that presentence reports "have a fair amount of information," but she stated that, "in California, the presentence report does not always accompany the inmate and frequently does not. It follows some period of time later from the county." Tr. of Oral Arg. 33. Despite the state-law requirement to the contrary, counsel informed the Court that the counties are not preparing the presentence reports "in a timely fashion." Ibid. Similarly, with regard to transferees, counsel stated that their prison records do not arrive at the reception centers in time to make cell assignments. Id., at 28. Even if such inefficiencies might explain a temporary expedient in some cases, they surely do not justify a systemwide policy. When the State's interest in administrative convenience is pitted against the Fourteenth Amendment's ban on racial segregation, the latter must prevail. When there has been no "serious, good faith consideration of workable race-neutral alternatives that will achieve the [desired goal]," 523 Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 339, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003), and when "obvious, easy alternatives" are available, Turner, 482 U.S., at 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254, the conclusion that CDC's policy is unconstitutional is inescapable regardless of the standard of review that the Court chooses to apply.[3]

In fact, the CDC's failure to demand timely presentence reports and prison records undercuts the sincerity of its concern for inmate security during the reception process. Race is an unreliable and necessarily *1157 underinclusive predictor of violence. Without the inmate-specific information found in the records, there is a risk that corrections officials will, for example, house together inmates of the same race who are nevertheless members of rival gangs, such as the Bloods and Crips.[4]

Accordingly, while I agree that a remand is appropriate for a resolution of the issue of qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent from the Court's refusal to decide, on the basis of the record before us, that the CDC's policy is unconstitutional.

Justice THOMAS, with whom Justice SCALIA joins, dissenting.

524 The questions presented in this case require us to resolve two conflicting lines of precedent. On the one hand, as the Court stresses, this Court has said that " 'all racial classifications reviewable under the Equal Protection Clause must be strictly scrutinized.' " Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 270, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257 (2003) (quoting Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 224, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995); emphasis added). On the other, this Court has no less categorically said that "the [relaxed] standard of review we adopted in Turner [v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64 (1987),] applies to all circumstances in which the needs of prison administration implicate constitutional rights." Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 224, 110 S.Ct. 1028, 108 L.Ed.2d 178 (1990) (emphasis added).

Emphasizing the former line of cases, the majority resolves the conflict in favor of strict scrutiny. I disagree. The Constitution has always demanded less within the prison walls. Time and again, even when faced with constitutional rights no less "fundamental" than the right to be free from state-sponsored racial discrimination, we have deferred to the reasonable judgments of officials experienced in running this Nation's prisons. There is good reason for such deference in this case. California oversees roughly 160,000 inmates in prisons that have been a breeding ground for some of the most violent prison gangs in America—all of them organized along racial lines. In that atmosphere, California racially segregates a portion of its inmates, in a part of its prisons, for brief periods of up to 60 days, until the State can arrange permanent housing. The majority is concerned with sparing inmates the indignity and stigma of racial discrimination. Ante, at 1147–1148. California is concerned with their safety and saving their lives. I respectfully dissent.

525 I

To understand this case, one must understand just how limited the policy at issue is. That requires more factual background than the Court's opinion provides. Petitioner Garrison Johnson is a black inmate in the California Department of Corrections (CDC), currently serving his sentence for murder, robbery, and assault with a deadly weapon. App. 255a–256a, 259a. Johnson began serving his sentence in June 1987 at the California Institution for Men in Chino, California. *1158 Id., at 79a, 264a. Since that time he has been transferred to a number of other facilities within the CDC. Id., at 79a–82a.

When an inmate like Johnson is admitted into the California prison system or transferred between the CDC's institutions, he is housed initially for a brief period—usually no more than 60 days—in one of California's prison reception centers for men. Id., at 303a–305a. CDC, Department Operations Manual § 61010.3 (2004) (hereinafter CDC Operations Manual), available at http://www. corr.ca.gov/RegulationsPolicies/PDF/DOM/00_dept_ops_maunal.pdf (all Internet materials as visited Feb. 18, 2005, and available in Clerk of Court's case file). In 2003, the centers processed more than 40,000 newly admitted inmates, almost 72,000 inmates returned from parole, over 14,000 inmates admitted for other reasons, and some portion of the 254,000 inmates who were transferred from one prison to another. CDC, Movement of Prison Population 3 (2003).

At the reception center, prison officials have limited information about an inmate, "particularly if he has never been housed in any CDC facility." App. 303a. The inmate therefore is classified so that prison officials can place the inmate in appropriate permanent housing. During this process, the CDC evaluates the inmate's "physical, mental and emotional health." Ibid. The CDC also reviews the inmate's criminal 526 history and record in jail to assess his security needs and classification level. Id., at 304a. Finally, the CDC investigates whether the inmate has any enemies in prison. Ibid. This process determines the inmate's ultimate housing placement and has nothing to do with race.

While the process is underway, the CDC houses the inmate in a one-person cell, a two-person cell, or a dormitory. Id., at 305a. The few single cells available at reception centers are reserved for inmates who present special security problems, including those convicted of especially heinous crimes or those in need of protective custody. See, e.g., CDC Operations Manual § 61010.11.3. At the other end of the spectrum, lower risk inmates are assigned to dormitories. App. 189a–190a. Placement in either a single cell or a dormitory has nothing to do with race, except that prison officials attempt to maintain a racial balance within each dormitory. Id., at 250a. Inmates placed in single cells or dormitories lead fully integrated lives: The CDC does not distinguish based on race at any of its facilities when it comes to jobs, meals, yard and recreation time, or vocational and educational assignments. Ibid.

Yet some prisoners, like Johnson, neither require confinement in a single cell nor may be safely housed in a dormitory. The CDC houses these prisoners in double cells during the 60–day period. In pairing cellmates, race is indisputably the predominant factor. Id., at 305a, 309a. California's reason is simple: Its prisons are dominated by violent gangs. Brief for Respondents 1–5. And as the largest gangs' names indicate —the Aryan Brotherhood, the Black Guerrilla Family, the Mexican Mafia, the Nazi Low Riders, and La Nuestra Familia —they are organized along racial lines. See Part II–B, infra.

According to the State, housing inmates in double cells without regard to race threatens not only prison discipline, but also the physical safety of inmates and staff. App. 305a–306a, 310a–311a. That is because double cells are especially 527 dangerous. The risk of racial violence in public areas of prisons is high, and the tightly confined, private conditions of cells hazard even more violence. Prison staff cannot *1159 see into the cells without going up to them, and inmates can cover the windows to prevent the staff from seeing inside the cells. Id., at 306a. The risk of violence caused by this privacy is grave, for inmates are confined to their cells for much of the day. Ibid.; id., at 187a–188a.

Nevertheless, while race is the predominant factor in pairing cellmates, it is hardly the only one. After dividing this subset of inmates based on race, the CDC further divides them based on geographic or national origin. As an example, Hispanics from northern and southern California are not housed together in reception centers because they often belong to rival gangs —La Nuestra Familia and the Mexican Mafia, respectively. Id., at 185a. Likewise, Chinese and Japanese inmates are not housed together, nor are Cambodians, Filipinos, Laotians, or Vietnamese. Id., at 189a. In addition to geographic and national origin, prison officials consider a host of other factors, including inmates' age, mental health, medical needs, criminal history, and gang affiliation. Id., at 304a, 309a. For instance, when Johnson was admitted in 1987, he was a member of the Crips, a black street gang. Id., at 93a. He was therefore ineligible to be housed with nonblack inmates. Id., at 183a; Brief for Respondents 12, n. 9.

Moreover, while prison officials consider race in assigning inmates to double cells, the record shows that inmates are not necessarily housed with other inmates of the same race during that 60–day period. When a Hispanic inmate affiliated with the Crips asked to be housed at the reception center with a black inmate, for example, prison administrators granted his request. App. 183a–184a, 199a. Such requests are routinely granted after the 60–day period, when prison officials complete the classification process and transfer an 528 inmate from the reception center to a permanent placement at that prison or another one.[1] Id., at 311a–312a.

II

Traditionally, federal courts rarely involved themselves in the administration of state prisons, "adopt[ing] a broad hands-off attitude toward problems of prison administration."[2] Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396, 404, 94 S.Ct. 1800, 40 L.Ed.2d 224 (1974). For most of this Nation's *1160 history, only law-abiding citizens could claim the cover of the Constitution: Upon conviction and incarceration, defendants forfeited their constitutional rights and possessed instead only those rights that the State chose to extend them. See, e.g., Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 228, 121 S.Ct. 1475, 149 L.Ed.2d 420 (2001); Ruffin v. Commonwealth, 62 Va. 790, 796 (1871). In recent decades, however, this Court has decided 529 that incarceration does not divest prisoners of all constitutional protections. See, e.g., Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 555–556, 94 S.Ct. 2963, 41 L.Ed.2d 935 (1974) (the right to due process); Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319, 322, 92 S.Ct. 1079, 31 L.Ed.2d 263 (1972) (per curiam) (the right to free exercise of religion).[3]

At the same time, this Court quickly recognized that the extension of the Constitution's demands behind prison walls had to accommodate the needs of prison administration. This Court reached that accommodation in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64 (1987), which "adopted a unitary, deferential standard for reviewing prisoners' constitutional claims," Shaw, supra, at 229, 113 S.Ct. 2816. That standard should govern Johnson's claims, as it has governed a host of other claims challenging conditions of confinement, even when restricting the rights at issue would otherwise have occasioned strict scrutiny. Under the Turner standard, the CDC's policy passes constitutional muster because it is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.

A

Well before Turner, this Court recognized that experienced prison administrators, and not judges, are in the best position to supervise the daily operations of prisons across this country. See, e.g., Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Labor Union, Inc., 433 U.S. 119, 125, 97 S.Ct. 2532, 53 L.Ed.2d 629 (1977) (courts must give "appropriate deference to the decisions of prison administrators"); Procunier, supra, at 405, 94 S.Ct. 1800 ("[C]ourts are ill equipped to deal with the increasingly urgent problems of prison administration 530 and reform"). Turner made clear that a deferential standard of review would apply across the board to inmates' constitutional challenges to prison policies.

At issue in Turner was the constitutionality of a pair of Missouri prison regulations limiting inmate-to-inmate correspondence and inmate marriages. The Court's analysis proceeded in two steps. First, the Court recognized that prisoners are not entirely without constitutional rights. As proof, it listed certain constitutional rights retained by prisoners, including the right to be "protected against invidious racial discrimination ..., Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. 333, 88 S.Ct. 994, 19 L.Ed.2d 1212 (1968)." Turner, 482 U.S., at 84, 107 S.Ct. 2254. Second, the Court concluded that for prison administrators rather than courts to " 'make the difficult judgments concerning institutional operations,' " id., at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254 (quoting Jones, supra, at 128, 97 S.Ct. 2532), courts should *1161 uphold prison regulations that impinge on those constitutional rights if they reasonably relate to legitimate penological interests, 482 U.S., at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254. Nowhere did the Court suggest that Lee's right to be free from racial discrimination was immune from Turner's deferential standard of review. To the contrary, "[w]e made quite clear that the standard of review we adopted in Turner applies to all circumstances in which the needs of prison administration implicate constitutional rights." Harper, 494 U.S., at 224, 110 S.Ct. 1028 (emphasis added).

Consistent with that understanding, this Court has applied Turner's standard to a host of constitutional claims by prisoners, regardless of the standard of review that would apply outside prison walls.[4] And this Court has adhered to 531 Turner despite being urged to adopt different standards of review based on the constitutional provision at issue. See Harper, supra, at 224, 110 S.Ct. 1028 (Turner's standard of review "appl [ies] in all cases in which a prisoner asserts that a prison regulation violates the Constitution, not just those in which the prisoner invokes the First Amendment" (emphasis added)); O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 353, 107 S.Ct. 2400, 96 L.Ed.2d 282 (1987) ("We take this opportunity to reaffirm our refusal, even where claims are made under the First Amendment, to substitute our judgment on ... difficult and sensitive matters of institutional administration for the determinations of those charged with the formidable task of running a prison" (internal quotation marks and citation omitted; emphasis added)). Our steadfast adherence makes sense: If Turner is our accommodation of the Constitution's demands to those of prison administration, see supra, at 1160–1161, we should apply it uniformly to prisoners' challenges to their conditions of confinement.

After all, Johnson's claims, even more than other claims to which we have applied Turner's test, implicate Turner's rationale. In fact, in a passage that bears repeating, the Turner Court explained precisely why deference to the judgments of California's prison officials is necessary:

> "Subjecting the day-to-day judgments of prison officials to an inflexible strict scrutiny analysis would seriously hamper their ability to anticipate security problems and to adopt innovative solutions to the intractable problems of prison administration. The rule would also distort the decisionmaking process, for every administrative judgment would be subject to the possibility that some court somewhere would conclude that it had a less restrictive way of solving the problem at hand. Courts inevitably would become the primary arbiters of what constitutes the best solution to every administrative 532 problem, thereby unnecessarily perpetuating the involvement of the federal courts in affairs of prison administration." *1162 482 U.S., at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254 (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted).

The majority's failure to heed that advice is inexplicable, especially since Turner itself recognized the "growing problem with prison gangs." Id., at 91, 107 S.Ct. 2254. In fact, there is no more "intractable problem" inside America's prisons than racial violence, which is driven by race-based prison gangs. See, e.g., Dawson v. Delaware, 503 U.S. 159, 172–173, and n. 1, 112 S.Ct. 1093, 117 L.Ed.2d 309 (1992) (THOMAS, J., dissenting); Stefanow v. McFadden, 103 F.3d 1466, 1472 (C.A.9 1996) ("Anyone familiar with prisons understands the seriousness of the problems caused by prison gangs that are fueled by actively virulent racism and religious bigotry").

B

The majority decides this case without addressing the problems that racial violence poses for wardens, guards, and inmates throughout the federal and state prison systems. But that is the core of California's justification for its policy: It maintains that, if it does not racially separate new cellmates thrown together in close confines during their initial admission or transfer, violence will erupt.

The dangers California seeks to prevent are real. See Brief for National Association of Black Law Enforcement Officers, Inc., as Amicus Curiae 12. Controlling prison gangs is the central challenge facing correctional officers and administrators. Carlson, Prison Interventions: Evolving Strategies to Control Security Threat Groups, 5 Corrections Mgmt. Q. 10 (Winter 2001) (hereinafter Carlson). The worst gangs are highly regimented and sophisticated organizations that commit crimes ranging from drug trafficking to theft and murder. Id., at 12; Cal. Dept. of Justice, Division of Law Enforcement, Organized Crime in California Annual Report to the California Legislature 2003, p. 15, available 533 at http://caag.state.ca.us/publications/org_crime.pdf. In fact, street gangs are often just an extension of prison gangs, their " 'foot soldiers' " on the outside. Ibid.; Willens, Structure, Content and the Exigencies of War: American Prison Law After Twenty–Five Years 1962–1987, 37 Am. U. L.Rev. 41, 55–56 (1987). And with gang membership on the rise, the percentage of prisoners affiliated with prison gangs more than doubled in the 1990's.[5]

The problem of prison gangs is not unique to California,[6] but California has a history like no other. There are at least five major gangs in this country—the Aryan Brotherhood, the Black Guerrilla Family, the Mexican Mafia, La Nuestra Familia, and the Texas Syndicate—all of which originated in California's prisons.[7] *1163 Unsurprisingly, then, California has the largest number of gang-related inmates of any correctional system in the country, including the Federal Government. Carlson 16.

As their very names suggest, prison gangs like the Aryan Brotherhood and the Black Guerrilla Family organize themselves along racial lines, and these gangs perpetuate hate and violence. Irwin 182, 184. Interracial murders and assaults 534 among inmates perpetrated by these gangs are common.[8] And, again, that brutality is particularly severe in California's prisons. See, e.g., Walker v. Gomez, 370 F.3d 969, 971 (C.A.9 2004) (describing "history of significant racial tension and violence" at Calipatria State Prison); id., at 979–980 (Rymer, J., dissenting) (same); App. 297a–299a (describing 2–year span at Pelican Bay Prison, during which there were no fewer than nine major riots that left at least one inmate dead and many more wounded).

C

It is against this backdrop of pervasive racial violence that California racially segregates inmates in the reception centers' double cells, for brief periods of up to 60 days, until such time as the State can assign permanent housing. Viewed in that context and in light of the four factors enunciated in Turner, California's policy is constitutional: The CDC's policy is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest; alternative means of exercising the restricted right remain open to inmates; racially integrating double cells might negatively impact prison inmates, staff, and administrators; and there are no obvious, easy alternatives to the CDC's policy.

1

First, the policy is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest. Turner, supra, at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254. The protection of inmates and staff is undeniably a legitimate penological interest. See Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 546–547, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979). 535 The evidence shows, and Johnson has never contested, that the objective of California's policy is reducing violence among the inmates and against the staff. No cells are designated for, nor are special privileges afforded to, any racial group. App. 188a, 305a. Because prison administrators use race as a factor in making initial housing assignments "solely on the basis of [its] potential implications for prison security," the CDC's cell assignment practice is neutral. Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 415, 109 S.Ct. 1874, 104 L.Ed.2d 459 (1989); Turner, 482 U.S., at 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254.

California's policy bears a valid, rational connection to this interest. The racial component to prison violence is impossible for prison administrators to ignore. Johnson himself testified that he is afraid of violence—based solely on the color of his skin.[9] In combating that violence, an inmate's *1164 arrival or transfer into a new prison setting is a critical time for inmate and staff alike. The policy protects an inmate from other prisoners, and they from him, while prison officials gather more information, including his gang affiliation, about his compatibility with other inmates. App. 249a. This connection between racial violence and the policy makes it far from "arbitrary or irrational." Turner, supra, at 89–90, 107 S.Ct. 2254.

Indeed, Johnson concedes that it would be perfectly constitutional for California to take account of race "as part of an overall analysis of proclivity to violence based upon a series of facts existing in that prison." Tr. of Oral Arg. 15. But that is precisely what California does. It takes into account a host of factors in addition to race: geographic or national 536 origin, age, physical size, mental health, medical needs, criminal history, and, of course, gang affiliation. Supra, at 1159. California does not simply assign inmates to double cells in the reception centers based on race—it also separates *intra*racially (for example, northern from southern Hispanics or violent from nonviolent offenders).

2

Second, alternative means of exercising the restricted right remain open to inmates like Johnson. Turner, supra, at 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254. The CDC submits, and Johnson does not contest, that all other facets of prison life are fully integrated: work, vocational, and educational assignments; dining halls; and exercise yards and recreational facilities. App. 250a. And after a brief detention period at the reception center, inmates may select their own cellmates regardless of race in the absence of overriding security concerns. Id., at 311a–312a. Simply put, Johnson has spent, and will continue to spend, the vast bulk of his sentence free from any limitation on the race of his cellmate.

3

Third, Johnson fails to establish that the accommodation he seeks—i.e., assigning inmates to double cells without regard to race—would not significantly impact prison personnel, other inmates, and the allocation of prison resources. Harper, 494 U.S., at 226–227, 110 S.Ct. 1028; Turner, supra, at 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254. Prison staff cannot see into the double cells without going up to them, and inmates can cover the windows so that staff cannot see inside the cells at all. App. 306a. Because of the limited number of staff to oversee the many cells, it "would be very difficult to assist inmates if the staff were needed in several places at one time." Ibid. Coordinated gang attacks against nongang cellmates could leave prison officials unable to respond effectively. In any event, diverting prison resources to monitor cells disrupts services elsewhere.

537 Then, too, fights in the cells are likely to spill over to the exercise yards and common areas. Ibid.; see also id., at 187a. As Turner made clear: "When accommodation of an asserted right will have a significant 'ripple effect' on fellow inmates or on prison staff, courts should be particularly deferential to the informed discretion of corrections officials." 482 U.S., at 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254; see also White v. Morris, 832 F.Supp. 1129, 1130 (S.D.Ohio 1993) (racially integrated double-celling contributed to a race riot in which 10 people were murdered). California prison officials are united in the view that racially integrating double cells in the *1165 reception centers would lead to serious violence.[10] This is precisely the sort of testimony that the Court found persuasive in Turner itself. 482 U.S., at 92, 107 S.Ct. 2254.

4

Finally, Johnson has not shown that there are "obvious, easy alternatives" to the CDC's policy. Id., at 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254. Johnson contends that, for newly admitted inmates, prison officials need only look to the information available in the presentence report that must accompany a convict to prison. See Cal.Penal Code Ann. § 1203(c) (West 2004); Cal. Rules of Ct., Crim., Rule 4.411(d) (West Supp.2004). But prison officials already do this to the extent that they can. Indeed, gang affiliation, not race, is the first factor in determining initial housing assignments. App. 315a. Race becomes the predominant factor only because gang affiliation is often not known, especially with regard to newly admitted inmates. As the Court of Appeals pointed out: "There is little chance 538 that inmates will be forthcoming about their past violent episodes or criminal gang activity so as to provide an accurate and dependable picture of the inmate." 321 F.3d 791, 806 (C.A.9 2003); see also App. 185a, 189a. Even if the CDC had the manpower and resources to prescreen the more than 40,000 new inmates it receives yearly, leafing through presentence reports would not tell prison officials what they need to know. See ante, at 1155–1157 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

Johnson presents a closer case with regard to the segregation of prisoners whom the CDC transfers between facilities. As I understand it, California has less need to segregate prisoners about whom it already knows a great deal (since they have undergone the initial classification process and been housed for some period of time). However, this does not inevitably mean that racially integrating transferred inmates, while obvious and easy, is a true alternative. For instance, an inmate may have affiliated with a gang since the CDC's last official assessment, or his past lack of racial violence may have been due to the absence of close confinement with members of other races. The CDC's policy does not appear to arise from laziness or neglect; California is a leader in institutional intelligence gathering. See Carlson 16 ("The CDC devotes 75 intelligence staff to gathering and verifying inmate-related information," both in prisons and on the streets). In short, applying the policy to transfers is not "arbitrary or irrational," requiring that we set aside the considered contrary judgment of prison administrators. Turner, supra, at 89–90, 107 S.Ct. 2254.

III

The majority claims that strict scrutiny is the applicable standard of review based on this Court's precedents and its general skepticism of racial classifications. It is wrong on both scores.

A

Only once before, in Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. 333, 88 S.Ct. 994, 19 L.Ed.2d 1212 (1968) (per curiam), has this Court considered *1166 the constitutionality 539 of racial classifications in prisons. The majority claims that Lee applied "a heightened standard of review." Ante, at 1147. But Lee did not address the applicable standard of review. And even if it bore on the standard of review, Lee would support the State here.

In Lee, a three-judge District Court ordered Alabama to desegregate its prisons under Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954). Washington v. Lee, 263 F.Supp. 327, 331–332 (M.D.Ala.1966). In so doing, the District Court rejected any notion that "consideration[s] of prison security or discipline" justified the "complete and permanent segregation of the races in all the Alabama penal facilities." Id., at 331. However, the District Court noted "that in some isolated instances prison security and discipline necessitates segregation of the races for a limited period." Ibid. (footnote omitted). It provided only one example—"the 'tank' used in ... large municipal jails where intoxicated persons are placed upon their initial incarceration and kept until they become sober," id., at 331, n. 6—and the court left unmentioned why it would have been necessary to separate drunk whites from blacks on a Birmingham Saturday night.

This Court, in a per curiam, one-paragraph opinion, affirmed the District Court's order. It found "unexceptionable" not only the District Court's general rule that wholesale segregation of penal facilities was unconstitutional, but also the District Court's "allowance for the necessities of prison security and discipline." Lee, 390 U.S., at 334, 88 S.Ct. 994. Indeed, Justices Black, Harlan, and Stewart concurred

> "to make explicit something that is left to be gathered only by implication from the Court's opinion. This is that prison authorities have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails." Ibid.

540 Those Justices were "unwilling to assume" that such an "explicit pronouncement [would] evinc[e] any dilution of this Court's firm commitment to the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition of racial discrimination." Ibid.

Lee said nothing about the applicable standard of review, for there was no need. Surely Alabama's wholesale segregation of its prisons was unconstitutional even under the more deferential standard of review that applies within prisons. This Court's brief, per curiam opinion in Lee simply cannot bear the weight or interpretation the majority places on it. See U.S. Bancorp Mortgage Co. v. Bonner Mall Partnership, 513 U.S. 18, 24, 115 S.Ct. 386, 130 L.Ed.2d 233 (1994) (noting "our customary skepticism toward per curiam dispositions that lack the reasoned consideration of a full opinion"); Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 670–671, 94 S.Ct. 1347, 39 L.Ed.2d 662 (1974).

Yet even if Lee had announced a heightened standard of review for prison policies that pertain to race, Lee also carved out an exception to the standard that California's policy would certainly satisfy. As the Lee concurrence explained without objection, the Court's exception for "the necessities of prison security and discipline" meant that "prison authorities have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails." 390 U.S., at 334, 88 S.Ct. 994 (opinion of Black, Harlan, and Stewart, JJ., concurring) (emphasis added).

California's policy—which is a far cry from the wholesale segregation at issue in *1167 Lee—would fall squarely within Lee's exception. Johnson has never argued that California's policy is motivated by anything other than a desire to protect inmates and staff. And the "particularized" nature of the policy is evident: It applies only to new inmates and transfers, only in a handful of prisons, only to double cells, and only then for a period of no more than two months. In the name of following a test that Lee did not create, the majority 541 opts for a more demanding standard of review than Lee's language even arguably supports.

The majority heavily relies on this Court's statement that " 'all racial classifications [imposed by government] ... must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny.' " Ante, at 1146 (emphasis deleted) (quoting Adarand Constructors, Inc., 515 U.S., at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097). Adarand has nothing to do with this case. Adarand's statement that "all racial classifications" are subject to strict scrutiny addressed the contention that classifications favoring rather than disfavoring blacks are exempt. Id., at 226–227, 115 S.Ct. 2097; accord, Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 353, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). None of these statements overruled, sub silentio, Turner and its progeny, especially since the Court has repeatedly held that constitutional demands are diminished in the unique context of prisons. See, e.g., Harper, 494 U.S., at 224, 110 S.Ct. 1028; Abbott, 490 U.S., at 407, 109 S.Ct. 1874; Turner, 482 U.S., at 85, 107 S.Ct. 2254; see also Webster v. Fall, 266 U.S. 507, 511, 45 S.Ct. 148, 69 L.Ed. 411 (1925) ("Questions which merely lurk in the record, neither brought to the attention of the court nor ruled upon, are not to be considered as having been so decided as to constitute precedents").

B

The majority offers various other reasons for applying strict scrutiny. None is persuasive. The majority's main reason is that "Turner's reasonable-relationship test [applies] only to rights that are 'inconsistent with proper incarceration.' " Ante, at 1149 (quoting Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 131, 123 S.Ct. 2162, 156 L.Ed.2d 162 (2003)). According to the majority, the question is thus whether a right "need necessarily be compromised for the sake of proper prison administration." Ante, at 1149. This inconsistency-with-proper-prison-administration test begs the question at the heart of this case. For a court to know whether any particular right is inconsistent with proper prison administration, it must have some implicit notion of what a proper prison ought to look like and how it 542 ought to be administered. Overton, supra, at 139, 123 S.Ct. 2162 (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment). But the very issue in this case is whether such second-guessing is permissible.

The majority's test eviscerates Turner. Inquiring whether a given right is consistent with "proper prison administration" calls for precisely the sort of judgments that Turner said courts were ill equipped to make. In none of the cases in which the Court deferred to the judgments of prison officials under Turner did it examine whether "proper" prison security and discipline permitted greater speech or associational rights (Abbott, supra; Shaw, 532 U.S. 223, 121 S.Ct. 1475, 149

L.Ed.2d 420; and Overton, supra); expanded access to the courts (Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 116 S.Ct. 2174, 135 L.Ed.2d 606 (1996)); broader freedom from bodily restraint (Harper, supra); or additional free exercise rights (O'Lone, 482 U.S. 342, 107 S.Ct. 2400, 96 L.Ed.2d 282). The Court has steadfastly refused to undertake the threshold standard-of-review inquiry that 1168 Turner settled, and that the majority today resurrects. And with good reason: As Turner pointed out, these judgments are better left in the first instance to the officials who run our Nation's prisons, not to the judges who run its courts.

In place of the Court's usual deference, the majority gives conclusive force to its own guesswork about "proper" prison administration. It hypothesizes that California's policy might incite, rather than diminish, racial hostility.[11] *543 Ante, at 1146–1148. The majority's speculations are implausible. New arrivals have a strong interest in promptly convincing other inmates of their willingness to use violent force. See Brief for National Association of Black Law Enforcement Officers, Inc., as Amicus Curiae 13–14 (citing commentary and congressional findings); cf. United States v. Santiago, 46 F.3d 885, 888 (C.A.9 1995) (describing one Hispanic inmate's murder of another in order to join the Mexican Mafia); United States v. Silverstein, 732 F.2d 1338, 1341 (C.A.7 1984) (prospective members of the Aryan Brotherhood must "make bones," or commit a murder, to be eligible for membership). In any event, the majority's guesswork falls far short of the compelling showing needed to overcome the deference we owe to prison administrators.

The majority contends that the Court "[has] put the burden on state actors to demonstrate that their race-based policies are justified," ante, at 1147, n. 1, and "[has] refused to defer to state officials' judgments on race in other areas where those officials traditionally exercise substantial discretion," ante, at 1150. Yet two Terms ago, in upholding the University of Michigan Law School's affirmative-action program, this Court deferred to the judgment by the law school's faculty and administrators on their need for diversity in the student body. See Grutter, supra, at 328, 123 S.Ct. 2325 ("The Law School's educational judgment that ... diversity is essential to its educational mission is one to which we defer"). Deference would seem all the more warranted in the prison context, for whatever the Court knows of administering educational institutions, it knows much less about administering penal ones. The potential consequences of second-guessing the judgments of prison administrators are also much more severe. See White v. Morris, 832 F.Supp. 1129, 1130 (S.D.Ohio 1993) (racially integrated double-celling that resulted *544 from federal consent decree was a factor in the worst prison riot in Ohio history). More importantly, as I have explained, the Court has recognized that the typically exacting review it applies to restrictions on fundamental rights must be relaxed in the unique context of prisons. See, e.g., Harper, 494 U.S., at 224, 110 S.Ct. 1028; Abbott, 490 U.S., at 407, 109 S.Ct. 1874; 1169 Turner, 482 U.S., at 85, 107 S.Ct. 2254. The majority cannot fall back on the Constitution's usual demands, because those demands have always been lessened inside the prison walls. See supra, at 1160.

The majority also mentions that California's policy may be the only one of its kind, as virtually all other States and the Federal Government manage their prison systems without racially segregating inmates. Ante, at 1148. This is both irrelevant and doubtful. It is irrelevant because the number of States that have followed California's lead matters not to the applicable standard of review (the only issue the Court today decides), but to whether California satisfies whatever standard applies, a question the majority leaves to be addressed on remand. In other words, the uniqueness of California's policy might show whether the policy is reasonable or narrowly tailored—but deciding whether to apply Turner or strict scrutiny in the first instance must depend on something else, like the majority's inconsistency-with-proper-prison-administration test. The commonness of California's housing policy is further irrelevant because strict scrutiny now applies to all claims of racial discrimination in prisons, regardless of whether the policies being challenged are unusual.

The majority's assertion is doubtful, because at least two other States apply similar policies to newly admitted inmates. Both Oklahoma and Texas, like California, assign newly admitted inmates to racially segregated cells in their prison reception centers.[12] The similarity is not surprising: *545 States like California and Texas have historically had the most severe problems with prison gangs. However, even States with less severe problems maintain that policies like California's are necessary to deal with race-related prison violence. See Brief for States of Utah, Alabama, Alaska, Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, New Hampshire and North Dakota as Amici Curiae 16. Relatedly, 10.3% of all wardens at maximum security facilities in the United States report that their inmates are assigned to racially segregated cells—apparently on a permanent basis. Henderson, Cullen, Carroll, & Feinberg, Race, Rights, and Order in Prison: A National Survey of Wardens on the Racial Integration of Prison Cells, 80 Prison J. 295, 304 (Sept.2000). In the same survey, 4.3% of the wardens report that their States have an official policy against racially integrating male inmates in cells. Id., at 302. Presumably, for the remainder of prisons in which inmates are assigned to racially segregated cells, that policy is the result of discretionary decisions by wardens rather than of official state directives. Ibid. In any event, the ongoing debate about the best way to reduce racial violence in prisons should not be resolved by judicial decree: It is the job "of prison administrators ... and not the courts, to make the difficult judgments concerning institutional operations." Jones, 433 U.S., at 128, 97 S.Ct. 2532.

*1170 The majority also observes that we have already carved out an exception to Turner for Eighth Amendment claims of cruel and unusual punishment in prison. See 546 Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 738, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002). In that context, we have held that "[a] prison official's 'deliberate indifference' to a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate violates the Eighth Amendment." Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 828, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994). Setting aside whether claims challenging inmates' conditions of confinement should be cognizable under the Eighth Amendment at all, see Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 18–19, 112 S.Ct. 995, 117 L.Ed.2d 156 (1992) (THOMAS, J., dissenting), the "deliberate indifference" standard does not bolster the majority's argument. If anything, that standard is more deferential to the judgments of prison administrators than Turner's reasonable-relationship test: It subjects prison officials to liability only when they are subjectively aware of the risk to the inmate, and they fail to take reasonable measures to abate the risk. Farmer, supra, at 847, 114 S.Ct. 1970. It certainly does not demonstrate the wisdom of an exception that imposes a heightened standard of review on the actions of prison officials.

Moreover, the majority's decision subjects prison officials to competing and perhaps conflicting demands. In this case, California prison officials have uniformly averred that random double-celling poses a substantial risk of serious harm to the celled inmates. App. 245a–246a, 251a. If California assigned inmates to double cells without regard to race, knowing full well that violence might result, that would seem the very definition of deliberate indifference. See Robinson v. Prunty, 249 F.3d 862, 864–865 (C.A.9 2001) (prisoner alleged an Eighth Amendment violation because administrators had failed to consider race when releasing inmates into the yards); Jensen v. Clarke, 94 F.3d 1191, 1201, 1204 (C.A.8 1996) (court held that random double-celling by prison officials constituted deliberate indifference, and affirmed an injunction and attorney's fees awarded against the officials). Nor would a victimized inmate need to prove that prison officials had anticipated any particular attack; it would be sufficient that prison officials had ignored a dangerous condition 547 that was chronic and ongoing—like interracial housing in closely confined quarters within prisons dominated by racial gangs. Farmer, supra, at 843–844, 114 S.Ct. 1970. Under Farmer, prison officials could have been ordered to take account of the very thing to which they may now have to turn a blind eye: inmates' race.

Finally, the majority presents a parade of horribles designed to show that applying the Turner standard would grant prison officials unbounded discretion to segregate inmates throughout prisons. See ante, at 1151. But we have never treated Turner as a blank check to prison officials. Quite to the contrary, this Court has long had "confidence that ... a reasonableness standard is not toothless." Abbott, 490 U.S., at 414, 109 S.Ct. 1874 (internal quotation marks omitted). California prison officials segregate only double cells, because only those cells are particularly difficult to monitor—unlike "dining halls, yards, and general housing areas." Ante, at 1151. Were California's policy not so narrow, the State might well have race-neutral means at its disposal capable of accommodating prisoners' rights without sacrificing their safety. See Turner, 482 U.S., at 90–91, 107 S.Ct. 2254. The majority does not say why Turner's standard ably polices all other constitutional infirmities, just not racial discrimination. In any event, it is not the refusal to apply —for the first time ever—a strict standard of review in the prison context that is "fundamentally at odds" *1171 with our constitutional jurisprudence. Ante, at 1146–1147, n. 1. Instead, it is the majority's refusal—for the first time ever—to defer to the expert judgment of prison officials.

IV

Even under strict scrutiny analysis, "it is possible, even likely, that prison officials could show that the current policy meets the test." 336 F.3d 1117, 1121 (C.A.9 2003) (Ferguson, J., joined by Pregerson, Nelson, and Reinhardt, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc). As Johnson concedes, all States have a compelling interest in 548 maintaining order and internal security within their prisons. See Reply Brief for Petitioner 18; see also Procunier, 416 U.S., at 404, 94 S.Ct. 1800. Thus the question on remand will be whether the CDC's policy is narrowly tailored to serve California's compelling interest.[13] The other dissent notes the absence of evidence on that question, see ante, at 1154–1155 (opinion of STEVENS, J.), but that is hardly California's fault.

From the outset, Johnson himself has alleged, in terms taken from Turner, that the CDC's policy is "not related to a legitimate penological interest." Johnson v. California, 207 F.3d 650, 655 (C.A.9 2000) (per curiam) (discussing Johnson's Third Amended Complaint). In reinstating Johnson's equal protection claim following the District Court's dismissal, the Court of Appeals repeated Johnson's allegation, without indicating that strict scrutiny should apply on remand before the District Court.[14] Ibid. And on remand, again Johnson alleged only that the CDC's policy "is not reasonably related to the legitimate penological interests of the CDC." App. 51a (Fourth Amended Complaint ¶ 23).

After the District Court granted qualified immunity to some of the defendants, Johnson once again appealed. In his brief before the Court of Appeals, Johnson assumed that 549 both Lee and Turner applied, without arguing that there was any tension between them; indeed, nowhere in his brief did Johnson even mention the words "strict scrutiny." Brief for Appellant in No. 01–56436(CA9), pp. 20, 26, 2001 WL 34091249. Perhaps as a result, the Court of Appeals did not discuss strict scrutiny in its second decision, the one currently before this Court. The Court of Appeals did find tension between Lee and Turner; however, it resolved this tension in Turner's favor. 321 F.3d, at 799. Yet the Court of Appeals accepted Lee's test at face value: Prison officials may only make racial classifications " 'in good faith and in particularized circumstances.' " 321 F.3d, at 797. The Court of Appeals, like Johnson, *1172 did not equate Lee's test with strict scrutiny, and in fact it mentioned strict scrutiny only when it quoted the portion of Turner that rejects strict scrutiny as the proper standard of review in the prison context. 321 F.3d, at 798. Even Johnson did not make the leap equating Lee with strict scrutiny when he requested that the Court of Appeals rehear his case. Appellant's Petition for Panel Rehearing with Suggestion for Rehearing En Banc in No. 01–56436(CA9), pp. 4–5. That leap was first made by the judges who dissented from the Court of Appeals' denial of rehearing en banc. 336 F.3d, at 1118 (Ferguson, J., joined by Pregerson, Nelson, and Reinhardt, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc).

Thus, California is now, after the close of discovery, subject to a more stringent standard than it had any reason to anticipate from Johnson's pleadings, the Court of Appeals' initial decision, or even the Court of Appeals' decision below. In such circumstances, California should be allowed to present evidence of narrow tailoring, evidence it was never obligated to present in either appearance before the District Court. See Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003, 1031–1032, 112 S.Ct. 2886, 120 L.Ed.2d 798 (1992) (remanding for consideration under the correct legal standard); id., at 1033, 112 S.Ct. 2886 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in judgment) ("Although we establish a framework 550 for remand, ... we do not decide the ultimate [constitutional] question [because] [t]he facts necessary to the determination have not been developed in the record").

* * *

Petitioner Garrison Johnson challenges not permanent, but temporary, segregation of only a portion of California's prisons. Of the 17 years Johnson has been incarcerated, California has assigned him a cellmate of the same race for no more than a year (and probably more like four months); Johnson has had black cellmates during the other 16 years, but by his own choice. Nothing in the record demonstrates that if Johnson (or any other prisoner) requested to be housed with a person of a different race, it would be denied (though Johnson's gang affiliation with the Crips might stand in his way). Moreover, Johnson concedes that California's prisons are racially violent places, and that he lives in fear of being attacked because of his race. Perhaps on remand the CDC's policy will survive strict scrutiny, but in the event that it does not, Johnson may well have won a Pyrrhic victory.

All Citations

543 U.S. 499, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949, 05 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 1568, 2005 Daily Journal D.A.R. 2118

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 Justice THOMAS takes a hands-off approach to racial classifications in prisons, suggesting that a "compelling showing [is] needed to overcome the deference we owe to prison administrators." Post, at 1168 (dissenting opinion). But such deference is fundamentally at odds with our equal protection jurisprudence. We put the burden on state actors to demonstrate that their race-based policies are justified.

2 Though, as Justice THOMAS points out, see post, at 1169, and n. 12, inmates in reception centers in Oklahoma and Texas " 'are not generally assigned randomly to racially integrated cells,' " it is also the case that "these inmates are not precluded from integrated cell assignments," Oklahoma Dept. of Corrections, Policies and Procedures, Operations Memorandum No. OP–030102, Inmate Housing (Sept. 16, 2004), available at http://www.doc.state.ok.us/docs/policies.htm (as visited Jan. 21, 2005, and available in Clerk of Court's case file); Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, Security Memorandum No. SM–01.28, Assignment to General Population Two–Person Cells (June 15, 2002). See also Brief for Former State Corrections Officials as Amici Curiae 20, n. 10 ("To the extent that race is considered in the assignment calculus in Oklahoma, it appears to be one factor among many, and as a result, individualized consideration is given to all inmates"). We therefore have no way of knowing whether, in practice, inmates in Oklahoma and Texas, like those in California, have close to no chance, App. to Pet. for Cert. 3a, of being celled with a person of a different race. See also Brief for Former State Corrections Officials as Amici Curiae 19–20 ("[W]e are aware of no state other than California that assumes that every incoming prisoner is incapable of getting along with a cell mate of a different race. And we are aware of no state other than California that has acted on such an assumption by adopting an inflexible and absolute policy of racial segregation of double cells in reception centers").

3 Justice THOMAS characterizes the CDC's policy as a "limited" one, see post, at 1157, but the CDC's policy is in fact sweeping in its application. It applies to all prisoners housed in double cells in reception centers, whether newly admitted or transferred from one facility to another. Moreover, despite Justice THOMAS' suggestion that the CDC considers other nonracial factors in determining housing placements, the CDC itself has admitted that, in practice, there is a " '[p]retty close' " to zero percent chance that an inmate will be housed with a person of a different race. App. to Pet. for Cert. 3a. See also generally post, at 1153–1154, and n. 1 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). Thus, despite an inmate's "age, physical size, mental health, medical needs, [and] criminal history," post, at 1164 (THOMAS, J., dissenting), the fact that he is black categorically precludes him from being celled with a white inmate. As we explain, see infra, at 1152 and we do not decide whether the threat of violence in California prisons is sufficient to justify such a broad policy.

1 The CDC operates 32 prisons, 7 of which house reception centers. All new inmates and all inmates transferring between prisons are funneled through one of these reception centers before they are permanently placed. At the centers, inmates are housed either in dormitories, double cells, or single cells (of which there are few). Under the CDC's segregation policy, race is a determinative factor in placing inmates in double cells, regardless of the other factors considered in such decisions. While a corrections official with 24 years of experience testified that an exception to this policy was once granted to a Hispanic inmate who had been "raised with Crips," App. 184a, the CDC's suggestion that its policy is therefore flexible, see Brief for Respondents 9, strains credulity. There is no evidence that the CDC routinely allows inmates to opt out of segregation, much less evidence that the CDC informs inmates of their supposed right to do so.

2 In explaining why it cannot prescreen new inmates, the CDC's brief all but concedes that segregating transferred inmates is unnecessary. See Brief for Respondents 42 ("If the officials had all of the necessary information to assess the inmates' violence potential when the inmates arrived, perhaps a different practice could be used. But unlike the federal system, where the inmates generally are in federal custody from the moment they are arrested, state inmates are in county custody until they are convicted and later transferred to the custody of the CDC").

3 Because the Turner factors boil down to a tailoring test, and I conclude that the CDC's policy is, at best, an " 'exaggerated response' " to its asserted security concerns, see Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 90, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64 (1987), I find it unnecessary to address specifically the other factors, such as whether new and transferred inmates have "alternative means" of exercising their right to equal protection during their period of housing segregation, id., at 89, 107 S.Ct. 2254. Indeed, this case demonstrates once again that "[h]ow a court describes its standard of review when a prison regulation infringes fundamental constitutional rights often has far less consequence[s] for the inmates than the actual showing that the court demands of the State in order to uphold the regulation." Id., at 100, 107 S.Ct. 2254 (STEVENS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

4 The CDC's policy may be counterproductive in other ways. For example, an official policy of segregation may initiate new arrivals into a corrosive culture of prison racial segregation, lending credence to the view that members of other races are to be feared and that racial alliances are necessary. While integrated cells encourage inmates to gain valuable cross-racial experiences, segregated cells may well facilitate the formation of race-based gangs. See Brief for Former State Corrections Officials as Amici Curiae 19 (citing evidence and experience suggesting that the racial integration of cells on balance decreases interracial violence).

1 Johnson has never requested—not during his initial admittance, nor his subsequent transfers, nor his present incarceration—that he be housed with a person of a different race. App. 106a, 112a–113a, 175a. According to Johnson, he considered the policy a barrier to any such request; however, Johnson has also testified that he never filed a grievance with prison officials about the segregation policy. Id., at 112a–113a, 124a–125a. Neither the parties nor the majority discusses whether Johnson has exhausted his action under Rev. Stat. § 1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, 110 Stat. 1321–66, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(a). See Booth v. Churner, 532 U.S. 731, 734, 121 S.Ct. 1819, 149 L.Ed.2d 958 (2001). The majority thus assumes that statutorily mandated exhaustion is not jurisdictional, and that California has waived the issue by failing to raise it. See, e.g., Richardson v. Goord, 347 F.3d 431, 433–434 (C.A.2 2003); Perez v. Wisconsin Dept. of Corrections, 182 F.3d 532, 536 (C.A.7 1999).

2 The majority refers to my approach as a "hands-off" one because I would accord deference to the judgments of the State's prison officials. See ante, at 1146–1147, n. 1. Its label is historically inaccurate. The "hands-off" approach was that taken prior to the 1960's by federal courts, which generally declined to consider the merits of prisoners' claims. See, e.g., J. Fliter, Prisoners' Rights: The Supreme Court and Evolving Standards of Decency 64–65 (2001); M. Feeley & E. Rubin, Judicial Policy Making and the Modern State 30–34 (2000); S. Krantz & L. Branham, Cases and Materials on the Law of Sentencing, Corrections and Prisoners' Rights 264–265 (4th ed.1991).

3 A prisoner may not entirely surrender his constitutional rights at the prison gates, Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 545, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979); Jones v. North Carolina Prisoners' Labor Union, Inc., 433 U.S. 119, 129, 97 S.Ct. 2532, 53 L.Ed.2d 629 (1977), but certainly he leaves some of his liberties behind him. When a prisoner makes a constitutional claim, the initial question should be whether the prisoner possesses the right at issue at all, or whether instead the prisoner has been divested of the right as a condition of his conviction and confinement. See Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126, 140, 123 S.Ct. 2162, 156 L.Ed.2d 162 (2003) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment); Coffin v. Reichard, 143 F.2d 443, 445 (C.A.6 1944).

4 See, e.g., Overton, supra, at 132, 123 S.Ct. 2162 (the right to association under the First and Fourteenth Amendments); Shaw v. Murphy, 532 U.S. 223, 228–229, 121 S.Ct. 1475, 149 L.Ed.2d 420 (2001) (the right to communicate with fellow inmates under the First Amendment); Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 361, 116 S.Ct. 2174, 135 L.Ed.2d 606 (1996) (the right of access to the courts under the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses); Washington v. Harper, 494 U.S. 210, 223–225, 110 S.Ct. 1028, 108 L.Ed.2d 178 (1990) (the right to refuse forced medication under the Due Process Clause); Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401, 413–414, 109 S.Ct. 1874, 104 L.Ed.2d 459 (1989) (the right to receive correspondence under the First Amendment); O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342, 349–350, 107 S.Ct. 2400, 96 L.Ed.2d 282 (1987) (the right to free exercise of religion under the First Amendment).

5 See National Gang Crime Research Center, A National Assessment of Gangs and Security Threat Groups (STGs) in Adult Correctional Institutions: Results of the 1999 Adult Corrections Survey, p. 5, http:// www.ngcrc.com/ngcrc/page7.htm.

6 See, e.g., Fraise v. Terhune, 283 F.3d 506, 512–513 (C.A.3 2002) (describing violence caused by a single black prison gang, the Five Percent Nation, in various New Jersey correctional facilities); Conroy v. Dingle, No. Civ. 01–1626 (RHK/RLE), 2002 WL 31357055, *1–*2 (D.Minn., Oct. 11, 2002) (describing rival racial gangs at Minnesota's Moose Lake facility, a medium security prison).

7 See D. Orlando–Morningstar, Prison Gangs, Special Needs Offenders Bulletin, Federal Judicial Center 4 (Oct.1997); see also J. Irwin, Prisons in Turmoil 189 (1980) (hereinafter Irwin) (describing the establishment and rise of gangs inside the California prison system, first the Mexican Mafia, followed by La Nuestra Familia, the Aryan Brotherhood, and the Black Guerrilla Family); United States v. Shryock, 342 F.3d 948, 961 (C.A.9 2003) (detailing rise of Mexican Mafia inside the California prison system).

8 See, e.g., id., at 962–969 (describing a host of murders and attempted murders by a handful of Mexican Mafia members); United States v. Silverstein, 732 F.2d 1338, 1341–1342 (C.A.7 1984) (describing murder of a black inmate by members of the Aryan Brotherhood); State v. Kell, 61 P.3d 1019, 1024–1025 (Utah 2002) (describing fatal stabbing of a black inmate by two white supremacists); State v. Farmer, 126 Ariz. 569, 570–571, 617 P.2d 521, 522–523 (1980) (en banc) (describing murder of a black inmate by members and recruits of the Aryan Brotherhood).

9 Specifically, Johnson testified:

"I was incarcerated at Calipatria before the major riot broke out there with Mexican and black inmates. ... If I would have stayed there, I would have been involved in that because you have four facilities there and each facility went on a major riot and a lot of people got hurt and injured just based on your skin color. I'm black, and if I was there I would have been hurt." App. 102a (emphasis added).

10 See id., at 245a–246a (Cambra declaration) ("If race were to be disregarded entirely, however, I am certain, based upon my experience with CDC prisoners, that ... there will be fights in the cells and the problems will emanate onto the prison yards"); id., at 250a–251a (Schulteis declaration) ("At CSP–Lancaster, if we were to disregard the initial housing placement [according to race], then I am certain there would be serious violence among inmates. I have worked in five different CDC institutions and this would be true for all of them").

11 The majority's sole empirical support for its speculation is a study of Texas prison desegregation that found the rate of violence higher in racially segregated double cells. Ante, at 1147–1148 (citing Trulson & Marquart, The Caged Melting Pot: Toward an Understanding of the Consequences of Desegregation in Prisons, 36 Law & Soc. Rev. 743, 774 (2002)). However, the study's authors specifically note that Texas—like California—does not integrate its "initial diagnostic facilities" or its "transfer facilities." See id., at 753, n. 13. Thus the study says nothing about the violence likely to result from integrating cells when inmates are thrown together for brief periods during admittance or transfer. What the study does say is that, once Texas has had the time to gather inmate-related information and make more permanent housing assignments, racially integrated cells may be the preferred option. But California leaves open that door: Inmates are generally free to room with whomever they like on a permanent basis.

12 See Oklahoma Dept. of Corrections, Policies and Procedures, Operations Memorandum No. OP–030102, Inmate Housing (Sept. 16, 2004) ("Upon arrival at the assessment and reception center ... [f]or reasons of safety and security, newly received inmates are not generally assigned randomly to racially integrated cells") (available at http:// www.doc.state.ok.us/docs/policies.htm); Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, Security Memorandum No. SM–01.28, Assignment to General Population Two–Person Cells (June 15, 2002) ("Upon arrival at a reception and diagnostic center ... [f]or reasons of safety and security, newly-received offenders are not generally assigned randomly to racially integrated cells due to the fact that the specific information needed to assess an offender's criminal and victimization history is not available until after diagnostic processing has been completed").

13 On the majority's account, deference to the judgments of prison officials in the application of strict scrutiny is presumably warranted to account for "the special circumstances [that prisons] present," ante, at 1152. See Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 328, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003). Although I disagree that deference is normally appropriate when scrutinizing racial classifications, there is some logic to the majority's qualification in this case because the Constitution's demands have always been diminished in the prison context. See, e.g., Harper, 494 U.S., at 224, 110 S.Ct. 1028; Abbott, 490 U.S., at 407, 109 S.Ct. 1874; Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78, 85, 107 S.Ct. 2254, 96 L.Ed.2d 64 (1987).

14 The Court of Appeals cited both Turner and Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. at 333, 88 S.Ct. 994 (1968) (per curiam), for the proposition that certain constitutional protections, among them the protection against state-sponsored racial discrimination, extend to the prison setting. However, the Court of Appeals did not discuss the applicable standard of review, nor did it attempt to resolve the tension between Turner and Lee that the majority finds.

End of Document

KeyCite Yellow Flag - Negative Treatment
Not Followed as Dicta Lemonds v. St. Louis County, 8th Cir.(Mo.), August 3, 2000

114 S.Ct. 2647
Supreme Court of the United States

Bolley JOHNSON, Speaker of the Florida House of Representatives, et al., Appellants
v.
Miguel DE GRANDY, et al.
Miguel DE GRANDY, et al., Appellants,
v.
Bolley JOHNSON, Speaker of the Florida House of Representatives, et al.
UNITED STATES, Appellant,
v.
FLORIDA, et al.

Nos. 92–519, 92–593 and 92–767
|
Argued Oct. 4, 1993.
|
Decided June 30, 1994.

Synopsis
Action was brought challenging Florida legislative districting plan. A three-judge district court in the Northern District of Florida found that there was dilution of hispanic and black voting strength, 875 F.Supp. 1550, and state appealed. The Supreme Court, Justice Souter, held that: (1) no violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act could be found where minority voters formed effective voting majorities in a number of districts roughly proportional to the minority voters' respective shares in the voting age population, even though it might have been possible to create additional districts in which minority voters represented a majority; (2) proportionality is not an affirmative defense which must be pled; and (3) proportionality does not defeat claim of vote dilution in all cases.

Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Justice O'Connor filed a concurring opinion.

Justice Kennedy filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

Justice Thomas dissented and filed an opinion in which Justice Scalia joined.

West Headnotes (17)

[1] States Population as basis and deviation therefrom

No violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act existed where, in spite of continuing discrimination and racial block voting, minority members formed effecting voting majorities in a number of districts which was roughly proportional to the minority voters' respective shares in the voting age population. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

42 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Election Law Judicial Review or Intervention

Although proportionality between the number of majority-minority districts and the percentage of minority voters in the voting age population is not dispositive in challenge to single-member district plan, it is relevant. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

151 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Judgment Reviewing court's determination

District court properly refused to give preclusive effect to decision of state Supreme Court upholding districting plan against Voting Rights Act challenge, where the state Supreme Court stated that it was impossible for it to conduct the complete factual analysis contemplated by the Act and that its holding was without prejudice to the right of anyone to question the validity of the plan by filing a petition in the Supreme Court. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42

U.S.C.A. § 1973; West's F.S.A. Const. Art. 3, § 16(c).

16 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Federal Courts Exhaustion of other remedies

States Persons entitled to sue, standing, and parties

When Florida Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of legislative redistricting plan pursuant to its state constitutional mandate to review apportionment resolutions within 30 days, but then stated that its decision was without prejudice to the right of any protestor to question the validity of the plan by filing a petition in the Supreme Court, those protesting the plan were not required to file petition with the Florida Supreme Court, and could, instead, maintain action in federal district court. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973; West's F.S.A. Const. Art. 3, § 16(c).

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Federal Courts Conclusiveness; res judicata and collateral estoppel

Federal court gives no greater preclusive effect to state court judgments then the state itself would do.

956 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Courts Constitutional questions, civil rights, and discrimination in general

Courts United States Supreme Court, exclusive federal jurisdiction of Rooker/Feldman abstention doctrine which bars the party from seeking judicial review of a state court decision in federal district did not preclude United States from bringing Voting Rights Act action in federal district court after state Supreme Court had upheld redistricting plan in proceeding to which the United States was not a party. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973; West's F.S.A. Const. Art. 3, § 16(c).

1808 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Gingles factors for determining whether there has been illegal dilution of minority voting strength cannot be applied mechanically or without regard to nature of claim. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Election Law Vote Dilution

Voting Rights Act precludes fragmenting minority voters among several districts where block voting majority can routinely outvote them or packing them into one or a small number of districts to minimize their influence in adjacent districts with the result that the line drawing, interacting with social and historical conditions, impairs the ability of protected class to elect candidate of its choice on an equal basis with other voters. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973; West's F.S.A. Const. Art. 3, § 16(c).

32 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

In order to show vote dilution through districting of single-member districts, there must be the possibility of creating more than the existing number of reasonably compact districts with sufficiently large minority population to elect candidates of its choice. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

97 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Election Law Vote Dilution

Gingles factors of compactness/numerousness, minority cohesion or block voting, and majority block voting are necessary preconditions for establishing vote dilution through a districting plan but they are not sufficient in combination, either in the sense that a court's examination of relevant circumstances is complete once the three factors are found to exist or in the sense that the three in combination necessarily and in all circumstances demonstrate dilution. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

65 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Election Law Judicial Review or Intervention

Election Law Evidence

Lack of electoral success of candidates supported by minority voters is evidence of vote dilution, but courts must also examine other evidence and the totality of the circumstances, including the extent of the opportunity which minority voters enjoy to participate in the political process. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

86 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Election Law Vote Dilution

Concept of proportionality between the number of voting districts in which minorities represent a majority and the share of the relevant population represented by minorities is distinct from the subject of the proportional representation clause of the Voting Rights Act. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

27 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Provision of the Voting Rights Act that nothing in the Act establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion of the population speaks to the success of minority candidates, as distinct from political or electoral power of minority voters, and emphasizes that the ultimate rights is equality of opportunity, not guarantee of electoral success for minority-preferred candidates, of whatever race. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

57 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] States Population as basis and deviation therefrom

Legislative district lines which apparently provided political effectiveness for hispanic and black voters in proportion to their voting age numbers did not deny equal political opportunity, even though it would have been possible to create another district in which hispanic voters would represent a majority. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

18 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] Election Law Vote Dilution

Failure to maximize the number of electoral districts of which minority voters represent a majority, even in the face of block voting or other incidents of societal bias, is not vote dilution prohibited by the Voting Rights Act. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

20 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] Election Law Judicial Review or Intervention

Fact that the percentage of single-member districts in which minority voters form effective majority mirrors the minority voters' percentage of the relevant population does not establish as a matter of law that there is no dilution in minority voting strength. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

52 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] Election Law Judicial Review or Intervention

Proportionality is not an affirmative defense to a claim of dilution under the Voting Rights Act and proportionality may be considered even when not pled by way of affirmative defense. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973.

1 Case that cites this headnote

2650 Syllabus[*]

In these consolidated cases, a group of Hispanic voters, a group of black voters, and the Federal Government claim that Florida's reapportionment plan for the State's single-member Senate and House districts (SJR 2–G) unlawfully dilutes the voting strength of Hispanics and blacks in the Dade County area, in violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The State Supreme Court, in a review required by the State Constitution, declared the plan valid under federal and state law, while acknowledging that time constraints precluded full review and authorizing any interested party to bring a § 2 challenge in that court. The plaintiffs chose, however, to pursue their claims in federal court. A three-judge District Court reviewed the totality of circumstances as required by § 2 and Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25, and concluded that the three Gingles preconditions for establishing dilution were satisfied, justifying a finding of vote dilution. Specifically, the court found that voting proceeded largely along racial lines, producing a system of "tripartite politics"; that Hispanics in the Dade County area could constitute a majority in 11 House and 4 Senate districts, but that SJR 2–G had created only 9 House and 3 Senate districts with Hispanic majorities; that an additional majority-black Senate district could have been drawn; and that Florida's minorities had suffered historically from official discrimination, the social, economic, and political effects of which they continued to feel. The court imposed a remedial plan with 11 majority-Hispanic House districts but, concluding that the remedies for blacks and Hispanics in the senatorial districts were mutually exclusive, left SJR 2–G's Senate districts in force.

Held:

1. The District Court properly refused to give preclusive effect to the State Supreme Court's decision validating SJR 2–G. Pp. 2653–2654.

*998 2. There is no violation of § 2 in SJR 2–G's House districts, where in spite of continuing discrimination and racial bloc voting, minority voters form effective voting majorities in a number of House districts roughly proportional to their respective shares in the voting-age population. While such proportionality is not dispositive, it is a relevant fact in the totality of circumstances to be analyzed when determining whether minority voters have "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice," 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b). Pp. 2654–2662.

(a) This Court assumes without deciding that the first Gingles factor has been satisfied in these cases. Pp. 2655–2656.

(b) While proof of the Gingles factors is necessary to make out a claim that a set of district lines violates § 2, it is not necessarily sufficient. Rather, a court must assess the probative significance of the Gingles factors after considering all circumstances with arguable bearing on the issue of equal political opportunity. Here, the court misjudged the relative importance of the Gingles factors and of historical discrimination by equating dilution where these had been found with failure to maximize the number of majority-minority districts. Dilution cannot be inferred from the mere failure to guarantee minority voters maximum political influence. Pp. 2656–2660.

(c) Ruling as the State proposes, that as a matter of law no dilution occurs whenever 2651 proportionality exists, would likewise provide a bright-line decisional rule only in derogation of the statutory text. While proportionality is an indication that minority voters have equal political and electoral opportunity in spite of racial polarization, it is no guarantee, and it cannot serve as a shortcut to determining whether a set of districts unlawfully dilutes minority voting strength. Pp. 2660–2662.

(d) This Court need not reach the United States' argument that proportionality should be assessed only on a statewide basis in cases challenging districts for electing a body with statewide jurisdiction. The argument would recast this litigation as it comes before the Court, for up until now the dilution claims have been litigated not on a statewide basis, but on a smaller geographical scale. P. 2662.

3. The District Court's decision to leave undisturbed the State's plan for Senate districts was correct. However, in reaching its decision, the court once again misapprehended the legal test for vote dilution. As in the case of the House districts, the totality of circumstances appears not to support a finding of dilution in the Senate districts. P. 2663.

815 F.Supp. 1550, (N.D.Fla.1992) affirmed in part and reversed in part.

999 SOUTER, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., and BLACKMUN, STEVENS, O'CONNOR, and GINSBURG, JJ., joined, and in all but Parts III–B–2, III–B–4, and IV of which KENNEDY, J., joined. O'CONNOR, J., filed a concurring opinion, post, p. 2664. KENNEDY, J., filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, post, p. 2664. THOMAS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which SCALIA, J., joined, post, p. 2667.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Joel I. Klein, Washington, DC, Keith E. Hope, Miami, FL, for Florida, et al., in No. 92–519, 92-767.

James A. Feldman, Washington, DC, for the U.S. in No. 92–767.

C. Allen Foster, Greensboro, NC, for De Grandy, et al., in No. 92–593.

Opinion

1000 Justice SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1] [2] These consolidated cases are about the meaning of vote dilution and the facts required to show it, when § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is applied to challenges to single-member legislative districts. See 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 1973. We hold that no violation of § 2 can be found here, where, in spite of continuing discrimination and racial bloc voting, minority voters form effective voting majorities in a number of districts roughly proportional to the minority voters' respective shares in the voting-age population. While such proportionality is not dispositive in a challenge to single-member districting, it is a relevant fact in the totality of circumstances to be analyzed when determining whether members of a minority group have "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." Ibid.

I

On the first day of Florida's 1992 legislative session, a group of Hispanic voters including Miguel De Grandy (De Grandy plaintiffs) complained in the United States District Court against the speaker of Florida's House of Representatives, the president of its Senate, the Governor, and other state officials (State). The complainants alleged that the districts from which Florida voters had chosen their state senators and representatives since 1982 were malapportioned, failing to reflect changes in the State's population during the ensuing decade. The State Conference of NAACP Branches and individual black voters (NAACP 1001 plaintiffs) *2652 filed a similar suit, which the three-judge District Court consolidated with the De Grandy case.[1]

Several months after the first complaint was filed, on April 10, 1992, the state legislature adopted Senate Joint Resolution 2–G (SJR 2–G), providing the reapportionment plan currently at issue. The plan called for dividing Florida into 40 single-member Senate, and 120 single-member House, districts based on population data from the 1990 census. As the Constitution of Florida required, the state attorney general then petitioned the Supreme Court of Florida for a declaratory judgment that the legislature's apportionment plan was valid under federal and state law. See Fla. Const., Art. III, § 16(c). The court so declared, while acknowledging that state constitutional time constraints precluded full review for conformity with § 2 of the Voting Rights Act and recognizing the right of any interested party to bring a § 2 challenge to the plan in the Supreme Court of Florida. See In re Constitutionality of Senate Joint Resolution 2G, Special Apportionment Session 1992, 597 So.2d 276, 285–286 (1992).[2]

The De Grandy and NAACP plaintiffs responded to SJR 2–G by amending their federal complaints to charge the new 1002 reapportionment plan with violating § 2.[3] They claimed that SJR 2–G " 'unlawfully fragments cohesive minority communities and otherwise impermissibly submerges their right to vote and to participate in the electoral process,' " and they pointed to areas around the State where black or Hispanic populations could have formed a voting majority in a politically cohesive, reasonably compact district (or in more than one), if SJR 2–G had not fragmented each group among several districts or packed it into just a few. De Grandy v. Wetherell, 815 F.Supp. 1550, 1559–1560 (ND Fla.1992).

The Department of Justice filed a similar complaint, naming the State of Florida and several elected officials as defendants and claiming that SJR 2–G diluted the voting strength of blacks and Hispanics in two parts of the State in violation of § 2. The Government alleged that SJR 2–G diluted the votes of the Hispanic population in an area largely covered by Dade County (including Miami) and the black population in an area covering much of Escambia County (including Pensacola).[4] App. 75. The District Court consolidated this action with the other two and held a 5–day trial, followed immediately by an hours-long hearing on remedy.

At the end of the hearing, on July 1, 1992, the District Court ruled from the bench. It held the plan's provisions for state House districts to be in violation of § 2 because "more than [SJR 2–G's] nine Hispanic districts may be drawn without having or creating a regressive effect upon black voters," and it imposed a remedial plan offered by the De Grandy plaintiffs calling for 11 majority-Hispanic House districts. 1003 App. to Juris. Statement 2a, 203a. As to the Senate, the court found that a fourth majority-Hispanic district could be drawn in addition to the three provided by SJR 2–G, but only at the expense of black voters in the area. *2653 Id., at 202a; 815 F.Supp., at 1560. The court was of two minds about the implication of this finding, once observing that it meant the legislature's plan for the Senate was a violation of § 2 but without a remedy, once saying the plan did not violate § 2 at all.[5] In any event, it ordered elections to be held using SJR 2–G's senatorial districts.

In a later, expanded opinion the court reviewed the totality of circumstances as required by § 2 and Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). In explaining Dade County's "tripartite politics," in which "ethnic factors ... predominate over all other[s] ...," 815 F.Supp., at 1572, the court found political cohesion within each of the Hispanic and black populations but none between the two, id., at 1569, and a tendency of non-Hispanic whites to vote as a bloc to bar minority groups from electing their chosen candidates except in a district 1004 where a given minority makes up a voting majority,[6] id., at 1572. The court further found that the nearly one million Hispanics in the Dade County area could be combined into 4 Senate and 11 House districts, each one relatively compact and with a functional majority of Hispanic voters, id., at 1568–1569, whereas SJR 2–G created fewer majority-Hispanic districts; and that one more Senate district with a black voting majority could have been drawn, id., at 1576. Noting that Florida's minorities bore the social, economic, and political effects of past discrimination, the court concluded that SJR 2–G impermissibly diluted the voting strength of Hispanics in its House districts and of both Hispanics and blacks in its Senate districts. Id., at 1574. The findings of vote dilution in the senatorial districts had no practical effect, however, because the court held that remedies for the blacks and the Hispanics were mutually exclusive; it consequently deferred to the state legislature's work as the "fairest" accommodation of all the ethnic communities in south Florida. Id., at 1580.

We stayed the judgment of the District Court, 505 U.S. 1232, 113 S.Ct. 1, 120 L.Ed.2d 930 (1992), and noted probable jurisdiction, 507 U.S. 907, 113 S.Ct. 1249, 122 L.Ed.2d 648 (1993).

II

[3] Before going to the issue at the heart of these cases, we need to consider the District Court's refusal to give preclusive effect to the decision of the State Supreme Court validating SJR 2–G. The State argues that the claims of the De Grandy plaintiffs should have been dismissed as res judicata because they had a full and fair opportunity to litigate vote dilution before the State Supreme Court, see In re Constitutionality of Senate Joint Resolution 2G, Special Apportionment Session 1992, 597 So.2d, at 285. The premise, however, 1005 is false, exaggerating the review afforded the De Grandy plaintiffs in the state court and ignoring that court's own opinion of its judgment's limited scope. Given *2654 the state constitutional mandate to review apportionment resolutions within 30 days, see Fla. Const., Art. III, § 16(c), the Supreme Court of Florida accepted briefs and evidentiary submissions, but held no trial. In that court's own words, it was "impossible ... to conduct the complete factual analysis contemplated by the Voting Rights Act ... within the time constraints of article III," and its holding was accordingly "without prejudice to the right of any protestor to question the validity of the plan by filing a petition in this Court alleging how the plan violates the Voting Rights Act." 597 So.2d, at 282, 285–286.

[4] [5] The State balks at recognizing this express reservation by blaming the De Grandy plaintiffs for not returning to the State Supreme Court with the § 2 claims. But the plaintiffs are free to litigate in any court with jurisdiction, and their choice to forgo further, optional state review hardly converted the state constitutional judgment into a decision following "full and fair opportunity to litigate," Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90, 104, 101 S.Ct. 411, 420, 66 L.Ed.2d 308 (1980), as res judicata would require. For that matter, a federal court gives no greater preclusive effect to a state-court judgment than the state court itself would do, Marrese

v. American Academy of Orthopaedic Surgeons, 470 U.S. 373, 384–386, 105 S.Ct. 1327, 1334–35, 84 L.Ed.2d 274 (1985), and the Supreme Court of Florida made it plain that its preliminary look at the vote dilution claims would have no preclusive effect under Florida law.

[6] The State does not, of course, argue that res judicata bars the claims of the United States, which was not a party in the Florida Supreme Court action. It contends instead that the Federal Government's § 2 challenge deserved dismissal under this Court's Rooker/Feldman abstention doctrine, under which a party losing in state court is barred from seeking what in substance would be appellate review of the state 1006 judgment in a United States district court, based on the losing party's claim that the state judgment itself violates the loser's federal rights. See District of Columbia Court of Appeals v. Feldman, 460 U.S. 462, 482, 103 S.Ct. 1303, 1314–15, 75 L.Ed.2d 206 (1983); Rooker v. Fidelity Trust Co., 263 U.S. 413, 416, 44 S.Ct. 149, 150, 68 L.Ed. 362 (1923). But the invocation of Rooker/Feldman is just as inapt here, for unlike Rooker or Feldman, the United States was not a party in the state court. It was in no position to ask this Court to review the state court's judgment and has not directly attacked it in this proceeding. Cf. Feldman, supra, 460 U.S. at 468, and n. 2, 472, and n. 8, 103 S.Ct., at 1307, and n. 2, 1309, and n. 8 (suing District of Columbia Court of Appeals); Rooker, supra, 263 U.S., at 414, 44 S.Ct., at 149 (seeking to have state court's judgment declared null and void). The United States merely seeks to litigate its § 2 case for the first time, and the Government's claims, like those of the private plaintiffs, are properly before the federal courts.

III

On the merits of the vote dilution claims covering the House districts, the crux of the State's argument is the power of Hispanics under SJR 2–G to elect candidates of their choice in a number of districts that mirrors their share of the Dade County area's voting-age population (i.e., 9 out of 20 House districts); this power, according to the State, bars any finding that the plan dilutes Hispanic voting strength. The District Court is said to have missed that conclusion by mistaking our precedents to require the plan to maximize the number of Hispanic-controlled districts.

[7] The State's argument takes us back to ground covered last Term in two cases challenging single-member districts. See Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993); Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993). In Growe, we held that a claim of vote dilution in a single-member district requires proof meeting the same three threshold conditions for a dilution challenge to a multimember district: that a minority group be " 'sufficiently large and geographically *2655 compact to constitute a majority 1007 in a single-member district' "; that it be " 'politically cohesive' "; and that " 'the white majority vot[e] sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate.' " Id., at 40, 113 S.Ct., at 1084 (quoting Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S., at 50–51, 106 S.Ct., at 2766, 2767). Of course, as we reflected in Voinovich and amplify later in this opinion, "the Gingles factors cannot be applied mechanically and without regard to the nature of the claim." 507 U.S., at 158, 113 S.Ct., at 1157.

[8] In Voinovich we explained how manipulation of district lines can dilute the voting strength of politically cohesive minority group members, whether by fragmenting the minority voters among several districts where a bloc-voting majority can routinely outvote them, or by packing them into one or a small number of districts to minimize their influence in the districts next door. See id., at 153–154, 113 S.Ct., at 1155. Section 2 prohibits either sort of line-drawing where its result, " 'interact[ing] with social and historical conditions,' impairs the ability of a protected class to elect its candidate of choice on an equal basis with other voters." Ibid. (quoting Gingles, supra, 478 U.S., at 47, 106 S.Ct., at 2765).[7]

Plaintiffs in Growe and Voinovich failed to show vote dilution because the former did not prove political cohesiveness of the minority group, Growe, supra, at 41–42, 113 S.Ct., at 1085 and the latter showed no significant white bloc voting, Voinovich, supra, at 158, 113 S.Ct., at 1158. Here, on the contrary, the District Court found, and the State does not challenge, the presence of both these Gingles preconditions. The dispute in this litigation centers on two quite different questions: whether Hispanics are sufficiently numerous and geographically compact to be a majority in additional single-member districts, as required by the first Gingles factor; and whether, even with all three Gingles 1008 conditions satisfied, the circumstances in totality support a finding of vote dilution when Hispanics can be expected to elect their chosen representatives in substantial proportion to their percentage of the area's population.

A

[9] When applied to a claim that single-member districts dilute minority votes, the first Gingles condition requires the possibility of creating more than the existing number of reasonably compact districts with a sufficiently large minority population to elect candidates of its choice. The District Court found the condition satisfied by contrasting SJR 2–G with the De Grandy plan for the Dade County area, which provided for 11 reasonably compact districts, each with a voting-age population at least 64 percent Hispanic. 815 F.Supp., at 1580. While the percentage figures are not disputed, the parties disagree about the sufficiency of these super-majorities to allow Hispanics to elect representatives of their choice in all 11 districts. The District Court agreed with plaintiffs that the supermajorities would compensate for the number of voting-age Hispanics who did not vote, most commonly because they were recent immigrants who had not become citizens of the United States. Id., at 1567–1568. The State protests that fully half of the Hispanic voting-age residents of the region are not citizens, with the result that several districts in the De Grandy plan lack enough Hispanic voters to elect candidates of their choice without cross-over votes from other ethnic groups. On these assumptions, the State argues that the condition necessary to justify tinkering with the State's plan disappears.

We can leave this dispute without a winner. The parties' ostensibly factual disagreement *2656 raises an issue of law about which characteristic of minority populations (e.g., age, citizenship) ought to be the touchstone for proving a dilution claim and devising a sound remedy. These cases may be resolved, however, without reaching this issue or the related 1009 question whether the first Gingles condition can be satisfied by proof that a so-called influence district may be created (that is, by proof that plaintiffs can devise an additional district in which members of a minority group are a minority of the voters, but a potentially influential one). As in the past, we will assume without deciding that even if Hispanics are not an absolute majority of the relevant population in the additional districts, the first Gingles condition has been satisfied in these cases. See Voinovich, supra, at 154, 113 S.Ct., at 1155–1156; see also Growe, supra, at 41–42, n. 5, 113 S.Ct., at 1084, n. 5 (declining to reach the issue); Gingles, supra, 478 U.S., at 46–47, n. 12, 106 S.Ct., at 2764, n. 12 (same).

B

We do, however, part company from the District Court in assessing the totality of circumstances. The District Court found that the three Gingles preconditions were satisfied, and that Hispanics had suffered historically from official discrimination, the social, economic, and political effects of which they generally continued to feel, 815 F.Supp., at 1573–1574. Without more, and on the apparent assumption that what could have been done to create additional Hispanic supermajority districts should have been done, the District Court found a violation of § 2. But the assumption was erroneous, and more is required, as a review of Gingles will show.

1

Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986), prompted this Court's first reading of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 after its 1982 amendment.[8] Section 2(a) of the amended Act prohibits any "standard, practice, or procedure ... which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color [or 1010 membership in a language minority group]...." Section 2(b) provides that a denial or abridgment occurs where,

> "based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by subsection (a) of this section in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).

Gingles provided some structure to the statute's "totality of circumstances" test in a case challenging multimember legislative districts. See 478 U.S., at 46–51, 106 S.Ct., at 2764–2767. The Court listed the factors put forward as relevant in the Senate Report treating the 1982 amendments,[9] and held that > 2657 *1011 "[w]hile many or all of [them] may be relevant to a claim of vote dilution through submergence in multimember districts, unless there is a conjunction of the following circumstances, the use of multimember districts generally will not impede the ability of minority voters to elect representatives of their choice. Stated succinctly, a bloc voting majority must usually be able to defeat candidates supported by a politically cohesive, geographically insular minority group." Id., at 48–49, 106 S.Ct., at 2765–2766 (footnote omitted) (emphasis in original).

The Court thus summarized the three now-familiar Gingles factors (compactness/numerousness, minority cohesion or bloc voting, and majority bloc voting) as "necessary preconditions," id., at 50, 106 S.Ct., at 2766, for establishing vote dilution by use of a multimember district.

[10] [11] But if Gingles so clearly identified the three as generally necessary to prove a § 2 claim, it just as clearly declined to hold them sufficient in combination, either in the sense that a court's examination of relevant circumstances was complete once the three factors were found to exist, or in the sense that the three in combination necessarily and in all circumstances demonstrated dilution. This was true not only because bloc voting was a matter of degree, with a variable legal significance depending on other facts, id., at 55–58, 106 S.Ct., at 2768–2770, but also because the ultimate conclusions about equality or inequality of opportunity were intended by Congress to be judgments resting on comprehensive, not limited, canvassing of relevant facts. Lack of electoral success is evidence of vote dilution, but courts must also examine other evidence in the totality of circumstances, including the extent of the opportunities minority voters enjoy to participate in the political *1012 processes. Id., at 46, 79–80, 106 S.Ct., at 2764, 2781–2782; id., at 98–99, 106 S.Ct., at 2791–2792 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment). To be sure, some § 2 plaintiffs may have easy cases, but although lack of equal electoral opportunity may be readily imagined and unsurprising when demonstrated under circumstances that include the three essential Gingles factors, that conclusion must still be addressed explicitly, and without isolating any other arguably relevant facts from the act of judgment.[10]

2

If the three Gingles factors may not be isolated as sufficient, standing alone, to prove dilution in every multimember district challenge, a fortiori they must not be when the 2658 challenge goes to a series of single-member districts, where dilution may be more difficult to grasp. Plaintiffs challenging single-member districts may claim, not total submergence, but partial submergence; not the chance for some electoral *1013 success in place of none, but the chance for more success in place of some. When the question thus comes down to the reasonableness of drawing a series of district lines in one combination of places rather than another, judgments about inequality may become closer calls. As facts beyond the ambit of the three Gingles factors loom correspondingly larger, factfinders cannot rest uncritically on assumptions about the force of the Gingles factors in pointing to dilution.

[12] [13] The cases now before us, of course, fall on this more complex side of the divide, requiring a court to determine whether provision for somewhat fewer majority-minority districts than the number sought by the plaintiffs was dilution of the minority votes. The District Court was accordingly required to assess the probative significance of the Gingles factors critically after considering the further circumstances with arguable bearing on the issue of equal political opportunity. We think that in finding dilution here the District Court misjudged the relative importance of the Gingles factors and of historical discrimination, measured against evidence tending to show that in spite of these facts, SJR 2–G would provide minority voters with an equal measure of political and electoral opportunity.

The District Court did not, to be sure, commit the error of treating the three Gingles conditions as exhausting the enquiry required by § 2. Consistently with Gingles, the court received evidence of racial relations outside the immediate confines of voting behavior and found a history of discrimination against Hispanic voters continuing in society generally to the present day. But the District Court was not critical enough in asking whether a history of persistent discrimination reflected in the larger society and its bloc-voting behavior portended any dilutive effect from a newly proposed districting scheme, whose pertinent features were majority-minority districts in substantial proportion to the minority's share of voting-age population. The court failed to ask whether the totality of facts, including those pointing to *1014 proportionality,[11] showed that the new scheme would deny minority voters equal political opportunity.

[14] Treating equal political opportunity as the focus of the enquiry, we do not see how these district lines, apparently providing political effectiveness in proportion to voting-age numbers, deny equal political opportunity. The record establishes that Hispanics constitute 50 percent of the voting-age population in Dade County and under SJR 2–G would make up supermajorities in 9 of the 18 House districts located primarily within the county. Likewise, if one considers the 20 House districts located at least in part within Dade County, the record indicates that Hispanics would be an effective voting majority in 45 percent of them (i.e., nine), and would constitute 47 percent of the voting-age population in the area. 815 F.Supp., at 1580; App. to Juris. Statement 180a–183a. In other words, under SJR 2–G Hispanics in the Dade County area would enjoy substantial proportionality. On this evidence, we think the State's scheme would thwart the historical tendency to exclude Hispanics, not encourage or perpetuate it. Thus in spite of 2659 that history and its legacy, including the racial cleavages that characterize Dade County politics today, we see no grounds for holding in these cases *1015 that SJR 2–G's district lines diluted the votes cast by Hispanic voters.

The De Grandy plaintiffs urge us to put more weight on the District Court's findings of packing and fragmentation, allegedly accomplished by the way the State drew certain specific lines: "[T]he line of District 116 separates heavily Hispanic neighborhoods in District 112 from the rest of the heavily Hispanic Kendall Lakes area and the Kendall area," so that the line divides "neighbors making up the ... same housing development in Kendall Lakes," and District 114 "packs" Hispanic voters, while Districts 102 and 109 "fragmen[t]" them. 815 F.Supp., at 1569 (internal quotation marks omitted). We would agree that where a State has split (or lumped) minority neighborhoods that would have been grouped into a single district (or spread among several) if the State had employed the same line-drawing standards in minority neighborhoods as it used elsewhere in the jurisdiction, the inconsistent treatment might be significant evidence of a § 2 violation, even in the face of proportionality. The district court, however, made no such finding. Indeed, the propositions the Court recites on this point are not even phrased as factual findings, but merely as recitations of testimony offered by plaintiffs' expert witness. While the District Court may well have credited the testimony, the court was apparently wary of adopting the witness's conclusions as findings. But even if one imputed a greater significance to the accounts of testimony, they would boil down to findings that several of SJR 2–G's district lines separate portions of Hispanic neighborhoods, while another district line draws several Hispanic neighborhoods into a single district. This, however, would be to say only that lines could have been drawn elsewhere, nothing more. But some dividing by district lines and combining within them is virtually inevitable and befalls any population group of substantial size. Attaching the labels "packing" and "fragmenting" to these phenomena,without *1016 more, does not make the result vote dilution when the minority group enjoys substantial proportionality.

3

[15] It may be that the significance of the facts under § 2 was obscured by the rule of thumb apparently adopted by the District Court, that anything short of the maximum number of majority-minority districts consistent with the Gingles conditions would violate § 2, at least where societal discrimination against the minority had occurred and continued to occur. But reading the first Gingles condition in effect to define dilution as a failure to maximize in the face of bloc voting (plus some other incidents of societal bias to be expected where bloc voting occurs) causes its own dangers, and they are not to be courted.

Assume a hypothetical jurisdiction of 1,000 voters divided into 10 districts of 100 each, where members of a minority group make up 40 percent of the voting population and voting is totally polarized along racial lines. With the right geographic dispersion to satisfy the compactness requirement, and with careful manipulation of district lines, the minority voters might be placed in control of as many as 7 of the 10 districts. Each such district could be drawn with at least 51 members of the minority group, and whether the remaining minority voters were added to the groupings of 51 for safety or scattered in the other three districts, minority voters would be able to elect candidates of their choice in all seven districts.[12] The point of the hypothetical is not, of course, that any given district is likely to be open to such extreme manipulation, or that bare majorities are likely to vote in full force and strictly along racial lines, but that reading § 2 to define dilution as any failure to maximize tends to *1017 obscure the very object of the statute and 2660 to run counter to its textually stated purpose. One may suspect vote dilution from political famine, but one is not entitled to suspect (much less infer) dilution from mere failure to guarantee a political feast. However prejudiced a society might be, it would be absurd to suggest that the failure of a districting scheme to provide a minority group with effective political power 75 percent above its numerical strength[13] indicates a denial of equal participation in the political process. Failure to maximize cannot be the measure of § 2.

4

[16] While, for obvious reasons, the State agrees that a failure to leverage minority political strength to the maximum possible point of power is not definitive of dilution in bloc-voting societies, it seeks to impart a measure of determinacy by applying a definitive rule of its own: that as a matter of law no dilution occurs whenever the percentage of single-member districts in which minority voters form an effective majority mirrors the minority voters' percentage of the relevant population.[14] Proportionality so defined, see n. 11, 1018 supra, would thus be a safe harbor for any districting scheme.

The safety would be in derogation of the statutory text and its considered purpose, however, and of the ideal that the Voting Rights Act of 1965 attempts to foster. An inflexible rule would run counter to the textual command of § 2, that the presence or absence of a violation be assessed "based on the totality of circumstances." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b). The need for such "totality" review springs from the demonstrated ingenuity of state and local governments in hobbling minority voting power, McCain v. Lybrand, 465 U.S. 236, 243–246, 104 S.Ct. 1037, 1042–44, 79 L.Ed.2d 271 (1984), a point recognized by Congress when it amended the statute in 1982: "[S]ince the adoption of the Voting Rights Act, [some] jurisdictions have substantially moved from direct, over[t] impediments to the right to vote to more sophisticated devices that dilute minority voting strength," Senate Report 10 (discussing § 5). In modifying § 2, Congress thus endorsed our view in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), that "whether the political processes are 'equally open' depends upon a searching practical evaluation of the 'past and present reality,' " Senate Report 30 (quoting 412 U.S., at 766, 770, 93 S.Ct., at 2339, 2341). In a substantial number of voting jurisdictions, that past reality has included such reprehensible practices as ballot box stuffing, outright violence, discretionary registration, property requirements, the poll tax, and the white primary; and other practices censurable when the object of their use is discriminatory, such as at-large elections, runoff requirements, anti-single-shot devices, gerrymandering, the impeachment of office-holders, the annexation or deannexation of territory, and the creation or elimination of elective offices.[15] Some of those *2661 expedients 1019 could occur even in a jurisdiction with numerically demonstrable proportionality; the harbor safe for States would thus not be safe for voters.[16] It is, in short, for good reason that we have been, and remain, chary of entertaining a simplification of the sort the State now urges upon us. Cf. Gingles, 478 U.S., at 77, 106 S.Ct., at 2780 ("[P]ersistent proportional representation ... [may] not accurately reflect the minority group's ability to elect its preferred representatives").

Even if the State's safe harbor were open only in cases of alleged dilution by the manipulation of district lines, however, it would rest on an unexplored premise of highly suspect validity: that in any given voting jurisdiction (or portion of that jurisdiction under consideration), the rights of some minority voters under § 2 may be traded off against the rights of other members of the same minority class. Under the State's view, the most blatant racial gerrymandering in half of a county's single-member districts would be irrelevant under § 2 if offset by political gerrymandering in the other half, so long as proportionality was the bottom line. But see Baird v. Consolidated City of Indianapolis, 976 F.2d 357, 359 (CA7 1992) ("A balanced bottom line does not foreclose proof of discrimination along the way"); Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358, 378–379, 95 S.Ct. 2296, 2307–2308, 45 L.Ed.2d 245 (1975) (territorial annexation aimed at diluting black votes forbidden by § 5, regardless of its actual effect).

Finally, we reject the safe harbor rule because of a tendency the State would itself certainly condemn, a tendency to promote and perpetuate efforts to devise majority-minority districts even in circumstances where they may not be necessary 1020 to achieve equal political and electoral opportunity. Because in its simplest form the State's rule would shield from § 2 challenge a districting scheme in which the number of majority-minority districts reflected the minority's share of the relevant population, the conclusiveness of the rule might be an irresistible inducement to create such districts. It bears recalling, however, that for all the virtues of majority-minority districts as remedial devices, they rely on a quintessentially race-conscious calculus aptly described as the "politics of second best," see B. Grofman, L. Handley, & R. Niemi, Minority Representation and the Quest for Voting Equality 136 (1992). If the lesson of Gingles is that society's racial and ethnic cleavages sometimes necessitate majority-minority districts to ensure equal political and electoral opportunity, that should not obscure the fact that there are communities in which minority citizens are able to form coalitions with voters from other racial and ethnic groups, having no need to be a majority within a single district in order to elect candidates of their choice. Those candidates may not represent perfection to every minority voter, but minority voters are not immune from the obligation to pull, haul, and trade to find common political ground, the virtue of which is not to be slighted in applying a statute meant to hasten the waning of racism in American politics.

It is enough to say that, while proportionality in the sense used here is obviously an indication that minority voters have an equal opportunity, in spite of racial polarization, "to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice," 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b), the degree of probative value assigned to proportionality may vary with other facts.[17] No single statistic provides 2662 courts with a shortcut *1021 to determine whether a set of single-member districts unlawfully dilutes minority voting strength.

5

[17] While the United States concedes the relevance of proportionality to a § 2 claim, it would confine proportionality to an affirmative defense, and one to be made only on a statewide basis in cases that challenge districts for electing a body with statewide jurisdiction. In this litigation, the United States would have us treat any claim that evidence of proportionality supports the State's plan as having been waived because the State made no argument in the District Court that the proportion of districts statewide in which Hispanics constitute an effective voting majority mirrors the proportion of statewide Hispanic population.[18]

The argument has two flaws. There is, first, no textual reason to segregate some circumstances from the statutory totality, to be rendered insignificant unless the defendant pleads them by way of affirmative defense. Second, and just as importantly, the argument would recast these cases as they come to us, in order to bar consideration of proportionality except on statewide scope, whereas up until now the *1022 dilution claims have been litigated on a smaller geographical scale. It is, indeed, the plaintiffs themselves, including the United States, who passed up the opportunity to frame their dilution claim in statewide terms. While the United States points to language in its complaint alleging that the redistricting plans dilute the votes of "Hispanic citizens and black citizens in the State of Florida," App. 77, the complaint identifies "several areas of the State" where such violations of § 2 are said to occur, and then speaks in terms of Hispanics in the Dade County area (and blacks in the area of Escambia County), id., at 75–76. Nowhere do the allegations indicate that claims of dilution "in the State of Florida" are not to be considered in terms of the areas specifically mentioned. The complaint alleges no facts at all about the contours, demographics, or voting patterns of any districts outside the Dade County or Escambia County areas, and neither the evidence at trial nor the opinion of the District Court addressed white bloc voting and political cohesion of minorities statewide. The De Grandy plaintiffs even voluntarily dismissed their claims of Hispanic vote dilution outside the Dade County area. See 815 F.Supp., at 1559, n. 13. Thus we have no occasion to decide which frame of reference should have been used if the parties had not apparently agreed in the District Court on the appropriate geographical scope for analyzing the alleged § 2 violation and devising its remedy.

6

In sum, the District Court's finding of dilution did not address the statutory standard of unequal political and electoral opportunity, and reflected instead a misconstruction of § 2 that equated dilution with failure to maximize the number of reasonably compact majority-minority districts. Because the ultimate finding of dilution in districting for the Florida House was based on a misreading of the governing law, we hold it to be clearly erroneous. See Gingles, 478 U.S., at 79, 106 S.Ct., at 2781.

2663 *1023 IV

Having found insufficient evidence of vote dilution in the drawing of House districts in the Dade County area, we look now to the comparable districts for the state Senate. As in the case of House districts, we understand the District Court to have misapprehended the legal test for vote dilution when it found a violation of § 2 in the location of the Senate district lines. Because the court did not modify the State's plan, however, we hold the ultimate result correct in this instance.

SJR 2–G creates 40 single-member Senate districts, 5 of them wholly within Dade County. Of these five, three have Hispanic supermajorities of at least 64 percent, and one has a clear majority of black voters. Two more Senate districts crossing county lines include substantial numbers of Dade County voters, and in one of these, black voters, although not close to a majority, are able to elect representatives of their choice with the aid of cross-over votes. 815 F.Supp., at 1574, 1579.

Within this seven-district Dade County area, both minority groups enjoy rough proportionality. The voting-age population in the seven-district area is 44.8 percent Hispanic and 15.8 percent black. Record, U.S.Exh. 7. Hispanics predominate in 42.9 percent of the districts (three out of seven), as do blacks in 14.3 percent of them (one out of seven). While these numbers indicate something just short of perfect proportionality (42.9 percent against 44.8; 14.3 percent against 15.8), the opposite is true of the five districts located wholly within Dade County.[19]

1024 The District Court concentrated not on these facts but on whether additional districts could be drawn in which either Hispanics or blacks would constitute an effective majority. The court found that indeed a fourth senatorial district with a Hispanic supermajority could be drawn, or that an additional district could be created with a black majority, in each case employing reasonably compact districts. Having previously established that each minority group was politically cohesive, that each labored under a legacy of official discrimination, and that whites voted as a bloc, the District Court believed it faced "two independent, viable Section 2 claims." 815 F.Supp., at 1577. Because the court did not, however, think it was possible to create both another Hispanic district and another black district on the same map, it concluded that no remedy for either violation was practical and, deferring to the State's plan as a compromise policy, imposed SJR 2–G's senatorial districts. Id., at 1580.

We affirm the District Court's decision to leave the State's plan for Florida State Senate districts undisturbed. As in the case of the House districts, the totality of circumstances appears not to support a finding of vote dilution here, where both minority groups constitute effective voting majorities in a number of state Senate districts substantially proportional to their share in the population, and where plaintiffs have not produced evidence otherwise indicating that under SJR 2–G voters in either minority group have "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).

V

There being no violation of the Voting Rights Act shown, we have no occasion to review the District Court's decisions going to remedy. The judgment of the District Court is accordingly affirmed in part and reversed in part.

It is so ordered.

2664 *1025 Justice O'CONNOR, concurring.

The critical issue in these cases is whether § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973, requires courts to "maximize" the number of districts in which minority voters may elect their candidates of choice. The District Court, applying the maximization principle, operated "on the apparent assumption that what could have been done to create additional Hispanic supermajority districts should have been done." Ante, at 2656. The Court today makes clear that the District Court was in error, and that the Voting Rights Act does not require maximization. Ante, at 2660 ("Failure to maximize cannot be the measure of § 2"); ante, at 2662 (the District Court improperly "equated dilution with failure to maximize the number of reasonably compact majority-minority districts").

But today's opinion does more than reject the maximization principle. The opinion's central teaching is that proportionality—defined as the relationship between the number of majority-minority voting districts and the minority group's share of the relevant population—is always relevant evidence in determining vote dilution, but is never itself dispositive. Lack of proportionality is probative evidence of vote dilution. "[A]ny theory of vote dilution must necessarily rely to some extent on a measure of minority voting strength that makes some reference to the proportion between the minority group and the electorate at large." Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 84, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2784, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment). Thus, in evaluating the Gingles preconditions and the totality of the circumstances a court must always consider the relationship between the number of majority-minority voting districts and the minority group's share of the population. Cf. id., at 99, 106 S.Ct., at 2791–92 ("[T]he relative lack of minority electoral success under a challenged plan, when compared with the success that would be predicted under the measure of undiluted minority voting strength the court is employing, can constitute powerful evidence of vote dilution").

1026 The Court also makes clear that proportionality is never dispositive. Lack of proportionality can never by itself prove dilution, for courts must always carefully and searchingly review the totality of the circumstances, including the extent to which minority groups have access to the political process. Ante, at 2657. Nor does the presence of proportionality prove the absence of dilution. Proportionality is not a safe harbor for States; it does not immunize their election schemes from § 2 challenge. Ante, at 2660–2662.

In sum, the Court's carefully crafted approach treats proportionality as relevant evidence, but does not make it the only relevant evidence. In doing this the Court makes clear that § 2 does not require maximization of minority voting strength, yet remains faithful to § 2's command that minority voters be given equal opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. With this understanding, I join the opinion of the Court.

Justice KENNEDY, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

At trial, the plaintiffs alleged that the State violated § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973, by not creating as many majority-minority districts as was feasible. The District Court agreed and found a violation of § 2, thus equating impermissible vote dilution with the failure to maximize the number of majority-minority districts. I agree with the Court that the District Court's maximization theory was an erroneous application of § 2.

A more difficult question is whether proportionality, ascertained by comparing the number of majority-minority districts to the minority group's proportion of the relevant population, is relevant in deciding whether there has been vote dilution under § 2 in a challenge to election district lines. The statutory text does not yield a clear answer.

The statute, in relevant part, provides: "The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to 1027 office in the *2665 State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered [in determining whether there has been vote dilution]: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." § 1973(b) (emphasis in original). By its terms, this language addresses the number of minorities elected to office, not the number of districts in which minorities constitute a voting majority. These two things are not synonymous, and it would be an affront to our constitutional traditions to treat them as such. The assumption that majority-minority districts elect only minority representatives, or that majority-white districts elect only white representatives, is false as an empirical matter. See Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 151–152, 158, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1154, 1157–1158, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993); A. Thernstrom, Whose Votes Count? Affirmative Action and Minority Voting Rights 210–216 (1987); C. Swain, Black Faces, Black Interests, ch. 6 (1993). And on a more fundamental level, the assumption reflects "the demeaning notion that members of the defined racial groups ascribe to certain 'minority views' that must be different from those of other citizens." Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547, 636, 110 S.Ct. 2997, 3046, 111 L.Ed.2d 445 (1990) (KENNEDY, J., dissenting); see also United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburgh, Inc. v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 186–187, 97 S.Ct. 996, 1020–1021, 51 L.Ed.2d 229 (1977) (Burger, C.J., dissenting).

Although the statutory text does not speak in precise terms to the issue, our precedents make clear that proportionality, or the lack thereof, has some relevance to a vote dilution claim under § 2. In a unanimous decision last Term, we recognized that single-member districts were subject to vote dilution challenges under § 2, and further that "[d]ividing [a politically cohesive] minority group among various [single-member] districts so that it is a majority in none" is one "device for diluting minority voting power" within the meaning of the statute. Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S., at 152–153, 113 S.Ct., at 1154–1155). If "the fragmentation of a minority group among 1028 various districts" is an acknowledged dilutive device, id., at 153, 113 S.Ct., at 1155, it follows that analysis under § 2 takes some account of whether the number of majority-minority districts falls short of a statistical norm. Cf. Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 242, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 2049, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976) (discriminatory impact relevant to allegation of intentional discrimination). Both the majority and concurring opinions in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986), reflect the same understanding of the statute. See id., at 50, n. 16, 106 S.Ct., at 2766, n. 16 (In a "gerrymander case, plaintiffs might allege that the minority group that is sufficiently large and compact to constitute a single-member district has been split between two or more multimember or single-member districts, with the effect of diluting the potential strength of the minority vote"); id., at 84, 106 S.Ct., at 2784 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment) ("[A]ny theory of vote dilution must necessarily rely to some extent on a measure of minority voting strength that makes some reference to the proportion between the minority group and the electorate at large"). Indeed, to say that proportionality is irrelevant under the § 2 results test is the equivalent of saying (contrary to our precedents) that no § 2 vote dilution challenges can be brought to the drawing of single-member districts.

To be sure, placing undue emphasis upon proportionality risks defeating the goals underlying the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended. See Gingles, supra, at 99, 106 S.Ct., at 2791–92 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment). As today's decision provides, a lack of proportionality is "never dispositive" proof of vote dilution, just as the presence of proportionality "is not a safe harbor for States [and] does not immunize their election schemes from § 2 challenge." Ante, at 2664 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring); see also ante, at 2661, n. 17. But given our past construction of the statute, I would hesitate to conclude that proportionality has no relevance to the § 2 inquiry.

*2666 It is important to emphasize that the precedents to which I refer, like today's decision, only construe the statute, and 1029 do not purport to assess its constitutional implications. See Chisom v. Roemer, 501 U.S. 380, 418, 111 S.Ct. 2354, 2376, 115 L.Ed.2d 348 (1991) (KENNEDY, J., dissenting). Operating under the constraints of a statutory regime in which proportionality has some relevance, States might consider it lawful and proper to act with the explicit goal of creating a proportional number of majority-minority districts in an effort to avoid § 2 litigation. Likewise, a court finding a § 2 violation might believe that the only appropriate remedy is to order the offending State to engage in race-based redistricting and create a minimum number of districts in which minorities constitute a voting majority. The Department of Justice might require (in effect) the same as a condition of granting preclearance, under § 5 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, to a State's proposed legislative redistricting. Those governmental actions, in my view, tend to entrench the very practices and stereotypes the Equal Protection Clause is set against. See Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, supra, 497 U.S., at 636–637, 110 S.Ct., at 3046–3047 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting). As a general matter, the sorting of persons with an intent to divide by reason of race raises the most serious constitutional questions.

"The moral imperative of racial neutrality is the driving force of the Equal Protection Clause." Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 518, 109 S.Ct. 706, 735, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989) (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). Racial classifications "are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality," and are presumed invalid. Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 643, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2824, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also A. Bickel, The Morality of Consent 133 (1975). This is true regardless of "the race of those burdened or benefited by a particular classification." Croson, supra, 488 U.S., at 494, 109 S.Ct., at 722 (opinion of O'CONNOR, J.); 488 U.S., at 520, 109 S.Ct., at 736 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment). Furthermore, "[i]t is axiomatic that racial classifications do not become legitimate on the assumption that all persons 1030 suffer them in equal degree." Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 1370, 113 L.Ed.2d 411 (1991); see also Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 560, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 1147, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting).

These principles apply to the drawing of electoral and political boundaries. As Justice Douglas, joined by Justice Goldberg, stated 30 years ago:

> "When racial or religious lines are drawn by the State, the multiracial, multireligious communities that our Constitution seeks to weld together as one become separatist; antagonisms that relate to race or to religion rather than to political issues are generated.... Since that system is at war with the democratic ideal, it should find no footing here." Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 67, 84 S.Ct. 603, 611, 11 L.Ed.2d 512 (1964) (dissenting opinion).

In like fashion, Chief Justice Burger observed that the "use of a mathematical formula" to assure a minimum number of majority-minority districts "tends to sustain the existence of ghettos by promoting the notion that political clout is to be gained or maintained by marshaling particular racial, ethnic, or religious groups in enclaves." United Jewish Organizations v. Carey, 430 U.S., at 186, 97 S.Ct., at 1020 (dissenting opinion). And last Term in Shaw, we voiced our agreement with these sentiments, observing that "[r]acial gerrymandering, even for remedial purposes, may balkanize us into competing racial factions; it threatens to carry us further from the goal of a political system in which race no longer matters—a goal that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments embody, and to which the Nation continues to aspire." 509 U.S., at 657, 113 S.Ct., at 2832.

Our decision in Shaw alluded to, but did not resolve, the broad question whether "the intentional creation of majority-minority districts, *2667 without more, always gives rise to an equal protection claim." Id., at 649, 113 S.Ct., at 2828 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also id., at 657, 113 S.Ct., at 2832. While recognizing that redistricting differs from many other kinds of state decisionmaking 1031 "in that the legislature always is aware of race when it draws district lines, just as it is aware of age, economic status, religion and political persuasion," we stated that "the difficulty of determining from the face of a single-member districting plan that it purposefully distinguishes between voters on the basis of race" does "not mean that a racial gerrymander, once established, should receive less scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause than other state legislation classifying citizens by race." Id., at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826. (emphasis in original) We went on to hold that "a reapportionment scheme so irrational on its face that it can be understood only as an effort to segregate voters into separate voting districts because of their race" must be subject to strict scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause. Id., at 658, 113 S.Ct., at 2832; see also id., at 649, 653, 113 S.Ct., at 2828, 2830. Given our decision in Shaw, there is good reason for state and federal officials with responsibilities related to redistricting, as well as reviewing courts, to recognize that explicit race-based districting embarks us on a most dangerous course. It is necessary to bear in mind that redistricting must comply with the overriding demands of the Equal Protection Clause. But no constitutional claims were brought here, and the Court's opinion does not address any constitutional issues. Cf. Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S., at 157, 113 S.Ct., at 1157.

With these observations, I concur in all but Parts III–B–2, III–B–4, and IV of the Court's opinion and in its judgment.

Justice THOMAS, with whom Justice SCALIA joins, dissenting.

For the reasons I explain in Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 891, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994), I would vacate the judgment of the District Court and remand with instructions to dismiss the actions consolidated in these cases for failure to state a claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. 42 U.S.C. § 1973. Each of the actions consolidated in these cases asserted that Florida's apportionment plan diluted the vote of a minority group. In accordance 1032 with the views I express in Holder, I would hold that an apportionment plan is not a "standard, practice, or procedure" that may be challenged under § 2. I therefore respectfully dissent.

All Citations

512 U.S. 997, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775, 62 USLW 4755

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 The complaints also challenged Florida's congressional districts, but that element of the litigation has been resolved separately, see De Grandy v. Wetherell, 794 F.Supp. 1076 (ND Fla.1992) (three-judge court), and without appeal.

2 In an additional step not directly relevant to this appeal, the State submitted SJR 2–G to the Department of Justice for preclearance pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1973c (§ 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965). Five Florida counties, but not Dade County, are subject to preclearance. De Grandy v. Wetherell, 815 F.Supp. 1550, 1574 (ND Fla.1992). When the Attorney General of the United States refused to preclear the plan's Senate districts for the Hillsborough County area and the state legislature refused to revise the plan, the Supreme Court of Florida ordered the adjustments necessary to obtain preclearance, 601 So.2d 543 (1992); it is the version of SJR 2–G so adjusted that is at issue in this litigation. 815 F.Supp., at 1557–1558.

3 The complaints also alleged violation of Art. I, § 2, and the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution, but these claims were later dismissed voluntarily.

4 The Voting Rights Act of 1965 and constitutional claims as to the Escambia County area were settled by the parties and are not at issue in this appeal.

5 The court's judgment filed July 2, 1992, App. to Juris. Statement 5a, said SJR 2–G's state senatorial districts "do not violate Section 2," but its subsequent opinion explaining the judgment said the senatorial districts do indeed violate § 2, and that its earlier language "should be read as holding that the Florida Senate plan does not violate Section 2 such that a different remedy must be imposed." 815 F.Supp., at 1582 (emphasis added).

Any conflict in these two formulations is of no consequence here. "This Court 'reviews judgments, not statements in opinions,' " California v. Rooney, 483 U.S. 307, 311, 107 S.Ct. 2852, 2854, 97 L.Ed.2d 258 (1987) (per curiam) (quoting Black v. Cutter Laboratories, 351 U.S. 292, 297, 76 S.Ct. 824, 827, 100 L.Ed. 1188 (1956)), and the De Grandy plaintiffs and the United States have appealed the failure of the District Court to provide relief for alleged § 2 violations in SJR 2–G's senatorial districts. The State is entitled to "urge any grounds which would lend support to the judgment below," Dayton Bd. of Ed. v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406, 419, 97 S.Ct. 2766, 2775, 53 L.Ed.2d 851 (1977), including the argument it makes here that the District Court was correct not to impose a remedy different from SJR 2–G because the State's reapportionment plan did not violate § 2.

6 The Court recognizes that the terms "black," "Hispanic," and "white" are neither mutually exclusive nor collectively exhaustive. We follow the practice of the District Court in using them as rough indicators of south Florida's three largest racial and linguistic minority groups.

7 See also 478 U.S., at 50, n. 16, 106 S.Ct., at 2766, n. 16 (discussing vote dilution through gerrymandering district lines). For earlier precedents recognizing that racial gerrymanders have played a central role in discrimination against minority groups, see Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960); Perkins v. Matthews, 400 U.S. 379, 91 S.Ct. 431, 27 L.Ed.2d 476 (1971); Connor v. Finch, 431 U.S. 407, 97 S.Ct. 1828, 52 L.Ed.2d 465 (1977).

8 Congress amended the statute to reach cases in which discriminatory intent is not identified, adding new language designed to codify White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 2339, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973). S.Rep. No. 97–417, p. 2 (1982) 1982 U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News p. 177 (hereinafter Senate Report).

9 As summarized in Gingles, 478 U.S., at 44–45, 106 S.Ct., at 2763: "[T]he Senate Report specifies factors which typically may be relevant to a § 2 claim: the history of voting-related discrimination in the State or political subdivision; the extent to which voting in the elections of the State or political subdivision is racially polarized; the extent to which the State or political subdivision has used voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group, such as unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, and prohibitions against bullet voting; the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes; the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process; the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns; and the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction. [Senate Report 28–29.] The Report notes also that evidence demonstrating that elected officials are unresponsive to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group and that the policy underlying the State's or the political subdivision's use of the contested practice or structure is tenuous may have probative value. Id., at 29."

10 If challenges to multimember districts are likely to be the easier plaintiffs' cases, it is worth remembering that even in multimember district challenges, proof of the Gingles factors has not always portended liability under § 2. In Baird v. Consolidated City of Indianapolis, 976 F.2d 357 (1992), the Seventh Circuit confronted a scheme for electing a City–County Council of 29 members. Voters chose 25 of their representatives from single-member districts and 4 at large, from a district representing the entire area. Black plaintiffs brought a vote dilution claim challenging the lines for single-member districts and the existence of the four-member at-large district. After the Council had redrawn its single-member districts to rectify dilution there, the District Court held, and the Seventh Circuit affirmed, that the four-member district did not dilute black voting strength because proof of the three Gingles factors was not enough "if other considerations show that the minority has an undiminished right to participate in the political process." 976 F.2d, at 359. The "other considerations" in Baird included the fact that the new single-member districts were so drawn that blacks formed a voting majority in seven of them (28 percent of the single-member districts and 24 percent of the entire council) while blacks constituted 21 percent of the local population; and that while the four at-large seats tended to go to Republicans, one of the Republicans elected in 1991 was black. Id., at 358, 361.

11 "Proportionality" as the term is used here links the number of majority-minority voting districts to minority members' share of the relevant population. The concept is distinct from the subject of the proportional representation clause of § 2, which provides that "nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b). This proviso speaks to the success of minority candidates, as distinct from the political or electoral power of minority voters. Cf. Senate Report 29, n. 115 (minority candidates' success at the polls is not conclusive proof of minority voters' access to the political process). And the proviso also confirms what is otherwise clear from the text of the statute, namely, that the ultimate right of § 2 is equality of opportunity, not a guarantee of electoral success for minority-preferred candidates of whatever race.

12 Minority voters might instead be denied control over a single seat, of course. Each district would need to include merely 51 members of the majority group; minority voters fragmented among the 10 districts could be denied power to affect the result in any district.

13 When 40 percent of the population determines electoral outcomes in 7 out of 10 districts, the minority group can be said to enjoy effective political power 75 percent above its numerical strength.

14 See Brief for Appellees in Nos. 92–593, 92–767, p. 20 ("If the statutory prohibition against providing minorities 'less opportunity than other members of the electorate ... to elect representatives of their choice' is given its natural meaning, it cannot be violated by a single-member district plan that assures minority groups voting control over numbers of districts that are numerically proportional to their population in the area where presence of the three Gingles preconditions has been established").

The parties dispute whether the relevant figure is the minority group's share of the population, or of some subset of the population, such as those who are eligible to vote, in that they are United States citizens, over 18 years of age, and not registered at another address (as students and members of the military often are). Because we do not elevate this proportion to the status of a magic parameter, and because it is not dispositive here, we do not resolve that dispute. See supra, at 2655–2656.

15 See generally J.M. Kousser, The Shaping of Southern Politics: Suffrage Restriction and the Establishment of the One–Party South, 1880–1910 (1974); Kousser, The Undermining of the First Reconstruction, Lessons for the Second, in Minority Vote Dilution 27 (C. Davidson ed. 1984); Hearings on the Extension of the Voting Rights Act before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., 1999–2022, 2115–2120 (1981).

16 The State might say, of course, that ostensibly "proportional" districting schemes that were nonetheless subject to diluting practices would not "assur[e]" minority voters their apparent voting power. But this answer would take us right back to a searching review of the factual totality, leaving the State's defensive rule without any particular utility.

17 So, too, the degree of probative value assigned to disproportionality, in a case where it is shown, will vary not only with the degree of disproportionality but with other factors as well. "[T]here is no indication that Congress intended to mandate a single, universally applicable standard for measuring undiluted minority voting strength, regardless of local conditions and regardless of the extent of past discrimination against minority voters in a particular State or political subdivision." Gingles, 478 U.S., at 94–95, 106 S.Ct., at 2789 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment).

18 The argument for proportionality statewide favors the State if it is based on the proportion of Hispanic citizens of voting age statewide. According to census data not available at the time of trial and thus not in the record, Hispanics constitute 7.15 percent of the citizen voting-age population of Florida, which corresponds to eight or nine Hispanic-majority House districts (120 ×7.15% = 8.58).

If instead one calculates the proportion of statewide Hispanic-majority House districts on the basis of total population or voting-age population, the result favors plaintiffs. Hispanics constitute 12.2 percent of the State's total population and 11.7 percent of the State's voting-age population, corresponding to 14 or 15 seats (120 × 12.2% = 14.64; 120 × 11.7% = 14.04). We need not choose among these calculations to decide these cases.

19 In the five districts wholly within Dade County, where Hispanics are concentrated, the voting-age population is 53.9 percent Hispanic and 13.5 percent black. Sixty percent of the districts are Hispanic majority (three out of five), and 20 percent are black majority (one out of five), so that each minority group protected by § 2 enjoys an effective voting majority in marginally more districts than proportionality would indicate (60 percent over 53.9; 20 percent over 13.5).

End of Document

KeyCite Yellow Flag - Negative Treatment
Distinguished by Perez v. Abbott, W.D.Tex., May 2, 2017

204 F.3d 1335
United States Court of Appeals,
Eleventh Circuit.

Brenda M. JOHNSON, William Guice, et al., Plaintiffs–Appellants,

v.

DeSOTO COUNTY BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS, R.V. Griffin, in his official capacity as chairperson of the DeSoto County Board of Commissioners, et al., Defendants–Appellees.

No. 98–3714.
|
March 3, 2000.

Synopsis
Black voters brought action alleging that at-large method of electing county school board and county commission violated Voting Rights Act and constitution. Following trial, the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida, No. 90-00366-CV-FTM-17, Anne C. Conway, J., entered judgment for defendants, and voters appealed. The Court of Appeals, Edmondson, Circuit Judge, held that: (1) evidence of population changes occurring after census was admissible despite defendants' stipulation and admissions that voters could establish required majority-minority district; (2) Act was not violated absent showing that black-majority district existed; and (3) voters failed toshow lack of equal political opportunity that was caused by county's electoral system, as required to establish constitutional claims.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes (14)

[1] Counties Nature and constitution in general

Evidence of population changes occurring after census was not barred by county defendants' pretrial stipulation and admissions that plaintiff black voters could establish required majority-minority district in support of claimed Voting Rights Act violation, since stipulation and admissions were based on and limited to census-year data, and plaintiffs were not unfairly prejudiced. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[2] Federal Civil Procedure Effect

The scope and effect of admissions, like the scope and effect of stipulations, is a matter for determination by the trial court, in the exercise of its broad discretion. Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rule 36, 28 U.S.C.A.

13 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Counties Nature and constitution in general

Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Post-census evidence derived from voter registration information was admissible in black voters' action alleging that methods of electing county school board and county commission violated Voting Rights Act, to rebut presumptive accuracy of census figures. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Election Law Presumptions and burden of proof

In action for violation of Voting Rights Act, continuing accuracy of census figures is presumed only until the party challenging the census data overcomes the presumption with competent evidence to the contrary; although a burden rests on the party challenging the continuing accuracy of the census to introduce evidence to the contrary, the burden to establish that the minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district remains, throughout the case, with the plaintiff. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Election Law Evidence

Whether evidence derived from voter registration figures is sufficiently reliable to be admitted and considered in an action brought under the Voting Rights Act is a determination in the discretion of the district court. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Counties Nature and constitution in general

Black voters failed to show existence of black-majority district in county as required to establish prima facie case of vote dilution under Voting Rights Act, even if such district would have been possible under most recent census figures, in view of evidence of population growth in county since census year, particularly outside of proposed black-majority district. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[7] Federal Courts Elections, voting, and political rights

Court of Appeals reviews for clear error district court's finding of no vote dilution in action brought under Voting Rights Act. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Counties Nature and constitution in general

Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Court did not impermissibly presume that voter registration mirrored population, in violation of rule governing presumptions, in action challenging at-large method of electing county school board and county commission under Voting Rights Act; any assumption made by defense expert that voter registration mirrored voting age population went to weight of testimony and was freely challengeable on cross-examination. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b); Fed.Rules Evid.Rule 301, 28 U.S.C.A.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Federal Courts "Clearly erroneous" standard of review in general

When reviewing for clear error, so long as the district court's findings are plausible, Court of Appeals may not reverse the district court even if it would have decided the case differently.

[10] Constitutional Law Intentional or purposeful action requirement

A facially neutral law is unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause only if a discriminatory impact can be traced to a discriminatory purpose. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Plaintiffs in both constitutional vote dilution cases and dilution cases under the Voting Rights Act must show that there is evidence that excluded groups have less opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect candidates of their choice. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 14, 15; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(b), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(b).

13 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Counties Nature and constitution in general

To establish a constitutional vote dilution claim, plaintiffs had to show that: (1) the county's black population lacked an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and elect candidates of its choice; (2) this inequality of opportunity resulted from the county's at-large voting scheme; and (3) a racially discriminatory purpose underlied the county's voting scheme. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 14, 15.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Constitutional Law Elections in general
Counties Nature and constitution in general
Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

At-large method of electing county school board and county commission did not dilute votes of black voters, in violation of their constitutional rights, absent showing that alternative system of districting could exist whereby black-minority vote could elect its preferred candidates, which was required to establish that alleged inequality of opportunity to participate in the political process and elect preferred candidates resulted from county's current electoral system. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 14, 15.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

To show that inequality of opportunity is caused by a particular electoral system, on claim of unconstitutional vote dilution, a plaintiff must establish that an alternative election scheme exists that would provide better access to the political process. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 14, 15.

12 Cases that cite this headnote

Attorneys and Law Firms

1337 Neil Bradley, Cristina Correia, ACLU Foundation, Inc., Atlanta, GA, for Plaintiffs–Appellants.

Robert M. Fournier, Sarasota, FL, for Defendants–Appellees.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida.

Before EDMONDSON and BIRCH, Circuit Judges, and OWENS[*], Senior District Judge.

Opinion

EDMONDSON, Circuit Judge:

Plaintiffs, black citizens of DeSoto County, brought suit, alleging that the current at-large method of electing the county school board and county commission unlawfully dilutes black-minority voting strength, under section 2 of the Voting Rights Act and the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. After a trial, the district court found that Plaintiffs had failed to prove vote dilution and entered judgment for Defendants. We affirm the judgment.

BACKGROUND

The DeSoto County commission and school board, pursuant to Florida law,[1] are each composed of five members. The members of each board, who serve four-year staggered terms, are required to live in five separate residency districts but are elected by an at-large, countywide vote. The elections are partisan, with a majority requirement in the primaries but not in the general election. No black person has ever run for a seat on the commission; only one has run (unsuccessfully) for the school board.

1338 At the time of the 1990 census, blacks comprised 15.6 percent of the county's total population and 13.7 percent of the total voting age population.[2] The county, however, contains a substantial nonvoting, mostly nonresident population, housed in a state prison and a state mental institution: few of the mental institution patients are county residents; and the inmates, convicted felons, cannot vote under Florida law. See Fla. Const. art. 6, § 4; Fla. Stat. § 97.041(2)(b). Removing these institutionalized members of the population from the total voting age population, blacks—in 1990—comprised only 11.8 percent of the potential voters in the county.

At trial, Plaintiffs' experts testified that, using 1990 census data, Plaintiffs could produce election plans for the county, consisting of five single-member districts for each board with blacks constituting a majority of the noninstitutionalized voting population in one of the districts. But Defendants introduced evidence that, because of changes in the black and white populations since 1990, the creation of a majority-black district was no longer possible in 1998. One of Defendants' experts compared the 1990 census data with 1991 voter registration data and calculated ratios of registered voters to voting age population in each proposed district; he then extrapolated, from 1998 voter registration data, the voting age population in 1998. From these calculations, he testified that blacks in 1998 could constitute only about 46 percent of the voting age population of Plaintiffs' proposed black-majority district. Another defense expert testified that considerable growth had occurred in the county since 1990, but not in the black population of the proposed black-majority district.[3]

Defendants also offered other evidence (not based on voter registration data) of the county's population growth. For example, a member of the county commission testified that, based on the commission's approval of new subdivisions, the southwest corner of the county was the major growth area: according to the witness, this area was not one with a high black population.

The district court entered judgment for Defendants, finding that Plaintiffs failed to establish their vote dilution claims. In particular, the district court found that Plaintiffs failed to show "discriminatory effects": failed to show that the county's at-large election system resulted in blacks having less opportunity to participate in the political process and elect candidates of their choice. Plaintiffs appeal.

THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT CLAIM

An electoral system violates section 2 of the Voting Rights Act if the system causes the members of a distinct racial group to "have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b). The Supreme Court has said that, to satisfy section 2's standard in a vote dilution case, plaintiffs must show (at a minimum) that: (1) "the minority group ... is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district;" (2) the minority group is politically cohesive; and (3) the white majority votes as a bloc sufficiently to defeat the minority group's preferred candidates. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2766, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). The district court, in this case, found that Plaintiffs failed to establish the first Gingles factor: "[W]hile the Plaintiffs demonstrated the existence of the first Gingles precondition as of 1990, the Defendants have established by a preponderance of the evidence that as of the date of trial it is no longer possible to create a minority- 1339 controlled district in DeSoto County." The district court, therefore, rejected Plaintiffs' statutory claim. Plaintiffs contend that the district court's finding that Plaintiffs failed to establish the first Gingles factor was error because the district court should have never considered Defendants' evidence of post–1990 population changes. We cannot accept Plaintiffs' contention.

A.

[1] Plaintiffs first contend that the district court should have excluded Defendants' evidence of post–1990 population changes because the evidence contradicted a stipulation and several admissions agreed to by Defendants before trial.

In 1991, Defendants admitted that Plaintiffs' proffered plans indeed created five single-member districts with one majority-black district.[4] And, in an April 1998 pretrial statement, the parties stipulated that Plaintiffs had drawn two electoral schemes with a black-majority district.[5] Defendants never amended these admissions or the stipulation. Based on the admissions and stipulation, Plaintiffs contend that Defendants' evidence of post-census changes is barred because Defendants conclusively admitted that Plaintiffs could establish the required majority-minority district.

Before filing the April pretrial statement, Defendants disclosed that they expected to call two expert witnesses at trial. On 1 May 1998, pursuant to the preexisting pretrial order, Defendants informed Plaintiffs that, given new 1998 voter registration data, Defendants' experts would challenge the continued validity of the 1990 census figures in their testimony. Defendants explained that their experts would testify that blacks, by 1998, were no longer sufficiently geographically concentrated to permit the creation of a black-majority district. After this disclosure, Plaintiffs filed a motion in limine to exclude Defendants' proffered evidence; the district court—after a hearing—denied the motion. Plaintiffs never moved for a continuance.

Defendants did not seek to amend or to withdraw the admissions or stipulation. Instead, Defendants argued that their evidence of population changes did not contradict Defendants' earlier admissions and stipulation because the admissions and stipulation were tied to and, thus, limited to the 1990 census figures. The district court agreed with Defendants. The district court found that the admissions and stipulation inherently were based on the use of 1990 census data.

The district court's conclusion that the pretrial stipulation was defined by the 1990 census data was no abuse of discretion.[6] See generally 1340 Pulliam v. Tallapoosa County Jail, 185 F.3d 1182, 1185 (11th Cir.1999) (noting that trial court's interpretation of pretrial order is reviewed for abuse of discretion). The trial court is in the best position to interpret the scope of stipulations in the pretrial statement. See Morrison v. Genuine Parts Co., 828 F.2d 708, 709 (11th Cir.1987) (noting that district court has broad discretion to decide whether to hold party to stipulation). We note that, in the April pretrial statement, Defendants expressly contended that Plaintiffs had not established the first Gingles factor because the 1990 census might not reflect the county's population in 1998. Therefore, in the light of the pretrial statement as a whole, the district court's decision that the stipulation was based on and limited to the 1990 census figures was not error.

Nor do we think the district court erred in construing the admissions as limited to the 1990 census.[7] We think, at the very least, ambiguity did exist about whether the admissions were absolute or limited to the 1990 census figures, figures which might or might not accurately describe the county's population at the time of trial.[8] See Woods v. Robb, 171 F.2d 539, 541–42 (5th Cir.1948). For example, one admission stated: "[I]n making [this] admission Defendants assume that Plaintiffs have accurately reported the figures for each of the districts.... If the figures shown in [the exhibit] turnout to be other than those Plaintiffs have shown, then Defendants reserve the right to supplement this answer accordingly." And, Plaintiffs' requests for admission specifically relied on exhibits created with figures from the 1990 census. See Rolscreen Co. v. Pella Prods. of St. Louis, Inc., 64 F.3d 1202, 1210 (8th Cir.1995) (noting that conclusive effect of admission 1341 "may not be appropriate where requests for admissions or the responses to them are subject to more than one interpretation" and that "[i]ssues change as a case develops, and the relevance of discovery responses is related to their context in the litigation").

[2] The scope and effect of admissions (like the scope and effect of stipulations) is a matter for determination by the trial court, in the exercise of its broad discretion.[9] Given the circumstances of this case, the district court did not abuse its discretion in interpreting the admissions and stipulation as limited to the 1990 census figures.

B.

[3] Plaintiffs also contend that, even if the admissions and stipulation did not bar the introduction of Defendants' post-census evidence, the district court erred in allowing Defendants' evidence to oppose the census figures.

[4] No one challenges the initial accuracy of the 1990 census; the trial, however, was in 1998. At trial, Defendants pointed to the lapse of time since the census and to the changed circumstances. The presumption is that census figures are continually accurate. See Valdespino v. Alamo Heights Indep. Sch. Dist., 168 F.3d 848, 853–54 (5th Cir.1999). But this presumption is not irrebuttable.[10] The continuing accuracy of census figures is presumed only until the party challenging the census data overcomes the presumption with competent evidence to the contrary. See id. Although a burden rests on the party challenging the continuing accuracy of the census to introduce evidence to the contrary, we stress that the burden to establish the first Gingles factor remains, throughout the case, with the plaintiff. See Gingles, 106 S.Ct. at 2764. We conclude that the district court did not err in considering non-census data.

Plaintiffs claim that the district court erred in considering non-census evidence based on voter registration figures because, Plaintiffs say, registration data is an inherently unreliable measure of voting age population and cannot be used to contradict census figures. First, we note that there is no per se rule against the use of voter registration data in voting rights cases.[11] Although the Supreme Court has 1342 written that voter registration data may be less probative than pure population data in voting cases, the Court has treated voter registration evidence as credible and as reliable. See Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 1297, 16 L.Ed.2d 376 (1966). We also have recognized the competence of this kind of data. See Wyche v. Madison Parish Police Jury, 635 F.2d 1151, 1161–62 (5th Cir.1981). Like most evidence presented by expert testimony, we think its admissibility has to be determined on a case-by-case basis by the district court. See generally Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S.Ct. 2786, 2796–98, 125 L.Ed.2d 469 (1993). And, this court has previously said, in a voting rights case, that statistical evidence derived from a sampling method, using reliable statistical techniques, is admissible on the question of determining the relevant population. See Negron v. City of Miami Beach, Fla., 113 F.3d 1563, 1570 (11th Cir.1997). We see no reason why the evidence presented in this case —calculations of the county's population in 1998 derived from voter registration information—should be subject to a different analysis.

[5] Whether evidence derived from voter registration figures is sufficiently reliable to be admitted and considered is a determination in the discretion of the district court. See generally Allison v. McGhan Medical Corp., 184 F.3d 1300, 1306 (11th Cir.1999) (citing General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 118 S.Ct. 512, 517, 139 L.Ed.2d 508 (1997)) (discussing review of admissibility of expert testimony). If the evidence is admissible, that voter registration data might not be as reliable as some other measures of population goes to the weight of the evidence, but does not preclude use of the figures by the district court.

Here, the district judge was presented with expert testimony, from both sides, on the reliability of Defendants' evidence. Defendants' expert spoke to the reliability of the registration data for the county, pointing out the lack of obstacles to registration. He stated that he believed that registration data would not underrepresent the black population in 1998 because the passage of the Motor Voter law,[12] if anything, would increase registration rates since 1991.[13] The district court's receipt and consideration of evidence on the demographic changes in the county was no abuse of discretion. The kinds of evidence introduced in this case are not unfit for the purpose of challenging the continuing accuracy of census data.

C.

[6] [7] [8] Next, we inquire whether the district court erred in finding no vote dilution for the section 2 claim in this case. We review the district court's finding of no vote dilution for clear error only. See Gingles, 106 S.Ct. at 2781. In the present case, Plaintiffs, using the 1990 census, proffered (at best) majority-minority districts with a black voting age majority of only about 54–57 percent. No one disputes 1343 that there has been substantial population growth in the county since the 1990 census. Defendants showed that a considerable amount of that growth has been within the white population. Based on the post-census population data derived from voter registration figures, Defendants' experts concluded that the creation of a black-majority district was not feasible in 1998: (1) movement of the district lines would include more whites in the district, thus decreasing the black majority; and (2) the black population growth was geographically distant from the proposed district and could not be included to make a black-majority district.[14] Defendants also offered other evidence, not derived from voter registration figures, of the population changes and growth in the county.

In Valdespino, the Fifth Circuit upheld a district court's finding that the plaintiffs had failed to establish the first Gingles factor. 168 F.3d at 856. There, even though, according to the 1990 census, the plaintiffs could create a majority-minority district, the Valdespino defendants presented evidence, at the 1997 trial, that demographic changes since the 1990 census had made the creation of such a district impossible. The defendants' presentation included evidence that a large apartment complex in the district had closed and reopened with fewer residents, while, at the same time, residential development outside the district increased. See id. at 850–51. The Fifth Circuit concluded that the district court did not err in deciding that the defendants' figures demonstrated sufficient post-census demographic changes to raise considerable doubt that a majority-minority district could still be created and in deciding that the plaintiffs had not carried their burden of proof. See id. at 854, 856.

[9] The record, in this case, presents ample evidence of population growth in the county since 1990, particularly outside of Plaintiffs' proposed district. And, even using the 1990 census, Plaintiffs' proffered black-majority district was not one that was overwhelmingly black. Thus, we cannot say that the district court erred in this finding that Defendants' evidence undercut the presumption that the 1990 census reflected the truth about the county's population and population distribution in 1998.[15] On this record, the district court (considering all the evidence including the 1990 census) did not clearly err in finding and in concluding that Plaintiffs failed to show the existence of the black-majority district needed to establish their prima facie case of vote dilution.[16]

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CLAIMS

[10] Plaintiffs contend that, even if their statutory claim fails, the district court erred in rejecting their constitutional vote dilution claims.[17] Plaintiffs point out 1344 that the district court found that a discriminatory purpose underlies the county's current at-large voting scheme. And, Plaintiffs assert that the record shows that the county's black population lacks an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and elect candidates of its choice. Plaintiffs argue that they, therefore, have sufficiently established claims under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.[18] We disagree.

[11] As an initial matter, we doubt that any plaintiff, challenging an electoral system like DeSoto County's, can establish a constitutional vote dilution claim where his section 2 claim has failed. Plaintiffs say that, after a claimant has proved discriminatory intent, he need only produce minimal evidence of injury resulting from the challenged electoral scheme to prevail under the Constitution. But, the Supreme Court, historically, has articulated the same general standard, governing the proof of injury, in both section 2 and constitutional vote dilution cases; plaintiffs, in both cases, must show that "there is evidence that excluded groups have 'less opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect candidates of their choice.' " Compare Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 2809, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986) (quoting Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 3279, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1982)), with Gingles, 106 S.Ct. at 2763, and 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b). The pertinent issues seem the same (or almost the same) in both cases. And, even if the standards are not completely identical in application, we know that section 2 was intended to be more permissive than the constitutional standard. See Solomon, 899 F.2d at 1015 (Kravitch, J., specially concurring); see also Lee County Branch of NAACP v. City of Opelika, 748 F.2d 1473, 1478 n. 7 (11th Cir.1984) ("[I]f the plaintiffs cannot prevail under the generally more easily proved 'results' standard of section 2, it is unlikely that they could prevail on their constitutional claims in any event."). The parties have cited (and we have found) no case in which a circuit court has concluded that an at-large or multi-member-district electoral system, although not in violation of section 2, unconstitutionally dilutes minority voting strength.[19] In the absence of Supreme Court direction, therefore, we question, as a legal proposition, whether vote dilution can be established under the Constitution when the pertinent record has not proved vote dilution 1345 under the more permissive section 2. But, we need not resolve this question today.

[12] [13] Even if we assume that it is possible, as a matter of law, to prevail on a constitutional claim where no section 2 violation can be in fact established, Plaintiffs here have not proved their constitutional claim. Briefly stated, to establish a constitutional vote dilution claim, Plaintiffs must show that: (1) the county's black population lacks an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and elect candidates of its choice; (2) this inequality of opportunity results from the county's at-large voting scheme; and (3) a racially discriminatory purpose underlies the county's voting scheme.[20] Lucas v. Townsend, 967 F.2d 549, 551 (11th Cir.1992); see also Bandemer, 106 S.Ct. at 2809. We will accept, for the purposes of this appeal, the district court's finding that Plaintiffs have shown discriminatory intent.[21] And, we will assume, for the sake of argument, that Plaintiffs' evidence demonstrates the absence of equal opportunity.[22] Plaintiffs, nonetheless, failed to establish their constitutional claims because the record fails to show that the inequality of opportunity results from the county's current electoral system. In other words, Plaintiffs have failed to establish causation.

[14] That a plaintiff, claiming a violation of his voting rights under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, must show that an injury is caused by the government conduct he seeks to challenge is hardly a novel proposition. See Kirksey v. Bd. of Supervisors of Hinds County, 554 F.2d 139, 148 (5th Cir.1977) (inquiring whether reapportionment plan "will in fact have the effect of perpetuating the denial of access to the political process that was proved by plaintiffs to exist"); Personnel Adm'r of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2293, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979) 1346 (requiring that claimant show discriminatory impact traceable to discriminatory purpose); see also Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 104 S.Ct. 3315, 3327, 82 L.Ed.2d 556 (1984) (requiring equal protection plaintiff to show causation as element of standing). To show that inequality of opportunity is caused by a particular electoral system, a plaintiff must establish that "an alternative election scheme exists that would provide better access to the political process." Burton v. City of Belle Glade, 178 F.3d 1175, 1199 (11th Cir.1999); see also Reno v. Bossier Parish Sch. Bd., 520 U.S. 471, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 1498, 137 L.Ed.2d 730 (1997); Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 2585, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994); Nipper v. Smith, 39 F.3d 1494, 1533 (11th Cir.1994) (en banc).[23] As we have explained, "[I]f a minority cannot establish that an alternative election scheme exists that would provide better access to the political process, then the challenged voting practice is not responsible for the claimed injury." Burton, 178 F.3d at 1199; see also Gingles, 106 S.Ct. at 2766 (explaining if first Gingles factor is not shown, then "the multi-member form of the district cannot be responsible for minority voters' inability to elect its candidates").

Here, Plaintiffs failed to make the requisite showing of causation: Plaintiffs did not establish that an alternative system of districting could exist whereby the black-minority vote could elect its preferred candidates. The district court found that the creation of a black-majority district, in 1998, was not feasible. Plaintiffs, on appeal, argue that a black-majority district is not required; according to Plaintiffs, a "black-influence district," where a substantial black minority is coupled with sufficient white cross-over voting so that the black minority in fact can elect candidates of its choice, is sufficient. We, however, need not decide whether Plaintiffs' "influence district" theory is correct.[24] Plaintiffs never argued this theory to the district court.

Plaintiffs have failed to establish causation. Plaintiffs' contention that the district court erred in rejecting their constitutional claims, therefore, must fail.[25]

CONCLUSION

The district court dealt with the evidence without error. The case was fully tried. The district court was the finder of fact. The district court did not err in determining that Plaintiffs showed no lack of equal political opportunity that was caused by the county's electoral system. Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden. The judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.

All Citations

204 F.3d 1335, 142 Ed. Law Rep. 59, 54 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 246, 13 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. C 427

Footnotes

* Honorable Wilbur D. Owens, Jr., Senior U.S. District Judge for the Middle District of Georgia, sitting by designation.

1 See Fla. Const. art. 8, § 1(e); Fla. Stat. § 100 et seq.

2 The parties do not dispute that, for the purposes of this litigation, the appropriate category of voters is blacks.

3 This expert plotted on a map the location of each black registered voter and found that, since 1991, more black registered voters were living outside the proposed district, showing a dispersion of the county's black population.

4 For example, one admission stated: "Defendants admit that the plaintiffs five single-member district plan ... is one which has a maximum deviation of 6.2% and that the plan contains one district in which African Americans make up a majority of the voting age population."

5 In the April pretrial statement, the parties stipulated:

> Plaintiffs have drawn an election plan for De Soto County containing 5 single member districts, which includes one district in which African–Americans are 54.37 percent of the population 18 years of age and over and which has a total deviation of 0.16% from the "ideal" district. (i.e. a district containing exactly one fifth of the county's total population). Plaintiffs have also drawn an election plan for De Soto County containing 5 single member districts, which includes one district in which African–Americans are 57.33 percent of the population 18 years of age and over and which has a total deviation of 6.2 % from the "ideal" district.

The pretrial statement, however, also stated: "Defendants do not concede that plaintiffs have met or will be able to meet the first Gingles precondition.... The census figures are now eight years old and may no longer accurately reflect the present population percentages."

6 Plaintiffs argue that the district court's construction of the stipulation amounts to an amendment of the pretrial order and, therefore, is subject to the manifest injustice standard of Fed.R.Civ.P. 16(e). We disagree. The district court did not amend the pretrial statement, but construed it. Also, Defendants' disclosure of their experts' new testimony was submitted pursuant to the pretrial order.

7 Plaintiffs argue that the district court's construction of the admissions amounts to withdrawal and is subject to the unfair prejudice standard of Fed.R.Civ.P. 36. We do not agree. Defendants did not argue for, nor did the district court allow, withdrawal; the district court just construed the scope of the admission.

Plaintiffs in this case were not unfairly prejudiced by the introduction of Defendants' evidence of post–1990 population change. Defendants' experts were specifically identified in the 1 May disclosure: fifty days before trial. And, Plaintiffs did depose one of Defendants' experts before trial about the new evidence. Cf. Bergemann v. United States, 820 F.2d 1117, 1121 (10th Cir.1987) (finding no prejudice where party knew issue was contested). When the 1998 pretrial statement was filed, Plaintiffs already expected to call an expert to testify about the feasibility of creating a majority-black district. And, at trial, Plaintiffs presented an expert who, in fact, challenged Defendants' new evidence. Plaintiffs have not shown that they were unfairly prejudiced by having to respond to Defendants' new evidence. See Smith v. First Nat'l Bank of Atlanta, 837 F.2d 1575, 1577–78 (11th Cir.1988).

Also, if Plaintiffs had been surprised, they should have moved for a continuance. This court has repeatedly said that "the remedy for coping with surprise is not to seek reversal after an unfavorable verdict, but a request for continuance at the time the surprise occurs." United States v. Battle, 173 F.3d 1343, 1350 (11th Cir.1999) (citations omitted). Plaintiffs requested no continuance.

Plaintiffs also contend that Defendants should have amended formally their admissions. Plaintiffs cite American Auto. Ass'n v. AAA Legal Clinic of Jefferson Crooke, P.C., 930 F.2d 1117, 1119 (5th Cir.1991), and Williams v. City of Dothan, Ala., 818 F.2d 755, 762, modified on other grounds on denial of reh'g by 828 F.2d 13 (11th Cir.1987), for the proposition that the district court is not free to reject an admission because it finds more "credible evidence." These cases are materially different from this case. In both cases, the court simply disregarded an admission; here, the court reasonably construed Defendants' admission as limited to the 1990 census figures.

8 Plaintiffs themselves characterized Defendants' admissions as tied to and limited to the validity of the 1990 census figures: "[D]efendants have admitted that 'African–Americans in DeSoto county are sufficiently geographically concentrated such that utilizing 1990 census population information, a single member district plan can be drawn (3)27' " (emphasis added). And, at least one admission stated: "Defendants' answer is subject to the further qualification that Defendants are not admitting that Plaintiffs have demonstrated that they can satisfy any of the three 'preconditions' of [Gingles]."

9 We are aware that the First Circuit, in one case, reviewed de novo a district court's interpretation of an admission. See Talley v. United States, 990 F.2d 695, 698–99 (1st Cir.1993) (stating that construction of documents is reviewed de novo). Because we review a district court's construction of stipulations and a district court's evidentiary rulings for abuse of discretion, we decline to adopt the standard of review that the First Circuit used. See, e.g., Pulliam, 185 F.3d at 1185; Ad–Vantage Tel. Directory Consultants, Inc. v. GTE Directories Corp., 37 F.3d 1460, 1463 (11th Cir.1994); see also Milton v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 33 Cal.App.3d 133, 138, 108 Cal.Rptr. 726 (Cal.Ct.App.1973) (noting that trial court has broad discretion to determine relevancy and scope of admission).

10 In fact, the Supreme Court has acknowledged that census data are not perfect and are often outdated. See Abrams v. Johnson, 521 U.S. 74, 117 S.Ct. 1925, 1940, 138 L.Ed.2d 285 (1997); see also Kirkpatrick v. Preisler, 394 U.S. 526, 89 S.Ct. 1225, 1231, 22 L.Ed.2d 519 (1969) (other data may be considered in voting rights cases).

11 The Supreme Court has never precluded the use of voter registration data. See Rollins v. Fort Bend Indep. Sch. Dist., 89 F.3d 1205, 1219 (5th Cir.1996) (noting that Supreme Court has not "held that voter registration is irrelevant: it is simply not the sole criterion"). And, neither have we. See, e.g., Negron v. City of Miami Beach, Fla., 113 F.3d 1563, 1568 (11th Cir.1997).

Plaintiffs cite a special concurrence in Solomon v. Liberty County, Fla., 899 F.2d 1012, 1018 (11th Cir.1990) (en banc) (Kravitch, J., specially concurring), for the proposition that voter registration figures should not be considered in the instant case. The Solomon en banc court, however, decided merely that the three Gingles factors had been established because, despite being only 45 percent of registered voters, the evidence showed that the minority population in the district was 51 percent of the voting age population. Id. at 1013 (per curiam). Moreover, Judge Kravitch never said that voter registration data was per se inadmissible evidence; she merely noted that the relevant criteria to consider is population, not the number of registered voters. See id. at 1018; see also Johnson v. DeGrandy, 512 U.S. 997, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 2656, 129

L.Ed.2d 775 (1994) (considering population as relevant criterion). In this case, Defendants and the district court, in fact, focused on the correct criteria: population. The use of evidence derived from voter registration data to show population is not, in itself, impermissible.

12 The Motor Voter law was enacted in 1993, in part, to increase the voter registration rates among minorities by allowing citizens to register at more places, including at driver's licensing facilities. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973gg(b)(1) (stating that purpose of Act is "to establish procedures that will increase the number of eligible citizens who register to vote").

13 Defendants' expert also observed the 66.1 percent registration rate among blacks within the proposed black-majority district (compared to the countywide white registration rate of 63.5 percent). Plaintiffs point out that black voter registration dropped in 1994, but Defendants' expert explained that the 1991 figures were based on inactive and active voter registration roles, whereas the 1994 figures were based purely on active registered voters.

14 Plaintiffs contend that the court impermissibly presumed that voter registration mirrored population, in violation of Fed.R.Evid. 301. We find this argument to be without merit. Any assumption made by Defendants' expert that voter registration mirrored voting age population went to the weight of the testimony and was freely challengeable on cross-examination.

15 At the motion in limine hearing, the district court, concluding that evidence of current population numbers would be relevant, said these words: "And I'm not saying we ignore the 1990 census." The 1990 census figures are facts. As evidence, they—even after Defendants introduced contrary evidence—retained probative force and could support inferences on the part of the fact finder. But the district court did not err in weighing the census figures against Defendants' evidence.

16 When reviewing for clear error: "As long as the district court's findings are plausible, we may not reverse the district court even if we would have decided the case differently." United States v. Engelhard Corp., 126 F.3d 1302, 1305 (11th Cir.1997); see generally Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 1511, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985) ("Where there are two permissible views of the evidence, the factfinder's choice between them cannot be clearly erroneous.").

17 Whether vote dilution is cognizable at all under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments is uncertain. See Burton v. City of Belle Glade, 178 F.3d 1175, 1187 n. 9 (11th Cir.1999).

18 Plaintiffs initially argue that, because the district court found a discriminatory purpose behind the county's electoral system, they have shown the existence of a de jure segregation system and, therefore, have established a claim under United States v. Fordice, 505 U.S. 717, 112 S.Ct. 2727, 120 L.Ed.2d 575 (1992). We have noted previously that no court has applied Fordice outside of the education setting, Burton v. City of Belle Glade, 178 F.3d 1175, 1190 (11th Cir.1999), and we decline to do so for the first time in this case. Moreover, the government's discriminatory intent alone, without a causal connection between the intent and some cognizable injury to Plaintiffs, cannot entitle Plaintiffs to relief in this case: a facially neutral law "is unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause only if [a discriminatory] impact can be traced to a discriminatory purpose." Personnel Adm'r of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2293, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979) (emphasis added). Therefore, for the reasons stated in this opinion, even if Fordice applies outside of the education setting, Plaintiffs cannot prevail on a Fordice-based theory in this case.

19 In Holder v. Hall, the Supreme Court, finding no section 2 violation, "remanded for consideration of respondent's constitutional [vote dilution] claim." 512 U.S. 874, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 2588, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994). Plaintiffs cite this result for the proposition that the statute and the Constitution are not coextensive for vote dilution claims. We do not think this statement bears the weight Plaintiffs have placed on it. In Holder, the circuit court originally did not address the constitutional claims because it concluded that section 2 vote dilution had been proved. Id. at 2585. Because the circuit court had not addressed the issue, it was proper for the Supreme Court to remand rather than consider an issue not considered by the circuit court. See Duignan v. United States, 274 U.S. 195, 47 S.Ct. 566, 568, 71 L.Ed. 996 (1927) ("This court sits as a court of review. It is only in exceptional cases coming here from the federal courts that questions not pressed or passed upon below are reviewed.").

20 We recognize that, in prior cases, we have said that, to prevail on a constitutional vote dilution claim, a plaintiff must show the existence of "discriminatory effects" and "a racially discriminatory purpose chargeable to the state." Lucas v.

Townsend, 967 F.2d 549, 551 (11th Cir.1992). Our articulation today of the constitutional standard does not alter the plaintiff's burden. We are not changing the law; we are explaining it. Case law makes apparent that the "discriminatory effects" requirement encompasses both inequality of opportunity and a causation element. See id. (requiring that discriminatory effect "results from" intentionally discriminatory electoral scheme); see also Kirksey v. Bd. of Supervisors of Hinds County, 554 F.2d 139, 148 (5th Cir.1977) (same). Causation is also implicit in the term "discriminatory effects." See Random House Dictionary of the English Language 622 (2d ed. unabridged 1987) (defining effect as "something that is produced by an agency or cause; result; consequence"). We think, however, that, to avoid confusion, viewing causation and the existence of unequal opportunity as distinct elements (instead of merging these two concepts into a single "discriminatory effects" requirement) is the better approach: it promotes clarity.

When the district court, in this case, found no "discriminatory effects," we understand the court to have found no causation.

21 Defendants dispute the district court's finding of discriminatory intent. Given our disposition of this appeal, however, we need not address Defendants' contention.

22 Plaintiffs assert that their evidence, of (1) the black population's inability to elect consistently candidates of its choice and (2) the deterrence of blacks from seeking office in the county, is sufficient to establish that the black population lacks equal political opportunity. We need not decide, however, whether these factors (or either factor alone) are sufficient to establish a lack of equal opportunity; we assume that Plaintiffs have shown an inequality of opportunity. But, we do observe that Plaintiffs' argument about the deterrence of black candidacies is, in this case, nothing more than a variation of the argument that the county's black population cannot consistently elect the candidates of its choice. If the record indeed establishes that black candidates are deterred from seeking office in DeSoto County, it is only because they (according to Plaintiffs) cannot win. And, if black candidates cannot win, it (according to Plaintiffs' theory) is only because the black-minority vote, under the present system, is insufficient to elect them. For all practical purposes, therefore, Plaintiffs' deterrence theory comes down to the black minority's alleged inability to elect candidates of its choice.

23 "The early development of our voting rights jurisprudence in [equal protection] cases provided the basis for our analysis of vote dilution under the amended § 2...." Holder, 114 S.Ct. at 2592 n. 1 (Thomas, J., concurring in judgment); see also League of United Latin American Citizens v. Clements, 999 F.2d 831, 851 (5th Cir.1993) ("[T]he 1982 amendments to § 2 were intended to 'codify' the results test as employed in White and Whitcomb."). Therefore, we are informed in our inquiry by prior decisions construing section 2.

24 The Supreme Court continually has declined to decide whether the "influence district" theory is sound. See, e.g., Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1155, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993).

25 Plaintiffs also assert that the district court erred in considering Plaintiffs' two proposed districting plans (one with less deviation than the other, but covering similar areas of black concentration) as similar. The district court noted that, at trial, the parties focused on the district with less deviation. The district court also found that the black voting age population constituted a district majority in neither districting plan. We find no error in the district court's analysis. See Davis v. Chiles, 139 F.3d 1414, 1418 n. 8 (11th Cir.1998) (discussing proposals together where they generally raise same issues).

98 N.Y.2d 155, 773 N.E.2d 490, 746 N.Y.S.2d 125,
168 Ed. Law Rep. 438, 2002 N.Y. Slip Op. 04669

Kenneth P. LaValle et al., Appellants,

v.

Carl T. Hayden et al., as Regents of the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York, et al., Respondents.

Court of Appeals of New York
2, 66
Argued April 24, 2002;

Decided June 6, 2002

CITE TITLE AS: LaValle v Hayden

SUMMARY

Appeal, on constitutional grounds, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the Second Judicial Department, entered April 30, 2001, which affirmed so much of an order and judgment (one paper) of the Supreme Court (Alan D. Oshrin, J.; op 182 Misc 2d 409), entered in Suffolk County, as granted a motion by defendants for summary judgment dismissing the complaint, denied a cross motion by plaintiffs for a declaration that the joint ballot provisions set forth in Education Law § 202 governing the election of members of the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York violate the State Constitution, and declared that those provisions do not violate article XI of the State Constitution.

LaValle v Hayden, 282 AD2d 716, affirmed.

HEADNOTE

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Election of Members of Board of Regents by Legislature

The joint ballot provisions of Education Law § 202 (1), (2), providing for an alternative means of electing members of the State Board of Regents, where the Senate and Assembly fail to elect by concurrent resolution, do not violate NY Constitution, article XI, §§ 1 and 2. The Constitution gives the Legislature control over the regents, and for more than two centuries the joint ballot has been an integral part of the procedure for selecting regents. The quintessential "legislative power," its lawmaking power, unlike the power to elect regents, is directly conferred to and vested in the Senate and the Assembly by the Constitution. The constitutional lawmaking prescription does not, however, negate or undermine the Legislature's ability to convene as a unicameral body, in a distinct, nonlawmaking capacity. The Legislature--whether functioning bicamerally, or sitting in joint session and acting unicamerally-- is nevertheless the "legislature" as it is understood in article XI.

TOTAL CLIENT SERVICE LIBRARY REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Schools §§ 6-9.

McKinney's, Education Law § 202 (1), (2); NY Const, art XI, §§ 1, 2. 156

NY Jur 2d, Schools, Universities, and Colleges §§ 3, 575, 576, 579.

ANNOTATION REFERENCES

See ALR Index under Schools and Education.

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Hamburger, Maxson & Yaffe, LLP, Melville (Richard Hamburger, David N. Yaffe and Lane T. Maxson of counsel), for appellants.

I. Because the Constitution vests the Legislature with exclusive and plenary power over the regents, nothing short of a concurrent vote of both houses of the Legislature is constitutionally sufficient to elect regents. (Matter of Anderson v Krupsak, 40 NY2d 397; People ex rel. Jackson v Potter, 47 NY 375; People v Carroll, 3 NY2d 686; Newell v People, 7 NY 9; Matter of Taylor v Sise, 33 NY2d 357; Matter of Hurowitz v Board of Elections of City of N.Y., 53 NY2d 531; Gardner v Ginther, 232 App Div 296, 257 NY 578; Union Free School Dist. No. 22 of Towns of Hempstead & N. Hempstead v Wilson, 281 App Div 419; Matter of Board of Educ., Cent School Dist. No. 1 of Town of Grand Is. v Helsby, 64 Misc 2d 473, 37 AD2d 493, 32 NY2d 660; Franklin Natl. Bank of Long Is. v Clark, 26 Misc 2d 724.) II. The statutes and established practice of the Legislature preceding the enactment of the 1894 Constitution demonstrate that each and every "appointment" of a regent was performed only by the "Legislature" acting bicamerally. Therefore, any constitutionalization of existing law effectuated by the 1894 State Constitution necessarily confirms that the election of regents cannot be performed by the unicameral action of the Assembly and Senate. III. The Legislature may not delegate to a unicameral body its constitutionally conferred power to appoint regents bicamerally. (Franklin Natl. Bank of Long Is. v Clark, 26 Misc 2d 724; People ex rel. Everson v Lorillard, 135 NY 285; Dorst v Pataki, 90 NY2d 696; Matter of Levine v Whalen, 39 NY2d 510.)

Cravath, Swaine & Moore, New York City (Frederick A.O. Schwarz, Jr., and Mary Eaton of counsel), and Kathy A. Ahearn, Albany, for Carl T. Hayden and others, respondents. I. NY Constitution article XI constitutionalizes election by joint ballot. (People ex rel. Joyce v Brundage, 78 NY 403.) II. NY Constitution article XI does not require appointment by concurrent resolution. (Newell v People, 7 NY 9; Board of Educ., Levittown Union Free School Dist. v Nyquist, 57 NY2d 27; Matter 157 of Taylor v Sise, 33 NY2d 357; Matter of Anderson v Krupsak, 40 NY2d 397; People v Molyneux, 40 NY 113.) III. NY Constitution article III governs the legislative power, not the power of appointment. (Lanza v Wagner, 11 NY2d 317; Shanker v Regents of Univ. of State of N.Y., 27 AD2d 84, 19 NY2d 951; Matter of Dunkel v Rogers, 279 App Div 44; Immigration & Naturalization Serv. v Chadha, 462 US 919.) IV. The presumption of constitutionality should be applied in favor of upholding Education Law § 202. (Matter of McGee v Korman, 70 NY2d 225; Shanker v Regents of Univ. of State of N.Y., 27 AD2d 84; Benson Realty Corp. v Beame, 50 NY2d 994.)

Eliot Spitzer, Attorney General, New York City (Melanie L. Oxhorn, Caitlin J. Halligan and Michael S. Belohlavek of counsel), for State of New York and another, respondents. Education Law § 202's alternative joint ballot provisions do not violate article XI of the State Constitution because they do not delegate the Legislature's implied power to appoint regents, and because a delegation of that power would not be improper in any event. (National Assn. of Ind. Insurers v State of New York, 89 NY2d 950; People v Tichenor, 89 NY2d 769, 522 US 918; Brady v State of New York, 80 NY2d 596, 509 US 905; Anthony v Town of Brookhaven, 190 AD2d 21; McPherson v Blacker, 146 US 1; Cohen v Cronin, 39 NY2d 42; Matter of Anderson v Krupsak, 40 NY2d 397; Marino v Weprin, 155 Misc 2d 276; Immigration & Naturalization Serv. v Chadha, 462 US 919; Matter of Koenig v Flynn, 258 NY 292.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Ciparick, J.

The question presented by this appeal is whether the joint ballot provisions of Education Law § 202, providing for an alternative means of electing members of the State Board of Regents, where the Senate and Assembly fail to elect by concurrent resolution, violate article XI, §§ 1 and 2--the Education Article--of the New York State Constitution. We say that they do not.

Plaintiffs Kenneth P. LaValle, a State Senator, and David H. Pearl, a retired teacher, commenced this action in Supreme Court seeking declaratory and injunctive relief against defendants, 14 individually named regents, the Board of Regents of the State of New York, Alexander F. Treadwell, the Secretary of State, and the State of New York. The underlying facts are undisputed. The Education Law provides guidelines 158 for the election of state regents.[*] The Legislature must first attempt to elect regents by concurrent resolution. When the Senate and Assembly are deadlocked, the Legislature may use a "joint ballot" to elect regents. The individually named regent defendants were elected, on various dates, pursuant to the contested joint ballot method. Plaintiffs sought to enjoin defendant regents from assuming office, and additionally sought a declaration that the joint ballot provisions of Education Law § 202 (1) and (2) are unconstitutional. Following commencement of the action, defendants promptly moved to dismiss the action pursuant to CPLR 3211. Plaintiffs cross-moved for summary judgment. Supreme Court denied plaintiffs' motion, and granted defendants' motions dismissing the complaint. The Appellate Division affirmed. Plaintiffs now appeal as of right pursuant to CPLR 5601 (b) (1).

Plaintiffs contend that joint ballot elections violate the constitutional delegation of legislative authority over regents expressly provided in article XI, §§ 1 and 2 of the State Constitution. Specifically, plaintiffs argue that the unicameral legislative body attendant to the joint ballot does not constitute the "legislature" as required in article XI, § 2 because only the Senate and Assembly acting bicamerally constitute the "legislature" within the meaning of the Constitution. In light of the validated and extensive historical use of the joint ballot, at both the federal and state levels, plaintiffs' argument necessarily fails.

I.

The University of the State of New York is a corporate institution with roots that trace back to colonial America (159 NY Const, art XI, § 2; L 1784, ch 51). The University's historical underpinnings provide useful insight into the resolution of this appeal.

In the wake of the Revolutionary War, a newly minted State Legislature sought to provide for a pervasive state education system. In 1784, the Legislature established the University of the State of New York (see L 1784, ch 51). The University derives from a colonial remnant, the "Governors of the College of the Province of New York in the city of New York in America" (id.). The College was specifically structured as a corporate entity, charged with overseeing local education. Apparently satisfied with the colonial model, the Legislature transferred "all the rights priviledges and immunities" of the former institution to the University (id.). The 1784 statute expressly continued the "corporate" institution King George II initiated in colonial America, transforming the colonial "college" into a functioning "university" (see id.).

Upon the creation of the University, the Legislature concomitantly created a governing body--the Board of Regents--empowered to maintain and secure the University's advancement (id.; see also Shanker v Regents of Univ. of State of N.Y., 27 AD2d 84, 85 [3d Dept 1966], affd on op below 19 NY2d 951 [1967]). The regents were statutorily endowed with the "full power and authority to ordain and make ordinances and bye laws for the government of the several colleges" and to, among other things, "found schools and colleges" (L 1784, ch 51). Essentially, the regents governed and directed all aspects of the University's business.

Originally, the individual members of the Board of Regents were themselves named in the text of the statute. In effect, the enactment itself represented a legislative election of individual regents. In total, the 1784 statute named 24 individual regents, as well as a number of ex officio members statutorily granted a position on the board. Additionally, this statute granted the Governor a limited power to fill board vacancies as they occurred. This gubernatorial appointment method was ultimately replaced by the "joint ballot" in 1787.

Under the Articles of Confederation, each state was represented in Congress by "delegates" (Articles of Confederation art V). Article V expressly noted that delegates were to be appointed "in such manner as the legislatures of each state shall direct." New York chose the joint ballot. Article XXX of the first Constitution of New York, 1777, governed the appointment 160 of "Delegates to ... Congress." Article XXX provided that delegates were to "be chosen by the joint ballot of the [state] senators and members of assembly so met together." The Legislature, in 1787, ultimately applied this same method to regents, abolishing the gubernatorial power to fill vacancies, and replacing it with the same process used to elect delegates--the joint ballot (L 1787, ch 82).

The new act provided that regent vacancies were to be "supplied by the legislature in the manner in which delegates to Congress are appointed" (L 1787, ch 82). Delegates were still elected in accordance with the joint ballot provision articulated in article XXX of the Constitution of 1777. Interest in the perpetual statutory election system sanctioned by the Legislature during the initial years of the regents' existence began to wane, and ultimately it was replaced when the Legislature enacted constitutional provisions concerning the University and the regents.

Article IX of the Constitution of 1894 expressly endorsed the establishment of the University and the regents. Two years prior, the United States Supreme Court, in McPherson v Blacker (146 US 1 [1892]), indirectly approved the use of the joint ballot as a valid and constitutional means of electing state electors. When New York's constitutional convention convened in 1894, the delegates were well aware of the use of the joint ballot on both the federal and state levels.

Article IX of the Constitution of 1894 stated that "the Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this State may be educated" (NY Const of 1894, art IX, § 1). It embodied most of the prior statutory ideals and framework governing election of the regents and maintenance of the University. Article IX, § 2 "continued" the University, granting sole control of the University and regents to the Legislature. Implied in this grant of authority was the power to elect regents. Article IX was subsequently renumbered and transposed, in its entirety, to what is currently article XI of the State Constitution. Thus, for more than two centuries the joint ballot has been an integral part of the procedure for selecting regents. The framers of the 1894 Constitution knew this when they adopted the predecessor to article XI, § 2, "crystaliz[ing] into a constitutional mandate the settled policy of the State" (1894 Report of Comm on Educ and Funds Pertaining Thereto, at 5, reprinted in 1894 Doc and Reports of NY Constitutional Convention, at 118). Plaintiffs' argument that this "policy" was 161 merely intended to maintain the Legislature's authority over the regents, is too constricted. The better view is that the constitutional framers also intended to preserve the means to ensure continued effectiveness of the regents. This, in turn, would presuppose the continuation of a suitable means for electing regents in the event of legislative deadlock. Against this backdrop, we evaluate the constitutionality of the joint ballot.

II.

Legislative enactments enjoy a strong presumption of constitutionality (see Paterson v University of State of N.Y., 14 NY2d 432, 438 [1964]). While the presumption is not irrefutable, parties challenging a duly enacted statute face the initial burden of demonstrating the statute's invalidity "beyond a reasonable doubt" (People v Tichenor, 89 NY2d 769, 773 [1997]; see also People v Pagnotta, 25 NY2d 333, 337 [1969]). Moreover, courts must avoid, if possible, interpreting a presumptively valid statute in a way that will needlessly render it unconstitutional (see Alliance of Am. Insurers v Chu, 77 NY2d 573, 585 [1991]). These well-established principles guide our analysis.

Article XI, § 1 of the State Constitution expressly grants the "legislature" the power to promote and maintain the state educational system. Just as article IX of the 1894 Constitution did, article XI provides that the "legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this state may be educated" (NY Const, art XI, § 1). Article XI, § 2 constitutionalizes the University of the State of New York, indicating that the "corporation created in the year one thousand seven hundred eighty-four, under the name of The Regents of the University of the State of New York, is hereby continued under the name of The University of the State of New York. It shall be governed and its corporate powers, which may be increased, modified or diminished by the legislature, shall be exercised by not less than nine regents."

The "legislature" is therefore constitutionally given authority and control over the University and the regents. The contemporary legislative exercise of this constitutionally conferred power is found in Education Law article 5.

Education Law article 5 provides an extensive statutory framework for the structure and organization of the University 162 of the State of New York. Section 202 focuses exclusively on the University's governing body--the Board of Regents. It prescribes the proper structure and composition of the board (Education Law § 202 [1]). It provides that the "University of the State of New York shall be governed and all its corporate powers exercised by a board of regents the number of whose members shall at all times be four more than the number of the then existing judicial districts of the state and shall not be less than fifteen" (Education Law § 202 [1]). Relatedly, it also provides a mode of election for the regents. The Legislature must first attempt to elect regents by concurrent resolution (see Education Law § 202 [1]). Thereafter, if the Legislature cannot bicamerally agree on a candidate, a joint session must be convened using a "joint ballot" to elect the regent (see id.). Regent "vacancies" are filled in the same manner--primarily by concurrent resolution, or in the alternative, by joint ballot (Education Law § 202 [2]).

The Legislature, although typically, and necessarily functioning in its lawmaking capacity in the form of a bicameral body, can also function unicamerally when performing duties other than lawmaking (see Matter of Anderson v Krupsak, 40 NY2d 397 [1976]). The quintessential "legislative power," its lawmaking power, unlike the power to elect regents at issue here, is directly conferred to and "vested in the senate and assembly" (NY Const, art III, § 1). The Constitution itself thus prohibits the enactment of laws "except by the assent of a majority of the members elected to each branch of the legislature" (NY Const, art III, § 14).

The lawmaking prescription contained in article III does not, however, negate or undermine the Legislature's ability to convene as a unicameral body, in a distinct, nonlawmaking capacity. The Legislature--whether functioning bicamerally, or sitting in joint session and acting unicamerally--is nevertheless the "legislature" as it is understood in article XI (Lanza v Wagner, 11 NY2d 317, 333 [1962], cert denied 371 US 901 ["(T)he exercise of the power of appointment to public office is not a function of ... essentially legislative character ..."]). Similarly, under the Federal Constitution, not all legislative actions are "subject to the bicameralism ... requirement [ ]" (Immigration & Naturalization Serv. v Chadha, 462 US 919, 952 [1983]). Instead, whether legislative actions are "an exercise of legislative power depends not on their form but upon 'whether they contain matter which is properly to be regarded as legislative in its character and effect'" (id. [citation 163 omitted]). There is no constitutional proscription against the Legislature acting unicamerally in a nonlawmaking capacity, and we are unwilling to impose one here.

The Legislature has chosen to exercise its constitutionally conferred authority by enacting valid legislation--Education Law § 202--to govern the election of regents. The alternative joint ballot method is neither constitutionally infirm nor statutorily defective. It is simply an alternative procedure, fashioned to avoid lengthy unproductive deadlocks in the appointment process. It provides the Legislature with an efficient means of filling empty seats promptly on the Board of Regents.

Our decision in Matter of Anderson v Krupsak (supra) further supports the result we reach today. In Anderson, we reviewed the legislative quorum requirements as they pertained to the joint ballot method of election prescribed in Education Law § 202. We held that "a quorum was simply a majority of the total membership of the unicameral body, without regard to whether those members come from the Senate or the Assembly" (Anderson, 40 NY2d at 405). In essence, "a quorum of the joint meeting was simply a majority of the single body" (id.). We did not require a Senate quorum. Moreover, in construing the unicameral quorum requirements, we implicitly acknowledged the validity of the Legislature acting as a unicameral body, sitting in joint session and functioning, constitutionally, in this nonlawmaking capacity. Indeed, we did so over a dissent urging the constitutional infirmity of the scheme (see id. at 406-408 [Gabrielli, J., dissenting]).

Finally, it should be noted that our approval of the joint ballot as a means of electing state officials is not without precedent. While historically used in the election of regents, the joint ballot is also used in other contexts (see Public Officers Law § 41; see also Marino v Weprin, 192 AD2d 174 [1993]). Public Officers Law § 41 affirmatively sanctions and adopts the joint ballot as the preferred means of filling vacancies in the elected offices of State Comptroller and Attorney General. It provides that

"[w]hen a vacancy occurs or exists, other than by removal, in the office of comptroller or attorney-general, or a resignation of either such officer to take effect at any future day shall have been made while the legislature is in session, the two houses thereof, by joint ballot, shall appoint a person to fill such actual or prospective vacancy" (Public Officers Law § 41 [emphasis added]). 164

We conclude that the New York State Senate and Assembly, meeting in a joint session as a unicameral body, constitute the Legislature as contemplated by article XI, §§ 1 and 2 of the New York State Constitution. Plaintiffs have thus failed to rebut, beyond a reasonable doubt, the presumption of constitutionality that favors the joint ballot provisions of Education Law § 202 (1) and (2).

Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, with costs.

Chief Judge Kaye and Judges Smith, Levine, Wesley, Rosenblatt and Graffeo concur.
Order affirmed, with costs. 165

Footnotes

* Education Law § 202 provides, in pertinent part, that

"1. ... Each regent shall be elected by the legislature by concurrent resolution in the preceding March, on or before the first Tuesday of such month. If, however, the legislature fails to agree on such concurrent resolution by the first Tuesday of such month, then the two houses shall meet in joint session at noon on the second Tuesday of such month and proceed to elect such regent by joint ballot.

"2. ... [If a] vacancy [in such office] occurs after the second Tuesday in March and before a resolution to adjourn sine die has been adopted by either house, then the vacancy shall be filled by concurrent resolution, unless the legislature fails to agree on such concurrent resolution within three legislative days after its passage by one house, in which case the two houses shall meet in joint session at noon on the next legislative day and proceed to elect such regent by joint ballots."

773 N.E.2d 490, 746 N.Y.S.2d 125, 168 Ed. Law Rep. 438, 2002 N.Y. Slip Op. 04669

End of Document

96 S.Ct. 2562
Supreme Court of the United States

MASSACHUSETTS BOARD OF RETIREMENT et al., Appellants,
v.
Robert D. MURGIA.

No. 74-1044
|
June 25, 1976.

Synopsis

Plaintiff, who was involuntarily retired from the uniformed branch of the Massachusetts state police pursuant to statute setting mandatory retirement age at 50, brought action to have the statute declared unconstitutional. The three-judge United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, 376 F.Supp. 753, declared statute unconstitutional and void, and appeal was taken. The Supreme Court held that rationality, rather than strict scrutiny, was the proper standard in determining whether the statute violated equal protection, that the age classification was rationally related to furthering a legitimate state interest, i. e., protection of the public by assuring physical preparedness of its uniformed police, and that fact that the state chose not to determine fitness more precisely through individualized testing after age 50 did not mean that the objective of assuring physical fitness was not rationally furthered by the maximum age limitation and that the statute did not deny plaintiff equal protection, notwithstanding that he was physically and mentally capable of performing the duties of a uniformed officer.

Judgment reversed.

Mr. Justice Marshall dissented and filed opinion.

West Headnotes (13)

[1] Courts Previous Decisions in Same Case as Law of the Case

Supreme Court's prior summary treatment of issue whether establishment of mandatory retirement age for government employees violates equal protection did not foreclose the opportunity to subsequently consider more fully that question. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

30 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Police and fire personnel

Rationality, rather than strict scrutiny, was the proper standard by which to test whether statute providing for compulsory retirement of Massachusetts uniformed state policemen at age 50 violated equal protection. M.G.L.A. c. 22 § 9A; c. 32 § 26(3), (3)(a); U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

70 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Strict scrutiny and compelling interest in general

Equal protection analysis requires strict scrutiny of a legislative classification only when the classification impermissibly interferes with the exercise of a fundamental right, e. g., a right of uniquely private nature, the right to vote, right of interstate travel and rights guaranteed by the First Amendment, or operates to the peculiar disadvantage of a suspect class, e. g., alienage, race or ancestry. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

477 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Public Employees and Officials

Right of governmental employment is not per se a fundamental right requiring strict scrutiny on equal protection challenge. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

341 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Constitutional Law Police and fire personnel

Class of uniformed state police officers over age of 50, i. e., the mandatory retirement age, did not constitute a suspect class for purposes of equal protection analysis. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

150 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Constitutional Law Strict scrutiny and compelling interest in general

A "suspect class" requiring application of the strict scrutiny standard of equal protection analysis is one saddled with such disabilities, or subjected to such a history of purposeful unequal treatment, or relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

299 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Constitutional Law Age

Old age does not, per se, define a discrete and insular group in need of extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process; hence, legislative classifications based on age do not automatically call for application of the strict scrutiny standard of equal protection analysis. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

209 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Constitutional Law Rational Basis Standard; Reasonableness

The rational basis standard of equal protection analysis is a relatively relaxed standard reflecting the court's awareness that the drawing of lines that create distinctions is peculiarly a legislative task and an unavoidable one; under such standards, perfection in making the necessary classifications is not necessary and the classifications are presumed valid. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

258 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Constitutional Law Police and fire personnel

Public Employment Mandatory retirement

States Retirement

Massachusetts statute providing for mandatory retirement of uniformed state police officers at age 50 is not violative of equal protection guaranteed of Fourteenth Amendment since the classification rationally furthers a legitimate state interest, i. e., protection of the public by assuring physical preparedness of its uniformed police; since physical ability generally declines with age, mandatory retirement at 50 serves to remove from police service those whose fitness for uniformed work presumptively has diminished with age; also, there was no showing that statute had effect of excluding so few officers who were in fact unqualified as to render age 50 a criterion wholly unrelated to the objective of the statute. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

179 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Constitutional Law Police and fire personnel

Although uniformed Massachusetts police officer, who had reached mandatory retirement age of 50, was still physically and mentally capable of performing duties of his office, application of mandatory retirement statute to such officer did not deny equal protection of the laws. M.G.L.A. c. 22 § 9A; c. 32 § 26(3), (3)(a); U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

13 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Constitutional Law Police and fire personnel

Fixing maximum retirement age for uniformed state police officers at age less than that set for other law enforcement personnel engaged in less demanding work does not violate equal protection. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Public Employment Mandatory retirement

States Retirement

Fact that Massachusetts, which requires a uniformed state police officer to retire on attaining age 50, chooses not to determine fitness more precisely through individualized testing after age 50 does not mean that the objective of assuring physical fitness is not rationally furthered by a maximum age limitation but means only that, with regard to the interest of all concerned, the state perhaps may not have chose the best means to accomplish such purpose. M.G.L.A. c. 22 § 9A; c. 32 § 26(3), (3)(a); U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

42 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Constitutional Law Perfect, exact, or complete equality or uniformity

Where rationality standard of equal protection analysis is the test, a State does not violate the guarantee merely because the classifications made by its laws are imperfect. U.S.C.A.Const. Amend. 14.

127 Cases that cite this headnote

Opinion

308 *2564 PER CURIAM.

[1] This case presents the question whether the provision of Mass.Gen.Laws Ann. c. 32, s 26(3)(a) (1969), that a uniformed state police officer "shall be retired . . . upon his attaining age fifty," denies appellee police officer equal protection of the laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.[1]

309 *2565 Appellee Robert Murgia was an officer in the Uniformed Branch of the Massachusetts State Police. The Massachusetts Board of Retirement retired him upon his 50th birthday. Appellee brought this civil action in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, alleging that the operation of s 26(3)(a) denied him equal protection of the laws and requesting the convening of a three-judge court under 310 28 U.S.C. ss 2281, 2284.[2] The District Judge dismissed appellee's complaint on the ground that the complaint did not allege a substantial constitutional question. D.C.Mass., 345 F.Supp. 1140 (1972). On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, in an unreported memorandum, set aside the District Court judgment and remanded the case with direction to convene a three-judge court. Upon a record consisting of depositions, affidavits, and other documentary material submitted by the parties, the three-judge court filed an opinion that declared s 26(3)(a) unconstitutional on the ground that "a classification based on age 50 alone lacks a rational basis in furthering any substantial state interest," and enjoined enforcement of the statute. 376 F.Supp. 753, 754 (Mass.1974). We noted probable jurisdiction, 421 U.S. 974, 95 S.Ct. 1973, 44 L.Ed.2d 466 (1975), and now reverse.

The primary function of the Uniformed Branch of the Massachusetts State Police is to protect persons and property and maintain law and order. Specifically, uniformed officers participate in controlling prison and civil disorders, respond to emergencies and natural disasters, patrol highways in marked cruisers, investigate crime, apprehend criminal suspects, and provide backup support for local law enforcement personnel. As the District Court observed, "service in this branch is, or can be, arduous." 376 F.Supp., at 754. "(H)igh versatility is required, with few, if any, backwaters available for the partially superannuated." Ibid. Thus, "even (appellee's) experts concede that there is a general relationship between 311 advancing age and decreasing physical ability to respond to the demands of the job." Id., at 755.

These considerations prompt the requirement that uniformed state officers pass a comprehensive physical examination biennially until age 40. After that, until mandatory retirement at age 50, uniformed officers must pass annually a more rigorous examination, including an electrocardiogram and tests for gastro-intestinal bleeding. Appellee Murgia had passed such an examination four months before he was retired, and there is no dispute that, when he retired, his excellent physical and mental health still rendered him capable of performing the duties of a uniformed officer.

The record includes the testimony of three physicians: that of the State Police *2566 Surgeon, who testified to the physiological and psychological demands involved in the performance of uniformed police functions; that of an associate professor of medicine, who testified generally to the relationship between aging and the ability to perform under stress; and that of a surgeon, who also testified to aging and the ability safely to perform police functions. The testimony clearly established that the risk of physical failure, particularly in the cardiovascular system, increases with age, and that the number of individuals in a given age group incapable of performing stress functions increases with the age of the group. App. 77-78, 174-176. The testimony also recognized that particular individuals over 50 could be capable of safely performing the functions of uniformed officers. The associate professor of medicine, who was a witness for the appellee, further testified that evaluating the risk of cardiovascular failure in a given individual would require a number of detailed studies. Id., at 77-78.

[2] In assessing appellee's equal protection claim, the District Court found it unnecessary to apply a strict-scrutiny test, see Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600 (1969), for 312 it determined that the age classification established by the Massachusetts statutory scheme could not in any event withstand a test of rationality, see Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 90 S.Ct. 1153, 25 L.Ed.2d 491 (1970). Since there had been no showing that reaching age 50 forecasts even "imminent change" in an officer's physical condition, the District Court held that compulsory retirement at age 50 was irrational under a scheme that assessed the capabilities of officers individually by means of comprehensive annual physical examinations. We agree that rationality is the proper standard by which to test whether compulsory retirement at age 50 violates equal protection. We disagree, however, with the District Court's determination that the age 50 classification is not rationally related to furthering a legitimate state interest.

I

[3] We need state only briefly our reasons for agreeing that strict scrutiny is not the proper test for determining whether the mandatory retirement provision denies appellee equal protection. San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 16, 93 S.Ct. 1278, 1287, 36 L.Ed.2d 16 (1973), reaffirmed that equal protection analysis requires strict scrutiny of a legislative classification only when the classification impermissibly interferes with the exercise of a fundamental right[3] or operates to the peculiar disadvantage of a suspect class.[4] Mandatory retirement at age 50 313 under the Massachusetts statute involves neither situation.

[4] This Court's decisions give no support to the proposition that a right of governmental employment Per se is fundamental. See San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, supra; Lindsey v. Normet, 405 U.S. 56, 73, 92 S.Ct. 862, 874, 31 L.Ed.2d 36 (1972); Dandridge v. Williams, supra, 397 U.S. at 485, 90 S.Ct. at 1162. Accordingly, we have expressly stated that a standard less than strict scrutiny "has consistently been applied to state legislation restricting *2567 the availability of employment opportunities." Ibid.

[5] [6] [7] Nor does the class of uniformed state police officers over 50 constitute a suspect class for purposes of equal protection analysis. Rodriguez, supra, 411 U.S. at 28, 93 S.Ct. at 1294, observed that a suspect class is one "saddled with such disabilities, or subjected to such a history of purposeful unequal treatment, or relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process." While the treatment of the aged in this Nation has not been wholly free of discrimination, such persons, unlike, say, those who have been discriminated against on the basis of race or national origin, have not experienced a "history of purposeful unequal treatment" or been subjected to unique disabilities on the basis of stereotyped characteristics not truly indicative of their abilities. The class subject to the compulsory retirement feature of the Massachusetts statute consists of uniformed state police officers over the age of 50. It cannot be said to discriminate only against the elderly. Rather, it draws the line at a certain age in middle life. But even old age does not define a "discrete and insular" group, United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152-153, n. 4, 58 S.Ct. 778, 783, 82 L.Ed. 1234 (1938), in need of "extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process." Instead, it marks a stage that each of us will reach if we live out 314 our normal span. Even if the statute could be said to impose a penalty upon a class defined as the aged, it would not impose a distinction sufficiently akin to those classifications that we have found suspect to call for strict judicial scrutiny.

Under the circumstances, it is unnecessary to subject the State's resolution of competing interests in this case to the degree of critical examination that our cases under the Equal Protection Clause recently have characterized as "strict judicial scrutiny."

II

[8] We turn then to examine this state classification under the rational-basis standard. This inquiry employs a relatively relaxed standard reflecting the Court's awareness that the drawing of lines that create distinctions is peculiarly a legislative task and an unavoidable one. Perfection in making the necessary classifications is neither possible nor necessary. Dandridge v. Williams, supra, 397 U.S., at 485, 90 S.Ct., at 1162. Such action by a legislature is presumed to be valid.[5]

[9] [10] [11] In this case, the Massachusetts statute clearly meets the requirements of the Equal Protection Clause, for the State's classification rationally furthers the purpose identified by the State:[6] Through mandatory retirement at age 50, the legislature seeks to protect the public by assuring physical preparedness of its uniformed police.[7] 315 Since physical ability generally declines 2568 with age, mandatory retirement at 50 serves to remove from police service those whose fitness for uniformed work presumptively has diminished with age. This clearly is rationally related to the State's objective.[8] There is no indication 316 that s 26(3)(a) has the effect of excluding from service so few officers who are in fact unqualified as to render age 50 a criterion wholly unrelated to the objective of the statute.[9]

[12] [13] That the State chooses not to determine fitness more precisely through individualized testing after age 50 is not to say that the objective of assuring physical fitness is not rationally furthered by a maximum-age limitation. It is only to say that with regard to the interest of all concerned, the State perhaps has not chosen the best means to accomplish this purpose.[10] But where rationality is the test, a State "does not violate the Equal Protection Clause merely because the classifications made by its laws are imperfect." Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S., at 485, 90 S.Ct., at 1161.

We do not make light of the substantial economic and psychological effects premature and compulsory retirement can have on an individual; nor do we denigrate the ability of elderly citizens to continue to contribute to society. The problems of retirement have been well documented 317 and are beyond serious dispute.[11] But "(w)e do not decide today that the (Massachusetts statute) is wise, that it best fulfills the relevant social and economic objectives that (Massachusetts) might ideally espouse, or 2569 that a more just and humane system could not be revised." Id., at 487, 90 S.Ct., at 1162. We decide only that the system enacted by the Massachusetts Legislature does not deny appellee equal protection of the laws.

The judgment is reversed.

Mr. Justice STEVENS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Mr. Justice MARSHALL, dissenting.

Today the Court holds that it is permissible for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to declare that members of its state police force who have been proved medically fit for service are nonetheless legislatively unfit to be policemen and must be terminated involuntarily "retired" because they have reached the age of 50. Although we have called the right to work "of the very essence of the personal freedom and opportunity that it was the purpose of the (Fourteenth) Amendment to secure," Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33, 41, 36 S.Ct. 7, 10, 60 L.Ed. 131 (1915), the Court finds that the right to work is not a fundamental right. And, while agreeing that "the treatment of the aged in this Nation has not been wholly free of discrimination," Ante, at 2566, the Court holds that the elderly are not a 318 suspect class. Accordingly, the Court undertakes the scrutiny mandated by the bottom tier of its two-tier equal protection framework, finds the challenged legislation not to be "wholly unrelated" to its objective, and holds, therefore, that it survives equal protection attack. I respectfully dissent.

I

Although there are signs that its grasp on the law is weakening, the rigid two-tier model still holds sway as the Court's articulated description of the equal protection test. Again, I must object to its perpetuation. The model's two fixed modes of analysis, strict scrutiny and mere rationality, simply do not describe the inquiry the Court has undertaken or should undertake in equal protection cases. Rather, the inquiry has been much more sophisticated and the Court should admit as much. It has focused upon the character of the classification in question, the relative importance to individuals in the class discriminated against of the governmental benefits that they do not receive, and the state interests asserted in support of the classification. Marshall v. United States, 414 U.S. 417, 432-433, 94 S.Ct. 700, 709, 38 L.Ed.2d 618 (1974) (Marshall, J., dissenting); San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 98-110, 93 S.Ct. 1278, 1330, 36 L.Ed.2d 16 (1973) (Marshall, J., dissenting); Richardson v. Belcher, 404 U.S. 78, 90-91, 92 S.Ct. 254, 262, 30 L.Ed.2d 231 (1971) (Marshall, J., dissenting); Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 519-530, 90 S.Ct. 1153, 1178, 25 L.Ed.2d 491 (1970) (Marshall, J., dissenting). See also City of Charlotte v. Firefighters, 426 U.S. 283, 286, 96 S.Ct. 2036, 2038, 48 L.Ed.2d 636 (1976); Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 253-254, 94 S.Ct. 1076, 1080, 39 L.Ed.2d 306

(1974); Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 335, 92 S.Ct. 995, 999, 31 L.Ed.2d 274 (1972); Kramer v. Union School Dist., 395 U.S. 621, 626, 89 S.Ct. 1886, 1889, 23 L.Ed.2d 583 (1969); Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 30, 89 S.Ct. 5, 10, 21 L.Ed.2d 24 (1968).

Although the Court outwardly adheres to the two-tier model, it has apparently lost interest in recognizing further 319 "fundamental" rights and "suspect" classes. See San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, supra (rejecting education as a fundamental right); Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677, 93 S.Ct. 1764, 36 L.Ed.2d 583 (1973) (declining to treat women as a suspect class). In my view, this result is the natural consequence of the limitations of the Court's traditional equal protection analysis. If a statute invades a "fundamental" right or discriminates against a "suspect" class, it is subject to strict scrutiny. If a statute is subject to strict scrutiny, the statute *2570 always, or nearly always, see Korematsu v. United States,[1] 323 U.S. 214, 65 S.Ct. 193, 89 L.Ed. 194 (1944), is struck down. Quite obviously, the only critical decision is whether strict scrutiny should be invoked at all. It should be no surprise, then, that the Court is hesitant to expand the number of categories of rights and classes subject to strict scrutiny, when each expansion involves the invalidation of virtually every classification bearing upon a newly covered category.

But however understandable the Court's hesitancy to invoke strict scrutiny, all remaining legislation should not drop into the bottom tier, and be measured by the mere rationality test. For that test, too, when applied as articulated, leaves little doubt about the outcome; the challenged legislation is always upheld. See 320 New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297, 96 S.Ct. 2513, 49 L.Ed.2d 511 (1976) (overruling Morey v. Doud, 354 U.S. 457, 77 S.Ct. 1344, 1 L.Ed.2d 1485 (1957), the only modern case in which this Court has struck down an economic classification as irrational). It cannot be gainsaid that there remain rights, not now classified as "fundamental," that remain vital to the flourishing of a free society, and classes, not now classified as "suspect," that are unfairly burdened by invidious discrimination unrelated to the individual worth of their members. Whatever we call these rights and classes, we simply cannot forgo all judicial protection against discriminatory legislation bearing upon them, but for the rare instances when the legislative choice can be termed "wholly irrelevant" to the legislative goal. McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420, 425, 81 S.Ct. 1101, 1104, 6 L.Ed.2d 393 (1961).

While the Court's traditional articulation of the rational-basis test does suggest just such an abdication, happily the Court's deeds have not matched its words. Time and again, met with cases touching upon the prized rights and burdened classes of our society, the Court has acted only after a reasonably probing look at the legislative goals and means, and at the significance of the personal rights and interests invaded. Stanton v. Stanton, 421 U.S. 7, 95 S.Ct. 1373, 43 L.Ed.2d 688 (1975); Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 95 S.Ct. 1225, 43 L.Ed.2d 514 (1975); United States Dept. of Agriculture v. Moreno, 413 U.S. 528, 93 S.Ct. 2821, 37 L.Ed.2d 782 (1973); Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S., at 691, 93 S.Ct., at 1772 (Powell, J., concurring in judgment); James v. Strange, 407 U.S. 128, 92 S.Ct. 2027, 32 L.Ed.2d 600 (1972); Weber v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 406 U.S. 164, 92 S.Ct. 1400, 31 L.Ed.2d 768 (1972); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438, 92 S.Ct. 1029, 31 L.Ed.2d 349 (1972); Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71, 92 S.Ct. 251, 30 L.Ed.2d 225 (1971). See San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, supra, 411 U.S., at 98-110, 93 S.Ct., at 1330 (Marshall, J., dissenting).[2] 321 These cases make clear that the Court has rejected, albeit Sub silentio, its most deferential statements of the rationality standard in assessing the validity under the Equal Protection Clause of much noneconomic legislation.

But there are problems with deciding cases based on factors not encompassed by the applicable standards. First, the approach *2571 is rudderless, affording no notice to interested parties of the standards governing particular cases and giving no firm guidance to judges who, as a consequence, must assess the constitutionality of legislation before them on an Ad hoc basis. Second, and not unrelatedly, the approach is unpredictable and requires holding this Court to standards it has never publicly adopted. Thus the approach presents the danger that, as I suggest has happened here, relevant factors will be misapplied or ignored. All interests not "fundamental" and all classes not "suspect" are not the same; and it is time for the Court to drop the pretense that, for purposes of the Equal Protection Clause, they are.

II

The danger of the Court's verbal adherence to the rigid two-tier test, despite its effective repudiation of that test in the cases, is demonstrated by its efforts here. There is simply no reason why a statute that tells able-bodied police officers, ready and willing to work, that they no longer have the right to earn a living in their chosen profession merely because they are 50 years old should be judged by the same minimal standards of rationality that we use to test economic legislation that discriminates against business interests. See

New Orleans v. Dukes, supra; Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 75 S.Ct. 461, 99 L.Ed. 563 (1955). Yet, the Court today not only invokes the minimal level of scrutiny, it wrongly adheres to it. Analysis 322 of the three factors I have identified above the importance of the governmental benefits denied, the character of the class, and the asserted state interests demonstrates the Court's error.

Whether "fundamental" or not, " 'the right of the individual . . . to engage in any of the common occupations of life' " has been repeatedly recognized by this Court as falling within the concept of liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 572, 92 S.Ct. 2701, 2707, 33 L.Ed.2d 548 (1972), quoting Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399, 43 S.Ct. 625, 626, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923). As long ago as Butchers' Union Co. v. Crescent City Co., 111 U.S. 746, 4 S.Ct. 652, 28 L.Ed. 585 (1884), Mr. Justice Bradley wrote that this right "is an inalienable right; it was formulated as such under the phrase 'pursuit of happiness' in the declaration of independence . . . . This right is a large ingredient in the civil liberty of the citizen." Id., at 762, 4 S.Ct., at 657 (concurring opinion). And in Smith v. Texas, 233 U.S. 630, 34 S.Ct. 681, 58 L.Ed. 1129 (1914), in invalidating a law that criminally penalized anyone who served as a freight train conductor without having previously served as a brakeman, and that thereby excluded numerous equally qualified employees from that position, the Court recognized that "all men are entitled to the equal protection of the law in their right to work for the support of themselves and families." Id., at 641, 34 S.Ct., at 684.

"In so far as a man is deprived of the right to labor, his liberty is restricted, his capacity to earn wages and acquire property is lessened, and he is denied the protection which the law affords those who are permitted to work. Liberty means more than freedom from servitude, and the constitutional guaranty is an assurance that the citizen shall be protected in the right to use his powers of mind and body in any lawful calling." Id., at 636, 34 S.Ct., at 682.

See also Arnett v. Kennedy, 416 U.S. 134, 94 S.Ct. 1633, 40 L.Ed.2d 15 (1974); Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593, 92 S.Ct. 2694, 33 L.Ed.2d 570 (1972); 323 Bell v. Burson, 402 U.S. 535, 91 S.Ct. 1586, 29 L.Ed.2d 90 (1971); Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 605-606, 87 S.Ct. 675, 685, 17 L.Ed.2d 629 (1967); Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232, 238-239, 77 S.Ct. 752, 756, 1 L.Ed.2d 796 (1957); *2572 Slochower v. Board of Higher Education, 350 U.S. 551, 76 S.Ct. 637, 100 L.Ed. 692 (1956); Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183, 73 S.Ct. 215, 97 L.Ed. 216 (1952); Truax v. Raich,[3] 239 U.S., at 41, 36 S.Ct., at 10. Even if the right to earn a living does not include the right to work for the government, it is settled that because of the importance of the interest involved, we have always carefully looked at the reasons asserted for depriving a government employee of his job.

While depriving any government employee of his job is a significant deprivation, it is particularly burdensome when the person deprived is an older citizen. Once terminated, the elderly cannot readily find alternative employment. The lack of work is not only economically damaging, but emotionally and physically draining. Deprived of his status in the community and of the opportunity for meaningful activity, fearful of becoming dependent on others for his support, and lonely in his new-found isolation, the involuntarily retired person is susceptible to physical and emotional ailments as a direct consequence of his enforced idleness. Ample clinical evidence supports the conclusion that mandatory retirement poses a direct threat to the health and life expectancy of the retired person,[4] and these consequences of termination for age e not disputed by appellants. 324 Thus, an older person deprived of his job by the government loses not only his right to earn a living, but, too often, his health as well, in sad contradiction of Browning's promise: "The best is yet to be,/ The last of life, for which the first was made."[5]

Not only are the elderly denied important benefits when they are terminated on the basis of age, but the classification of older workers is itself one that merits judicial attention. Whether older workers constitute a "suspect" class or not, it cannot be disputed that they constitute a class subject to repeated and arbitrary discrimination in employment. See United States Department of Labor, The Older American Worker: Age Discrimination in Employment (1965); M. Barron, The Aging American 55-68 (1961). As Congress found in passing the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967:

"(I)n the face of rising productivity and affluence, older workers find themselves disadvantaged in their efforts to retain employment, and especially to regain employment when displaced from jobs(.)

"(T)he setting of arbitrary age limits regardless of potential for job performance has become a common practice, and certain otherwise desirable practices may work to the disadvantage of older persons(.)

"(T)he incidence of unemployment, especially long-term unemployment with resultant deterioration of skill, morale, and employer acceptability is, relative to the younger ages, high among older workers; their numbers are great and growing; and their employment problems grave(.)" 81 Stat. 602, 29 U.S.C. s 621(a) (subsection numbers omitted).

See also Ante, at 2568 n. 11.

325 Of course, the Court is quite right in suggesting that distinctions exist between the elderly and traditional suspect classes such as Negroes, and between the elderly and "quasi-suspect" classes such as women *2573 or illegitimates. The elderly are protected not only by certain anti-discrimination legislation, but by legislation that provides them with positive benefits not enjoyed by the public at large. Moreover, the elderly are not isolated in society, and discrimination against them is not pervasive but is centered primarily in employment. The advantage of a flexible equal protection standard, however, is that it can readily accommodate such variables. The elderly are undoubtedly discriminated against, and when legislation denies them an important benefit employment I conclude that to sustain the legislation appellants must show a reasonably substantial interest and a scheme reasonably closely tailored to achieving that interest. Cf. San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. at 124-126, 93 S.Ct. at 1343 (Marshall, J., dissenting). This inquiry, ultimately, is not markedly different from that undertaken by the Court in Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71, 92 S.Ct. 251, 30 L.Ed.2d 225 (1971).

Turning, then, to appellants' arguments, I agree that the purpose of the mandatory retirement law is legitimate, and indeed compelling, the Commonwealth has every reason to assure that its state police officers are of sufficient physical strength and health to perform their jobs. In my view, however, the means chosen, the forced retirement of officers at age 50, is so over-inclusive that it must fall.

All potential officers must pass a rigorous physical examination. Until age 40, this same examination must be passed every two years when the officer re-enlists and, after age 40, every year. Appellants have conceded that "(w)hen a member passes his re-enlistment or annual physical, he is found to be qualified to perform all of 326 the duties of the Uniformed Branch of the Massachusetts State Police." App. 43. See id., 52. If a member fails the examination, he is immediately terminated or refused re-enlistment. Thus, the only members of the state police still on the force at age 50 are those who have been determined repeatedly by the Commonwealth to be physically fit for the job. Yet, all of these physically fit officers are automatically terminated at age 50. Appellants do not seriously assert that their testing is no longer effective at age 50,[6] nor do they claim that continued testing would serve no purpose because officers over 50 are no longer physically able to perform their 327 jobs.[7] Thus the Commonwealth is in the position of already individually testing its police officers for *2574 physical fitness, conceding that such testing is adequate to determine the physical ability of an officer to continue on the job, and conceding that that ability may continue after age 50. In these circumstances, I see no reason at all for automatically terminating those officers who reach the age of 50; indeed, that action seems the height of irrationality.

Accordingly, I conclude that the Commonwealth's mandatory retirement law cannot stand when measured against the significant deprivation the Commonwealth's action works upon the terminated employees. I would affirm the judgment of the District Court.[8]

All Citations

427 U.S. 307, 96 S.Ct. 2562, 49 L.Ed.2d 520, 12 Fair Empl.Prac.Cas. (BNA) 1569, 12 Empl. Prac. Dec. P 10,998, 1 Employee Benefits Cas. 1032

Footnotes

1 Uniformed state police officers are appointed under Mass.Gen.Laws Ann. c. 22, s 9A (Supp.1976-1977), which provides:

> "Whenever the governor shall deem it necessary to provide more effectively for the protection of persons and property and for the maintenance of law and order in the commonwealth, he may authorize the commissioner to make additional appointments to the division of state police, together with such other employees as the governor may deem necessary for the proper administration thereof. . . . Said additional officers shall have and exercise within the commonwealth all the powers of constables, except the service of civil process, and of police officers and watchmen. . . . No person who has not reached his nineteenth birthday nor any person who has passed his thirtieth birthday shall be enlisted for the first time as an officer of the division of state police, except that said maximum age qualification shall not apply in the case of the enlistment of any woman as such an officer."

In pertinent part c. 32, s 26(3), provides:

"(a) . . . Any . . . officer appointed under section nine A of chapter twenty-two . . . who has performed service in the division of state police in the department of public safety for not less than twenty years, shall be retired by the state board of retirement upon his attaining age fifty or upon the expiration of such twenty years, whichever last occurs."

"(b) Any . . . officer . . . who has performed service . . . for not less than twenty years and who has not attained . . . age fifty in the case of an officer appointed under the said section nine A, shall be retired by the state board of retirement in case the rating board, after an examination of such officer or inspector by a registered physician appointed by it, shall report in writing to the state board of retirement that he is physically or mentally incapacitated for the performance of duty and that such incapacity is likely to be permanent."

Since s 9A requires that new enlistees in the Uniformed Branch be no more than 30 years of age, few retirements are delayed past 50 until the expiration of 20 years' service.

The question presented in this case was summarily treated in Cannon v. Guste, 423 U.S. 918, 96 S.Ct. 257, 46 L.Ed.2d 245 (1975), aff'g No. 74-3211 (May 6, 1975, ED La.); Weisbrod v. Lynn, 420 U.S. 940, 95 S.Ct. 1319, 43 L.Ed.2d 420 (1975), aff'g 383 F.Supp. 933 (DC 1974); McIlvaine v. Pennsylvania, 415 U.S. 986, 94 S.Ct. 1583, 39 L.Ed.2d 884 (1974), dismissing appeal from 454 Pa. 129, 309 A.2d 801 (1973). Our cursory consideration in those cases does not, of course, foreclose this opportunity to consider more fully that question. See, E. g., Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 670-671, 94 S.Ct. 1347, 1359, 39 L.Ed.2d 662 (1974).

2 Jurisdiction was invoked pursuant to 28 U.S.C. s 1343, and declaratory and injunctive relief was sought under 28 U.S.C. ss 2201, 2202. The equal protection denial was alleged to constitute a violation of 42 U.S.C. s 1983. Appellee made no claim under the Federal Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, 81 Stat. 602, 29 U.S.C. s 621 Et seq.

3 E. g., Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 93 S.Ct. 705, 35 L.Ed.2d 147 (1973) (right of a uniquely private nature); Bullock v. Carter, 405 U.S. 134, 92 S.Ct. 849, 31 L.Ed.2d 92 (1972) (right to vote); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600 (1969) (right of interstate travel); Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 89 S.Ct. 5, 21 L.Ed.2d 24 (1968) (rights guaranteed by the First Amendment); Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942) (right to procreate).

4 E. g., Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365, 91 S.Ct. 1848, 29 L.Ed.2d 534 (1971) (alienage); McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 85 S.Ct. 283, 13 L.Ed.2d 222 (1964) (race); Oyama v. California, 332 U.S. 633, 68 S.Ct. 269, 92 L.Ed. 249 (1948) (ancestry).

5 See, E. g., San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 40-41, 93 S.Ct. 1278, 1300, 36 L.Ed.2d 16 (1973); Madden v. Kentucky, 309 U.S. 83, 88, 60 S.Ct. 406, 408, 84 L.Ed. 590 (1940); Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U.S. 61, 78-79, 31 S.Ct. 337, 340, 55 L.Ed. 369 (1911).

6 See San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, supra, 411 U.S., at 17, 93 S.Ct., at 1288.

7 A special legislative commission's report preceding the enactment of the age-50 maximum for uniformed police stated: "The Division of State Police, by virtue of the nature of the work demanded of its members, undoubtedly requires comparatively young men of vigorous physique. The nature of the duties to be performed in all weathers is arduous in the extreme . . . . No argument is needed to demonstrate that men above middle life are not usually physically able to perform such duties." Mass.H.Doc. No. 1582, p. 8 (1938). With these considerations in mind, the State's Commissioner of Public Safety argued before the commission for provisions permitting retirement of state police at 45. The commission observed in response that it was "not prepared to say that the contention of the Commissioner of Public Safety, that (state police) over age forty-five should be eligible (for) retirement, is unsound as a matter of public policy." Ibid. The commission, however, deferred the problem of setting retirement ages for the state police to special study, their sole reason for not recommending age 45 being the anticipated pension costs to the State, not the reasonableness of the age with respect to job qualification. Id., at 7-9. Though the age-50 limitation was not specifically proposed by the commission, but was ultimately enacted by the legislature after further study, Act of Aug. 12, 1939, c. 503, s 3 (1939), Mass.Acts & Resolves 737-738 (1939), it is apparent that the purpose of the limitation was to protect the public by assuring the ability of state police to respond to the demands of their jobs. See also Mass.H.Doc. No. 5316, pp. 16-17 (1967); Mass.H.Doc. No. 2500, pp. 21, 23-25 (1955). This purpose is also clearly implied by the State's maximum-age scheme, which sets higher mandatory retirement ages for less demanding jobs. See Mass. Gen.Laws Ann. c. 32, ss 1, 3(2)(g), 26(3)(a) (1966 and Supp.1975).

8 Appellee seems to have suggested in oral argument that Mass.Gen.Laws Ann. c. 32, ss 1, 3(2)(g), 26(3)(a), also deny equal protection through the job classification established by them. Tr. of Oral Arg. 14, 17-18. Any such argument, however, is unpersuasive. The sections do set a maximum retirement age for uniformed state officers which is less than that set for other law enforcement personnel. It has never been seriously disputed, if at all, however, that the work of uniformed state officers is more demanding than that of other state, or even municipal, law enforcement personnel. It is this difference in work demands that underlies the job classification. Mass.H.Doc. No. 2500, pp. 21-22 (1955).

9 Review of Massachusetts' maximum-age limitations by state legislative commissions has proceeded on the principle that "maximum retirement age for any group of employees should be that age at which the efficiency of a large majority of the employees in the group is such that it is in the public interest that they retire." Id., at 7.

10 Indeed, were it not for the existing annual individual examinations through age 50, appellee would concede the rationality of mandatory retirement at 50. Tr. of Oral Arg. 22-23. The introduction of individual examinations, however, hardly defeats the rationality of the State's scheme. In fact, it augments rationality since the legislative judgment to avoid the risk posed by even the healthiest 50-year-old officers would be implemented by annual individual examinations between ages 40 and 50 which serve to eliminate those younger officers who are not at least as healthy as the best 50-year-old officers.

11 E. g., M. Barron, The Aging American (1961); Cameron, Neuroses of Later Maturity, in Mental Disorders in Later Life 201 (O. Kaplan, 2d ed. 1956); Senate Special Committee on Aging Developments in Aging: 1971 and January-March 1972, S.Rep.No.92-784, pp. 48-53 (1972); Hearings before the Subcommittee on Retirement and the Individual of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., pts. 1 and 2, pp. 36-46, 87-100, 121-127, 212-217, 464-471 (1967).

1 Some classifications are so invidious that they should be struck down automatically absent the most compelling state interest, and by suggesting the limitations of strict-scrutiny analysis I do not mean to imply otherwise. The analysis should be accomplished, however, not by stratified notions of "suspect" classes and "fundamental" rights, but by individualized assessments of the particular classes and rights involved in each case. Of course, the traditional suspect classes and fundamental rights would still rank at the top of the list of protected categories, so that in cases involving those categories analysis would be functionally equivalent to strict scrutiny. Thus, the advantages of the approach I favor do not appear in such cases, but rather emerge in those dealing with traditionally less protected classes and rights. See Infra, at 2570-2573.

2 See also Gunther, The Supreme Court, 1971 Term, Foreword: In Search of Evolving Doctrine on a Changing Court: A Model for a Newer Equal Protection, 86 Harv.L.Rev. 1 (1972).

3 See Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564, 587, 92 S.Ct. 2701, 2714, 33 L.Ed.2d 548 (1972) (Marshall, J., dissenting). Appellee makes no such claim; nor does he allege that procedural due process requires that he be afforded a hearing prior to termination.

4 See American Medical Association, Committee on Aging, Retirement, A Medical Philosophy and Approach; M. Barron, The Aging American 76-86, and sources cited (1961). Because, as one former AMA president bluntly put it, "(d)eath comes at retirement," quoted in M. Barron, Id., at 76, the AMA has formally taken a position against involuntary retirement and has submitted an Amicus brief in this case to inform us of the medical consequences of the practice.

5 R. Browning, Rabbi Ben Ezra, stanza 1.

6 There may be an age at which passing a physical examination provides no substantial guarantee that the officer is fit for service for the coming year. In that case, the test has lost its predictive ability. There is no showing that age 50 marks such a line although the appellants ask us to hypothesize that it does and indeed the evidence seems contrary to that supposition. First, among officers aged 40-49, who undergo yearly examinations, there is no general trend of increasing rejections with age nor any suggestion that those who passed the examination served in less than a satisfactory manner. 376 F.Supp. 753, 756 (Mass.1974).

This evidence presents no reason to assume that testing suddenly loses its predictive ability after age 50. The only relevant studies presented are contrary to appellants' assumption. These studies support the conclusion that airline pilots should be terminated at age 60 because after That age medical examinations lose their predictive ability. See Air Line Pilots Assn., Int'l v. Quesada, 276 F.2d 892 (CA2 1960).

The suggestion that age 50 is not the critical point for predictive ability is also supported by the national experience. Appellee has produced a study of the laws of the 50 States that shows that Massachusetts' age-50 retirement law prescribes the earliest retirement age in the Nation, and that no other State requires its state police to retire before age 55. Brief for Appellee 37 n. 14.

In short, I refuse to hypothesize that testing after age 50 loses its predictive ability when the appellants have introduced absolutely nothing that supports this position.

7 Indeed, the appellants have conceded that "(a)ny individual member of the Uniformed Branch . . . whose age is fifty years or more may be capable of performing the physical activity required of the Uniformed Branch . . . depending upon his individual physical condition." App. 44. See Id., at 52.

8 The Court's conclusion today does not imply that all mandatory retirement laws are constitutionally valid. Here the primary state interest is in maintaining a physically fit police force, not a mentally alert or manually dexterous work force. That the Court concludes it is rational to legislate on the assumption that physical strength and well-being decrease significantly with age does not imply that it will reach the same conclusion with respect to legislation based on assumptions about mental or manual ability. Accordingly, a mandatory retirement law for all government employees would stand in a posture different from the law before us today.

New York Official Reports

100 A.D.3d 1052, 953 N.Y.S.2d 339, 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 07236

1 In the Matter of County of Nassau et al., Respondents-Appellants, et al., Petitioners

v

State of New York et al., Respondents, and New York State Board of Elections et al., Appellants-Respondents.

Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Third Department, New York
November 1, 2012

CITE TITLE AS: Matter of County of Nassau v State of New York

HEADNOTES

Elections
Board of Elections
Capacity of Single Election Commissioner to Bring Suit—Claims Raising Issues Affecting Board of Elections as Whole

Parties
Capacity to Sue
Municipality's Challenge to Constitutionality of State Statute Requiring Use of Electronic Voting Systems—Municipality Not Forced to Violate a Constitutional Proscription

Paul M. Collins, New York State Board of Elections, Albany, for appellants-respondents.
John Ciampoli, County Attorney, Mineola, for respondents-appellants.
Eric T. Schneiderman, Attorney General, Albany (Andrew B. Ayers of counsel), for State of New York, respondent.
Davidoff, Malito & Hutcher, LLP, Garden City (Daniel J. Fischer of Koley Jessen, PC, LLO, Omaha, Nebraska, pro hac vice), for Election Systems & Software, respondent.

Peters, P.J. Appeals (1) (transferred to this Court by order of the Appellate Division, Second Department) from that part of an order of the Supreme Court (Woodard, J.), entered July 23, 2010 in Nassau County, which, in a combined proceeding pursuant to CPLR article 78 and action for declaratory judgment, granted petitioners' motion for immediate discovery, (2) (transferred to this Court by order of the Appellate Division, Second Department) from an order of said court, entered October 14, 2010 in Nassau County, which, in a combined proceeding pursuant to CPLR article 78 and action for declaratory judgment, granted a motion by respondent Election Systems & Software for an order of confidentiality, and (3) from a judgment of the Supreme Court (Lynch, J.), entered June 24, 2011 in Albany County, which, in a combined proceeding pursuant to CPLR article 78 and action for declaratory judgment, granted certain respondents' motions to dismiss the petition.

In 2002, in order to improve the accessibility of voting systems to disabled voters, Congress enacted the Federal Help America Vote Act (hereinafter HAVA) (see 42 USC § 15301 et seq.). In an effort to comply with HAVA, the Legislature enacted the Election Reform and Modernization Act of 2005 (hereinafter ERMA) (see L 2005, ch 181), which, as later amended, requires the replacement of lever voting machines with electronic optical scan voting systems (see L 2007, ch 506, § 1; Election Law §7-202). Petitioners, believing that electronic voting systems are vulnerable to "hacking, tampering, manipulation and malfunction," resisted efforts by respondent State Board of Elections (hereinafter SBOE) and respondent State of New York to replace lever voting machines with an electronic system manufactured by respondent Election Systems & Software (hereinafter ESS).

Due, in part, to such resistance, the United States Depart 1053 ment of Justice commenced an action against the SBOE and the State in 2006 seeking an injunction requiring compliance with HAVA. The parties to that action reached an agreement, and the District Court for the Northern District of New York (Sharpe, J.) issued a remedial order placing the State and the SBOE under various conditions, including a timeline for compliance. The deadline for compliance was extended twice but, by March 2010, the State and the SBOE were still not in compliance with HAVA due to petitioners' continued failure to implement the new voting machines. Shortly thereafter, the State and the SBOE applied for and were granted an injunction directing petitioners to cease their interference with efforts to comply with the District Court's previous orders and to take actions necessary to implement the new voting machines.[1] 2

Around that same time, petitioners commenced this combined proceeding pursuant to CPLR article 78 and action for declaratory judgment in Supreme Court, Nassau County, seeking, among other things, a declaration that ERMA is unconstitutional, claiming that electronic voting systems are susceptible to tampering and thus create the risk of "disenfranchisement and subversion of the democratic process." Petitioners thereafter sought an order expediting discovery with respect to various documents, software, access codes and other materials associated with the electronic voting systems which they claimed were necessary to "reveal[ ] the weaknesses and vulnerabilities of the new machines." Supreme Court (Woodard, J.) granted the motion, and the State and the SBOE appeal from the order. Subsequently, ESS was granted intervenor status for the limited purpose of protecting its intellectual property and trade secrets and successfully moved for a confidentiality order. Petitioners appeal from that order.

While those appeals were pending, the State and the SBOE each moved to dismiss the petition contending, among other things, that petitioners lacked legal capacity to challenge the constitutionality of ERMA. After venue of the proceeding was transferred to Albany County,[2] Supreme Court (Lynch, J.) determined that petitioners lacked capacity to pursue their claims and, accordingly, dismissed the petition. Petitioners County of Nassau and John A. DeGrace, in his capacity as Nas 1054 sau County Republican Commissioner of Elections, appeal from that order.

We first address the appeal from Supreme Court's judgment dismissing the petition based on petitioners' lack of capacity to sue. As petitioners Nassau County Board of Elections (hereinafter NCBOE) and William T. Biamonte, the Nassau County Democratic Commissioner of Elections, have not joined in the appeal from that order, we consider only the issue of capacity with respect to the County and DeGrace (see Hecht v City of New York, 60 NY2d 57, 62 [1983]; Matter of Sanders v Slater, 53 AD3d 716, 717 n 1 [2008]). We find that DeGrace lacks the capacity to unilaterally maintain the instant appeal. Election Law § 3-212 (2) requires that all actions of local boards of elections be approved by a majority vote of the commissioners. As the claims in this proceeding raise issues affecting the NCBOE as a whole, as opposed to those alleging a political imbalance on the NCBOE or otherwise relating to the representational rights of the political parties thereon, the pursuit of the instant appeal is an "action" of the NCBOE requiring approval of a majority of the commissioners (see Matter of Graziano v County of Albany, 3 NY3d 475, 480 [2004]). In the absence of any proof that such approval has been given, DeGrace lacks the capacity to maintain the present appeal on behalf of the NCBOE (see id. at 480; Matter of Mohr v Schroeder, 86 NY2d 786, 788 [1995], revg 216 AD2d 926 [1995], for the reasons stated in 162 Misc 2d 584 [1994]; Gagliardo v Colascione, 153 AD2d 710, 710 [1989], lv denied 74 NY2d 609 [1989]). As such, his appeal must be dismissed (see Matter of Bridgham v Tutunjian, 84 AD2d 853, 853 [1981]). *3

The only issue that remains, therefore, is whether the County has capacity to challenge the constitutionality of ERMA.[3] We hold that it does not. "[C]apacity concerns a litigant's power to appear and bring its grievance before the court" (Matter of Graziano v County of Albany, 3 NY3d at 478-479 [internal quotation marks and citation omitted]; see Matter of Town of Riverhead v New York State Bd. of Real Prop. Servs., 5 NY3d 36, 41 [2005]). As purely creatures of the State, municipal enti 1055 ties generally "cannot have the right to contest the actions of their principal or creator affecting them in their governmental capacity or as representatives of their inhabitants" (City of New York v State of New York, 86 NY2d 286, 290 [1995]; see County of Albany v Hooker, 204 NY 1, 10 [1912]; Matter of County of Oswego v Travis, 16 AD3d 733, 735 [2005]). Thus, municipalities and other local government entities lack capacity to attack actions by the State and the Legislature on constitutional grounds unless they properly invoke one of the four recognized exceptions to the rule (see City of New York v State of New York, 86 NY2d at 289-293; Matter of New York Blue Line Council, Inc. v Adirondack Park Agency, 86 AD3d 756, 758 [2011], appeal dismissed sub nom. Matter of Clinton County v Adirondack Park Agency, 17 NY3d 947 [2011], lv denied sub nom. Matter of Clinton County v Adirondack Park Agency, 18 NY3d 806 [2012]; New York State Assn. of Small City School Dists., Inc. v State of New York, 42 AD3d 648, 649 [2007]). Here, the County asserts " 'that if [it is] obliged to comply with the State statute [it] will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription' " (City of New York v State of New York, 86 NY2d at 292, quoting Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 41 NY2d 283, 287 [1977]; see Matter of County of Oswego v Travis, 16 AD3d at 735), thereby coming within an exception.[4]

However, the County cannot claim that, by complying with ERMA, it will be forced to violate a constitutional prohibition, because it is the NCBOE—not the County—that is responsible for the implementation of the requirements of ERMA. Indeed, nowhere is it alleged in the petition/complaint that the County plays any role in the administration of ERMA or the *4 selection of voting machines.[5] Rather, the petition/complaint specifically alleges that it is the NCBOE that "is responsible for carrying out the elections in Nassau County," which responsibility includes, among other things, "[s]electing new voting systems approved by the [SBOE] and ERMA." And, the Election Law confirms that it is the local board of elections that is charged with the selection and implementation of voting systems and machines (see Election Law §§ 3-226, 7-200 [1]; 7-208). Notably, in this regard, the NCBOE does not act on behalf of the County, but is rather an independent political body separate and distinct from the County (see Matter of Reynolds, 202 NY 430, 441 [1911]; 1056 Matter of Daly v Board of Elections of City of N.Y., 254 App Div 914, 914 [1938], affd 279 NY 743 [1939]). Inasmuch as the County has neither alleged nor demonstrated that it plays any role in implementing the statute it seeks to challenge, it cannot be said that the County itself will be forced to violate a constitutional proscription if obliged to comply with the statute. Thus, having failed to bring its claims within any recognized exception to the general rule that municipalities lack capacity to sue the State, the action on behalf of the County was properly dismissed (see City of New York v State of New York, 86 NY2d at 295).

With respect to the appeals from the two intermediate discovery orders, those appeals must be dismissed. "[T]he right to appeal from a nonfinal order terminates upon the entry of a final judgment" (State of New York v Joseph, 29 AD3d 1233, 1234 n [2006], lv denied 7 NY3d 711 [2006]; see Matter of Aho, 39 NY2d 241, 248 [1976]; Cunningham v Anderson, 85 AD3d 1370, 1371 [2011], lv dismissed and denied 17 NY3d 948 [2011]). Furthermore, as the interlocutory orders do not "necessarily affect[ ]" the final judgment, the appeal from the final judgment does not bring them up for review (CPLR 5501 [a] [1]; see generally Matter of Cicardi v Cicardi, 263 AD2d 686, 686 [1999]).

Rose, Spain and McCarthy, JJ., concur. Ordered that the appeals from the orders entered July 23, 2010 and October 14, 2010 are dismissed, without costs. Ordered that the judgment is affirmed, without costs. [Prior Case History: 2010 NY Slip Op 31420(U).]

FOOTNOTES

Footnotes

1 The order granting the SBOE preliminary relief was affirmed by the Second Circuit Court of Appeals (United States v New York State Bd. of Elections, 312 Fed Appx 353 [2d Cir 2008]).

2 As a result of venue being transferred to Albany County, the Second Department transferred the appeals from the expedited discovery order and confidentiality order to this Court.

3 The petition also challenged the SBOE's 2009 certification of the electronic voting system as arbitrary and capricious, claiming that the voting system disregards voter intent by not counting the vote where the voter "overvotes" or "undervotes," and that it would be nearly impossible to install the machines prior to the fall 2010 election. However, the fall 2010 election has long since passed, and the voting system that is the subject of these claims is no longer in use and a new version has since been certified. As such, these claims are now moot (see Matter of Hearst Corp. v Clyne, 50 NY2d 707, 714 [1980]).

4 Petitioners do not claim the applicability of any of the other exceptions to the rule.

5 In fact, with respect to the constitutional claims raised in the petition, the only specific mention of the County—as opposed to the NCBOE—is that it is a municipal corporation organized under the laws of New York.

50 N.Y.2d 707, 409 N.E.2d 876, 431 N.Y.S.2d 400

In the Matter of Hearst Corporation et al., Appellants, v. John J. Clyne, as Judge of the County Court of Albany County, et al., Respondents.

Court of Appeals of New York
Argued March 27, 1980;

decided July 3, 1980

CITE TITLE AS: Matter of Hearst Corp. v Clyne

SUMMARY

Appeal, on constitutional grounds, from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the Third Judicial Department, entered August 16, 1979, which, in a proceeding pursuant to CPLR article 78, dismissed a petition to declare illegal the closing of a courtroom to the press by respondents without a hearing during the entry of a guilty plea by a defendant and to enjoin respondents from granting such closure orders in the future without a hearing.

In March of 1979, respondent County Court Judge was conducting a joint suppression hearing in the criminal case of two defendants who had been indicted for the crimes of robbery in the first degree, burglary in the first degree and grand larceny in the second degree. The hearings were closed to the public and press on the motion of the defendants, without objection by the prosecutor and without a hearing. Petitioner newspaper reporter knew the hearings were closed and the courtroom doors locked, but was sufficiently interested in the proceedings to periodically walk by the courtroom to observe whatever she could. On March 7, during one of these periodic observations, the reporter noticed the attorney for one of the defendants standing outside the courtroom door. On the assumption that something other than a suppression hearing was in progress, she tried the courtroom door but found it locked. She then learned that the Judge, behind closed doors, had heard and granted a motion to close a proceeding during which one of the defendants was expected to enter a plea, which he did do during the proceeding. The Judge refused petitioners' request for a transcript of the plea proceeding or to direct the court stenographer to read back the minutes of the proceeding. On March 12, prior to trial, the other defendant also entered a plea of guilty before respondent Judge. Thereafter, he permitted the petitioners to obtain a copy of the transcript of the closed plea proceeding. The Appellate Division concluded that the closure was a proper exercise of the trial court's discretion and dismissed the petition.

The Court of Appeals reversed and remitted to the Appellate 708 Division for dismissal, holding, in an opinion by Judge Wachtler, that the case is moot and that there is no sufficient reason for the court to consider the merits of the appeal since the court has recently set forth the requirements that must be fulfilled before a judicial proceeding in this State may be closed to the public and the press.

Matter of Hearst Corp. v Clyne, 71 AD2d 966, reversed.

HEADNOTES

Appeal
Academic and Moot Questions

(1) Although an appeal will generally be considered moot unless the rights of the parties will be directly affected by the determination of the appeal and the interest of the parties is an immediate consequence of the judgment, the exception to the doctrine of mootness permits the courts to preserve for review cases which involve: (1) a likelihood of repetition, either between the parties or among other members of the public; (2) a phenomenon typically evading review; and (3) a showing of significant or important questions not previously passed on, i.e., substantial and novel issues. Accordingly, an appeal from an order dismissing a petition to declare illegal the closing of a courtroom to the press by respondent County Court Judge without a hearing during the entry of a guilty plea by a defendant and to enjoin respondent from granting such closure in the future without a hearing, must be dismissed as moot where the plea was concluded and the transcript of said proceeding furnished to the petitioners, a newspaper and a newspaper reporter, before they brought said petition, since the rights of the parties cannot be affected by the determination of the appeal; moreover, no sufficiently useful purpose would be served by retaining the appeal notwithstanding its mootness, since the Court of Appeals has recently set forth the requirements that must be fulfilled before a judicial proceeding in this State may be closed to the public and the press.

Crimes
Right to Public Trial

(2) All judicial proceedings, both civil and criminal, are presumptively open to the public; moreover, a proceeding at which a criminal defendant enters a plea of guilty is a substitute for a trial.

TOTAL CLIENT SERVICE LIBRARY REFERENCES

4 NY Jur 2d, Appellate Review §§301, 326, 327, 348

10 Carm-Wait 2d, Appeals in General §§ 70:262, 70:297, 70:298; 11 Carm-Wait 2d, Appeals to the Court of Appeals § 71:112

Judiciary Law §4

5 Am Jur 2d, Appeal and Error §§ 761-763, 768; 21 Am Jur 2d, Criminal Law §§ 257-262; 75 Am Jur 2d, Trial § 42

Am Jur Pl & Pr Forms (Rev), Criminal Procedure, Forms 151, 154

2 Am Jur Proof of Facts 495, Bias or Prejudice 709

1 Am Jur Trials 303, Controlling Trial Publicity

ANNOTATION REFERENCES

Right of accused to have press or other media representatives excluded from criminal trial. 49 ALR3d 1007.

Propriety of exclusion of press or other media representatives from civil trial. 79 ALR3d 401.

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Peter L. Danziger for appellants. I. The Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution guarantees petitioners the right to attend guilty plea proceedings. (People v Selikoff, 35 NY2d 227; Henderson v Morgan, 426 US 637; Boykin v Alabama, 395 US 238; People v Gina M. M., 40 NY2d 595; People v Seaton, 19 NY2d 404; Matter of Oliver, 333 US 257; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368.) II. The First and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution guarantee petitioners the right to attend plea proceedings. (Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 443 US 368; New York Times Co. v Sullivan, 376 US 254; Mills v Alabama, 384 US 214; Gitlow v New York, 268 US 652; Landmark Communications v Virginia, 435 US 829; Houchins v KQED, Inc., 438 US 1; Nebraska Press Assn. v Stuart, 427 US 539; Saxbe v Washington Post Co., 417 US 843.) III. Petitioners' right to attend a plea proceeding is guaranteed by the freedom of speech and press clause of the New York State Constitution. (Matter of Madole v Barnes, 20 NY2d 169; East Meadow Community Concerts Assn. v Board of Educ., 19 NY2d 605; Matter of Figari v New York Tel. Co., 32 AD2d 434; Pickering v Board of Educ., 391 US 563; People v Jones, 47 NY2d 409; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368; Matter of Oliver v Postel, 30 NY2d 171; Matter of United Press Assns. v Valente, 308 NY 71; Matter of New York Times Co. v Starkey, 51 AD2d 60.) IV. The common law of New York recognizes the right of petitioners to attend plea proceedings. (Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368; Lee v Brooklyn Union Pub. Co., 209 NY 245; People v Jones, 47 NY2d 409; People v Jones, 87 Misc 2d 931, 57 AD2d 1082, 44 NY2d 76; Matter of Rudd v Hazard, 266 NY 302; Crain v United States, 162 US 625; Maryland v Baltimore Radio Show, 338 US 912.) V. Section 4 of the Judiciary Law of this State requires that guilty plea proceedings remain open 710 to the public. (Matter of O'Connell, 90 Misc 2d 555; Lee v Brooklyn Union Pub. Co., 209 NY 245; Matter of United Press Assns. v Valente, 308 NY 71; Matter of Oliver v Postel, 30 NY2d 171; Craig v Harney, 331 US 367; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368.) VI. Closure of the plea proceeding without granting petitioners an opportunity to be heard violated petitioners' constitutional, statutory and common-law rights. (People v Hinton, 31 NY2d 71; United States v Bell, 464 F2d 667, 409 US 991; Carroll v Princess Anne, 393 US 175; Stuart v Palmer, 74 NY 183; Near v Minnesota, 283 US 697; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368; Freedman v Maryland, 380 US 51; United States v Schiavo, 504 F2d 1, cert den sub nom. Ditter v Philadelphia Newspapers, 419 US 1096; Matter of New York Times Co. v Starkey, 51 AD2d 60.)

Robert G. Lyman, County Attorney (William J. Conboy, II, of counsel), for John J. Clyne, respondent. I. This appeal must be dismissed upon the ground that no substantial constitutional question is directly involved. (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 70 AD2d 1066.) II. This proceeding presents neither questions likely to recur nor issues of sufficient importance and interest to justify this court's entertaining same. (Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368; Matter of Oliver v Postel, 30 NY2d 171; People v Jelke, 308 NY 56.) III. These petitioners-appellants waived any rights which they may have had to object to the closure in issue. (Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368.) IV. The plea proceeding at issue herein was in fact a pretrial proceeding and not the equivalent of a trial. (Boykin v Alabama, 395 US 238; People v Serrano, 15 NY2d 304; People v Seaton, 19 NY2d 404; People v Gina M. M., 40 NY2d 595; People ex rel. Steckler v Warden of City Prison, 259 NY 430; Maurer v People, 43 NY 1; People v Anderson, 16 NY2d 282; People v Jones, 87 Misc 2d 931, 57 AD2d 1082, 44 NY2d 76.) V. The order of exclusion at issue herein was a necessary and proper exercise of judicial discretion. VI. The trial court in the plea proceeding at issue had the inherent power to close the courtroom. VII. The closure at issue herein did not deprive petitioners-appellants of any due process.

Sol Greenberg, District Attorney (George H. Barber of counsel), for Sol Greenberg, respondent. I. A criminal defendant 711 and the people of the State of New York are entitled to the unimpaired right of a fair trial. (Sheppard v Maxwell, 384 US 333; Nebraska Press Assn. v Stuart, 427 US 539; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 443 US 368; Matter of Murchison, 349 US 133; People v McLaughlin, 150 NY 365; Estes v Texas, 381 US 532; People v Thomas, 47 NY2d 37.) II. The Sixth Amendment does not require public attendance at a guilty plea. (Marshall v United States, 360 US 310; Michelson v United States, 335 US 469; Matter of Rudd v Hazard, 266 NY 302.) III. The First Amendment does not guarantee public attendance at a guilty plea. (Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370.) IV. The New York State Constitution does not require public access to a guilty plea. (People v Nicholas, 35 AD2d 18.) V. There are exceptions to the general rule in New York that trials should be public. (Matter of Rudd v Hazard, 266 NY 302.) VI. Section 4 of the Judiciary Law does not require all Criminal Court proceedings to be public. (Matter of Oliver v Postel, 30 NY2d 171; United Press Assns. v Valente, 308 NY 71; People v Nicholas, 35 AD2d 18; People v Rickenbacker, 50 AD2d 566.) VII. The closure of the guilty plea proceeding without notice was proper and necessary. (Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370; People v Darden, 34 NY2d 177; People v Devine, 80 Misc 2d 641.) VIII. In the event courtroom was not closed and defendant Du Bray could not obtain a fair trial in Albany County, he would have been required to request a change of venue or surrender his right to a jury trial. (Marshall v United States, 360 US 310; Michelson v United States, 335 US 469; Patterson v Colorado, 205 US 454; Sheppard v Maxwell, 384 US 333.) IX. There was no alternative that would have preserved the fair trial rights of defendant Du Bray other than the closure of the courtroom during defendant Marathon's guilty plea. (Nebraska Press Assn. v Stuart, 427 US 539.)

Robert C. Bernius for Binghamton Press Company, Inc., and others, amici curiae. I. This court should articulate specific guidelines which disfavor in camera proceedings. (People v Jones, 47 NY2d 409; Matter of Oliver, 333 US 257; United States v Cianfrani, 573 F2d 835; Levine v United States, 362 US 610; Reynolds v United States, 98 US 145; Estes v Texas, 381 US 532; Sheppard v Maxwell, 384 US 333; Nebraska Press Assn. v Stuart, 427 US 539; People v Hinton, 31 NY2d 71.) II. Amici's guidelines achieve the appropriate balance. (United States v Cores, 356 US 405; People v Goldswer, 39 NY2d 656; 712 People v Moore, 46 NY2d 1; People v Briggs, 38 NY2d 319; Pennekamp v Florida, 328 US 331; Carroll v Princess Anne, 393 US 175; Shuttlesworth v Birmingham, 394 US 147; Fuentes v Shevin, 407 US 67; Mullane v Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 US 306; Boddie v Connecticut, 401 US 371.) III. Amici's guidelines are constitutionally mandated. (Duncan v Louisiana, 391 US 145; Shapiro v Thompson, 394 US 618; Poe v Ullman, 367 US 497; Harper v Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 US 663; Matter of Winship, 397 US 885; Moore v East Cleveland, 431 US 494; Yick Wo v Hopkins, 118 US 356.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Wachtler, J.

The petitioners in this article 78 proceeding are the publisher of the Albany Times-Union, a daily newspaper, and Shirley Armstrong, a reporter for that newspaper. The respondent, John J. Clyne, is a Judge of the Albany County Court.

In March of 1979 Judge Clyne was conducting a joint suppression hearing in the criminal case of Alexander Marathon and William Du Bray, who had been indicted for the crimes of robbery in the first degree, burglary in the first degree and grand larceny in the second degree. The hearings were closed to the public and press on the motion of the defendants, without objection by the prosecutor and without a hearing. Armstrong, the court reporter for the Times-Union, knew the hearings were closed and the courtroom doors locked, but was sufficiently interested in the proceedings to periodically walk by the courtroom to observe whatever she could.

On March 7, during one of these periodic observations, Armstrong noticed the attorney for Du Bray, one of the codefendants, standing outside the courtroom door. On the assumption that something other than a suppression hearing was in progress Armstrong tried the courtroom door but found it locked. She then learned from Du Bray's attorney that Judge Clyne, behind closed doors, had heard and granted a motion to close a proceeding during which Marathon was expected to enter a plea. The reporter, Armstrong, then knocked on the courtroom door. There was no response. After about 15 minutes the doors opened and she learned from Judge Clyne that Marathon had indeed entered a guilty plea. 713 The Judge, however, refused petitioners' request for a transcript of the plea proceeding or to direct the court stenographer to read back the minutes of the proceeding.

On March 12, prior to trial, the other defendant, Du Bray, also entered a plea of guilty before Judge Clyne. Thereafter Judge Clyne permitted the petitioners to obtain a copy of the transcript of the closed plea proceeding; that transcript has now been furnished to them and forms a part of the record on this appeal.

The transcript of the closed proceeding held March 7, which is the sole concern of this appeal, indicates that at the very commencement of the already closed suppression hearing which had been adjourned from March 5, Marathon's attorney orally moved to close the courtroom to all persons except Marathon, his attorney, and court personnel. The District Attorney joined the motion. Without taking evidence or hearing argument from anyone Judge Clyne immediately granted the motion, even excluding the codefendant Du Bray and his attorney from the courtroom, and had the doors secured. In sworn testimony Marathon then confessed his own participation in the crime for which he was indicted, inculpated his codefendant Du Bray, and was permitted to enter a plea of guilty to one count of the indictment.

The petitioners brought this proceeding seeking a declaration that the closure of the plea taking was illegal, and for an injunction prohibiting such closures in the future unless members of the press are afforded an opportunity to be heard.

The Appellate Division concluded that the closure was a proper exercise of the trial court's discretion and dismissed the petition. Petitioners appealed. We conclude that the case is moot and that there is no sufficient reason for this court to consider the merits of the appeal; however, for the reasons which follow, the order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and remitted for dismissal.

It is a fundamental principle of our jurisprudence that the power of a court to declare the law only arises out of, and is limited to, determining the rights of persons which are actually controverted in a particular case pending before the tribunal (Matter of State Ind. Comm., 224 NY 13, 16; California v San Pablo & Tulare R. R., 149 US 308, 314-315). This principle, which forbids courts to pass on academic, hypothetical, moot, or otherwise abstract questions, is founded both in constitutional separation-of-powers doctrine, and in methodological 714 strictures which inhere in the decisional process of a common-law judiciary.

Our particular concern on this appeal is with that facet of the principle which ordinarily precludes courts from considering questions which, although once live, have become moot by passage of time or change in circumstances. In general an appeal will be considered moot unless the rights of the parties will be directly affected by the determination of the appeal and the interest of the parties is an immediate consequence of the judgment. On the facts of the instant case, where the underlying plea proceeding had been long concluded and the transcript had been furnished to the petitioners at the time this action was commenced (cf. Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 436) we conclude that the rights of the parties cannot be affected by the determination of this appeal and it is therefore moot. Because we conclude that the appeal is moot it may not properly be decided by this court unless it is found to be within the exception to the doctrine which permits the courts to preserve for review important and recurring issues which, by virtue of their relatively brief existence, would be rendered otherwise nonreviewable (see Roe v Wade, 410 US 113, 125).

(1)In this court the exception to the doctrine of mootness has been subject over the years to a variety of formulations.[1] However, examination of the cases in which our court has found an exception to the doctrine discloses three common factors: (1) a likelihood of repetition, either between the 715 parties or among other members of the public; (2) a phenomenon typically evading review; and (3) a showing of significant or important questions not previously passed on, i.e., substantial and novel issues. After careful review we are persuaded that the case before us presents no questions the fundamental underlying principles of which have not already been declared by this court, and that this case is, therefore, not of the class that should be preserved as an exception to the mootness doctrine.

We acknowledge, as we have before, the very substantial character of the interests represented by the petitioners in this proceeding. We also note that questions such as the one posed may occasionally escape review. It is for this reason that on occasion we have entertained appeals even though the issues in the particular controversy have been resolved. However, as our court only recently has set forth in some detail the requirements that must be fulfilled before a judicial proceeding in this State may be closed to the public and press, no sufficiently useful purpose would be served in this instance by our retaining the appeal notwithstanding that the underlying controversy is now moot.

(2)It has, of course, long been the law in this State that all judicial proceedings, both civil and criminal, are presumptively open to the public (Judiciary Law, § 4; Lee v Brooklyn Union Pub. Co., 209 NY 245) and that a proceeding at which a criminal defendant enters a plea of guilty is indisputedly a substitute for a trial (People ex rel. Carr v Martin, 286 NY 27, 32). Indeed, in Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale (43 NY2d 370) it was only by distinguishing the pretrial and evidentiary nature of the proceeding at issue that this court could conclude that such a proceeding should ordinarily be closed to the public and press (Gannett, supra, at p 380). We were careful to note in Gannett (at p 378) that, "In the case now before us, the Trial Judge was not presiding over a trial on the merits".

In Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, (48 NY2d 430, supra.;), which was decided by this court after the decision of the Appellate Division in the instant case and which was obviously not available to inform either the trial or the appellate court, the issue was closure of a pretrial competency hearing. In that case even the pretrial nature of the proceeding was considered insufficient to nullify the presumption that all judicial proceedings are to be open. Thus the dissent is flatly incorrect in its statement that by dismissing 716 this appeal for mootness we are disposed to permit trials to be closed to the public on the same basis as pretrial proceedings. On the contrary, we have distinguished between pretrial and trial closures and expressed our consciousness of the danger inherent in permitting too casual a closure of even pretrial proceedings: "At the present time, in fact in most criminal cases, there are only pretrial proceedings. Thus if the public is routinely excluded from all proceedings prior to trial, most of the work of the criminal courts will be done behind closed doors" (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, supra, at p 440).

(1)Our decisions in Gannett (supra) and Leggett (supra) laid down the procedural framework within which the possibility of closure must be considered.[2] We conclude, therefore, that inasmuch as the principles governing fair trial- free press issues which might have been developed by consideration of the instant case have already been largely declared by our decisions in Gannett and Leggett, in this instance there is no sufficient reason to depart from the normal jurisprudential principle which calls for judicial restraint when the particular controversy has become moot.

More than that, we are convinced that there is a good reason in the circumstances of this case not to entertain this appeal for the purpose of extrapolating or refining the principles which we have declared. The closing of the plea hearing here occurred while the appeal from our Gannett decision was pending before the United States Supreme Court and some months before our decision in the Leggett case.[3] We cannot conclude that the trial court would have followed the procedures which he did or that he would necessarily have reached the same conclusion had our decision in Leggett preceded the hearing. While we can anticipate that the implementation of the principles that we have declared will not always be easy, we have no reason to question the readiness or capacity of the 717 Judges at nisi prius to seek to implement them appropriately with diligence, faithfulness and imagination. We conceive our jurisprudential role in this field as one of supervising and monitoring the dispositions made by our lower courts after we declare the applicable principles, rather than retrospectively appraising conduct of Trial Judges that preceded our declarations.

Other considerations also support our conclusion that this appeal should not be entertained. We are concerned with the vitality and fundamental soundness of our jurisprudence.

The engine of the common law is inductive reasoning. It proceeds from the particular to the general. It is an experimental method which builds its rules in tiny increments, case-by-case. It is cautious advance always a step at a time. The essence of its method is the continual testing and retesting of its principles in "those great laboratories of the law, the courts of justice" (Smith, Jurisprudence, p 21).[4]

Conscious judicial restraint is essential--its absence diminishes the craftsmanship of the courts and debases the judicial product. A common-law Judge will not reach to decide a question not properly before him. Nor will he attempt to state a broad rule except when absolutely required--and then it will be cast in terms which permit it to be moulded in light of the experience of those who must work with it. A newly articulated rule should not be immediately recast "for the attempt to do absolute justice in every single case would make the development and maintenance of general rules impossible" (Smith, Jurisprudence, p 21).

Finally, it must be explicitly stated that in dismissing the present appeal as moot we express no view on the merits. Our disposition here is not to be read as any withdrawal from, addition to, or elaboration on our opinions in Gannett and Leggett. It is entirely incorrect to suggest otherwise. Nor should our dismissal be interpreted as presaging a disposition to decline on grounds of mootness to entertain appeals in future fair-trial, free-press cases. We recognize, of course, that cases in this area of the law, because of considerations of timing, would often, even usually, evade review if appeals were uniformly to be dismissed for mootness. We shall continue 718 to resolve each case in this field on the basis of its individual characteristics and merits, only one aspect of which will be its mootness, if moot it is.

Concluding as we do that the appeal is moot and not of a character which should be preserved for review, the appeal should be dismissed. In this case, however, because the Appellate Division had no opportunity to consider the matter in light of our decision in Leggett (supra) we should reverse and remit with directions to dismiss solely on the ground of mootness, in order to prevent a judgment which is unreviewable for mootness from spawning any legal consequences or precedent (see Matter of Adirondack League Club v Board of Black Riv. Regulating Dist., 301 NY 219, 223; cf. United States v Munsingwear, 340 US 36, 39; United States v Alaska S. S. Co., 253 US 113, 115).

Meyer, J.

(Concurring).

I concur fully in Judge Wachtler's opinion and write only because where the dissent finds implications in that opinion which "do not bode well for the future of public trials in this State" (p 723), I find in the dissent suggestions which, if they become the governing rule, may adversely affect the individual's right to a fair trial.

I, of course, do not suggest that the media are to be regularly, or even often, excluded from the courtroom. What I am urging is that the problem must be analyzed not in terms of categories and classifications but of the rights affected, and that, without a very much clearer demonstration that the public's interest cannot be reasonably protected without infringing individual rights than has been made, the rights of the individual on trial may not be subordinated to the rights of the public to know what goes on in a courtroom or how the system of justice is functioning.

The genius of the American constitutional experiment has been the protections it affords individuals against oppression by the majority, whether in the form of star chamber proceedings or of stadium trials, the result of either of which is an equally foregone conclusion. Important as it is that justice appear to the public to be done, in final analysis the public is grossly disserved if it not in fact be done in each individual case.

Resolution of the instant case, were it to be decided on the merits, would turn not on whether the taking of a guilty plea is the equivalent of a trial or more nearly a preliminary 719 proceeding, or whether the fair trial rights at stake were those of the pleading defendant or his codefendant. The fact is, as both we and the United States Supreme Court have recognized, that there are occasions when parts of trials, as well as of pretrial proceedings, may constitutionally be closed (Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 443 US 368, 388, n 19, and cases cited; People v Jones, 47 NY2d 409; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 377-378, affd 443 US 368), though as we have made clear the discretion to do so is to be "sparingly exercised and then, only when unusual circumstances necessitate it" (People v Hinton, 31 NY2d 71, 76; accord: Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 441). Closure during trial, moreover, will usually be to protect some interest of a third person or the public, rather than of the person on trial[1] (to protect the public interest in not revealing the identity of an informer, People v Jones, supra; People v Hinton, supra; see Proposed Code of Evidence for the State of New York, § 510; to protect the life of a witness or shield him or her from embarrassment, People v Hagan, 24 NY2d 395, cert den 396 US 886; People v Smallwood, 31 NY2d 750; United States ex rel. Smallwood v La Valle, 377 F Supp 1148, affd 508 F2d 837, cert den 421 US 920; see Judiciary Law, § 4; to protect the interests of the defendant and the public in orderly trial, United States ex rel. Orlando v Fay, 350 F2d 967).

Nor can I accept the dissent's assumption that there is an "absence of prejudice" to codefendant Du Bray in permitting Marathon's guilty plea to be taken in open court. Short of publishing a confession by Du Bray before it has been ruled admissible, nothing could be more devastating to his rights than Marathon's accusatory words. Given in a plea proceeding, such words are usually the quid pro quo for some favor of the law, generally a lesser sentence. To permit such information to get to potential jurors without the prophylaxis of cross-examination pointedly indicating the self-serving nature of the accusation is materially to disadvantage such a codefendant, for cross-examination when it does occur will be less effective than it would have been had the accusation not come to the jury in advance of trial and with the imprimatur of the press. 720 It is possible to disadvantage such a codefendant in an additional way which cannot be known before trial. It is not unknown for a person in Marathon's position to recant when called to testify at his codefendant's trial. In such a case his statement about the codefendant at his own guilty plea "may be received only for the purpose of impeaching" him "and does not constitute evidence in chief" (CPL 60.35, subd 2). While the Trial Judge must so instruct the jury (id.), such an instruction, of questionable psychological value in any event,[2] will be even less effective than usual because the accusation came to the jury in advance of trial and with the imprimatur of the press.

The problem that arises when the issue is discussed in terms of categories rather than effect on individual rights is well illustrated by the present case. The dissent sees the closure here involved as casting "a veil of secrecy over the major component of the criminal justice system" (p 728) and the fact that the pleading defendant might implicate his codefendant as insufficient justification for closure (p 727). In my view there is a ready means of protecting the public's interest in the Marathon- Du Bray trials without sacrificing Du Bray's clear right not to have the jury pool for his trial, scheduled to begin a few days later, tainted by media accounts of Marathon's plea statements implicating him, and the number of plea proceedings in which, to protect the rights of a codefendant, closure of part or all of the plea proceeding might occur is an insignificant part of the criminal justice system. So far as the record and briefs reveal (including the brief of amici which catalogues a number of recent closures) this is the first such case.

The tension between public and individual interests that arises over an issue such as whether by closing so much of a plea proceeding as relates to him a codefendant should be protected against revelation in advance of his trial of the pleading defendant's accusations against him, arises not because of the presence of media representatives in the courtroom, but because it is a constitutional absolute that what transpires in open court is public property and may be immediately 721 disseminated. Responsible media often will delay publication nonetheless,[3] but quite properly are unwilling to permit the invasion of First Amendment rights that would be involved in permitting the courts to tell them when they can publish. Yet, just as not all Judges are exemplars of their craft, neither are all editors able to perceive in their highly competitive profession the value to individual rights of delaying publication. The antidote for the nonexemplary Judge is to keep courtrooms open to the fullest extent consistent with individual rights. The antidote for the unresponsive or irresponsible editor is to close the courtroom when there is a real probability that publication of what is to be revealed in the courtroom will materially prejudice the defendant on trial, because in no other constitutionally acceptable way can his rights be protected.

I, of course, do not ignore the existence of procedures such as change of venue, change of venire, continuance, waiver of jury, sequestration, some of which are discussed by the Supreme Court in Nebraska Press Assn. v Stuart (427 US 539, 563), as alternatives to prior restraint. But I cannot accept the concept that these possibilities, most of which[4] involve denigration of defendant's constitutional protections are acceptable alternatives (cf. Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 444, supra.;; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 380, affd 443 US 368, supra.;).

In my view the Bills of Rights set forth in article I of the New York State Constitution and the first 10 amendments to the United States Constitution become a mockery when, because of publicity, a court must say to a man on trial for his life or for his liberty, you are entitled to a speedy trial, but not yet. You are entitled to trial by a jury, unless you fear that pretrial publicity has so adversely affected the impartiality of those who will be called as potential jurors that you 722 dare not risk the result. You are entitled to a trial by a jury of your neighbors, but not those nearby. You are entitled to confront and cross-examine witnesses, but not those whose testimony is given through the newspapers. You are entitled to exclude improperly seized matter from the jury as evidence, but not as a news story. The more is this so when what we deal with is not prior restraint on publication as in Stuart, but denial of access for a limited time as to a limited part of the proceeding, and when we impose upon the defendant seeking closure not only the burden of showing that such procedures will not "dispel prejudice", but also what impact the prejudicial information will have on the jury pool, in light of its size, the extent of the media coverage and the effect of that coverage on the public at large (see Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, supra, at p 447 [Cooke, Ch. J., concurring]). Bearing in mind that "none are more lowly-- none more subject to potential abuse--and none with more at stake than those who have been indicted and face criminal prosecution in our courts" (ibid., at p 444 [Wachtler, J., majority opn]), I conclude that the required showing presses to the outer limits of, if it does not exceed, due process requirements for all but the wealthy defendant.

Delayed access does not affect the rights of the public or of the media in any similar way. As suggested in Gannett (43 NY2d, at p 381) and ordered in Westchester Rockland Newspapers (48 NY2d, at p 445), a full transcript of the plea proceeding in this matter was made and was furnished to appellant as soon as the danger to Du Bray's interest was past. Perhaps consideration should be given to (1) equipping one courtroom in each courthouse with videotape equipment so that any closed portion of a trial or pretrial proceeding can be recorded in a way that will make available to the media with all the nuances of voice and gesture exactly what transpired while the courtroom was closed, (2) requiring that any closed proceeding be held in that courtroom and videotaped in its entirety, (3) putting the operation of the videotape equipment and the retention of the tapes in the hands of a public commission independent of the courts or other members of the criminal justice system and subject to court order only as to time of release, which would, in any event, be required to be not later than a few days after the trial of defendant or a codefendant ends (cf. Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure, rule 714, 10 ULA 317). Though no objective evidence of which 723 I am aware indicates the need for the procedure suggested, I recognize the importance of assuring our citizens that the judicial process is above suspicion, and believe any resulting inconvenience to the system to be more than offset if we thereby assure the constitutional rights of individuals accused.

Use of the suggested procedure together with the preliminary hearing mandated by the Gannett and Westchester Rockland Newspapers cases will preserve both the rights of the public (and the media in the interest of the public) to the free flow of information about the courts and the "most fundamental of all freedoms,"[5] the right of an accused individual to a fair trial.

Chief Judge Cooke

(Dissenting).

A majority of the court today in effect sanctions the exclusion of the public and the press from a guilty plea proceeding in a criminal case. Because closure of a plea proceeding is tantamount to closure of a trial itself, and because the tacit implications of the court's decision do not bode well for the future of public trials in this State, I must respectfully dissent.[1]

The present article 78 proceeding stems from a criminal proceeding in Albany County. In September of 1978, Alexander Marathon and William Du Bray were indicted for the crimes of robbery in the first degree, burglary in the first degree and grand larceny in the second degree. Although the case did attract media attention, the publicity does not appear to have been substantial. Nonetheless, when a joint suppression hearing was convened on March 5, 1979, defendants moved for exclusion of the public. The court granted the motion, without objection by the prosecutor, and without conducting a hearing, and ordered the doors to the courtroom locked.

During the course of the closed suppression hearing, defendant Marathon decided to enter a guilty plea. While the courtroom was still locked, and the public and reporters barred, Marathon's counsel moved to close the courtroom during the plea proceeding. The District Attorney joined in the motion, and the Judge again ordered closure, stating only 724 that "In the exercise of discretion and in the interests of justice, I will close the courtroom at this time to all non-Court personnel". Later the court explained that it closed the plea proceeding because it was likely that Marathon would implicate Du Bray, rendering it difficult to select an impartial jury when Du Bray came to trial.

Petitioner Armstrong, a reporter for the Albany Times-Union, was aware of the closed suppression hearing, and allegedly made periodic checks of the courtroom where she believed the hearing was being conducted. She first learned of the closed plea proceeding from the attorney for Du Bray, who was excluded from the proceeding and was standing outside the courtroom.

Ms. Armstrong visited the Judge in his chambers, and he confirmed that a guilty plea had been entered. The Judge indicated that a transcript of the proceeding would be available in a few days, but denied Ms. Armstrong's request to have the stenographer read the minutes to her. The next day, petitioners delivered a letter to the Judge protesting the closure and requested either an immediate transcript or an order directing the court reporter to relate the minutes of the proceeding. This request was denied.

On the following Monday, Du Bray entered a plea of guilty. Ms. Armstrong was then permitted to purchase a copy of the minutes taken at Marathon's plea. Shortly thereafter, this proceeding was instituted.

At the outset, I cannot agree that the proceeding should be dismissed for mootness. As the court has but recently reaffirmed regarding closure orders, "we have traditionally retained jurisdiction, despite a claim of mootness, because of the importance of the question involved, the possibility of recurrence, and the fact that orders of this nature quickly expire and thus typically evade review" (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 436-437). By now rejecting this exception to the mootness doctrine, the majority has provided a precedent to effectively insulate closure orders from legal challenge. Indeed, since we have previously cautioned trial courts against staying the criminal proceeding while collateral review of a closure order proceeds (Matter of Merola v Bell, 47 NY2d 985, 987- 988), the closure order will be moot and evade review in all but the rarest of instances.

No persuasive reason has been given for now overruling the 725 mootness exception for closure orders so recently recited and recognized in Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale (43 NY2d 370, affd 443 US 368) and Westchester Rockland.[2] Indeed, the majority furnishes no explanation whatsoever as to why the mootness exception applied in those cases falls short of reaching the situation in this matter, but notes somewhat cryptically that future cases may or may not be moot. Perhaps more unsettling is the absence of guidelines by which to evaluate mootness in these proceedings. If the court is unwilling to apply the mootness exception here, where a novel and not insubstantial issue is presented, it is difficult to predict when the exception will again be invoked. Such ad hoc, unexplained decision making is not in harmony with the best interests of our system of jurisprudence.

Nor do I agree that the "principles governing fair trial-free press issues  have already been largely declared by our decisions in Gannett" (majority opn, at p 716) and in Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett (supra, at pp 439-442). Undoubtedly, Westchester Rockland and Gannett establish the procedural and substantive rules to be followed when dealing with a motion to close pretrial proceedings. Those guidelines do not cover the situation here, as a guilty plea proceeding is simply not pretrial in nature. Rather, it is a substitute for and the legal and practical equivalent of the trial itself. A plea of guilty establishes "guilt of the crime charged as incontrovertibly as a verdict of a jury upon a trial" (People ex rel. Carr v Martin, 286 NY 27; see, e.g., People v Krennen, 264 NY 108, 109; People ex rel. Hubert v Kaiser, 206 NY 46, 53). The plea is in itself a conviction (e.g., People v Jones, 44 NY2d 76, 82-83, citing Boykin v Alabama, 359 US 238). "Like a verdict of a jury it is conclusive. More is not required; the court has nothing to do but give judgment and sentence" (Kercheval v United States, 274 US 220, 223). Thus, 726 by stating that Westchester Rockland and Gannett are controlling, the court is effectively holding that trials may be closed to the public on the same basis as pretrial proceedings.

And the court may not sidestep this significant issue by merely asserting that Westchester Rockland recognized a distinction between trial and pretrial proceedings, for the fact remains that Westchester Rockland articulated substantive standards for only pretrial proceedings. Today's decision must be construed as indorsing the application of those same standards to trial closures, and thereby sustaining the constitutionality of excluding the public and press from a trial itself. The fallacy in this holding is demonstrated by the Supreme Court's retention of jurisdiction--at least for the present--in a case where the trial was closed to the public (Richmond Newspapers v Virginia, 448 US ___, 48 USLW 3241). That action signals a strong possibility that the closing of a trial presents a substantial Federal constitutional question, even after Gannett upheld pretrial closure. It is thus difficult to fathom the majority's efforts to avoid a question with such momentous constitutional and societal impact.[3]

This is especially disturbing because the rationale for excluding the public from pretrial proceedings does not justify closure of plea hearings.[4] This court has a number of times reviewed the serious conflict which gave rise to the pretrial closure controversy. On the one hand, the public is possessed of a right to open judicial proceedings.[5] Not only is this right deeply rooted in our history (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 445, supra.; [concurring opn]), but it is mandated by the clear long-standing command of the Legislature: "[t]he sittings of every court within this state shall be public, and every citizen may freely attend the 727 same" (Judiciary Law, § 4). At the same time, there are instances, however rare, where pretrial publicity may effectively destroy the accused's right to a fair trial (see Sheppard v Maxwell, 384 US 333). The precise point at which the public right to know must give way to the defendant's right to a fair trial has and will continue to spark lively debate (compare Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 443-444, with id., at pp 445-448, supra.;).

But we can all agree as to the possible source of the potential prejudice at pretrial suppression hearings. Because the very purpose of such proceedings is to determine the admissibility of evidence, they "are often a potent source for the revelation of evidence which is both highly prejudicial to the defendant's case and not properly admissible at trial" (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, supra, at p 439). If the hearing is open, and the case is well publicized, it is possible that the evidence will be disclosed to potential jurors but ultimately excluded from use at trial. This could subvert the very purpose of the hearing.

By contrast, none of these possible dangers attend when the plea proceeding is opened to public view. Given a defendant's voluntary decision to admit his guilt in open court, and the fact that the plea proceeding will quickly ripen into a conviction, the possibility of a defendant's rights being impaired by the presence of the public and the press is almost nonexistent. And, even if it be assumed that concern for a codefendant's rights would ever warrant closure of a plea, the mere fact that the pleading defendant might implicate his cohort is insufficient justification. It is true, of course, that the defendant's statements at the plea, if they implicate the codefendant, would be prejudicial. But all evidence which suggests guilt is highly prejudicial. This does not mean that all inculpatory evidence must be enjoined from pretrial disclosure. The narrow rationale for considering closure of the suppression hearing is that the damaging evidence may prove to be inadmissible at trial. There is no reason to suppose that the evidence uncovered at a plea hearing would be inadmissible at the later trial of a codefendant. Indeed, more often than not, the defendant who pleaded can probably be expected to testify at the codefendant's trial--possibly for the prosecution, possibly for the defense. It follows that there is no ipso facto basis for overriding the command of section 4 of the Judiciary Law with respect to plea proceedings. 728

In addition to the absence of prejudice, the public has a compelling stake in open plea proceedings. "Publicity, not secrecy, in arraignment, plea and judgment is part of our tradition" (Matter of Rudd v Hazard, 266 NY 302, 307). Especially in modern times, when guilty pleas account for most criminal dispositions, it is particularly egregious to close the courtroom doors on these proceedings. In some areas of the State, guilty pleas make up three fourths of all criminal dispositions (Twenty-Second Ann Report of NY Judicial Conference, 1977, p 56). And, in any calendar year, guilty pleas may constitute 90-95% of all convictions obtained State-wide (see id., at p 58). To exclude the public from plea proceedings of codefendants is thus to exclude the public from the workings of a substantial part of the criminal justice system.[6]

The beneficial aspects of an open criminal justice system have been often enough discussed to need no repetition here (see, e.g., Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 443 US 368, 407, 421-422, 427-433, supra.; [Blackmun, J., concurring and dissenting]; Friendly, Crime and Publicity; Note, The Right to Attend Criminal Hearings, 78 Col L Rev 1308). But it would not be amiss to note that if the plea is insulated from public view, the public may be deprived of their most effective method of determining whether elected officials are enforcing the law "with vigor and impartiality" (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 437, supra.;). And, casting a veil of secrecy over the major component of the criminal justice system may well lead our citizens to view the judicial process with a suspicious eye (see People v Hinton, 31 NY2d 71, 73, supra.;). It is not enough that justice be done. It must be perceived as being done in the eyes of the public.

Finally, it bears emphasis that the closure motion in the present case was entertained in secret, with no representative of the public or media afforded an opportunity to voice opposition. Moreover, the motion was granted in summary fashion without any showing in support of it. These procedures cannot be sanctioned (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 442, supra.;). The majority's explanation--that closure occurred prior to the Westchester Rockland case--is unacceptable. Even prior to Westchester Rockland it was clear that closure could not be ordered absent some 729 showing of potential prejudice (Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 376-381, affd 443 US 368, supra.;). Here, there was none. And, it had also been stated in Gannett that "the courts should of course afford interested members of the news media an opportunity to be heard  to determine the magnitude of any genuine public interest" (43 NY2d, at p 381). Since the closure in this case occurred after the procedural guidelines in Gannett were promulgated, the majority's explanation of the improprieties does not bear scrutiny. Thus, the procedural irregularities alone would warrant reversal.

Accordingly, the judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed.

Judges Jasen, Gabrielli, Jones and Fuchsberg concur with Judge Wachtler; Judge Meyer concurs in a separate opinion; Chief Judge Cooke dissents and votes to reverse in another opinion.

Judgment reversed, without costs, and matter remitted to the Appellate Division, Third Department, with directions to dismiss the proceeding solely on the ground of mootness.

730

Footnotes

1 "[N]ovel and important question of statutory construction" (Le Drugstore Etat Unis v New York State Bd. of Pharmacy, 33 NY2d 298, 301); "of a character which is likely to recur not only with respect to the parties before the court but with respect to others as well" (East Meadow Community Concerts Assn. v Board of Educ., 18 NY2d 129, 135); "only exceptional cases, where the urgency of establishing a rule of future conduct is imperative and manifest will justify a departure from our general practice" (Matter of Lyon Co. v Morris, 261 NY 497, 499); question of "importance and interest and because of the likeliness that they will recur" (Matter of Jones v Berman, 37 NY2d 42, 57); "question of general interest and substantial public importance is likely to recur" (People ex rel. Guggenheim v Mucci, 32 NY2d 307, 310); question "of major importance and [that] will arise again and again" (Matter of Rosenbluth v Finkelstein, 300 NY 402, 404); questions of "general interest, substantial public importance and likely to arise with frequency" (Matter of Gold v Lomenzo, 29 NY2d 468, 476); "importance of the question involved, the possibility of recurrence, and the fact that orders of this nature quickly expire and thus typically evade review" (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 437); "crystalizes a recurring and delicate issue of concrete significance" (Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 376).

2 In Gannett we stated that in determining the propriety of closure in a particular case the court "should of course afford interested members of the news media an opportunity to be heard, not in the context of a full evidentiary hearing, but in a preliminary proceeding adequate to determine the magnitude of any genuine public interest" (43 NY2d 370, 381). That precatory language in Gannett was the foundation for the mandate of Leggett (supra, at p 442) which spelled out in as much detail as a common-law court may, the procedure to be followed by a trial court which is confronted with a request for closure of a criminal proceeding.

3 We also note that the appeal in Richmond Newspapers v Virginia (448 US ___, 48 USLW 3241) is now pending before the Supreme Court.

4 (Cf. Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process, p 25: "This work of modification is gradual. It goes on inch by inch. Its effects must be measured by decades and even centuries. Thus measured, they are seem to have behind them the power and pressure of the moving glacier.")

1 Hearings preliminary in nature (e.g., suppression) are sometimes permitted during trial. For purposes of present discussion they should be classed as preliminary, but as indicated in the text the difference is not determinative. What is determinative is the effect on individual rights of what will be revealed.

2 For Mr. Justice Jackson that such an instruction could overcome the prejudice involved was a "naive assumption" which "all practicing lawyers know to be unmitigated fiction" (Krulewitch v United States, 336 US 440, 453 [concurring opn]; see, also, Bruton v United States, 391 US 123, 128-136; Jackson v Denno, 378 US 368, 388; Kalven & Zeisel, American Jury, p 128).

3 That effective news reporting is possible notwithstanding delay is clear from the New York Times' handling of the Franzese case (United States v Franzese, 392 F2d 954, vacated in part and remanded sub nom. Giordano v United States, 394 US 310). In that case the Times honored the Trial Judge's request and withheld until conclusion of the trial reporting on what occurred in the courtroom out of the presence of the jury. It then printed a roundup story concerning the trial, including the material earlier withheld (New York Times, March 4, 1967, p 28, cols 4-8).

4 Sequestration is the exception, but it involves a potential of jury resentment at being locked up for the duration of the trial which makes it likewise unacceptable as an alternative (cf. Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 444, supra.;).

5 (Estes v Texas, 381 US 532, 540: "We have always held that the atmosphere essential to the preservation of a fair trial--the most fundamental of all freedoms--must be maintained at all costs.")

1 It should never be forgotten that the concept of a public trial has its genesis in concern for protection of the accused (see People v Hinton, 31 NY2d 71; Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 443 US 368, 406 [Blackmun, J., concurring and dissenting]).

2 As the majority correctly notes, the mootness exception recognized in Gannett and Leggett applies in instances where an important issue is capable of recurring while evading review (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v Leggett, 48 NY2d 430, 436-437, supra.;; Matter of Gannett Co. v De Pasquale, 43 NY2d 370, 376, supra.;; see Matter of Carr v New York State Bd. of Elections, 40 NY2d 556, 559; see, also, Matter of United Press Assns. v Valente, 308 NY 71, 76). Since Leggett presented an issue substantially similar to Gannett, the retention of jurisdiction in Leggett apparently represents a policy decision by the court to continue to apply the mootness exception in closure cases. Alternatively, the court may have viewed Leggett as presenting a novel question, even after Gannett. Under either rationale, the mootness exception applies here.

3 It is also difficult to understand how the majority can find this proceeding moot and yet effectively rule on the merits of the trial closure. By finding Westchester Rockland controlling, as discussed, the majority has held that a trial may constitutionally be closed, in instances not previously permitted.

4 The two are not the same but are separate and distinct and they do not mix or merge. A justifiable closure of the suppression hearing did not envelop the plea for by nature and law there was a cessation of the former before the initiation of the latter.

5 In People v Hinton (31 NY2d 71, supra.;), it was well stated at page 73: "Public trials, of necessity, serve a twofold purpose. They safeguard an accused's right to be dealt with fairly and not to be unjustly condemned  and concomitantly serve to instill a sense of public trust in our judicial process by preventing the abuses of secret tribunals as exemplified by the Inquisition, Star Chamber and lettre de cachet  Not only the defendant himself, but also the public at large has a vital stake in the concept of a public trial."

6 Even more troubling is the possibility of closure of a plenary trial where one defendant is to be tried separately from and before his codefendant.

End of Document

41 N.Y.2d 283, 360 N.E.2d 1086, 392 N.Y.S.2d 403

In the Matter of Charles Jeter et al., Respondents, v. Ellenville Central School District et al., Respondents, Board of Education of the City of Yonkers et al., Appellants-Respondents, and Board of Education, City School District of the City of New Rochelle, Respondent- Appellant.

Court of Appeals of New York
Argued January 3, 1977;

decided February 15, 1977

CITE TITLE AS: Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist.

HEADNOTES

Schools
liability for cost of instruction--pupils placed in family homes.

(1) Paragraph a of subdivision 5 of section 3202 of the Education Law (as amd by L 1974, ch 919) is to be interpreted as imposing the cost of instruction of pupils placed in family homes at board by social services districts and State agencies on the school 284 district in which the pupil resided at the time the social services district or State agency assumed responsibility for his support and maintenance, provided that such cost of instruction shall continue to be borne by any social services district or State agency which assumed responsibility for tuition costs prior to January 1, 1974.

(2) The proviso in paragraph a which refers to any social services district or State agency "which assumed responsibility for tuition costs for any such pupil" refers only to districts and agencies that, prior to January 1, 1974 assumed responsibility for tuition costs of welfare beneficiaries in addition to or as distinguished from responsibility for general support and maintenance. Use of the terms "support and maintenance" and "tuition costs" in close proximity supports the conclusion that the references were to assumptions of different responsibilities.

(3) Arguments addressed to the economic and political wisdom of the cost allocation scheme of the statute are disputations outside the scope of judicial review.

(4) While the New York City Board of Education and Department of Social Services and the Board of Education of the City of Yonkers have procedural standing to be heard on questions of statutory interpretation, they do not have the substantive right to raise constitutional challenges as to due process and equal protection.

(5) There is no warrant in the statute or its legislative history for a presumption that the school district in which the pupil resided immediately before his transfer to the receiving school district is the municipal entity responsible for payment of the cost of instruction to the receiving district.

Matter of Jeter v Ellenville Cent. School Dist., 50 AD2d 366, affirmed.

SUMMARY

Cross appeals, by appellants-respondents as of right on constitutional grounds, and by respondent-appellant by permission of the Court of Appeals, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the Third Judicial Department, entered January 15, 1976, which modified, on the law and the facts, and, as modified, affirmed an order and judgment of the Supreme Court at Special Term (John L. Larkin, J.; opn 81 Misc 2d 511), entered in Ulster County, (1) converting the proceeding pursuant to CPLR article 78 into an action for a declaratory judgment, (2) declaring subdivision 5 of section 3202 of the Education Law constitutional, (3) ordering that all social services districts and State departments were to comply with the express terms of subdivision 5 of section 3202 of the Education Law by immediately forwarding reimbursement for tuition as required by statute, if tuition payments were made prior to January 1, 1974, (4) declaring that the school district in which each child resided immediately prior to his transfer to the school district of present residence was the body responsible for the reimbursement for tuition required by the statute, and (5) declaring that no district in the State may refuse to admit any pupil to a full course of elementary or secondary education because of its failure to receive reimbursement for the cost of instruction as mandated by 285 subdivision 5 of section 3202 of the Education Law. The modification consisted of striking the decretal paragraph which imposed immediate liability upon the school district in which a child resided at the time of his transfer to the school district seeking tuition.

POINTS OF COUNSEL

W. Bernard Richland, Corporation Counsel (Alfred Weinstein, L. Kevin Sheridan and Joseph F. Bruno of counsel), for New York City Board of Education and another, appellants.

Eugene J. Fox, Corporation Counsel (Howard Most of counsel), for Board of Education of City of Yonkers, appellant-respondent.

Peter M. Fishbein and Robert S. Ellenport, New York City, for Board of Education, City School District of City of New Rochelle, respondent-appellant.

Gerald Harris, County Attorney (Jonathan Lovett of counsel), White Plains, for Westchester County Department of Social Services, respondent.

OPINION OF THE COURT

Jones, J.

We hold that paragraph a of subdivision 5 of section 3202 of the Education Law is to be interpreted as imposing the cost of instruction of pupils placed in family homes at board by social services districts and State departments and agencies on the school district in which the pupil resided at the time the district, department or agency assumed responsibility for his support and maintenance, provided that the cost of instruction shall continue to be borne by any district, department or agency which had assumed responsibility for tuition costs (as distinguished from support and maintenance) prior to January 1, 1974. The attacks aimed by appellants at paragraph a as so interpreted must be rejected.

The statutory provision with which we deal is a portion of the section of the Education Law that establishes the right to free public education for resident pupils and sets forth details of making education available to nonresident pupils, including allocation of the cost of such education. Paragraph a was added to subdivision 5 of section 3202 by chapter 867 of the Laws of 1973 with a view to relieving school districts of the financial burden of educating pupils who are placed in family homes within the district at board from other school districts, a burden to which the districts furnishing the educational services had been subjected under prior law. Paragraph a, as amended by chapter 919 of the Laws of 1974, now provides in relevant part: "The cost of instruction of pupils placed in 286 family homes at board by a social services district or a state department or agency shall be borne by the school district in which each such pupil resided at the time the social services district or state department or agency assumed responsibility for the support and maintenance of such pupil; provided, however, that such cost of instruction shall continue to be borne while such pupil remains under the age of twenty-one years, by any social services district or state department or agency which assumed responsibility for tuition costs for any such pupil prior to January one, nineteen hundred seventy-four."

This litigation, instituted to compel provision of public education for particular children residing in foster homes in Ellenville Central School District, was subsequently expanded and parties added to permit a broad determination of responsibility for the cost of such instruction under the quoted statutory subdivision. The courts below have given a literal meaning to the language of paragraph a of Education Law, section 3202, subdivision 5, and have upheld its constitutionality.

We first address the issue of statutory interpretation pressed by the City School District of the City of New Rochelle. This appellant would have us read the defining phrase in the proviso at the end of the quoted statutory sentence--"which assumed responsibility for tuition costs for any such pupil"--as referable not to tuition costs but to the assumption of responsibility for support and maintenance of the pupil. The result of such an interpretation would be to relieve all school districts of educational costs of pupils who had become public charges prior to January 1, 1974, rather than to limit such relief only to those public charges for whom a social welfare district or State department or agency had assumed responsibility for tuition costs (as distinguished from support and maintenance) prior to that date. We reject this suggestion. In our view the language of the subdivision facially and literally draws an unmistakable distinction between responsibility of a social services district or a State department or agency for "support and maintenance" and for "tuition costs". Use of the different terms in such close proximity within the same sentence gives strong support to the conclusion that the references were to assumptions of different responsibilities. We find nothing in the legislative history to which our attention is drawn which would suggest, let alone compel, a contrary 287 legislative meaning, intention or purpose (cf. New York State Bankers Assn. v Albright, 38 NY2d 430, esp 435-438, and cases cited). Accordingly, we agree that the proviso at the end of the first sentence of paragraph a of Education Law, section 3202, subdivision 5, must be held to refer only to social services districts and State departments and agencies that, prior to January 1, 1974, assumed responsibility for the tuition costs of welfare beneficiaries in addition to or as distinguished from responsibility for their general support and maintenance.

As to challenges to the validity of the paragraph in general, we first observe that very much of the extensive arguments advanced by the parties is addressed to the economic and political wisdom of the cost allocation scheme set out in the statute, a realm of disputation which is quite outside the scope of judicial review (Montgomery v Daniels, 38 NY2d 41, 53; cf. People v Broadie, 37 NY2d 100, 118). The New York City Board of Education and Department of Social Services and the Board of Education of the City of Yonkers seek also to mount attacks of varying degrees of plausibility and relevance under the due process and equal protection clauses of our State and Federal Constitutions. While these units of municipal government have procedural standing to participate in the present litigation (and thus to be heard, for instance, on questions of statutory interpretation), they do not have the substantive right to raise these constitutional challenges. (Williams v Mayor, 289 US 36; Trenton v New Jersey, 262 US 182; City of New York v Richardson, 473 F2d 923, 929, cert den sub nom. Lavine v Lindsay, 412 US 950; Lindsay v Wyman, 372 F Supp 1360, 1366; Triplett v Tiemann, 302 F Supp 1239, 1242; Matter of County of Cayuga v McHugh, 4 NY2d 609, 616; Black Riv. Regulating Dist. v Adirondack League Club, 307 NY 475, 488, app dsmd 351 US 922; Robertson v Zimmermann, 268 NY 52, 64; see Right of municipality to invoke constitutional provisions against acts of State Legislature, Ann., 116 ALR 1037.) This is not an instance in which the municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription (cf. Board of Educ. v Allen, 20 NY2d 109, affd 392 US 236).

Finally, we agree with the Appellate Division that, whatever may be the practical problems of administration engendered by the present statutory formulation, and understandable 288 as is the temptation to offer judicial assistance in their minimization, there is no warrant in this statute nor in its legislative history for the erection of the presumption fashioned by Supreme Court that the school district in which the pupil resided immediately before his transfer to the receiving school district is the municipal entity responsible for payment of the cost of instruction to the receiving district. Again, if relief be needed or desired, address must be to the Legislature and the Appellate Division properly excised the provision of the judgment that implemented the novel presumption.

Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed.

Chief Judge Breitel and Judges Jasen, Gabrielli, Wachtler, Fuchsberg and Cooke concur.
Order affirmed, without costs.

New York Official Reports

80 N.Y.2d 70, 600 N.E.2d 191, 587 N.Y.S.2d 560

In the Matter of Martin Wolpoff et al., Respondents,

v.

Mario M. Cuomo, Individually and as Governor of the State of New York, et al., Respondents, and Saul Weprin, Individually and as Speaker of the New York State Assembly, et al., Appellants.

In the Matter of Reeves Dixon et al., Respondents,

v.

Mario M. Cuomo, Individually and as Governor of the State of New York, et al., Respondents, and Ralph Marino, Individually and as Temporary President and Majority Leader of the New York State Senate, Intervenor-Appellant.

Court of Appeals of New York
219, 220
Argued June 29, 1992;

Decided June 30, 1992

CITE TITLE AS: Matter of Wolpoff v Cuomo

SUMMARY

Appeal, in the first above-entitled proceeding, on constitutional grounds, from a judgment of the Supreme Court (Alan J. Saks, J.), entered June 16, 1992 in Bronx County in a proceeding pursuant to NY Constitution, article III, § 5 and McKinney's Unconsolidated Laws of NY § 4221 (L 1911, ch 773, § 1), which declared unconstitutional a redistricting plan for the New York State Senate (L 1992, chs 76, 77, 78), and annulled a redistricting plan for the New York State Assembly (L 1992, chs 76, 77, 78) as violative of the requirement in NY Constitution, article III, § 5 that the Senate and Assembly be redistricted by the same law.

Appeal, in the second above-entitled proceeding, on constitutional grounds, from a judgment of the Supreme Court (Leland DeGrasse, J.), dated June 15, 1992 and entered in New York County in a proceeding pursuant to NY Constitution, article III, § 5 and McKinney's Unconsolidated Laws of NY § 4221 (L 1911, ch 773, § 1), which declared Laws of 1992 (chs 76, 77, 78) unconstitutional insofar as they set forth a redistricting plan for the New York State Senate.

HEADNOTES

Legislature
Apportionment of Legislature--Constitutionality of Senate Redistricting Plan

(1) Laws of 1992 (chs 76, 77, 78), which embody a redistricting plan for the State Senate that results in 28 of 61 Senate districts crossing county lines, 23 counties being divided and 4 pairs of bi-county districts, are constitutional. The presumption of constitutionality that attaches to the redistricting plan has not been overcome. The Senate redistricting plan does not unduly depart from the State Constitution's requirements regarding contiguity, compactness and integrity of counties (NY Const, art III, §4) in its 71 compliance with Federal mandates for apportionment substantially on an equal population basis.

Legislature
Apportionment of Legislature--Constitutionality of Senate Redistricting Plan--Constitutional Requirements Regarding Integrity of Counties

(2) Laws of 1992 (chs 76, 77, 78), which embody a redistricting plan for the State Senate that results in 28 of 61 Senate districts crossing county lines, 23 counties being divided and 4 pairs of bi-county districts, do not unduly depart from the State Constitution's requirements regarding integrity of counties (NY Const, art III, §4) in its compliance with Federal mandates for apportionment substantially on an equal population basis. Notwithstanding that the Senate redistricting plan technically violates the express language of the State Constitution, more than enough evidence has been put forth to support the argument that any such violation was minimized and that the district lines were drawn as they were in order to comply with Federal statutory and constitutional requirements. Although the Senate plan compromises the integrity of 23 counties, a detailed defense of the proposed plan has been presented that is grounded in a complex analysis of population trends and voting patterns, and the way in which both must be accommodated in order to comply with Federal requirements. While the number of divided counties in the new plan and the four bi-county pairings are troubling, it is not appropriate for the Court of Appeals to substitute its evaluation of the relevant statistical data for that of the Legislature. In balancing State and Federal requirements, the State Constitution has been complied with as far as practicable, and it cannot be concluded on this record that the Legislature acted in bad faith in approving this redistricting plan.

TOTAL CLIENT SERVICE LIBRARY REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Elections, §§ 12-29.

NY Const, art III, §4.

NY Jur 2d, Elections, §§8-10.

ANNOTATION REFERENCES

Constitutionality of State legislative apportionment--Supreme Court cases. 77 L Ed 2d 1496.

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Michael A. Carvin and Charles J. Cooper, of the District of Columbia Bar, admitted pro hac vice, and Gregg M. Mashberg for Ralph Marino, appellant in the first above-entitled proceeding and intervenor-appellant in the second above-entitled proceeding.

I. The rulings below directly conflict with this Court's decisions in Schneider and Bay Ridge. (Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420; Bay Ridge Community 72 Council v Carey, 103 AD2d 280, 66 NY2d 657; Gaffney v Cummings, 412 US 735; Sincock v Roman, 233 F Supp 615; Wells v Rockefeller, 311 F Supp 48, 398 US 901; Bush v Martin, 251 F Supp 484; Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315; Cook v Luckett, 735 F2d 912; Black Political Task Force v Connolly, 679 F Supp 109; Travis v King, 552 F Supp 554.)

II. The courts below erred by ignoring the Voting Rights Act. (Thornburg v Gingles, 478 US 30; Meek v Metropolitan Dade County, 908 F2d 1540, 918 F2d 184; Jeffers v Clinton, 730 F Supp 196; Major v Treen, 574 F Supp 325; Jordan v Winter, 604 F Supp 807; Carstens v Lamm, 543 F Supp 68; Goddard v Babbitt, 536 F Supp 538; Kirksey v Board of Supervisors, 554 F2d 139; Moore v Leflore County Bd. of Election Commrs., 502 F2d 621; Garza v County of Los Angeles, 756 F Supp 1298, 918 F2d 763.)

III. The courts below improperly reversed the presumption of constitutionality and impermissibly struck down a legislative enactment on the basis of unresolved factual disputes. (Matter of Fay, 291 NY 198; People ex rel. Henderson v Board of Supervisors, 147 NY 1; Matter of Richardson [Stark], 307 NY 269.)

IV. The 1992 State Senate plan is constitutional.

V. Petitioners' other claims are without merit. (Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; Matter of Reynolds, 202 NY 430; Ince v Rockefeller, 290 F Supp 878.)

VI. If the Senate plan is struck down, the Assembly plan must also fall. (Matter of Orans, 45 Misc 2d 616, 15 NY2d 339; Upham v Seamon, 456 US 37; White v Weiser, 412 US 783; Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; Matter of Dowling, 219 NY 44.)

VII. If this Court finds the enactment unconstitutional, the remedy is to provide the Legislature with an opportunity to correct the constitutional deficiencies. (Matter of Burns v Flynn, 155 Misc 742, 245 App Div 799, 268 NY 601; Matter of Tishman v Sprague, 293 NY 42; Matter of Dowling, 219 NY 44; Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; Chapman v Meier, 420 US 1; Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; Wise v Lipscomb, 437 US 535; Connor v Finch, 431 US 407; Burns v Richardson, 384 US 73; Bandemer v David, 603 F Supp 1479, 478 US 109.)

C. Daniel Chill, Elaine M. Reich and Lawrence D. Bernfeld for Saul Weprin, appellant in the first above-entitled proceeding and respondent in the second above-entitled proceeding.

I. There was no controversy before Justice Saks regarding Assembly districts. Thus, the court below has issued an impermissible advisory opinion concerning Assembly district lines. (Prasher v United States Guar. Co., 1 NY2d 584; New York 73 Pub. Interest Research Group v Carey, 42 NY2d 527; Matter of Richardson, 247 NY 401.)

II. The bill contains a severability clause and hence the unconstitutionality of the Senate lines does not, ipso facto, invalidate the Assembly lines. (People ex rel. Henderson v Board of Supervisors, 147 NY 1; People ex rel. Carter v Rice, 135 NY 473; Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; People ex rel. Alpha Portland Cement Co. v Knapp, 230 NY 48; Matter of Dowling, 219 NY 44; Matter of Fay, 291 NY 198; WMCA, Inc. v Lomenzo, 377 US 633; Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; Thornburg v Gingles, 478 US 30; United Jewish Orgs. v Carey, 430 US 144.)

III. Any master appointed by the court below would, as a matter of law, be limited to consideration of the Assembly plan passed by the Legislature. (Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; Connor v Finch, 431 US 407; Chapman v Meier, 420 US 1; White v Weiser, 412 US 783; Maryland Comm. v Tawes, 377 US 656; Wise v Lipscomb, 437 US 535; Upham v Seamon, 456 US 37; Burton v Hobbie, 543 F Supp 235, 459 US 961.)

Stanley Kalmon Schlein for Martin Wolpoff and others, respondents in the first above-entitled proceeding.

I. The New York State Constitution requires a finding that the Senate plan is unconstitutional. (Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315.)

II. New York State constitutional requirements must be met and such requirements only give way to the minimal extent required by Federal supremacy. (Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339; Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420; Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315; Gaffney v Cummings, 412 US 735; White v Regester, 412 US 755; Flateau v Anderson, 537 F Supp 257.)

III. The Senate plan cannot be defended on the basis of "one man one vote" requirements. (Gaffney v Cummings, 412 US 735; White v Regester, 412 US 755; Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315; Brown v Thompson, 462 US 835.)

IV. The current Senate plan cannot be defended on the basis of voting rights requirements.

V. The Senate plan and its defenders are attempting to mislead the courts and the public. (Bay Ridge Community Council v Carey, 66 NY2d 657; United Jewish Orgs. v Carey, 430 US 144.)

VI. Respondent Cuomo has effectively confessed judgment, undoing the validity of his acts.

VII. Appellant's rejoinders in the proceedings below were entirely inapposite.

VIII. Appellant can draw no comfort from the district lines of the past decade.

IX. The decision should be affirmed because it is based on factualfindings 74 which are not subject to review at this level. (Matter of Mercorella v Benza, 37 NY2d 792. X. Appellants are not entitled to an automatic stay and any stay already in effect ought be lifted forthwith, in the interests of justice.

Robert Abrams, Attorney-General (Richard Rifkin, Jerry Boone, Joel Graber and Dennis Safran of counsel), for Mario M. Cuomo and others, respondents in the first and second above-entitled proceedings.

I. The Court has subject matter jurisdiction of these direct appeals pursuant to CPLR 5601 (b) (2). (Matter of Orans, 45 Misc 2d 616, 15 NY2d 339, appeal dismissed sub nom. Rockefeller v Orans, 383 US 10.)

II. The Assembly lines should not have been stricken. (Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339; Upham v Seamon, 456 US 37; White v Weiser, 412 US 783; Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533.)

III. This Court should exercise its jurisdiction to review and determine the constitutionality of the Senate's lines. (Baker v Carr, 369 US 186; People ex rel. Carter v Rice, 135 NY 473; Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; Matter of Dowling, 219 NY 44; Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; WMCA, Inc. v Lomenzo, 377 US 633; Matter of Orans, 17 NY2d 601; Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420; Wise v Lipscomb, 437 US 535.)

George F. Carpinello for Manfred Ohrenstein and another, respondents in the first and second above-entitled proceedings.

I. Petitioners have made a prima facie showing that the 1992 Senate reapportionment plan violates article III, § 4 of the New York State Constitution.

II. Requiring the Legislature to honor article III, § 4 to the extent practicable is the only means the people have to limit partisan gerrymandering. (Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; Matter of Smith v Board of Supervisors, 148 NY 187; Matter of Dowling, 219 NY 44; Matter of Richardson [Stark], 307 NY 269; WMCA, Inc. v Lomenzo, 377 US 633; Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339; Glinski v Lomenzo, 16 NY2d 27; Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420; Bay Ridge Community Council v Carey, 103 AD2d 280, 66 NY2d 657.)

III. Defendant Marino's defenses to the 1992 plan have been demonstrated to be factually without merit. (Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315; Brown v Thompson, 462 US 835.)

Theodore S. Steingut, Jerome Tarnoff, Peter J. Kiernan, Allison M. Walsh and L. Banks Tarver for Reeves Dixon and others, respondents in the second above-entitled proceeding.

I. The 1992 Senate plan violates State constitutional apportionment 75 provisions concerning integrity of county lines, contiguity, compactness and gerrymandering. (Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185; Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339; Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; WMCA, Inc. v Lomenzo, 377 US 633; Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420; Bay Ridge Community Council v Carey, 115 Misc 2d 433, 103 AD2d 280; Davis v Bandemer, 478 US 109; Matter of Dowling, 219 NY 44.)

II. The State constitutional apportionment provisions are controlling, absent unavoidable conflict with Federal law. (Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533; Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420; Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339; WMCA, Inc. v Lomenzo, 377 US 633; Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315; White v Regester, 412 US 755; Gaffney v Cummings, 412 US 735.)

III. The 1992 Senate plan's violations of State constitutional law are not unavoidably necessary to comply with Federal law. (Martin v Edwards Labs., 60 NY2d 417; Property Clerk v Scricca, 140 Misc 2d 433; Jeffers v Clinton, 730 F Supp 196; Rybicki v State Bd. of Elections, 574 F Supp 1082; Gunn v Chickasaw County, 705 F Supp 315; United Jewish Orgs. v Wilson, 510 F2d 512, affd on other grounds sub nom. United Jewish Orgs. v Carey, 430 US 144; Mirrione v Anderson, 717 F2d 743, 465 US 1036.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Chief Judge Wachtler.

On March 9, 1992, the New York State Legislature voted to adopt a redistricting plan for the Senate and the Assembly (Senate Bill S 7280). On May 4, 1992, the Governor signed the plan, as approved and later amended, into law (L 1992, chs 76, 77, 78). Within days, two separate challenges to the redistricting plan were mounted in State court, pursuant to article III, § 5 of the State Constitution and section 4221 of McKinney's Unconsolidated Laws of NY (L 1911, ch 773, § 1). The first of these, Wolpoff v Cuomo, was commenced by order to show cause filed in Supreme Court, Bronx County, on or about May 8, 1992. Petitioners, four residents and registered voters of Bronx County, claimed that the plan for redistricting the Senate violated article III, § 4 of the State Constitution. Petitioners alleged that the Senate redistricting plan unconstitutionally fragments Bronx County into six separate Senate districts, only two of which are contained wholly within Bronx County, despite the fact that by virtue of population, Bronx County could support four wholly self-contained Senate districts. 76

The second action, Dixon v Cuomo, was commenced in Supreme Court, New York County, by order to show cause filed on or about May 18, 1992. Petitioners, nine registered voters residing in proposed Senate districts throughout the State, similarly alleged violations of article III, § 4 of the State Constitution. In their petition, they contended that the Senate redistricting plan "is a rank partisan and personal-interest gerrymander" that unnecessarily fragments counties throughout the State and creates districts that are neither compact nor contiguous.

In Wolpoff, the Senate Majority Leader, a named party, had the case removed to Federal court pursuant to 28 USC § 1443 (2). The United States District Court, Southern District of New York, however, sent the case back to State court (Wolpoff v Cuomo, 792 F Supp 964). Appeal of this remand order to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is set for the week of July 13, 1992. A temporary stay of the remand order expired on June 9, and oral argument was heard on the petition in Supreme Court, Bronx County, on June 12. That afternoon, the State court struck down the Senate redistricting plan as violative of the State Constitution in that it "excessively, gratuitously and without supervening need dictated by federal law, disregards the integrity of county boundaries in the creation of Senatorial districts." The court struck down the Assembly plan as well, based on the requirement in article III, § 5 that the Senate and the Assembly be redistricted by the same law.

Meanwhile, the Majority Leader, who was not a named party in Dixon v Cuomo, moved to intervene in that case and his request was granted, but was conditioned upon his agreement not to seek removal of the case to Federal court. On June 15, Supreme Court, New York County, having considered the arguments in Dixon v Cuomo, similarly declared the redistricting plan unconstitutional.

The Majority Leader appealed pursuant to CPLR 5601 (b) (2). In addition, the Assembly Speaker has filed a direct appeal challenging the decision in Wolpoff to invalidate the Assembly plan along with the Senate plan, even though the Assembly plan had not been challenged.

In the interim, a three-Judge Federal court issued its Per Curiam opinion, acknowledging its "independent obligation" in such matters, but also declaring that it was "fully cognizant of the primacy of the state legislature and state judiciary" 77 in redistricting (Fund for Accurate & Informed Representation v Weprin, US Dist Ct, ND NY, June 19, 1992).

We begin our analysis by turning to the constitutional provision implicated by this litigation. Article III, § 4 of the State Constitution states that "each senate district shall contain as nearly as may be an equal number of inhabitants, excluding aliens, and be in as compact form as practicable, and ... shall at all times consist of contiguous territory, and no county shall be divided in the formation of a senate district except to make two or more senate districts wholly in such county."

In Matter of Orans (15 NY2d 339), we considered the continued vitality of article III, § 4 in light of the United States Supreme Court decisions in Reynolds v Sims (377 US 533) and related cases, in which the Court had held that both houses of a State Legislature, by virtue of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, must be apportioned substantially on an equal population basis. We recognized in that case that redistricting plans could no longer be based solely upon county lines without running afoul of Reynolds v Sims, and that "the integrity of all the counties in these respects cannot be complete" (Matter of Orans, supra, at 351). We stated at that time, however, that "the historic and traditional significance of counties in the districting process should be continued where and as far as possible" (id., at 352).

Redistricting plans must also comply with the requirements of the Federal Voting Rights Act (42 USC § 1973 et seq.). 42 USC § 1973 (b) specifically provides that a voting rights violation occurs if "based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State ... are not equally open to participation by members of a [protected] class of citizens ... in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." It should be noted that the Senate redistricting plan at issue in this case was reviewed for compliance with the Voting Rights Act by the United States Department of Justice and was subsequently approved.

The issue before us on these appeals is not whether the Senate redistricting plan technically violates the express language of the State Constitution. No one disputes that such a technical violation has occurred, and in Matter of Orans, we recognized that such violations were inevitable if the Legislature 78 was to comply with Federal constitutional requirements. Indeed, each of the four alternative plans submitted by the petitioners technically violates the State Constitution as well. Rather, we examine the balance struck by the Legislature in its effort to harmonize competing Federal and State requirements. The test is whether the Legislature has "unduly departed" from the State Constitution's requirements regarding contiguity, compactness and integrity of counties (Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420, 429) in its compliance with Federal mandates. "[I]t is not our function to determine whether a plan can be worked out that is superior to that set up by [the Legislature]. Our duty is, rather, to determine whether the legislative plan substantially complies with the Federal and State Constitutions" (id., at 427). A strong presumption of constitutionality attaches to the redistricting plan and we will upset the balance struck by the Legislature and declare the plan unconstitutional " 'only when it can be shown beyond reasonable doubt that it conflicts with the fundamental law, and that until every reasonable mode of reconciliation of the statute with the Constitution has been resorted to, and reconciliation has been found impossible' " (Matter of Fay, 291 NY 198, 207).

This is no simple endeavor. We first address petitioners' concerns regarding the integrity of counties. An examination of the redistricting plan reveals the following: 28 Senate districts out of 61 cross county lines; 11 minor counties and 12 major counties are divided. For purposes of the current plan, a minor county has fewer than 294,925 citizens, which is the figure obtained by dividing the State's citizen population (17,990,455) by the number of Senate seats (61). Further, and apparently for the first time in State history, there are four pairs of bi-county districts. Thus, two separate Senate districts cross the county line between Nassau County and Suffolk County, another two districts cross between Bronx County and New York County, another two between Bronx County and Westchester County and another two between Orange County and Ulster County. We note that the plan challenged here is not markedly different from the plan upheld in Schneider, (supra). In Schneider, 26 out of 60 Senate districts crossed county lines, splitting 9 minor counties and 10 major counties.

The Majority Leader has marshaled a considerable amount of statistical and demographic data to support his contention that these districts were drawn in a "good faith effort" (Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, supra, at 428) to comply with 79 Reynolds v Sims and the Voting Rights Act and not for partisan political reasons, as petitioners argue. In support of his argument that the Legislature's motives were benign, he points to the fact that for purposes of the United States Supreme Court equal population mandates, the Senate plan has a maximum population deviation of 4.29% from the ideal, which is well below the 16.4% deviation held acceptable by the United States Supreme Court in Mahan v Howell (410 US 315).

Petitioners, by contrast, have submitted four alternative plans, all of which have higher population deviations, but all of which divide fewer counties. In addition, none of the proffered alternative plans create pairs of bi-county districts, as does the current plan. Petitioners contend that the Legislature could have drafted a plan that had a higher, but still acceptable, population deviation and thereby done less damage to the integrity of county lines.

We are not here to determine whether the Legislature complied with the Federal Voting Rights Act. The Justice Department has already determined that the plan meets Federal requirements in that regard. Nor is it our role to assess the equal population deviations contained in the plans before us and determine which plan best balances Federal equal population and State constitutional directives. We are here to decide whether in complying with Federal mandates, the Legislature unduly undermined article III, § 4 of the State Constitution. That an alternative plan might have been devised that conflicted less with article III, § 4 but did greater violence to the equal representation principle is no basis for rejecting the Senate plan. Further, we cannot focus solely on the challenged districts and ignore the fact that a redistricting plan must form an integrated whole.

(1) Balancing the myriad requirements imposed by both the State and the Federal Constitution is a function entrusted to the Legislature. It is not the role of this, or indeed any, court to second-guess the determinations of the Legislature, the elective representatives of the people, in this regard. We are hesitant to substitute our own determination for that of the Legislature even if we would have struck a slightly different balance on our own. Having considered the competing demographic and statistical data submitted by all of the parties in these cases, we find that the petitioners have not overcome the presumption of constitutionality that attaches to the redistricting plan. 80

(2) Notwithstanding the technical deficiencies of the Senate redistricting plan, we find that respondent has put forth more than enough evidence to support his argument that any such violation was minimized and that the district lines were drawn as they were in order to comply with Federal statutory and constitutional requirements. The Senate plan indeed compromises the integrity of 23 counties, as petitioners have noted. But respondent has countered petitioners' allegations with a detailed defense of the proposed plan that is grounded in a complex analysis of population trends and voting patterns, and the way in which both must be accommodated in order to comply with Federal requirements. Although we are troubled by the number of divided counties in the new plan and by the four bi-county pairings, it is not appropriate for us to substitute our evaluation of the relevant statistical data for that of the Legislature. We are satisfied that in balancing State and Federal requirements, the respondent has complied with the State Constitution as far as practicable, and we cannot conclude on this record that the Legislature acted in bad faith in approving this redistricting plan. Having made that determination, our review is ended (Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, supra, at 428-429).

(1) We have considered the petitioners' compactness and contiguity claims, and we find them to be without merit. Accordingly, in each case, the judgment of Supreme Court should be reversed, without costs, the petition dismissed, and judgment granted declaring chapters 76, 77 and 78 of the Laws of 1992 constitutional.

Titone, J.

(Dissenting). The issue here is, quite simply, the degree to which our State constitutional antigerrymandering provisions still have vitality in light of the evolving body of Federal law that both demands proportional representation (see, e.g., Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315; Reynolds v Sims, 377 US 533) and prohibits State apportionment plans that dilute minority voting strength (42 USC § 1973 [a], [b]; see, Thornburg v Gingles, 478 US 30). The majority has held that in this case the former must give way to the values reflected by the latter. Since I conclude that it is possible under these facts to reconcile the requirements of Federal law with those of article III, § 4 of our State Constitution without completely eviscerating the latter, I dissent.

Article III, § 4 of the State Constitution requires, among other things, that Senate district lines be drawn so that "no 81 county shall be divided ... except to make two or more [S]enate districts wholly [within the] county." It has long been recognized that absolute adherence to this constitutional command is impossible in light of modern Federal equal-population mandates and the existence of several counties whose populations are insufficient to support even a single senatorial district. Accordingly, this Court has held that the Constitution is satisfied when "the Legislature has made a good-faith effort to comply with ... the equal-population principle ... and has not unduly departed from our State constitutional command that the integrity of counties be preserved" (Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, 31 NY2d 420, 428-429 [emphasis supplied]).

The standard for judicial review in this context is thus one akin to the notion of reasonableness. Under Schneider, what appears to be an unconditional constitutional directive may be satisfied as long as any departures therefrom are fairly justifiable in view of the other legal and practical constraints to which the redistricting process is subject. Hence, while the strict county-integrity rule has been eased by precedent, the Legislature is not free to disregard it simply because it can point to other, legally sanctioned goals as the motivating force or benign motive behind its final product.

And, contrary to the majority's suggestion, the Legislature is not the sole arbiter of whether an appropriate balance has been struck between the strictures of that rule and the sometimes competing values of population equality and enhancement of minority voting strength. As important and deserving as those values unquestionably are, the Legislature is duty-bound to accommodate them within our own constitutional framework, and the courts have both the right and the obligation to ensure that the demands of the State Constitution are, to the extent practicable, respected (Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, 188 NY 185, 203- 204; see Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, supra, at 427 ["(o)ur duty is ... to determine whether the legislative plan substantially complies with the ... State Constitution"]). Viewed against these principles, the redistricting plan at issue here cannot be upheld.

The plan petitioners have challenged contains 28 out of a total of 61 Senate districts that cross county lines other than to create two or more districts wholly within the divided counties. A total of 11 minor and 12 major counties have been divided. Populous Kings and New York Counties are each divided by no less than three districts. Bronx County, which 82 has sufficient population to encompass four whole Senate districts, is instead given only two wholly intra-county districts and is then divided by four additional cross-county districts. Moreover, the plan contains four bi- county districts, i.e., pairs of districts where both contain parts of the same two counties, a phenomenon which, according to petitioners, is unprecedented. Thus, it cannot be disputed that the challenged plan represents a drastic departure from the constitutional goal of respecting the integrity of county lines.

Contrary to the majority's analysis this derogation of the constitutional rule cannot be justified on the basis of the competing commands of the Federal equal-population requirement and the Voting Rights Act. As revealed by petitioners' submissions, at least four alternative plans exist that satisfy all of the requirements of Federal law while dividing fewer counties and containing no bi-county districts. These plans establish that the Legislature's county-dividing choices were not dictated by practical necessity.

Respondents' efforts to combat the inferences to be drawn from the existence of these less divisive alternative plans are unavailing. First, relying on language in Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller (supra, at 427), respondents contend that the existence of alternative plans is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of constitutionality that ordinarily cloaks legislation and is, in fact, not even a proper subject for judicial consideration. The argument, however, misconstrues the Schneider analysis, which merely concluded that "it is not [the court's] function to determine whether a plan can be worked out that is superior to that set up by [the challenged plan]" (id., at 427). Here, the alternative plans were not submitted as alternative or superior plans, but rather as a means of disproving respondents' contention that the Legislature's wholesale disregard for county integrity was compelled by the need to comply with Federal equal protection principles. Viewed in that context, the alternative plans provide a legitimate and, indeed, highly persuasive argument for holding the enacted plan unconstitutional.

Respondents next contend that the alternative plans petitioners submitted are an unsatisfactory ground for invalidating the enacted plan because although all four of them satisfy Federal requirements, they each contain average population deviations that are higher than the over-all percentage deviation 83 contemplated by the enacted plan. In Reynolds v Sims (supra, at 577, 579), the Supreme Court set down the basic principle that local legislators should be elected from districts that are "as nearly of equal population as is practicable," but also stated that some "deviations" "based on legitimate considerations incident to the effectuation of ... rational state policy" are permissible. On the basis of Reynolds and its progeny, this Court held in Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller (supra, at 428) that the Legislature is entitled to draw districts that cross county lines in order to minimize deviations from the one-person-one-vote principle and that "the choice of maximum population equality [is] a [valid] guiding principle." Respondents invoke the latter pronouncement in support of their contention that the Legislature was entitled to adopt a plan that was more divisive than the alternatives because they were acting to advance the goal of minimizing population deviations. The argument is, at best, misguided.

Since Schneider was decided, the United States Supreme Court has held that a "rational state policy of respecting the boundaries of political subdivisions" is a valid ground for departing somewhat from the strict one-person-one-vote rule and that a "16-odd percent maximum deviation" was within "tolerable limits" (Mahan v Howell, 410 US 315, 328-329, supra). Mahan thus establishes that compliance with Federal law may be achieved even though the redistricting plan does not purport to minimize population deviations, as long as some other satisfactory State value, including preserving the integrity of local political subdivisions, was the motivating reason (accord, Brown v Thomson, 462 US 835; White v Regester, 412 US 755; Gaffney v Cummings, 412 US 735). Additionally, Mahan refutes any argument respondents might make that they had to ignore county borders to the extent they did in order to comply with Federal law.

Furthermore, inasmuch as Schneider predates Mahan, that case can no longer be regarded as controlling to the extent that it suggests judicial tolerance for redistricting plans that freely divide counties in order to maximize population equality. Now that Mahan has established that Federal law does not require State Legislatures to maximize equality without regard to other local concerns, the Court's view of what constitutes an "undue" incursion on the county-integrity principle 84 must necessarily change.[1] In the final analysis, the guiding principle continues to be the prescriptions contained in the State Constitution, and those prescriptions must be obeyed except to the extent that they are directly in conflict with the dictates of Federal law.

Finally, respondents' reliance on the Federal Voting Rights Act to justify the Legislature's departure from article III, § 4's requirements is unpersuasive. While the Legislature was unquestionably required to guard against an apportionment plan that could dilute the voting strength of minority voters, respondents have not shown in specific terms how that goal necessitated the number and extent of county divisions that were adopted here.

In short, because the plan the Legislature adopted departs dramatically from State constitutional mandates and was not necessitated by Federal law, petitioners have made a prima facie showing that the Senate redistricting plan "unduly departed from our State constitutional command that the integrity of counties be preserved" (Matter of Schneider v Rockefeller, supra, at 428-429). Further, that constitutional command is not merely an outdated relic of another time that may be relegated to a secondary status or even disregarded entirely in light of modern Federal principles. Article III, § 4 was designed specifically to prevent "the possibility of unfair division of the State into ... district[s] so as to result in party or individual advantage" (Matter of Sherrill v O'Brien, supra, at 203; see, 3 Lincoln, Constitutional History of New York, at 135, 204, 218). That concern is as valid today as it was just before the turn of this century, when the Constitution of 1894 containing the present provision's predecessor was adopted (see, McKinney's Cons Laws of NY, Book 2, NY Const, art III, §4, Historical Note, at 40). Indeed, even a brief review of the challenged plan's treatment of Bronx County makes clear that the practice of gerrymandering is far from a dead letter.

With a population of 1,203,789, Bronx County is entitled to four wholly contained Senate districts. If the Legislature had drawn four whole Senate districts wholly enclosed within the 85 County's borders, the percentage deviation from a perfect one-person-one-vote ratio would be only 2%, a figure well within the "tolerable limits" contemplated in Mahan v Howell (supra). Furthermore, the ethnic make-up of the Bronx readily lends itself to district formation that would advance the values to be promoted by the Voting Rights Act. With a population that is 43% Hispanic, 31% African-American and 26hite, Bronx County could accommodate two wholly contained districts that are nearly 85% combined minority with a majority of Hispanics, one district that is nearly 85% combined minority with a majority of African-Americans and one district that would contain most of the County's non-minority population. The fact that the Legislature chose to criss-cross the County's borders repeatedly, giving it only two intra-county Senate districts and dividing the remainder of its population among four inter-county Senate districts belies any serious claim that the present redistricting plan was motivated solely by a legislative desire to comply with Federal mandates.

I am particularly concerned that the tolerance the majority has today expressed for a plan that all but disregards the integrity of county borders will be read by many as a signal that our State constitutional provisions no longer represent serious constraints on the critically important redistricting process. Certainly, although the majority has made passing reference to " 'the historic and traditional significance of counties in the districting process' " (majority opn, at 77, quoting Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339, 352, supra), there is little in its analysis or result that suggests any real commitment to that principle. Inasmuch as I deem this constitutionally prescribed principle to be important to the integrity of our redistricting system and inasmuch as the principle could have been accommodated within a Federally satisfactory plan, I am compelled to dissent from the Court's decision to uphold the plan the Legislature enacted and vote instead to affirm the judgments below.[2] 86

Judges Simons, Hancock, Jr., and Bellacosa concur with Chief Judge Wachtler; Judge Titone dissents and votes to affirm in a separate opinion; Judge Kaye taking no part

In each case: Judgment reversed, etc. 87

Footnotes

1 Respondents' reliance on Bay Ridge Community Council v Carey (103 AD2d 280, affd 66 NY2d 657) as a post-Mahan decision that supports their position is misplaced, since Bay Ridge was concerned principally with Assembly districts, as to which there is no effective constitutional rule requiring respect for county lines (see, 103 AD2d, at 285, citing Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339, 351).

2 Inasmuch as the Senate plan and the Assembly plan were enacted as part of the same law, the former's constitutional infirmity operates to invalidate the latter as well (see, Matter of Orans, 15 NY2d 339, supra).

71 N.Y.2d 729, 525 N.E.2d 710, 530 N.Y.S.2d 64

William L. McGowan et al., Respondents,

v.

Karen S. Burstein et al., Constituting the Civil Service Commission of the State of New York, Appellants.

Court of Appeals of New York
126
Argued April 21, 1988;

decided June 2, 1988

CITE TITLE AS: McGowan v Burstein

SUMMARY

Appeal from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the Third Judicial Department, entered August 12, 1987, which, with two Justices dissenting, modified, on the law, and, as modified, affirmed an order of the Supreme Court (Daniel H. Prior, Jr., J.), entered in Albany County, (1) denying a motion by plaintiffs for summary judgment, (2) denying a cross motion by defendants for summary judgment, (3) granting plaintiffs' alternative request for a preliminary injunction, and (4) preliminarily enjoining defendants from employing zone scoring with respect to written civil service examinations without prior court approval or consent of the plaintiffs, together with a demonstration of the justification for its use. The modification consisted of granting summary judgment in plaintiffs' favor and declaring that zone scoring violates NY Constitution, article V, § 6 and 4 NYCRR 67.1 (b) and (c).

McGowan v Burstein, 130 AD2d 123, reversed.

HEADNOTES

Civil Service
Examinations
Constitutionality of Zone Scoring of Competitive Examinations

(1) NY Constitution, article V, § 6, which requires that, as far as practicable, the merit and fitness of candidates for appointments and promotions in the civil service be ascertained by competitive examination, does not mandate an absolute prohibition of zone scoring, a grading method which assigns a single grade to a range of raw scores. Competitiveness is not a constitutional end in itself. Merit selection is the overarching constitutional goal and command; the competitive examination is the preferred means of compliance, but it is not a coequal--and certainly not a competing--goal. It would be perverse to sanctify rank ordering of exam scores in a quest to maximize competitiveness if, as a result, other considerations relevant to merit and fitness are discounted or swept aside. Moreover, it is no answer to suggest that in those rare cases where certain necessary attributes cannot be assessed by a written examination, then the position should not be included in the competitive class. The constitutional preference for competitive examinations commends a middle ground which incorporates both competitive testing and consideration of untestable attributes, where both are necessary for a complete evaluation of merit and fitness. Such flexibility provides an incentive for defendants to include a doubtful position in the constitutionally favored competitive class. 730

Civil Service
Examinations
Zone Scoring of Competitive Examinations

(2) Inasmuch as the Regulations of the State Civil Service Commission with respect to competitive examinations do not make rank order inviolate, defendant Commissioners' interpretation of their regulations, including 4 NYCRR 67.1 (b), (c) which require that "the relative order of scores [be] maintained", to allow for zone scoring of competitive examinations is neither irrational nor arbitrary and should be upheld.

TOTAL CLIENT SERVICE LIBRARY REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Civil Service, § 45.

Carmody-Wait 2d, Proceeding against Body or Officer § 145:108.

CLS, NY Const, art V, §6; 4 NYCRR 67.1.

NY Jur 2d, Civil Rights, §61; Civil Servants and Other Public Officers and Employees, §§261, 312 et seq.

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Robert Abrams, Attorney-General (O. Peter Sherwood, Peter H. Schiff and Daniel M. Smirlock of counsel), for appellants. I. Zone scoring per se does not violate the merit and fitness requirement of article V, § 6 of the New York Constitution. (Berkman v City of New York, 812 F2d 52; Kirkland v New York State Dept. of Correctional Servs., 711 F2d 1117, cert denied sub nom. Althiser v New York State Dept. of Correctional Servs., 465 US 1005; Guardians Assn. v Civil Serv. Commn., 630 F2d 79; People ex rel. Sweet v Lyman, 157 NY 368; Matter of Altman v Lang, 44 Misc 2d 751, 23 AD2d 820, 17 NY2d 464; Matter of Sloat v Board of Examiners, 274 NY 367; Matter of Katz v Hoberman, 28 NY2d 530; Matter of Grossman v Rankin, 43 NY2d 493; People ex rel. Schau v McWilliams, 185 NY 92; Matter of Firshein v Reavy, 263 App Div 490, 289 NY 712.) II. Zone scoring is necessary to achieve compliance with title VII of the Federal Civil Rights Act of 1964. (Griggs v Duke Power Co., 401 US 424; Connecticut v Teal, 457 US 440; Bushey v New York State Civ. Serv. Commn., 733 F2d 220; Kirkland v New York State Dept. of Correctional Servs., 374 F Supp 1361, 520 F2d 420, 531 F2d 5, 429 US 823, 1124, 482 F Supp 1179, 628 F2d 796, cert denied sub nom. Fitzpatrick v Kirkland, 450 US 980; Kirkland v New York State Dept. of Correctional Servs., 711 F2d 1117, cert denied sub nom. Althiser v New York State Dept. of Correctional Servs., 465 US 1005.) III. Zone scoring does not violate 4 NYCRR 67.1 (b) and (c). (People ex rel. Knowles v Smith, 54 731 NY2d 259; Matter of Sun Beach Real Estate Dev. Corp. v Anderson, 98 AD2d 367, 62 NY2d 965.) IV. The relief ordered by the court below is an impermissible judicial intrusion on the operations of the civil service system. (Matter of Firshein v Reavy, 262 App Div 490, 289 NY 712; Matter of New York State Inspection, Sec. & Law Enforcement Employees v Cuomo, 64 NY2d 233.)

Jeffrey R. Armstrong and Marjorie E. Karowe for respondents. I. Zone scoring competitive exams violates the New York State Constitution. (Hale v Worstell, 185 NY 247; Matter of Burke v Axelrod, 90 AD2d 577; Matter of Fink v Finegan, 270 NY 256; Matter of Young v Trussel, 42 Misc 2d 108; People ex rel. Crummey v Palmer, 152 NY 217; Matter of Montero v Lum, 68 NY2d 253; Matter of Holcombe v Gusty, 51 AD2d 868; Matter of Cassidy v Municipal Civ. Serv. Commn., 37 NY2d 526; Palmer v Board of Educ., 276 NY 222, 682.) II. Zone scoring violates Civil Service Law § 61 and civil service regulations. (Matter of Jackson v Poston, 40 AD2d 19; Matter of Wipfler v Klebes, 284 NY 248; Matter of Corwin v Farrell, 303 NY 61; Matter of Sikich v Hughes, 274 App Div 675; Amico v Erie County Legislature, 36 AD2d 415; Matter of Ruddy v Connelie, 61 AD2d 372; People ex rel. Schau v McWilliams, 185 NY 93.) III. Affirmative action requirements are not in conflict with State competitive exam regulations. (Guardians Assn. v Civil Serv. Commn., 630 F2d 79, 452 US 940.)

Peter L. Zimroth, Corporation Counsel (Elizabeth Dvorkin and Edward F. X. Hart of counsel), for City of New York, amicus curiae.

Because zone scoring can be used in a manner that is consistent with the State constitutional requirement of merit and fitness selection, it is constitutional per se. (City Council v Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 US 789; People v Ferber, 57 NY2d 256; Matter of Fay, 44 NY2d 137, appeal dismissed sub nom. Buck v Hunter, 439 US 1059; Matter of Sontag v Bronstein, 33 NY2d 197; Matter of Bridgman v Kern, 257 App Div 420, 282 NY 375; Matter of Oback v Nadel, 57 NY2d 620; Matter of Acosta v Lang, 13 NY2d 1079; Teamsters v United States, 431 US 324; Association Against Discrimination in Employment v City of Bridgeport, 647 F2d 256, 455 US 988; Dothard v Rowlinson, 433 US 321.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Chief Judge Wachtler.

Article V, § 6 of our State Constitution requires that, as far 732 as practicable, the merit and fitness of candidates for appointments and promotions in the civil service be ascertained by competitive examination. The primary question presented by this appeal is whether, consistent with this constitutional requirement, such examinations may be subject to zone scoring, a grading method which assigns a single grade to a range of raw scores. The letter grades A-F or a pass/fail grading system are familiar, but extreme, illustrations. A more subtle example is the practice of rounding scores in the range from 88.6% to 88.9%, for instance, up to 89%.

Plaintiffs, representatives of a large number of the State's public employees, claim that the practice renders examinations scored in such a manner noncompetitive and therefore unconstitutional. We note at the outset, because it is critical to our analysis, that the attack is a facial one.

Supreme Court denied the parties' cross motions for summary judgment, but granted plaintiffs' alternative request for a preliminary injunction. The court concluded that defendants had apparently employed zone scoring in a manner that allowed subjective factors other than merit and fitness to enter the selection process, in violation of the Constitution. The court therefore enjoined defendants from using the technique without prior court approval or consent of the plaintiffs, together with a demonstration of the justification for its use.

(1, 2) The Appellate Division, with two Justices dissenting, found the practice "presumptively unconstitutional" and modified by granting summary judgment in plaintiffs' favor and declaring that zone scoring violates the State Constitution and certain of defendants' regulations (130 AD2d 123, 127). We now reverse.

Preliminarily, we note our agreement with the courts below that zone scoring poses a threat to the competitive examination process that serves as the foundation of the merit system. The use of overly broad zones could negate the competitiveness of the test, allow too much room for the subjective judgments of appointing authorities and invite personal and political influence into the selection process. Any practice with such potential must be approached with skepticism.

However, the broadside nature of plaintiffs' challenge bears emphasis. Plaintiffs are not challenging zone scoring as applied to any particular civil service examination; nor do they limit their challenge to the use of overbroad zones or allege a specific instance of favoritism resulting from the practice. 733 Instead, they seek a declaration that zone scoring is per se violative of the State Constitution and ask that the practice be permanently enjoined. To sustain their challenge, as so framed, plaintiffs must demonstrate that zone scoring in any degree and in every conceivable application would be unconstitutional. They have not carried this burden.

Article V, § 6, the constitutional basis for the challenge, provides as follows: "Appointments and promotions in the civil service of the state * * * shall be made according to merit and fitness to be ascertained, as far as practicable, by examination which, as far as practicable, shall be competitive". New York was the first State to constitutionalize the merit and fitness requirement, a reflection of our citizens' insistence that competence, rather than cronyism, should determine civil service appointments (see, Hale v Worstell, 185 NY 247, 251; see also, Matter of Montero v Lum, 68 NY2d 253, 258).

The Department of Civil Service, which the defendant Commissioners oversee, is the agency charged with the task of implementing the merit system (Civil Service Law §§ 5, 6). The Department must determine what knowledge, skills and abilities are required for a given position, assess whether the relevant attributes can be measured by a competitive examination and, if so, develop, administer and grade a test from which those characteristics may be discerned. In addition, as defendants point out, care must be taken that success on the examination does not depend on factors that are unrelated to the candidate's fitness for the position, not only because fitness is the object of the merit system, but also because such factors may discriminate among equally qualified candidates along ethnic, racial or sexual lines, in violation of the State Human Rights Law (Executive Law § 296) and the Federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 USC § 2000e et seq.). The complex, highly technical, and sometimes even competing nature of these functions justifies considerable judicial deference to the Commission's greater ability to assess whether, to what extent, and in what manner merit and fitness should be measured by competitive examinations (see, Matter of Grossman v Rankin, 43 NY2d 493; People ex rel. Moriarity v Creelman, 206 NY 570, 575; People ex rel. Schau v McWilliams, 185 NY 92, 98-99)

It appears that defendants zone score exams rarely, and then primarily when the use of strict rank ordering would, in 734 their view, overemphasize certain skills and preclude adequate consideration of other necessary attributes. For example, the position being tested for may require a variety of testable skills, but it may also require, in equal or greater measure, oral communication skills, the ability to interact with others, or some other characteristic which cannot be readily and reliably measured by a written examination. In this and similar situations, defendants assert, the Constitution permits a grading system such as zone scoring which discounts marginal and perhaps statistically insignificant degrees of success on the written examination, when necessary to accommodate adequate consideration of other relevant criteria. We agree that the Constitution does not mandate an absolute prohibition of such testing and grading techniques.

The competitive examination is favored by the Constitution because it provides, presumably, an objective and verifiable measurement of the candidates' merit (Matter of Fink v Finegan, 270 NY 356, 363). We acknowledged in Matter of Cassidy v Municipal Civ. Serv. Commn. (37 NY2d 526), however, that examination scores are often unable to reflect all aspects of a candidate's fitness for a position and, for that reason, that it was desirable and constitutionally permissible for the appointing authority to be given room to consider the unmeasurable traits necessary for fulfillment of the duties. On that basis, we upheld, against a constitutional challenge, Civil Service Law § 61, which permits the appointment of any 1 of 3 persons with the highest standing on the eligibility list.

Implicit in that decision and in the constitutional language is the understanding that competitiveness is not a constitutional end in itself. Merit selection is the overarching constitutional goal and command; the competitive examination is the preferred means of compliance, but it is not a coequal--and certainly not a competing--goal. It would be perverse to sanctify rank ordering of exam scores in a quest to maximize competitiveness if, as a result, other considerations relevant to merit and fitness are discounted or swept aside (see, Matter of Sloat v Board of Examiners, 274 NY 367, 373).

It is no answer to suggest, as plaintiffs do, that in those rare cases where certain necessary attributes cannot be assessed by a written examination, then the position should not be included in the competitive class. The constitutional preference 735 for competitive examinations, on which plaintiffs hinge much of their argument, provides sufficient reason to shun such an all or nothing approach. That preference commends a middle ground which incorporates both competitive testing and consideration of untestable attributes, where both are necessary for a complete evaluation of merit and fitness (Matter of Fink v Finegan, supra, at 362). Such flexibility provides an incentive for defendants to include a doubtful position in the constitutionally favored competitive class.

(1) We hold, therefore, that article V, § 6 of the New York Constitution does not require a blanket prohibition of the use of zone scoring in competitive civil service examinations. As the issue is now framed, it would be inappropriate for us to speculate as to what standards should govern the use of zone scoring. Those considerations are best measured against specific facts, such as the breadth of the zones used, the justification for their use advanced by the Department of Civil Service, the qualifications required for the position in issue, and the extent to which a particular selection process, viewed as a whole, may lack objectivity and invite consideration of impermissible factors. This facial challenge does not provide us with the necessary background to render such an assessment.

(2) As for plaintiffs' claim that zone scoring violates defendants' own requirement that "the relative order of scores [be] maintained" (4 NYCRR 67.1 [b], [c]), we note only that defendants, quite obviously, interpret their regulations, including the cited ones, as allowing for zone scoring. In light of the numerous other adjustments to raw scores plainly contemplated by the regulations, some of which can result in inversion of the relative rank order (see, e.g., 4 NYCRR 67.1 [f]), it is clear that the regulations do not make rank order inviolate. Thus, defendants' interpretation is neither irrational nor arbitrary and should be upheld (see, Matter of Howard v Wyman, 28 NY2d 434, 438).

Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be reversed, with costs, plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment denied, defendants' motion for summary judgment granted, and judgment granted in favor of defendants declaring that defendants' use of the zone scoring technique on competitive civil service examinations is not per se violative of NY Constitution, article V, § 6 or 4 NYCRR 67.1 (b) and (c). 736

Judges Simons, Kaye, Alexander, Titone, Hancock, Jr., and Bellacosa concur.

Order reversed, with costs, plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment denied, defendants' motion for summary judgment granted and judgment granted in favor of defendants in accordance with the opinion herein. 737

427 F.Supp.3d 286
United States District Court, N.D. New York.

Frank J. MEROLA, Plaintiff,

v.

Andrew M. CUOMO et al., Defendants.

1:19-cv-899 (GLS/TWD)
|
Signed 12/13/2019

Synopsis

Background: County clerk brought action against State of New York to challenge New York's Driver's License Access and Privacy Act (DLAPA), which, among other things, expanded approved forms of identification accepted for obtaining driver's license. State moved to dismiss, and clerk sought preliminary injunction.

Holdings: The District Court, Gary L. Sharpe, Senior District Judge, held that:

[1] clerk had standing to challenge DLAPA as preempted by federal law, but

[2] clerk lacked capacity to sue under New York law to challenge DLAPA.

Motions granted in part and denied in part.

West Headnotes (9)

[1] Federal Courts Pleadings and motions
Federal Courts Evidence; Affidavits

When standing is lacking, the court's subject matter jurisdiction is implicated and the proper method for seeking dismissal on that basis is under rule governing subject matter jurisdiction, which would allow for the submission and consideration by the court of matters outside the pleadings. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[2] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

Where standing is questioned, even under a rule that would ordinarily require the court to exclude matters presented outside of the pleadings, like rules governing dismissal for failure to state a claim and judgment on the pleadings, the district court is authorized to consider matters outside the pleadings and make findings of fact when necessary. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), 12(c).

[3] Federal Civil Procedure Judgment on the Pleadings

The standard for addressing a motion for judgment on the pleadings is the same as that for a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), 12(c).

[4] Federal Courts Evidence; Affidavits
Federal Courts Weight and sufficiency

Under motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, the standard of review is similar to that of motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, except that the court may refer to evidence outside the pleadings and a plaintiff asserting subject matter jurisdiction has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that it exists. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1), 12(b)(6).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[5] Federal Civil Procedure In general; injury or interest

Standing is a threshold question, which should be addressed at the outset of the litigation.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[6] Election Law Citizenship
Federal Preemption Motor vehicles; highways

County clerk had standing to challenge New York's Driver's License Access and Privacy Act (DLAPA), which, among other things, expanded approved forms of identification accepted for obtaining driver's license, as preempted by federal law; clerk took oath of office in which he swore to support United States Constitution and the New York Constitution, and clerk alleged complying with DLAPA would require him to violate the Supremacy Clause as well as State constitutional proscription on voting by non-citizens. U.S. Const. art. 6, § 2; N.Y. Vehicle and Traffic Law §§ 201, 508.

[7] Municipal Corporations Capacity to sue or be sued in general

Under New York law, municipalities, and, by extension, their officers, lack capacity to sue the State because they are merely subdivisions of the State, created by the State for the convenient carrying out of the State's governmental powers and responsibilities as its agents.

[8] Municipal Corporations Capacity to sue or be sued in general

An exception to the general rule barring local governmental challenges to State legislation is when the municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription.

[9] Counties Capacity to sue or be sued in general

Public Employment Actions by employees, officers, and agents

County clerk lacked capacity to sue under New York law to challenge New York's Driver's License Access and Privacy Act (DLAPA), which, among other things, expanded approved forms of identification accepted for obtaining driver's license, since complying with DLAPA would not force clerk to violate the Supremacy Clause or State constitutional proscription against disenfranchisement, and county board of elections was tasked with reviewing and examining voting applications and verification of voters' identities. U.S. Const. art. 6, § 2; N.Y. Vehicle and Traffic Law §§ 201, 508; N.Y. Election Law § 5-210(8)-(9).

1 Case that cites this headnote

Attorneys and Law Firms

287 FOR THE PLAINTIFF: Harris, Beach Law Firm OF COUNSEL: ELLIOT A. HALLAK, ESQ., KARL J. SLEIGHT, ESQ., 677 Broadway, Suite 1101, Albany, NY 12207, OF COUNSEL: KELLY S. FOSS, ESQ., 99 Garnsey Road, Pittsford, NY 14534.

FOR THE DEFENDANTS: HON. LETITIA JAMES, New York State Attorney General OF COUNSEL: KEITH J. STARLIN, Assistant Attorney General, The Capitol, Albany, NY 12224, OF COUNSEL: LINDA FANG, Assistant Solicitor General, 28 Liberty Street, New York, NY 10005.

FOR THE UNITED STATES: Department of Justice Civil Division, Federal Programs Branch OF COUNSEL: CHARLES E.T. ROBERTS, ESQ., 1100 L Street, NW, Washington, DC 20005.

FOR AMICUS CURIAE: HON. WILLIAM TONG, Attorney General of Connecticut OF COUNSEL: JOSHUA PERRY, ESQ., P.O. Box 120, 55 Elm Street, Hartford, CT 06106.

MEMORANDUM-DECISION AND ORDER

Gary L. Sharpe, Senior District Judge

I. Introduction

To the dissatisfaction of the parties and public-at-large, courts are at times unable to pass upon the merits of a case for one 288 reason or another. There are various reasons why the ultimate question for which parties seek judicial review cannot be broached. This is such a case. It should be noted that cases like this one, where the court is constrained to dismiss without deciding the legal issues at play — here, a challenge to New York's Driver's License Access and Privacy Act (DLAPA),[1] more commonly referred to as the "Green Light Law" — does not mean in the vernacular that the "law is legal," despite what any politician may claim, (Dkt. No. 27, Attach. 7 at 2). Indeed the court has not and cannot pass upon that question no matter how compelling the arguments are on one side or the other. With that caveat in mind, the court turns to the issues now before it.

[1] [2] Pending are a motion for a preliminary injunction filed by plaintiff Frank J. Merola, Clerk of the County of Rennselaer, New York, and a cross motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure[2] filed by defendants Andrew M. Cuomo, Governor of the State of New York, Letitia A. James, Attorney General of the State of New York, and Mark J.F. Schroeder, Commissioner of the New York State Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) (hereinafter collectively referred to as "the State"). (Dkt. Nos. 27, 30.)[3] For the reasons that follow, the State's cross motion to dismiss is granted, and Merola's motion for a preliminary injunction is denied as moot.

II. Background[4]

The DLAPA, which goes into effect on December 14, 2019, modifies sections 201, 289 502, and 508 of the New York Vehicle and Traffic Law. See L. 2019, ch 37. The amendments alter the New York State driver's licensing scheme in three material ways that are at issue here by: (1) forbidding disclosure or sharing of applicant information except under limited circumstances; (2) expanding the approved forms of identification accepted for obtaining a driver's license; and (3) requiring prompt notice to an individual about whom a request for information was made by "any agency that primarily enforces immigration law." Id. §§ 2-6. Some county clerks throughout the State of New York, like Merola, are required to perform DMV functions, such as the issuance of driver's licenses. See N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 205(1).

Broadly speaking, Merola challenges the DLAPA as prempted by federal law. (Compl. ¶¶ 40, 78, Dkt. No. 1.) He contends that he confronts a dilemma: comply with the DLAPA and violate the United States Constitution and expose himself to federal criminal liability, or refuse to comply with the DLAPA and be subject to removal from office and a loss of funding. (Compl. ¶ 77; Dkt. No. 32 at 5-6.) The State promotes this legislation as advancing "public safety and economic growth." (Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1 at 1.)

Some sixteen days before this action was commenced, a near-identical case was commenced in the United States District Court for the Western District of New York, involving a similar challenge to the DLAPA. (Kearns v. Cuomo, Dkt. No. 1, 1:19-cv-902.) The plaintiff there, Michael Kearns, is the Clerk of Erie County, and he brought his action against the same defendants named in this matter. (See generally id.) That action has since been dismissed for lack of standing and an appeal is pending with the Second Circuit. See Kearns v. Cuomo, 415 F.Supp.3d 319 (W.D.N.Y. 2019), appeal docketed, No. 19-3769 (2d Cir. Nov. 13, 2019).

III. Standards of Review

[3] "The standard for addressing a Rule 12(c) motion for judgment on the pleadings is the same as that for a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim." Wright v. Monroe Cmty. Hosp., 493 F. App'x 233, 234 (2d Cir. 2012) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). For a full discussion of the governing standard, the court refers the parties to its prior decision in Ellis v. Cohen & Slamowitz, LLP, 701 F. Supp. 2d 215, 218 (N.D.N.Y. 2010), abrogated on other grounds by Altman v. J.C. Christensen & Assocs., Inc., 786 F.3d 191 (2d Cir. 2015).

[4] As mentioned above, see supra note 2, to the extent that standing is challenged, the State's motion is properly considered under Rule 12(b)(1). Under Rule 12(b)(1), the standard of review is similar to that of Rule 12(b)(6), except that the court "may refer to evidence outside the pleadings ... [and a] plaintiff asserting subject matter jurisdiction has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that it exists." Makarova v. United States, 201 F.3d 110, 113 (2d Cir. 2000) (citations omitted).

IV. Discussion

A. Cross Motion to Dismiss

The State makes a handful of arguments in support of its cross motion to dismiss. (Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1.) Two of them urge dismissal for the threshold issues of lack of standing and capacity, while the others go to the merits of Merola's claims. (Id. at 9-35.)

290 i. Standing

[5] Standing is a "threshold question," which should be addressed at the outset of the litigation. See Nat'l Org. for Women, Inc. v. Scheidler, 510 U.S. 249, 255, 114 S.Ct. 798, 127 L.Ed.2d 99 (1994). The broad contours of standing — an injury-in-fact, causation, and redressability, see Lujan v. Defs. of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61, 112 S.Ct. 2130, 119 L.Ed.2d 351 (1992) — and the finer points were discussed at length in Kearns v. Cuomo, 415 F.Supp.3d 319, 2019 WL 5849513, but Merola's sole theory of standing here is different from that proffered in Kearns. (Dkt. No. 32 at 3-9.)

Relying on Board of Education of Central School District No. 1 v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 88 S.Ct. 1923, 20 L.Ed.2d 1060 (1968), and Aguayo v. Richardson, 473 F.2d 1090 (2d Cir. 1973), Merola contends that he "unquestionably [has] established oath-of-office standing to pursue his claims in his official capacity as County Clerk." (Dkt. No. 32 at 3.)[5] While the State attempted to get out in front of this theory in its memorandum of law filed in support of its cross motion, it primarily focused on other bases of standing, or the lack thereof. (Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1 at 11-20.) That is, in part, the fault of the briefing schedule, which was set to accommodate the sensitive timing issues in this case, and the State has not had the opportunity[6] to address Merola's specific contentions about oath-of-office standing raised in his response. In any case, the State argues that compliance with the DLAPA is not at odds with either the Federal or State Constitutions. (Id. at 19.) It claims further that Merola's subjective belief that his compliance would violate the Federal Constitution is insufficient, and his argument about the adverse consequences that would befall him (removal from office and loss of licensing revenue) are "highly speculative and premature." (Id. at 19-20.)

In Allen, the Supreme Court indicated, in dicta, the existence of standing where a plaintiff who "ha[s] taken an oath to support the United States Constitution" is "in the position of having to choose between violating [his] oath and taking a step—refusal to comply with [a challenged state statute]—that would be likely to bring [his] expulsion from office and also" a loss of funding. 392 U.S. at 241 n.5, 88 S.Ct. 1923. This doctrine, sometimes called the " 'dilemma' theory of standing," has been recognized by the Supreme Court, Second Circuit, and other Circuits in subsequent cases, although it is infrequently invoked. Bd. of Educ. of Mt. Sinai Union Free Sch. Dist. v. N.Y. State Teachers Ret. Sys., 60 F.3d 106, 112 (2d Cir. 1995); see 291 Bender v. Williamsport Area Sch. Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 544 n.7, 106 S.Ct. 1326, 89 L.Ed.2d 501 (1986); Aguayo, 473 F.2d at 1100.

[6] Here, Merola took an oath of office in which he "solemnly sw[ore] that [he] w[ould] support the constitution of the United States, and the constitution of the State of New York, and that [he] w[ould] faithfully discharge the duties of the office ..., according to the best of [his] ability." (Dkt. No. 27, Attach. 2 ¶ 8.) He argues that the only requirement he need meet in order to establish oath-of-office standing is his good faith belief that compliance with the DLAPA would require him to violate the Federal Constitution. (Dkt. No. 32 at 5.) Merola disputes the applicability of Finch v. Mississippi State Med. Association, Inc., 585 F.2d 765, 774 (5th Cir. 1978), modified, 594 F.2d 163 (5th Cir. 1979), relied upon by the State, (Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1 at 19-20), which held that a mere belief that a statute violates the constitution is insufficient to establish standing, see Finch, 585 F.2d at 774, as at odds with Allen and Aguayo, and not binding on this court in any event, (Dkt. No. 32 at 6). Alternatively, Merola argues that he has adequately demonstrated a realistic threat of removal from office or the loss of funding should those requirements be deemed a part of the test for oath-of-office standing by this court. (Id. at 6-7.) Because the briefing is lacking on the finer points, and Merola has made a colorable argument for standing based on his oath of office, (id. at 5-6), dismissal on this ground would be inappropriate at this juncture.

ii. Capacity

The State contends that Merola lacks capacity to sue under New York law and that he cannot demonstrate that he should benefit from an exception to the general bar preventing municipalities and their officers from challenging state legislation. (Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1 at 9-11.) In opposition, Merola argues that the DLAPA would require him to violate a federal constitutional proscription, namely the Supremacy Clause, as well as a state constitutional proscription "on voting by non-citizens," and that he, therefore, has capacity to sue despite the general bar against suits by municipal officers. (Dkt. No. 32 at 9.) Because Merola lacks capacity as discussed below, dismissal is required.

[7] [8] Capacity, juxtaposed with standing, "is conceived to be a party's personal right to litigate in a federal court." 6A Charles Alan Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1542 (3d ed. Supp. 2019). The "[c]apacity to sue or be sued is determined," as relevant here, "by the law of the state where the court is located." Fed. R. Civ. P. 17(b)(3). In New York, municipalities, and, by extension, their officers, lack capacity to sue because they "are merely subdivisions of the State, created by the State for the convenient carrying out of the State's governmental powers and responsibilities as its agents." City of New York v. New York, 86 N.Y.2d 286, 290, 631 N.Y.S.2d 553, 655 N.E.2d 649 (1995). There are limited "exceptions to the general rule barring local governmental challenges to State legislation," only one of which is at issue here: "where 'the municipal challengers assert that if they are obliged to comply with the State statute they will by that very compliance be forced to violate a constitutional proscription.' " Id. at 291-92, 631 N.Y.S.2d 553, 655 N.E.2d 649 (quoting In re Jeter v. Ellenville Cent. Sch. Dist., 41 N.Y.2d 283, 287, 392 N.Y.S.2d 403, 360 N.E.2d 1086 (1977) (citing Board of Education of Central School District No. 1 v. Allen, 20 N.Y.2d 109, 281 N.Y.S.2d 799, 228 N.E.2d 791 (1967), aff'd, 392 U.S. 236, 88 S.Ct. 1923, 20 L.Ed.2d 1060 (1968))); see 292 Bd. of Educ. of Roosevelt Union Free Sch. Dist. v. Bd. of Trustees of State Univ. of New York, 185 Misc. 2d 704, 708, 713 N.Y.S.2d 908 (Sup. Ct. 2000), aff'd as modified, 282 A.D.2d 166, 723 N.Y.S.2d 262 (3d Dep't 2001).

Merola contends that his compliance with the DLAPA will force him to violate proscriptions in both the Federal and State Constitutions. (Dkt. No. 32 at 9.) He snarkily points the finger at the State for "not surprisingly, fail[ing] to provide a single citation for the unsupportable argument that the Supremacy Clause is not a 'constitutional proscription.' " (Id.) While his observation is true, it is similarly true that he failed to cite contrary authority. Insofar as his one-sentence State Constitution argument is concerned, which is best described as half-hearted, Merola provides no citation to where in the State Constitution the "proscription on voting by non-citizens," (id.), exists, leaving the court to guess.

While the court is loathe to engage in semantics, it is necessary here. A "proscription" is a prohibition or "an imposed restraint or restriction." Merriam Webster's Collegiate Dictionary (10th ed. 1997). Anecdotally, New York courts have interpreted constitutional or statutory proscriptions to be something expressly forbidden and along the lines of "no (blank) shall (blank)." See, e.g., Bellanca v. N.Y. State Liquor Auth., 54 N.Y.2d 228, 230-31, 445 N.Y.S.2d 87, 429 N.E.2d 765 (1981) (referring to an older version of N.Y. Alco. Bev. Cont. Law § 106(6-a)'s prohibition against topless dancing as a "blanket proscription against all topless dancing" as well as New York State Constitution Art. 1, § 8's prohibition against any law abridging speech as a proscription (emphasis added)); accord Weiner v. McCord, 264 A.D.2d 864, 866, 694 N.Y.S.2d 807 (3d Dep't 1999) (considering the following language: "No member of this state shall be disfranchised" as an express constitutional proscription).

With this interpretation in mind, Merola's first argument carries no weight. Indeed, the Supremacy Clause contains no proscription whatsoever. The Clause in its entirety provides:

> This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. No proscription is evident, unlike, for example, the First Amendment's "Congress shall make no law ...," id. amend. I, or the Fourth Amendment's proclamation that the right against unreasonable searches "shall not be violated," id. amend. IV. The list of federal constitutional proscriptions is long, but it does not include the Supremacy Clause and, therefore, cannot support Merola's assertion.

[9] Merola's argument about the State Constitution fares no better. As mentioned above, no citation is provided to the supposed "proscription on voting by non-citizens." (Dkt. No. 32 at 9.) However, Article I, § 1 of the New York State Constitution provides:

> No member of this state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his or her peers, except that the legislature may provide that there shall be no primary election held to nominate candidates for public office or to elect persons to party positions for any political party or parties in any unit of representation of the state from which such candidates or persons are nominated or elected whenever 293 there is no contest or contests for such nominations or election as may be prescribed by general law.

If this is the wellspring of the proscription referenced by Merola, it does not help his cause. The language contains a proscription, see Weiner, 264 A.D.2d at 866, 694 N.Y.S.2d 807 — a prohibition against disenfranchisement — but it is not what Merola claims it to be: a proscription on voting by non-citizens.[7] The court by no means intends to intimate that the DLAPA results in disenfranchisement, but, even if it did along the lines of Merola's argument, his claim that "as the State agent offering voter registration" he would be required "to violate the State Constitution proscription on voting by non-citizens," (Dkt. No. 32 at 9), is steps removed and wholly speculative. The DLAPA requires no such conduct by Merola. This is chiefly so because any prospective non-citizen voter licensed to drive under the DLAPA would have to affirmatively lie about his or her eligibility to vote. (Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1 at 4-5.) Ultimately, the county board of elections is tasked with review and examination of voting applications and verification of the applicant's identity. See N.Y. Elec. Law § 5-210(8)-(9). For obvious reasons, it cannot be said that Merola would be forced to violate the State Constitution's proscription against disenfranchisement in the event that such a person engages in criminal conduct. For all of these reasons, Merola cannot demonstrate that he has capacity to sue under the constitutional proscription exception, and dismissal is required.

B. Preliminary Injunction

Because dismissal is required given Merola's lack of capacity to bring suit, his motion for a preliminary injunction, (Dkt; No. 27), is denied as moot.

V. Conclusion

WHEREFORE, for the foregoing reasons, it is hereby ORDERED that the State of Connecticut's letter motion seeking permission to file an amicus curiae brief (Dkt. No. 33) is GRANTED; and it is further ORDERED that the State's letter motion seeking permission to respond to the United States' memorandum of law (Dkt. No. 35) is DENIED; and it is further

ORDERED that the State's cross motion to dismiss (Dkt. No. 30) is GRANTED, and the complaint (Dkt. No. 1) is DISMISSED; and it is further ORDERED that Merola's motion for a preliminary injunction (Dkt. No. 27) is DENIED as moot; and it is further

ORDERED that the Clerk close this case; and it is further ORDERED that the Clerk provide a copy of this Memorandum-Decision and Order to the parties.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

All Citations

427 F.Supp.3d 286

Footnotes

1 See L. 2019, ch 37.

2 Without any explanation why they may be properly considered on a Rule 12(c) motion, the State submitted affidavits and attached exhibits from two Department of Motor Vehicle employees for the purpose of providing background information. (Dkt. No. 30, Attachs. 2-6.) The matters presented outside of the pleadings must be excluded from consideration absent any argument why they may be properly considered without conversion to summary judgment. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(d); Sira v. Morton, 380 F.3d 57, 67 (2d Cir. 2004) (explaining that the complaint includes any attached written instrument, materials incorporated by reference, and documents integral to the complaint). It is unclear why the State moved for dismissal pursuant to Rule 12(c) only. (Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1 at 1.) When standing is lacking, the court's subject matter jurisdiction is implicated and the proper method for seeking dismissal on that basis is Rule 12(b)(1), which would allow for the submission and consideration by the court of matters outside the pleadings. In any case, where standing is questioned, even under a rule that would ordinarily require the court to exclude matters presented outside of the pleadings, like Rule 12(b)(6) or (c), "the district court is authorized to consider matters outside the pleadings and make findings of fact when necessary." First Capital Asset Mgmt. v. Brickellbush, Inc., 218 F. Supp. 2d 369, 378 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (citations omitted), on reconsideration, 219 F. Supp. 2d 576 (S.D.N.Y. 2002), aff'd sub nom. First Capital Asset Mgmt. v. Satinwood, Inc., 385 F.3d 159 (2d Cir. 2004). For this reason, the court has considered Merola's declaration, which was submitted in conjunction with his preliminary injunction motion, (Dkt. No. 27, Attach. 2), to the extent that it bears on the standing question.

3 The court has also considered an amicus curiae brief filed by the Attorney General of Connecticut on behalf of the State of Connecticut and joined by California, the District of Columbia, Delaware, Hawaii, Illinois, Maryland, Nevada, Oregon, Vermont, and Washington, (Dkt. No. 33, Attach. 1), and a memorandum of law filed by the United States as intervenor pursuant to Rule 5.1(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and 28 U.S.C. § 2403(a) to defend the constitutionality of 8 U.S.C. §§ 1373 and 1644, (Dkt. No. 34). The amicus curiae brief and United States' memorandum of law present arguments that are ultimately not germane to the disposition of the case.

4 In addition to the court's prior Summary Order, (Dkt. No. 22 at 1-2), the Decision and Order in Kearns v. Cuomo, 415 F.Supp.3d 319, 323-25, 2019 WL 5849513, at *2-3 (W.D.N.Y. 2019), appeal docketed, No. 19-3769 (2d Cir. Nov. 13, 2019), includes relevant background information.

5 Merola makes no effort to oppose the several other arguments, largely overlapping with those that formed the basis of the dismissal for lack of standing in Kearns, which have also been advanced by the State here. (Compare Dkt. No. 30, Attach. 1 at 11-20, with Dkt. No. 32 at 3-9.) In addition, Merola, who brings this action only in his official capacity, has requested leave to amend to add individual capacity claims in the event the court "deems it necessary and appropriate." (Dkt. No. 32 at 8 n.5.) The court does not engage in such hand-holding. If Merola was inclined to seek leave to amend, he should have done so consistent with the Local Rules of Practice. See N.D.N.Y. L.R. 7.1(a)(4). Additionally, it is not clear how Merola would establish standing by bringing his causes of action in his individual capacity. Indeed, Kearns soundly rejected individual standing under nearly identical circumstances. See 415 F.Supp.3d at 330-36, 2019 WL 5849513, at *6-12.

6 Despite the limitations of the briefing schedule, the State did not request permission to file an otherwise unpermitted reply in further support of its cross motion, which is contemplated by the Local Rules of Practice. See N.D.N.Y. L.R. 7.1(c).

7 The court is left to guess at whether Merola intends to suggest that watering down the vote with ineligible voters who fraudulently register disenfranchises lawful voters. Just like his failure to elaborate upon his argument about where in the State Constitution the proscription exists, he has not adequately explained his argument in this regard, which is a basis to reject it.

End of Document

KeyCite Yellow Flag - Negative Treatment
Declined to Extend by Alabama Legislative Black Caucus v. Alabama, U.S.Ala., March 25, 2015

115 S.Ct. 2475
Supreme Court of the United States

Zell MILLER, et al., Appellants,
v.
Davida JOHNSON et al.
Lucious ABRAMS, Jr., et al., Appellants,
v.
Davida JOHNSON et al.
UNITED STATES, Appellant,
v.
Davida JOHNSON et al.

Nos. 94–631, 94–797, and 94–929.
|
Argued April 19, 1995.
|
Decided June 29, 1995.

Synopsis
Georgia residents brought action challenging constitutionality of redistricting legislation in seeking injunction against its further use in congressional elections. A three-judge panel of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Georgia determined that redistricting plan violated equal protection principles, 864 F.Supp. 1354. Appeal was taken. The Supreme Court, Justice Kennedy, held that: (1) bizarre shape was not threshold requirement of claim of racial gerrymandering under Shaw ; (2) allegation that race was legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing district lines was sufficient to state claim under Shaw ; and (3) Georgia's congressional redistricting plan violates the equal protection clause.

Affirmed and remanded.

Justice O'Connor concurred and filed opinion.

Justice Stevens dissented and filed opinion.

Justice Ginsburg dissented and filed an opinion in which Justices Stevens and Breyer joined and in which Justice Souter joined in part.

West Headnotes (46)

[1] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Allegation, that state's redistricting plan, on its face, has no rational explanation save as an effort to separate voters on basis of race, is sufficient to state claim upon which relief can be granted under equal protection clause. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Race, National Origin, or Ethnicity

Central mandate of equal protection clause of Fourteenth Amendment is racial neutrality in governmental decisionmaking. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14, § 1.

16 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Race, national origin, or ethnicity

Racial and ethnical distinctions of any sort are inherently suspect and thus call for the most exacting judicial examination under Equal Protection Clause; this rule obtains with equal force regardless of race of those burdened or benefited by particular classification. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14, § 1.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Constitutional Law Race, national origin, or ethnicity

Laws classifying citizens on basis of race cannot be upheld unless they are narrowly tailored to achieve compelling state interest. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14, § 1.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Constitutional Law Electoral Districts

Equal protection principles governed state's drawing of congressional districts. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

[6] Constitutional Law Race, National Origin, or Ethnicity

Equal protection principles apply not only to legislation that contains explicit racial distinctions, but also to laws neutral on their face but unexplainable on grounds other than race. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Redistricting legislation that is so bizarre on its face that it is unexplainable on grounds other than race demands the same close scrutiny under equal protection clause that is given to other state laws classifying citizens by race. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Election Law Acts requiring preclearance

Preclearance mechanism of Voting Rights Act applies to congressional redistricting plans and requires that proposed change not have purpose and will not have effect of denying or abridging, on account of race or color, right to vote. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Purpose of § 5 of Voting Rights Act has always been to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that lead to retrogression in position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Constitutional Law Elections

Residents of challenged voting district had standing to bring equal protection challenge to redistricting legislation which resulted in creation of the district. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Allegation that race was the overriding and predominant factor in Georgia's redistricting legislation was sufficient to state claim upon which relief could be granted under equal protection clause, regardless of whether challenged district's shape was so bizarre that it was unexplainable other than on basis of race. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

17 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Racial gerrymandering claim under Shaw differs analytically from vote dilution claim; whereas "vote dilution claim" alleges that state has enacted particular voting scheme as purposeful device to minimize or cancel out voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities, that is, action disadvantaging voters of particular race, essence of equal protection claim recognized in Shaw is that state has used race as basis for separating voters into districts. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

44 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Just as state may not, absent extraordinary justification, segregate citizens of race in its public parks, golf courses, and schools, it may not separate its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Constitutional Law Discrimination and Classification

At the heart of Constitution's guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that government must treat citizens as individuals rather than as components of racial, religious, sexual, or national classes. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

20 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Race-based assignments of voters to districts embody stereotypes that treat individuals as product of their race, thereby evaluating their thoughts and efforts, their very worth as citizens, according to criterion barred to the government by history and by the Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

13 Cases that cite this headnote

[16] Jury Race

Race cannot be a proxy for determining juror bias or competence. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

[17] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Race-based districting by state legislatures demands close judicial scrutiny under equal protection clause. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[18] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Bizarre shape of voting district is not threshold requirement of bringing claim, under Shaw, that state has used race as basis for separating voters into districts; shape is relevant not because bizarreness is necessary element of the constitutional wrong or threshold requirement of proof, but rather, because it may be persuasive circumstantial evidence that race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its district lines. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

39 Cases that cite this headnote

[19] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Parties may rely on evidence other than bizarreness of district shape in order to establish that legislature has engaged in race-based districting. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[20] Constitutional Law Race, national origin, or ethnicity

Statutes are subject to strict scrutiny under equal protection clause not only when they contain express racial classifications, but also when, though race neutral on their face, they are motivated by racial purpose or object. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

15 Cases that cite this headnote

[21] Constitutional Law Discrimination and Classification

Conspicuous pattern of discrimination is not a necessary predicate to violation of equal protection clause. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[22] United States Judicial review and enforcement

Federal court review of state's districting legislation represents serious intrusion on most vital of local functions inasmuch as it is well settled that reapportionment is primarily duty and responsibility of the state.

28 Cases that cite this headnote

[23] Constitutional Law Equal protection

Although race-based decisionmaking is inherently suspect, good faith of state legislature must be presumed until claimant makes showing sufficient to support allegation of race-based decisionmaking. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

14 Cases that cite this headnote

[24] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Courts, in assessing sufficiency of equal protection challenge to districting plan, must be sensitive to complex interplay of forces that enter legislature's redistricting calculus; for example, redistricting legislatures will almost always be aware of racial demographics, but it does not follow that race predominates in redistricting process. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

27 Cases that cite this headnote

[25] Constitutional Law Intentional or purposeful action requirement

"Discriminatory purpose," as used in context of equal protection analysis, implies more than intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences; it implies that the decisionmaker selected or reaffirmed particular course of action at least in part because of, not merely in spite of, its adverse effects. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[26] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Evidentiary difficulty in distinguishing between awareness of racial considerations and motivation by them, together with sensitive nature of redistricting and presumption of good faith which must be accorded legislative enactments, require courts to exercise extraordinary caution in adjudicating claim that state has drawn voting district lines on basis of race. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

26 Cases that cite this headnote

[27] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

On claim that state has drawn district lines on basis of race, plaintiff's burden is to show, either through circumstantial evidence of district's shape and demographics or through more direct evidence going to legislative purpose, that race was predominant factor motivating legislature's decision to place significant number of voters within or without particular district; to make this showing, plaintiff must prove that legislature subordinated to racial considerations traditional race-neutral districting principles, including, but not limited to compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions or communities defined by actual shared interests. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

223 Cases that cite this headnote

[28] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Election Law Gerrymandering of equipopulous districts

State can defeat claim that district has been gerrymandered on racial lines by showing that traditional districting principles or other race-neutral considerations are the basis for challenged redistricting legislation and are not subordinated to race. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

109 Cases that cite this headnote

[29] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

In context of racial gerrymandering claim, court must recognize traditional race-neutral districting principles and other race-neutral considerations and must always recognize intrusive potential of judicial intervention into the legislative realm when assessing, under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the adequacy of plaintiff's showing at various stages of litigation and determining whether to permit discovery or trial to proceed. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Fed.Rules Civ.Proc.Rules 12(b, e), 26(b)(2), 56, 28 U.S.C.A.

25 Cases that cite this headnote

[30] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

District court did not clearly err in finding that, unless it was narrowly tailored to serve compelling state interest, Georgia's redistricting plan violated equal protection clause, given irregular shape of congressional district containing nearly 80% of district's total African-American population in outlying appendages, together with evidence showing that Georgia legislature was motivated by predominant, overriding desire to create a third majority-black district. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

52 Cases that cite this headnote

[31] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

State could not refute claim of racial gerrymandering by demonstrating compliance with traditional districting principles, or by mere recitation of purported communities of interest, where those factors were subordinated to racial objectives. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[32] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Georgia's redistricting plan, for which race was predominant, overriding factor in drawing district lines, violated equal protection clause. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

29 Cases that cite this headnote

[33] Constitutional Law Voting and political rights

To satisfy strict scrutiny test for redistricting legislation challenged on equal protection grounds, state must demonstrate that its districting legislation is narrowly tailored to achieve compelling interest. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

28 Cases that cite this headnote

[34] Constitutional Law Race, national origin, or ethnicity

Constitutional Law Affirmative action in general

There is significant state interest, for purposes of equal protection analysis, in eradicating the effects of past racial discrimination. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[35] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Election Law Gerrymandering of equipopulous districts

Election Law Acts requiring preclearance

Georgia's interest in complying with Justice Department's preclearance demands was not “compelling,” and thus did not justify use of racial gerrymandering to create black-majority congressional district, where, under correct reading of Voting Rights Act, such preclearance requirements were not necessary. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

8 Cases that cite this headnote

[36] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Compliance with federal antidiscrimination laws cannot justify race-based districting legislation absent showing that challenged legislation was reasonably necessary under constitutional reading and application of those laws. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

4 Cases that cite this headnote

[37] Constitutional Law Affirmative action in general

When state governmental entities seek to justify race-based remedies to cure effects of past discrimination, court does not accept government's mere assertion that remedial action is required, but rather, insists on strong basis in evidence of the harm being remedied. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

6 Cases that cite this headnote

[38] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Election Law Method of apportionment

Presumptive skepticism of all racial classifications prohibits court from accepting on its face Justice Department's conclusion that racial districting is necessary under Voting Rights Act; thus, when state relies on Department's determination that race-based districting is necessary, judiciary retains independent obligation in adjudicating consequent equal protection challenges to ensure that state's actions are narrowly tailored to achieve compelling interest. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

24 Cases that cite this headnote

[39] Constitutional Law To executive in general

Judiciary may not surrender, to the executive branch, its role in enforcing constitutional limits on race-based official action. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[40] Election Law Purpose and construction in general

Statutes Attorney General

It is inappropriate for court engaged in constitutional scrutiny of redistricting legislation to accord deference to Justice Department's interpretation of Voting Rights Act. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[41] Election Law Purpose and construction in general

Statutes Attorney General

When Justice Department's interpretation of Voting Rights Act compels race-based districting, interpretation by definition raises such "serious constitutional question," as should not receive deference. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[42] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

United States Equality of representation and discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Georgia's proposed redistricting legislation creating two black-majority congressional districts where only one had existed before was "ameliorative" and, therefore, should not have been rejected by Justice Department, absent showing that new apportionment itself so discriminated on basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

11 Cases that cite this headnote

[43] Election Law Majority-minority districts

Redistricting plan which is "ameliorative," meaning increasing number of majority-minority districts, cannot violate Voting Rights Act unless new apportionment itself so discriminates on basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[44] Election Law Majority-minority districts

State has burden, under Voting Rights Act, to prove nondiscriminatory purpose for refusing to maximize number of majority-minority districts. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[45] Election Law Majority-minority districts

State's policy of adhering to other districting principles instead of creating as many majority-minority districts as possible does not support inference that plan so discriminates on basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[46] Constitutional Law Fifteenth Amendment

Congress' exercise of its Fifteenth Amendment authority, even when otherwise proper, still must consist with the letter and spirit of Constitution. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 15.

*2480 Syllabus[*]

900 In Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511, this Court articulated the equal protection principles that govern a State's drawing of congressional districts, noting that laws that explicitly distinguish between individuals on racial grounds fall within the core of the Equal Protection Clause's prohibition against race-based decisionmaking, that this prohibition extends to laws neutral on their face but unexplainable on grounds other than race, and that redistricting legislation that is so bizarre on its face that it is unexplainable on grounds other than race demands the same strict scrutiny given to other state laws that classify citizens by race. Georgia's most recent congressional districting plan contains three majority-black districts and was adopted after the Justice Department refused to preclear, under § 5 of the Voting Rights Act (Act), two earlier plans that each contained only two majority-black districts. Appellees, voters in the new Eleventh District—which joins metropolitan black neighborhoods together with the poor black populace of coastal areas 260 miles away—challenged the district on the ground that it was a racial gerrymander in violation of the Equal Protection Clause as interpreted in Shaw. The District Court agreed, holding that evidence of the state legislature's purpose, as well as the district's irregular borders, showed that race was the overriding and predominant force in the districting determination. The court assumed that compliance with the Act would be a compelling interest, but found that the plan was not narrowly tailored to meet that interest since the Act did not require three majority-black districts.

Held: Georgia's congressional redistricting plan violates the Equal Protection Clause. Pp. 2485–2494.

(a) Parties alleging that a State has assigned voters on the basis of race are neither confined in their proof to evidence regarding a district's geometry and makeup nor required to make a threshold showing of bizarreness. A district's shape is relevant to Shaw's equal protection analysis not because bizarreness is a necessary element of the constitutional 901 wrong or a threshold requirement of proof, but because it may be persuasive circumstantial evidence that race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was a legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing district *2481 lines. In some exceptional cases, a reapportionment plan may be so highly irregular that, on its face, it rationally cannot be understood as anything other than an effort to segregate voters based on race, but where the district is not so bizarre, parties may rely on other evidence to establish race-based districting. The very stereotypical assumptions the Equal Protection Clause forbids underlie the argument that the Clause's general proscription on race-based decisionmaking does not obtain in the districting context because redistricting involves racial consideration. While redistricting usually implicates a political calculus in which various interests compete for recognition, it does not follow that individuals of the same race share a single political interest. Nor can the analysis used to assess the vote dilution claim in United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburgh, Inc. v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 97 S.Ct. 996, 51 L.Ed.2d 229, be applied to resuscitate this argument. Pp. 2485–2488.

(b) Courts must exercise extraordinary caution in adjudicating claims that a State has drawn race-based district lines. The plaintiff must show, whether through circumstantial evidence of a district's shape and demographics or more direct evidence of legislative purpose, that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a district. To make this showing, a plaintiff must prove that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles, including but not limited to compactness, contiguity, respect for political subdivisions or communities defined by actual shared interests, to racial considerations. P. 2488.

(c) The District Court applied the correct analysis here, and its finding that race was the predominant factor motivating the Eleventh District's drawing was not clearly erroneous. It need not be decided whether the district's shape, standing alone, was sufficient to establish that the district is unexplainable on grounds other than race, for there is considerable additional evidence showing that the state legislature was motivated by a predominant, overriding desire to create a third majority-black district in order to comply with the Justice Department's preclearance demands. The District Court's well-supported finding justified its rejection of the various alternative explanations offered for the district. Appellants cannot refute the claim of racial gerrymandering by arguing the legislature complied with traditional districting principles, since those factors were subordinated to racial objectives. Nor are there tangible communities of interest spanning the district's hundreds of miles that can be called upon to rescue the plan. Since race 902 was the predominant, overriding factor behind the Eleventh District's drawing, the State's plan is subject to strict scrutiny and can be sustained only if it is narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling state interest. Pp. 2488–2490.

(d) While there is a significant state interest in eradicating the effects of past racial discrimination, there is little doubt that Georgia's true interest was to satisfy the Justice Department's preclearance demands. Even if compliance with the Act, standing alone, could provide a compelling interest, it cannot do so here, where the district was not reasonably necessary under a constitutional reading and application of the Act. To say that the plan was required in order to obtain preclearance is not to say that it was required by the Act's substantive requirements. Georgia's two earlier plans were ameliorative and could not have violated § 5 unless they so discriminated on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution. However, instead of grounding its objections on evidence of a discriminatory purpose, the Justice Department appears to have been driven by its maximization policy. In utilizing § 5 to require States to create majority-minority districts whenever possible, the Department expanded its statutory authority beyond Congress' intent for § 5: to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise. The policy also raises serious constitutional concerns because its implicit command that States may engage in presumptive unconstitutional race-based districting brings *2482 the Act, once upheld as a proper exercise of Congress' Fifteenth Amendment authority, into tension with the Fourteenth Amendment. Pp. 2490–2494.

864 F.Supp. 1354 (S.D.Ga.1994), affirmed and remanded.

KENNEDY, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., and O'CONNOR, SCALIA, and THOMAS, JJ., joined. O'CONNOR, J., filed a concurring opinion, post, p. 2497. STEVENS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, post, p. 2497. GINSBURG, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which STEVENS and BREYER, JJ., joined, and in which SOUTER, J., joined except as to Part III–B, post, p. 2499.

Attorneys and Law Firms

David F. Walbert, Atlanta, GA, for appellants in Nos. 94–631 and 94–797.

Drew S. Days, III, Washington, DC, for appellant in No. 94–929.

903 A. Lee Parks, Atlanta, GA, for appellees.

Opinion

Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1] The constitutionality of Georgia's congressional redistricting plan is at issue here. In Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), we held that a plaintiff states a claim under the Equal Protection Clause by alleging that a state redistricting plan, on its face, has no rational explanation save as an effort to separate voters on the basis of race. The question we now decide is whether Georgia's new Eleventh District gives rise to a valid equal protection claim under the principles announced 904 in Shaw, and, if so, whether it can be sustained nonetheless as narrowly tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest.

I

A

[2] [3] [4] The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U.S. Const., Amdt. 14, § 1. Its central mandate is racial neutrality in governmental decisionmaking. See, e.g., Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 11, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 1823, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1967); McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 191–192, 85 S.Ct. 283, 287–288, 13 L.Ed.2d 222 (1964); see also Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954). Though application of this imperative raises difficult questions, the basic principle is straightforward: "Racial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are inherently suspect and thus call for the most exacting judicial examination.... This perception of racial and ethnic distinctions is rooted in our Nation's constitutional and demographic history." Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 291, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 2748, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978) (opinion of Powell, J.). This rule obtains with equal force regardless of "the race of those burdened or benefited by a particular classification." Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 494, 109 S.Ct. 706, 722, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989) (plurality opinion) (citations omitted); id., at 520, 109 S.Ct., at 735 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment) ("I agree ... with Justice O'CONNOR's conclusion that strict scrutiny must be applied to all governmental classification by race"); see also Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 224, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 2111, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995); Bakke, supra, at 289–291, 98 S.Ct., at 2747–2748 (opinion of Powell, J.). Laws classifying citizens on the basis of race cannot be upheld unless they are narrowly tailored to achieving a compelling state interest. See, e.g., Adarand, at 227, 115 S.Ct., at 2113; Croson, supra, at 494, 109 S.Ct., at 722 (plurality opinion); Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 274, 280, and n. 6, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 1847, 1850, and n. 6, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (plurality opinion).

*2483 [5] [6] [7] 905 In Shaw v. Reno, supra, we recognized that these equal protection principles govern a State's drawing of congressional districts, though, as our cautious approach there discloses, application of these principles to electoral districting is a most delicate task. Our analysis began from the premise that "[l]aws that explicitly distinguish between individuals on racial grounds fall within the core of [the Equal Protection Clause's] prohibition." Id., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2824. This prohibition extends not just to explicit racial classifications, but also to laws neutral on their face but " 'unexplainable on grounds other than race.' " Id., at 644, 113 S.Ct., at 2825 (quoting Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 266, 97 S.Ct. 555, 563, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977)). Applying this basic equal protection analysis in the voting rights context, we held that "redistricting legislation that is so bizarre on its face that it is 'unexplainable on grounds other than race,' ... demands the same close scrutiny that we give other state laws that classify citizens by race." 509 U.S., at 644, 113 S.Ct., at 2825 (quoting Arlington Heights, supra, at 266, 97 S.Ct., at 563).

This litigation requires us to apply the principles articulated in Shaw to the most recent congressional redistricting plan enacted by the State of Georgia.

B

[8] [9] In 1965, the Attorney General designated Georgia a covered jurisdiction under § 4(b) of the Voting Rights Act (Act), 79 Stat. 438, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 1973b(b). 30 Fed.Reg. 9897 (1965); see 28 CFR pt. 51, App.; see also City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 161, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 1553, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980). In consequence, § 5 of the Act requires Georgia to obtain either administrative preclearance by the Attorney General or approval by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia of any change in a "standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting" made after November 1, 1964. 42 U.S.C. § 1973c. The preclearance mechanism applies to 906 congressional redistricting plans, see, e.g., Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 133, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1360, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976), and requires that the proposed change "not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color." 42 U.S.C. § 1973c. "[T]he purpose of § 5 has always been to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise." Beer, supra, at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1363.

Between 1980 and 1990, one of Georgia's 10 congressional districts was a majority-black district, that is, a majority of the district's voters were black. The 1990 Decennial Census indicated that Georgia's population of 6,478,216 persons, 27% of whom are black, entitled it to an additional eleventh congressional seat, App. 9, prompting Georgia's General Assembly to redraw the State's congressional districts. Both the House and the Senate adopted redistricting guidelines which, among other things, required single-member districts of equal population, contiguous geography, nondilution of minority voting strength, fidelity to precinct lines where possible, and compliance with §§ 2 and 5 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 1973, 1973c. See App. 11–12. Only after these requirements were met did the guidelines permit drafters to consider other ends, such as maintaining the integrity of political subdivisions, preserving the core of existing districts, and avoiding contests between incumbents. Id., at 12.

A special session opened in August 1991, and the General Assembly submitted a congressional redistricting plan to the Attorney General for preclearance on October 1, 1991. The legislature's plan contained two majority-minority districts, the Fifth and Eleventh, and an additional district, the Second, in which blacks comprised just over 35% of the voting age population. Despite the plan's increase in the number of majority-black districts from one to two and the absence of any evidence of an intent to discriminate against minority voters, 864 F.Supp. 1354, 1363, and n. 7 (SD Ga.1994), the 907 Department of Justice refused preclearance on January 21, 1992. App. 99–107. The Department's objection letter noted a concern that Georgia had created only two majority-minority districts, *2484 and that the proposed plan did not "recognize" certain minority populations by placing them in a majority-black district. Id., at 105, 105–106.

The General Assembly returned to the drawing board. A new plan was enacted and submitted for preclearance. This second attempt assigned the black population in Central Georgia's Baldwin County to the Eleventh District and increased the black populations in the Eleventh, Fifth, and Second Districts. The Justice Department refused preclearance again, relying on alternative plans proposing three majority-minority districts. Id., at 120–126. One of the alternative schemes relied on by the Department was the so-called "max-black" plan, 864 F.Supp., at 1360, 1362–1363, drafted by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) for the General Assembly's black caucus. The key to the ACLU's plan was the "Macon/Savannah trade." The dense black population in the Macon region would be transferred from the Eleventh District to the Second, converting the Second into a majority-black district, and the Eleventh District's loss in black population would be offset by extending the Eleventh to include the black populations in Savannah. Id., at 1365–1366. Pointing to the General Assembly's refusal to enact the Macon/Savannah swap into law, the Justice Department concluded that Georgia had "failed to explain adequately" its failure to create a third majority-minority district. App. 125. The State did not seek a declaratory judgment from the District Court for the District of Columbia. 864 F.Supp., at 1366, n. 11.

Twice spurned, the General Assembly set out to create three majority-minority districts to gain preclearance. Id., at 1366. Using the ACLU's "max-black" plan as its benchmark, id., at 1366–1367, the General Assembly enacted a plan that > 908 "bore all the signs of [the Justice Department's] involvement: The black population of Meriwether County was gouged out of the Third District and attached to the Second District by the narrowest of land bridges; Effingham and Chatham Counties were split to make way for the Savannah extension, which itself split the City of Savannah; and the plan as a whole split 26 counties, 23 more than the existing congressional districts." Id., at 1367. See Appendix A, infra, following p. 2494.

The new plan also enacted the Macon/Savannah swap necessary to create a third majority-black district. The Eleventh District lost the black population of Macon, but picked up Savannah, thereby connecting the black neighborhoods of metropolitan Atlanta and the poor black populace of coastal Chatham County, though 260 miles apart in distance and worlds apart in culture. In short, the social, political, and economic makeup of the Eleventh District tells a tale of disparity, not community. See 864 F.Supp. at 1376–1377, 1389–1390; Plaintiff's Exh. No. 85, pp. 10–27 (report of Timothy G. O'Rourke, Ph.D.). As the appendices to this opinion attest,

> "[t]he populations of the Eleventh are centered around four discrete, widely spaced urban centers that have absolutely nothing to do with each other, and stretch the district hundreds of miles across rural counties and narrow swamp corridors." 864 F.Supp., at 1389 (footnote omitted).
>
> "The dense population centers of the approved Eleventh District were all majority-black, all at the periphery of the district, and in the case of Atlanta, Augusta and Savannah, all tied to a sparsely populated rural core by even less populated land bridges. Extending from Atlanta to the Atlantic, the Eleventh covered 6,784.2 square miles, splitting eight counties and five municipalities along the way." Id., at 1367 (footnote omitted).

909 The Almanac of American Politics has this to say about the Eleventh District: "Geographically, it is a monstrosity, stretching from Atlanta to Savannah. Its core is the plantation country in the center of the state, lightly populated, but heavily black. It links by narrow corridors the black neighborhoods in Augusta, Savannah and southern DeKalb County." M. Barone & G. Ujifusa, Almanac of American Politics 356 (1994). Georgia's plan included three majority-black districts, though, and received Justice Department preclearance on April 2, 1992. Plaintiff's Exh. No. 6; see 864 F.Supp., at 1367.

*2485 [10] Elections were held under the new congressional redistricting plan on November 4, 1992, and black candidates were elected to Congress from all three majority-black districts. Id., at 1369. On January 13, 1994, appellees, five white voters from the Eleventh District, filed this action against various state officials (Miller Appellants) in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Georgia. Id., at 1369, 1370. As residents of the challenged Eleventh District, all appellees had standing. See United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 744–745, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 2436, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995). Their suit alleged that Georgia's Eleventh District was a racial gerrymander and so a violation of the Equal Protection Clause as interpreted in Shaw v. Reno. A three-judge court was convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284, and the United States and a number of Georgia residents intervened in support of the defendant-state officials.

A majority of the District Court panel agreed that the Eleventh District was invalid under Shaw, with one judge dissenting. 864 F.Supp. 1354 (1994). After sharp criticism of the Justice Department for its use of partisan advocates in its dealings with state officials and for its close cooperation with the ACLU's vigorous advocacy of minority district maximization, the majority turned to a careful interpretation of our opinion in Shaw. It read Shaw to require strict scrutiny whenever race is the "overriding, predominant force" in the redistricting process. 910 864 F.Supp., at 1372 (emphasis deleted). Citing much evidence of the legislature's purpose and intent in creating the final plan, as well as the irregular shape of the district (in particular several appendages drawn for the obvious purpose of putting black populations into the district), the court found that race was the overriding and predominant force in the districting determination. Id., at 1378. The court proceeded to apply strict scrutiny. Though rejecting proportional representation as a compelling interest, it was willing to assume that compliance with the Act would be a compelling interest. Id., at 1381–1382. As to the latter, however, the court found that the Act did not require three majority-black districts, and that Georgia's plan for that reason was not narrowly tailored to the goal of complying with the Act. Id., at 1392–1393.

Appellants filed notices of appeal and requested a stay of the District Court's judgment, which we granted pending the filing and disposition of the appeals in this litigation, Miller v. Johnson, 512 U.S. 1283, 115 S.Ct. 36, 129 L.Ed.2d 932 (1994). We later noted probable jurisdiction. 513 U.S. 1071, 115 S.Ct. 713, 130 L.Ed.2d 620 (1995); see 28 U.S.C. § 1253.

II

A

[11] Finding that the "evidence of the General Assembly's intent to racially gerrymander the Eleventh District is overwhelming, and practically stipulated by the parties involved," the District Court held that race was the predominant, overriding factor in drawing the Eleventh District. 864 F.Supp., at 1374; see id., at 1374–1378. Appellants do not take issue with the court's factual finding of this racial motivation. Rather, they contend that evidence of a legislature's deliberate classification of voters on the basis of race cannot alone suffice to state a claim under Shaw. They argue that, regardless of the legislature's purposes, a plaintiff must demonstrate that a district's shape is so bizarre that it is unexplainable other than on the basis of race, and that 911 appellees failed to make that showing here. Appellants' conception of the constitutional violation misapprehends our holding in Shaw and the equal protection precedent upon which Shaw relied.

[12] [13] [14] [15] [16] [17] Shaw recognized a claim "analytically distinct" from a vote dilution claim. 509 U.S., at 652, 113S.Ct., at 2830; see id., at 649–650, 113 S.Ct., at 2828. Whereas a vote dilution claim alleges that the State has enacted a particular voting scheme as a purposeful device "to minimize or cancel out the voting potential of racial or ethnic minorities," Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 66, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 1499, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (citing cases), an action disadvantaging voters of a particular race, the essence of the equal protection claim recognized in Shaw is that the *2486 State has used race as a basis for separating voters into districts. Just as the State may not, absent extraordinary justification, segregate citizens on the basis of race in its public parks, New Orleans City Park Improvement Assn. v. Detiege, 358 U.S. 54, 79 S.Ct. 99, 3 L.Ed.2d 46 (1958) (per curiam), buses, Gayle v. Browder, 352 U.S. 903, 77 S.Ct. 145, 1 L.Ed.2d 114 (1956) (per curiam), golf courses, Holmes v. Atlanta, 350 U.S. 879, 76 S.Ct. 141, 100 L.Ed. 776 (1955) (per curiam), beaches, Mayor of Baltimore v. Dawson, 350 U.S. 877, 76 S.Ct. 133, 100 L.Ed. 774 (1955) (per curiam), and schools, Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954), so did we recognize in Shaw that it may not separate its citizens into different voting districts on the basis of race. The idea is a simple one: "At the heart of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that the Government must treat citizens 'as individuals, not "as simply components of a racial, religious, sexual or national class." ' " Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547, 602, 110 S.Ct. 2997, 3028, 111 L.Ed.2d 445 (1990) (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting) (quoting Arizona Governing Comm. for Tax Deferred Annuity and Deferred Compensation Plans v. Norris, 463 U.S. 1073, 1083, 103 S.Ct. 3492, 3498, 77 L.Ed.2d 1236 (1983)); cf. Northeastern Fla. Chapter, Associated Gen. Contractors of America v. Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656, 666, 113 S.Ct. 2297, 2303, 124 L.Ed.2d 586 (1993) (" 'injury in fact' " was "denial of equal treatment ..., not the ultimate inability to obtain the benefit"). When the State assigns voters on the basis of race, it engages in 912 the offensive and demeaning assumption that voters of a particular race, because of their race, "think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls." Shaw, supra, at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2827; see Metro Broadcasting, supra, at 636, 110 S.Ct., at 3046 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting). Race-based assignments "embody stereotypes that treat individuals as the product of their race, evaluating their thoughts and efforts—their very worth as citizens—according to a criterion barred to the Government by history and the Constitution." Metro Broadcasting, supra, at 604, 110 S.Ct., at 3029 (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting) (citation omitted); see Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 1370, 113 L.Ed.2d 411 (1991) ("Race cannot be a proxy for determining juror bias or competence"); Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429, 432, 104 S.Ct. 1879, 1881, 80 L.Ed.2d 421 (1984) ("Classifying persons according to their race is more likely to reflect racial prejudice than legitimate public concerns; the race, not the person, dictates the category"). They also cause society serious harm. As we concluded in Shaw:

> "Racial classifications with respect to voting carry particular dangers. Racial gerrymandering, even for remedial purposes, may balkanize us into competing racial factions; it threatens to carry us further from the goal of a political system in which race no longer matters—a goal that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments embody, and to which the Nation continues to aspire. It is for these reasons that race-based districting by our state legislatures demands close judicial scrutiny." Shaw, supra, at 657, 113 S.Ct., at 2832.

[18] [19] Our observation in *Shaw*of the consequences of racial stereotyping was not meant to suggest that a district must be bizarre on its face before thereis a constitutional violation. Nor was our conclusion in Shaw that in certain instances a district'sappearance (or, to be more precise, its appearance in combination withcertain demographic evidence) can give rise to an equal protection claim, 509 U.S., at 649, 113 S.Ct., at 2828, a holding that bizarreness was athreshold showing, as appellants believe 913 it to be. Our circumspect approach and narrow holding in Shaw did not erect an artificial rule barringaccepted equal protection analysis in other redistricting cases. Shape is relevant not because bizarreness is a necessary elementof the constitutional wrong or a threshold requirement of proof, but because it may be persuasive circumstantial evidence that race for its own sake, and not other districting principles, was the legislature's dominant and controlling rationale in drawing its districtlines. The logical implication, as courts applying Shaw have recognized, is that parties may rely on evidence other than bizarreness to establish race-based districting. See Shaw v. Hunt, 861 F.Supp. 408, 431 (EDNC 1994); Hays v. *2487 Louisiana, 839 F.Supp. 1188, 1195 (WD La.1993), vacated, 512 U.S. 1230, 114 S.Ct. 2731, 129 L.Ed.2d 853 (1994); but see DeWitt v. Wilson, 856 F.Supp. 1409, 1413 (ED Cal.1994).

[20] [21] Our reasoning in Shaw compels this conclusion. We recognized in Shaw that, outside the districting context, statutes are subject to strict scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause not just when they contain express racial classifications, but also when, though race neutral on their face, they are motivated by a racial purpose or object. 509 U.S., at 644, 113 S.Ct., at 2825. In the rare case, where the effect of government action is a pattern " 'unexplainable on grounds other than race,' " ibid. (quoting Arlington Heights, 429 U.S., at 266, 97 S.Ct., at 563), "[t]he evidentiary inquiry is ... relatively easy," Arlington Heights, supra, at 266, 97 S.Ct., at 563 (footnote omitted). As early as Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220 (1886), the Court recognized that a laundry permit ordinance was administered in a deliberate way to exclude all Chinese from the laundry business; and in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960), the Court concluded that the redrawing of Tuskegee, Alabama's municipal boundaries left no doubt that the plan was designed to exclude blacks. Even in those cases, however, it was the presumed racial purpose of state action, not its stark manifestation, that was the constitutional violation. Patterns of discrimination as conspicuous as these are rare, and 914 are not a necessary predicate to a violation of the Equal Protection Clause. Cf. Arlington Heights, supra, at 266, n. 14, 97 S.Ct., at 563, n. 14. In the absence of a pattern as stark as those in Yick Wo or Gomillion, "impact alone is not determinative, and the Court must look to other evidence" of race-based decisionmaking. Arlington Heights, supra, at 266, 97 S.Ct., at 563 (footnotes omitted).

Shaw applied these same principles to redistricting. "In some exceptional cases, a reapportionment plan may be so highly irregular that, on its face, it rationally cannot be understood as anything other than an effort to 'segregat[e] ... voters' on the basis of race." Shaw, supra, at 646–647, 113 S.Ct., at 2826 (quoting Gomillion, supra, at 341, 81 S.Ct., at 127). In other cases, where the district is not so bizarre on its face that it discloses a racial design, the proof will be more "difficul[t]." 509 U.S., at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826. Although it was not necessary in Shaw to consider further the proof required in these more difficult cases, the logical import of our reasoning is that evidence other than a district's bizarre shape can be used to support the claim.

Appellants and some of their amici argue that the Equal Protection Clause's general proscription on race-based decisionmaking does not obtain in the districting context because redistricting by definition involves racial considerations. Underlying their argument are the very stereotypical assumptions the Equal Protection Clause forbids. It is true that redistricting in most cases will implicate a political calculus in which various interests compete for recognition, but it does not follow from this that individuals of the same race share a single political interest. The view that they do is "based on the demeaning notion that members of the defined racial groups ascribe to certain 'minority views' that must be different from those of other citizens," Metro Broadcasting, 497 U.S., at 636, 110 S.Ct., at 3046 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting), the precise use of race as a proxy the Constitution prohibits. Nor can the argument that districting cases are excepted from standard equal protection precepts be resuscitated by 915 United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburgh, Inc. v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 97 S.Ct. 996, 51 L.Ed.2d 229 (1977), where the Court addressed a claim that New York violated the Constitution by splitting a Hasidic Jewish community in order to include additional majority-minority districts. As we explained in Shaw, a majority of the Justices in UJO construed the complaint as stating a vote dilution claim, so their analysis does not apply to a claim that the State has separated voters on the basis of race. 509 U.S., at 652, 113 S.Ct., at 2829. To the extent any of the opinions in that "highly fractured decision," id., at 651, 113 S.Ct., at 2829, can be interpreted as suggesting that a State's assignment of voters on the basis of race would be subject to anything *2488 but our strictest scrutiny, those views ought not be deemed controlling.

In sum, we make clear that parties alleging that a State has assigned voters on the basis of race are neither confined in their proof to evidence regarding the district's geometry and makeup nor required to make a threshold showing of bizarreness. Today's litigation requires us further to consider the requirements of the proof necessary to sustain this equal protection challenge.

B

[22] [23] [24] [25] [26] [27] [28] [29] Federal-court review of districting legislation represents a serious intrusion on the most vital of local functions. It is well settled that "reapportionment is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State." Chapman v. Meier, 420 U.S. 1, 27, 95 S.Ct. 751, 766, 42 L.Ed.2d 766 (1975); see, e.g., Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 156–157, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1156–1157, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993); Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 34, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 1081, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993). Electoral districting is a most difficult subject for legislatures, and so the States must have discretion to exercise the political judgment necessary to balance competing interests. Although race-based decisionmaking is inherently suspect, e.g., Adarand, 515 U.S., at 218, 115 S.Ct., at 2108 (citing Bakke, 438 U.S., at 291, 98 S.Ct., at 2748 (opinion of Powell, J.)), until a claimant makes a showing sufficient to support that allegation the good faith of a state legislature must be presumed, see id. at 318–319, 98 S.Ct., at 2762–2763 (opinion of Powell, J.). The courts, in assessing the sufficiency of a challenge to a districting plan, must be sensitive to the complex 916 interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus.

Redistricting legislatures will, for example, almost always be aware of racial demographics; but it does not follow that race predominates in the redistricting process. Shaw, supra, at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826; see Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2296, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979) (" '[D]iscriminatory purpose' ... implies more than intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences. It implies that the decisionmaker ... selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least in part 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' its adverse effects") (footnotes and citation omitted). The distinction between being aware of racial considerations and being motivated by them may be difficult to make. This evidentiary difficulty, together with the sensitive nature of redistricting and the presumption of good faith that must be accorded legislative enactments, requires courts to exercise extraordinary caution in adjudicating claims that a State has drawn district lines on the basis of race. The plaintiff's burden is to show, either through circumstantial evidence of a district's shape and demographics or more direct evidence going to legislative purpose, that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district. To make this showing, a plaintiff must prove that the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles, including but not limited to compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions or communities defined by actual shared interests, to racial considerations. Where these or other race-neutral considerations are the basis for redistricting legislation, and are not subordinated to race, a State can "defeat a claim that a district has been gerrymandered on racial lines." Shaw, supra, 515 U.S., at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2827. These principles inform the plaintiff's burden of proof at trial. Of course, courts must also recognize these principles, and the intrusive potential of judicial intervention into the legislative realm, when assessing under the Federal Rules of Civil 917 Procedure the adequacy of a plaintiff's showing at the various stages of litigation and determining whether to permit discovery or trial to proceed. See, e.g., Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. 12(b) and (e), 26(b)(2), 56; see also Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 327, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 2554, 91 L.Ed.2d 265 (1986).

[30] In our view, the District Court applied the correct analysis, and its finding that race was the predominant factor motivating the drawing of the Eleventh District was not clearly erroneous. The court found it was *2489 "exceedingly obvious" from the shape of the Eleventh District, together with the relevant racial demographics, that the drawing of narrow land bridges to incorporate within the district outlying appendages containing nearly 80% of the district's total black population was a deliberate attempt to bring black populations into the district. 864 F.Supp., at 1375; see id., at 1374–1376. Although by comparison with other districts the geometric shape of the Eleventh District may not seem bizarre on its face, when its shape is considered in conjunction with its racial and population densities, the story of racial gerrymandering seen by the District Court becomes much clearer. See Appendix B, infra, at 2496; see also App. 133. Although this evidence is quite compelling, we need not determine whether it was, standing alone, sufficient to establish a Shaw claim that the Eleventh District is unexplainable other than by race. The District Court had before it considerable additional evidence showing that the General Assembly was motivated by a predominant, overriding desire to assign black populations to the Eleventh District and thereby permit the creation of a third majority-black district in the Second. 864 F.Supp., at 1372, 1378.

The court found that "it became obvious," both from the Justice Department's objection letters and the three preclearance rounds in general, "that [the Justice Department] would accept nothing less than abject surrender to its maximization agenda." Id., at 1366, n. 11; see id., at 1360–1367; see also Arlington Heights, 429 U.S., at 267, 97 S.Ct., at 564 ("historical 918 background of the decision is one evidentiary source"). It further found that the General Assembly acquiesced and as a consequence was driven by its overriding desire to comply with the Department's maximization demands. The court supported its conclusion not just with the testimony of Linda Meggers, the operator of "Herschel," Georgia's reapportionment computer, and "probably the most knowledgeable person available on the subject of Georgian redistricting," 864 F.Supp., at 1361, 1363, n. 6, 1366, but also with the State's own concessions. The State admitted that it " 'would not have added those portions of Effingham and Chatham Counties that are now in the [far southeastern extension of the] present Eleventh Congressional District but for the need to include additional black population in that district to offset the loss of black population caused by the shift of predominantly black portions of Bibb County in the Second Congressional District which occurred in response to the Department of Justice's March 20th, 1992, objection letter.' " Id., at 1377. It conceded further that "[t]o the extent that precincts in the Eleventh Congressional District are split, a substantial reason for their being split was the objective of increasing the black population of that district." Ibid. And in its brief to this Court, the State concedes that "[i]t is undisputed that Georgia's eleventh is the product of a desire by the General Assembly to create a majority black district." Brief for Miller Appellants 30. Hence the trial court had little difficulty concluding that the Justice Department "spent months demanding purely race-based revisions to Georgia's redistricting plans, and that Georgia spent months attempting to comply." 864 F.Supp., at 1377. On this record, we fail to see how the District Court could have reached any conclusion other than that race was the predominant factor in drawing Georgia's Eleventh District; and in any event we conclude the court's finding is not clearly erroneous. Cf. Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 56–57, 84 S.Ct. 603, 605, 11 L.Ed.2d 512 (1964) (evidence presented "conflicting inferences" and therefore "failed to 919 prove that the New York Legislature was either motivated by racial considerations or in fact drew the districts on racial lines").

[31] In light of its well-supported finding, the District Court was justified in rejecting the various alternative explanations offered for the district. Although a legislature's compliance with "traditional districting principles such as compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions" may well suffice to refute a claim of racial gerrymandering, Shaw, 509 U.S., at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2827, appellants cannot make such a refutation where, as here, those factors were subordinated to racial objectives. Georgia's Attorney General objected to the Justice Department's demand for three majority-black districts on the ground that to do so the *2490 State would have to "violate all reasonable standards of compactness and contiguity." App. 118. This statement from a state official is powerful evidence that the legislature subordinated traditional districting principles to race when it ultimately enacted a plan creating three majority-black districts, and justified the District Court's finding that "every [objective districting] factor that could realistically be subordinated to racial tinkering in fact suffered that fate." 864 F.Supp., at 1384; see id., at 1364, n. 8; id., at 1375 ("While the boundaries of the Eleventh do indeed follow many precinct lines, this is because Ms. Meggers designed the Eleventh District along racial lines, and race data was most accessible to her at the precinct level").

Nor can the State's districting legislation be rescued by mere recitation of purported communities of interest. The evidence was compelling "that there are no tangible 'communities of interest' spanning the hundreds of miles of the Eleventh District." Id., at 1389–1390. A comprehensive report demonstrated the fractured political, social, and economic interests within the Eleventh District's black population. See Plaintiff's Exh. No. 85, pp. 10–27 (report of Timothy G. O'Rourke, Ph.D.). It is apparent that it was not alleged 920 shared interests but rather the object of maximizing the district's black population and obtaining Justice Department approval that in fact explained the General Assembly's actions. 864 F.Supp., at 1366, 1378, 1380. A State is free to recognize communities that have a particular racial makeup, provided its action is directed toward some common thread of relevant interests. "[W]hen members of a racial group live together in one community, a reapportionment plan that concentrates members of the group in one district and excludes them from others may reflect wholly legitimate purposes." Shaw, 509 U.S., at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826. But where the State assumes from a group of voters' race that they "think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls," it engages in racial stereotyping at odds with equal protection mandates. Id., at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2827; cf. Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 1370, 113 L.Ed.2d 411 (1991) ("We may not accept as a defense to racial discrimination the very stereotype the law condemns").

[32] Race was, as the District Court found, the predominant, overriding factor explaining the General Assembly's decision to attach to the Eleventh District various appendages containing dense majority-black populations. 864 F.Supp., at 1372, 1378. As a result, Georgia's congressional redistricting plan cannot be upheld unless it satisfies strict scrutiny, our most rigorous and exacting standard of constitutional review.

III

[33] [34] [35] [36] Tosatisfy strict scrutiny, the State must demonstrate that its districting legislation is narrowly tailored to achieve a compellinginterest. Shaw, supra, at 653–657, 113 S.Ct., at 2830–2832; see also Croson, 488 U.S., at 494, 109 S.Ct., at 722 (plurality opinion); Wygant, 476 U.S., at 274, 280, and n. 6, 106 S.Ct., at 1847, 1850, and n. 6 (plurality opinion); cf. Adarand, 515 U.S., at 227, 115 S.Ct., at 2114. There is a "significant state interest in eradicating the effects of past racial discrimination." Shaw, supra, at 656, 113 S.Ct., at 2831. The State does not argue, however, that it created the Eleventh District to remedy past discrimination, and with good 921 reason: There is little doubt that the State's true interest in designing the Eleventh District was creating a third majority-black district to satisfy the Justice Department's preclearance demands. 864 F.Supp., at 1378

("[T]he only interest the General Assembly had in mind when drafting the current congressional plan was satisfying [the Justice Department's] preclearance requirements"); id., at 1366; compare Wygant, supra, at 277, 106 S.Ct., at 1848 (plurality opinion) (under strict scrutiny, State must have convincing evidence that remedial action is necessary before implementing affirmative action), with Heller v. Doe, 509 U.S. 312, 320, 113 S.Ct. 2637, 2642, 125 L.Ed.2d 257 (1993) (under rational-basis review, legislature need not " 'actually articulate at any time the purpose or rationale supporting its classification' ") (quoting Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 15, 112 S.Ct. 2326, 2334, 120 L.Ed.2d 1 (1992)). Whether or not in some cases compliance with the Act, standing *2491 alone, can provide a compelling interest independent of any interest in remedying past discrimination, it cannot do so here. As we suggested in Shaw, compliance with federal antidiscrimination laws cannot justify race-based districting where the challenged district was not reasonably necessary under a constitutional reading and application of those laws. See 509 U.S., at 653–655, 113 S.Ct., at 2830–2831. The congressional plan challenged here was not required by the Act under a correct reading of the statute.

The Justice Department refused to preclear both of Georgia's first two submitted redistricting plans. The District Court found that the Justice Department had adopted a "black-maximization" policy under § 5, and that it was clear from its objection letters that the Department would not grant preclearance until the State made the "Macon/Savannah trade" and created a third majority-black district. 864 F.Supp., at 1366, 1380. It is, therefore, safe to say that the congressional plan enacted in the end was required in order to obtain preclearance. It does not follow, however, that the plan was required by the substantive provisions of the Act.

[37] [38] [39] 922 We do not accept the contention that the State has a compelling interest in complying with whatever preclearance mandates the Justice Department issues. When a state governmental entity seeks to justify race-based remedies to cure the effects of past discrimination, we do not accept the government's mere assertion that the remedial action is required. Rather, we insist on a strong basis in evidence of the harm being remedied. See, e.g., Shaw, supra, at 656, 113 S.Ct., at 2831–2832; Croson, supra, at 500–501, 109 S.Ct., at 725; Wygant, supra, at 276–277, 106 S.Ct. at 1848 (plurality opinion). "The history of racial classifications in this country suggests that blind judicial deference to legislative or executive pronouncements of necessity has no place in equal protection analysis." Croson, supra, at 501, 109 S.Ct., at 725. Our presumptive skepticism of all racial classifications, see Adarand, supra, at 223–224, 115 S.Ct., at 2110–2111, prohibits us as well from accepting on its face the Justice Department's conclusion that racial districting is necessary under the Act. Where a State relies on the Department's determination that race-based districting is necessary to comply with the Act, the judiciary retains an independent obligation in adjudicating consequent equal protection challenges to ensure that the State's actions are narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling interest. See Shaw, supra, at 654, 113 S.Ct., at 2830–2831. Were we to accept the Justice Department's objection itself as a compelling interest adequate to insulate racial districting from constitutional review, we would be surrendering to the Executive Branch our role in enforcing the constitutional limits on race-based official action. We may not do so. See, e.g., United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 704, 94 S.Ct. 3090, 3105, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039 (1974) (judicial power cannot be shared with Executive Branch); Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803) ("It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is"); cf. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 211, 82 S.Ct. 691, 706, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962) (Supreme Court is "ultimate interpreter of the Constitution"); Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18, 78 S.Ct. 1401, 1409, 3 L.Ed.2d 5 (1958) ("permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system" is that "the federal 923 judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution").

[40] [41] For the same reasons, we think it inappropriate for a court engaged in constitutional scrutiny to accord deference to the Justice Department's interpretation of the Act. Although we have deferred to the Department's interpretation in certain statutory cases, see, e.g., Presley v. Etowah County Comm'n, 502 U.S. 491, 508–509, 112 S.Ct. 820, 831, 117 L.Ed.2d 51 (1992), and cases cited therein, we have rejected agency interpretations to which we would otherwise defer where they raise serious constitutional questions. *2492 Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 574–575, 108 S.Ct. 1392, 1396–1397, 99 L.Ed.2d 645 (1988). When the Justice Department's interpretation of the Act compels race-based districting, it by definition raises a serious constitutional question, see, e.g., Bakke, 438 U.S., at 291, 98 S.Ct., at 2748 (opinion of Powell, J.) ("Racial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are inherently suspect" under the Equal Protection Clause), and should not receive deference.

[42] [43] Georgia's drawing of the Eleventh District was not required under the Act because there was no reasonable basis to believe that Georgia's earlier enacted plans violated § 5. Wherever a plan is "ameliorative," a term we have used to describe plans increasing the number of majority-minority districts, it "cannot violate § 5 unless the new apportionment itself so discriminates on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution." Beer, 425 U.S., at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1363. Georgia's first and second proposed plans increased the number of majority-black districts from 1 out of 10 (10%) to 2 out of 11 (18.18%). These plans were "ameliorative" and could not have violated § 5's nonretrogression principle. Ibid. Acknowledging as much, see Brief for United States 29; 864 F.Supp., at 1384–1385, the United States now relies on the fact that the Justice Department may object to a state proposal either on the ground that it has a prohibited purpose or a prohibited effect, see, e.g., 924 Pleasant Grove v. United States, 479 U.S. 462, 469, 107 S.Ct. 794, 798, 93 L.Ed.2d 866 (1987). The Government justifies its preclearance objections on the ground that the submitted plans violated § 5's purpose element. The key to the Government's position, which is plain from its objection letters if not from its briefs to this Court, compare App. 105–106, 124–125 with Brief for United States 31–33, is and always has been that Georgia failed to proffer a nondiscriminatory purpose for its refusal in the first two submissions to take the steps necessary to create a third majority-minority district.

[44] [45] The Government's position is insupportable. "[A]meliorative changes, even if they fall short of what might be accomplished in terms of increasing minority representation, cannot be found to violate section 5 unless they so discriminate on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution." Days, Section 5 and the Role of the Justice Department, in B. Grofman & C. Davidson, Controversies in Minority Voting 56 (1992). Although it is true we have held that the State has the burden to prove a nondiscriminatory purpose under § 5, e.g., Pleasant Grove, supra, at 469, 107 S.Ct., at 798, Georgia's Attorney General provided a detailed explanation for the State's initial decision not to enact the max-black plan, see App. 117–119. The District Court accepted this explanation, 864 F.Supp., at 1365, and found an absence of any discriminatory intent, id., at 1363, and n. 7. The State's policy of adhering to other districting principles instead of creating as many majority-minority districts as possible does not support an inference that the plan "so discriminates on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution," Beer, supra, at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1363; see Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (plurality opinion), and thus cannot provide any basis under § 5 for the Justice Department's objection.

Instead of grounding its objections on evidence of a discriminatory purpose, it would appear the Government was driven by its policy of maximizing majority-black districts. Although the Government now disavows having had that 925 policy, see Brief for United States 35, and seems to concede its impropriety, see Tr. of Oral Arg. 32–33, the District Court's well-documented factual finding was that the Department did adopt a maximization policy and followed it in objecting to Georgia's first two plans.[*] One of the two *2493 Department of Justice line attorneys overseeing the Georgia preclearance process himself disclosed that " 'what we did and what I did specifically was to take a ... map of the State of Georgia shaded for race, shaded by minority concentration, and overlay the districts that were drawn by the State of Georgia and see how well those lines adequately reflected black voting strength.' " 864 F.Supp., at 1362, n. 4. In utilizing § 5 to require States to create majority-minority districts wherever possible, the Department of Justice expanded its authority under the statute beyond what Congress intended and we have upheld.

Section 5 was directed at preventing a particular set of invidious practices that had the effect of "undo[ing] or defeat[ing] the rights recently won by nonwhite voters." 926 H.R.Rep. No. 91–397, p. 8 (1969). As we explained in Beer v. United States,

> " 'Section 5 was a response to a common practice in some jurisdictions of staying one step ahead of the federal courts by passing new discriminatory voting laws as soon as the old ones had been struck down. That practice had been possible because each new law remained in effect until the Justice Department or private plaintiffs were able to sustain the burden of proving that the new law, too, was discriminatory.... Congress therefore decided, as the Supreme Court held it could, "to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victim," by "freezing election procedures in the covered areas unless the changes can be shown to be nondiscriminatory." ' " 425 U.S., at 140, 96 S.Ct., at 1363 (quoting H.R.Rep. No. 94–196, pp. 57–58 (1975) (footnotes omitted)).

[46] Based on this historical understanding, we recognized in Beer that "the purpose of § 5 has always been to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise." 425 U.S., at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1363. The Justice Department's maximization policy seems quite far removed from this purpose. We are especially reluctant to conclude that § 5 justifies that policy given the serious constitutional concerns it raises. In South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966), we upheld § 5 as a necessary and constitutional response to some States' "extraordinary stratagem[s] of contriving new rules of various kinds for the sole purpose of perpetuating voting discrimination in the face of adverse federal court decrees." Id., at 335, 86 S.Ct., at 822 (footnote omitted); see also City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S., at 173–183, 100 S.Ct., at 1559–1564. But our belief in Katzenbach that the federalism costs exacted by § 5 preclearance could be justified by those extraordinary circumstances does not 927 mean they can be justified in the circumstances of this litigation. And the Justice Department's implicit command that States engage in presumptively unconstitutional race-based districting brings the Act, once upheld as a proper exercise of Congress' authority under § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment, Katzenbach, supra, at 327, 337, 86 S.Ct., at 818, 823, into tension with the Fourteenth Amendment. As we recalled in Katzenbach itself, Congress' exercise of its Fifteenth Amendment authority even when otherwise proper still must " 'consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution.' " 383 U.S., at 326, 86 S.Ct., at 817 (quoting McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 421, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819)). We need not, however, resolve these troubling and difficult constitutional questions today. There is no indication Congress intended such a far-reaching application of § 5, so we reject the Justice Department's interpretation of the statute and avoid the constitutional problems that interpretation raises. See, e.g., DeBartolo Corp. v. *2494 Florida Gulf Coast Trades Council, 485 U.S., at 575, 108 S.Ct., at 1397.

IV

The Act, and its grant of authority to the federal courts to uncover official efforts to abridge minorities' right to vote, has been of vital importance in eradicating invidious discrimination from the electoral process and enhancing the legitimacy of our political institutions. Only if our political system and our society cleanse themselves of that discrimination will all members of the polity share an equal opportunity to gain public office regardless of race. As a Nation we share both the obligation and the aspiration of working toward this end. The end is neither assured nor well served, however, by carving electorates into racial blocs. "If our society is to continue to progress as a multi-racial democracy, it must recognize that the automatic invocation of race stereotypes retards that progress and causes continued hurt and injury." Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614, 630–631, 111 S.Ct. 2077, 2088, 114 L.Ed.2d 660 (1991). It takes a shortsighted and 928 unauthorized view of the Voting Rights Act to invoke that statute, which has played a decisive role in redressing some of our worst forms of discrimination, to demand the very racial stereotyping the Fourteenth Amendment forbids.

* * *

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed, and the cases are remanded for further proceedings consistent with this decision.

It is so ordered.

*2495

*2496

2497 Justice O'CONNOR, concurring.

I understand the threshold standard the Court adopts—that "the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles ... to racial considerations," ante, at 2488—to be a demanding one. To invoke strict scrutiny, a plaintiff must show that the State has relied on race in substantial disregard of customary and traditional districting practices. Those practices provide a crucial frame of reference and therefore constitute a significant governing principle in cases of this kind. The standard would be no different if a legislature had drawn the boundaries to favor some other ethnic group; certainly the standard does not treat efforts to create majority-minority districts less favorably than similar efforts on behalf of other groups. Indeed, the driving force behind the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment was the desire to end legal discrimination against blacks.

Application of the Court's standard does not throw into doubt the vast majority of the Nation's 435 congressional districts, where presumably the States have drawn the boundaries in accordance with their customary districting principles. That is so even though race may well have been *929 considered in the redistricting process. See Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 646, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2826, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993); ante, at 2488. But application of the Court's standard helps achieve Shaw 's basic objective of making extreme instances of gerrymandering subject to meaningful judicial review. I therefore join the Court's opinion.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

Justice GINSBURG has explained why the District Court's opinion on the merits was erroneous and why this Court's law-changing decision will breed unproductive litigation. I join her excellent opinion without reservation. I add these comments because I believe the appellees in these cases, like the appellees in United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 115 Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635, have not suffered any legally cognizable injury.

In Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), the Court crafted a new cause of action with two novel, troubling features. First, the Court misapplied the term "gerrymander," previously used to describe grotesque line-drawing by a dominant group to maintain or enhance its political power at a minority's expense, to condemn the efforts of a majority (whites) to share its power with a minority (African-Americans). Second, the Court dispensed with its previous insistence in vote dilution cases on a showing of injury to an identifiable group of voters, but it failed to explain adequately what showing a plaintiff must make to establish standing to litigate the newly minted Shaw claim. Neither in Shaw itself nor in the cases decided today has the Court coherently articulated what injury this cause of action is designed to redress. Because appellees have alleged no legally cognizable injury, they lack standing, and these cases should be dismissed. See Hays, 515 U.S., at 750–751, 115 S.Ct., at 2439 (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment).

Even assuming the validity of Shaw, I cannot see how appellees in these cases could assert the injury the Court attributes to them. Appellees, plaintiffs below, are white *930 voters in Georgia's Eleventh Congressional District. The Court's conclusion that they have standing to maintain a Shaw claim appears to rest on a theory that their placement in the Eleventh District caused them " 'representational harms.' " Hays, at 744, 115 S.Ct., at 2436, cited ante, at 2485. The Shaw Court explained the concept of "representational harms" as follows: "When a district obviously is created solely to effectuate the perceived common interests of one racial group, elected officials are more likely to believe that their primary obligation is to represent only the members of that group, rather than their constituency as a whole." Shaw, 509 U.S., at 648, 113 S.Ct., at 2827. Although the Shaw Court attributed representational harms solely to a message sent by the legislature's action, those harms can only come about if the message is received—that is, first, if all or most black voters support the same candidate, and, second, if the successful candidate ignores the interests of her white constituents. Appellees' standing, 2498 in other words, ultimately depends on the very premise the Court purports to abhor: that voters of a particular race " 'think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls.' " Ante, at 2486 (quoting Shaw, 509 U.S., at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2827). This generalization, as the Court recognizes, is "offensive and demeaning." Ante, at 2486.

In particular instances, of course, members of one race may vote by an overwhelming margin for one candidate, and in some cases that candidate will be of the same race. "Racially polarized voting" is one of the circumstances plaintiffs must prove to advance a vote dilution claim. Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 56–58, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2769–2770, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). Such a claim allows voters to allege that gerrymandered district lines have impaired their ability to elect a candidate of their own race. The Court emphasizes, however, that a so-called Shaw claim is " 'analytically distinct' from a vote dilution claim," ante, at 2485 (quoting Shaw, 509 U.S., at 652, 113 S.Ct., at 2830). Neither in Shaw, nor in Hays, nor in the instant cases has the Court answered the *931 question its analytic distinction raises: If the Shaw injury does not flow from an increased probability that white candidates will lose, then how can the increased probability that black candidates will win cause white voters, such as appellees, cognizable harm?[1]

The Court attempts an explanation in these cases by equating the injury it imagines appellees have suffered with the injuries African-Americans suffered under segregation. The heart of appellees' claim, by the Court's account, is that "a State's assignment of voters on the basis of race," ante, at 2487, violates the Equal Protection Clause for the same reason a State may not "segregate citizens on the basis of race in its public parks, New Orleans City Park Improvement Assn. v. Detiege, 358 U.S. 54, 79 S.Ct. 99, 3 L.Ed.2d 46 (1958) (per curiam), buses, Gayle v. Browder, 352 U.S. 903, 77 S.Ct. 145, 1 L.Ed.2d 114 (1956) (per curiam), golf courses, Holmes v. Atlanta, 350 U.S. 879, 76 S.Ct. 141, 100 L.Ed. 776 (1955) (per curiam), beaches, Mayor of Baltimore v. Dawson, 350 U.S. 877, 76 S.Ct. 133, 100 L.Ed. 774 (1955) (per curiam), and schools, Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954)." Ante, at 2486. This equation, however, fails to elucidate the elusive Shaw injury. Our desegregation cases redressed the exclusion of black citizens from public facilities reserved for whites. In these cases, in contrast, any voter, black or white, may live in the Eleventh District. What appellees contest is the inclusion of too many black voters in the district as drawn. In my view, if appellees allege no vote dilution, that inclusion can cause them no conceivable injury.

The Court's equation of Shaw claims with our desegregation decisions is inappropriate for another reason. In each of those cases, legal segregation frustrated the public interest in diversity and tolerance by barring African-Americans *932 from joining whites in the activities at issue. The districting plan here, in contrast, serves the interest in diversity and tolerance by increasing the likelihood that a meaningful number of black representatives will add their voices to legislative debates. See post, at 2506 (GINSBURG, J., dissenting). "There is no moral or constitutional equivalence between a policy that is designed to perpetuate a caste system and one that seeks to eradicate racial subordination." Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S., at 243, 115 S.Ct., at 2120 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); see also id., at 247–248, n. 5, 115 S.Ct., at 2122–2123, n. 5. That racial integration of the sort attempted by Georgia now appears more vulnerable to judicial challenge than some policies alleged to perpetuate racial bias, cf. Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 104 S.Ct. 3315, 82 L.Ed.2d 556 (1984), is anomalous, to say the least.

Equally distressing is the Court's equation of traditional gerrymanders, designed to maintain or enhance a dominant group's power, with a dominant group's decision to share 2499 its power with a previously underrepresented group. In my view, districting plans violate the Equal Protection Clause when they "serve no purpose other than to favor one segment—whether racial, ethnic, religious, economic, or political—that may occupy a position of strength at a particular point in time, or to disadvantage a politically weak segment of the community." Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725, 748, 103 S.Ct. 2653, 2668–2669, 77 L.Ed.2d 133 (1983) (STEVENS, J., concurring). In contrast, I do not see how a districting plan that favors a politically weak group can violate equal protection. The Constitution does not mandate any form of proportional representation, but it certainly permits a State to adopt a policy that promotes fair representation of different groups. Indeed, this Court squarely so held in Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 37 L.Ed.2d 298 (1973):

> "[N]either we nor the district courts have a constitutional warrant to invalidate a state plan, otherwise *933 within tolerable population limits, because it undertakes, not to minimize or eliminate the political strength of any group or party, but to recognize it and, through districting, provide a rough sort of proportional representation in the legislative halls of the State." Id., at 754, 93 S.Ct., at 2332.

The Court's refusal to distinguish an enactment that helps a minority group from enactments that cause it harm is especially unfortunate at the intersection of race and voting, given that African-Americans and other disadvantaged groups have struggled so long and so hard for inclusion in that most central exercise of our democracy. See post, at 2500–2501 (GINSBURG, J., dissenting). I have long believed that treating racial groups differently from other identifiable groups of voters, as the Court does today, is itself an invidious racial classification. Racial minorities should receive neither more nor less protection than other groups against gerrymanders.[2] A fortiori, racial minorities should not be less eligible than other groups to benefit from districting plans the majority designs to aid them.

I respectfully dissent.

934 Justice GINSBURG, with whom Justice STEVENS and Justice BREYER join, and with whom Justice SOUTER joins except as to Part III–B, dissenting.

Legislative districting is highly political business. This Court has generally respected the competence of state legislatures to attend to the task. When race is the issue, however, we have recognized the need for judicial intervention to prevent dilution of minority voting strength. Generations of rank discrimination against African–Americans, as citizens and voters, account for that surveillance.

Two Terms ago, in Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), this Court took up a claim "analytically distinct" from a vote dilution claim. Id., at 652, 113 S.Ct., at 2830. Shaw authorized judicial intervention in "extremely irregular" apportionments, id., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2824, in which the legislature cast aside traditional districting practices to consider race alone—in the Shaw case, to create a district in North Carolina in which African–Americans would compose a majority of the voters.

Today the Court expands the judicial role, announcing that federal courts are to undertake searching review of any district with contours "predominant[ly] motivat[ed]" by race: "[S]trict scrutiny" will be triggered not *2500 only when traditional districting practices are abandoned, but also when those practices are "subordinated to"—given less weight than—race. See ante, at 2488. Applying this new "race-as-predominant-factor" standard, the Court invalidates Georgia's districting plan even though Georgia's Eleventh District, the focus of today's dispute, bears the imprint of familiar districting practices. Because I do not endorse the Court's new standard and would not upset Georgia's plan, I dissent.

I

At the outset, it may be useful to note points on which the Court does not divide. First, we agree that federalism and the slim judicial competence to draw district lines weigh 935 heavily against judicial intervention in apportionment decisions; as a rule, the task should remain within the domain of state legislatures. See ante, at 2488; Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 586, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 1394, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964) ("[L]egislative reapportionment is primarily a matter for legislative consideration and determination...."). Second, for most of our Nation's history, the franchise has not been enjoyed equally by black citizens and white voters. To redress past wrongs and to avert any recurrence of exclusion of blacks from political processes, federal courts now respond to Equal Protection Clause and Voting Rights Act complaints of state action that dilutes minority voting strength. See, e.g., Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986); White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973). Third, to meet statutory requirements, state legislatures must sometimes consider race as a factor highly relevant to the drawing of district lines. See Pildes & Niemi, Expressive Harms, "Bizarre Districts," and Voting Rights: Evaluating Election–District Appearances After Shaw v. Reno, 92 Mich.L.Rev. 483, 496 (1993) ("compliance with the [Voting Rights Act] and Gingles necessarily requires race-conscious districting"). Finally, state legislatures may recognize communities that have a particular racial or ethnic makeup, even in the absence of any compulsion to do so, in order to account for interests common to or shared by the persons grouped together. See Shaw, 509 U.S., at 646, 113 S.Ct., at 2826 ("[W]hen members of a racial group live together in one community, a reapportionment plan that concentrates members of the group in one district and excludes them from others may reflect wholly legitimate purposes.").

Therefore, the fact that the Georgia General Assembly took account of race in drawing district lines—a fact not in dispute—does not render the State's plan invalid. To offend the Equal Protection Clause, all agree, the legislature had to do more than consider race. How much more, is the issue that divides the Court today.

936 A

"We say once again what has been said on many occasions: reapportionment is primarily the duty and responsibility of the State through its legislature or other body, rather than of a federal court." Chapman v. Meier, 420 U.S. 1, 27, 95 S.Ct. 751, 766, 42 L.Ed.2d 766 (1975); see also ante, at 2488. The Constitution itself allocates this responsibility to States. U.S. Const., Art. I, § 2; Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 34, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 1081, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993).

"Districting inevitably has sharp political impact and inevitably political decisions must be made by those charged with the task." White v. Weiser, 412 U.S. 783, 795–796, 93 S.Ct. 2348, 2355, 37 L.Ed.2d 335 (1973). District lines are drawn to accommodate a myriad of factors—geographic, economic, historical, and political—and state legislatures, as arenas of compromise and electoral accountability, are best positioned to mediate competing claims; courts, with a mandate to adjudicate, are ill equipped for the task.

B

Federal courts have ventured into the political thicket of apportionment when necessary to secure to members of racial minorities equal voting rights—rights denied in many States, including Georgia, until not long ago.

The Fifteenth Amendment, ratified in 1870, declares that the right to vote "shall not be denied ... by any State on account of *2501 race." That declaration, for generations, was often honored in the breach; it was greeted by a near century of "unremitting and ingenious defiance" in several States, including Georgia. South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 309, 86 S.Ct. 803, 808, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966). After a brief interlude of black suffrage enforced by federal troops but accompanied by rampant violence against blacks, Georgia held a constitutional convention in 1877. Its purpose, according to the convention's leader, was to " 'fix it so that the people shall rule and the Negro shall never be heard from.' " McDonald, Binford, & Johnson, Georgia, in Quiet Revolution in the South 68 (C. Davidson 937 & B. Grofman eds. 1994) (quoting Robert Toombs). In pursuit of this objective, Georgia enacted a cumulative poll tax, requiring voters to show they had paid past as well as current poll taxes; one historian described this tax as the "most effective bar to Negro suffrage ever devised." A. Stone, Studies in the American Race Problem 354–355 (1908).

In 1890, the Georgia General Assembly authorized "white primaries"; keeping blacks out of the Democratic primary effectively excluded them from Georgia's political life, for victory in the Democratic primary was tantamount to election. McDonald, Binford, & Johnson, supra, at 68–69. Early in this century, Georgia Governor Hoke Smith persuaded the legislature to pass the "Disenfranchisement Act of 1908"; true to its title, this measure added various property, "good character," and literacy requirements that, as administered, served to keep blacks from voting. Id., at 69; see also Katzenbach, 383 U.S., at 310, 86 S.Ct., at 809 (tests of this order were "specifically designed to prevent Negroes from voting"). The result, as one commentator observed 25 years later, was an " 'almost absolute exclusion of the Negro voice in state and federal elections.' " McDonald, Binford, & Johnson, supra, at 70 (quoting R. Wardlaw, Negro Suffrage in Georgia, 1867–1930, p. 69 (unpublished 1932)).

Faced with a political situation scarcely open to self-correction—disenfranchised blacks had no electoral influence, hence no muscle to lobby the legislature for change—the Court intervened. It invalidated white primaries, see Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649, 64 S.Ct. 757, 88 L.Ed. 987 (1944), and other burdens on minority voting. See, e.g., Schnell v. Davis, 336 U.S. 933, 69 S.Ct. 749, 93 L.Ed. 1093 (1949) (per curiam) (discriminatory application of voting tests); Lane v. Wilson, 307 U.S. 268, 59 S.Ct. 872, 83 L.Ed. 1281 (1939) (procedural hurdles); Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347, 35 S.Ct. 926, 59 L.Ed. 1340 (1915) (grandfather clauses).

It was against this backdrop that the Court, construing the Equal Protection Clause, undertook to ensure that apportionment 938 plans do not dilute minority voting strength. See, e.g., Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 617, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 3275, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1982); Regester, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339; Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 57, 84 S.Ct. 603, 605–606, 11 L.Ed.2d 512 (1964). By enacting the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Congress heightened federal judicial involvement in apportionment, and also fashioned a role for the Attorney General. Section 2 creates a federal right of action to challenge vote dilution. Section 5 requires States with a history of discrimination to preclear any changes in voting practices with either a federal court (a three-judge United States District Court for the District of Columbia) or the Attorney General.

These Court decisions and congressional directions significantly reduced voting discrimination against minorities. In the 1972 election, Georgia gained its first black Member of Congress since Reconstruction, and the 1981 apportionment created the State's first majority-minority district.[1] This voting district, however, was not gained easily. Georgia created it only after the United States District Court for the District of Columbia refused to preclear a predecessor apportionment plan that included no such district—an omission due in part to the influence of Joe Mack Wilson, then Chairman of the Georgia House Reapportionment Committee. *2502 As Wilson put it only 14 years ago, " 'I don't want to draw nigger districts.' " Busbee v. Smith, 549 F.Supp. 494, 501 (DC 1982).

II

A

Before Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), this Court invoked the Equal Protection Clause to justify intervention in the quintessentially political task of legislative districting in two circumstances: to enforce the one-person-one-vote requirement, see Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964); and 939 to prevent dilution of a minority group's voting strength, see Regester, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339; Wright, 376 U.S., at 57, 84 S.Ct., at 605–606.[2]

In Shaw, the Court recognized a third basis for an equal protection challenge to a State's apportionment plan. The Court wrote cautiously, emphasizing that judicial intervention is exceptional: "Strict judicial scrutiny" is in order, the Court declared, if a district is "so extremely irregular on its face that it rationally can be viewed only as an effort to segregate the races for purposes of voting." 509 U.S., at 642, 113 S.Ct., at 2824.

"[E]xtrem[e] irregular[ity]" was evident in Shaw, the Court explained, setting out this description of the North Carolina voting district under examination:

> "It is approximately 160 miles long and, for much of its length, no wider than the I–85 corridor. It winds in snakelike fashion through tobacco country, financial centers, and manufacturing areas until it gobbles in enough enclaves of black neighborhoods. Northbound and southbound drivers on I–85 sometimes find themselves in separate districts in one county, only to 'trade' districts when they enter the next county. Of the 10 counties through which District 12 passes, 5 are cut into 3 different districts; even towns are divided. At one point the district remains contiguous only because it intersects at a single point with two other districts before crossing over them. One state legislator has remarked that ' "[i]f you drove down the interstate with both car 940 doors open, you'd kill most of the people in the district." ' Washington Post, Apr. 20, 1993, p. A4. The district even has inspired poetry: 'Ask not for whom the line is drawn; it is drawn to avoid thee.' Grofman, Would Vince Lombardi Have Been Right If He Had Said: 'When It Comes to Redistricting, Race Isn't Everything, It's the Only Thing'?, 14 Cardozo L.Rev. 1237, 1261, n. 96 (1993) (internal quotation marks omitted)." Shaw, Id., at 635–636, 113 S.Ct., at 2820–2821 (some citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

The problem in Shaw was not the plan architects' consideration of race as relevant in redistricting. Rather, in the Court's estimation, it was the virtual exclusion of other factors from the calculus. Traditional districting practices were cast aside, the Court concluded, with race alone steering placement of district lines.

B

The record before us does not show that race similarly overwhelmed traditional districting practices in Georgia. Although the Georgia General Assembly prominently considered race in shaping the Eleventh District, race did not crowd out all other factors, as the Court found it did in North Carolina's delineation of the Shaw district.

In contrast to the snake-like North Carolina district inspected in Shaw, Georgia's Eleventh District is hardly "bizarre," "extremely irregular," or "irrational on its face." *2503 Id., at 642, 644, 658, 113 S.Ct., at 2824, 2825, 2848. Instead, the Eleventh District's design reflects significant consideration of "traditional districting factors (such as keeping political subdivisions intact) and the usual political process of compromise and trades for a variety of nonracial reasons." 864 F.Supp. 1354, 1397, n. 5 (SD Ga.1994) (Edmondson, J., dissenting); cf. ante, at 2489 ("geometric shape of the Eleventh District may not seem bizarre on its face"). The district covers a core area in central and eastern 941 Georgia, and its total land area of 6,780 square miles is about average for the State. Defendant's Exh. 177, p. 4.[3] The border of the Eleventh District runs 1,184 miles, in line with Georgia's Second District, which has a 1,243–mile border, and the State's Eighth District, with a border running 1,155 miles. See 864 F.Supp., at 1396 (Edmondson, J., dissenting).[4]

Nor does the Eleventh District disrespect the boundaries of political subdivisions. Of the 22 counties in the district, 14 are intact and 8 are divided. See Joint Exh. 17. That puts the Eleventh District at about the state average in divided counties. By contrast, of the Sixth District's five counties, none are intact, ibid., and of the Fourth District's four counties, just one is intact. Ibid.[5] Seventy-one percent of the Eleventh District's boundaries track the borders of political subdivisions. See 864 F.Supp., at 1396 (Edmondson, J., dissenting). Of the State's 11 districts, 5 score worse than the Eleventh District on this criterion, and 5 score better. 942 See Defendant's Exh. 177, p. 4.[6] Eighty-three percent of the Eleventh District's geographic area is composed of intact counties, above average for the State's congressional districts. 864 F.Supp., at 1396 (Edmondson, J., dissenting).[7] And notably, the Eleventh District's boundaries largely follow precinct lines.[8]

Evidence at trial similarly shows that considerations other than race went into determining the Eleventh District's boundaries. For a "political reason"—to accommodate the request of an incumbent State Senator regarding the placement of the precinct in which his son lived—the DeKalb County portion of the Eleventh District was drawn to include a particular (largely white) precinct. 2 Tr. 187, 202. The corridor through Effingham County was substantially narrowed at the request of a (white) State Representative. 2 Tr. 189–190, 212–214. In Chatham County, the district was trimmed to exclude *2504 a heavily black community in Garden City because a State Representative wanted to keep the city intact inside the neighboring First District. 2 Tr. 218–219. The Savannah extension was configured by "the narrowest means possible" to avoid splitting the city of Port Wentworth. 4 Tr. 172–174, 175–178, 181–183.

943 Georgia's Eleventh District, in sum, is not an outlier district shaped without reference to familiar districting techniques. Tellingly, the district that the Court's decision today unsettles is not among those on a statistically calculated list of the 28 most bizarre districts in the United States, a study prepared in the wake of our decision in Shaw. See Pildes & Niemi, 92 Mich.L.Rev., at 565.

The Court suggests that it was not Georgia's Legislature, but the U.S. Department of Justice, that effectively drew the lines, and that Department officers did so with nothing but race in mind. Yet the "Max–Black" plan advanced by the Attorney General was not the plan passed by the Georgia General Assembly.[9] See 864 F.Supp., at 1396–1397, n. 5 (Edmondson, J., dissenting) ("The Max–Black plan did influence to some degree the shape of the ultimate Eleventh District.... [But] the actual Eleventh is not identical to the Max–Black plan. The Eleventh, to my eye, is significantly different in shape in many ways. These differences show ... consideration of other matters beyond race....").[10]

And although the Attorney General refused preclearance to the first two plans approved by Georgia's Legislature, the State was not thereby disarmed; Georgia could have demanded relief from the Department's objections by instituting a civil action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, with ultimate review in this Court. Instead of pursuing that avenue, the State chose to adopt the plan here in controversy—a plan the State forcefully defends 944 before us. We should respect Georgia's choice by taking its position on brief as genuine.

D

Along with attention to size, shape, and political subdivisions, the Court recognizes as an appropriate districting principle, "respect for ... communities defined by actual shared interests." Ante, at 2488. The Court finds no community here, however, because a report in the record showed "fractured political, social, and economic interests within the Eleventh District's black population." Ante, at 2490.

But ethnicity itself can tie people together, as volumes of social science literature have documented—even people with divergent economic interests. For this reason, ethnicity is a significant force in political life. As stated in a classic study of ethnicity in one city of immigrants:

> "[M]any elements—history, family and feeling, interest, formal organizational life—operate to keep much of New York life channeled within the bounds of the ethnic group....
>
> "... The political realm ... is least willing to consider [ethnicity] a purely private affair....
>
> . . . . .
>
> "[P]olitical life itself emphasizes the ethnic character of the city, with its balanced tickets and its special appeals...." N. Glazer & D. Moynihan, Beyond the Melting Pot 19–20 (1963).

See also, e.g., E. Litt, Beyond Pluralism: Ethnic Politics in America 2 (1970) ("[E]thnic forces play a surprisingly persistent role in our politics."); Ethnic Group Politics, Preface ix (H. Bailey & E. Katz eds. 1969) ("[E]thnic identifications do exist and ... one cannot really understand the American political *2505 process without giving special attention to racial, religious and national minorities.").

To accommodate the reality of ethnic bonds, legislatures have long drawn voting districts along ethnic lines. Our 945 Nation's cities are full of districts identified by their ethnic character—Chinese, Irish, Italian, Jewish, Polish, Russian, for example. See, e.g., S. Erie, Rainbow's End: Irish–Americans and the Dilemmas of Urban Machine Politics, 1840–1985, p. 91 (1988) (describing Jersey City's "Horseshoe district" as "lumping most of the city's Irish together"); Coveted Landmarks Add a Twist to Redistricting Task, Los Angeles Times, Sept. 10, 1991, pp. A1, A24 ("In San Francisco in 1961, ... an Irish Catholic [State Assembly member] 'wanted his district drawn following [Catholic] parish lines so all the parishes where he went to baptisms, weddings and funerals would be in his district'...."); Stone, Goode: Bad and Indifferent, Washington Monthly, July–Aug. 1986, pp. 27, 28 (discussing "The Law of Ethnic Loyalty— ... a universal law of politics," and identifying "predominantly Italian wards of South Philadelphia," a "Jewish Los Angeles district," and a "Polish district in Chicago"). The creation of ethnic districts reflecting felt identity is not ordinarily viewed as offensive or demeaning to those included in the delineation.

III

To separate permissible and impermissible use of race in legislative apportionment, the Court orders strict scrutiny for districting plans "predominantly motivated" by race. No longer can a State avoid judicial oversight by giving—as in this case—genuine and measurable consideration to traditional districting practices. Instead, a federal case can be mounted whenever plaintiffs plausibly allege that other factors carried less weight than race. This invitation to litigate against the State seems to me neither necessary nor proper.

A

The Court derives its test from diverse opinions on the relevance of race in contexts distinctly unlike apportionment. 946 See ante, at 2485–2486.[11] The controlling idea, the Court says, is " 'the simple command [at the heart of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection] that the Government must treat citizens as individuals, not as simply components of a racial, religious, sexual or national class.' " See ante, at 2485 (quoting Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547, 602, 110 S.Ct. 2997, 3028, 111 L.Ed.2d 445 (1990) (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting)) (some internal quotation marks omitted). But cf. Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 307, 25 L.Ed. 664 (1880) (pervading purpose of post-Civil *2506 War Amendments was to bar discrimination against once-enslaved race).

947 In adopting districting plans, however, States do not treat people as individuals. Apportionment schemes, by their very nature, assemble people in groups. States do not assign voters to districts based on merit or achievement, standards States might use in hiring employees or engaging contractors. Rather, legislators classify voters in groups—by economic, geographical, political, or social characteristics—and then "reconcile the competing claims of [these] groups." Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 147, 106 S.Ct. 2797, 2818, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment).

That ethnicity defines some of these groups is a political reality. Until now, no constitutional infirmity has been seen in districting Irish or Italian voters together, for example, so long as the delineation does not abandon familiar apportionment practices. See supra, at 2504–2505. If Chinese–Americans and Russian–Americans may seek and secure group recognition in the delineation of voting districts, then African–Americans should not be dissimilarly treated. Otherwise, in the name of equal protection, we would shut out "the very minority group whose history in the United States gave birth to the Equal Protection Clause." See Shaw, 509 U.S., at 679, 113 S.Ct., at 2845 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).[12]

B

Under the Court's approach, judicial review of the same intensity, i.e., strict scrutiny, is in order once it is determined that an apportionment is predominantly motivated by race. It matters not at all, in this new regime, whether the apportionment dilutes or enhances minority voting strength. As very recently observed, however, "[t]here is no moral or 948 constitutional equivalence between a policy that is designed to perpetuate a caste system and one that seeks to eradicate racial subordination." Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S., at 243, 115 S.Ct., at 2120 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

Special circumstances justify vigilant judicial inspection to protect minority voters—circumstances that do not apply to majority voters. A history of exclusion from state politics left racial minorities without clout to extract provisions for fair representation in the lawmaking forum. See supra, at 2500–2502. The equal protection rights of minority voters thus could have remained unrealized absent the Judiciary's close surveillance. Cf. United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 153, n. 4, 58 S.Ct. 778, 783, n. 4, 82 L.Ed. 1234 (1938) (referring to the "more searching judicial inquiry" that may properly attend classifications adversely affecting "discrete and insular minorities"). The majority, by definition, encounters no such blockage. White voters in Georgia do not lack means to exert strong pressure on their state legislators. The force of their numbers is itself a powerful determiner of what the legislature will do that does not coincide with perceived majority interests.

State legislatures like Georgia's today operate under federal constraints imposed by the Voting Rights Act—constraints justified by history and designed by Congress to make once-subordinated people free and equal citizens. But these federal constraints do not leave majority voters in need of extraordinary judicial solicitude. The Attorney General, who administers the Voting Rights Act's preclearance requirements, is herself a political actor. She has a duty to enforce the law Congress passed, and she is no doubt aware of the political cost of venturing too far to the detriment of majority voters. Majority voters, furthermore, can press the State to seek judicial review if the Attorney General refuses to preclear a plan that the voters favor. Finally, the Act is itself a political measure, subject to modification in the political process.

*2507 949 C

The Court's disposition renders redistricting perilous work for state legislatures. Statutory mandates and political realities may require States to consider race when drawing district lines. See supra, at 2500. But today's decision is a counterforce; it opens the way for federal litigation if "traditional ... districting principles" arguably were accorded less weight than race. See ante, at 2488. Genuine attention to traditional districting practices and avoidance of bizarre configurations seemed, under Shaw, to provide a safe harbor. See 509 U.S., at 647, 113 S.Ct., at 2827 ("[T]raditional districting principles such as compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions ... are objective factors that may serve to defeat a claim that a district has been gerrymandered on racial lines."). In view of today's decision, that is no longer the case.

Only after litigation—under either the Voting Rights Act, the Court's new Miller standard, or both—will States now be assured that plans conscious of race are safe. Federal judges in large numbers may be drawn into the fray. This enlargement of the judicial role is unwarranted. The reapportionment plan that resulted from Georgia's political process merited this Court's approbation, not its condemnation. Accordingly, I dissent.

*2508

2509

All Citations

515 U.S. 900, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762, 63 USLW 4726, 95 Daily Journal D.A.R. 8495, 95 Daily Journal D.A.R. 8496, 95 Daily Journal D.A.R. 8504, 95 Daily Journal D.A.R. 8506

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

* See 864 F.Supp. 1354, 1361 (SD Ga.1994) (quoting Rep. Tyrone Brooks, who recalled on the Assembly Floor that " 'the Attorney General ... specifically told the states covered by the Act that wherever possible, you must draw majority black districts, wherever possible' "); id., at 1362–1363, and n. 4 (citing 3 Tr. 23–24: Assistant Attorney General answering "Yes" to question whether "the Justice Department did take the position in a number of these cases, that if alternative plans demonstrated that more minority districts could be drawn than the state was proposing to draw ... that did, in fact, violate Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act?"); 864 F.Supp., at 1365–1366; id., at 1366, n. 11 ("[I]t became obvious that [the Justice Department] would accept nothing less than abject surrender to its maximization agenda"); id., at 1368 ("It apparently did not occur to [the Justice Department] that increased 'recognition' of minority voting strength, while perhaps admirable, is properly tempered with other districting considerations"); id., at 1382–1383 (expressing doubts as to the constitutionality of [the Justice Department's] " 'maximization' policy"); id., at 1383, n. 35 (citing other courts that have "criticize[d] [the Justice Department's] maximization propensities").

1 White voters obviously lack standing to complain of the other injury the Court has recognized under Shaw: the stigma blacks supposedly suffer when assigned to a district because of their race. See Hays, 515 U.S., at 744, 115 S.Ct., at 2436; cf. Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S., at 247–248, n. 5, 115 S.Ct., at 2122–2123, n. 5 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

2 "In my opinion an interpretation of the Constitution which afforded one kind of political protection to blacks and another kind to members of other identifiable groups would itself be invidious. Respect for the citizenry in the black community compels acceptance of the fact that in the long run there is no more certainty that these individuals will vote alike than will individual members of any other ethnic, economic, or social group. The probability of parallel voting fluctuates as the blend of political issues affecting the outcome of an election changes from time to time to emphasize one issue, or a few, rather than others, as dominant. The facts that a political group has its own history, has suffered its own special injustices, and has its own congeries of special political interests, do not make one such group different from any other in the eyes of the law. The members of each go to the polls with equal dignity and with an equal right to be protected from invidious discrimination." Cousins v. City Council of Chicago, 466 F.2d 830, 852 (CA7 1972) (Stevens, J., dissenting).

1 Georgia's population is approximately 27 percent black. 864 F.Supp. 1354, 1385 (SD Ga.1994).

2 In the vote dilution category, Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960), was a pathmarker. There, the city of Tuskegee redrew its boundaries to exclude black voters. This apportionment was unconstitutional not simply because it was motivated by race, but notably because it had a dilutive effect: It disenfranchised Tuskegee's black community. See id., at 341, 81 S.Ct., at 127 ("The essential inevitable effect of this redefinition of Tuskegee's boundaries is to remove from the city all save only four or five of its 400 Negro voters while not removing a single white voter or resident. The result of the Act is to deprive the Negro petitioners discriminatorily of the benefits of residence in Tuskegee, including, inter alia, the right to vote in municipal elections.").

3 Georgia's First, Second, and Eighth Districts each have a total area of over 10,100 square miles. 864 F.Supp., at 1396 (Edmondson, J., dissenting).

4 Although the Eleventh District comes within 58 miles of crossing the entire State, this is not unusual in Georgia: The Ninth District spans the State's entire northern border, and the First, Second, and Eighth Districts begin at the Florida border and stretch north to almost the middle of the State. See ibid. (Edmondson, J., dissenting). In the 1980's, Georgia's Eighth District extended even farther, in an irregular pattern from the southeast border with Florida to nearly the Atlanta suburbs. See App. 80.

5 The First District has 20 intact counties and parts of 2 others. The Second District has 23 intact counties and parts of 12 others. The Third District has 8 intact counties and parts of 8 others. The Fifth District is composed of parts of 4 counties. The Seventh District has 10 intact counties and part of 1 county. The Eighth District has 22 intact counties and parts of 10 others. The Ninth District has 19 intact counties and part of 1 other. The Tenth District has 16 intact counties and parts of 3 others. See Joint Exh. 17.

6 The Sixth District scores lowest, with just 45 percent of its boundaries following political subdivision lines. The Ninth District rates highest, with 91 percent. Defendant's Exh. 177, p. 3.

7 On this measure, only three districts—the First, Seventh, and Ninth—rate higher than the Eleventh District. Excluding the Fifth and Sixth Districts, which contain no intact counties, the scores range from about 30 percent for the Fourth District to 97 percent for the Seventh District. Id., at 4.

8 The Court turns the significance of this fact on its head by stating: " 'While the boundaries of the Eleventh do indeed follow many precinct lines, this is because Ms. Meggers designed the Eleventh District along racial lines, and race data was most accessible to her at the precinct level.' " Ante, at 2490 (quoting 864 F.Supp., at 1384). To this curious comment, one can only demur. Yes, Georgia's plan considered race, but by following precinct lines, it did so in an altogether proper way, i.e., without disregarding traditional districting practices.

9 Appendixes A, B, and C to this opinion depict, respectively, the proposed Eleventh District under the "Max–Black" plan, Georgia's current congressional districts, and the district in controversy in Shaw.

10 Indeed, a "key" feature, ante, at 2484, of the "Max–Black" plan—placing parts of Savannah in the Eleventh District—first figured in a proposal adopted by Georgia's Senate even before the Attorney General suggested this course. 864 F.Supp., at 1394, n. 1 (Edmondson, J., dissenting).

11 I would follow precedent directly on point. In United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburgh, Inc. v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 97 S.Ct. 996, 51 L.Ed.2d 229 (1977) (UJO), even though the State "deliberately used race in a purposeful manner" to create majority-minority districts, id., at 165, 97 S.Ct., at 1010 (opinion of White, J., joined by REHNQUIST and STEVENS, JJ.), seven of eight Justices participating voted to uphold the State's plan without subjecting it to strict scrutiny. Five Justices specifically agreed that the intentional creation of majority-minority districts does not give rise to an equal protection claim, absent proof that the districting diluted the majority's voting strength. See ibid. (opinion of White, J., joined by REHNQUIST and STEVENS, JJ.); id., at 179–180, 97 S.Ct., at 1016–1017 (Stewart, J., concurring in judgment, joined by Powell, J.).

Nor is UJO best understood as a vote dilution case. Petitioners' claim in UJO was that the State had "violated the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments by deliberately revising its reapportionment plan along racial lines." Id., at 155, 97 S.Ct., at 1005 (opinion of White, J., joined by Brennan, Blackmun, and STEVENS, JJ.) (emphasis added). Petitioners themselves stated: " 'Our argument is ... that the history of the area demonstrates that there could be—and in fact was—no reason other than race to divide the community at this time.' " Id., at 154, n. 14, 97 S.Ct., at 1004, n. 14 (quoting Brief for Petitioners, O.T. 1976, No. 75–104, p. 6, n. 6) (emphasis in Brief for Petitioners).

Though much like the claim in Shaw, the UJO claim failed because the UJO district adhered to traditional districting practices. See 430 U.S., at 168, 97 S.Ct., at 1011 (opinion of White, J., joined by REHNQUIST and STEVENS, JJ.) ("[W]e think it ... permissible for a State, employing sound districting principles such as compactness and population equality, ... [to] creat[e] districts that will afford fair representation to the members of those racial groups who are sufficiently numerous and whose residential patterns afford the opportunity of creating districts in which they will be in the majority.") (emphasis added).

12 Race-conscious practices a State may elect to pursue, of course, are not as limited as those it may be required to pursue. See Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 156, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1156, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993) ("[F]ederal courts may not order the creation of majority-minority districts unless necessary to remedy a violation of federal law. But that does not mean that the State's powers are similarly limited. Quite the opposite is true....") (citation omitted).

End of Document

462 F.Supp.3d 368
United States District Court, S.D. New York.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR the ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE, SPRING VALLEY BRANCH; Julio Clerveaux; Chevon Dos Reis; Eric Goodwin; Jose Vitelio Gregorio; Dorothy Miller; and Hillary Moreau, Plaintiffs,

v.

EAST RAMAPO CENTRAL SCHOOL DISTRICT, Defendant.

No. 17-CV-8943 (CS)
|
Signed 05/25/2020

Synopsis
Background: Interest group and minority registered voters brought action against school district, alleging that the election system that school district used to elect members of its board of education resulted in minority vote dilution in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA).

Holdings: The District Court, Cathy Seibel, J., held that:

[1] population of Black and Latino voters in school district was sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in at least one single-member district under a ward system;

[2] district's Black and Latino communities were politically cohesive, and white majority voted sufficiently as a bloc to enable it usually to defeat minority-preferred candidates;

[3] election system through which a bloc of white Orthodox and Hasidic Jewish voters were usually able to defeat preferred candidates of Black and Latino minority voters resulted in minority vote dilution in violation of VRA; and

[4] school district was enjoined from holding any further elections under its at-large system, and was ordered to propose a compliant remedial plan that divided the district into nine voting wards – one for each board seat.

Injunction ordered.

West Headnotes (32)

[1] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

To establish that the minority vote is diluted in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, a plaintiff must show that (1) the minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district, (2) the minority group is politically cohesive, and (3) the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it, in the absence of special circumstances, usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[2] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Lack of electoral success is evidence of vote dilution under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), but courts must also examine other evidence in the totality of circumstances, including the extent of the opportunities minority voters enjoy to participate in the political processes. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[3] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

If a plaintiff satisfies preconditions to a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), the court must then examine the totality of the circumstances, including by assessing the following non-exclusive factors: (1) the history of voting-related discrimination in the political subdivision, (2) the extent to which voting is racially polarized, (3) the extent to which voting practices enhance the opportunity for discrimination, (4) the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes, (5) the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, (6) the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns, and (7) the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction, as well as two factors that might have probative value in some cases: (8) the responsiveness of elected officials to the needs of the minority community and (9) whether the policy underlying the use of the contested practice or structure is tenuous. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[4] Election Law Weight and sufficiency

Plaintiffs alleging a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA) must prove preconditions and vote dilution under the totality of the circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[5] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA) does not confer on blacks and Latinos a right to be elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population or insulate minority candidates from defeat at the polls. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[6] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

A violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA) can be proved by showing discriminatory effect alone, without showing a specific intent to discriminate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[7] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Diverse minority groups can be combined to meet litigation requirements under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), provided they are shown to be politically cohesive. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[8] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Population of Black and Latino voters in school district was sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in at least one single-member district under a ward system, supporting claim that election system that school district used to elect members of its board of education resulted in minority vote dilution in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA); demography expert demonstrated that it was possible to create three majority-Black districts or four, if Black and Latinos were combined, and Black and Latino voters were voting cohesively. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[9] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Where a significant number of minority group members usually vote for the same candidates, the minority group is politically cohesive and satisfies precondition for establishing a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Election Law Weight and sufficiency

Plaintiffs can rely on both statistical and anecdotal evidence to show political cohesion as required to establish precondition for establishing a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[11] Election Law Weight and sufficiency

Whether a candidate is minority preferred, for purposes of establishing a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), cannot be proven by anecdotal evidence but rather only by statistical evidence showing that a candidate received support from more than 50% of minority voters. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Evidence of minority candidates' success does not necessarily negate a finding of bloc voting for purposes of establishing a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), particularly if elections are shown usually to be polarized or the success of minority candidates in particular elections can be explained by special circumstances, such as the absence of an opponent or incumbency. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[13] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

For purposes of establishing a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), a pattern of racial bloc voting that extends over a period of time is more probative of a claim that a district experiences significant polarization than are the results of a single election. a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA).

[14] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

School district's Black and Latino communities were politically cohesive, and white majority voted sufficiently as a bloc to enable it usually to defeat minority-preferred candidates, supporting claim that election system that school district used to elect members of its board of education resulted in minority vote dilution in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA); while voters did not self-report their race, plaintiffs' experts used ecological statistical models to estimate racial voting patterns, relying on software that used individual-level data, including a voter's surname, geographic location, and the racial composition of the voter's census tract or block to generate the probability that an individual belonged to a racial particular group, and witnesses anecdotally perceived minority cohesion and a large white voting bloc. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[15] Education Redistricting; Voting Rights Act

Election system that school district used to elect members of its board of education, through which a bloc of white Orthodox and Hasidic Jewish voters were usually able to defeat preferred candidates of politically cohesive Black and Latino minority voters who were numerous enough to constitute a majority in as many as four single-member districts, resulted in minority vote dilution in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA); voting was highly racially polarized in a community where public school students were almost all black or Latino and students attending private schools were almost all white, district held at-large, staggered, off-cycle elections with numbered posts, slating organization in the white, private school community consistently guaranteed election outcomes, victories by candidates of color were arranged by slating organization for the sake of appearance, numerous board decisions privileged private school interests or harmed public education, and some board members had tenuous reasons for wanting to maintain status quo. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[16] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

For purposes of establishing a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), whether a white voting bloc may be explained as an expression of political partisanship is properly considered under factor requiring the court to consider the extent to which voting is racially polarized, but the fact that divergent voting patterns may logically be explained by a factor other than race does not end the inquiry, nor does it require plaintiffs to prove racial bias in community. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[17] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Even where there is a strong correlation between political partisanship and the voting behavior of Blacks and Whites, plaintiffs can still prevail on a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA) under the totality of the circumstances where minority voters' failure to elect representatives of their choice is not best explained by partisan politics. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[18] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

An inference of racial animus is unnecessary to establish a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[19] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

A possible race-neutral explanation for racial polarization is not dispositive of a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA); possible explanations other than race are considered as one aspect of the totality of the circumstances. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[20] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

In considering a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), it is proper to explore whether white support for minority candidates can be explained as manipulating the election of a "safe" minority candidate, or by other special circumstances; the issue is not simply whether a candidate is a member of a minority community, but whether the candidate is minority preferred, because if a successful minority candidate is not minority preferred, that is evidence of racial polarization, not the lack thereof. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[21] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

A system that provides only a theoretical avenue for minority candidates to get their names on the ballot while for all practical purposes making it extremely difficult for such candidates to have a meaningful opportunity to participate contributes to a minority vote dilution violation under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[22] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

In considering the factor asking whether members of the minority group have been denied access to any candidate slating process, for purposes of a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), a "slating" organization that selects and endorses a group or slate of candidates can be formal or informal. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[23] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Where minority voters do not have any choice in determining what issues or candidates should or should not be endorsed by the slating organization, the slating process is racially exclusive, supporting a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[24] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

For purposes of a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), a racially exclusive slating process is not made inclusive by the selection and election of a few minority candidates who may not be true representatives of the minority population. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[25] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

In considering whether members of the minority group have been denied access to any candidate slating process, for purposes of a minority vote dilution claim under Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), the question is not simply whether minority candidates get on the ballot, but whether minorities have any substantial input into the slating process. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[26] Election Law Presumptions and burden of proof

Where minority group members suffer effects of prior discrimination and the level of minority participation in politics is depressed, plaintiffs need not prove any further causal nexus between their disparate socioeconomic status and the depressed level of political participation to establish a claim for minority vote dilution under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA); rather, the burden falls to defendant to show that the cause is something else. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[27] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Appeals in political campaigns can be racial, supporting a claim for minority vote dilution under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), when they operate on heightened racial tension, or when a candidate sends campaign materials to white constituents that suggest that an opponent is a person of color. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[28] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Racial appeals in political campaigns need not be permanent or pervasive to support a claim for minority vote dilution under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[29] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

The election of a few minority candidates does not necessarily foreclose the possibility of dilution of the minority vote in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[30] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Special circumstances surrounding minority elections, such as unopposed races and appointment prior to election, weigh against a finding of minority success in elections in an action alleging minority vote dilution under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[31] Election Law Weight and sufficiency

In some cases, evidence demonstrating that elected officials are unresponsive to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group has probative value to establish a claim for minority vote dilution under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA); "unresponsiveness" includes failure to respond to complaints of racial discrimination, failure to identify concerns of the minority community, scarcity of outreach sessions in the minority community, failure to respond to unequal school resources and disparate discipline and educational opportunities, and failure to provide bilingual translations of official forms. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[32] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

Upon successful claim of minority vote dilution in violation of Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), occurring as a result of at-large election system used by school district wherein a bloc of white Orthodox and Hasidic Jewish voters were usually able to defeat preferred candidates of Black and Latino minority voters who were numerous enough to constitute a majority in as many as four single-member districts, district court would enjoin school district from holding any further elections under its at-large system, including the elections currently scheduled, and order school district to propose a compliant remedial plan that divided the district into nine voting wards – one for each board seat. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

Attorneys and Law Firms

373 Claudia T. Salomon, Corey A. Calabrese, Andrej Novakovski, Latham & Watkins LLP, New York, New York, Marc Zubick, Russell Mangas, Latham & Watkins LLP, Chicago, Illinois, Andrew Clubok, Latham & Watkins LLP, Washington, D.C., Arthur Eisenberg, Perry Grossman, New York Civil Liberties Union Foundation, New York, New York, Counsel for Plaintiffs.

David J. Butler, Randall Levine, Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP, New York, New York, Washington, D.C., William S.D. Cravens, Clara Kollm, Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP, Washington, D.C., Counsel for Defendant.

DECISION AND ORDER

Seibel, J.

1. This case involves a challenge to the election system that the East Ramapo Central School District (the "District") uses to elect members of its Board of Education (the "Board"). Plaintiffs allege that the election system results in vote dilution – that is, that it affords black and Latino residents "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice," 374 Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 36, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986) (internal quotation marks omitted) – in violation of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 ("VRA" or the "Act"), which provides, in pertinent part, that "[n]o voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color," 52 U.S.C. § 10301(a) ("Section 2"). Following a bench trial held on January 22, February 10-14, 18-21, and 24-27, and March 3, 5, and 24, 2020, I make the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Plaintiffs

2. Plaintiff National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Spring Valley Branch ("NAACP") is a racial justice organization that includes District residents. (PX 288 ¶ 3.)[1]

3. Plaintiffs Julio Clerveaux, Chevon Dos Reis, Eric Goodwin, and Dorothy Miller are minority registered voters in the District.[2] In 2017, Dos Reis and Goodwin ran for the Board and believe they were supported by the "public school community," a group of residents interested in improving public schools after past budget cuts. Both lost to white candidates by a margin of approximately 5,000 votes. (PX 279 ¶¶ 25, 64 (Dos Reis); PX 281 ¶¶ 23, 59 (Goodwin); JPTO at 10.) Since 2008, every candidate for whom Dos Reis, Clerveaux, Goodwin, and Miller voted in a contested Board election lost. (PX 279 ¶ 11 (Dos Reis); PX 280 ¶ 9 (Clerveaux); PX 281 ¶ 9 (Goodwin); PX 282 ¶ 11 (Miller).)

B. Defendant

4. The District is a "highly segregated," (Tr. at 514:17-20 (Cooper)),[3] political subdivision of New York State located in Rockland County that in the 2017-2018 school year served approximately 8,843 public school students at fourteen schools and approximately 29,279 private school students, (JPTO at 4; PX 372 ¶ 24).[4] The District's population is approximately 65.7% white, 19.1% black, 10.7% Latino, and 3.3% Asian. (PX 244A ¶ 4.)[5] Most white residents live in majority-white neighborhoods, and most minority residents live in majority-minority neighborhoods, according to data from the American Community Survey, which is a survey of 2% of households performed by the Census Bureau every year for five years, generating results for 10% of U.S. households. 375 (Tr. at 256:14-257:7 (Barreto).)[6] Of the white residents in the District, 69.4% live in block groups that are 80% or more white and 33.03% live in block groups that are 95% or more white. Of the minority residents in the District – who are concentrated in and around Hillcrest, Spring Valley, and Nanuet – 55.7% live in block groups that are 83.6% to 98.2% minority. (PX 244A ¶¶ 28-29 & fig.8; id. ¶¶ 32-33 & fig.9; see Tr. at 512:7-23; 514:14-16 (Cooper).) A "block group" is a collection of several blocks. (See note 17 below.)

5. Public school students are almost all black or Latino (92%), and students attending private schools located in the District are almost all white (98%). (JPTO at 4; PX 372 ¶ 24.)[7] Most witnesses acknowledged the existence of a "private school community," consisting of white Orthodox and Hasidic Jews who educate their children in yeshivas, and a "public school community," consisting of all races but primarily black and Latino persons, and virtually all witnesses involved in District elections used those terms. (Tr. at 612:15-614:6 (Castor); id. at 1238:11-14 (Germain); id. at 2560:11-14 (Charles-Pierre); PX 257 at 191:18-192:2 (Russell); PX 286 ¶ 12 (Price); PX 279 ¶ 58 (Dos Reis); Tr. at 655:25-656:10, 657:17-20 (same); PX 283 ¶¶ 40-41, 67 (Fields); PX 281 ¶¶ 20, 62 (Goodwin); PX 282 ¶¶ 11-15 (Miller); PX 288 ¶¶ 9, 37 (Trotman); Tr. at 1373:20-22 (same); see Tr. at 725:5-16, 730:14-17 (Board member Joel Freilich identifying himself as member of "private school community" and someone else as member of "public school community"); id. at 997:1-6 (Rabbi Hersh Horowitz discussing "private" and "public school community" vote totals); id. at 1896:6-24 (former Board member Suzanne Young-Mercer was on "public school team" but received support from "private school community" including Orthodox and Hasidic voters); id. at 1942:5-21 (public school advocate Oscar Cohen identifying public school community as "people of all races" and private school community as Orthodox and ultra-Orthodox); id. at 1082:15-18 (Board member Yehuda Weissmandl using term "public school community"); id. at 1523:12-14 (Board member Harry Grossman acknowledging "public school advocates" spoke at Board meetings); id. at 2479:10-24 (influential community leader Rabbi Yehuda Oshry vetted candidates by ensuring they would be responsive to needs of "Jewish community besides the public school").)

6. The District is governed by nine Board members whose responsibilities include selecting the Superintendent of Schools and approving District personnel, setting a budget and levying taxes, establishing District policies, and evaluating and communicating the "progress and needs of the District to the community, educational governing boards and legislators." (PX 259 376 at 1; JPTO at 5.)[8] To register to vote in elections for Board members and to vote on the annual school budget and other ballot referenda in the District, a person must be a United States citizen, a resident of the District for at least thirty days, eighteen years of age or older, and either registered for District elections or registered to vote in general elections in Rockland County. (JPTO at 5.) Board elections are not held with other local, state, or federal elections (that is, they are off cycle), and they are staggered such that three seats – each having a three-year term – are open each year (although on occasion an extra seat will be open if a Board member resigns, dies, or is removed). (Id.) Each candidate runs for an individual numbered seat that is elected at large, meaning that all eligible voters in the District cast votes in each race. (Id.)[9] Candidates can reside anywhere in the District. (PX 257 at 38:5-8.)

7. A table summarizing the results of Board elections from 2008 through 2018 is set out below, including the year, the candidates, the candidates' races ("W" indicating white, "B" indicating black, and "L" indicating Latino), and the number of votes each received.

Table 1: Summary of Board Elections: 2008-2018. (JPTO at 12 tbl.1.)

377

Yr.	Seat 1			Seat 2			Seat 3			Seat 4	TOTAL VOTE COUNT
2008	Aaron Wieder (W) (6,261)*	Steve White (W) (2,415)		Moshe Hopstein (W) (6,533)*			Nathan Rothschild (W) (5,103)*				9,163
2009	Morris Kohn (W) (8,768)*	Leonardo Vera (L) (4,548)		Carolyn Watson (W) (366)	Margaret Hatton (W) (4,236)	Eliyahu Solomon (W) (8,578)*	Emilia White (B) (4,149)	Richard Stone (W) (9,224)*			13,708
2010	Antonio Luciano (W) (7,622)	Moses Freidman (W) (7,926)*		Stephen Price (W) (13,612)*			Suzanne Young-Mercer (B) (13,839)*				16,056
2011	Moshe Hopstein (W) (9,904)*	M. Hatton (W) (7,907)		Yehuda Weissmandl (W) (9,923)*	A. Luciano (W) (7,909)		Daniel Schwartz (W) (9,947)*	Carole Anderson (B) (7,818)		Joanne Thompson (B) (13,958)*	18,206
2012	Hiram Rivera (L) (6,315)	Jacob Lefkowitz (W) (8,474)*		Kim Foskew (W) (6,276)*	E. Solomon (W) (8,460)*		Yonah Rothman (W) (8,521)*	J. Thompson (B) (6,335)			15,091
2013	Maraluz Corado (L) (6,806)*	Margaret Tuck (B) (5,244)		Eustache Clerveaux (B) (5,085)	Pierre Germain (B) (6,899)*		Robert Forrest (B) (5,175)	Bernard Charles (B) (6,633)*			12,317
2014	M. Hopstein (W) (2,388)*			Harry Grossman (W) (2,652)*			Yakov Engel (W) (2,381)*			Y. Weissmandl (W) (2,379)*	4,998
2015	Sabrina Charles-Pierre (B) (4,600)	Jacob Lefkowitz (W) (6,380)*	Alan Jones (B) (468)	Y. Rothman (W) (6,523) *	Natashia Morales (L) (4,864)		S. White (W) (4,615)	Yisroel Eisenbach (W) (556)	Juan Pablo Ramirez (L) (6,293)*		11,694
2016	B. Charles (B) (7,973)*	K. Foskew (W) (3,972)		P. Germain (B) (7,860)*	Jean Fields (B) (4,137)		Y. Weissmandl (W) (7,626)*	N. Morales (L) (4,401))		S. Charles-Pierre (B) (5,014)*	12,311
2017	Alexandra Manigo (W) (4,964)	Mark Berkowitz (W) (9,158)*		Eric Goodwin (B) (4,910)	H. Grossman (W) (9,137)*		Joel Frielich (W) (9,530)*	Chevon Dos Reis (L) (4,503)			14,348
2018	S. Charles-Pierre (B) (9,180)*			Yoel Trieger (W) (7,179)*	Miriam Moster (W) (1,996)		E. Weissmandl (W) (6,977)*	Joselito Cintron (L) (2,308)			9,714

*Key: An * denotes the election winner, Bold denotes the incumbent candidate*

C. Legal Standard

[1] 8. "The essence of a § 2 claim is that a certain electoral law, practice, or structure interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by [minority] and white voters to elect their preferred representatives." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 47, 106 S.Ct. 2752. To establish that the minority vote is diluted, a plaintiff must show that (1) the minority group "is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district," (2) the minority group is "politically cohesive," and (3) "the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it – in the absence of special circumstances ... – usually to defeat the minority's preferred 378 candidate," (together, the "Gingles preconditions"). Id. at 50-51, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (citation omitted). These "showings are needed to establish that the challenged districting thwarts a distinctive minority vote by submerging it in larger white voting population." Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993).

[2] [3] 9. "Lack of electoral success is evidence of vote dilution, but courts must also examine other evidence in the totality of circumstances, including the extent of the opportunities minority voters enjoy to participate in the political processes." Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1011-12, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994). Thus, if a plaintiff satisfies the Gingles preconditions, the court must then examine the totality of the circumstances, including by assessing the following factors identified by the U.S. Senate in Section 2's legislative history: (1) " 'the history of voting-related discrimination in the ... political subdivision,' " (2) " 'the extent to which voting ... is racially polarized,' " (3) the extent to which voting practices " 'enhance the opportunity for discrimination,' " (4) " 'the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes,' " (5) " 'the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health,' " (6) " 'the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns,' " and (7) " 'the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction,' " as well as two factors that might have probative value in some cases: (8) the responsiveness of elected officials to the needs of the minority community and (9) whether " 'the policy underlying the ... use of the contested practice or structure is tenuous.' " Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491-92 (quoting Gingles, 478 U.S. at 44-45, 106 S.Ct. 2752). "The list of factors is neither comprehensive nor exclusive." NAACP, Inc. v. City of Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d 1002, 1008 (2d Cir. 1995) (internal quotation marks omitted). "[N]o specified number of factors need be proved, and ... it is not necessary for a majority of the factors to favor one position or another." Goosby, 180 F.3d at 492.

[4] [5] 10. Plaintiffs must prove the Gingles preconditions and vote dilution under the totality of the circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence. See Arbor Hill Concerned Citizens Neighborhood Ass'n v. County of Albany, 281 F. Supp. 2d 436, 443 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). "[I]t will be only the very unusual case in which the plaintiffs can establish the existence of the three Gingles factors but still have failed to establish a violation of § 2 under the totality of circumstances." Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d at 1019 n.21 (internal quotation marks omitted). But Section 2 does not confer on blacks and Latinos "a right to [be] elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population" or insulate minority candidates from defeat at the polls. 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b).

[6] 11. In 1982, Congress amended the VRA to make clear that the Act does not require plaintiffs to show a specific intent to discriminate. See S. Rep. No. 97-417, at 2, 27 (1982), as reprinted in 1982 U.S.C.C.A.N. 177, 179, 205. "The amendment was largely a response to [the Supreme] Court's plurality opinion in Mobile v. Bolden," 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980), which held that "minority voters must prove that a contested electoral mechanism was intentionally adopted or maintained by state officials for a discriminatory purpose." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 35, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Congress adopted the Court's " 'results test,' " applied in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), and "ma[d]e clear that a violation could be proved by showing discriminatory effect alone," 379 Gingles, 478 U.S. at 35, 106 S.Ct. 2752, while also establishing that the VRA did not confer on minorities the right to win elections, see 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b). Accordingly, there is "inherent tension" between the results test and § 10301(b) "because any theory of vote dilution must necessarily rely to some extent on a measure of minority voting strength that makes some reference to the proportion between the minority group and the electorate at large." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 84, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (O'Connor, J., concurring). But it is clear that the VRA prohibits voting practices that result in vote dilution even if such dilution was not intended. See id. at 70-71, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (majority opinion).

[7] 12. "[D]iverse minority groups can be combined to meet VRA litigation requirements," Arbor Hill, 281 F. Supp. 2d at 445, provided they are shown to be politically cohesive, see Pope v. County of Albany, No. 11-CV-736, 2011 WL 3651114, at *3 (N.D.N.Y. Aug. 18, 2011), aff'd, 687 F.3d 565 (2d Cir. 2012); Rodriguez v. Pataki, 308 F. Supp. 2d 346, 374-75 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 543 U.S. 997, 125 S.Ct. 627, 160 L.Ed.2d 454 (2004).

II. DISCUSSION

A. First Gingles Precondition

[8] 13. The first Gingles precondition is satisfied because the population of black and Latino voters in the District is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in at least one single-member district under a ward system. Specifically, Plaintiffs' demography expert William Cooper has demonstrated that the demographics of the District allow for the creation of (1) three majority-black (or majority-minority) wards or (2) four majority-minority wards, if the District's black and Latino voters are combined into a single minority population. (PX 244A ¶ 3; id. ¶¶ 55-67 & figs.15-16 (Cooper's illustrative plan showing that black population is sufficiently large and geographically compact to create three majority-minority districts); id. ¶¶ 68-82 & figs.17-18 (Cooper's illustrative plan showing that population of blacks and Latinos combined is sufficiently large and geographically compact to create four majority-minority districts).)[10] Although Defendant stipulated only that black voters alone are sufficiently numerous and geographically compact to constitute a majority in at least one potential election district, (JPTO at 14), it does not provide evidence to dispute that it is possible to create three majority-black districts, (see Doc. 555 ¶¶ 21-25), or four, if black and Latinos can be combined.[11] Further, Defendant concedes that combining minority groups is permissible " 'where the statistical 380 evidence is that the minority groups vote cohesively for the same candidates.' " (Id. ¶ 37 (quoting Reed v. Town of Babylon, 914 F. Supp. 843, 848 (E.D.N.Y. 1996)); see id. ¶ 25.) As discussed below in connection with the Court's analysis of the second Gingles precondition, (see ¶¶ 26-27 below), black and Latino voters are sufficiently cohesive within and across those groups for them to be combined, (Tr. at 289:2-9; id. at 289:21-24 (Barreto) ("Black and Latino voters voted for the same candidates. So it wasn't as though blacks were voting for one candidate and Latinos are voting for a third. Black and Latino voters were also voting cohesively with each other.")).[12] Accordingly, the population of minority voters in the District is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in four single-member districts under a ward system.

B. Second and Third Gingles Preconditions

[9] [10] 14. Where a "significant number of minority group members usually vote for the same candidates," the minority group is politically cohesive and satisfies the second Gingles precondition. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 56, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Plaintiffs can rely on both statistical and anecdotal evidence to show political cohesion. Pope v. County of Albany, 94 F. Supp. 3d 302, 333 (N.D.N.Y. 2015).

[11] [12] [13] 15. Where the majority votes as a bloc and usually defeats the minority-preferred candidate absent special circumstances, the third Gingles precondition is satisfied. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 51, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Whether a candidate is minority preferred cannot be proven by anecdotal evidence but rather only by statistical evidence showing that a candidate received support from more than 50% of minority voters. Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d at 1018-19. "[E]vidence [of minority candidates' success] does not necessarily negate a finding of bloc voting, particularly if elections are shown usually to be polarized or the success of minority candidates in particular elections can be explained by special circumstances, such as the absence of an opponent or incumbency.' " Pope, 687 F.3d at 582 (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted). "Courts have disregarded elections won by minorities after the initiation of a voting rights suit, where Anglos preferred the minority candidate, or manipulated the election of a safe minority candidate or provided unusual organized political support or campaigned to insure the election of a minority candidate." Aldasoro v. Kennerson, 922 F. Supp. 339, 375-76 (S.D. Cal. 1995) (citations omitted); see Ruiz v. City of Santa Maria, 160 F.3d 543, 557-58 (9th Cir. 1998) (per curiam) ("special circumstances" include majority support for minority-preferred candidates intended to thwart litigation). "[A] pattern of racial bloc voting that extends over a period of time is more probative of a claim that a district experiences significant polarization than are the results of a single election." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 57, 106 S.Ct. 2752.

381 [14] 16. Plaintiffs contend that the District's black and Latino communities are politically cohesive and that the white majority votes as a bloc in Board elections so that no minority-preferred candidate has won a contested election since 2007. For the reasons stated below, I find that Plaintiffs are correct and that they have satisfied the second and third Gingles preconditions.

17. Plaintiffs' expert in political science and statistical analysis, Dr. Matthew Barreto, (see Tr. at 154:5-11), used accurate and scientifically validated methods to identify and analyze racially polarized voting in the District. He is a professor of political science and Chicana/o studies at the University of California, Los Angeles, and the co-founder of a successful political and electoral consulting firm called Latino Decisions. (PX 242B at 44; Tr. at 150:1-3, 151:11-14.)[13] Dr. Barreto has published extensively and recently on voting, race, and statistical methods, including four books and sixty journal articles and book chapters, (see PX 242B at 45-48), and has been honored with research awards and fellowships, (id. at 49-50). He has published with many of the other leading experts in this field and is up to date on the newest, most innovative methods. He teaches courses on the VRA, racial and ethnic politics, electoral politics, demographics, and statistical analysis. (Tr. at 151:18-152:7.) In sum, Dr. Barreto is extremely well credentialed and at the leading edge of political science and statistical analysis with respect to racially polarized voting and voting estimates. I found him to be entirely credible.

18. Defendant's political science expert, Dr. John Alford, is a professor of political science at Rice University. (Id. at 2146:9-10.) He has testified as an expert approximately thirty to forty times in VRA cases, primarily for defendants. (Id. at 2146:19-23, 2147:4-7, 2264:23-2265:5.) He teaches courses on voting behavior in elections and, in those courses, covers material on racial voting patterns, (id. at 2264:5-8), but he has not published a paper on racially polarized voting, taught any courses on minority politics or voting behavior, or written about a Section 2 case in an academic publication, (id. at 2263:25-2264:16). He has not published any peer-reviewed articles using methods of ecological inference or involving surname analysis, and his last article on geocoding analysis was published thirty years ago. (Id. at 2263:9-23.) And he is not (nor does he consider himself to be) an expert in the area of race and ethnicity politics. (Id. at 2264:17-19.) His testimony, while sincere, did not reflect current established scholarship and methods of analysis of racially polarized voting and voting estimates.

19. In New York, voters do not self-report their race, so voting patterns have to be estimated. To perform this estimation, Dr. Barreto and his colleague Dr. Loren Collingwood used ecological statistical models that "attempt to draw an inference regarding how groups voted using aggregate ecological data." (PX 242A ¶ 7.)[14] Dr. Barreto used two ecological inference ("EI") methods to analyze various data sets.[15] The first method, King's 382 Ecological Inference ("King's EI"), identifies patterns between the racial make-up of voters in certain precincts and the number of votes candidates received at the corresponding polling places. (See PX 242B at 5, 10-11.) The second method, row by column ("RxC"), is an improved EI technique that can generate estimates for more racial groups and more candidates. (Id. at 11.) Dr. Barreto's results were consistent across every methodology:

> Across a variety of analyses that Dr. Collingwood and I performed, we found strong and consistent evidence that blacks and Latinos are politically cohesive and that they consistently vote for the candidates which lose elections.
>
> We found strong and consistent evidence that white voters vote cohesively as a bloc[ ] and that they vote for candidates that have won every single election.

(Tr. at 155:6-12.)

20. Of the various data sets that could be used as EI input, Dr. Barreto primarily relied on Bayesian Improved Surname Geocoding ("BISG") data. "BISG is a methodology that uses individual-level data, including a voter's surname, geographic location, and the racial composition of the voter's census tract or block to generate the probability that an individual belongs to a particular group where self-reported information is not available." (PX 242B at 15.) Starting with the list of actual voters in each election (the "voter file"), Dr. Barreto used the "Who Are You" or "WRU" software package created by scholars Kosuke Imai and Kabir Khanna to estimate the probability that each voter was white, black, Latino, or other using a surname list[16] and geolocation data from the decennial census.[17] (PX 242A ¶ 7; Tr. at 166:13-20, 168-11-172:11; PX 305_0008-09; see PX 269 (Kosuke Imai & Kabir Khanna, Improving Ecological Inference by Predicting Individual Ethnicity from Voter Registration Records, 24 Pol. Analysis 263 (2016)).)[18]

21. The first step of the BISG analysis plugs in a race estimate based on the voter's surname – for example, census data that shows that of individuals with the surname Jackson, 39% are white and 53% are black. The next step looks at the voter's census block. If, for example, voter Jackson lives on a block that is 80% black and 20% white, that increases the likelihood that voter Jackson is black and makes an estimation of voter Jackson as black more reliable. The software calculates the probability that someone with a 53%-probable black surname who lives in an 80%-black census block is actually 383 black. (Tr. at 168:9-170:10, 170:24-172:11.)[19]

22. After Dr. Barreto estimated voter race probabilities, he aggregated those probabilities to the precinct level to estimate the racial make-up of each precinct. (See id. at 185:23-186:4.) Through a statistical package and method called eiCompare, Dr. Barreto then used both King's EI and RxC to estimate voting preference by race and compared the results. (Id. at 164:1-11, 165:5-18.) He used both ecological inference methods because they enabled him to see if the results were consistent across the models and provided "more evidence, more data points [to] take in to draw [his] conclusion." (Id. at 287:22-288:7.)

23. The use of BISG has been extensively validated by experts. Dr. Barreto first used surname and geocoding analysis on voter files around 2003 and has continued to use and publish about that method since. (Id. at 170:16-23.) In 2009, scientists from the RAND Corporation evaluated the census surname list and geocoding information from the census at the block level and found that the probability that self-reported race matched with a BISG race estimate (that is, "concordance") was 95% for Hispanics and 93% for blacks and whites. (DX 101 at 70, 78.) In 2016, RAND published a second article that describes how BISG can produce estimates of racial disparities within populations with a concordance of 90 to 96%. (PX 274 at 2; Tr. at 181:13-24, 182:5-183:1.) Many respected scholars have used and validated BISG in the political science context and across a variety of disciplines. (Tr. at 192:2-14; see PX 269 (validating BISG with results of Florida presidential election);[20] PX 367 (2015 article using surname and geocoding data purchased from data vendor Catalist LLC to estimate race of voting populations in nationwide elections to calculate turnout differences between racial groups); PX 369 at 223-26 (2018 book validating accuracy of Catalist data); PX 368 at 5-6, 13 (2016 article using BISG to estimate voter race and King's EI to estimate precinct-level votes and racial voting preferences); PX 370 (2020 article using BISG race estimates to estimate differences in political campaign contributions across racial groups); see also PX 274 at 1 (BISG "can produce accurate estimates of racial/ethnic disparities within populations served when self-reported data are lacking" in health-care context); id. at 5 (citing fifteen validation studies and peer-reviewed articles using surname and geocoding analysis); Tr. at 182:19-183:10, 183:20-184:6 (Barreto) (PX 274 summarized validation studies using surname and geocoding analysis); PX 305_0014 (citing peer-reviewed articles on health care and epidemiology); DX 209 at 3 (using BISG in consumer-protection context).) The political science articles were peer reviewed and published in leading journals. (Tr. at 189:23-191:11, 192:2-14.) And both of Defendant's experts, Dr. Alford and demographer Dr. Peter Morrison, have advocated for the use of surname and geocoding analysis to derive racial estimates by geographic unit. (See DX 67-02 384 ¶ 26 (Dr. Alford suggesting that flaws in Plaintiffs' previous expert's preliminary report could have been corrected if that expert had "estimated voter turnout by race using surnames and voter sign-in records," citing the Imai & Khanna article); DX 99 at 12 n.21 (article co-authored by Dr. Morrison noting availability of BISG to "assign a race to registrants in a voter file where this quantity is not present and then aggregate these individuals by a geographic unit such as a voting precinct").)[21]

24. Dr. Barreto applied BISG in the manner proposed in the academic literature – not by attempting to assign individuals to racial categories, but by aggregating individual race estimates to create precinct-level demographic estimates. (Tr. at 185:13-186:4; PX 242A ¶ 7; PX 305_0012; PX 274 at 2-3.) He then used that data as an input to the EI models, which is "exactly the same" as how other scholars have used BISG in the health-care and campaign-donation contexts. (Tr. at 2728:7-23.) Defendant contends that Dr. Barreto did not identify support in the academic literature for using BISG race estimates as an EI input, (see Doc. 555 ¶ 107(c)), but his methodology is supported, as described in paragraph 23 above. And Dr. Barreto did not simply estimate a probability distribution for each individual (e.g., a 60% probability that voter X is white, a 30% probability that voter X is black, etc.), as Defendant suggests, (see Doc. 555 ¶ 107(b)); rather, he aggregated his estimations to the precinct level as described in the literature, (PX 242A ¶ 7; see Tr. at 187:13-21).

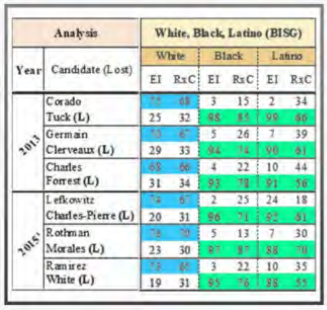
25. BISG is particularly reliable for use in the District because of its unique characteristics. BISG models work best in places "where there's more differentiation between names and more differentiation between racial populations of neighborhoods," like the District. (Tr. at 201:18-24.) The District has large populations of Hispanic voters with very commonly occurring Spanish surnames and large populations of white voters with very commonly occurring white surnames. (Id. at 202:7-11.) Black and Hispanic surnames rarely overlap, so BISG is still highly precise even in neighborhoods where blacks and Hispanics live together. (Id. at 203:23-204:2; see id. at 208:5-10.) The District's neighborhoods are racially segregated to "a very high degree," (id. at 202:18-20), and many approach 100% white or 100% minority, (id. at 210:4-17, 212:20-217:5, 217:25-218:4). And even in neighborhoods where blacks and Latinos live together in the same census block groups, census blocks are more highly segregated, lending confidence to BISG results, which rely on census block data. (Id. at 1673:2-1675:19; see PX 300; PX 301.) For all these reasons, BISG is likely to provide accurate, reliable estimates in the District.

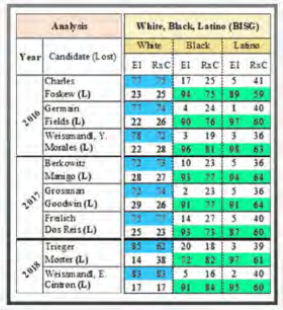
26. Dr. Barreto's King's EI and RxC analyses using BISG data showed that white voters were highly cohesive and consistently voted for the winning candidate in every election. Black and Latino voters were also highly cohesive, both as individual groups and when considered together,[22] and they consistently voted for the losing 385 candidate. In every contested election, "the candidates who were preferred by a cohesive white voting bloc[ ] beat the candidates preferred by blacks and Latinos." (Tr. at 289:14-290:1; see PX 242A ¶¶ 8, 10, 12, 16; PX 243 ¶ 32.) Dr. Alford conceded that white voters are cohesive, concluding that "[a]ll of the results from all of the data sources and all of the methods show the same stable level of 70-80% white support for one candidate in each contest" and that "it is clear that whites are voting cohesively." (DX 13 at 23.)

27. A table summarizing Dr. Barreto's results is set out below.[23]

Table 2: BISG Results for White, Black, and Latino Voters. (PX 305_0049.)



Analysis		White, Black, Latino (BISG)
		White		Black		Latino
Year	Candidate (Lost)	EI	RxC	EI	RxC	EI	RxC
2013	Corado	[illegible]	68	3	15	2	34
	Tuck (L)	25	32	95	85	99	66
	Germain	[illegible]	67	5	26	7	39
	Clerveaux (L)	29	33	94	74	96	61
	Charles	[illegible]	66	4	22	10	44
	Forrest (L)	31	34	93	78	91	56
2015	Lefkowitz	[illegible]	67	2	25	24	18
	Charles-Pierre (L)	20	31	96	71	67	81
	Rothman	[illegible]	70	5	13	7	30
	Morales (L)	23	30	97	87	88	70
	Ramirez	[illegible]	66	3	22	10	35
	White (L)	19	31	95	76	88	55



Analysis		White, Black, Latino (BISG)
		White		Black		Latino
Year	Candidate (Lost)	EI	RxC	EI	RxC	EI	RxC
2010	Charles	[illegible]	[illegible]	17	25	5	41
	Foskew (L)	23	25	93	75	89	59
	German	[illegible]	74	4	24	1	40
	Fields (L)	22	26	80	76	97	60
	Weissmandl, Y.	[illegible]	72	3	19	3	36
	Morales (L)	22	28	96	81	98	63
2017	Berkowitz	[illegible]	[illegible]	10	23	5	36
	Mango (L)	28	27	93	77	96	64
	Grossman	[illegible]	74	2	23	5	36
	Goodwin (L)	29	26	91	77	95	64
	Frnlich	[illegible]	[illegible]	14	27	5	40
	Des Rets (L)	25	23	93	73	87	60
2018	Trieger	[illegible]	62	20	18	3	39
	Monter (L)	14	38	72	82	97	61
	Weissmandl, E.	[illegible]	83	5	16	2	40
	Cimron (L)	17	17	91	84	95	60

The numbers in the columns labeled "White," "Black," and "Latino" represent the estimated percentage of each racial group that voted for each candidate. This analysis showed high levels of racially polarized voting in every contested election. White support for the winning candidates ranged from 62-85%. Black support for losing candidates ranged from 71-98%, and Latino support for losing candidates ranged from 55-99%. (Id.)[24]

28. Dr. Barreto validated his analysis using other methodologies to "see if the data all stack[ ] up and point[ ] in the same direction," (Tr. at 162:14-16), and each method supported his conclusions.

- First, he purchased a data set from a private consulting company called Catalist LLC ("Catalist"), which provides data, analytics, and modeling to political campaigns, civic organizations, and research institutions. (PX 386 258 at 21:9-17 (deposition of designated Catalist witness); see Tr. at 242:1-6 (Barreto).) Catalist's database of over 240 million voters includes first name, surname, census, and self-reported data. (PX 258 at 52:6-18, 61:19-63:7; Tr. at 245:15-246:9.) Dr. Barreto has used the Catalist data set in the past and found it to be extremely accurate, (Tr. at 242:9-14), it has won awards for accuracy from political and commercial consulting groups, (id. at 252:1-3), and it is a highly successful commercial product on which campaigns and others rely, all of which suggest that its results are reliable. Other experts have also relied on and validated Catalist's data, including in VRA cases. (See PX 367 at 102; PX 369 at 223-224; Lee v. Va. State Bd. of Elections, 188 F. Supp. 3d 577, 598-99 (E.D. Va. 2016), aff'd, 843 F.3d 592 (4th Cir. 2016); Veasey v. Perry, 71 F. Supp. 3d 627, 661-63 (S.D. Tex.

2014), vacated and rev'd in part on other grounds sub nom. Veasey v. Abbott, 830 F.3d 216 (5th Cir. 2016).) Dr. Barreto compared Catalist's estimates of voter race from the District's 2017 elections with his own results and found both methodologies produced similar results, which gave him more confidence in his conclusions. (PX 242A ¶ 18; Tr. at 254:21-24, 291:15-24.)

- Second, he used a different data set – citizen voting age population data from the Census Bureau ("CVAP data") – to perform King's EI and RxC analyses, both of which also showed racially polarized voting with white voters always voting cohesively for the winning candidate (and a combined "non-white" group of voters always voting for the loser). (Tr. at 291:25-292:20, 293:16-294:9; PX 242B at 25-26.)[25]

- Third, Dr. Barreto generated white voter estimates using CVAP and subtracted those estimates from the total votes for each candidate to estimate nonwhite votes, (Tr. at 296:16-25), which also showed voter cohesion, (id. at 300:14-22; PX 242B at 16-25).[26]

- Fourth, Dr. Barreto examined the 2012 U.S. presidential election and concluded that it was also highly racially polarized, with whites and minorities "voting in opposite directions," (Tr. at 306:17-307:17), which further supported his conclusions.

387 • Fifth, as additional backup for his results, he analyzed the surnames from nomination petitions and found that white voters supported the winning candidates and black and Latino voters supported the losing candidates. (Id. at 357:20-358:15.)

In sum, by performing ecological inference on BISG-generated data, Dr. Barreto proved consistent white voting cohesion for the winning candidates and consistent minority voting cohesion for the losing candidates, and the other methods he employed supported these conclusions. (Id. at 352:23-353:14.)

29. There is also anecdotal evidence of minority cohesion under the second Gingles precondition that supports Dr. Barreto's conclusions.[27] Witnesses called by both sides perceive a large white voting bloc of Orthodox and Hasidic people whose children attend private schools voting for the "private school community" slate, and black and Latino people whose children attend public schools voting for the "public school community" slate. (Id. at 1238:11-14, 1849:1-4, 2560:11-14; PX 243 ¶ 55 n.71; id. ¶¶ 58-65; PX 257 at 191:18-192:2; PX 286 ¶ 12.) Many witnesses referred to the private and public school communities and testified that the public school community's slate always loses. (See PX 279 ¶ 11; PX 280 ¶¶ 7-9; PX 281 ¶¶ 9, 60-62; PX 282 ¶¶ 11-15; PX 283 ¶¶ 67, 69-70; PX 288 ¶ 6; Tr. at 1818:5-9; see also ¶ 5 above.)

30. Defendant concedes that whether Plaintiffs have satisfied the second and third Gingles preconditions hinges on whether BISG is a good data input. (Doc. 555 ¶ 99 ("[T]he Court's main task is to decide whether it agrees with Dr. Barreto that using BISG generated race estimates as the demographic data input for an EI:RxC analysis is better than using ... CVAP.").) I find that, given the unique characteristics of the District, BISG is a better data set than CVAP for use as an input for ecological inference, and Dr. Barreto therefore used the superior methodology. Defendant's expert Dr. Alford relied on CVAP, which is less reliable here for three reasons.

31. First, CVAP is less precise. BISG begins with the actual voter file – that is, the names of the individuals who actually voted – whereas a CVAP data set contains all eligible voters in the District, whether they voted or not. In addition, CVAP data come from the American Community Survey. (Tr. at 255:15-21.) Because that Survey only accounts for 2% of the population over each of five years, CVAP requires an inference to apply the 10% sample to the whole population, which can introduce bias. (Id. at 256:23-257:7, 282:7-18.) Using CVAP data, Dr. Alford was not able to draw definitive conclusions about minority voter cohesion or the existence of racially polarized voting. (Id. at 2271:17-19 (Alford could neither conclude nor rule out that minorities were voting cohesively); see id. at 2158:2-2166:17, 2268:13-16.)

32. Second, there is a misalignment between the voter precincts analyzed and the census block-group data from which the CVAP data set is pulled. To analyze voters in a given precinct, experts would want data from that specific precinct. But CVAP data provide racial proportions within census block groups, which almost never correspond to the voter precincts. Because the BISG data set begins with the voter 388 file, it contains the actual voters within in each precinct. (Id. at 257:8-259:11.) "CVAP has ... 'geographic misalignment' between census boundaries and precinct boundaries, whereas BISG has the exact same alignment." (Id. at 257:16-18.)

33. Third, because CVAP data sets do not contain information on actual voters, voter turnout must be estimated, which fails to reliably produce the precinct-by-precinct estimates required for EI analysis. (Id. at 264:11-19.) Although the District has 60,000 eligible voters, only about 13,000 to 14,000 people actually vote, so using CVAP introduces "noise ... influencing who is in a precinct." (Id. at 259:20-260:1.) Both King's EI and RxC can estimate turnout and incorporate it into the choice percentage, (PX 242B at 18), but such estimations do not produce results that are as reliable as the results produced by BISG.

- As to King's EI, Dr. Barreto testified that a double-equation approach is necessary to help account for "turnout issues," (Tr. at 2707:13-15), such as "substantial difference in turnout across racial groups," (PX 364 at 611 (article by Dr. Barreto and Dr. Bernard Grofman explaining that double regression can mitigate turnout problem)), as there is in the District.[28] Such an approach would estimate voter turnout and make adjustments to CVAP data before estimating voter choice. (Tr. at 2708:19-24.) But even using a double-equation approach would not "solve[ ] the problem CVAP has," and the voter file would still be the better data source. (Tr. at 2711:8-2712:20; see PX 364 at 607-08.). In other words, the turnout estimated by EI is not as accurate without a double-equation approach, and even with such an approach, is not as accurate as using the voter file, which BISG uses.

- The experts disagree about precisely how turnout is estimated by RxC. Dr. Alford testified that RxC estimates turnout "simultaneously," (Tr. at 2209:22-2210:6), by including "a category that didn't vote," which "estimate[s] for each racial group at each precinct ... the proportion that are not voting," (id. at 2208:17-22).[29] Dr. Barreto testified that the software package that runs RxC can be programmed to estimate turnout by race at the precinct level, (id. at 2715:1-8), but that it would require "a formula or a model that just predicted voter turnout" using a different set of commands and specifications before candidate choice can be estimated, (id. at 2715:9-21).

In any event, it does not appear that Dr. Alford properly accounted for turnout. It seems that he did not perform a double-equation regression, (id. at 2711:3-7), or include a voter turnout model in his RxC script, (id. at 2716:2-16, 2717:25-2718:5). He variously claimed that he performed a double regression on the CVAP data before running EI analysis, (id. at 2292:2-9), and that the double regression was happening 389 automatically within RxC to estimate turnout at the precinct level, (id. at 2208:4-15). But Dr. Barreto testified that Dr. Alford's scripts used a single-equation approach that introduced error by mixing turnout estimates with candidate choice estimates. (Id. at 2717:25-2720:17.) Thus, although Dr. Alford suggested that inclusion of a no-vote (or abstained) category in RxC, rather than just estimating votes for candidate 1 and candidate 2, would solve the problem of CVAP not accounting for turnout, Dr. Barreto explained that turnout by racial group should be estimated first, without "mixing it with the candidate choice," (id. at 2720:2), and then used to adjust the input variable in the voter-choice model, (id. at 2720:8-11). But Dr. Alford did not do a separate calculation. He used unadjusted CVAP as the input variable to estimate votes for candidate 1, candidate 2, and no-vote, and then calculated the percentage of votes for candidate 1 and candidate 2 as a percentage of all votes. (Id. at 2714:2-2723:11.) He did not "chang[e] the input variable ... to account for the turnout rate. [He] just transform[ed] it into a share." (Id. at 2721:17-19.) For all these reasons, Dr. Alford's conclusions based on CVAP, (see id. at 2158:2-2166:17), are not as reliable as Dr. Barreto's conclusions based on BISG.

34. Indeed, in criticizing the methodology of Plaintiffs' previous expert, Dr. Alford also admitted that CVAP was not a "good data set" for EI because it did not use "the number of actual voters from each racial group," (DX 62 ¶ 24 (emphasis in original); see Tr. at 2335:4-17), and opined (citing the Imai and Khanna article) that BISG-like analysis could correct for CVAP's flaws, (DX 62 ¶ 26 & n.17; see Tr. at 2236:14-2337:13). He acknowledged that CVAP "assumes, without justification, that racial groups vote in proportion to their size," but black and Latino voters typically have significantly lower turnout than white voters. (DX 62 ¶ 24.)

35. The District's criticisms of Dr. Barreto and of BISG are unpersuasive. First, Dr. Alford testified that the accepted practice for political scientists is to reject results that do not report a 95% confidence interval. (Tr. at 2169:22-2170:15.) Dr. Alford testified that where a result has a wide confidence interval (for example, 11% to 88% support for a candidate), the likelihood of the point estimate (for example, 52%), is lower than it would be were the confidence interval narrower. (Id. at 2167:6-2168:19.)[30] He contends that such an interval means that he "can't reject the possibility that ... the actual value [of support for a candidate] might have been 49 percent" because the confidence interval goes below 50%. (Id. at 2168:4-12.) But Dr. Barreto credibly explained why reliance on confidence intervals is not required and, moreover, why the confidence intervals he did report, (see PX 242B at 34-42, PX 242A at 40-47), do not undermine his conclusions.[31] The use of 95% 390 confidence intervals "depends entirely on the type of question you're asking and the type of research inquiry you're doing" and is more helpful when testing samples of data rather than using the voter file. (Tr. at 347:14-348:19.) He testified that there is no consensus around their use, and while some scholars rely on them, others provide point estimates, examine patterns, and draw conclusions from those. (Id. at 348:20-349:2.) Because Dr. Barreto's BISG scripts calculated racial probabilities rather than race predictions and error rates, based on instruction from the academic literature, (id. at 218:14-25), using probability terminology rather than "strict confidence interval testing" was more appropriate, (id. at 1683:10-1684:5).[32] Drawing conclusions "about patterns of point estimates," as in BISG analysis, "does not require a 95 percent statistical test." (Id. at 347:16-18.) Accordingly, Defendant's argument that voters' preference cannot be determined with 95% confidence where a confidence interval goes below 50%, (see Doc. 555 ¶ 65; Tr. at 2167:4-2168:3), is unavailing. Further, the reported confidence intervals for the CVAP analyses, the presidential election, and the 2017 BISG analysis do not undermine Dr. Barreto's conclusions. None of the confidence intervals for white voters crossed 50%. (Tr. at 1683:3-9; see PX 242A at 40-47; PX 242B at 34-42.) The intervals for black voters did not cross 50% for twelve of the fourteen races, and for the other two races, the lower "tail" of the distribution that could fall below 50% is still very close to 50%, indicating that the outcome of voter support below 50% is unlikely to occur. (Tr. at 350:20-351:2, 1679:2-21, 1681:24-1682:10; PX 242 B at 41; PX 242A at 42.) The point estimate patterns of Latino voting show preference for the losing candidate in all contests, and in the "handful of elections where the confidence intervals for Latinos did cross below 50 percent," in no instance "was there a majority probability that this event would occur," and "the most likely outcome for all of our data ... was cohesiveness in support of the candidate who lost." (Tr. at 351:3-14; see id. at 1684:12-1685:9.) As Dr. Barreto explained, the better practice would be to determine the probability that any results would cross the 50% threshold rather than to reject the results out of hand. (See id. at 341:11-24, 343:4-11.) Indeed, Dr. Alford admitted that point estimates are the most likely outcomes, that "similar results repeating year after year" would constitute a "pattern," and that in another case, he did not rely on confidence intervals where voting patterns were consistent. (Id. at 2351:20-23, 2354:6-8, 2357:12-2358:9.) Dr. Barreto's results were all consistent with each other and with the anecdotal evidence year after year. For all of these reasons, I find Dr. Barreto's analyses credible and reliable.

36. The District also contends that Dr. Barreto did not use BISG the way the literature instructs. It offered the testimony of Dr. Morrison, who contributed to the 2009 article about BISG, but his main purpose was to ensure that the demography was correct, and he did not perform any statistical analysis in connection with that article. (Id. at 68:19-21, 69:2-4.) Dr. Morrison 391 is not a political scientist. (See id. at 10:8-17.) Accordingly, his criticism that Dr. Barreto misused BISG rings hollow because Dr. Barreto credibly explained that he applied BISG the way political scientists use it: to generate probabilities, aggregate them to the precinct level, and use those estimates as the input for EI, not to assign a race to an individual person. (Compare id. at 21:17-25 (Morrison's description), with id. at 187:13-21 (Barreto's description).)[33] Dr. Morrison also opined that BISG would not work well in the District because "one's immediate neighborhood location does little to improve an estimate of one's race/ethnicity." (DX 70 ¶ 35.) To whatever extent that could be true in some localities, it is not true in the District, in which housing is highly racially segregated, even at the block-to-block level, as discussed above. In sum, Dr. Morrison's critiques do not undermine Dr. Barreto's credibility or the accuracy of his results.

37. In an attempt to attack Dr. Barreto's results based on Catalist data, the District pointed to a small percentage – about 1.4% – of names that were anomalies or appear to have been miscoded. Assuming those names were all coded in error, they would be well within validation rates for Catalist's model. (Tr. at 1685:18-1686:4.) This criticism, as well as the criticism that two people with the same last name and address were coded with different race probabilities, (id. at 2255:6-2257:5),[34] amount to cherry-picking and do not undermine the evidence that Catalist's database is highly reliable – as evidenced by, among other things, its success in the commercial marketplace. In any event, Dr. Barreto's Catalist-based results are a helpful cross-check that lend confidence to his conclusions, but his opinion does not rise and fall with the fidelity of every individual entry in Catalist's database.

38. Finally, the District argues that there were problems with Dr. Barreto's scripts. As an initial matter, both Dr. Alford and Dr. Barreto relied on someone else to run the scripts – neither performed the technical analysis himself – and neither side called those individuals. As Dr. Barreto explained, Dr.

Collingwood programmed the scripts according to Imai and Khanna's instructions and the code from their WRU package. (Id. at 237:8-19.) Drs. Barreto and Collingwood did not manipulate the scripts. (Id. at 1675:20-1676:17.) Dr. Alford claimed that his assistant had difficulty getting the scripts to run, but did not offer a clear explanation of why or what happened and did not undermine Dr. Barreto's credible testimony that Defendant had "everything ... needed to run the replication." (Id. at 234:15-17.) Moreover, Dr. Alford testified that his colleague Dr. Randy Stevenson said he was able to get the scripts to run, (id. at 2348:4-2349:14), and the District produced the results, (id. at 233:19-234:6). Accordingly, these criticisms are unpersuasive.

392 39. This may be the first time that voter-preference estimates based on BISG have been admitted into evidence at a VRA trial. But that is no reason to reject a recently developed, reliable method of analysis. There must always be a first time. The method has been endorsed by respected social scientists in leading publications. At least one other court has found such evidence reliable enough to be admitted in a bench trial involving a Section 2 challenge to an at-large voting system, see United States v. City of Eastpointe, 378 F. Supp. 3d 589, 612-13 (E.D. Mich. 2019), although the case settled before trial, see No. 17-CV-10079, 2019 WL 2647355 (E.D. Mich. June 6, 2019), motion for relief from judgment denied, 2020 WL 127953 (E.D. Mich. Jan. 10, 2020). And the Court is convinced that in the circumstances of this case, it is a strong and reliable method for estimating voter preference, minority-group cohesion, bloc voting, and racial polarization. Using that method, as confirmed by a variety of other methods, Plaintiffs have proven that black and Latino voters are politically cohesive within and across those groups and that the white majority votes as a bloc to routinely defeat the minority's preferred candidates.

40. Thus, Plaintiffs have satisfied the Gingles preconditions.

III. THE TOTALITY OF THE CIRCUMSTANCES

A. Senate Factor 1

[15] 41. The first Senate Factor examines "the extent of any history of official discrimination in the state or political subdivision that touched the right of the members of the minority group to register, to vote, or otherwise to participate in the democratic process." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 36-37, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (internal quotation marks omitted). There is no evidence of official discrimination in the District. Accordingly, this factor favors Defendant.

B. Senate Factor 2

[16] [17] [18] 42. Senate Factor 2 "requires the Court to consider 'the extent to which voting in the elections of the State or political subdivision is racially polarized.' " Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 342 (quoting Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491). Whether a white voting bloc may be explained as "an expression of political partisanship" is properly considered under this factor, Goosby, 180 F.3d at 493, but "[t]he fact that divergent voting patterns may logically be explained by a factor other than race does not end the inquiry, nor does it require plaintiffs to prove racial bias in community," Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 342 (internal quotation marks omitted).

> [E]ven if proof of a race-neutral cause of divergent voting patterns is forthcoming, the defendant does not automatically triumph. Instead, the court must determine whether, based on the totality of the circumstances, the plaintiffs have proven that the minority group was denied meaningful access to the political system on account of race.

Goosby v. Town Bd. of Hempstead, 956 F. Supp. 326, 355 (E.D.N.Y. 1997) (internal quotation marks and alterations omitted), aff'd, 180 F.3d 476. Even where Senate Factor 2 favors a municipality because of a "strong correlation between political partisanship and the voting behavior of blacks and whites," plaintiffs can still prevail under the totality of the circumstances where minority voters' "failure to elect representatives of their choice ... is not best explained by partisan politics." Id. At least one court has held that where the influence of race and of political affiliation on voting patterns "are too closely related to isolate and measure for effect ... the evidence fails to demonstrate that race-neutral 393 factors explain the voting polarization" in the locality. United States v. Charleston County, 316 F. Supp. 2d 268, 304 (D.S.C. 2003), aff'd, 365 F.3d 341 (4th Cir. 2004).[35]

[19] 43. The District cites cases that hold that "[u]nless the tendency among minorities and white voters to support different candidates, and the accompanying losses by minority groups at the polls, are somehow tied to race, voting rights plaintiffs simply cannot make out a case of vote dilution." Nipper v. Smith, 39 F.3d 1494, 1523-24 (11th Cir. 1994); see Solomon, 221 F.3d at 1225. But that does not mean that a possible race-neutral explanation for racial polarization is dispositive. As described above, the Second Circuit has not followed such an all-or-nothing approach but instead considers possible explanations other than race as one aspect of the totality of the circumstances. See Goosby, 180 F.3d at 493.

44. Plaintiffs have shown high levels of racially polarized voting in the District, as described above in connection with the Court's Gingles analysis. (See ¶¶ 26-27 above.) That showing is confirmed by witness testimony. For example:

- Sabrina Charles-Pierre is a black woman who was appointed to fill a vacancy on the Board after the Board came under pressure from a state-imposed monitor of the District[36] to appoint a public school parent, (see Tr. at 2576:14-24; PX 81_0047 (Grossman told Charles-Pierre that Weissmandl said, "The only reason [Charles-Pierre] is there and ran unopposed is because the board wants to do what [the state-appointed monitor] said," which was to "[h]ave at least one [public] school parent."); see also PX 156_0014-15 (monitor report recommending that all candidates for at least one Board seat must be parents of public school students and selected by other public school parents)), and was thereafter re-elected with the support of the private school community, (see PX 81_0016-18, 29, 35, 40). According to Charles-Pierre, between 2015 and 2018, in every single contested Board election, the preferred candidates of black and Hispanics lost to the other candidates. (Tr. at 2572:15-22.) She also agreed that the white majority had all of the electoral power, (id. at 2579:11-14, 2670:12-24), which was obvious because a candidate supported by the overwhelming majority of black and Hispanic voters could still lose by 4,000 votes, (id. at 2571:16-22). Other Board members 394 and private school community leaders corroborate Charles-Pierre's observations and confirm that the white bloc is determinative of electoral success. Former Board member Yonah Rothman wrote in a WhatsApp group chat called "School Board Support Group" that included private school advocates, "If private school really wanted [Charles-Pierre's] seat she would have lost the election like the rest of them." (PX 80 at 427.) Hersh Horowitz, an influential rabbi, wrote in the same chat, "I hear we had over 9000 [votes] and they under 5000." (Id. at 774.) Board President Harry Grossman repeatedly reminded Charles-Pierre that the white community could easily replace her, texting her, "If there really was any desire by anybody to remove you from the board, all that would need to be done was to run a candidate against you in May. That candidate would have garnered 8,000 votes and you would have lost by 4,000 votes just like the other 3," (PX 81_0035), and, "[I]f people wanted you off the board they just would have run a candidate against you and you would have lost as [other public school candidates] Fields, Foskew, and Morales did," (id. at _0040; see Tr. at 1534:13-21, 1536:5-1539:20, 1546:5-19).

- Private school community leaders have also acknowledged more generally that the white bloc vote holds all the power and controls election outcomes. Former Board member Bernard Charles, who is black, agreed that the Orthodox and Hasidic community "has the voting power to place anyone they want on the Board," and "the leaders in the Orthodox and Hasidic community could replace [him] if they wanted to." (Tr. at 1816:22-1817:3.) In a text with Grossman, Horowitz wrote that the public school community is "getting weaker," and Grossman said, "They feel disempowered because they are." (PX 88_0002; see Tr. at 990:23-991:11.)[37] Grossman said in the private school group chat that the outcome of the 2016 election would be "whatever we want it to be." (PX 80 at 279.) He also told Charles-Pierre, "Nothing can pass without [O]rthodox support." (PX 81_0050.)

45. Plaintiffs have made a strong showing of racially polarized voting and a white bloc vote that controls the outcome of elections, which gives rise to an inference that the targeted electoral process dilutes their votes, and that inference "will endure unless and until the defendant adduces credible evidence tending to prove that detected voting patterns can most logically be explained by factors unconnected to the intersection of race with the electoral system." Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 343 (internal quotation marks omitted). The District contends that the polarization is best explained by policy preferences, but the record lacks sufficient credible evidence to support such a conclusion.

46. In this unique community, policy preferences are not "unconnected" to race. As described above, the so-called private and public school communities in the District are essentially the white and minority communities, respectively.[38] There is nearly 395 perfect concordance between race and the populations of public and private schools that cannot be ignored. In the District, policies benefitting private schools or reducing expenditures on public education benefit the white community, and policies benefitting public schools or reducing expenditures on private education benefit the black and Latino communities. Put differently, if the white community votes down a budget because the budget increases taxes, minority children lose access to services. (See, e.g., PX 76_0024-26 (Grossman advocating for voting down budget); Tr. at 1548:22-1554:2 (Grossman admitting voting down budget would result "massive cuts to the public schools"); id. at 1811:19-25 (Charles admitting that the Board's cuts to certain programs predominantly affected the black and Latino community); id. at 1177:23-25 (Former Board member Aron Wieder admitting that budget cuts for public schools primarily impact black and Latin students); see also PX 218A (ads in Jewish magazine telling readers to "vote no" on the budget); Tr. at 644:13-645:18 (former student explaining that policy and race are "intersectional," not "distinctive buckets," and that people supporting cuts to public schools and voting down the budget are white, and people attending public schools are black and Latino).) At the same time that public school cuts almost exclusively affect black and Latino children, any services for private schools beyond what is mandated by New York State almost exclusively benefit white children.[39]

47. Accordingly, race and policy cannot be isolated in a community where public school students are almost all black or Latino (92%), and students attending private schools located in the District are almost all white (98%). (See JPTO at 4; PX 372 ¶ 24.) This makes it all but impossible to untangle race and policy, and thus for Defendant to show that the voting discrepancies are based on the latter and not the former. See Charleston County, 316 F. Supp. 2d at 304.

48. The District argues that the private school community supports candidates who advocate for lower property taxes and maintaining and increasing mandated services for private schools, while the public school community supports candidates who advocate for policies supporting public education. (See Doc. 555 ¶¶ 154, 157.) But the record evidence to that effect came from past and present Board members, (see DX 174 ¶ 70; DX 176 ¶ 68; DX 172 ¶ 41; DX 177 ¶ 68; DX 251 ¶ 56; DX 175 ¶ 31), each of whom had credibility problems. The following is a nonexhaustive list of examples showing why their testimony is not credible.

- Grossman testified that he was not aware of any slating organization in the District, (DX 174 ¶ 34), but he clearly participated in slating with Hersh Horowitz, Yehuda Oshry, and private school advocate Shaya Glick, (see Tr. at 1411:8-1412:6, 1412:11-18, 1413:6-12, 1427:22-1428:6, 1436:13-19, 1437:12-1438:4, 1438:13-22, 1444:15-1446:16, 396 1446:18-1447:7, 1447:12-21, 1451:5-1452:19, 1453:14-1454:13, 1458:24-1459:17, 1465:24-1466:7, 1468:15-1469:2, 1477:17-25, 1485:1-5, 1485:15-1486:8, 1515:16-20, 1516:5-16, 1517:6-10). He seems to have no compunction about compromising his legal obligations when it suits his purposes, as evidenced by actions that would seem to conflict with his obligations as President or Board member and harm the Board, including writing the text for a petition to be presented to the Board protesting a proposal of the Superintendent, (id. at 1525:23-1529:9; PX 80 at 1451-52), and advocating for, among other things, lawsuits against the District, voting down the school budget, and voting out "non-frum" Board members, (Tr. at 1549:17-1554:8; see PX 76_0024).[40] He also lied to Board members of color about the purpose of a settlement conference in this case. (See Tr. at 2675:23-2676:23; see also note 58 below.) Plaintiffs impeached him at least three times with his prior sworn deposition testimony. (See id. at 1433:1-1434:2, 1510:1-1511:12, 1511:14-1512:2; see also PX 339 at 8-9.)[41] I found Grossman to be one of the more incredible witnesses I have encountered.

- In his written testimony, Weissmandl testified that "there is no 'slating' organization within the Orthodox and Hasidic Jewish communities in the District that recruits, vets or endorses candidates." (DX 176 ¶ 16.) Later, when confronted with evidence that he texted the private school group chat saying that he "personally got the blessing for [their] slate" for the past three years through the son of an influential Rabbi, (Tr. at 1073:1-4), he testified unconvincingly that he did not know what he was talking about, that he may have been talking about some slate other than the school board slate, and that he never went to get support from any Rabbi for Board elections, (id. at 1073:8-1074:25). When asked at trial whether he went with Horowitz to get the "blessing" that he had mentioned in the group chat, he answered "I guess." (Id. at 1076:7-19.) Another chat shows that Weissmandl told Grossman to connect an interested Board candidate with Horowitz, (PX 75_0035), and when asked at trial whether that Horowitz was Hersh Horowitz, he said "[p]robably" and "I know many Horowitzes, but I would assume in this context it's ..." before answering "I think so," (Tr. at 1077:20-1078:11). In 2016, Weissmandl forwarded an email regarding filling a Board vacancy only to the white Board members with the note, "Please respond ASAP as we discussed[. O]ne choice." (PX 73_0001.) The candidate ultimately chosen to fill the vacancy was Joe Chajmovicz, a white person with no relevant experience for the position whose application was riddled with spelling and grammatical errors. (See PX 167 (Chajmovicz statement); Tr. at 1853:16-1856:6 (Charles).) Weissmandl testified that he did not know what "one choice" meant, did not 397 remember the discussion, and "might have been referring to anything." (Tr. at 1125:7-15.) He said that he did not know whether he ever spoke to the white Board members about filling the vacancy with Chajmovicz. (Id. at 1126:7-10.) Weissmandl also testified that he did not recall soliciting suggestions for Board candidates in 2018, (id. at 1079:21-1080:12), but then later admitted to doing so, (id. at 1081:8-14). Plaintiffs impeached him twice with his prior sworn deposition testimony. (See id. at 1056:10-1057:19, 1107:14-1108:14, see also PX 339 at 4-6.) In sum, Weissmandl's claimed lack of memory on critical topics such as slating and Board appointments was utterly unconvincing.

- Former Board member Aron Wieder submitted written testimony that he was not aware of any recognized slating organization in the Orthodox and Hasidic communities, (DX 172 ¶ 25), but then testified that a group of people in the Orthodox and Hasidic community select people to run for the Board, he was asked to run for the Board in 2007 by Yakov Horowitz (a leader in the Orthodox community), and community leaders selected him as the candidate to endorse, (Tr. at 1155:6-11, 1162:8-14, 1167:15-20). His written testimony said that endorsement was not a guarantee of electoral success, (DX 172 ¶ 26), but he then testified at trial that Orthodox and Hasidic Jewish voters usually supported candidates based on community leaders' endorsement, (Tr. at 1173:6-12).

- Former Board member Yonah Rothman also submitted written testimony that "there is no 'slating' organization within the Orthodox and Hasidic Jewish communities," (DX 177 ¶ 122), but his other testimony raises the opposite inference. A private school advocate named Shimmy Walfish asked Rothman to run for the Board in 2012. (Id. ¶ 12.) He told Walfish that he did not have time to campaign, (id. ¶ 17), and Walfish told him not to worry because he would "talk to people who help organize signatures," (Tr. at 1386:6-22). Thereafter, he was introduced to Wieder, Oshry, and Glick. (Id. at 1387:13-25.) Rothman then denied knowing the first thing about how he was elected. In 2012 he ran on a slate with two other candidates, (id. at 1388:8-19), but said he did not meet them until after the election, did not collect any signatures for his petition or submit it, did not know who did, could not explain how lawn signs bearing the three candidates' names appeared in the community, and did not know how he came to run for a particular seat against JoAnne Thompson, a black woman. (Id. at 1381:21-1383:12, 1383:19-1384:8, 1384:12-1385:10, 1388:1-4.) Rothman testified that in 2015, Wieder either took care of Rothman's nominating petition or spoke to someone who did and, as in 2012, Rothman did nothing to get elected and knew virtually nothing about how he got elected. (Id. at 1391:1-1392:20, 1393:3-5.)

- Charles denied running on a private school slate, (DX 251 ¶ 26), yet admitted that "when it comes to running for the school board ... you're either working with the white community or you're working with the other community," (Tr. at 1849:1-4). His written testimony states that, although he and the other candidates on his slate met with "members of the Orthodox and Hasidic community," 398 he was not aware of any slating organization, and that he was not "vetted" by leaders, and did not need the approval of a local Rabbi to become part of the private school slate. (DX 251 ¶¶ 22, 27.) Then, at trial, he admitted that he asked the Rabbi for his approval to add two people to the slate, and the Rabbi "indicated that he would like to vet [them] like he did me." (Tr. at 1819:4-1820:13.)

- Germain, another black former Board member, also contradicted himself with respect to whether he received or needed the approval of private school leaders to win an election. (DX 175 ¶¶ 18-19; Tr. at 1242:3-4, 1243:1-11.) He swore that no one told him he needed approval to run, and that he sought out Orthodox and Hasidic leaders only to receive support, yet he admitted that he had to meet with Rabbis and receive their approval before formally joining the slate with Charles. (Tr. at 1243:1-6.) He averred that he did not know what the South East Ramapo Taxpayers Association ("SERTA") is or what it might have done to support his candidacy, (DX 175 ¶ 21), but then spoke about its activities and admitted that the organization made the only contribution to his "campaign," (Tr. at 1248:17-24).

The Court will not attempt to apportion fault between the witnesses and Defendant's counsel for the extent to which the witnesses' affidavits – especially Charles's and Germain's – were contradicted by their live testimony, but regardless of who is to blame, their testimony overall was so rife with dissembling that it offered scant, if any, value.

49. The argument that private school candidates were elected because of their policy platforms is also unavailing because it is unrefuted that those candidates did not advocate policies, campaign, or spend money. (See id. at 1381:12-1385:10 (Rothman did not do "anything" to get elected); id. at 714:22-716:7, 718:9-719:19, 720:13-724:7 (Freilich did not campaign); id. at 1835:3-16 (Charles did not spend any of his own money on campaign); id. at 384:18-23 (no campaign expenditures filed by winning candidates for 2015, 216, or 2017 elections).)[42] The Rabbis who slated private school candidates did not ask about their policies. (See id. at 2578:3-23; 2587:20-2588:12 (Charles-Pierre); id. at 1787:20-1788:10 (Charles); DX 175 ¶ 16 (Germain).) Although some witnesses testified that voters in the private school community wanted lower taxes, (Tr. at 725:5-8, 1012:19-1013:14), there is little evidence that the private school candidates ran on any particular platforms. As for the policies of minority-preferred candidates, no minority-preferred candidate ran on a platform that promoted raising taxes or reducing services to private schools, although two (Young-Mercer and Dos Reis) supported a budget that would have affected taxes. (See PX 343 ¶ 12 (Young-Mercer); Tr. at 1889:12-1890:14, 1891:22-1892:6 (same); PX 279 ¶¶ 32, 37, 39-41 (Dos Reis); Tr. at 661:2-662:8 (same); PX 283 ¶ 52 (Fields); Tr. at 861:19-862:3, 944:20-946:1 (same); PX 281 ¶¶ 32-36 (Goodwin); PX 286 ¶ 9 (Price); Tr. at 1208:3-11, 1211:15-22 (same); DX 253 ¶¶ 3-4, 7 (Charles-Pierre).) Nevertheless, minority-preferred candidates – who did campaign – did not do much campaigning in white neighborhoods because they knew such efforts would be fruitless or they felt unwelcome there. (See PX 283 399 ¶ 60 (Fields); PX 281 ¶ 54 (Goodwin); Tr. at 801:3-14, 812:5-11 (same); id. at 1174:6-8 (Wieder admitting that he told Mr. Goodwin, a black man, "that the best use of his time was to campaign in his own community").) One candidate, Jean Fields, who is black, explained that sometime in the 1990s a group of white men in New Square stopped and surrounded her car and told her, "[Y]ou don't belong here, you need to leave," which is why she did not feel comfortable campaigning in white neighborhoods. (Tr. at 950:12-951:8.)

[20] 50. The District contends that "[t]he consistent success of minority candidates, with the unvaried support from the majority of White voters, conclusively demonstrates that ... if there is polarization in District elections, it must be driven by policy or political differences – not by racial animus." (Doc. 555 ¶ 137.) But this theory is unavailing for several reasons.

- First, the District cites Goosby as providing that "where 'it could be said that white voters [have] supported minority candidates ... at levels equal to or greater than those of white candidates, it [is] proper to conclude in that case "that divergent voting patterns among white and minority voters are best explained" ' by factors other than race, such as partisanship or policy preferences." (Doc. 555 ¶ 132 (alterations in original) quoting Goosby, 180 F.3d at 496 (quoting League of United Latin Am. Citizens, Council No. 4434 v. Clements (LULAC), 999 F.2d 831, 861 (5th Cir. 1993))). But this quotation, as presented by Defendant, is misleading. It substitutes an ellipsis for the phrase "elected by their parties." Goosby, 180 F.3d at 496. LULAC dealt with partisan elections in which minority candidates were nominated by both sides. See 999 F.2d at 861. Goosby explained that LULAC did not control because there, "white voters, both Democrat and Republican, supported minority candidates elected by their parties," so party affiliation best explained divergent voting patterns among white and minority voters. Goosby, 180 F.3d at 496. Goosby, too, involved partisan elections, where Republicans were overwhelmingly white and won elections and Democrats were overwhelmingly black and lost elections, and black voters had no access to the Republican party's slating process. See id. at 482, 496-97. Accordingly, black Republicans were "unable to advance their preferred candidates as nominees." Id. at 497. LULAC does not control here because these are not partisan elections, and because (as discussed below) minority voters have no access to the slating process of the overwhelmingly white private school community that wins elections. Goosby is also not controlling for same reasons, but this case is more like Goosby than LULAC because the white community's tight control of the slating process of the dominant bloc prevents black and Latino voters from electing their preferred candidates.

- Next, the District argues that Reed v. Town of Babylon, 914 F. Supp. 843 (E.D.N.Y. 1996), compels its conclusion. But that case is readily distinguishable. First, here, the public and private school communities are proxies for race, which was found not to be the case in Reed. See 914 F. Supp. at 883. Second, Reed was decided before Goosby separated the Gingles preconditions analysis from the Senate Factor analysis, and the point Defendant cites is now analyzed as 400 part of the third Gingles precondition.

- Further, as discussed below in connection with Senate Factors 4 and 7, it is proper to explore whether white support for minority candidates can be explained as "manipulating the election of a 'safe' minority candidate," Gingles, 478 U.S. at 75, 106 S.Ct. 2752, or by other special circumstances, Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 345-46. The issue is not simply whether a candidate is a member of a minority community, but whether the candidate is minority preferred. Cf. Goosby, 956 F. Supp. at 340-41, 344 (black appointee "safe" where, among other things, he was appointed over local black interest group's recommended appointee). If, as here, a successful minority candidate is not minority preferred, that is evidence of racial polarization, not the lack thereof.

Accordingly, the success of minority candidates does not prove that elections were policy driven for purposes of this factor.

51. To the extent it is fair to infer that parents who send their children to private schools (and other like-minded individuals) want lower taxes, and parents who send their children to public schools (and other like-minded individuals) want more spending on public education, that inference is not enough to tilt this factor in favor of Defendant in light of the high racial polarization in voting, the paucity of evidence of policy-driven campaigns, and the identity between race and politics in this community. Cases crediting a "better explanation" defense tend to look to something structural, like party affiliation or a superior ground organization. See, e.g., Uno, 72 F.3d at 983 & n.4 (defendant must prove "detected voting patterns can most logically be explained by factors unconnected to the intersection of race with the electoral system," such as "organizational disarray [and] want of campaign experience"); Flores v. Town of Islip, 382 F. Supp. 3d 197, 216-17 (E.D.N.Y. 2019) (party affiliation predicted outcomes better than race did). Nothing comparable is present here. This is not to say that the white bloc voters harbor conscious racial animus. But if we assume that the white "private school community" votes as it does to reduce taxes, it would deny reality to pretend that its members were unaware that the students to be negatively affected by their votes are overwhelmingly children of color. Where that is the case; where it is difficult, if not impossible, to disentangle race from school affiliation; and where the evidence supporting the District's race-neutral explanation for divergent voting patterns is weak, Defendant's attempt to show that policy preferences best explain divergent voting patterns is, on balance, not sufficient to undermine Plaintiffs' strong showing of racial polarization, and thus Senate Factor 2 favors Plaintiffs.[43]

C. Senate Factor 3

52. Senate Factor 3 examines "the extent to which the State or political subdivision has used voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority 401 group, such as unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, and prohibitions against bullet voting." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 37, 45, 106 S.Ct. 2752.[44] "Where members of a racial minority group vote as a cohesive unit, ... at-large electoral systems can reduce or nullify minority voters' ability, as a group, to elect the candidate of their choice." Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 641, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (internal quotation marks omitted). In districts where candidates run for specific seats (that is, numbered posts), dilution is enhanced because that practice "prevents a cohesive political group from concentrating [all of their votes] on a single candidate." Montes, 40 F. Supp. 3d at 1411. Other dilutive practices include few, inconveniently located polling places with limited hours, Perez v. Pasadena Indep. Sch. Dist., 958 F. Supp. 1196, 1222-23 (S.D. Tex. 1997), aff'd, 165 F.3d 368 (5th Cir. 1999), and staggered elections and off-cycle voting, United States v. Village of Port Chester, No. 06-CV-15173, 2008 WL 190502, at *28 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 17, 2008).

53. The District holds at-large, staggered, off-cycle elections with numbered posts, all of which have the effect of diluting minority votes. (PX 242A ¶¶ 20-35; Tr. at 364:12-20, 366:6-367:19, 369:25-371:14.) The numbered posts and one-vote-per-seat requirement prevent minorities from casting all of their votes for one candidate. (PX 242A ¶¶ 32-33; Tr. at 369:25-371:1.) As to off-cycle elections, Dr. Barreto explained that awareness and information is lower, (Tr. at 366:19-21 ("[T]here's just less awareness and information surrounding 'election day,' which is very high in November of even-numbered years.")), and voters who feel disenfranchised tend to stay home during off-cycle elections, so minority turnout is even lower in District elections, (PX 242A ¶¶ 25-28; Tr. at 366:6-368:19).

54. State and federal elections have twenty-four polling places, but the District uses only thirteen for the same geographic area, which increases confusion and enhances discrimination. (PX 242A ¶ 29; Tr. at 368:20-369:24.)[45] The District has also failed to produce critical voting and election materials in a language other than English, although 37% of the District's public school students are English Language Learners and 53.6% of Latinos and 21.9% of blacks in the District speak English "less than very well." (JPTO at 4-5; PX 244A ¶ 51; Tr. at 371:2-372:18.) The District admitted that it has failed to make many of its election materials – including ballots, ballot applications, absentee ballots, information on voter registration, nominating petitions, and information on polling locations – available in the primary languages of many of the District's black 402 and Latino voters, such as Creole or Spanish. (PX 257 at 22:2-24, 41:18-20; 42:20-43:3, 105:16-25, 106:11-22, 148:17-149:4, 150:12-151:10, 152:14-153:4; PX 243 ¶¶ 49-51; PX 288 ¶ 34; Tr. at 1266:7-19.)

55. Defendant argues that any election-practice issues that might exist were not intentional. (See, e.g., Doc. 555 ¶ 163 (at-large system required by state law); id. ¶ 172 (District uses fewer polling places because of lack of staffing); id. ¶¶ 173-174 (new polling places selected by committee that did not consider race, and preferred plan could not be implemented because fire department would not allow use of its building).) But the third Senate Factor does not examine intent; rather, it asks whether the subdivision has used election practices "that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 37, 45, 106 S.Ct. 2752. Here, Plaintiffs have offered ample evidence showing that the District employs such practices. Thus, Senate Factor 3 weighs in favor of Plaintiffs.

D. Senate Factor 4

[21] [22] [23] [24] [25] 56. Under Senate Factor 4 courts ask, "if there is a candidate slating process, whether the members of the minority group have been denied access to that process." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 37, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (internal quotation marks omitted).[46] "[A] system that provides only a theoretical avenue for minority ... candidates to get their names on the ballot while for all practical purposes making it extremely difficult for such candidates to have a meaningful opportunity to participate ... contribute[s] to a violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act." United States v. Village of Port Chester, 704 F. Supp. 2d 411, 444-45 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). Slating organizations can be formal or informal. See Westwego Citizens for Better Gov't, 946 F.2d at 1116 & n.5; United States v. Marengo County Comm'n, 731 F.2d 1546, 1569 (11th Cir. 1984), United States v. City of Euclid, 580 F. Supp. 2d 584, 608 (N.D. Ohio 2008). Where minority voters do not "have any choice in determining what issues or candidates should or should not be endorsed" by the slating organization, the slating process is racially exclusive. See Citizens for a Better Gretna v. City of Gretna, 636 F. Supp. 1113, 1123 (E.D. La. 1986), aff'd, 834 F.2d 496 (5th Cir. 1987). The process is not made inclusive by the selection and election of a few minority candidates who may not be "true representatives of the minority population." Velasquez v. Abilene, 725 F.2d 1017, 1022-23 (5th Cir. 1984); see Goosby, 180 F.3d at 496-97; McNeil v. Springfield, 658 F. Supp. 1015, 1031 (C.D. Ill. 1987), appeal dismissed sub nom. In re City of Springfield, 818 F.2d 565 (7th Cir. 1987). Thus, the question is not simply whether minority candidates get on the ballot, but whether minorities have any "substantial input into the slating process." Harper v. City of Chicago Heights, No. 87-CV-5112, 1997 WL 102543, at *9 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 5, 1997).

57. Influential members of the white, private school community in the District participate in a slating process by which they select, endorse, promote, and secure the election of their preferred candidates, and minorities have no input into this process. (Tr. at 372:19-374:5; see PX 242A ¶ 37.)[47] There is abundant evidence of this 403 slating process. Witnesses for both sides testified that an informal organization slates the white community's candidates. Wieder admitted that "there is a group of people in the Orthodox and Hasidic community who select people to run for School Board." (Tr. at 1155:6-9.) Freilich admitted that Grossman connected him with Glick and Oshry, who were "looking for somebody to run." (Id. at 706:23-708:8.) Weissmandl explained that the signatures on his required nominating petition were collected by Rabbi Rosenfeld, who was his "go-to guy" for election assistance, that Weber supported his election (discussed further below), and that he never raised or spent any money in an effort to get elected. (Id. at 1035:4-25, 1067:12-1068:18.)[48] Rothman testified to a similar lack of campaigning and to getting approval to run from Oshry and Glick. (Id. at 1381:12-1382:19, 1383:10-1388:4.) As noted earlier, Weissmandl testified unconvincingly, to be charitable, that he did not remember what he was talking about when he texted a private school group chat saying, "I personally got the blessing for our slate every year last three years through the son [of an influential Rabbi]." (Id. at 1072:9-1076:19.) Grossman also did not collect signatures or spend any money, and ran on a slate with Weissmandl. (Id. at 1420:8-1424:4.) Charles, who is black, was connected to Rabbi Rosenfeld through a friend, met with Rosenfeld twice, and said that Rosenfeld told him that Charles's proposed running mates would have to be interviewed and vetted to "see if [Rosenfeld would] accept them as part of what [he] wanted to do." (Id. at 1787:2-1789:16, 1819:4-1820:13.) Charles testified that he met with other Orthodox people, but could not remember their names, and that Weber spent money on his campaign and distributed lawn signs and posters. (Id. at 1790:7-1792:10.) He also admitted that "leaders in the Orthodox and Hasidic community could replace [him] in an election if they wanted to." (Id. at 1816:25-1817:3.) Germain, who is also black, testified that he had to meet with and get the approval of six Rabbis before he could formally become Charles's running mate. (Id. at 1241:5-1243:11.)

58. The slating organization made no open calls for candidates, and only people with some kind of connection to the organization were introduced, vetted, and selected. Horowitz admitted that he was not aware of any public notices welcoming candidates to meet religious leaders in open forums, and that he never introduced a public school candidate to Orthodox leaders. (Id. at 1025:23-1026:7.) Charles admitted that "when it comes to running for the school board ... you're either working with [the] white community or you're working with the other community." (Id. at 1849:1-4.) Young-Mercer, who is black, testified that the Orthodox and Hasidic voters let her win in 2007. (Id. at 1894:19-21.) Candidates of color who lost their elections were never approached by anyone connected to the slating organization. (PX 279 ¶ 60 (Dos Reis); PX 281 ¶ 55 (Goodwin).)

59. The roles of the leaders of the slating organization are as follows.

404 • Rabbi Oshry selects and approves candidates, controls access to the slating process, and submits petitions on behalf of candidates. He testified that he, Glick, Rosenfeld, Weber, and/or Horowitz selected candidates and that he met with and endorsed several white-preferred candidates; that he met with some non-Jewish people, but he could not remember their names; that he submitted nominating petitions; and that he "okayed" candidates. (Tr. at 2468:23-2469:16, 2474:3-2477:13, 2479:10-24, 2483:15-21, 2487:14-2488:16, 2493:11-2494:6, 2495:12-2497:16, 2500:18-2501:24, 2502:9-2506:18; see PX 88_0004 (Horowitz writes regarding the 2017 candidates: "Oshry has been busy with it, and he has 4 people for the 2 other seats. Last I spoke he hadn't decided yet."); id. (Grossman: "I know somebody who would like to run for one of the seats. Who should I connect him to?" Horowitz: "Give me his number and Rabbi Oshry will call him.").)[49]

• Glick helps select candidates, publicizes their candidacy, and organizes get-out-the-vote efforts. (See Tr. at 2503:15-2506:23 (Oshry); id. at 1410:6-1413:15, 1427:24-1428:6, 1430:10-1431:1, 1438:13-22, 1441:3-13, 1451:12-1454:13, 1455:6-1458:12, 1458:24-1461:4, 1464:13-21, 1466:1-1467:23, 1468:15-1470:15 (Grossman);[50] id. at 1736:2-10 (Russell); id. at 1792:2-10, 1836:13-24 (Charles); id. at 993:9-24, 996:17-999:2 (Horowitz).)

• Horowitz connects potential candidates to Oshry and approves candidates. (See id. at 1424:23-25, 1432:14-1434:2, 1436:1-19, 1437:16-1438:4, 1444:1-1447:21, 1477:8-1479:24 (Grossman); PX 339 at 8 (same).) Charles-Pierre testified that Grossman told her that Horowitz was key to her being unopposed in 2016. (Tr. at 2575:11-14 (Charles-Pierre).) During the course of this litigation, 405 Grossman texted Horowitz, "Spoke to [Defendant's counsel] David Butler today. He asked me to convey message that it would be good for the case to have a [m]inority to run against Sabrina [Charles-Pierre] that [the] community could support. Message conveyed." (PX 88_0010; Tr. at 972:24-975:2 (Horowitz); id. at 1477:17-1479:24 (Grossman).)[51]

• SERTA, Weber's organization, places ads in a local magazine and works to get out the vote. (Tr. at 991:16-992:10 (Horowitz); id. at 1063:18-1067:11 (Weissmandl).)

60. In each contested election, the slating organization helped to secure the white-preferred candidate's election.

• In 2008, the slating organization created a phone script urging support "for our Heimishe candidates." (PX 188.)[52]

• In 2011, Rabbi Rosenfeld handled Weissmandl's nominating petitions. (Tr. at 1035:4-25 (Weissmandl).)

• In 2012, Glick and Walfish handled everything for Rothman's election including getting all signatures on his nominating petition, and Rothman did not do anything to get elected or even meet the two other candidates on his slate. (Id. at 1381:12-1389:5.)

• In 2013, Charles, Germain, and Maraluz Corado were supported by SERTA, Glick, and Horowitz, (id. at 1010:19-24 (Horowitz); id. at 1243:21-1245:6, 1247:1-1249:18, 1251:25-1252:14 (Germain); id. at 1791:3-15, 1836:13-24 (Charles)), and vetted and approved by Rabbi Rosenfeld, (id. at 1782:2-1791:19, 1818:20-1819:21 (Charles); see id. at 1242:9-1243:11 (Germain); id. at 2503:16-2505:13 (Oshry)).

- In 2015, Rabbi Rosenfeld vetted Juan Pablo Ramirez, (id. at 1820:22-1821:17 (Charles)), and Weissmandl and Horowitz assisted. (Tr. at 1024:20-1025:11 (Horowitz); see PX 80 at 1532.) Rothman, who was also elected, did nothing to campaign. (Tr. at 1391:23-1393:5.)

- In 2016, Charles, Germain, and Weissmandl, were approved and endorsed by SERTA, Oshry, Horowitz, and Glick. (Id. at 1242:9-1243:11, 1246:11-1251:2 (Germain); id. at 1010:19-24 (Horowitz); id. at 1836:13-1838:6, 1846:4-1847:8 (Charles); id. at 1513:14-21 (Grossman); see PX 80 at 1532.) The private school slating organization arranged for Charles-Pierre to run unopposed, securing her win. (Tr. at 1395:17-1396:6 (Rothman).)[53]

- In 2017, Horowitz and Oshry endorsed Freilich at Grossman's recommendation. (Id. at 706:23-709:7 (Freilich); id. at 1432:14-1434:2, 1434:8-15, 1436:1-19 (Grossman); PX 339 at 8 (same).) Oshry, Glick, and SERTA supported his election. (406 Tr. at 1410:6-1413:15, 1420:8-1421:22, 1427:24-1428:6, 1430:10-1431:1 (Grossman); id. at 994:18-995:5, 996:17-999:2 (Horowitz); id. at 706:23-709:7, 709:12-713:17, 720:13-724:7 (Freilich); PX 339 at 3 (same).) Freilich did nothing in support of his own candidacy beyond once announcing at a synagogue that he was running. (Tr. at 714:22-716:7, 718:9-719:19, 720:13-724:7 (Freilich); PX 339 at 3 (same).)

- In 2018, Ephraim Weissmandl and Yoel Trieger were assisted by Glick, Grossman, and Oshry. (PX 74_0005; Tr. at 2487:14-2488:16.) The slating organization again arranged for Charles-Pierre to run unopposed. (See Tr. at 2569:10-2570:2 (Charles-Pierre).)

- In 2019, as discussed in detail at paragraph 76 below in connection with Senate Factor 7, the white slating organization engineered a minority-versus-minority race and a victory for the public school community candidate Ashley Leveille, (DX 12), along the lines of what Grossman told Horowitz would be "good for the case."[54]

61. To the extent minority candidates have been elected with the support of the white community, they have been chosen by the white slating mechanism (as described above), they are often not minority-preferred, (see Tables 1-2 above), or special circumstances exist, (as described below in connection with Senate Factor 7). Accordingly, their election does not undermine the Court's finding of the existence of a white slating mechanism into which minorities have no significant input. See Velasquez, 725 F.2d at 1022 n.1.

62. The witness testimony corresponds with Dr. Barreto's testimony about and the academic literature on slating. The presence of slating is indicated by a pattern of two-candidate elections as well as nearly identical vote totals in every contest, which are present here. (PX 242A ¶¶ 43-44; Tr. at 377:4-383:25.) Dr. Barreto discussed a leading article on exclusive slating organizations and testified that, as here, such organizations refuse minority participants access to the nominating process by "vesting authority in a handful of community leaders who were largely unaccountable to others in the organization" and not "maintain[ing] consistent procedures from year to year." (PX 242A ¶ 38; see Tr. at 374:6-375:12.) All slating groups in the seminal study described in the article included " 'some minority group members, but they were often described by minority leaders not involved in the slating process as tokens, and in some cases the minority nominees were not the choice of minority voters.' " (PX 242A ¶ 38 (quoting Chandler Davidson & Luis Ricardo Fraga, Slating Groups as Parties in a "Nonpartisan" Setting, 41 W. Pol. Q. 373, 382 (1988)) (PX 271)).

63. In sum, it is clear that a slating organization exists in the white, private school community and that it consistently guarantees election outcomes. The organization may not be formal or official, but it need not be. See Euclid, 580 F. Supp. 2d at 608; Gretna, 636 F. Supp. at 1123. There is little evidence that any private school candidates created platforms or shared their views, or that the public school candidates, who did have platforms and positions, were heard within the white community. Rather, the evidence is that blacks and Latinos did not have the opportunity to participate in the private school slating process, which was tightly controlled by a few white individuals. 407 Further, it is irrelevant whether there is a public school slating process. Even though the public school community engages in traditional electioneering, its candidates always lose. (Tr. at 2133:21-2134:6 (White); PX 279 ¶¶ 34-57 (Dos Reis); PX 281 ¶¶ 30-50 (Goodwin); PX 283 ¶¶ 53-58 (Fields); see PX 242A ¶ 39.) The public school community's process is open to the public, and candidates do not need any insider information or special access to decision makers to participate. As Dr. Barreto testified, the literature explains that frustrated communities who are "locked out" of the dominant winning slate try to form their own slates, but because they represent "a numeric minority," as here, they can never "overcome the more powerful slate" and win. (Tr. at 379:8-14.) For all these reasons, this factor favors Plaintiffs.[55]

E. Senate Factor 5

[26] 64. Senate Factor 5 considers "the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process." Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491 (internal quotation marks omitted). "[W]here minority group members suffer effects of prior discrimination" and "the level of minority participation in politics is depressed, plaintiffs need not prove any further causal nexus between their disparate socioeconomic status and the depressed level of political participation." Village of Port Chester, 704 F. Supp. 2d at 445 (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted). Rather, "the burden falls to Defendant to show that the cause is something else." Id.

65. In the District, blacks and Latinos have higher unemployment rates than whites, and a higher percentage of whites work in management or professional jobs, whereas blacks and Latinos are more likely than whites to work in service occupations. (PX 244H_0051-56.) Blacks and Latinos also trail whites in earning high school diplomas and bachelor's degrees. (Tr. at 743:25-744:17 (Cooper).)

66. By some measures, including poverty rates, median income, and per capita income, the data seem to show that blacks are doing better than whites. (See PX 244A ¶ 44.) But as Plaintiffs' demographer William Cooper explained, these figures do not accurately reflect the white community's wealth, because even if income is lower, a larger percentage of whites have opted out of the labor force, (Tr. at 750:23-751:1; PX 244H_0053), and the white population "has a lot of wealth built up into ... their homes," (Tr. at 748:21-749:1; see id. at 745:23-747:12), which are located in higher value areas, (see PX 244A ¶¶ 47-48). See Mo. State Conference of the NAACP v. Ferguson-Florissant Sch. Dist., 201 F. Supp. 3d 1006, 1073 (E.D. Mo. 2016) (noting "wealth gap" in home ownership is a key driver of disparities), aff'd, 894 F.3d 924 (8th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 826, 202 L.Ed.2d 579 (2019). Further, the unusually large average household size of whites in the District serves to depress household financial statistics. (PX 244A ¶ 43.) Latinos lag behind blacks and whites "across most of these same key socioeconomic measures." (Id. ¶ 44; see Tr. at 532:4-6 (Cooper).)

67. Defendant contends that blacks and Latinos in the District do better than 408 blacks and Latinos statewide, (see Doc. 555 ¶¶ 201-202), which is not relevant here. This factor concerns how blacks and Latinos are doing socioeconomically compared to whites in the District. Even though blacks may be doing well by some measures, the lags they experience in education and employment are consistent with their lower (and declining) turnout rates compared with whites, (PX 242A ¶ 57 & tbl.7; see id. ¶¶ 58-59), and their feelings of "election futility," which is one of the strongest factors correlated with low minority voter turnout rates, (Tr. at 398:10-19 (Barreto)).[56] There is also demonstrated religious and housing segregation in the District, and those separations, along with social and economic separations, "make[ ] it especially difficult for [minority] candidates ... to reach out to and communicate with the predominantly white electorate from whom they must obtain substantial support to win an at-large elections." Charleston County, 316 F. Supp. 2d at 291. As Dr. Barreto explained, in the District, "there's ample evidence of election hindrance in the [m]inority community; that they don't have equal access to slating organizations and mobilizing groups which turn out the vote for candidates" and are thereby "hindered," which "limits their ability to participate in the political process." (Tr. at 1631:2-12.) Accordingly, Plaintiffs need not prove any further causal nexus. See Village of Port Chester, 704 F. Supp. 2d at 445.

68. Although both sides can point to statistics in their favor on this factor, Plaintiffs have shown that blacks and Latinos in the District lag behind whites socioeconomically, and these conditions have resulted in a depressed level of participation by the minority community in the political process. Thus, Senate Factor 5 weighs in Plaintiffs' favor, although not heavily.

F. Senate Factor 6

[27] [28] 69. Senate Factor 6 looks to "the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns." Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491 (internal quotation marks omitted). Appeals can be racial when they operate on "heightened racial tension," id. at 488, or when a candidate sends campaign materials to white constituents that suggest that an opponent is a person of color, see Charleston County, 316 F. Supp. 2d at 295. Racial appeals need not be permanent or pervasive. See Euclid, 580 F. Supp. 2d at 610.

70. Plaintiffs have offered little evidence showing the use of racial appeals in political campaigns in the District. Plaintiffs suggest that white candidates' targeted messaging to white voters constitutes a racial appeal, (see Doc. 556 ¶ 187 (citing Tr. at 719:6-17 (Freilich); id. at 1061:1-9 (Weissmandl))), but there is no evidence that this activity suggested that opponents were people of color or sought to capitalize on heightened racial tension. The only evidence of a campaign activity that comes close to a racial appeal is a Yiddish phone script given to private school volunteers that translated to "the fate of Jewish money and Jewish children is in your vote." (See Tr. at 1169:14-1170:8 (Wieder); PX 188.) But there is no evidence that the script was ever used, and in any event, it hardly shows that racial appeals have 409 formed a part of campaigns. Accordingly, this factor favors Defendant.

G. Senate Factor 7

[29] [30] 71. Senate Factor 7 examines "the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction." Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491 (internal quotation marks omitted). "[T]he election of a few minority candidates does not necessarily foreclose the possibility of dilution of the [minority] vote ...." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 75, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (internal quotation marks omitted). "[I]f it did, the possibility exists that the majority citizens might evade § 2 by manipulating the election of a safe minority candidate." Id. (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted). "Safe" candidates have included a black man who, once elected as a town officer, was unresponsive to the needs of black constituents, see Goosby, 956 F. Supp. at 339-45, and a minority candidate who won an election having received only about 30.7% of the minority vote, see Charleston County, 316 F. Supp. 2d at 278-79, 279 n.14. The election of a minority candidate is also discounted where whites preferred the minority candidate, engineered the election of a minority to evade a VRA challenge, or provided unusual political support to the minority candidate or otherwise campaigned to ensure that candidate's election. See Aldasoro, 922 F. Supp. at 375-76. Special circumstances surrounding minority elections, such as unopposed races and appointment prior to election, likewise weigh against a finding of minority success in elections. See Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 345-46.

72. Minority candidates have won seven out of thirty-two contested races from 2005 through 2018. (PX 242A ¶ 61.)[57] Of the eighteen of those races in which the candidates were of different races, minority candidates won three. (Id.) Defendant argues that these victories indicate that divergent voting is best explained by policy differences rather than vote dilution. (Doc. 555 ¶ 233.) But from 2008 to 2018, no minority-preferred candidate won a contested Board election, (PX 242A ¶ 64; see Table 1 above), and every candidate of color who won was either perceived as "safe" by the white slating organization or affected by special circumstances.

73. Without deciding whether any particular Board member was "safe," I find that the white slating organization was certainly looking for and supporting candidates believed to be "safe." Charles and Germain, black men who won four of the six contested elections analyzed, both admitted that they were vetted by the white slating organization, (Tr. at 1819:4-1820:3 (Charles); id. at 1243:1-6 (Germain)), and elected because the white community approved of their candidacy, (see id. at 1846:4-1847:8, 1849:1-4 (Charles's campaign materials were created and distributed by members of Orthodox and Hasidic community, with whom he was working); id. at 1242:9-1243:11, 1250:2-1251:2 (Germain had to meet with Orthodox and Hasidic community leaders before formally joining Charles's slate and members of that community collected signatures for his nominating petition); id. at 1487:20-1488:6 (Grossman referring to Charles and Germain as members of the private school slate)). They apparently had no interest in or need for campaigning in or appealing to any other community because they knew they would win by virtue of the white slating organization's support. (See Tr. at 1847:9-1848:15 (Charles admitting that he 410 never attended public NAACP candidate forum and felt he had no reason to attend, and that in 2013, he chose to attend a campaign event with all white attendees); id. at 1814:10-1815:14 (Charles acknowledging that he won with support of Orthodox and Hasidic leaders); PX 339_0010 (Charles stating that support of the Orthodox and Hasidic community was necessary to win an election); PX 288 ¶ 37 (Trotman stating that Germain did not attend 2013 NAACP forum and attended 2016 forum only briefly), Tr. at 1254:18-21 (Germain testifying that he believed he received approximately 90 percent of his votes from the Jewish community).) And, once elected, Charles and Germain appeared to join with the white majority. For example, they did not seem to support the addition of minority Board members and appeared determined to maintain the status quo. (See Tr. at 1849:5-1851:19 (Charles did not support appointment of Charles-Pierre, a black woman whom he perceived to be "on the opposing side," and in an email to Grossman called her the "lamb who will certainly lead to a slaughter of this board"); id. at 1264:18-1265:21 (Germain supported Charles-Pierre only because he believed Board could "have better control of [her]" because she is "not ... aggressive" like another candidate, whom he called "the Spanish girl"); id. at 1853:16-1856:6 (Charles "went along" with other Board members and voted for appointment of Joe Chajmovicz, an inexperienced white man with a poor command of written English, over a retired District principal with two master's degrees who is black); see PX 167-168 (Chajmovicz and Fields statements).) Members of the public school community did not support Charles and Germain, (see PX 280 ¶ 9 (Clerveaux); PX 279 ¶¶ 12-15 (Dos Reis); PX 283 ¶¶ 43, 62, 70 (Fields); PX 281 ¶¶ 9-10, 12-13 (Goodwin); Tr. at 2565:14-23, 2567:21-24, 2598:4-7 (Charles-Pierre); id. at 1858:12-14 (Charles describing calls for his resignation); id. at 1260:25-1261:14 (Germain describing protest in front of his house that resulted in another Board member's resignation)), and some were of the view that Charles and Germain were identified with the private school community, (see Tr. at 841:10-25, 842:8-19 (Miller); id. at 1927:24-1928:10 (Cohen)). On this evidence, I need not reach a conclusion about whether Charles or Germain were "safe" candidates to conclude that the white slating organization believed that they would go along with the white community's wishes.

74. Other successful minority candidates won under unusual circumstances. Corado and Ramirez won with the support of the white community in 2013 and 2015, respectively, (PX 242A ¶¶ 8-9, 14; see Table 1 above), and resigned from the Board shortly thereafter, (Tr. at 1252:5-7, 1261:2-6 (Germain); id. at 1113:17-23 (Weissmandl)), leaving the Board to appoint Grossman and Charles-Pierre, (see id. at 1110:11-1111:1, 1115:7-9 (Weissmandl); PX 172). Charles and Germain were incumbent in three races, which gives an electoral advantage. (PX 242A ¶ 62.) Young-Mercer and Thompson were unopposed incumbents, but Thompson lost to Rothman the next year and Young-Mercer resigned in frustration and because she was confident she would not be re-elected. (See PX 234; PX 242A at 34-35; Tr. at 1876:2-1877:12, 1880:14-1881:15 (Young-Mercer).)

75. Charles-Pierre was initially appointed to the Board in 2015 as a result of pressure on the Board from the state-imposed monitor to appoint a public school parent. (See PX 81_0047 (Grossman told Charles-Pierre that Weissmandl said, "The only reason [Charles-Pierre] is there and ran unopposed is because the board wants to do what [the state-appointed monitor] said," which was to "[h]ave at least one [public] school parent."); 411 Tr. at 2576:14-2577:2 (same); PX 156_0014-15 (monitor report recommending that all candidates for at least one Board seat must be parents of public school students and selected by other public school parents).) She ran unopposed and won in 2016 because she had the imprimatur of the white slating organization. (See PX 81 at 16-18; Tr. at 1009:9-1010:15, 1024:23-1025:11 (Horowitz supported Charles-Pierre in 2016 "[i]f it's the year she won"); id. at 2565:17-2566:23 (Charles-Pierre campaigned with other public school candidates who "worked just as hard" as she did but lost, while she won because she met with slating organization and got the majority of the white vote); id. at 2567:11-16 (Grossman told Charles-Pierre that he and Weissmandl convinced Horowitz that they would support Charles-Pierre and she would run unopposed).) After she won, Grossman repeatedly reminded her that her continued presence on the Board depended on the white slating organization's support. (Tr. at 2582:22-2583:16 (Charles-Pierre); see PX 81_0029 (Grossman texted Charles-Pierre, "When you look at the vote totals from last night, you know you are on the board because the Jewish community trusted me and Yehuda [Weissmandl] not to run another candidate."); id. at _0035 (Grossman texted Charles-Pierre, "If there really was any desire by anybody to remove you from the board, all that would need to be done was to run a candidate against you in May. That candidate would have garnered 8,000 votes and you would have lost by 4,000 votes just like the other 3 .... Orthodox community could just have voted you out in May. WE told them that you were good and not to run a candidate."); id. at _0040 (similar statements from Grossman to Charles-Pierre).) She believed that she was kept out of important discussions and that the Board tried to placate the monitor without giving her any real power or clout. (Tr. at 2595:17-23, 2639:14-2640:9 (Board members said they believed they could control Charles-Pierre and that she had "zero control or influence on direction"); id. at 2626:25-2527:7 (Charles-Pierre believed Board members were making her look "stupid" and "keeping [her] in the dark").) Indeed, Board members limited certain discussions to white members only, including discussions on important matters such as the settlement of this litigation, (see Doc. 533), and the appointment of a new Board member, (see Tr. at 1530:24-1533:24 (Grossman testifying that Weissmandl forwarded resumes of Board candidates to white Board members with message, "Please respond ASAP as we discussed. One choice.")).[58]

76. Further, Leveille's election in 2019 appears to have been engineered by the white slating organization, as mentioned above, after Defendant's counsel had suggested the previous year that "it would be good for the case to have a minority to run against Sabrina [Charles-Pierre] that the community could support." (Tr. at 2648:22-2649:6 (Charles-Pierre); PX 88_0010.) In 2019, Pastor Joselito Cintron, who is Latino, ran for a seat to be vacated by Weissmandl, who is white. (Tr. at 1772:8-11, 1773:9-21 (Leveille); id. at 2590:8-12 (Charles-Pierre).) Cintron agreed to run on a ticket with Leveille and Goodwin, both of whom are black and public school advocates. (See id. at 792:21-24 (Goodwin); 412 id. at 1773:17-20 (Leveille); PX 281 ¶¶ 3, 20, 23 (Goodwin).) Leveille was running for a different vacant seat. (Id. at 1773:21-1774:1.) Then, abruptly, Weissmandl apparently decided to run after all, and Cintron, rather than opposing him, chose to run for the same seat as his former ticket-mate Leveille, leaving Weissmandl rather than Leveille to run unopposed. (Id. at 1774:17-19 (Leveille); id. at 2592:9-12 (Charles-Pierre).) Because Cintron was now running for a different seat, he needed a new nominating petition. All the signatures for that petition were collected on a single day – the day petitions were due – and were collected almost exclusively from voters residing in the white areas of the District, showing that the white slating organization wanted the switch. (PX 314; PX 330; PX 341; Tr. at 1748:10-1750:10 (Russell); see id. at 1515:21-1516:16, 1517:6-12 (Grossman).) Cintron told Leveille that "they" were giving him the seat if he ran against her and that "the rabbis" said that that was the only way he could win.[59] (Tr. at 1775:19-1776:18 (Leveille).) On election day, to her surprise, Leveille unexpectedly defeated Cintron. (Id. at 1779:15-1780:2 (Leveille).) Turnout was inordinately low at the polling places in the white areas of the District, (see id. at 1742:19-1743:1 (Russell); DX 252 ¶ 62(1); DX 12), suggesting that the white slating organization had pulled its support from Cintron and engineered the victory of a candidate favored by the public school community over another minority candidate. Grossman had discussed with an activist named Rivke Feiner that it would be desirable to have two minority candidates running against one another. (Tr. at 1520:18-21 (Grossman).) This engineering of Leveille's win, complete with double-cross by and then of Cintron, shows not only the power of the white slating organization, but also that Leveille's victory was (without any participation on her part) at least a "special circumstance," if not a naked attempt to manipulate the outcome of this case.

77. Even before Leveille's engineered victory, the white slating organization was cognizant of appearances and aware that the white, private school community would be better off if it included minority candidates on the slate, whether to placate the monitor or the minority voters of the District. This awareness is supported by the white slating organization's selection and endorsement of Charles and Germain, who they believed would not stand in the way of what they wanted. Thus, the mere fact that there were some minority candidates, a few of whom were elected, does not carry a lot of weight in light of the evidence that victories were arranged for appearance's sake and/or occurred in unusual circumstances, especially considering how few people of color were ultimately elected. Senate Factor 7 therefore weighs in Plaintiffs' favor.

413 H. Additional Factor 8

[31] 78. In some cases, "evidence demonstrating that elected officials are unresponsive to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group" has probative value. Goosby, 180 F.3d at 491-92 (internal quotation marks omitted). Unresponsiveness includes failure to respond to complaints of racial discrimination, Goosby, 956 F. Supp. at 346; failure to identify concerns of the minority community, see McDaniels v. Mehfoud, 702 F. Supp. 588, 595-96 (E.D. Va. 1988), denying amendment, 708 F. Supp. 754 (E.D. Va. 1989), appeal dismissed, 927 F.2d 596 (4th Cir. 1991); scarcity of outreach sessions in the minority community, Conn. Citizen Action Grp. v. Pugliese, 1984 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24869, at *12-13 (D. Conn. Sept. 27, 1984); failure to respond to unequal school resources and disparate discipline and educational opportunities, Ferguson-Florissant Sch. Dist., 201 F. Supp. 3d at 1073; and failure to provide bilingual translations of official forms, Pugliese, 1984 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24869, at *13.

79. Defendants can introduce evidence of responsiveness, but overall the Second Circuit pursues the responsiveness/unresponsiveness "inquiry with some reluctance, as it entails ... deciphering what policy steps qualify as responses to the needs of members of the minority community," and is therefore less objective than other factors. See Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d at 1023 n.24 (internal quotation marks omitted). Accordingly, I do not give this factor as much weight as I give other factors. See Village of Port Chester, 704 F. Supp. 2d at 446.

80. Plaintiffs have put forth ample evidence of the Board's lack of responsiveness to particularized needs of the black and Latino communities since 2008. The Board has ignored concerns and numerous requests from the NAACP and others in the public school community. (See PX 342 ¶¶ 18-19 (Cohen); PX 288 ¶¶ 12-14, 16-18, 25, 36 (Trotman); PX 228 (letter from NAACP); PX 40 (same); Tr. at 2665:22-2266:7 (Charles-Pierre); PX 279 ¶¶ 21-24 (Dos Reis).) One former public school student of color – an impressive and thoughtful young woman – testified that when she approached the Board as a student, she was ignored or accused of lying. (PX 278 ¶¶ 21-28 (Castor); Tr. at 590:11-24 (same).) In an apparent effort to prevent public school parents' voices from being heard, the Board for a time moved the public comment period to the end of its meetings, and often held such long executive sessions beforehand that public comments began after 10 or 11 p.m., when most members of the public had already had to leave. (PX 152 at 35; PX 342 ¶ 13 (Cohen); PX 283 ¶ 44 (Fields); PX 286 ¶ 30 (Price).) At times, Board members left the room to destroy a quorum and delay public comment, (PX 286 ¶ 31 (Price)), or became obviously absorbed in their phones or in side conversations while public school advocates were speaking, (Tr. at 590:17-22 (Castor); id. at 786:20-787:9 (Goodwin); id. at 820:14-16 (Miller)). Some were so disengaged while public school advocates were expressing concerns that "[i]t looked like they were sleeping." (Id. at 820:16-18 (Miller).) The Board also enacted a rule prohibiting its members from responding when community members voiced concerns during Board meetings. (See id. at 734:25-735:9 (Freilich).) Together, these policies stifled public school advocates' ability to articulate concerns and enabled Board members to not respond.

81. In one incident, former District Superintendent Joel Klein was discussing an influx of older students who had little education in their native Latin American countries. He said that "we know every[ ]one of these kids are dropping out" and that, to avoid having them skew the graduation 414 rate, the District would set up an "alternate transitional program" for students who, he said, "want to learn the language, they want free lunch, breakfast and whatever else they can get." (DX 171 at 2:9-3:15; DX 180.) The state monitors characterized these remarks as a "failure to understand the background and needs of [the District's English Language Learner] community," (PX 217 at 9-10); one of Plaintiffs' witnesses called them "disgusting," (Tr. at 1337:11-1338:3); and Plaintiffs call them "racially insensitive," (Doc. 556 ¶ 140). Regardless of whether Klein was merely responding to a crisis, or intentionally hostile, or somewhere in the middle, the Board's lack of response is what matters. Despite "numerous unfortunate comments" by Klein that "contributed to an ongoing distrust between the District leadership and the public school community," (DX 35 at 9), Klein remained in place for a year, (see DX 180 (comments made on August 20, 2014); DX 35 at 9 (Klein replaced in 2015); Tr. at 2410:21-25 (Wortham replaced Klein in November 2015)). Defendant points out that Klein was replaced by Deborah Wortham, who has overseen "remarkable and steady improvement," (Doc. 555 ¶ 247), but the Board hired her only after pressure from the state monitors to replace Klein, (DX 35 at 9), so her appointment does little to show District responsiveness. In other incidents, lawyers retained by the Board treated students and parents in a bizarrely hostile fashion but remained as Board counsel even after the public school community protested. (PX 286 ¶ 24 (Price); PX 343 ¶ 27 (Young-Mercer); PX 278 ¶ 29 (Castor); PX 140 (letter from parent who said her son was harassed); PX 283 ¶ 47 (Fields); PX at 152 at 28 (monitor presentation).)

82. Current and former Board members who support public schools felt marginalized and harassed, (see PX 343 ¶¶ 35-38 (Young-Mercer); PX 286 ¶ 33 (Price); Tr. at 1184:8-1186:22 (same); id. at 2664:5-20 (Charles-Pierre)), while white Board members acknowledged that they had all the power, (PX 342 ¶ 16 (former Board President told Cohen that the Board had "all of the power"); PX 80 at 427 (Grossman: "If private school really wanted [Ms. Charles-Pierre's] seat she would have lost the election like the rest of them."); PX 81_0050 (Grossman: "Nothing can pass without [O]rthodox support."); PX 88_0002 (Grossman: public school advocates "feel disempowered because they are"); PX 8 at 279 (Grossman: the outcome of the 2016 election "will be whatever we want it to be"); see Tr. at 2670:12-24 (Charles-Pierre agreeing that the "white majority" "had all the real power")). It is therefore unsurprising that the Board refused to participate in a reconciliation process with public school community leaders. (PX 342 ¶ 16 (Cohen); PX 288 ¶ 9 (Trotman).)

83. This lack of concern regarding the views of the public school community seems to have allowed for numerous Board decisions privileging private school interests and/or harmful to public education.

- From 2009 to 2014, budgets were cut dramatically, and the Board eliminated hundreds of public school teaching, staff, and administrative positions and eliminated classes and programs. (PX 152 at 30-32.) The public school buildings fell into disrepair and custodial services were reduced. (PX 279 ¶ 19 (Dos Reis); PX 278 ¶¶ 18-20 (Castor); PX 283 ¶ 36 (Fields); PX 288 ¶ 18 (Trotman).)

Students were given academically deficient schedules full of free time and filler. (PX 278 ¶¶ 15-16 (Castor); Tr. at 582:12-584:25, 638:9-24 (same); PX 3B at 2, 4.) The Board closed two public schools over minority opposition and tried to sell one of them to a 415 yeshiva at a sweetheart price, a sale the New York State Commissioner of Education annulled. (PX 286 ¶¶ 26-27 (Price); PX 212.) Graduation rates and test scores sank. (PX 283 ¶¶ 30-35 (Fields); see PX 204A-I.) The Board made "no meaningful effort ... to distribute [the] pain of deep budget cuts fairly among private and public schools." (PX 152 at 33.)

- In the 2010-2011 and 2011-2012 school years, so many special education placements were improperly given to white children that the state refused to fully reimburse the District. (PX 211; PX 286 ¶ 18 (Price); PX 289.)

- The state monitor found that in 2013 the Board turned down $3.5 million in advanced lottery funds that could have been used to restore programs, but which would have required the District to form an advisory committee including parents and teachers that would direct how the money would be spent. (Id. at 22, 45.)

- While the public school cuts have yet to be restored in full, (PX 108 at 5-6), nonmandated private school services have increased. For example, the budget for the 2017-2018 school year included funds for five nonmandated days of private school transportation, and as a result, the Commissioner of Education did not approve the budget. (PX 170.) The Board approved six days of nonmandated private school busing for the 2019-2020 school year. (PX 262.) In November 2019, the New York State Comptroller found that, over the preceding two school years, the District paid yeshiva private contractors to bus 1,172 more students than were registered, totaling $832,584 in unsubstantiated expenses. (PX 214 at 1.)

- The Board appointed new members seemingly without concern for candidates' qualifications or lack thereof. (PX 172; PX 283 ¶¶ 65-66 (Fields); Tr. at 2666:21-2667:17 (Charles-Pierre).) It also made accommodations for Yiddish-speaking parents and students that were not made for Spanish speakers. (PX 157 at 8-9; PX 217 at 1-2.) It remains under a corrective action plan by the New York State Education Department Office of Bilingual Education and World Languages. (Tr. at 2418:19-2419:6 (Wortham).)

Accordingly, that cuts may, as Defendant suggests,[60] have been necessitated by the financial crisis or a state funding formula that is unfair to the District does not undermine the conclusion that the Board has not been responsive to the concerns of black and Latino persons.

84. Since 2015, the District has seen improvements, which are commendable, but the positions that have been restored have not been restored in full, (see PX 208 at 5-6), and have not kept up with a significant increase in enrollment, (id.). Further, all improvements have occurred under state supervision and with the help of a lot of state money. For example, the District's budgets, developed in consultation with the state monitors, must be approved by the Commissioner before being submitted to a vote in the District, (Tr. at 2404:22-2405:4 (Wortham)), and an annual $3 million grant recommended by the monitors must be spent on public schools, (PX 206_0007-08; 416 PX 203; Tr. at 2431:23-2432:13 (Wortham); PX 207_0009-10; PX 208_0010-11). The District cannot maintain its public school program restorations without the grant money. (PX 206_0019.) There is every reason to believe that the improvements are because of the state monitors, and in spite of the machinations of some Board members. (See, e.g., Tr. at 1525:23-1529:9, 1550:7-1554:8, 2675:23-2676:23 (Grossman urging petitions against Board, suggesting removal of non-Orthodox Board members, and interfering with settlement of this lawsuit).) Even Superintendent Wortham, who has overseen many of the positive changes, was hired by the Board in collaboration with the state monitors, who helped to "identify, recruit, and hire" her. (PX 156_0010.) Accordingly, the improvements to public education in the District do not show responsiveness by the Board, or change the facts above, which show a lack thereof. For these reasons, this factor favors Plaintiffs.

I. Additional Factor 9

85. Under Senate Factor 9, courts consider "whether the policy underlying the ... political subdivision's use of ... [the contested] practice or procedure is tenuous." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 37, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (internal quotation marks omitted).

86. Defendant contends that it is required to use an at-large voting system because under New York law, "[e]ach vacancy upon the board of education to be filled shall be considered a separate specific office," N.Y. Educ. Law § 2018(a), and all qualified voters are "entitled to vote at any school meeting or election for the election of school district officers," id. § 2012. Defendant's interpretation is reasonable, and may even be correct, and on this record, there is no basis for concluding that the at-large elections are a cover for intentional discrimination or a desire for discriminatory effect. But although the District has a legitimate basis for running the elections the way that it does, there is evidence that the dominant Board members and the white slating organization have a desire to adhere to the current system despite its discriminatory effect and went to extraordinary lengths to preserve that system to maintain political power. The evidence shows that, in the course of this proceeding, Board members outright lied or disingenuously claimed lack of memory;[61] the Board President and others failed to provide the Board's members of color with complete or accurate information about this lawsuit, including settlement possibilities that could have saved enormous amounts of money,[62] (see Tr. at 2672:10-2674:1, 2675:23-2677:1 (Charles-Pierre); Doc. 553-1 ¶ 9 (Leveille)); and one leader of the white slating organization went so far as to go into contempt of court, (see Doc. 530; note 49 above). The District also knew, at least as of January 30, 2020, when the Court ruled on the parties' motions in limine, that even if state law requires at-large elections, the 417 Court has the power to impose a remedy if the challenged voting practice violates Section 2 and, therefore, that it would have been possible to resolve this case. Further, as discussed above, the slating organization appears to have been so desperate to maintain the at-large system that it engineered Leveille's 2019 victory for purposes of appearances after Defendant's counsel suggested it would be "good for the case" to have an additional minority candidate. (Tr. at 2648:22-2649:6 (Charles-Pierre); PX 88 at 10.) All of these machinations show that, even if the District is justified in its belief that state law requires at-large elections, some Board members had tenuous, if not illegitimate, reasons for wanting to maintain the status quo. Accordingly, this factor weighs in Plaintiffs' favor.

IV. FINAL CONCLUSIONS & REMEDY

87. Balancing all of the relevant factors, I find that Plaintiffs have convincingly proven their case of vote dilution. The three Gingles factors are met, and the Senate Factors weigh firmly in Plaintiffs' favor. The at-large system of electing the Board of Education of the East Ramapo Central School District affords black and Latino residents "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice," Gingles, 478 U.S. at 36, 106 S.Ct. 2752 (internal quotation marks omitted), in that it "thwarts a distinctive minority vote by submerging it in larger white voting population," Growe, 507 U.S. at 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075. I do not address whether this result was intentional, as no such finding is required under Section 2. The case is made by showing that people of color feel the deleterious impact of the at-large scheme employed for Board elections and white people do not, such that the challenged practice "has operated to invidiously exclude blacks [and Latinos] from effective participation in political life in violation of Section 2." Goosby, 956 F. Supp. at 356.

[32] 88. Plaintiffs have proven that the at-large method of electing Board members in the District violates Section 2 of the VRA and that they are thus entitled to full relief. This Court enjoins the District from holding any further elections under its at-large system, including the elections currently scheduled for June 9, 2020. See Wright v. Sumter Cty. Bd. of Elections & Registration, 361 F. Supp. 3d 1296, 1305-06 (M.D. Ga. 2018) (enjoining election pending redistricting), modified on other grounds, No. 14-CV-42, 2018 WL 7366461 (M.D. Ga. June 21, 2018), reconsideration denied, 2018 WL 7366501 (M.D. Ga. July 23, 2018); Arbor Hill, 281 F. Supp. 2d at 457 (same); cf. Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 585-86, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964) (court not required to enjoin imminent election where apportionment scheme found invalid, but "it would be the unusual case in which a court would be justified in not taking appropriate action to insure that no further elections are conducted under the invalid plan"). The District shall propose a remedial plan that fully complies with the VRA within thirty days of the date of this Order. See Goosby, 981 F. Supp. at 755 ("Where a court has struck down a voting system, it must give the appropriate elected body an opportunity to propose a remedial plan."); see also Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 351 (affording defendant municipality "the first opportunity to create a remedial plan"). Such a remedial plan shall divide the District into nine voting wards – one for each Board seat – and require that only those residents living in a voting ward may vote for that ward's seat. The Court will not prescribe further details at this time except to note that as many as four majority-minority wards appear to be possible, (see ¶ 13 above), and 418 that a special election would appear to be necessary once the remedial plan is adopted. Plaintiffs shall respond within thirty days of the date of Defendant's proposal.[63] This Court shall retain jurisdiction to ensure that the District complies fully with the VRA and implements all steps to cure its violation. See New Rochelle Voter Def. Fund v. City of New Rochelle, 308 F. Supp. 2d 152, 163-64 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

89. Finally, Plaintiffs are entitled to attorney's fees and costs, including expert fees, pursuant to 52 U.S.C. § 10310(e). See Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 351-52. Within thirty days of the entry of this Order, Plaintiffs shall file a motion for the award of such fees and costs, unless the parties can come to an agreement on that subject. Defendant will thereafter have thirty days to respond.

* * *

This ruling may or may not change the way the schools in the District are run. But the purpose of Section 2 is not to produce any particular policy outcome. Rather, it is to ensure that every voter has equal access to the electoral process. For too long, black and Latino voters in the District have been frustrated in that most fundamental and precious endeavor. They, like their white neighbors, are entitled to have their voices heard.

SO ORDERED.

All Citations

462 F.Supp.3d 368, 382 Ed. Law Rep. 631

Footnotes

1 "PX" refers to an exhibit offered by Plaintiffs and received at trial. "DX" refers to an exhibit offered by Defendant and received at trial. "Tr." refers to the transcript of the bench trial. "JPTO" refers to the Joint Pretrial Order. (Doc. 458.) For clarity and ease of reference, some record citations include the last name of the testifying witness.

2 On November 5, 2018, Washington Sanchez voluntarily withdrew as a Plaintiff. (Doc. 195.) Plaintiff Jose Vitelio Gregorio passed away on April 30, 2020. (See Doc. 566.) Plaintiffs designated Plaintiff Hillary Moreau as a witness, (JPTO at 18), but she did not testify, and no information about her is in the record.

3 William S. Cooper is Plaintiffs' expert in demography and redistricting, (see Tr. at 498:5-10), and the author of the expert report at PX 244A through PX 244X.

4 The District provides certain services to both public and private schools including transportation, special education, and textbooks. (Tr. at 2380:21-2381:9, 2381:24-2382:19 (Wortham).) Deborah Wortham is the Superintendent of the District. (DX 173 ¶ 1.)

5 The District's citizen voting age population ("CVAP") is 61.4% white, 24.1% black, 9.1% Latino, and 4.5% Asian. (PX 244A ¶ 4; Tr. at 510:5-17 (Cooper).)

6 Dr. Matthew Barreto is Plaintiffs' political science and statistical analysis expert, (see Tr. at 154:5-11), and the co-author of the expert report at PX 242A and the preliminary expert report at PX 242B.

7 Defendant contends that a "non-trivial" percentage of black families in the District send their children to private schools, (see Doc. 555 ¶ 78 n.2), and while it is obvious that some black and Latino students attend private schools, (PX 278 ¶¶ 9-10 (Castor); Tr. at 1237:23-24 (Germain)), there is no evidence that it is more than an insignificant number, (see PX 372_0009 (New York State Education Department data show that 571 nonwhite students both reside and attend private schools in the District); id. at _0010 (no more than 813 nonwhite students reside in the District and attend private schools in New York State but outside of the District)); id. at _0030-31 (it is not possible to calculate the number of black and Latino students residing in the District and attending private schools outside of New York State).

8 As of January 6, 2020, Board members were Harry Grossman (President), Sabrina Charles-Pierre (Vice-President), Mark Berkowitz, Bernard L. Charles Jr., Joel Freilich, Ashley Leveille, Yoel T. Trieger, Ephraim Weissmandl, and Yehuda Weissmandl. (JPTO at 6.) On February 6, 2020, Charles resigned from the Board after pleading guilty to a misdemeanor in state court. (Tr. at 1783:21-1784:22.) Thereafter, Carole Anderson was appointed on an interim basis until the next election, currently scheduled for June 9, 2020. (See Doc. 567; Board Members, E. Ramapo Cent. Sch. District, https://www.ercsd.org/Page/90 (last visited May 25, 2020).)

9 In an at-large system, all voters vote in all contests. In a ward system, also called a single-member district system, political subdivisions are divided into "compact, contiguous and essentially equipopulous" geographical areas, commonly referred to as wards. See Goosby v. Town Bd., 981 F. Supp. 751, 757 (E.D.N.Y. 1997), aff'd, 180 F.3d 476 (2d Cir. 1999). Under a single-member district system, candidates run for a seat associated with a particular ward, and only residents of that ward vote in that contest. See, e.g., N.Y. Town Law § 85.

10 A summary of Mr. Cooper's redistricting experience is available at PX 244C. Although his testimony may have been shaky on unrelated matters such as the location of private schools attended by District residents and the number of students of color attending private schools, (see Tr. at 555:2-15, 561:1-17), his testimony and conclusions regarding redistricting – upon which he is eminently qualified to opine – were convincing and essentially unchallenged by Defendant.

11 Rather, Defendant contends that Plaintiffs may not assert a VRA claim on behalf of a combined minority group because such a group would be a political rather than racial coalition. (See Doc. 555 ¶ 24 (citing Hall v. Virginia, 385 F.3d 421, 431 (4th Cir. 2004) ("[A]ny construction of Section 2 that authorizes the vote dilution claims of multiracial coalitions would transform the Voting Rights Act from a law that removes disadvantages based on race, into one that creates advantages for political coalitions that are not so defined.")).) But Defendant's argument is disingenuous because in Hall, plaintiff sought to combine black and white voters to show vote dilution. See 385 F.3d at 424-25. The Fourth Circuit held that black and white voters combined would form a political coalition, not a minority group. Id. at 431. Hall does not stand for the proposition that minority groups cannot be combined. To the contrary, courts "recognize the permissibility of coalition claims under § 2, as long as plaintiffs are able to demonstrate the political cohesiveness of the coalition." Ga. State Conference of the NAACP v. Gwinnett Cty. Bd. of Registrations & Elections, No. 16-CV-2852, 2017 WL 4250535, at *1 (N.D. Ga. May 12, 2017) (collecting cases); see Bridgeport Coal. for Fair Representation v. City of Bridgeport, 26 F.3d 271, 276 (2d Cir.), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 512 U.S. 1283, 115 S.Ct. 35, 129 L.Ed.2d 931 (1994).

12 I need not reach whether the District's Latino voters alone are sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority, (see Doc. 555 ¶¶ 22-23), because I conclude that they vote cohesively with black voters.

13 All references to PX 242B are to the page numbers stamped at the top-center of each page.

14 I refer to Dr. Barreto alone throughout because he provided live expert testimony in this case, but Drs. Barreto and Collingwood "work[ed] together on all of the reports and analyses," with Dr. Collingwood serving as lead programmer. (Tr. at 164:23-165:13.)

15 "Generally speaking, both methods take ecological data in the aggregate – such as precinct vote totals – and use Bayesian statistical methods to find voting patterns by regressing candidate choice against racial demographics within the aggregate precinct." (PX 242B at 11.)

16 For every surname that occurs at least 1,000 times, demographers at the Census Bureau have created a race probability estimate based on census respondents' self-reported race. (Tr. at 168:16-24.)

17 The Census Bureau collects data at various geographic levels, the smallest being a "block," which is about one city block in size, and the next smallest being a "block group," which is a collection of several blocks. (PX 244 ¶¶ 3-4, 29.) That data can then be aggregated to the precinct (or polling place) level. (See Tr. at 2200:16-21.)

18 In 2016, Imai and Khanna published an article in the leading political science statistics and methods journal proposing the use of surname and geocoding analysis to estimate voter preference and turnout. (PX 269; see Tr. at 190:3-8.) They validated their statistical package WRU by comparing its results to the self-reported race of 9 million Florida voters. (PX 269 at 267.) They concluded that BISG "enables academic researchers and litigators to conduct more reliable ecological inference in states where registered voters are not asked to report their race." (Id. at 271.)

19 Dr. Barreto did not purport to have expertise on how the equation underlying Imai and Khanna's software package functions, and it appears he may not have fully understood it, (see Tr. at 1597:11-1607:20 (Barreto); id. at 2227:15-2228:21 (Alford)), but he used the software as published by Imai and Khanna without alteration, (id. at 1598:3, 1598:25-1599:1, 1599:20-22, 1600:7-9, 2727:23-2728:6), and his understanding of the results produced is manifest, (see, e.g., id. at 167:3-10, 168:9-170:10, 170:24-175:8, 185:11-18).

20 Dr. Barreto explained that Imai and Khanna's validation in particular supports the use of BISG in the District because Florida and the District have similar demographics, including large Latino, Haitian, and Hasidic populations. (Tr. at 194:4-11.)

21 Dr. Morrison testified that Dr. Barreto should not have used BISG, (Tr. at 23:15-19), but this testimony was not consistent with his earlier published statement that BISG could be used in vote dilution analysis, (see DX 99 at 12 n.21).

22 In other words, black voters tended to vote for the same candidates as each other, Latino voters tended to vote for the same candidates as each other, and both groups supported the same candidates; "it wasn't as though blacks were voting for one candidate and Latinos are voting for a third. Black and Latino voters were also voting cohesively with each other." (Tr. at 289:16-24.)

23 The 2014 election was not analyzed because all candidates that year ran unopposed. (See JPTO at 8-9; see also Table 1 above.)

24 Both sides agree that white voters have supported black and Latino candidates to the same extent as white candidates, but contrary to Defendant's suggestion, (Doc. 555 ¶ 73), that does not show the absence of racial polarization or a Section 2 violation. A minority candidate is not necessarily preferred by minority voters. See Goosby, 180 F.3d at 497 (acknowledging that black candidate was not minority preferred); see also Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d at 1018 (cautioning against "degenerat[ing] into racial stereotyping"). And the election of a minority candidate is discounted where whites preferred the minority candidate, manipulated the election of a "safe" minority candidate, engineered the election of a minority to evade a VRA challenge, or provided unusual political support to the minority candidate or otherwise campaigned to ensure that candidate's election, see Aldasoro, 922 F. Supp. at 375-76, all of which occurred here (as discussed below).

25 In this CVAP analysis Dr. Barreto combined black and Latino voters into a single "non-white" category. Dr. Barreto testified that he did not believe "the CVAP data was appropriate or precise" and so he "did not attempt to make CVAP estimates for Blacks or Latinos" but rather performed a white/non-white analysis of CVAP to "start to understand voting patterns. (Tr. at 420:20-25, 421:24-422:8.) While this might not be a reliable methodology in the first instance, (see id. at 2184:22-2185:11 (Alford testifying that if Barreto were concerned with reliability, he should have reported black/white/Latino results and explained them); id. at 2751:19-2752:4 (Barreto admitting that he was aware of Alford's CVAP results)), it is appropriately considered here because grouping the minority voters increased the sample size being analyzed, (id. at 284:1-14), and helped to mitigate the turnout problem, (see id. at 284:1-3), described below, and because Dr. Barreto used this method just as a cross-check of his BISG analysis, (id. at 283:20-24).

26 Dr. Barreto used Dr. Alford's own method and conclusions in this analysis. (Tr. at 294:20-295:14, 306:204.) The results showed that even if every black and Latino voter voted for the losing candidate, that candidate would still lose by thousands of votes because the white voting bloc was too powerful to overcome. (Id. at 304:6-19, 306:2-8.)

27 As noted in paragraph 15 above, anecdotal evidence is not considered in determining which candidates are minority preferred under the third Gingles precondition. As to whether white voters vote as a bloc under that precondition, courts likewise rely on statistical analysis. See Niagara Falls, 65 F.3d at 1012; Pope, 94 F. Supp. 3d at 336-37; Rodriguez, 308 F. Supp. 2d at 422-26.

28 The turnout problem is amplified in the District. Dr. Barreto's testimony confirms that the CVAP data set used in this case overestimates black and Latino turnout and underestimates white turnout. (See Tr. at 272:11-274:10, 274:14-275:8, 275:17-276:14.) Accordingly, EI estimates of voter preference relying on CVAP underestimate the extent of racially polarized voting. (Id. at 281:15-24.)

29 In so opining, Dr. Alford contended that PX 364 – Dr. Barreto and Dr. Grofman's article – claimed that RxC can also account for turnout, (see Tr. at 2208:4-15), but the article covered King's EI, not RxC, (see id. at 2707:21-2708:7).

30 A point estimate is the most likely outcome as generated by a statistical model such as King's EI or RxC. (See Tr. at 336:5-10, 336:22-25, 337:23-338:4 (Barreto).) The confidence interval is the rest of the distribution and shows the probability of other estimates. (Id. at 336:18-21.)

31 In his expert report, Dr. Barreto reported confidence intervals using CVAP data for the contested races in 2013, 2016, 2017, and 2018, (PX 242A at 40-44, 46-47), and 2017 King's EI and RxC analysis using Catalist data, (id. at 44-46). He did not analyze the 2015 election in that report because the data contained incorrect precinct assignments. (Id. ¶ 7.) In his preliminary report, Dr. Barreto reported confidence intervals using CVAP data for the contested races in 2013, 2015, 2016, and 2017; the 2012 presidential election; and the 2017 races using BISG. (PX 242B at 34-42.) At the time of the preliminary report, Dr. Barreto was able to apply BISG only to the 2017 voter file, which had been produced in discovery by that point. (Id. at 9, 12-13.)

32 Dr. Barreto explained that "the error rate in BISG is built into the model, ... it is part of the probability. And so it's not an otherwise published statistic." (Tr. at 1578:19-21.) In other words, "when [BISG] spits out estimates, what is the error rate on that specific estimate, and my answer to that is that it is baked into that estimate, and that's why it gives us a probability instead of an assignment. It gives you a .83 White and a .07 Black and .05 Hispanic." (Id. at 1580:6-11.)

33 As noted, elsewhere Dr. Morrison appeared to understand how political scientists use BISG in voting analysis. A 2017 paper co-authored by Dr. Morrison cited the Imai and Khanna article in support of the contention that "one could assign a race to registrants in a voter file where this quantity is not present and then aggregate these individuals by a geographic unit such as a voting precinct" and then use that as an EI input, (DX 99 at 12 n.21) – exactly what Dr. Barreto did, (Tr. at 201:1-12). I did not find persuasive Dr. Morrison's attempt to backtrack at trial by suggesting that he did not intend for readers to rely on the footnote where this statement was made. (Id. at 29:3-30:4.)

34 This anomaly could be explained by the fact that the Catalist database incorporates first name and self-reported data, (see PX 258 at 52:6-21, 61:19-63:7; Tr. at 245:15-246:9, 250:8-9, 479:11-16), not just surname and geolocation data.

35 Defendant contends that " '[P]laintiffs cannot prevail on a VRA § 2 claim if there is significantly probative evidence that whites voted as a bloc for reasons wholly unrelated to racial animus.' " (See Doc. 555 ¶ 127 (alteration in original) (quoting Uno v. City of Holyoke, 72 F.3d 973, 981 (1st Cir. 1995)).) But this approach is at best an oversimplification because "it ignores language in the Senate Report which expressly states that such an inference of racial animus is unnecessary." See Solomon v. Liberty County, 957 F. Supp. 1522, 1548 n.55 (N.D. Fla. 1997), aff'd, 221 F.3d 1218 (11th Cir. 2000); accord Charleston County, 316 F. Supp. 2d at 299 n.35.

36 On June 10, 2014, the New York State Commissioner of Education appointed a fiscal monitor to oversee the District due to "the District's history of and continued signs of fiscal distress," (PX 210), and to ensure that the District provide "appropriate educational programs and services for all its students and properly manage[ ] and account[ ] for State and federal funds received," (PX 169_0001). Thereafter, and to this day, the Commissioner has continued to appoint monitors not only to oversee District finances, but also to address the educational decline, community rifts, failures of accountability, and need for planning in the District. (See PX 152; PX 156; PX 169; PX 206; PX 207; PX 208.)

37 In that same text exchange Horowitz seemed to call public school advocates "haters." (PX 88_0002.) He testified unconvincingly at trial that he was probably talking about a few individuals but did not know who they were. (Tr. at 962:16-963:12.)

38 The Court does not mean to suggest that there are no white voters in the District who support public education or that there are no minority voters whose interests correspond to those of Orthodox or Hasidic voters. But the racial polarization in voting and in the populations attending the public and private schools is so strong that the observation in the text – shared by witnesses from both communities – holds.

39 School services required under state law are called "mandated" services. For example, state law requires the District to provide busing services to private schools on certain days, called "mandated" days. The District is not required to provide private school busing on days when public school is not in session, or "nonmandated days." (See Tr. at 805:25-806:8 (Goodwin); id. at 2380:21-2384:3 (Wortham).)

40 "Frum" describes an observant Jew.

41 At trial, Plaintiffs used video clips showing portions of certain witnesses' depositions to impeach those witnesses, and the content of those videos is not reflected in the trial transcript. PX 339 contains excerpts of the deposition transcripts that correspond to those videos.

42 Ads placed in a Yiddish newspaper by a private school advocate warn of a tax hike, (see, e.g., PX 218A_0002, 0004, 0005, 0009), but this is little support for the notion that policies advocated by the candidates drove election results.

43 The outcome of the case would be the same even if Defendant had provided sufficient evidence to show that Senate Factor 2 was a wash or tilted in its favor. As noted, even if divergent voting patterns may be explained by a factor other than race, the court must still assess the totality of the circumstances and may find – as I do – that the minority citizens' inability to elect their preferred candidates is best explained by the fact that the political processes leading to the slating and election of candidates are not equally open to them. See Goosby, 956 F. Supp. at 355.

44 Bullet, or single-shot, voting refers "to a voting practice in which a voter is allowed to cast fewer than all of his or her votes." Reed, 914 F. Supp. at 849. "An anti-single-shot provision prohibits this practice" and may "force[ ] minority voters to vote for white candidates whom the minority voters may not favor, thereby increasing the vote totals of those white candidates." Id. at 849 n.2 (internal quotation marks omitted). Plaintiffs here do not allege that there is an anti-single-shot-voting practice in the District, but, as discussed below, elections for numbered posts – which the District does have – effectively "neutralize[ ] the single-shot voting strategy." Montes v. City of Yakima, 40 F. Supp. 3d 1377, 1411 (E.D. Wash. 2014).

45 In 2018, the District increased the number of polling places from ten to thirteen. Grossman solicited input on the location of the new polling places from white, private school activist Shaya Glick, who suggested two locations in overwhelmingly Orthodox Jewish neighborhoods, (Tr. at 1473:6-19), and said, "Great opportunity to help ourselves," to which Grossman responded, "Bingo," (id. at 1475:24-1476:8).

46 Slating is "a process in which some influential non-governmental organization selects and endorses a group or 'slate' of candidates, rendering the election little more than a stamp of approval for the candidates selected." Westwego Citizens for Better Gov't v. City of Westwego, 946 F.2d 1109, 1116 n.5 (5th Cir. 1991).

47 Slating group members include current and former Board members Aron Wieder, Harry Grossman and Yehuda Weissmandl, community activists Shaya Glick and Kalman Weber (who runs SERTA, an association that organizes private school voters), and influential Rabbis Yehuda Oshry, Hersh Horowitz, and the late Rabbi Beryl Rosenfeld, as discussed further below.

48 Candidates must submit nominating petitions with the signatures of 2% of the actual voters from the previous election to get on the ballot. (JPTO at 5.) While public school candidates find the process "daunting" and time consuming, (Tr. at 785:20-786:2 (Goodwin); see PX 283 ¶ 56), candidates backed by the private school slating organization could have all their signatures collected "in one morning in the synagogue," (Tr. at 2505:15-17 (Oshry)).

49 In the weeks leading up to and during trial, Rabbi Oshry went to great lengths to avoid testifying. He ignored repeated attempts by Plaintiffs to serve a subpoena ad testificandum. On February 13, 2020, Plaintiffs' agent accomplished service by alternative means ordered by the Court. (Doc. 517.) Rabbi Oshry did not appear as instructed on February 18, 19, 20, or 21. On February 20, Plaintiffs filed a motion for a finding of civil contempt, (Doc. 522), which they served, along with a new subpoena, commanding Oshry to appear on February 24. When he did not appear, the Court found him to be in contempt of court for his failure to appear and testify at trial and ordered a warrant for his arrest. The Court issued an Order indicating that Oshry would be subject to arrest by the U.S. Marshals at any time and that, should he not appear on February 26 or 27, he risked being incarcerated for some period of time pending his testimony. (See Doc. 530.) Oshry finally appeared to testify on February 27 and, accordingly, the contempt was purged and the warrant vacated. (Tr. at 2508:25-2509:12.) Oshry's defiance, along with his attempts at evasion in his testimony, betray a remarkable reluctance – shared by several other witnesses associated with the private school community – to admit the obvious existence of the slating process.

50 On the topic of slating, Grossman at times testified unconvincingly that he did not know what he was talking about in certain text messages, (see, e.g., Tr. at 1448:3-1449:21, 1458:8-12), gave glib responses, (see, e.g., id. at 1431:2-6, 1446:23-1447:7), and seemed to have a selective memory when it came to conversations he had as recently as 2019, (see id. at 1517:6-16). He and several other Board members and white witnesses associated with the private school community were not credible in their claimed lack of knowledge of the slating process, and the sometimes absurd lengths to which they went to feign ignorance suggests their understanding of how that process excludes blacks and Latinos. (See ¶ 48 above.)

51 Grossman claimed that he inaccurately conveyed Butler's message, (Tr. at 1482:20-21), but he was impeached with his deposition testimony, in which he admitted that the text accurately conveys what Butler told him to convey, (see Tr. at 1511:14-1512:2; see also PX 339 at 9), and he never explained what was supposedly inaccurate about his text.

52 "Heimishe" is a Yiddish term meaning homey, homegrown, or one of the group.

53 That year, the minority-preferred candidates in contested races – Fields, Morales, and Foskew – lost. (See Tables 1-2 above.) Charles-Pierre admitted that "if [she] didn't have the support of the majority of the white community, [she had] basically no chance to win." (Tr. at 2566:11-15.)

54 The parties did not introduce expert testimony on the 2019 election.

55 Plaintiffs made a motion for sanctions seeking an adverse inference against the District for what they argue was Defendant's failure to preserve and produce certain documents relevant to Senate Factor 4. (See Docs. 518, 521 at 1.) The motion is denied as moot, in that Plaintiffs have adduced sufficient evidence to decisively establish Senate Factor 4 without the adverse inference.

56 The testimony of Charles, NAACP of Spring Valley President Willie J. Trotman, and Grossman confirms the election futility faced by the District's black and Latino voters. Charles explained that minority voters do not turn out to vote in Board elections. (Tr. at 1818:13-16.) Trotman testified that the NAACP works to encourage minorities to vote, even though they feel that "they don't have a voice," and if "[they] can't win[,] why bother?" (Id. at 1282:14-1283:6.) Grossman texted Horowitz that public school voters "feel disempowered because they are." (PX 88_0002.)

57 Dr. Barreto analyzed the voting patterns in six of the seven races. Data for 2007 were unavailable. (PX 242A ¶ 63.)

58 As to the settlement discussions, Grossman affirmatively misled Charles-Pierre by telling her that the reason for a settlement conference was "Judge wants to talk/yell at" the Board "for not doing what N.A.A.C.P. wants." (Tr. at 2675:23-2677:1; DX 233 at 382-83.) He sent similar messages to Ashley Leveille, another black Board member, (see Doc. 553-1 ¶ 9; id. Ex. 1), who was also not included on emails about settlement proposals, (see Docs. 545-2, 553-1 ¶¶ 6-8).

59 I received this testimony not for its truth but for the fact that it was said. It is not evidence that "the rabbis" in fact said what Cintron attributed to them, but it is relevant to show that Cintron and Leveille found it entirely plausible that the white slating organization had the power to dictate who ran for what seat as well as the outcome of the election, as shown by Leveille's belief that she would lose, (see Tr. at 1779:17-18), and Cintron's apparent belief that he would win, (id. at 1778:25-1779:4 (Cintron told Leveille there was "no point" in her running); id. at 1779:21-1780:5 (Leveille observed Cintron on election day "walking around greeting everyone, smiling, happy, [and] cheerful" before results were announced, and she saw him sink into his seat and then leave after he lost)). This testimony also goes to minority election futility in that, once Leveille heard that Cintron had the support of the white slating mechanism, she believed that she would lose.

60 During discovery, Defendant invoked legislative privilege to shield testimony about the reasons for Board actions, so – while state funding and the financial crisis might explain certain Board actions to a certain extent – the Board's actual reasoning remains unknown.

61 Throughout this Decision and Order, I discuss credibility determinations with respect to each witness as appropriate. In the interest of brevity, I also find accurate and incorporate the details set forth in Part IV of Plaintiffs' Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. (Doc. 556 ¶¶ 209-216.)

62 Plaintiffs' counsel offered to waive their fees as part of a settlement. (See Doc. 553.) A defendant obviously has no obligation whatsoever to settle a case, and the Court does not hold it against Defendant in any way that it put Plaintiffs to their proof. But the failure to provide Board members of color with updated and accurate information about the case, and the false, misleading, or evasive testimony of present and former Board members and their allies at trial, reveal a disturbing win-at-all-costs attitude that suggests bad motives for adhering to the challenged voting practice.

63 As noted, before and during trial certain Board members' actions and positions taken by the District seemed to stymie resolution of this matter, but I also observed some apparently sincere attempts at agreement. In hopes that the former will not be repeated, and encouraged by the latter, the Court urges the parties to reach agreement on the proposed remedial plan if possible.

End of Document

New York Official Reports

20 N.Y.3d 586, 987 N.E.2d 621, 965 N.Y.S.2d 61, 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 02102

1 Overstock.com, Inc., Appellant

v

New York State Department of Taxation and Finance et al., Respondents.

Amazon.com, LLC, et al., Appellants

v

New York State Department of Taxation and Finance et al., Respondents.

Court of Appeals of New York
Argued February 6, 2013

Decided March 28, 2013

CITE TITLE AS: Overstock.com, Inc. v New York State Dept. of Taxation & Fin.

SUMMARY

Appeal, in the first above-entitled action, on constitutional grounds, from a stipulation of discontinuance (deemed a judgment of the Supreme Court, New York County) entered December 13, 2011. The stipulation discontinued plaintiffs' as-applied constitutional challenges to Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi). The appeal brings up for review a prior nonfinal order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the First Judicial Department, entered November 4, 2010. The Appellate Division had modified, on the law and the facts, an order of that Supreme Court (Eileen Bransten, J.), which granted defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint in an action to declare Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) unconstitutional and denied plaintiff's cross motion for summary judgment. The modification consisted of declaring that Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) is constitutional on its face and does not violate the Equal Protection Clause either on its face or as applied, and reinstating the complaint for further proceedings with regard to the claims that, as applied, the statute violates the Commerce and Due Process Clauses.

Appeal, in the second above-entitled action, on constitutional grounds, from a stipulation of discontinuance (deemed a judgment of the Supreme Court, New York County) dated February 8, 2012. The stipulation discontinued plaintiff's as-applied constitutional challenges to Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi). The appeal brings up for review a prior nonfinal order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the First Judicial Department, entered November 4, 2010. The Appellate Division had modified, on the law and the facts, a judgment of that Supreme Court (Eileen Bransten, J.; op 23 Misc 3d 418 [2009]), which granted defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint in an action to declare Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) unconstitutional and denied plaintiffs' cross motion for summary judgment. The modification consisted of declaring that Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) is constitutional on its face and does not violate the Equal 587 Protection Clause either on its face or as applied, and reinstating the complaint for further proceedings with regard to the claims that, as applied, the statute violates the Commerce and Due Process Clauses.

Amazon.com, LLC v New York State Dept. of Taxation & Fin., 81 AD3d 183, affirmed.

HEADNOTES

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Collection of Sales Tax by Out-of-State Internet Vendors—Commerce Clause

(1) Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) (the Internet tax), which subjects online vendors, without a physical presence in New York, to state sales and compensating use taxes if the vendors use in-state residents to solicit business in New York through the residents' websites, is facially valid under the Commerce Clause. The Internet tax is constitutional on its face under either standard for evaluating a facial challenge pursuant to the Commerce Clause—that there is "no set of circumstances" under which the statute would be valid, or the stricter test of whether the statute has a plainly legitimate sweep. The relevant inquiry is whether the tax is applied to an activity with a substantial nexus with the taxing state. Although an in-state physical presence is necessary, it need not be substantial, but demonstrably more than a slightest presence, and the presence requirement will be satisfied if economic activities are performed in New York by the seller's employees or on its behalf. The Internet tax statute satisfies the substantial nexus requirement, as active, in-state solicitation that produces a significant amount of revenue qualifies as demonstrably more than a slightest presence. Further, although not a dispositive factor, vendors are not required to pay the taxes out-of-pocket. Rather, they are collecting taxes that are due, which are exceedingly difficult to collect from the individual purchasers themselves, and as to which there is no risk of multiple taxation. The statutory language allows for a range of possible types of compensation, which would include flat fee arrangements, and although a substantial nexus would be lacking if New York residents were merely engaged to post passive advertisements on their websites, a vendor paying New York residents to actively solicit business in New York should shoulder the appropriate tax burden.

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Collection of Sales Tax by Out-of-State Internet Vendors—Due Process Clause

(2) Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) (the Internet tax), which subjects online vendors, without a physical presence in New York, to state sales and compensating use taxes if the vendors use in-state residents to solicit business in New York through the residents' websites, is facially valid under the Due Process Clause. An in-state physical presence is not required in order to satisfy due process. Instead, the focus is on whether a party has purposefully directed its activities toward the forum state and whether it is reasonable, based on the extent of a party's contacts with that state and the benefits derived from such access, to require it to collect taxes for that state. The Internet tax statute says that a seller "shall be presumed to be soliciting business through an independent contractor or other representative" if it enters an agreement under which a New York resident, "for a commission or other consideration, directly or indirectly refers potential customers, whether by a link on an internet website or otherwise." The statutory presumption is not 588 irrational or irrebuttable. It is rational to presume that, given the direct correlation between referrals and compensation, it is likely that residents will seek to increase their referrals by soliciting customers. More specifically, it is not unreasonable to presume that affiliated website owners residing in New York State will reach out to their New York friends, relatives and other local individuals in order to accomplish this purpose. Moreover, the agency charged with enforcing the statute has expressly acknowledged that mere advertising is beyond the scope of the provision, and it has set forth a method (contractual prohibition and annual certification) through which the retailers will be deemed to have rebutted the presumption.

RESEARCH REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Commerce §§ 20, 41, 108; Am Jur 2d, Constitutional Law §§ 965, 968; Am Jur 2d, Sales and Use Taxes §§ 8, 22–24.

McKinney's, Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi).

NY Jur 2d, Constitutional Law §§ 126, 387; NY Jur 2d, Taxation and Assessment §§ 53, 54, 73, 74, 1688, 1690.

ANNOTATION REFERENCE

Validity, construction, and application of sales, use, and utility taxes on retail transactions of Internet sellers and Internet access providers. 30 ALR6th 341.

FIND SIMILAR CASES ON WESTLAW

Database: NY-ORCS

Query: internet /4 tax & commerce /2 clause /p constitutional

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Bracewell & Giuliani LLP, New York City (Daniel S. Connolly and Rachel B. Goldman of counsel), for appellant in the first above-entitled action.
I. New York's Internet tax is facially invalid under the Commerce Clause. (Quill Corp. v North Dakota, 504 US 298; Healy v Beer Institute, 491 US 324; General Motors Corp. v Tracy, 519 US 278; Northwestern States Portland Cement Co. v Minnesota, 358 US 450; Dutchess Sanitation Serv. v Town of Plattekill, 51 NY2d 670; Wardair Canada Inc. v Florida Dept. of Revenue, 477 US 1; Hughes v Oklahoma, 441 US 322; National Bellas Hess, Inc. v Department of Revenue of Ill., 386 US 753; Oklahoma Tax Comm'n v Jefferson Lines, Inc., 514 US 175; Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v Brady, 430 US 274.) II. The Internet tax violates due process. (People v Leyva, 38 NY2d 160; Speiser v Randall, 357 US 513; 589 Bailey v Alabama, 219 US 219; Vlandis v Kline, 412 US 441; Central Sav. Bank v City of New York, 280 NY 9; Usery v Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 US 1; Heiner v Donnan, 285 US 312; Eff-Ess, Inc. v New York Edison Co., 237 App Div 315; County Court of Ulster Cty. v Allen, 442 US 140.)
Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher LLP, New York City (Randy M. Mastro and Oliver M. Olanoff of counsel), and Gibson, Dunn

& Crutcher LLP (Julian W. Poon, of the California bar, admitted pro hac vice, and Kahn A. Scolnick, of the California bar, admitted pro hac vice, of counsel) for appellants in the second above-entitled action.

I. Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) violates due process on its face. (Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v Brady, 430 US 274; Quill Corp. v North Dakota, 504 US 298; Scripto, Inc. v Carson, 362 US 207; Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v Washington State Dept. of Revenue, 483 US 232; National Bellas Hess, Inc. v Department of Revenue of Ill., 386 US 753; Miller Brothers Co. v Maryland, 347 US 340; Speiser v Randall, 357 US 513, Bailey v Alabama, 219 US 219; United States v Romano, 382 US 136; Tot v United States, 319 US 463.) II. Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) violates the Commerce Clause on its face. (Quill Corp. v North Dakota, 504 US 298; Scripto, Inc. v Carson, 362 US 207; Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v Washington State Dept. of Revenue, 483 US 232; Miller Brothers Co. v Maryland, 347 US 340; National Bellas Hess, Inc. v Department of Revenue of Ill., 386 US 753; St. Tammany Parish Tax Collector v Barnesandnoble.Com, 481 F Supp 2d 575; Matter of Orvis Co. v Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 86 NY2d 165; General Trading Co. v State Tax Comm'n of Iowa, 322 US 335; Felt & Tarrant Mfg. Co. v Gallagher, 306 US 62; American Libs. Assn. v Pataki, 969 F Supp 160.) III. The Appellate Division, First Department, applied the wrong legal standard to decide Amazon.com, LLC's and Amazon Services LLC's facial constitutional claims. (United States v Salerno, 481 US 739; Doe v City of Albuquerque, 667 F3d 1111; Washington State Grange v Washington State Republican Party, 552 US 442; Chicago v Morales, 527 US 41; Washington v Glucksberg, 521 US 702; County Court of Ulster Cty. v Allen, 442 US 140; Leary v United States, 395 US 6.) IV. Even under the "no set of circumstances" test, Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) would still be unconstitutional on its face. (Roe v Meese, 689 F Supp 344; United States v Arizona, 295 US 174; Speiser v Randall, 357 US 513; Washington State Grange v Washington State Republican Party, 552 US 442.)

Eric T. Schneiderman, Attorney General, New York City (Steven C. Wu, Barbara D. Underwood and Andrew D. Bing of 590 counsel), for respondents in the first and second above-entitled actions.

I. Facial invalidation requires proof that a statute is indisputably unconstitutional regardless of individual factual circumstances. (People v Stuart, 100 NY2d 412; Cohen v Cuomo, 19 NY3d 196; Paterson v University of State of N.Y., 14 NY2d 432; Cohen v State of New York, 94 NY2d 1; United States v Salerno, 481 US 739; Matter of Moran Towing Corp. v Urbach, 99 NY2d 443; Washington State Grange v Washington State Republican Party, 552 US 442; Matter of McGee v Korman, 70 NY2d 225; Sabri v United States, 541 US 600; Department of Taxation & Finance of N. Y. v Milhelm Attea & Bros., 512 US 61.) II. Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) complies with the dormant Commerce Clause. (Matter of Zelinsky v Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 1 NY3d 85; Matter of Moran Towing Corp. v Urbach, 99 NY2d 443; Matter of Orvis Co. v Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 86 NY2d 165; Quill Corp. v North Dakota, 504 US 298; Scripto, Inc. v Carson, 362 US 207; National Geographic Soc. v California Bd. of Equalization, 430 US 551; Standard Pressed Steel Co. v Department of Revenue of Wash., 419 US 560; Felt & Tarrant Mfg. Co. v Gallagher, 306 US 62; Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v Washington State Dept. of Revenue, 483 US 232; Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v Brady, 430 US 274.) III. Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi)'s presumption of solicitation satisfies the Due Process Clause. (Mobile, J. & K. C. R. Co. v Turnipseed, 219 US 35; Matter of Casse v New York State Racing & Wagering Bd., 70 NY2d 589; Usery v Turner Elkhorn Mining Co., 428 US 1; United States v Gainey, 380 US 63; County Court of Ulster Cty. v Allen, 442 US 140; Lavine v Milne, 424 US 577; Trump v Chu, 65 NY2d 20; Matter of Grace v New York State Tax Commn., 37 NY2d 193; Matter of 31/32 Lexington Assoc. v Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 258 AD2d 684; Matter of Orvis Co. v Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 86 NY2d 165.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Chief Judge Lippman.

Plaintiffs challenge Tax Law § 1101 (b) (8) (vi) (the Internet tax), alleging that it is unconstitutional on its face because it violates the Commerce Clause by subjecting online retailers, without a physical presence in the state, to New York sales and compensating use taxes. They also maintain that the Internet tax violates the Due Process Clause by creating an irrational, irrebuttable presumption of solicitation of business within the state. We reject *2 plaintiffs' facial challenges.

591 I.

Plaintiff Amazon.com, LLC is a limited liability company formed in Delaware; Amazon Services LLC is a limited liability company formed in Nevada (collectively Amazon). Its principal corporate offices are located in the State of Washington. Amazon is strictly an online retailer—selling its merchandise solely through the Internet—and represents that it does not maintain any offices or property in New York.

Amazon offers an "Associates Program" through which third parties agree to place links on their own websites that, when clicked, direct users to Amazon's website. The Associates are compensated on a commission basis. They receive a percentage of the revenue from sales generated when a customer clicks on the Associate's link and completes a purchase from the Amazon site. The operating agreement governing this arrangement states that the Associates are independent contractors and that there is no employment relationship between the parties. Thousands of entities enrolled in the Associates Program have provided a New York address in connection with their applications.

Plaintiff Overstock.com is a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in Utah. Overstock likewise sells its merchandise solely through the Internet and does not maintain any office, employees or property in New York. Similar to Amazon, Overstock had an "Affiliates" program through which third parties would place links for Overstock.com on their own websites.[1] When a customer clicked on the link, he or she was immediately directed to Overstock.com, and if the customer completed a purchase, the Affiliate received a commission. According to the parties' Master Agreement, the Affiliates were independent contractors without the authority to obligate or bind Overstock.

In April 2008, the legislature amended the Tax Law to include the subparagraph at issue here. In connection with the statutory definition of "vendor," the Internet tax provides that > "a person making sales of tangible personal property or services taxable under this article ('seller') shall be presumed to be soliciting business through an independent contractor or other representative if 592 the seller enters into an agreement with a resident of this state under which the resident, for a commission or other consideration, directly or indirectly refers potential customers, whether by a link on an internet website or otherwise, to the seller, if the cumulative gross receipts from sales by the seller to customers in the state who are referred to the seller by all residents with this type of an agreement with the seller is in excess of ten thousand dollars during the preceding four quarterly periods" *3 (Tax Law § 1101 [b] [8] [vi]).

The statutory presumption, however, can "be rebutted by proof that the resident with whom the seller has an agreement did not engage in any solicitation in the state on behalf of the seller that would satisfy the nexus requirement of the United States constitution during the four quarterly periods in question" (Tax Law § 1101 [b] [8] [vi]).

Shortly after the legislation was enacted, the Department of Taxation and Finance (DTF) issued a memorandum to provide taxpayer guidance on the recent amendment. The document clarified that advertising alone would not invoke the statutory presumption, but further observed that, for purposes of this statute, the placement of a link to the seller's website where the resident was compensated on the basis of completed sales deriving from that link would not be considered mere advertising (see NY St Dept of Taxation & Fin Mem No. TSB-M-08[3]S). The memorandum also explained that the statutory presumption could be rebutted through proof that the residents' only activity in New York on behalf of the seller was to provide a link to the seller's website and that the residents did not engage in any in-state solicitation directed toward potential New York customers (see NY St Dept of Taxation & Fin Mem No. TSB-M-08[3]S).

The following month, DTF issued a second memorandum, further detailing how sellers could rebut the statutory presumption. The presumption would be deemed successfully rebutted if the seller satisfied two conditions: (1) if the parties' contract prohibited the resident representative from engaging in any solicitation activities in New York State on behalf of the seller, and (2) if each resident representative submitted an annual, signed certification stating that the resident had not engaged in any of the proscribed solicitation (see NY St Dept of Taxation & Fin Mem No. TSB-M-08[3.1]S).

593 Amazon commenced this action on April 25, 2008, seeking a judgment declaring that the statute was unconstitutional both on its face and as applied. Overstock commenced its action on May 30, 2008, making essentially the same arguments and also seeking injunctive relief. Supreme Court, in separate decisions, granted DTF's motions to dismiss the complaints for failure to state a cause of action and denied plaintiffs' cross motions for summary judgment as moot, rejecting all of plaintiffs' challenges to the constitutionality of the statute (see Amazon.com LLC v New York State Dept. of Taxation & Fin., 23 Misc 3d 418 [Sup Ct, NY County 2009]).

The Appellate Division affirmed the portions of the orders that dismissed the facial challenges under the Commerce and Due Process Clauses and declared the statute constitutional on its face (81 AD3d 183 [1st Dept 2010]). However, the Court modified by reinstating the as-applied challenges, finding that further discovery was required before those claims could be determined. Plaintiffs then entered into stipulations of discontinuance withdrawing their as-applied constitutional challenges with prejudice, which were deemed the final judgments. They now appeal pursuant to CPLR 5601 (b) (1) and (d), bringing 4 up for review the prior nonfinal Appellate Division order.

II.

Having elected to forgo their as-applied challenges, plaintiffs now confront the substantial hurdle of demonstrating that the Internet tax is unconstitutional on its face. It is well settled that facial constitutional challenges are disfavored. "Legislative enactments enjoy a strong presumption of constitutionality . . . [and] parties challenging a duly enacted statute face the initial burden of demonstrating the statute's invalidity 'beyond a reasonable doubt.' Moreover, courts must avoid, if possible, interpreting a presumptively valid statute in a way that will needlessly render it unconstitutional" (LaValle v Hayden, 98 NY2d 155, 161 [2002] [citations omitted]).

(1) There is some dispute as to the appropriate standard for evaluating a facial challenge under the Commerce Clause —whether we must determine that there is "no set of circumstances" under which the statute would be valid (see Matter of Moran Towing Corp. v Urbach, 99 NY2d 443, 448 [2003], quoting United States v Salerno, 481 US 739, 745 [1987]) or apply the stricter test of whether "the statute has a plainly legitimate sweep" (see 594 Washington State Grange v Washington State Republican Party, 552 US 442, 449 [2008] [internal quotation marks and citation omitted]; Crawford v Marion County Election Bd., 553 US 181, 202 [2008]). Under either standard, however, the Internet tax is constitutional on its face.

The dormant Commerce Clause has been interpreted to prohibit states from imposing an undue tax burden on interstate commerce (see Matter of Orvis Co. v Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 86 NY2d 165, 170-171 [1995]). However, in the absence of an improper burden, entities participating in interstate commerce will not be excused from the obligation to pay their fair share of state taxes (see Orvis, 86 NY2d at 171). To that end, a state tax impacting the Commerce Clause will be upheld " '[1] when the tax is applied to an activity with a substantial nexus with the taxing State, [2] is fairly apportioned, [3] does not discriminate against interstate commerce, and [4] is fairly related to the services provided by the State' " (Moran Towing, 99 NY2d at 449, quoting Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v Brady, 430 US 274, 279 [1977]). The parties agree that the only prong at issue here is whether the statute satisfies the "substantial nexus" test.

In National Bellas Hess, Inc. v Department of Revenue of Ill. (386 US 753 [1967]), the United States Supreme Court held that a use tax could not be imposed on an out-of-state mail-order business that did not have offices, property or sales representatives in Illinois. The Court noted that it had never permitted such a tax where the seller's sole connection with its customers in the forum state was by mail or common carrier (see Bellas Hess, 386 US at 758). Rather, the Court observed that, if Illinois were permitted to impose that type of tax burden, every other taxing jurisdiction in the country could do the same, which would result in a morass of obligations to local governments (see Bellas Hess, 386 US at 759-760). 5

The Supreme Court confronted a similar issue involving a mail-order business in Quill Corp. v North Dakota (504 US 298, 314 [1992]) and considered whether the emphasis in Bellas Hess on physical presence within the state had been rendered obsolete by the Court's shift toward "more flexible balancing analyses" under the Commerce Clause. While allowing that the result might have been different if the issue was being considered for the first time, the Court retained the bright-line presence requirement articulated in Bellas Hess, recognizing the benefits provided by a clear rule that established the limits of state taxing authority (see Quill, 504 US at 311, 315).

595 The world has changed dramatically in the last two decades, and it may be that the physical presence test is outdated. An entity may now have a profound impact upon a foreign jurisdiction solely through its virtual projection via the Internet. That question, however, would be for the United States Supreme Court to consider. We are bound, and adjudicate this controversy, under the binding precedents of that Court, the ultimate arbiter of the meaning of the Commerce Clause.

Subsequent to Quill, we further explained that, although an in-state physical presence is necessary, it "need not be substantial. Rather, it must be demonstrably more than a 'slightest presence' " (Orvis, 86 NY2d at 178, quoting National Geographic Soc. v California Bd. of Equalization, 430 US 551, 556 [1977]). The presence requirement will be satisfied if economic activities are performed in New York by the seller's employees or on its behalf (see Orvis, 86 NY2d at 178).

There are clearly parallels between a mail-order business and an online retailer—both are able to conduct their operations without maintaining a physical presence in a particular state. Indeed, physical presence is not typically associated with the Internet in that many websites are designed to reach a national or even a global audience from a single server whose location is of minimal import. However, through this statute, the legislature has attached significance to the physical presence of a resident website owner. The decision to do so recognizes that, even in the Internet world, many websites are geared toward predominantly local audiences—including, for instance, radio stations, religious institutions and schools—such that the physical presence of the website owner becomes relevant to Commerce Clause analysis. Indeed, the Appellate Division record in this case contains examples of such websites urging their local constituents to support them by making purchases through their Amazon links. Essentially, through these types of affiliation agreements, a vendor is deemed to have established an in-state sales force.

Viewed in this manner the statute plainly satisfies the substantial nexus requirement. Active, in-state solicitation that produces a significant amount of revenue qualifies as "demonstrably more than a 'slightest presence' " under Orvis. Although it is not a dispositive factor, it also merits notice that vendors are not required to pay these taxes out-of-pocket. *6 Rather, they are collecting taxes that are unquestionably due, which are exceedingly difficult to collect from the individual purchasers themselves, and as to which there is no risk of multiple taxation.

596 Clearly, the statutory language allows for a range of possible types of compensation ("commission or other consideration"), which would include flat fee arrangements. However, no one disputes that a substantial nexus would be lacking if New York residents were merely engaged to post passive advertisements on their websites. The bottom line is that if a vendor is paying New York residents to actively solicit business in this state, there is no reason why that vendor should not shoulder the appropriate tax burden. We will not strain to invalidate this statute where plaintiffs have not met their burden of establishing that it is facially invalid.

III.

As explained in Quill, although Due Process and Commerce Clause challenges are "closely related," each provision "pose[s] distinct limits on the taxing powers of the States" (504 US at 305). Unlike the bright line presented by the Commerce Clause, physical presence is not required in order to satisfy due process. Instead, the focus is on whether a party has purposefully directed its activities toward the forum state and whether it is reasonable, based on the extent of a party's contacts with that state and the benefits derived from such access, to require it to collect taxes for that state (see Quill, 504 US at 307-308). Indeed, an entity "that is engaged in continuous and widespread solicitation of business within a State . . . clearly has fair warning that [its] activity may subject [it] to the jurisdiction of a foreign sovereign," even in the absence of physical presence (Quill, 504 US at 308 [internal quotation marks and citation omitted]). In this respect, we believe that a brigade of affiliated websites compensated by commission is the equivalent of "a deluge of catalogs" and "a phalanx of drummers" (Quill, 504 US at 308).

Plaintiffs argue that the Internet tax violates due process because the statutory presumption is irrational and essentially irrebuttable. In order for the presumption to be constitutionally valid, there must be "a rational connection between the facts proven and the fact presumed, and . . . a fair opportunity for the opposing party to make [a] defense" (Matter of Casse v New York State Racing & Wagering Bd., 70 NY2d 589, 595 [1987]).

(2) Here, the fact proved is that the resident is compensated for referrals that result in purchases. The fact presumed is that at least some of those residents will actively solicit other New Yorkers in order to increase their referrals and, consequently, 597 their compensation.[2] It is plainly rational to presume that, given the direct correlation between referrals and compensation, it is likely that residents will seek to increase their referrals by soliciting customers. More *7 specifically, it is not unreasonable to presume that affiliated website owners residing in New York State will reach out to their New York friends, relatives and other local individuals in order to accomplish this purpose. As noted above, the record contains examples of this type of solicitation by schools and certain other organizations.

The presumption would appear decidedly less rational if it were applied to those who receive some types of "other consideration"—i.e., those whose compensation is unrelated to actual sales. It is difficult to distinguish that arrangement from traditional advertising. Nonetheless, plaintiffs have chosen to limit our review to a facial challenge, and the fact that plaintiffs can posit a potential constitutional infirmity does not require the statute's invalidation on its face. This is particularly true where, as here, the agency charged with enforcing the statute has expressly acknowledged that mere advertising is beyond the scope of the provision.

Plaintiffs also claim that the presumption is irrebuttable because it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to prove that none of their New York affiliates is soliciting customers on the retailers' behalf. However, as noted above, DTF has set forth a method (contractual prohibition and annual certification) through which the retailers will be deemed to have rebutted the presumption. Obtaining the necessary information may impose a burden on the retailers, but inconvenience does not render the presumption irrebuttable. In addition, while not determinative, it is notable that the presumption sensibly places the burden on the retailers to provide information about the activities of their own affiliates—information that DTF would have significant difficulty uncovering on its own (see Lavine v Milne, 424 US 577, 585 [1976]).

In sum, plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate that the statute is facially unconstitutional under either the Commerce or the Due Process Clause.

Accordingly, in both cases, the judgment appealed from and the order of the Appellate Division brought up for review should be affirmed, with costs. 598

Smith, J. (dissenting). The rules that govern this case are laid down in a series of United States Supreme Court decisions and are not in dispute. Under the Commerce Clause, a state may require an out-of-state retailer to collect use tax from in-state purchasers only if the retailer has a physical presence within the state (National Bellas Hess, Inc. v Department of Revenue of Ill., 386 US 753 [1967]; Quill Corp. v North Dakota, 504 US 298, 309-319 [1992]). The solicitation of customers for the retailer by in-state sales representatives counts as a physical presence, even where the sales representatives are independent contractors (Scripto, Inc. v Carson, 362 US 207 [1960]; Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc. v Washington State Dept. of Revenue, 483 US 232, 250-251 [1987]; cf. Matter of Orvis Co. v Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 86 NY2d 165, 180 [1995]); but mere advertising by the out-of-state retailer in in-state media does not (see Quill, 504 US at 302-303 [North Dakota statute making tax obligation dependent on advertisements held invalid]). Thus, the majority correctly summarizes the law by saying that "if New York residents were merely *8 engaged to post passive advertisements on their websites" no tax could be collected, but that a vendor who "is paying New York residents to actively solicit business in this state" may be required to remit tax (majority op at 596).

Our task here is to decide whether certain New York-based websites—Overstock's "Affiliates" and Amazon's "Associates"—are the equivalent of sales agents, soliciting business for Overstock and Amazon, or are only media in which Overstock and Amazon advertise their products. I think they are the latter.

The Overstock and Amazon links that appear on websites owned by New York proprietors serve essentially the same function as advertising that a more traditional out-of-state retailer might place in local newspapers. The websites are not soliciting customers for Overstock and Amazon in the fashion of a local sales agent. Of course the website owners solicit business for themselves; they encourage people to visit their websites, just as a newspaper owner would seek to boost circulation. But there is no basis for inferring that they are actively soliciting for the out-of-state retailers.

It does not make sense to envision a website owner trying to persuade members of the public, as a sales agent would, that Overstock and Amazon are high quality merchants that the public should want to do business with: persuasion of that sort 599 does the website owner no good. A traditional sales agent—say, a vacuum cleaner salesman—would promote a particular brand of vacuum cleaner so that customers would order the product through him and he would get a commission. But no website owner promotes Overstock or Amazon for a similar reason, because everyone who wants to buy from either of those firms can go to the retailer's website directly. It is true, as the majority mentions (majority op at 595), that certain kinds of website owners—churches and schools, for example—may ask their supporters to show their loyalty by using the website when they buy from Amazon, but that is not the same as soliciting business that Amazon would not otherwise get. In any event, a rule applicable to websites generally cannot be justified on the basis of the special characteristics of volunteer-supported organizations.

The statute at issue here tries to turn advertising media into an in-state sales force through a presumption. The statute says that a seller "shall be presumed to be soliciting business through an independent contractor or other representative" if it enters an agreement under which a New York resident "for a commission or other consideration, directly or indirectly refers potential customers, whether by a link on an internet website or otherwise" (Tax Law § 1101 [b] [8] [vi]). But of course a statutory presumption cannot by itself permit a state to do what the United States Constitution forbids. To presume that every website that has an agreement under which it carries an Overstock or Amazon link is a sales agent for Overstock or Amazon would be to nullify the rule that advertising in in-state media is not the equivalent of physical presence.

Read literally, the statute would reach essentially all Internet advertising that links *9 to a seller's website: it includes any agreement for referral of customers, by a link or otherwise, "for a commission or other consideration." Since this literal reading would unquestionably render the statute unconstitutional, the Department of Taxation and Finance has adopted a narrowing construction, largely ignoring the words "or other consideration," and applying the presumption only where the website receives a commission or similar compensation—i.e., where "the consideration for placing the link on the Web site is based on the volume of completed sales generated by the link" (NY St Dept of Taxation & Fin Mem No. TSB-M-08[3]S at 2). The narrowing construction, in my view, does not save the statute.

It was no doubt true before the Internet existed that advertising was usually sold for a flat fee, while sales agents usually 600 worked on commission, but that has changed. When an advertisement takes the form of a link on a website, it is easy, as well as efficient, for the advertiser to compensate the website on the basis of results. But the link is still only an ad. It seems quite unlikely, and the record contains no evidence, that compensation "based on the volume of completed sales" is an unusual way of charging for web advertising, or that such compensation is primarily associated with active solicitation on the seller's behalf by the website owner.

A number of tests have been stated for deciding the validity of a statutory presumption. In People v Leyva (38 NY2d 160, 165-166 [1975]), we described certain United States Supreme Court cases as requiring "a rational connection between the facts which are proved and the one which is to be inferred with the aid of the presumption" (see Tot v United States, 319 US 463, 467-468 [1943]; United States v Romano, 382 US 136, 139-141 [1965]), and others as requiring a "substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend" (Leary v United States, 395 US 6, 36 [1969]). New York, according to the Leyva case, "has exacted an even higher standard of rational connection," one that "must assure 'a reasonably high degree of probability' that the presumed fact follows from those proved directly" (38 NY2d at 166, quoting People v McCaleb, 25 NY2d 394, 404 [1969]).

I do not think it necessary to decide here what test should apply to a presumption enacted by a state for the purpose of expanding its own power over interstate transactions (though I would think it should be a relatively demanding one); whatever the test is, this statute fails. To infer, from an agreement to put a link on a website and to compensate the website owner in proportion to the resulting sales, that the website owner is actively soliciting business for the seller "is so strained as not to have a reasonable relation to the circumstances of life as we know them" (Tot v United States, 319 US at 468).

I would therefore hold that the statute challenged in this litigation is invalid under the Commerce Clause.

Judges Graffeo, Read and Pigott concur with Chief Judge Lippman; Judge Smith dissents in an opinion; Judge Rivera taking no part.

In each case: Judgment appealed from and order of the Appellate Division brought up for review affirmed, with costs.

FOOTNOTES

Footnotes

1 Overstock suspended its Affiliates program (for those who provided a New York address) shortly after the enactment of the Internet tax at issue here.

2 The presumption only applies in the first instance to a company that has sold at least $10,000 in products or services as the result of such referrals.

End of Document

127 S.Ct. 2738
Supreme Court of the United States

PARENTS INVOLVED IN COMMUNITY SCHOOLS, Petitioner,

v.

SEATTLE SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1 et al.

Crystal D. Meredith, custodial parent and next friend of Joshua Ryan McDonald, Petitioner,

v.

Jefferson County Board of Education et al.

Nos. 05–908, 05–915.
|
Argued Dec. 4, 2006.
|
Decided June 28, 2007.

Synopsis

Background: Parents brought action against school district challenging, under Equal Protection Clause, student assignment plan that relied on racial classification to allocate slots in oversubscribed high schools. The United States District Court for the District of Washington, Barbara Jacobs Rothstein, J., 137 F.Supp.2d 1224, entered summary judgment for school district, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, on rehearing en banc, ultimately affirmed, 426 F.3d 1162. In separate action, another parent brought similar suit against school board that used racial classification in student assignment plan for elementary school assignments and transfer requests. The United States District Court for the Western District of Kentucky, John G. Heyburn II, Chief Judge, 330 F.Supp.2d 834, upheld assignment plan, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, 416 F.3d 513, affirmed. The Supreme Court granted certiorari in both cases.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Chief Justice Roberts, held that:

[1] parents had standing;

[2] allegedly compelling interest of diversity in higher education could not justify districts' use of racial classifications in student assignment plans, abrogating Comfort v. Lynn School Comm., 418 F.3d 1; and

[3] districts failed to show that use of racial classifications in their student assignment plans was necessary to achieve their stated goal of racial diversity.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice Thomas filed concurring opinion.

Justice Kennedy concurred in part, concurred in the judgment, and filed opinion.

Justice Stevens filed dissenting opinion.

Justice Breyer filed dissenting opinion in which Justices Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg joined.

West Headnotes (15)

[1] Constitutional Law Education
Declaratory Judgment Subjects of relief in general

Parents of elementary school, middle school, and high school students had standing to challenge, under Equal Protection Clause, school district's use of racial classification in student assignment plan that relied on racial classification to allocate slots in oversubscribed high schools, despite claim that whether students would be affected by policy was speculative; complaint sought declaratory and injunctive relief on behalf of parents whose elementary and middle school children might be denied admission to particular high schools in the future and also asserted an interest in not being forced to compete for seats at certain high schools in a system that used race as a deciding factor in many of its admissions decisions. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

33 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Constitutional Law Race, National Origin, or Ethnicity

One form of injury under the Equal Protection Clause is being forced to compete in a race-based system that may prejudice the plaintiff. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

23 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Constitutional Law Education

Constitutional Law Mootness

School district's alleged cessation of student assignment plan that relied on racial classification, pending outcome of litigation that challenged plan under the Equal Protection Clause, did not render such litigation moot, or negate plaintiff parents' standing, where district vigorously defended constitutionality of its race-based program and nowhere suggested that, if litigation was resolved in its favor, it would not resume using race to assign students. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

35 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Federal Courts Voluntary cessation of challenged conduct

Voluntary cessation of challenged conduct does not moot a case or controversy unless subsequent events make it absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur.

108 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Federal Courts Particular Cases, Contexts, and Questions

Although student whose parent challenged school board's student assignment plan, under Equal Protection Clause, had been granted a transfer to the school to which transfer was denied under board's racial guidelines, Supreme Court retained jurisdiction to consider parent's challenge to plan, because racial guidelines applied at all grade levels, such that, upon student's enrollment in middle school, he might again be subject to assignment based on his race, and parent sought damages in her complaint. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Constitutional Law Race, national origin, or ethnicity

When the government distributes burdens or benefits on the basis of individual racial classifications, that action, when challenged under the Equal Protection Clause, is reviewed under strict scrutiny; racial classifications are simply too pernicious to permit any but the most exact connection between justification and classification. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

50 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Constitutional Law Assignment and transfer of students

In order to satisfy searching standard of review applicable to individual racial classifications challenged under the Equal Protection Clause, school districts that used such classifications in their student assignment plans had to demonstrate that the use of racial classifications was narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

69 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Constitutional Law Assignment and transfer of students

Education School location; districts and attendance zones

Education Freedom of choice; transfer

Any interest in remedying effects of past intentional discrimination could not serve as compelling interest justifying school board's use of racial classification in student assignment plan for elementary school assignments and transfer requests, which was challenged under the Equal Protection Clause, where, although district's schools were previously segregated by law and then subject to desegregation decree, decree had since been dissolved upon finding that district had achieved unitary status. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

25 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Constitutional Law Assignment and transfer of students

Education School location; districts and attendance zones

Education Freedom of choice; transfer

Allegedly compelling interest of diversity in higher education could not justify school districts' use of racial classifications in student assignment plans for elementary schools, transfer requests, and high schools, under Equal Protection Clause, as race was not considered by the districts as part of a broader effort to achieve exposure to widely diverse people, cultures, ideas, and viewpoints, but could sometimes be determinative standing alone, and plans employed only limited notion of diversity; abrogating, Comfort v. Lynn School Comm., 418 F.3d 1. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

23 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Constitutional Law Assignment and transfer of students

Education Desegregation plans in general

School districts' use of racial classifications in their student assignment plans, which were challenged under the Equal Protection Clause, were not narrowly tailored to their asserted goal of fostering educational and broader socialization benefits through a racially diverse learning environment, particularly where level of racial diversity sought by each plan was tied specifically to each district's racial demographics, not any particular pedagogic concept, and thus was directed only to impermissible goal of racial balance. (Per Chief Justice Roberts, with three Justices joining and one Justice concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

20 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Constitutional Law Assignment and transfer of students

Education Desegregation plans in general

School districts failed to show that use of racial classifications in their student assignment plans, which was challenged under the Equal Protection Clause, was necessary to achieve their stated goal of racial diversity, in view of minimal effect that classifications actually had on student assignments, and districts also failed to show that they considered methods other than explicit racial classifications to achieve their stated goals. U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

19 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Courts Dicta

Supreme Court is not bound to follow its dicta in a prior case in which the point presently at issue was not fully debated. (Per Chief Justice Roberts, with three Justices joining and one Justice concurring in the judgment.)

12 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Constitutional Law Persons or Entities Protected

The Equal Protection Clause protects persons, not groups. (Per Chief Justice Roberts, with three Justices joining and one Justice concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[14] Constitutional Law Education

Education Desegregation plans in general

Simply because school districts may seek a worthy goal does not mean they are free to discriminate on the basis of race to achieve it, or that their racial classifications should be subject to less exacting scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause. (Per Chief Justice Roberts, with three Justices joining and one Justice concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

24 Cases that cite this headnote

[15] Constitutional Law Equal protection
Constitutional Law Assignment and transfer of students

Judicial deference toward local school boards on issue of using racial classifications in student assignment plans is fundamentally at odds with equal protection jurisprudence, and burden is on state actors to demonstrate that their race-based policies are justified. (Per Chief Justice Roberts, with three Justices joining and one Justice concurring in the judgment.) U.S.C.A. Const.Amend. 14.

10 Cases that cite this headnote

*2740 701 Syllabus[*]

Respondent school districts voluntarily adopted student assignment plans that rely on race to determine which schools certain children may attend. The Seattle district, which has never operated legally segregated schools or been subject to court-ordered desegregation, classified children as white or nonwhite, and used *2741 the racial classifications as a "tiebreaker" to allocate slots in particular high schools. The Jefferson County, Ky., district was subject to a desegregation decree until 2000, when the District Court dissolved the decree after finding that the district had eliminated the vestiges of prior segregation to the greatest extent practicable. In 2001, the district adopted its plan classifying students as black or "other" in order to make certain elementary school assignments and to rule on transfer requests.

Petitioners, an organization of Seattle parents (Parents Involved) and the mother of a Jefferson County student (Joshua), whose children were or could be assigned under the foregoing plans, filed these suits contending, inter alia, that allocating children to different public schools based solely on their race violates the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection guarantee. In the Seattle case, the District Court granted the school district summary judgment, finding, inter alia, that its plan survived strict scrutiny on the federal constitutional claim because it was narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest. The Ninth Circuit affirmed. In the Jefferson County case, the District Court found that the school district had asserted a compelling interest in maintaining racially diverse schools, and that its plan was, in all relevant respects, narrowly tailored to serve that interest. The Sixth Circuit affirmed.

Held: The judgments are reversed, and the cases are remanded.

No. 05–908, 426 F.3d 1162; No. 05–915, 416 F.3d 513, reversed and remanded.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III–A, and III–C, concluding:

702 1. The Court has jurisdiction in these cases. Seattle argues that Parents Involved lacks standing because its current members' claimed injuries are not imminent and are too speculative in that, even if the district maintains its current plan and reinstitutes the racial tiebreaker, those members will only be affected if their children seek to enroll in a high school that is oversubscribed and integration positive. This argument is unavailing; the group's members have children in all levels of the district's schools, and the complaint sought declaratory and injunctive relief on behalf of members whose elementary and middle school children may be denied admission to the high schools of their choice in the future. The fact that those children may not be denied such admission based on their race because of undersubscription or oversubscription that benefits them does not eliminate the injury claimed. The group also asserted an interest in not being forced to compete in a race-based system that might prejudice its members' children, an actionable form of injury under the Equal Protection Clause, see, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 211, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158. The fact that Seattle has ceased using the racial tiebreaker pending the outcome here is not dispositive, since the district vigorously defends its program's constitutionality, and nowhere suggests that it will not resume using race to assign students if it prevails. See Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 189, 120 S.Ct. 693, 145 L.Ed.2d 610. Similarly, the fact that Joshua has been granted a transfer does not eliminate the Court's jurisdiction; Jefferson County's racial guidelines apply at all grade levels and he may again be subject to race-based assignment in middle school. Pp. 2750 – 2751.

2. The school districts have not carried their heavy burden of showing that the interest they seek to achieve justifies the extreme means they have chosen— *2742 discriminating among individual students based on race by relying upon racial classifications in making school assignments. Pp. 2751 – 2755, 2759 – 2761.

(a) Because "racial classifications are simply too pernicious to permit any but the most exact connection between justification and classification," Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 537, 100 S.Ct. 2758, 65 L.Ed.2d 902 (STEVENS, J., dissenting), governmental distributions of burdens or benefits based on individual racial classifications are reviewed under strict scrutiny, e.g., Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 505–506, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949. Thus, the school districts must demonstrate that their use of such classifications is "narrowly tailored" to achieve a "compelling" government interest. Adarand, supra, at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097.

Although remedying the effects of past intentional discrimination is a compelling interest under the strict scrutiny test, see Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 494, 112 S.Ct. 1430, 118 L.Ed.2d 108, that interest is not involved here because the 703 Seattle schools were never segregated by law nor subject to court-ordered desegregation, and the desegregation decree to which the Jefferson County schools were previously subject has been dissolved. Moreover, these cases are not governed by Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 328, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304, in which the Court held that, for strict scrutiny purposes, a government interest in student body diversity "in the context of higher education" is compelling. That interest was not focused on race alone but encompassed "all factors that may contribute to student body diversity," id., at 337, 123 S.Ct. 2325, including, e.g., having "overcome personal adversity and family hardship," id., at 338, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Quoting Justice Powell's articulation of diversity in Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 314–315, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750, the Grutter Court noted that " 'it is not an interest in simple ethnic diversity, in which a specified percentage of the student body is in effect guaranteed to be members of selected ethnic groups,' that can justify the use of race," 539 U.S., at 324–325, 123 S.Ct. 2325, but " 'a far broader array of qualifications and characteristics of which racial or ethnic origin is but a single though important element,' " id., at 325, 123 S.Ct. 2325. In the present cases, by contrast, race is not considered as part of a broader effort to achieve "exposure to widely diverse people, cultures, ideas, and viewpoints," id., at 330, 123 S.Ct. 2325; race, for some students, is determinative standing alone. The districts argue that other factors, such as student preferences, affect assignment decisions under their plans, but under each plan when race comes into play, it is decisive by itself. It is not simply one factor weighed with others in reaching a decision, as in Grutter ; it is the factor. See Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 275, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257. Even as to race, the plans here employ only a limited notion of diversity, viewing race exclusively in white/nonwhite terms in Seattle and black/"other" terms in Jefferson County. The Grutter Court expressly limited its holding—defining a specific type of broad-based diversity and noting the unique context of higher education—but these limitations were largely disregarded by the lower courts in extending Grutter to the sort of classifications at issue here. Pp. 2751 – 2755.

(b) Despite the districts' assertion that they employed individual racial classifications in a way necessary to achieve their stated ends, the minimal effect these classifications have on student assignments suggests that other means would be effective. Seattle's racial tiebreaker results, in the end, only in shifting a small number of students between schools. Similarly, Jefferson *2743 County admits that its use of racial classifications has had a minimal effect, and claims only that its guidelines provide a firm definition of the goal of racially integrated schools, thereby providing administrators with authority to collaborate with principals and staff to maintain schools within the desired range. Classifying and assigning schoolchildren according to a binary conception of 704 race is an extreme approach in light of this Court's precedents and the Nation's history of using race in public schools, and requires more than such an amorphous end to justify it. In Grutter, in contrast, the consideration of race was viewed as indispensable in more than tripling minority representation at the law school there at issue. See 539 U.S., at 320, 123 S.Ct. 2325. While the Court does not suggest that greater use of race would be preferable, the minimal impact of the districts' racial classifications on school enrollment casts doubt on the necessity of using such classifications. The districts have also failed to show they considered methods other than explicit racial classifications to achieve their stated goals. Narrow tailoring requires "serious, good faith consideration of workable race-neutral alternatives," id., at 339, 123 S.Ct. 2325, and yet in Seattle several alternative assignment plans—many of which would not have used express racial classifications—were rejected with little or no consideration. Jefferson County has failed to present any evidence that it considered alternatives, even though the district already claims that its goals are achieved primarily through means other than the racial classifications. Pp. 2759 – 2761.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE, joined by Justice SCALIA, Justice THOMAS, and Justice ALITO, concluded for additional reasons in Parts III–B and IV that the plans at issue are unconstitutional under this Court's precedents. Pp. 2754 – 2759, 2761 – 2768.

1. The Court need not resolve the parties' dispute over whether racial diversity in schools has a marked impact on test scores and other objective yardsticks or achieves intangible socialization benefits because it is clear that the racial classifications at issue are not narrowly tailored to the asserted goal. In design and operation, the plans are directed only to racial balance, an objective this Court has repeatedly condemned as illegitimate. They are tied to each district's specific racial demographics, rather than to any pedagogic concept of the level of diversity needed to obtain the asserted educational benefits. Whatever those demographics happen to be drives the required "diversity" number in each district. The districts offer no evidence that the level of racial diversity necessary to achieve the asserted educational benefits happens to coincide with the racial demographics of the respective districts, or rather the districts' white/nonwhite or black/"other" balance, since that is the only diversity addressed by the plans. In Grutter, the number of minority students the school sought to admit was an undefined "meaningful number" necessary to achieve a genuinely diverse student body, 539 U.S., at 316, 335–336, 123 S.Ct. 2325, and the Court concluded that the law school did not count back from its applicant pool to arrive at that number, id., at 335–336, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Here, in contrast, the schools worked backward to achieve a 705 particular type of racial balance, rather than working forward from some demonstration of the level of diversity that provides the purported benefits. This is a fatal flaw under the Court's existing precedent. See, e.g., Freeman, 503 U.S., at 494, 112 S.Ct. 1430. Accepting racial balancing as a compelling state interest would justify imposing racial proportionality throughout American society, contrary to the Court's repeated admonitions *2744 that this is unconstitutional. While the school districts use various verbal formulations to describe the interest they seek to promote—racial diversity, avoidance of racial isolation, racial integration—they offer no definition suggesting that their interest differs from racial balancing. Pp. 2754 – 2759.

2. If the need for the racial classifications embraced by the school districts is unclear, even on the districts' own terms, the costs are undeniable. Government action dividing people by race is inherently suspect because such classifications promote "notions of racial inferiority and lead to a politics of racial hostility," Richmond v. J.A. Croson, Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493, 109 S.Ct. 706, "reinforce the belief, held by too many for too much of our history, that individuals should be judged by the color of their skin," Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511, and "endorse race-based reasoning and the conception of a Nation divided into racial blocs, thus contributing to an escalation of racial hostility and conflict," Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547, 603, 110 S.Ct. 2997, 111 L.Ed.2d 445 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). When it comes to using race to assign children to schools, history will be heard. In Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873, the Court held that segregation deprived black children of equal educational opportunities regardless of whether school facilities and other tangible factors were equal, because the classification and separation themselves denoted inferiority. Id., at 493–494, 74 S.Ct. 686. It was not the inequality of the facilities but the fact of legally separating children based on race on which the Court relied to find a constitutional violation in that case. Id., at 494, 74 S.Ct. 686. The districts here invoke the ultimate goal of those who filed Brown and subsequent cases to support their argument, but the argument of the plaintiff in Brown was that the Equal Protection Clause "prevents states from according differential treatment to American children on the basis of their color or race," and that view prevailed—this Court ruled in its remedial opinion that Brown required school districts "to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis." Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 300–301, 75 S.Ct. 753, 99 L.Ed. 1083 (emphasis added). Pp. 2761 – 2768.

Justice KENNEDY agreed that the Court has jurisdiction to decide these cases and that respondents' student assignment plans are not narrowly tailored to achieve the compelling goal of diversity properly defined, but concluded that some parts of the plurality opinion imply an 706 unyielding insistence that race cannot be a factor in instances when it may be taken into account. Pp. 2788 – 2797.

(a) As part of its burden of proving that racial classifications are narrowly tailored to further compelling interests, the government must establish, in detail, how decisions based on an individual student's race are made in a challenged program. The Jefferson County Board of Education fails to meet this threshold mandate when it concedes it denied Joshua's requested kindergarten transfer on the basis of his race under its guidelines, yet also maintains that the guidelines do not apply to kindergartners. This discrepancy is not some simple and straightforward error that touches only upon the peripheries of the district's use of individual racial classifications. As becomes clearer when the district's plan is further considered, Jefferson County has explained how and when it employs these classifications only in terms so broad and imprecise that they cannot withstand strict scrutiny. In its briefing it fails to make clear—even in the limited respects implicated by Joshua's initial assignment and transfer denial—whether in *2745 fact it relies on racial classifications in a manner narrowly tailored to the interest in question, rather than in the far-reaching, inconsistent, and ad hoc manner that a less forgiving reading of the record would suggest. When a court subjects governmental action to strict scrutiny, it cannot construe ambiguities in favor of the government. In the Seattle case, the school district has gone further in describing the methods and criteria used to determine assignment decisions based on individual racial classifications, but it has nevertheless failed to explain why, in a district composed of a diversity of races, with only a minority of the students classified as "white," it has employed the crude racial categories of "white" and "non-white" as the basis for its assignment decisions. Far from being narrowly tailored, this system threatens to defeat its own ends, and the district has provided no convincing explanation for its design. Pp. 2788 – 2791.

(b) The plurality opinion is too dismissive of government's legitimate interest in ensuring that all people have equal opportunity regardless of their race. In administering public schools, it is permissible to consider the schools' racial makeup and adopt general policies to encourage a diverse student body, one aspect of which is its racial composition. Cf. Grutter v. Bollinger, supra. School authorities concerned that their student bodies' racial compositions interfere with offering an equal educational opportunity to all are free to devise race-conscious measures to address the problem in a general way and without treating each student in different fashion based solely on a systematic, individual typing by race. Such measures may include strategic site selection of new schools; drawing attendance zones with general recognition of neighborhood 707 demographics; allocating resources for special programs; recruiting students and faculty in a targeted fashion; and tracking enrollments, performance, and other statistics by race.

Each respondent has failed to provide the necessary support for the proposition that there is no other way than individual racial classifications to avoid racial isolation in their school districts. Cf. Croson, supra, at 501, 109 S.Ct. 706, 102 L.Ed.2d 854. In these cases, the fact that the number of students whose assignment depends on express racial classifications is small suggests that the schools could have achieved their stated ends through different means, including the facially race-neutral means set forth above or, if necessary, a more nuanced, individual evaluation of school needs and student characteristics that might include race as a component. The latter approach would be informed by Grutter, though the criteria relevant to student placement would differ based on the students' age, the parents' needs, and the schools' role. Pp. 2791 – 2793.

ROBERTS, C. J., announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III–A, and III–C, in which SCALIA, KENNEDY, THOMAS, and ALITO, JJ., joined, and an opinion with respect to Parts III–B and IV, in which SCALIA, THOMAS, and ALITO, JJ., joined. THOMAS, J., filed a concurring opinion, post, p. 2768. KENNEDY, J., filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, post, p. 2788. STEVENS, J., filed a dissenting opinion, post, p. 2797. BREYER, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which STEVENS, SOUTER, and GINSBURG, JJ., joined, post, p. 2800.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Harry J.F. Korrell, for Petitioner.

Paul D. Clement, for United States as amicus curiae, by special leave of the Court, supporting the Petitioner.

*2746 Michael F. Madden, for Respondents.

Harry J. F. Korrell, Daniel B. Ritter, Eric B. Martin, Davis Wright Tremaine LLP, Seattle, WA, for Petitioner.

Maree F. Sneed, John W. Borkowski, Audrey J. Anderson, Hogan & Hartson L.L.P., Washington, D.C., Michael Madden, Carol Sue Janes, Bennett Bigelow & Leedom P.S., Seattle, WA, Gary L. Ikeda, Shannon McMinimee, Seattle, WA, Eric Schnapper, Seattle, WA, for Respondents.

Teddy B. Gordon, Louisville, Kentucky, for Petitioner.

Rosemary Miller, Louisville, KY, Francis J. Mellen, Jr, Byron E. Leet Wyatt, Tarrant & Combs, LLP, Louisville, KY, for Respondents.

Opinion

Chief Justice ROBERTS announced the judgment of the Court, and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III–A, and III–C, and an opinion with respect to Parts III–B and IV, in which Justice SCALIA, Justice THOMAS, and Justice ALITO join.

709 The school districts in these cases voluntarily adopted student assignment plans that rely upon race to determine 710 which public schools certain children may attend. The Seattle school district classifies children as white or nonwhite; the Jefferson County school district as black or "other." In Seattle, this racial classification is used to allocate slots in oversubscribed high schools. In Jefferson County, it is used to make certain elementary school assignments and to rule on transfer requests. In each case, the school district relies upon an individual student's race in assigning that student to a particular school, so that the racial balance at the school falls within a predetermined range based on the racial composition of the school district as a whole. Parents of students denied assignment to particular schools under these 711 plans solely because of their race brought suit, contending that allocating children to different public schools on the basis of race violated the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee of equal protection. The Courts of Appeals below upheld the plans. We granted certiorari, and now reverse.

I

Both cases present the same underlying legal question—whether a public school that had not operated legally segregated schools or has been found to be unitary may choose to classify students by race and rely upon that classification in making school assignments. Although we examine the plans under the same legal framework, the specifics of the two plans, and the circumstances surrounding their adoption, are in some respects quite different.

A

Seattle School District No. 1 operates 10 regular public high schools. In 1998, it adopted the plan at issue in this case for assigning students to these schools. App. in No. 05–908, pp. 90a–92a.[1] The plan *2747 allows incoming ninth graders to choose from among any of the district's high schools, ranking however many schools they wish in order of preference.

Some schools are more popular than others. If too many students list the same school as their first choice, the district employs a series of "tiebreakers" to determine who will fill the open slots at the oversubscribed school. The first tiebreaker selects for admission students who have a sibling 712 currently enrolled in the chosen school. The next tiebreaker depends upon the racial composition of the particular school and the race of the individual student. In the district's public schools approximately 41 percent of enrolled students are white; the remaining 59 percent, comprising all other racial groups, are classified by Seattle for assignment purposes as nonwhite. Id., at 38a, 103a.[2] If an oversubscribed school is not within 10 percentage points of the district's overall white/nonwhite racial balance, it is what the district calls "integration positive," and the district employs a tiebreaker that selects for assignment students whose race "will serve to bring the school into balance." Id., at 38a. See Parents Involved VII, 426 F.3d 1162, 1169–1170 (C.A.9 2005) (en banc).[3] If it is still necessary to select students for the school after using the racial tiebreaker, the next tiebreaker is the geographic proximity of the school to the student's residence. App. in No. 05–908, at 38a.

Seattle has never operated segregated schools—legally separate schools for students of different races—nor has it ever been subject to court-ordered desegregation. It nonetheless employs the racial tiebreaker in an attempt to address the effects of racially identifiable housing patterns on school assignments. Most white students live in the northern part of Seattle, most students of other racial backgrounds in the southern part. Parents Involved VII, supra, at 1166. Four of Seattle's high schools are located in the north—Ballard, Nathan Hale, Ingraham, and Roosevelt—and five in the south—Rainier Beach, Cleveland, West Seattle, 713 Chief Sealth, and Franklin. One school—Garfield—is more or less in the center of Seattle. App. in No. 05–908, at 38a–39a, 45a.

For the 2000–2001 school year, five of these schools were oversubscribed—Ballard, Nathan Hale, Roosevelt, Garfield, and Franklin—so much so that 82 percent of incoming ninth graders ranked one of these schools as their first choice. Id., at 38a. Three of the oversubscribed schools were "integration positive" because the school's white enrollment the previous school year was greater than 51 percent—Ballard, Nathan Hale, and Roosevelt. Thus, more nonwhite students (107, 27, and 82, respectively) who selected one of these three schools as a top choice received placement at the school than would have been the case had race not been considered, and proximity been the next tiebreaker. Id., at 39a–40a. Franklin was *2748 "integration positive" because its nonwhite enrollment the previous school year was greater than 69 percent; 89 more white students were assigned to Franklin by operation of the racial tiebreaker in the 2000–2001 school year than otherwise would have been. Ibid. Garfield was the only oversubscribed school whose composition during the 1999–2000 school year was within the racial guidelines, although in previous years Garfield's enrollment had been predominantly nonwhite, and the racial tiebreaker had been used to give preference to white students. Id., at 39a.

Petitioner Parents Involved in Community Schools (Parents Involved) is a nonprofit corporation comprising the parents of children who have been or may be denied assignment to their chosen high school in the district because of their race. The concerns of Parents Involved are illustrated by Jill Kurfirst, who sought to enroll her ninth-grade son, Andy Meeks, in Ballard High School's special Biotechnology Career Academy. Andy suffered from attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and dyslexia, but had made good progress with hands-on instruction, and his mother and middle school teachers thought that the smaller biotechnology program 714 held the most promise for his continued success. Andy was accepted into this selective program but, because of the racial tiebreaker, was denied assignment to Ballard High School. Id., at 143a–146a, 152a–160a. Parents Involved commenced this suit in the Western District of Washington, alleging that Seattle's use of race in assignments violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,[4] Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964,[5] and the Washington Civil Rights Act.[6] Id., at 28a–35a.

The District Court granted summary judgment to the school district, finding that state law did not bar the district's use of the racial tiebreaker and that the plan survived strict scrutiny on the federal constitutional claim because it was narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest. 137 F.Supp.2d 1224, 1240 (W.D.Wash.2001) (Parents Involved I). The Ninth Circuit initially reversed based on its interpretation of the Washington Civil Rights Act, 285 F.3d 1236, 1253 (2002) (Parents Involved II), and enjoined the district's use of the integration tiebreaker, id., at 1257. Upon realizing that the litigation would not be resolved in time for assignment decisions for the 2002–2003 school year, the Ninth Circuit withdrew its opinion, 294 F.3d 1084 (2002) (Parents Involved III), vacated the injunction, and, pursuant to Wash. Rev.Code § 2.60.020 (2006), certified the state-law question to the Washington Supreme Court, 294 F.3d 1085, 1087 (2002) (Parents Involved IV).

715 The Washington Supreme Court determined that the State Civil Rights Act bars only preferential treatment programs "where race or gender is used by government to select a less qualified applicant over a more qualified applicant," and not "[p]rograms which are racially neutral, such as the [district's] open choice plan." *2749 Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist., No. 1, 149 Wash.2d 660, 689–690, 663, 72 P.3d 151, 166, 153 (2003) (en banc) (Parents Involved V). The state court returned the case to the Ninth Circuit for further proceedings. Id., at 690, 72 P.3d, at 167.

A panel of the Ninth Circuit then again reversed the District Court, this time ruling on the federal constitutional question. Parents Involved VI, 377 F.3d 949 (2004). The panel determined that while achieving racial diversity and avoiding racial isolation are compelling government interests, id., at 964, Seattle's use of the racial tiebreaker was not narrowly tailored to achieve these interests, id., at 980. The Ninth Circuit granted rehearing en banc, 395 F.3d 1168 (2005), and overruled the panel decision, affirming the District Court's determination that Seattle's plan was narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest, Parents Involved VII, 426 F.3d, at 1192–1193. We granted certiorari. 547 U.S. 1177, 126 S.Ct. 2351, 165 L.Ed.2d 277 (2006).

B

Jefferson County Public Schools operates the public school system in metropolitan Louisville, Kentucky. In 1973 a federal court found that Jefferson County had maintained a segregated school system, Newburg Area Council, Inc. v. Board of Ed. of Jefferson Cty., 489 F.2d 925, 932 (CA6), vacated and remanded, 418 U.S. 918, 94 S.Ct. 3208, 3209, 41 L.Ed.2d 1160, reinstated with modifications, 510 F.2d 1358, 1359 (C.A.6 1974), and in 1975 the District Court entered a desegregation decree. See Hampton v. Jefferson Cty. Bd. of Ed., 72 F.Supp.2d 753, 762–764 (W.D.Ky.1999). Jefferson County operated under this decree until 2000, when the District Court dissolved the decree after 716 finding that the district had achieved unitary status by eliminating "[t]o the greatest extent practicable" the vestiges of its prior policy of segregation. Hampton v. Jefferson Cty. Bd. of Ed., 102 F.Supp.2d 358, 360 (2000). See Board of Ed. of Oklahoma City Public Schools v. Dowell, 498 U.S. 237, 249–250, 111 S.Ct. 630, 112 L.Ed.2d 715 (1991); Green v. School Bd. of New Kent Cty., 391 U.S. 430, 435–436, 88 S.Ct. 1689, 20 L.Ed.2d 716 (1968).

In 2001, after the decree had been dissolved, Jefferson County adopted the voluntary student assignment plan at issue in this case. App. in No. 05–915, p. 77. Approximately 34 percent of the district's 97,000 students are black; most of the remaining 66 percent are white. McFarland v. Jefferson Cty. Public Schools, 330 F.Supp.2d 834, 839–840, and n. 6 (W.D.Ky.2004) (McFarland I). The plan requires all nonmagnet schools to maintain a minimum black enrollment of 15 percent, and a maximum black enrollment of 50 percent. App. in No. 05–915, at 81; McFarland I, supra, at 842.

At the elementary school level, based on his or her address, each student is designated a "resides" school to which students within a specific geographic area are assigned; elementary resides schools are "grouped into clusters in order to facilitate integration." App. in No. 05–915, at 82. The district assigns students to nonmagnet schools in one of two ways: Parents of kindergartners, first graders, and students new to the district may submit an application indicating a first and second choice among the schools within their cluster; students who do not submit such an application are assigned within the cluster by the district. "Decisions to assign students to schools within each cluster are based on available space within the schools and the racial guidelines in the District's current student assignment plan." Id., at 38. If a school has reached the "extremes of the *2750 racial guidelines," a student whose race would contribute to the school's racial imbalance will not be assigned there. Id., at 38–39, 82. After assignment, students at all grade levels 717 are permitted to apply to transfer between nonmagnet schools in the district. Transfers may be requested for any number of reasons, and may be denied because of lack of available space or on the basis of the racial guidelines. Id., at 43.[7]

When petitioner Crystal Meredith moved into the school district in August 2002, she sought to enroll her son, Joshua McDonald, in kindergarten for the 2002–2003 school year. His resides school was only a mile from his new home, but it had no available space—assignments had been made in May, and the class was full. Jefferson County assigned Joshua to another elementary school in his cluster, Young Elementary. This school was 10 miles from home, and Meredith sought to transfer Joshua to a school in a different cluster, Bloom Elementary, which—like his resides school—was only a mile from home. See Tr. in McFarland I, pp. 1–49 through 1–54 (Dec. 8, 2003). Space was available at Bloom, and intercluster transfers are allowed, but Joshua's transfer was nonetheless denied because, in the words of Jefferson County, "[t]he transfer would have an adverse effect on desegregation compliance" of Young. App. in No. 05–915, at 97.[8]

Meredith brought suit in the Western District of Kentucky, alleging violations of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The District Court found that Jefferson County had asserted a compelling interest in maintaining 718 racially diverse schools, and that the assignment plan was (in all relevant respects) narrowly tailored to serve that compelling interest. McFarland I, supra, at 837.[9] The Sixth Circuit affirmed in a per curiam opinion relying upon the reasoning of the District Court, concluding that a written opinion "would serve no useful purpose." McFarland v. Jefferson Cty. Public Schools, 416 F.3d 513, 514 (2005) (McFarland II). We granted certiorari. 547 U.S. 1178, 126 S.Ct. 2351, 165 L.Ed.2d 277 (2006).

II

[1] As a threshold matter, we must assure ourselves of our jurisdiction. Seattle argues that Parents Involved lacks standing because none of its current members can claim an imminent injury. Even if the district maintains the current plan and reinstitutes the racial tiebreaker, Seattle argues, Parents Involved members will only be affected if their children seek to enroll in a Seattle public high school and choose an oversubscribed school that is integration positive—too speculative a *2751 harm to maintain standing. Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, pp. 16–17.

[2] This argument is unavailing. The group's members have children in the district's elementary, middle, and high schools, App. in No. 05–908, at 299a–301a; Affidavit of Kathleen Brose Pursuant to this Court's Rule 32.3 (Lodging of Petitioner Parents Involved), and the complaint sought declaratory and injunctive relief on behalf of Parents Involved members whose elementary and middle school children may be "denied admission to the high schools of their choice when they apply for those schools in the future," App. in No. 05–908, at 30a. The fact that it is possible that children of group members will not be denied admission to a school 719 based on their race—because they choose an undersubscribed school or an oversubscribed school in which their race is an advantage—does not eliminate the injury claimed. Moreover, Parents Involved also asserted an interest in not being "forced to compete for seats at certain high schools in a system that uses race as a deciding factor in many of its admissions decisions." Ibid. As we have held, one form of injury under the Equal Protection Clause is being forced to compete in a race-based system that may prejudice the plaintiff, Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 211, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995); Northeastern Fla. Chapter, Associated Gen. Contractors of America v. Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656, 666, 113 S.Ct. 2297, 124 L.Ed.2d 586 (1993), an injury that the members of Parents Involved can validly claim on behalf of their children.

[3] [4] In challenging standing, Seattle also notes that it has ceased using the racial tiebreaker pending the outcome of this litigation. Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, at 16–17. But the district vigorously defends the constitutionality of its race-based program, and nowhere suggests that if this litigation is resolved in its favor it will not resume using race to assign students. Voluntary cessation does not moot a case or controversy unless "subsequent events ma[ke] it absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur," Friends of Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 189, 120 S.Ct. 693, 145 L.Ed.2d 610 (2000) (quoting United States v. Concentrated Phosphate Export Assn., Inc., 393 U.S. 199, 203, 89 S.Ct. 361, 21 L.Ed.2d 344 (1968); internal quotation marks omitted), a heavy burden that Seattle has clearly not met.

[5] Jefferson County does not challenge our jurisdiction, Tr. of Oral Arg. in No. 05–915, p. 48, but we are nonetheless obliged to ensure that it exists, Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 514, 126 S.Ct. 1235, 163 L.Ed.2d 1097 (2006). Although apparently Joshua has now been granted a transfer to Bloom, the school to which transfer was denied under the racial guidelines, Tr. of Oral Arg. in No. 05–915, at 45, the racial guidelines apply at all grade 720 levels. Upon Joshua's enrollment in middle school, he may again be subject to assignment based on his race. In addition, Meredith sought damages in her complaint, which is sufficient to preserve our ability to consider the question. Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 109, 103 S.Ct. 1660, 75 L.Ed.2d 675 (1983).

III

A

[6] [7] It is well established that when the government distributes burdens or benefits on the basis of individual racial classifications, that action is reviewed under strict scrutiny. Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 505–506, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949 (2005); *2752 Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003); Adarand, supra, at 224, 115 S.Ct. 2097. As the Court recently reaffirmed, " 'racial classifications are simply too pernicious to permit any but the most exact connection between justification and classification.' " Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 270, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257 (2003) (quoting Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 537, 100 S.Ct. 2758, 65 L.Ed.2d 902 (1980) (STEVENS, J., dissenting); brackets omitted). In order to satisfy this searching standard of review, the school districts must demonstrate that the use of individual racial classifications in the assignment plans here under review is "narrowly tailored" to achieve a "compelling" government interest. Adarand, supra, at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097.

[8] Without attempting in these cases to set forth all the interests a school district might assert, it suffices to note that our prior cases, in evaluating the use of racial classifications in the school context, have recognized two interests that qualify as compelling. The first is the compelling interest of remedying the effects of past intentional discrimination. See Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 494, 112 S.Ct. 1430, 118 L.Ed.2d 108 (1992). Yet the Seattle public schools have not shown that they were ever segregated by law, and were not subject to court-ordered desegregation decrees. The Jefferson County public schools were previously segregated by law and were subject to a desegregation decree entered in 1975. In 2000, the District Court that entered that decree dissolved it, finding that Jefferson 721 County had "eliminated the vestiges associated with the former policy of segregation and its pernicious effects," and thus had achieved "unitary" status. Hampton, 102 F.Supp.2d, at 360. Jefferson County accordingly does not rely upon an interest in remedying the effects of past intentional discrimination in defending its present use of race in assigning students. See Tr. of Oral Arg. in No. 05–915, at 38.

Nor could it. We have emphasized that the harm being remedied by mandatory desegregation plans is the harm that is traceable to segregation, and that "the Constitution is not violated by racial imbalance in the schools, without more." Milliken v. Bradley, 433 U.S. 267, 280, n. 14, 97 S.Ct. 2749, 53 L.Ed.2d 745 (1977). See also Freeman, supra, at 495–496, 112 S.Ct. 1430; Dowell, 498 U.S., at 248, 111 S.Ct. 630; Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 746, 94 S.Ct. 3112, 41 L.Ed.2d 1069 (1974). Once Jefferson County achieved unitary status, it had remedied the constitutional wrong that allowed race-based assignments. Any continued use of race must be justified on some other basis.[10]

*2753 722 The second government interest we have recognized as compelling for purposes of strict scrutiny is the interest in diversity in higher education upheld in Grutter, 539 U.S., at 328, 123 S.Ct. 2325. The specific interest found compelling in Grutter was student body diversity "in the context of higher education." Ibid. The diversity interest was not focused on race alone but encompassed "all factors that may contribute to student body diversity." Id., at 337, 123 S.Ct. 2325. We described the various types of diversity that the law school sought:

> "[The law school's] policy makes clear there are many possible bases for diversity admissions, and provides examples of admittees who have lived or traveled widely abroad, are fluent in several languages, have overcome personal adversity and family hardship, have exceptional records of extensive community service, and have had successful careers in other fields." Id., at 338, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (brackets and internal quotation marks omitted).

The Court quoted the articulation of diversity from Justice Powell's opinion in Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978), noting that "it is not an interest in simple ethnic diversity, in which a specified percentage of the student body is in effect guaranteed to be members of selected ethnic groups, that can justify the use of race." Grutter, supra, at 324–325, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (citing and quoting Bakke, supra, at 314–315, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.); brackets and internal quotation marks omitted). Instead, what was upheld in Grutter was consideration of "a far broader array of qualifications and characteristics of which racial or ethnic origin is but a single though important element." 539 U.S., at 325, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (quoting Bakke, supra, at 315, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.); internal quotation marks omitted).

The entire gist of the analysis in Grutter was that the admissions program at issue there focused on each applicant as an individual, and not simply as a member of a particular racial group. The classification of applicants by race upheld 723 in Grutter was only as part of a "highly individualized, holistic review," 539 U.S., at 337, 123 S.Ct. 2325. As the Court explained, "[t]he importance of this individualized consideration in the context of a race-conscious admissions program is paramount." Ibid. The point of the narrow tailoring analysis in which the Grutter Court engaged was to ensure that the use of racial classifications was indeed part of a broader assessment of diversity, and not simply an effort to achieve racial balance, which the Court explained would be "patently unconstitutional." Id., at 330, 123 S.Ct. 2325.

[9] In the present cases, by contrast, race is not considered as part of a broader effort to achieve "exposure to widely diverse people, cultures, ideas, and viewpoints," ibid.; race, for some students, is determinative standing alone. The districts argue that other factors, such as student preferences, affect assignment decisions under their plans, but under each plan when race comes into play, it is decisive by itself. It is not simply one factor weighed with others in reaching a decision, as in Grutter ; it is the factor. Like the University of Michigan undergraduate plan struck down in Gratz, 539 U.S., at 275, 123 S.Ct. 2411, the plans here "do not *2754 provide for a meaningful individualized review of applicants" but instead rely on racial classifications in a "nonindividualized, mechanical" way, id., at 276, 280, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

Even when it comes to race, the plans here employ only a limited notion of diversity, viewing race exclusively in white/nonwhite terms in Seattle and black/"other" terms in Jefferson County.[11] But see Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547, 610, 110 S.Ct. 2997, 111 L.Ed.2d 445 (1990) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("We are a Nation not of black and white alone, but one teeming with divergent 724 communities knitted together by various traditions and carried forth, above all, by individuals"). The Seattle "Board Statement Reaffirming Diversity Rationale" speaks of the "inherent educational value" in "[p]roviding students the opportunity to attend schools with diverse student enrollment," App. in No. 05–908, at 128a, 129a. But under the Seattle plan, a school with 50 percent Asian–American students and 50 percent white students but no African–American, Native–American, or Latino students would qualify as balanced, while a school with 30 percent Asian–American, 25 percent African–American, 25 percent Latino, and 20 percent white students would not. It is hard to understand how a plan that could allow these results can be viewed as being concerned with achieving enrollment that is " 'broadly diverse,' " Grutter, supra, at 329, 123 S.Ct. 2325.

Prior to Grutter, the courts of appeals rejected as unconstitutional attempts to implement race-based assignment plans—such as the plans at issue here—in primary and secondary schools. See, e.g., Eisenberg v. Montgomery Cty. Public Schools, 197 F.3d 123, 133 (C.A.4 1999); Tuttle v. Arlington Cty. School Bd., 195 F.3d 698, 701 (C.A.4 1999) (per curiam); Wessmann v. Gittens, 160 F.3d 790, 809 (C.A.1 1998). See also Ho v. San Francisco Unified School Dist., 147 F.3d 854, 865 (C.A.9 1998). After Grutter, however, the two Courts of Appeals in these cases, and one other, found that race-based assignments were permissible at the elementary and secondary level, largely in reliance on that case. See Parents Involved VII, 426 F.3d, at 1166; McFarland II, 416 F.3d, at 514; Comfort v. Lynn School Comm., 418 F.3d 1, 13 (C.A.1 2005) (en banc).

In upholding the admissions plan in Grutter, though, this Court relied upon considerations unique to institutions of higher education, noting that in light of "the expansive freedoms of speech and thought associated with the university environment, universities occupy a special niche in our constitutional tradition." 539 U.S., at 329, 123 S.Ct. 2325. See also 725 Bakke, 438 U.S., at 312, 313, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.). The Court explained that "[c]ontext matters" in applying strict scrutiny, and repeatedly noted that it was addressing the use of race "in the context of higher education." Grutter, supra, at 327, 328, 334, 123 S.Ct. 2325. The Court in Grutter expressly articulated key limitations on its holding—defining a specific type of broad-based diversity and noting the unique context of higher education—but these limitations were largely disregarded by the lower courts in extending Grutter to uphold race-based assignments in elementary and secondary schools. The present cases are not governed by Grutter.

*2755 B

[10] Perhaps recognizing that reliance on Grutter cannot sustain their plans, both school districts assert additional interests, distinct from the interest upheld in Grutter, to justify their race-based assignments. In briefing and argument before this Court, Seattle contends that its use of race helps to reduce racial concentration in schools and to ensure that racially concentrated housing patterns do not prevent nonwhite students from having access to the most desirable schools. Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, at 19. Jefferson County has articulated a similar goal, phrasing its interest in terms of educating its students "in a racially integrated environment." App. in No. 05–915, at 22.[12] Each school district argues that educational and broader socialization benefits flow from a racially diverse learning environment, and each contends that because the diversity they seek 726 is racial diversity—not the broader diversity at issue in Grutter—it makes sense to promote that interest directly by relying on race alone.

The parties and their amici dispute whether racial diversity in schools in fact has a marked impact on test scores and other objective yardsticks or achieves intangible socialization benefits. The debate is not one we need to resolve, however, because it is clear that the racial classifications employed by the districts are not narrowly tailored to the goal of achieving the educational and social benefits asserted to flow from racial diversity. In design and operation, the plans are directed only to racial balance, pure and simple, an objective this Court has repeatedly condemned as illegitimate.

The plans are tied to each district's specific racial demographics, rather than to any pedagogic concept of the level of diversity needed to obtain the asserted educational benefits. In Seattle, the district seeks white enrollment of between 31 and 51 percent (within 10 percent of "the district white average" of 41 percent), and nonwhite enrollment of between 49 and 69 percent (within 10 percent of "the district minority average" of 59 percent). App. in No. 05–908, at 103a. In Jefferson County, by contrast, the district seeks black enrollment of no less than 15 or more than 50 percent, a range designed to be "equally above and below Black student enrollment systemwide," McFarland I, 330 F.Supp.2d, at 842, based on the objective of achieving at "all schools ... an African–American enrollment equivalent to the average district-wide African–American enrollment" of 34 percent, App. in No. 05–915, at 81. In Seattle, then, the benefits of racial diversity require enrollment of at least 31 percent white students; in Jefferson County, at least 50 percent. There must be at least 15 percent nonwhite students under Jefferson County's plan; in Seattle, more than three times that figure. This comparison makes clear that the racial demographics in each district—whatever they happen to be— 727 drive the required "diversity" numbers. The plans here are not tailored to achieving a degree of diversity necessary to realize the asserted educational benefits; instead the plans are tailored, in the words of Seattle's Manager *2756 of Enrollment Planning, Technical Support, and Demographics, to "the goal established by the school board of attaining a level of diversity within the schools that approximates the district's overall demographics." App. in No. 05–908, at 42a.

The districts offer no evidence that the level of racial diversity necessary to achieve the asserted educational benefits happens to coincide with the racial demographics of the respective school districts—or rather the white/nonwhite or black/"other" balance of the districts, since that is the only diversity addressed by the plans. Indeed, in its brief Seattle simply assumes that the educational benefits track the racial breakdown of the district. See Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, at 36 ("For Seattle, 'racial balance' is clearly not an end in itself but rather a measure of the extent to which the educational goals the plan was designed to foster are likely to be achieved"). When asked for "a range of percentage that would be diverse," however, Seattle's expert said it was important to have "sufficient numbers so as to avoid students feeling any kind of specter of exceptionality." App. in No. 05–908, at 276a. The district did not attempt to defend the proposition that anything outside its range posed the "specter of exceptionality." Nor did it demonstrate in any way how the educational and social benefits of racial diversity or avoidance of racial isolation are more likely to be achieved at a school that is 50 percent white and 50 percent Asian–American, which would qualify as diverse under Seattle's plan, than at a school that is 30 percent Asian–American, 25 percent African–American, 25 percent Latino, and 20 percent white, which under Seattle's definition would be racially concentrated.

Similarly, Jefferson County's expert referred to the importance of having "at least 20 percent" minority group representation 728 for the group "to be visible enough to make a difference," and noted that "small isolated minority groups in a school are not likely to have a strong effect on the overall school." App. in No. 05–915, at 159, 147. The Jefferson County plan, however, is based on a goal of replicating at each school "an African–American enrollment equivalent to the average district-wide African–American enrollment." Id., at 81. Joshua McDonald's requested transfer was denied because his race was listed as "other" rather than black, and allowing the transfer would have had an adverse effect on the racial guideline compliance of Young Elementary, the school he sought to leave. Id., at 21. At the time, however, Young Elementary was 46.8 percent black. Id., at 73. The transfer might have had an adverse effect on the effort to approach districtwide racial proportionality at Young, but it had nothing to do with preventing either the black or "other" group from becoming "small" or "isolated" at Young.

In fact, in each case the extreme measure of relying on race in assignments is unnecessary to achieve the stated goals, even as defined by the districts. For example, at Franklin High School in Seattle, the racial tiebreaker was applied because nonwhite enrollment exceeded 69 percent, and resulted in an incoming ninth-grade class in 2000–2001 that was 30.3 percent Asian–American, 21.9 percent African–American, 6.8 percent Latino, 0.5 percent Native–American, and 40.5 percent Caucasian. Without the racial tiebreaker, the class would have been 39.6 percent Asian–American, 30.2 percent African–American, 8.3 percent Latino, 1.1 percent Native–American, and 20.8 percent Caucasian. See App. in No. 05–908, at 308a. When the actual racial breakdown is considered, enrolling students without regard to their *2757 race yields a substantially diverse student body under any definition of diversity.[13]

729 In Grutter, the number of minority students the school sought to admit was an undefined "meaningful number" necessary to achieve a genuinely diverse student body. 539 U.S., at 316, 335–336, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Although the matter was the subject of disagreement on the Court, see id., at 346–347, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (SCALIA, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); id., at 382–383, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (Rehnquist, C. J., dissenting); id., at 388–392, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting), the majority concluded that the law school did not count back from its applicant pool to arrive at the "meaningful number" it regarded as necessary to diversify its student body. Id., at 335–336, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Here the racial balance the districts seek is a defined range set solely by reference to the demographics of the respective school districts.

This working backward to achieve a particular type of racial balance, rather than working forward from some demonstration of the level of diversity that provides the purported benefits, is a fatal flaw under our existing precedent. We have many times over reaffirmed that "[r]acial balance is not 730 to be achieved for its own sake." Freeman, 503 U.S., at 494, 112 S.Ct. 1430. See also Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 507, 109 S.Ct. 706, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989); Bakke, 438 U.S., at 307, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.) ("If petitioner's purpose is to assure within its student body some specified percentage of a particular group merely because of its race or ethnic origin, such a preferential purpose must be rejected ... as facially invalid"). Grutter itself reiterated that "outright racial balancing" is "patently unconstitutional." 539 U.S., at 330, 123 S.Ct. 2325.

Accepting racial balancing as a compelling state interest would justify the imposition of racial proportionality throughout American society, contrary to our repeated recognition that "[a]t the heart of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that the Government must treat citizens as individuals, not as simply components of a racial, religious, sexual or national class." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 911, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (quoting Metro Broadcasting, 497 U.S., at 602, 110 S.Ct. 2997 (O'Connor, J., dissenting); internal quotation *2758 marks omitted).[14] Allowing racial balancing as a compelling end in itself would "effectively assur[e] that race will always be relevant in American life, and that the 'ultimate goal' of 'eliminating entirely from governmental decisionmaking such irrelevant factors as a human being's race' will never be achieved." Croson, supra, at 495, 109 S.Ct. 706 (plurality opinion of O'Connor, J.) (quoting Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 320, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (STEVENS, J., dissenting), in turn quoting 731 Fullilove, 448 U.S., at 547, 100 S.Ct. 2758 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); brackets and citation omitted). An interest "linked to nothing other than proportional representation of various races ... would support indefinite use of racial classifications, employed first to obtain the appropriate mixture of racial views and then to ensure that the [program] continues to reflect that mixture." Metro Broadcasting, supra, at 614, 110 S.Ct. 2997 (O'Connor, J., dissenting).

The validity of our concern that racial balancing has "no logical stopping point," Croson, supra, at 498, 109 S.Ct. 706 (quoting Wygant, supra, at 275, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion); internal quotation marks omitted); see also Grutter, supra, at 343, 123 S.Ct. 2325, is demonstrated here by the degree to which the districts tie their racial guidelines to their demographics. As the districts' demographics shift, so too will their definition of racial diversity. See App. in No. 05–908, at 103a (describing application of racial tiebreaker based on "current white percentage" of 41 percent and "current minority percentage" of 59 percent (emphasis added)).

The Ninth Circuit below stated that it "share[d] in the hope" expressed in Grutter that in 25 years racial preferences would no longer be necessary to further the interest identified in that case. Parents Involved VII, 426 F.3d, at 1192. But in Seattle the plans are defended as necessary to address the consequences of racially identifiable housing patterns. The sweep of the mandate claimed by the district is contrary to our rulings that remedying past societal discrimination does not justify race-conscious government action. See, e.g., Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 909–910, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) ("[A]n effort to alleviate the effects of societal discrimination is not a compelling interest"); Croson, supra, at 498–499, 109 S.Ct. 706; Wygant, 476 U.S., at 276, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion) ("Societal discrimination, without more, is too amorphous a basis for imposing a racially classified remedy"); id., at 288, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) ("[A] governmental agency's interest in remedying 'societal' discrimination,that 732 is, discrimination not traceable to its own actions, cannot be deemed sufficiently compelling to pass constitutional muster").

The principle that racial balancing is not permitted is one of substance, not semantics. Racial balancing is not transformed from "patently unconstitutional" to a compelling state interest simply by relabeling it "racial diversity." While the school districts use various verbal formulations to *2759 describe the interest they seek to promote—racial diversity, avoidance of racial isolation, racial integration—they offer no definition of the interest that suggests it differs from racial balance. See, e.g., App. in No. 05–908, at 257a ("Q. What's your understanding of when a school suffers from racial isolation?" "A. I don't have a definition for that"); id., at 228a–229a ("I don't think we've ever sat down and said, 'Define racially concentrated school exactly on point in quantitative terms.' I don't think we've ever had that conversation"); Tr. in McFarland I, at 1–90 (Dec. 8, 2003) ("Q." "How does the Jefferson County School Board define diversity ... ?" "A. Well, we want to have the schools that make up the percentage of students of the population").

Jefferson County phrases its interest as "racial integration," but integration certainly does not require the sort of racial proportionality reflected in its plan. Even in the context of mandatory desegregation, we have stressed that racial proportionality is not required, see Milliken, 433 U.S., at 280, n. 14, 97 S.Ct. 2749 ("[A desegregation] order contemplating the substantive constitutional right [to a] particular degree of racial balance or mixing is ... infirm as a matter of law" (internal quotation marks omitted)); Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 24, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971) ("The constitutional command to desegregate schools does not mean that every school in every community must always reflect the racial composition of the school system as a whole"), and here Jefferson County has already been found to have eliminated the vestiges of its prior segregated school system.

733 The en banc Ninth Circuit declared that "when a racially diverse school system is the goal (or racial concentration or isolation is the problem), there is no more effective means than a consideration of race to achieve the solution." Parents Involved VII, supra, at 1191. For the foregoing reasons, this conclusory argument cannot sustain the plans. However closely related race-based assignments may be to achieving racial balance, that itself cannot be the goal, whether labeled "racial diversity" or anything else. To the extent the objective is sufficient diversity so that students see fellow students as individuals rather than solely as members of a racial group, using means that treat students solely as members of a racial group is fundamentally at cross-purposes with that end.

C

[11] The districts assert, as they must, that the way in which they have employed individual racial classifications is necessary to achieve their stated ends. The minimal effect these classifications have on student assignments, however, suggests that other means would be effective. Seattle's racial tiebreaker results, in the end, only in shifting a small number of students between schools. Approximately 307 student assignments were affected by the racial tiebreaker in 2000–2001; the district was able to track the enrollment status of 293 of these students. App. in No. 05–908, at 162a. Of these, 209 were assigned to a school that was one of their choices, 87 of whom were assigned to the same school to which they would have been assigned without the racial tiebreaker. Eighty-four students were assigned to schools that they did not list as a choice, but 29 of those students would have been assigned to their respective school without the racial tiebreaker, and 3 were able to attend one of the oversubscribed schools due to waitlist and capacity adjustments. Id., at 162a–163a. In over one-third of the assignments affected by the racial tiebreaker, then, the use of race in the end made no *2760 difference, and the district could identify 734 only 52 students who were ultimately affected adversely by the racial tiebreaker in that it resulted in assignment to a school they had not listed as a preference and to which they would not otherwise have been assigned.

As the panel majority in Parents Involved VI concluded:

> "[T]he tiebreaker's annual effect is thus merely to shuffle a few handfuls of different minority students between a few schools—about a dozen additional Latinos into Ballard, a dozen black students into Nathan Hale, perhaps two dozen Asians into Roosevelt, and so on. The District has not met its burden of proving these marginal changes ... outweigh the cost of subjecting hundreds of students to disparate treatment based solely upon the color of their skin." 377 F.3d, at 984–985.

Similarly, Jefferson County's use of racial classifications has only a minimal effect on the assignment of students. Elementary school students are assigned to their first- or second-choice school 95 percent of the time, and transfers, which account for roughly 5 percent of assignments, are only denied 35 percent of the time—and presumably an even smaller percentage are denied on the basis of the racial guidelines, given that other factors may lead to a denial. McFarland I, 330 F.Supp.2d, at 844–845, nn. 16, 18. Jefferson County estimates that the racial guidelines account for only 3 percent of assignments. Brief in Opposition in No. 05–915, p. 7, n. 4; Tr. of Oral Arg. in No. 05–915, at 46. As Jefferson County explains, "the racial guidelines have minimal impact in this process, because they 'mostly influence student assignment in subtle and indirect ways.' " Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, pp. 8–9.

While we do not suggest that greater use of race would be preferable, the minimal impact of the districts' racial classifications on school enrollment casts doubt on the necessity of using racial classifications. In Grutter, the consideration of race was viewed as indispensable in more than tripling minority 735 representation at the law school —from 4 to 14.5 percent. See 539 U.S., at 320, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Here the most Jefferson County itself claims is that "because the guidelines provide a firm definition of the Board's goal of racially integrated schools, they 'provide administrators with the authority to facilitate, negotiate and collaborate with principals and staff to maintain schools within the 15–50% range.' " Brief in Opposition in No. 05–915, at 7 (quoting McFarland I, supra, at 842). Classifying and assigning schoolchildren according to a binary conception of race is an extreme approach in light of our precedents and our Nation's history of using race in public schools, and requires more than such an amorphous end to justify it.

The districts have also failed to show that they considered methods other than explicit racial classifications to achieve their stated goals. Narrow tailoring requires "serious, good faith consideration of workable race-neutral alternatives," Grutter, supra, at 339, 123 S.Ct. 2325, and yet in Seattle several alternative assignment plans—many of which would not have used express racial classifications—were rejected with little or no consideration. See, e.g., App. in No. 05–908, at 224a–225a, 253a–259a, 307a. Jefferson County has failed to present any evidence that it considered alternatives, even though the district already claims that its goals are achieved primarily through means other than the racial classifications. Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, at 8–9. Cf. Croson, 488 U.S., at 519, 109 S.Ct. 706 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and *2761 concurring in judgment) (racial classifications permitted only "as a last resort").

IV

Justice BREYER's dissent takes a different approach to these cases, one that fails to ground the result it would reach in law. Instead, it selectively relies on inapplicable precedent and even dicta while dismissing contrary holdings, alters and misapplies our well-established legal framework for assessing equal protection challenges to express racial classifications, 736 and greatly exaggerates the consequences of today's decision.

To begin with, Justice BREYER seeks to justify the plans at issue under our precedents recognizing the compelling interest in remedying past intentional discrimination. See post, at 2809 – 2813. Not even the school districts go this far, and for good reason. The distinction between segregation by state action and racial imbalance caused by other factors has been central to our jurisprudence in this area for generations. See, e.g., Milliken, 433 U.S., at 280, n. 14, 97 S.Ct. 2749; Freeman, 503 U.S., at 495–496, 112 S.Ct. 1430 ("Where resegregation is a product not of state action but of private choices, it does not have constitutional implications"). The dissent elides this distinction between de jure and de facto segregation, casually intimates that Seattle's school attendance patterns reflect illegal segregation, post, at 2802, 2809 – 2810, 2812,[15] and fails to credit the judicial determination—under the most rigorous standard—that Jefferson County had eliminated the vestiges of prior segregation. The dissent thus alters in fundamental ways not only the facts presented here but the established law.

Justice BREYER's reliance on McDaniel v. Barresi, 402 U.S. 39, 91 S.Ct. 1287, 28 L.Ed.2d 582 (1971), post, at 2812 – 2813, 2815 – 2816, highlights how far removed the discussion in the dissent is from the question actually presented in these cases. McDaniel concerned a Georgia school system that had been segregated by law. There was no doubt that the county had operated a "dual school 737 system," 402 U.S., at 41, 91 S.Ct. 1287, and no one questions that the obligation to disestablish a school system segregated by law can include race-conscious remedies—whether or not a court had issued an order to that effect. See supra, at 2806. The present cases are before us, however, because the Seattle school district was never segregated by law, and the Jefferson County district has been found to be unitary, having eliminated the vestiges of its prior dual status. The justification for race-conscious remedies in McDaniel is therefore not applicable here. The dissent's persistent refusal to accept this distinction —its insistence on viewing the racial classifications here as if they were just like the ones in McDaniel, "devised to overcome a history of segregated public schools," post, at 2825 – 2826—explains its inability to understand why the remedial justification for racial classifications cannot decide these cases.

*2762 [12] Justice BREYER's dissent next relies heavily on dicta from Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S., at 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267—far more heavily than the school districts themselves. Compare post, at 2801, 2811 – 2815, with Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, at 19–20; Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, at 31. The dissent acknowledges that the two-sentence discussion in Swann was pure dicta, post, at 2811 – 2812, but nonetheless asserts that it demonstrates a "basic principle of constitutional law" that provides "authoritative legal guidance," post, at 2811 – 2812, 2816. Initially, as the Court explained just last Term, "we are not bound to follow our dicta in a prior case in which the point now at issue was not fully debated." Central Va. Community College v. Katz, 546 U.S. 356, 363, 126 S.Ct. 990, 163 L.Ed.2d 945 (2006). That is particularly true given that, when Swann was decided, this Court had not yet confirmed that strict scrutiny applies to racial classifications like those before us. See n. 16, infra. There is nothing "technical" or "theoretical," post, at 2816, about our approach to such dicta. See, e.g., Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 399–400, 5 L.Ed. 257 (1821) (Marshall, C.J.) (explaining why dicta is not binding).

738 Justice BREYER would not only put such extraordinary weight on admitted dicta, but relies on the statement for something it does not remotely say. Swann addresses only a possible state objective; it says nothing of the permissible means—race conscious or otherwise—that a school district might employ to achieve that objective. The reason for this omission is clear enough, since the case did not involve any voluntary means adopted by a school district. The dissent's characterization of Swann as recognizing that "the Equal Protection Clause permits local school boards to use race-conscious criteria to achieve positive race-related goals" is—at best—a dubious inference. Post, at 2811–2812. Even if the dicta from Swann were entitled to the weight the dissent would give it, and no dicta is, it not only did not address the question presented in Swann, it also does not address the question presented in these cases—whether the school districts' use of racial classifications to achieve their stated goals is permissible.

Further, for all the lower court cases Justice BREYER cites as evidence of the "prevailing legal assumption," post, at 2813, embodied by Swann, very few are pertinent. Most are not. For example, the dissent features Tometz v. Board of Ed., Waukegan City School Dist. No. 61, 39 Ill.2d 593, 597–598, 237 N.E.2d 498, 501 (1968), as evidence that "state and federal courts had considered the matter settled and uncontroversial." Post, at 2813. But Tometz addressed a challenge to a statute requiring race-consciousness in drawing school attendance boundaries—an issue well beyond the scope of the question presented in these cases. Importantly, it considered that issue only under rational-basis review, 39 Ill.2d, at 600, 237 N.E.2d, at 502 ("The test of any legislative classification essentially is one of reasonableness"), which even the dissent grudgingly recognizes is an improper standard for evaluating express racial classifications. Other cases cited are similarly inapplicable. See, e.g., 739 Citizens for Better Ed. v. Goose Creek Consol. Independent School Dist., 719 S.W.2d 350, 352–353 (Tex.App.1986) (upholding rezoning plan under rational-basis review).[16]

*2763 Justice BREYER's dissent next looks for authority to a footnote in 740 Washington v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 472, n. 15, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896 (1982), post, at 2830 – 2831, but there this Court expressly noted that it was not passing on the propriety of race-conscious student assignments in the absence of a finding of de jure segregation. Similarly, the citation of Crawford v. Board of Ed. of Los Angeles, 458 U.S. 527, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 73 L.Ed.2d 948 (1982), post, at 2813, in which a state referendum prohibiting a race-based assignment plan was challenged, is inapposite—in Crawford the Court again expressly reserved the question presented by these cases. 458 U.S., at 535, n. 11, 102 S.Ct. 3211. Such reservations and preliminary analyses of course did not decide the merits of this question—as evidenced by the disagreement among the lower courts on this issue. Compare Eisenberg, 197 F.3d, at 133, with Comfort, 418 F.3d, at 13.

Justice BREYER's dissent also asserts that these cases are controlled by Grutter, claiming that the existence of a compelling interest in these cases "follows a fortiori " from Grutter, post, at 2822, 2834 – 2836, and accusing us of tacitly overruling that case, see post, at 2834 – 2836. The dissent overreads Grutter, however, in suggesting that it renders pure racial balancing a constitutionally compelling interest; Grutter itself recognized that using race simply to achieve racial balance would be "patently unconstitutional," 539 U.S., at 330, 123 S.Ct. 2325. The Court was exceedingly careful in describing the interest furthered in Grutter as "not an interest in simple ethnic diversity" but rather a "far broader array of qualifications and characteristics" in which race was but a single element. Id., at 324–325, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (internal *2764 quotation marks omitted). We take the Grutter Court at its word. We simply do not understand how Justice BREYER can maintain that classifying every schoolchild as black or white, and using that classification as a determinative factor in assigning children to achieve pure racial balance, can be regarded as "less burdensome, and hence more narrowly tailored" than the consideration of race in Grutter, post, at 2825 – 2826, when the Court in Grutter stated that "[t]he importance of ... individualized consideration" in the program was "paramount," and consideration 741 of race was one factor in a "highly individualized, holistic review," 539 U.S., at 337, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Certainly if the constitutionality of the stark use of race in these cases were as established as the dissent would have it, there would have been no need for the extensive analysis undertaken in Grutter. In light of the foregoing, Justice BREYER's appeal to stare decisis rings particularly hollow. See post, at 2835 – 2836.

At the same time it relies on inapplicable desegregation cases, misstatements of admitted dicta, and other noncontrolling pronouncements, Justice BREYER's dissent candidly dismisses the significance of this Court's repeated holdings that all racial classifications must be reviewed under strict scrutiny, see post, at 2816 – 2817, 2818 – 2820, arguing that a different standard of review should be applied because the districts use race for beneficent rather than malicious purposes, see post, at 2816 – 2820.

This Court has recently reiterated, however, that " 'all racial classifications [imposed by government] ... must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny.' " Johnson, 543 U.S., at 505, 125 S.Ct. 1141 (quoting Adarand, 515 U.S., at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097; emphasis added by Johnson Court). See also Grutter, supra, at 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325 ("[G]overnmental action based on race—a group classification long recognized as in most circumstances irrelevant and therefore prohibited—should be subjected to detailed judicial inquiry" (internal quotation marks and emphasis omitted)). Justice BREYER nonetheless relies on the good intentions and motives of the school districts, stating that he has found "no case that ... repudiated this constitutional asymmetry between that which seeks to exclude and that which seeks to include members of minority races." Post, at 2815 – 2816 (emphasis in original). We have found many. Our cases clearly reject the argument that motives affect the strict scrutiny analysis. See Johnson, supra, at 505, 125 S.Ct. 1141 ("We have insisted on strict scrutiny in every context, even for so-called 'benign' racial classifications"); Adarand, supra, at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (rejecting idea that " 'benign' " racial classifications may 742 be held to "different standards"); Croson, 488 U.S., at 500, 109 S.Ct. 706 ("Racial classifications are suspect, and that means that simple legislative assurances of good intention cannot suffice").

This argument that different rules should govern racial classifications designed to include rather than exclude is not new; it has been repeatedly pressed in the past, see, e.g., Gratz, 539 U.S., at 282, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (BREYER, J., concurring in judgment); id., at 301, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (GINSBURG, J., dissenting); Adarand, supra, at 243, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); Wygant, 476 U.S., at 316–317, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (STEVENS, J., dissenting), and has been repeatedly rejected. See also Bakke, 438 U.S., at 289–291, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.) (rejecting argument that strict scrutiny should be applied only to classifications that disadvantage minorities, stating "[r]acial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are inherently *2765 suspect and thus call for the most exacting judicial examination").

The reasons for rejecting a motives test for racial classifications are clear enough. "The Court's emphasis on 'benign racial classifications' suggests confidence in its ability to distinguish good from harmful governmental uses of racial criteria. History should teach greater humility .... '[B]enign' carries with it no independent meaning, but reflects only acceptance of the current generation's conclusion that a politically acceptable burden, imposed on particular citizens on the basis of race, is reasonable." Metro Broadcasting, 497 U.S., at 609–610, 110 S.Ct. 2997 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). See also Adarand, supra, at 226, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (" '[I]t may not always be clear that a so-called preference is in fact benign' " (quoting Bakke, supra, at 298, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.))). Accepting Justice BREYER's approach would "do no more than move us from 'separate but equal' to 'unequal but benign.' " Metro Broadcasting, supra, at 638, 110 S.Ct. 2997 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting).

[13] Justice BREYER speaks of bringing "the races" together (putting aside the purely black-and-white nature of the plans) as the justification for excluding individuals on the basis of their race.) See post, at 2815 – 2816. Again, this approach 743 to racial classifications is fundamentally at odds with our precedent, which makes clear that the Equal Protection Clause "protect [s] persons, not groups," Adarand, 515 U.S., at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (emphasis in original). See ibid. ("[A]ll governmental action based on race—a group classification long recognized as 'in most circumstances irrelevant and therefore prohibited,' Hirabayashi [v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 100, 63 S.Ct. 1375, 87 L.Ed. 1774 (1943)]—should be subjected to detailed judicial inquiry to ensure that the personal right to equal protection of the laws has not been infringed" (emphasis in original)); Metro Broadcasting, supra, at 636, 110 S.Ct. 2997 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting) ("[O]ur Constitution protects each citizen as an individual, not as a member of a group"); Bakke, supra, at 289, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.) (The Fourteenth Amendment creates rights " 'guaranteed to the individual. The rights established are personal rights' "). This fundamental principle goes back, in this context, to Brown itself. See Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 300, 75 S.Ct. 753, 99 L.Ed. 1083 (1955) (Brown II) ("At stake is the personal interest of the plaintiffs in admission to public schools ... on a nondiscriminatory basis" (emphasis added)). For the dissent, in contrast, " 'individualized scrutiny' is simply beside the point." Post, at 2829 – 2830.

[14] Justice BREYER's position comes down to a familiar claim: The end justifies the means. He admits that "there is a cost in applying 'a state-mandated racial label,' " post, at 2836, but he is confident that the cost is worth paying. Our established strict scrutiny test for racial classifications, however, insists on "detailed examination, both as to ends and as to means." Adarand, supra, at 236, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (emphasis added). Simply because the school districts may seek a worthy goal does not mean they are free to discriminate on the basis of race to achieve it, or that their racial classifications should be subject to less exacting scrutiny.

Despite his argument that these cases should be evaluated under a "standard of review that is not 'strict' in the traditional sense of that word," post, at 2819 – 2820, Justice BREYER still purports 744 to apply strict scrutiny to these cases. See ibid. It is evident, however, that Justice BREYER's brand of narrow tailoring is quite unlike anything found in our precedents. *2766 Without any detailed discussion of the operation of the plans, the students who are affected, or the districts' failure to consider race-neutral alternatives, the dissent concludes that the districts have shown that these racial classifications are necessary to achieve the districts' stated goals. This conclusion is divorced from any evaluation of the actual impact of the plans at issue in these cases—other than to note that the plans "often have no effect." Post, at 2824 – 2825.[17] Instead, the dissent suggests that some combination of the development of these plans over time, the difficulty of the endeavor, and the good faith of the districts suffices to demonstrate that these stark and controlling racial classifications are constitutional. The Constitution and our precedents require more.

[15] In keeping with his view that strict scrutiny should not apply, Justice BREYER repeatedly urges deference to local school boards on these issues. See, e.g., post, at 2811, 2826 – 2827, 2835 – 2836. Such deference "is fundamentally at odds with our equal protection jurisprudence. We put the burden on state actors to demonstrate that their race-based policies are justified." Johnson, 543 U.S., at 506, n. 1, 125 S.Ct. 1141. See Croson, supra, at 501, 109 S.Ct. 706 ("The history of racial classifications in this country suggests that blind judicial deference to legislative or executive pronouncements of necessity has no place in 745 equal protection analysis"); West Virginia Bd. of Ed. v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 637, 63 S.Ct. 1178, 87 L.Ed. 1628 (1943) ("The Fourteenth Amendment ... protects the citizen against the State itself and all of its creatures—Boards of Education not excepted").

Justice BREYER's dissent ends on an unjustified note of alarm. It predicts that today's decision "threaten[s]" the validity of "[h]undreds of state and federal statutes and regulations." Post, at 2833; see also post, at 2814 – 2815. But the examples the dissent mentions—for example, a provision of the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001 that requires States to set measurable objectives to track the achievement of students from major racial and ethnic groups, 20 U.S.C. § 6311(b)(2)(C)(v) (2000 ed., Supp. IV)—have nothing to do with the pertinent issues in these cases.

Justice BREYER also suggests that other means for achieving greater racial diversity in schools are necessarily unconstitutional if the racial classifications at issue in these cases cannot survive strict scrutiny. Post, at 2831 – 2834. These other means—e.g., where to construct new schools, how to allocate resources among schools, and which academic offerings to provide to attract students to certain schools—implicate different considerations than the explicit racial classifications at issue in these cases, and we express no opinion on their validity—not even in dicta. Rather, we employ the familiar and well-established analytic approach of strict scrutiny to evaluate the plans at issue today, an approach that in no way warrants the dissent's cataclysmic concerns. Under *2767 that approach, the school districts have not carried their burden of showing that the ends they seek justify the particular extreme means they have chosen—classifying individual students on the basis of their race and discriminating among them on that basis.

* * *

If the need for the racial classifications embraced by the school districts is unclear, even on the districts' own terms, the costs are undeniable. "[D]istinctions between citizens 746 solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality." Adarand, 515 U.S., at 214, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (internal quotation marks omitted). Government action dividing us by race is inherently suspect because such classifications promote "notions of racial inferiority and lead to a politics of racial hostility," Croson, 488 U.S., at 493, 109 S.Ct. 706 (plurality opinion), "reinforce the belief, held by too many for too much of our history, that individuals should be judged by the color of their skin," Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 657, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), and "endorse race-based reasoning and the conception of a Nation divided into racial blocs, thus contributing to an escalation of racial hostility and conflict." Metro Broadcasting, 497 U.S., at 603, 110 S.Ct. 2997 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). As the Court explained in Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495, 517, 120 S.Ct. 1044, 145 L.Ed.2d 1007 (2000), "[o]ne of the principal reasons race is treated as a forbidden classification is that it demeans the dignity and worth of a person to be judged by ancestry instead of by his or her own merit and essential qualities."

All this is true enough in the contexts in which these statements were made—government contracting, voting districts, allocation of broadcast licenses, and electing state officers—but when it comes to using race to assign children to schools, history will be heard. In Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954) (Brown I), we held that segregation deprived black children of equal educational opportunities regardless of whether school facilities and other tangible factors were equal, because government classification and separation on grounds of race themselves denoted inferiority. Id., at 493–494, 74 S.Ct. 686. It was not the inequality of the facilities but the fact of legally separating children on the basis of race on which the Court relied to find a constitutional violation in 1954. See id., at 494, 74 S.Ct. 686 (" 'The impact [of segregation] is greater when it has the sanction of the law' "). The next Term, we accordingly stated that "full compliance" with Brown I required school districts "to achieve a system of 747 determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis." Brown II, 349 U.S., at 300–301, 75 S.Ct. 753 (emphasis added).

The parties and their amici debate which side is more faithful to the heritage of Brown, but the position of the plaintiffs in Brown was spelled out in their brief and could not have been clearer: "[T]he Fourteenth Amendment prevents states from according differential treatment to American children on the basis of their color or race." Brief for Appellants in Nos. 1, 2, and 4 and for Respondents in No. 10 on Reargument in Brown I, O.T.1953, p. 15 (Summary of Argument). What do the racial classifications at issue here do, if not accord differential treatment on the basis of race? As counsel who appeared before this Court for the plaintiffs in Brown put it: "We have one fundamental contention which we will seek to develop in the course of this argument, and that contention is that no State has any authority under the equal-protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to use race as a factor in *2768 affording educational opportunities among its citizens." Tr. of Oral Arg. in Brown I, O.T. 1952, No. 8, p. 7 (Robert L. Carter, Dec. 9, 1952). There is no ambiguity in that statement. And it was that position that prevailed in this Court, which emphasized in its remedial opinion that what was "[a]t stake is the personal interest of the plaintiffs in admission to public schools as soon as practicable on a nondiscriminatory basis," and what was required was "determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis." Brown II, supra, at 300–301, 75 S.Ct. 753 (emphasis added). What do the racial classifications do in these cases, if not determine admission to a public school on a racial basis?

Before Brown, schoolchildren were told where they could and could not go to school based on the color of their skin. The school districts in these cases have not carried the heavy burden of demonstrating that we should allow this once again—even for very different reasons. For schools that never segregated on the basis of race, such as Seattle, or that have removed the vestiges of past segregation, such as 748 Jefferson County, the way "to achieve a system of determining admission to the public schools on a nonracial basis," Brown II, supra, at 300–301, 75 S.Ct. 753, is to stop assigning students on a racial basis. The way to stop discrimination on the basis of race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race.

The judgments of the Courts of Appeals for the Sixth and Ninth Circuits are reversed, and the cases are remanded for further proceedings.

It is so ordered.

Justice THOMAS, concurring.

Today, the Court holds that state entities may not experiment with race-based means to achieve ends they deem socially desirable. I wholly concur in THE CHIEF JUSTICE's opinion. I write separately to address several of the contentions in Justice BREYER's dissent (hereinafter dissent). Contrary to the dissent's arguments, resegregation is not occurring in Seattle or Louisville; these school boards have no present interest in remedying past segregation; and these race-based student-assignment programs do not serve any compelling state interest. Accordingly, the plans are unconstitutional. Disfavoring a colorblind interpretation of the Constitution, the dissent would give school boards a free hand to make decisions on the basis of race—an approach reminiscent of that advocated by the segregationists in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954). This approach is just as wrong today as it was a half century ago. The Constitution and our cases require us to be much more demanding before permitting local school boards to make decisions based on race.

I

The dissent repeatedly claims that the school districts are threatened with resegregation and that they will succumb to that threat if these plans are declared unconstitutional.

It also argues that these plans can be justified as part of the school boards' attempts to "eradicat[e] earlier school segregation." 749 See, e.g., post, at 2801 – 2802. Contrary to the dissent's rhetoric, neither of these school districts is threatened with resegregation, and neither is constitutionally compelled or permitted to undertake race-based remediation. Racial imbalance is not segregation, and the mere incantation of terms like resegregation and remediation cannot make up the difference.

A

Because this Court has authorized and required race-based remedial measures to *2769 address de jure segregation, it is important to define segregation clearly and to distinguish it from racial imbalance. In the context of public schooling, segregation is the deliberate operation of a school system to "carry out a governmental policy to separate pupils in schools solely on the basis of race." Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 6, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971); see also Monroe v. Board of Comm'rs of Jackson, 391 U.S. 450, 452, 88 S.Ct. 1700, 20 L.Ed.2d 733 (1968). In Brown, this Court declared that segregation was unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Swann, supra, at 6, 91 S.Ct. 1267; see also Green v. School Bd. of New Kent Cty., 391 U.S. 430, 435, 88 S.Ct. 1689, 20 L.Ed.2d 716 (1968) ("[T]he State, acting through the local school board and school officials, organized and operated a dual system, part 'white' and part 'Negro.' It was such dual systems that 14 years ago Brown [, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873,] held unconstitutional and a year later Brown [v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 75 S.Ct. 753, 99 L.Ed. 1083 (1955),] held must be abolished").[1]

Racial imbalance is the failure of a school district's individual schools to match or approximate the demographic makeup of the student population at large. Cf. Washington 750 v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 460, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896 (1982). Racial imbalance is not segregation.[2] Although presently observed racial imbalance might result from past de jure segregation, racial imbalance can also result from any number of innocent private decisions, including voluntary housing choices. See Swann, supra, at 25–26, 91 S.Ct. 1267; Missouri v. Jenkins, 515 U.S. 70, 116, 115 S.Ct. 2038, 132 L.Ed.2d 63 (1995) (THOMAS, J., concurring). Because racial imbalance is not inevitably linked to unconstitutional segregation, it is not unconstitutional in and of itself. Dayton Bd. of Ed. v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406, 413, 97 S.Ct. 2766, 53 L.Ed.2d 851 (1977); Dayton Bd. of Ed. v. Brinkman, 443 U.S. 526, 531, n. 5, 99 S.Ct. 2971, 61 L.Ed.2d 720 (1979) ("Racial imbalance ... is not per se a constitutional violation"); Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 494, 112 S.Ct. 1430, 118 L.Ed.2d 108 (1992); see also Swann, supra, at 31–32, 91 S.Ct. 1267; cf. Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 740–741, and n. 19, 94 S.Ct. 3112, 41 L.Ed.2d 1069 (1974).

Although there is arguably a danger of racial imbalance in schools in Seattle and Louisville, there is no danger of resegregation. No one contends that Seattle has established or that Louisville has reestablished a dual school system that separates students on the basis of race. The statistics cited in Appendix A to the dissent are not to the contrary. See post, at 2837 – 2839. At most, those statistics show a national trend toward classroom racial imbalance. However, racial imbalance without intentional state action to separate the races does not amount to segregation. To raise the specter of resegregation to defend *2770 these programs is to ignore the meaning of the word and the nature of the cases before us.[3]

751 B

Just as the school districts lack an interest in preventing resegregation, they also have no present interest in remedying past segregation. The Constitution generally prohibits government race-based decisionmaking, but this Court has authorized the use of race-based measures for remedial purposes in two narrowly defined circumstances. First, in schools that were formerly segregated by law, race-based measures are sometimes constitutionally compelled to remedy prior school segregation. Second, in Croson, the Court appeared willing to authorize a government unit to remedy past discrimination for which it was responsible. Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 504, 109 S.Ct. 706, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989). Without explicitly resting on either of these strands of doctrine, the dissent repeatedly invokes the school districts' supposed interests in remedying past segregation. Properly analyzed, though, these plans do not fall within either existing category of permissible race-based remediation.

1

The Constitution does not permit race-based government decisionmaking simply because a school district claims a remedial purpose and proceeds in good faith with arguably pure motives. Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 371, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003) 752 THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 239, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995) (SCALIA, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)). Rather, race-based government decisionmaking is categorically prohibited unless narrowly tailored to serve a compelling interest. Grutter, supra, at 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325; see also Part II–A, infra. This exacting scrutiny "has proven automatically fatal" in most cases. Jenkins, supra, at 121, 115 S.Ct. 2038 (THOMAS, J., concurring); cf. Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 100, 63 S.Ct. 1375, 87 L.Ed. 1774 (1943) ("[R]acial discriminations are in most circumstances irrelevant and therefore prohibited"). And appropriately so. "The Constitution abhors classifications based on race, not only because those classifications can harm favored races or are based on illegitimate motives, but also because every time the government places citizens on racial registers and makes race relevant to the provision of burdens or benefits, it demeans us all." Grutter, supra, at 353, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). Therefore, as a general rule, all race-based government *2771 decisionmaking—regardless of context—is unconstitutional.

2

This Court has carved out a narrow exception to that general rule for cases in which a school district has a "history of maintaining two sets of schools in a single school system deliberately operated to carry out a governmental policy to separate pupils in schools solely on the basis of race."[4] Swann, 402 U.S., at 5–6, 91 S.Ct. 1267. In such cases, race-based remedial 753 measures are sometimes required.[5] Green, 391 U.S., at 437–438, 88 S.Ct. 1689; cf. United States v. Fordice, 505 U.S. 717, 745, 112 S.Ct. 2727, 120 L.Ed.2d 575 (1992) (THOMAS, J., concurring).[6] But without a history of state-enforced racial separation, a school district has no affirmative legal obligation to take race-based remedial measures to eliminate segregation and its vestiges.

Neither of the programs before us today is compelled as a remedial measure, and no one makes such a claim. Seattle has no history of de jure segregation; therefore, the Constitution did not require Seattle's plan.[7] Although Louisville 754 once operated *2772 a segregated school system and was subject to a Federal District Court's desegregation decree, see ante, at 2803; Hampton v. Jefferson Cty. Bd. of Ed., 102 F.Supp.2d 358, 376–377 (W.D.Ky.2000), that decree was dissolved in 2000, id., at 360. Since then, no race-based remedial measures have been required in Louisville. Thus, the race-based student-assignment plan at issue here, which was instituted the year after the dissolution of the desegregation decree, was not even arguably required by the Constitution.

3

Aside from constitutionally compelled remediation in schools, this Court has permitted government units to remedy prior racial discrimination only in narrow circumstances. See Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 277, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (plurality opinion). Regardless of the constitutional validity of such remediation, see Croson, 488 U.S., at 524–525, 109 S.Ct. 706 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment), it does not apply here. Again, neither school board asserts that its race-based actions were taken to remedy prior discrimination. Seattle provides three forward-looking—as opposed to remedial—justifications for its race-based assignment plan. Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, pp. 24–34. Louisville asserts several similar forward-looking interests, Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, pp. 24–29, and at oral argument, counsel for Louisville disavowed any claim that Louisville's argument "depend[ed] in any way on the prior de jure segregation," Tr. of Oral Arg. in No. 05–915, p. 38.

Furthermore, for a government unit to remedy past discrimination for which it was responsible, the Court has required it to demonstrate "a 'strong basis in evidence for its conclusion that remedial action was necessary.' " 755 Croson, supra, at 500, 109 S.Ct. 706 (quoting Wygant, supra, at 277, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion)). Establishing a "strong basis in evidence" requires proper findings regarding the extent of the government unit's past racial discrimination. Croson, 488 U.S., at 504, 109 S.Ct. 706. The findings should "define the scope of any injury [and] the necessary remedy," id., at 505, 109 S.Ct. 706, and must be more than "inherently unmeasurable claims of past wrongs," id., at 506, 109 S.Ct. 706. Assertions of general societal discrimination are plainly insufficient. Id., at 499, 504, 109 S.Ct. 706; Wygant, supra, at 274, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion); cf. Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 310, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57

L.Ed.2d 750 (1978) (opinion of Powell, J.). Neither school district has made any such specific findings. For Seattle, the dissent attempts to make up for this failing by adverting to allegations made in past complaints filed against the Seattle school district. However, allegations in complaints cannot substitute for specific findings of prior discrimination—even when those allegations lead to settlements with complaining parties. Cf. Croson, supra, at 505, 109 S.Ct. 706; Wygant, supra, at 279, n. 5, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion). As for Louisville, its slate was cleared by the District Court's 2000 dissolution decree, which effectively declared that there were no longer any effects of de jure discrimination in need of remediation.[8]

2773 *756 Despite the dissent's repeated intimation of a remedial purpose, neither of the programs in question qualifies as a permissible race-based remedial measure. Thus, the programs are subject to the general rule that government race-based decisionmaking is unconstitutional.

C

As the foregoing demonstrates, racial balancing is sometimes a constitutionally permissible remedy for the discrete legal wrong of de jure segregation, and when directed to that end, racial balancing is an exception to the general rule that government race-based decisionmaking is unconstitutional. Perhaps for this reason, the dissent conflates the concepts of segregation and racial imbalance: If racial imbalance equates to segregation, then it must also be constitutionally acceptable to use racial balancing to remedy racial imbalance.

For at least two reasons, however, it is wrong to place the remediation of segregation on the same plane as the remediation of racial imbalance. First, as demonstrated above, the two concepts are distinct. Although racial imbalance can result from de jure segregation, it does not necessarily, and the further we get from the era of state-sponsored racial separation, the less likely it is that racial imbalance has a traceable connection to any prior segregation. See Freeman, 503 U.S., at 496, 112 S.Ct. 1430; Jenkins, 515 U.S., at 118, 115 S.Ct. 2038 (THOMAS, J., concurring).

Second, a school cannot "remedy" racial imbalance in the same way that it can remedy segregation. Remediation of past de jure segregation is a one-time process involving the redress of a discrete legal injury inflicted by an identified entity. At some point, the discrete injury will be remedied, and the school district will be declared unitary. See Swann, 402 U.S., at 31, 91 S.Ct. 1267. Unlike de jure segregation, there is no ultimate remedy for racial imbalance. Individual schools will fall in and out of balance in the natural course, and the appropriate balance itself will shift with a school district's changing *757 demographics. Thus, racial balancing will have to take place on an indefinite basis—a continuous process with no identifiable culpable party and no discernable end point. In part for those reasons, the Court has never permitted outright racial balancing solely for the purpose of achieving a particular racial balance.

II

Lacking a cognizable interest in remediation, neither of these plans can survive strict scrutiny because neither plan serves a genuinely compelling state interest. The dissent avoids reaching that conclusion by unquestioningly accepting the assertions of selected social scientists while completely ignoring the fact that those assertions are the subject of fervent debate. Ultimately, the dissent's entire analysis is corrupted by the considerations that lead it initially to question whether strict scrutiny should apply at all. What emerges is a version of "strict scrutiny" that combines hollow assurances of harmlessness with reflexive acceptance of conventional wisdom. When it 2774 comes to government race-based decisionmaking, the Constitution demands more.

A

The dissent claims that "the law requires application here of a standard of review that is not 'strict' in the traditional sense of that word." Post, at 2819 – 2820. This view is informed by dissents in our previous cases and the concurrences of two Court of Appeals judges. Post, at 34–36 (citing 426 F.3d 1162, 1193–1194 (C.A.9 2005) (Kozinski, J., concurring); Comfort v. Lynn School Comm., 418 F.3d 1, 28–29 (C.A.1 2005) (Boudin, C. J., concurring)). Those lower court judges reasoned that programs like these are not "aimed at oppressing blacks" and do not "seek to give one racial group an edge over another." Id., at 27; 426 F.3d, at 1193 (Kozinski, J., concurring). They were further persuaded that these plans differed from other race-based programs this Court has considered because they are "certainly more benign than laws *758 that favor or disfavor one race, segregate by race, or create quotas for or against a racial group," Comfort, 418 F.3d, at 28 (Boudin, C. J., concurring), and they are "far from the original evils at which the Fourteenth Amendment was addressed," id., at 29; 426 F.3d, at 1195 (Kozinski, J., concurring). Instead of strict scrutiny, Judge Kozinski would have analyzed the plans under "robust and realistic rational basis review." Id., at 1194.

These arguments are inimical to the Constitution and to this Court's precedents.[9] We have made it unusually clear that strict scrutiny applies to every racial classification. Adarand, 515 U.S., at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097; Grutter, 539 U.S., at 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325; Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 505, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949 (2005) ("We have insisted on strict scrutiny in every context, even for so-called 'benign' racial classifications").[10] There are good reasons not to apply a lesser standard to these cases. The constitutional problems with government race-based decisionmaking are not diminished in the slightest by the presence or absence of an intent to oppress any race or by the real or asserted well-meaning motives for the race-based decisionmaking. Adarand, 515 U.S., at 228–229, 115 S.Ct. 2097. Purportedly benign race-based decisionmaking suffers the same constitutional infirmity as invidious race-based decisionmaking. 759 Id., at 240, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) ("As far as the Constitution is concerned, it is irrelevant whether a government's racial classifications are drawn by those who wish to oppress a race or by those who have a sincere desire to help those thought to be disadvantaged").

*2775 Even supposing it mattered to the constitutional analysis, the race-based student-assignment programs before us are not as benign as the dissent believes. See post, at 2818 – 2819. "[R]acial paternalism and its unintended consequences can be as poisonous and pernicious as any other form of discrimination." Adarand, supra, at 241, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). As these programs demonstrate, every time the government uses racial criteria to "bring the races together," post, at 2815 – 2816, someone gets excluded, and the person excluded suffers an injury solely because of his or her race. The petitioner in the Louisville case received a letter from the school board informing her that her kindergartner would not be allowed to attend the school of petitioner's choosing because of the child's race. App. in No. 05–915, p. 97. Doubtless, hundreds of letters like this went out from both school boards every year these race-based assignment plans were in operation. This type of exclusion, solely on the basis of race, is precisely the sort of government action that pits the races against one another, exacerbates racial tension, and "provoke[s] resentment among those who believe that they have been wronged by the government's use of race." Adarand, supra, at 241, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (opinion of THOMAS, J.). Accordingly, these plans are simply one more variation on the government race-based decisionmaking we have consistently held must be subjected to strict scrutiny. Grutter, supra, at 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325.

B

Though the dissent admits to discomfort in applying strict scrutiny to these plans, it claims to have nonetheless applied that exacting standard. But in its search for a compelling 760 interest, the dissent casually accepts even the most tenuous interests asserted on behalf of the plans, grouping them all under the term " 'integration.' " See post, at 2820. " '[I]ntegration,' " we are told, has "three essential elements." Ibid. None of these elements is compelling. And the combination of the three unsubstantiated elements does not produce an interest any more compelling than that represented by each element independently.

1

According to the dissent, integration involves "an interest in setting right the consequences of prior conditions of segregation." Ibid. For the reasons explained above, the records in these cases do not demonstrate that either school board's plan is supported by an interest in remedying past discrimination. Part I–B, supra.

Moreover, the school boards have no interest in remedying the sundry consequences of prior segregation unrelated to schooling, such as "housing patterns, employment practices, economic conditions, and social attitudes." Post, at 2820 – 2821. General claims that past school segregation affected such varied societal trends are "too amorphous a basis for imposing a racially classified remedy," Wygant, 476 U.S., at 276, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion), because "[i]t is sheer speculation" how decades-past segregation in the school system might have affected these trends, see Croson, 488 U.S., at 499, 109 S.Ct. 706. Consequently, school boards seeking to remedy those societal problems with race-based measures in schools today would have no way to gauge the proper scope of the remedy. Id., at 498, 109 S.Ct. 706. Indeed, remedial measures geared toward such broad and unrelated societal ills have " 'no logical stopping point,' " ibid., and threaten to become "ageless in their reach into the past, and timeless in their ability to affect the future," *2776 Wygant, supra, at 276, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion). See Grutter, supra, at 342, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (stating the "requirement that all governmental use of race must have a logical end point").

761 Because the school boards lack any further interest in remedying segregation, this element offers no support for the purported interest in "integration."

2

Next, the dissent argues that the interest in integration has an educational element. The dissent asserts that racially balanced schools improve educational outcomes for black children. In support, the dissent unquestioningly cites certain social science research to support propositions that are hotly disputed among social scientists. In reality, it is far from apparent that coerced racial mixing has any educational benefits, much less that integration is necessary to black achievement.

Scholars have differing opinions as to whether educational benefits arise from racial balancing. Some have concluded that black students receive genuine educational benefits. See, e.g., Crain & Mahard, Desegregation and Black Achievement: A Review of the Research, 42 Law & Contemp. Prob. 17, 48 (Summer 1978). Others have been more circumspect. See, e.g., Henderson, Greenberg, Schneider, Uribe, & Verdugo, High–Quality Schooling for African American Students, in Beyond Desegregation 162, 166 (M. Shujaa ed. 1996) ("Perhaps desegregation does not have a single effect, positive or negative, on the academic achievement of African American students, but rather some strategies help, some hurt, and still others make no difference whatsoever. It is clear to us that focusing simply on demographic issues detracts from focusing on improving schools"). And some have concluded that there are no demonstrable educational benefits. See, e.g., Armor & Rossell, Desegregation and Resegregation in the Public Schools, in Beyond the Color Line: New Perspectives on Race and Ethnicity in America 219, 239, 251 (A. Thernstrom & S. Thernstrom eds.2002).

The amicus briefs in the cases before us mirror this divergence of opinion. Supporting the school boards, one amicus 762 has assured us that "both early desegregation research and recent statistical and econometric analyses ... indicate that there are positive effects on minority student achievement scores arising from diverse school settings." Brief for American Educational Research Association 10. Another brief claims that "school desegregation has a modest positive impact on the achievement of African–American students." App. to Brief for 553 Social Scientists as Amici Curiae 13–14 (footnote omitted). Yet neither of those briefs contains specific details like the magnitude of the claimed positive effects or the precise demographic mix at which those positive effects begin to be realized. Indeed, the social scientists' brief rather cautiously claims the existence of any benefit at all, describing the "positive impact" as "modest," id., at 13, acknowledging that "there appears to be little or no effect on math scores," id., at 14, and admitting that the "underlying reasons for these gains in achievement are not entirely clear," id., at 15.[11]

*2777 Other amici dispute these findings. One amicus reports that "[i]n study after study, racial composition of a student body, when isolated, proves to be an insignificant determinant of student achievement." Brief for Dr. John Murphy et al. in No. 05–908, p. 8; see also id., at 9 ("[T]here is no evidence that diversity in the K–12 classroom positively affectsstudent 763 achievement"). Another amicus surveys several social science studies and concludes that "a fair and comprehensive analysis of the research shows that there is no clear and consistent evidence of [educational] benefits." Brief for David J. Armor et al. 29.

Add to the inconclusive social science the fact of black achievement in "racially isolated" environments. See T. Sowell, Education: Assumptions Versus History 7–38 (1986). Before Brown, the most prominent example of an exemplary black school was Dunbar High School. Sowell, Education: Assumptions Versus History, at 29 ("[I]n the period 1918–1923, Dunbar graduates earned fifteen degrees from Ivy League colleges, and ten degrees from Amherst, Williams, and Wesleyan"). Dunbar is by no means an isolated example. See id., at 10–32 (discussing other successful black schools); Walker, Can Institutions Care? Evidence from the Segregated Schooling of African American Children, in Beyond Desegregation, supra, at 209–226; see also T. Sowell, Affirmative Action Around the World: An Empirical Study 141–165 (2004). Even after Brown, some schools with predominantly black enrollments have achieved outstanding educational results. See, e.g., S. Carter, No Excuses: Lessons from 21 High–Performing, High–Poverty Schools 49–50, 53–56, 71–73, 81–84, 87–88 (2001); A. Thernstrom & S. Thernstrom, No Excuses: Closing the Racial Gap in Learning 43–64 (2003); see also L. Izumi, They Have Overcome: High–Poverty, High–Performing Schools in California (2002) (chronicling exemplary achievement in predominantly Hispanic schools in California). There is also evidence that black students attending historically black colleges achieve better academic results than those attending predominantly white colleges. Grutter, 539 U.S., at 364–365, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing sources); see also Fordice, 505 U.S., at 748–749, 112 S.Ct. 2727 (THOMAS, J., concurring).

764 The Seattle School Board itself must believe that racial mixing is not necessary to black achievement. Seattle operates a K–8 "African–American Academy," which has a "nonwhite" enrollment of 99%. See App. in No. 05–908, p. 227a; Reply Brief for Petitioner in No. 05–908, p. 13, n. 13. That school was founded in 1990 as part of the school board's effort to "increase academic achievement."[12] See African American Academy History, online at http://www.seattleschools.org/schools/aaa/history.htm (all Internet materials as visited June 26, 2007, and available in Clerk of Court's case file). According to the school's most recent annual report, "[a]cademic excellence" is its "primary goal." See African American Academy 2006 Annual Report, p. *2778 2, online at http://www.seattleschools.org/area/siso/reports/anrep/altern/938.pdf. This racially imbalanced environment has reportedly produced test scores "higher across all grade levels in reading, writing and math." Ibid. Contrary to what the dissent would have predicted, see post, at 2820 – 2821, the children in Seattle's African American Academy have shown gains when placed in a "highly segregated" environment.

Given this tenuous relationship between forced racial mixing and improved educational results for black children, the dissent cannot plausibly maintain that an educational element supports the integration interest, let alone makes it compelling.[13] See 765 Jenkins, 515 U.S., at 121–122, 115 S.Ct. 2038 (THOMAS, J., concurring) ("[T]here is no reason to think that black students cannot learn as well when surrounded by members of their own race as when they are in an integrated environment").

Perhaps recognizing as much, the dissent argues that the social science evidence is "strong enough to permit a democratically elected school board reasonably to determine that this interest is a compelling one." Post, at 2820 – 2821. This assertion is inexplicable. It is not up to the school boards —the very government entities whose race-based practices we must strictly scrutinize—to determine what interests qualify as compelling under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Rather, this Court must assess independently the nature of the interest asserted and the evidence to support it in order to determine whether it qualifies as compelling under our precedents. In making such a determination, we have deferred to state authorities only once, see Grutter, 539 U.S., at 328–330, 123 S.Ct. 2325, and that deference was prompted by factors uniquely relevant to higher education. Id., at 328, 123 S.Ct. 2325 ("Our holding today is in keeping with our tradition of giving a degree of deference to a university's academic decisions"). The dissent's proposed test—whether sufficient social science evidence supports a government unit's conclusion that the interest it asserts is compelling—calls to mind the rational-basis standard of review the dissent purports not to apply, post, at 2819 – 2820. See Williamson v. Lee Optical of Okla., Inc., 348 U.S. 483, 488, 75 S.Ct. 461, 99 L.Ed. 563 (1955) ("It is enough that there is an evil at hand for correction, 766 and that it might be thought that the particular legislative measure was a rational way to correct it"). Furthermore, it would leave our equal protection jurisprudence at the mercy of elected government officials evaluating the evanescent views of a handful of social scientists. To adopt the dissent's deferential approach *2779 would be to abdicate our constitutional responsibilities.[14]

3

Finally, the dissent asserts a "democratic element" to the integration interest. It defines the "democratic element" as "an interest in producing an educational environment that reflects the 'pluralistic society' in which our children will live." Post, at 2821.[15] Environmental reflection, though, is 767 just another way to say racial balancing. And "[p]referring members of any one group for no reason other than race or ethnic origin is discrimination for its own sake." Bakke, 438 U.S., at 307, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.). "This the Constitution forbids." Ibid.; Grutter, supra, at 329–330, 123 S.Ct. 2325; Freeman, 503 U.S., at 494, 112 S.Ct. 1430.

Navigating around that inconvenient authority, the dissent argues that the racial balancing in these plans is not an end in itself but is instead intended to "teac[h] children to engage in the kind of cooperation among Americans of all races that is necessary to make a land of 300 million people one Nation." Post, at 2821 – 2822. These "generic lessons in socialization and good citizenship" are too sweeping to qualify as compelling interests. Grutter, 539 U.S., at 348, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (SCALIA, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). And they are not "uniquely relevant" to schools or "uniquely 'teachable' in a formal educational setting." Id., at 347, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Therefore, if governments may constitutionally use racial balancing to achieve these aspirational ends in schools, they may use racial balancing to achieve similar goals at every level—from state-sponsored 4–H clubs, see Bazemore v. Friday, 478 U.S. 385, 388–390, 106 S.Ct. 3000, 92 L.Ed.2d 315 (1986) (Brennan, J., concurring in part), to the state civil service, see Grutter, 539 U.S., at 347–348, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (opinion of SCALIA, J.).

Moreover, the democratic interest has no durational limit, contrary to Grutter's command. See id., at 342, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (opinion of the Court); see also *2780 Croson, 488 U.S., at 498, 109 S.Ct. 706; Wygant, 476 U.S., at 275, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion). In other words, it will always be important for students to learn cooperation among the races. If this interest justifies race-conscious measures today, then logically it will justify race-conscious measures forever. Thus, the democratic interest, limitless in scope 768 and "timeless in [its] ability to affect the future," id., at 276, 106 S.Ct. 1842, cannot justify government race-based decisionmaking.[16]

In addition to these defects, the democratic element of the integration interest fails on the dissent's own terms. The dissent again relies upon social science research to support the proposition that state-compelled racial mixing teaches children to accept cooperation and improves racial attitudes and race relations. Here again, though, the dissent overstates the data that supposedly support the interest.

The dissent points to data that indicate that "black and white students in desegregated schools are less racially prejudiced than those in segregated schools." Post, at 2821 – 2822 (internal quotation marks omitted). By the dissent's account, improvements in racial attitudes depend upon the increased contact between black and white students thought to occur in more racially balanced schools. There is no guarantee, however, that students of different races in the same school will actually spend time with one another. Schools frequently group students by academic ability as an aid to efficient instruction, but such groupings often result in classrooms with high concentrations of one race or another. See, 769 e.g., Yonezawa, Wells, & Serna, Choosing Tracks: "Freedom of Choice" in Detracking Schools, 39 Am. Ed. Research J. 37, 38 (2002); Mickelson, Subverting Swann: First- and Second–Generation Segregation in the Charlotte–Mecklenburg Schools, 38 Am. Ed. Research J. 215, 233–234 (2001) (describing this effect in schools in Charlotte, North Carolina). In addition to classroom separation, students of different races within the same school may separate themselves socially. See Hallinan & Williams, Interracial Friendship Choices in Secondary Schools, 54 Am. Sociological Rev. 67, 72–76 (1989); see also Clotfelter, Interracial Contact in High School Extracurricular Activities, 34 Urban Rev. 25, 41–43 (2002). Therefore, even supposing interracial contact leads directly to improvements in racial attitudes and race relations, a program that assigns students of different races to the same schools might not capture those benefits. Simply putting students together under the same roof does not necessarily mean that the students will learn together or even interact.

Furthermore, it is unclear whether increased interracial contact improves racial *2781 attitudes and relations.[17] One researcher has stated that "the reviews of desegregation and intergroup relations were unable to come to any conclusion about what the probable effects of desegregation were ... [;] 770 virtually all of the reviewers determined that few, if any, firm conclusions about the impact of desegregation on intergroup relations could be drawn." Schofield, School Desegregation and Intergroup Relations: A Review of the Literature, in 17 Review of Research in Education 335, 356 (G. Grant ed.1991). Some studies have even found that a deterioration in racial attitudes seems to result from racial mixing in schools. See N. St. John, School Desegregation Outcomes for Children 67–68 (1975) ("A glance at [the data] shows that for either race positive findings are less common than negative findings"); Stephan, The Effects of School Desegregation: An Evaluation 30 Years After Brown, in 3 Advances in Applied Social Psychology 181, 183–186 (M. Saks & L. Saxe eds.1986). Therefore, it is not nearly as apparent as the dissent suggests that increased interracial exposure automatically leads to improved racial attitudes or race relations.

Given our case law and the paucity of evidence supporting the dissent's belief that these plans improve race relations, no democratic element can support the integration interest.[18]

4

The dissent attempts to buttress the integration interest by claiming that it follows a fortiori from the interest this Court recognized as compelling in Grutter. Post, at 2822. Regardless of the merit of Grutter, the compelling interest recognized in that case cannot support these plans. Grutter recognized a compelling interest in a law school's attainment of a diverse student body. 771 539 U.S., at 328, 123 S.Ct. 2325. This interest was critically dependent upon features unique to higher education: "the expansive freedoms of speech and thought associated with the university environment," the "special niche in our constitutional tradition" occupied by universities, and "[t]he freedom of a university to make its own judgments as to education[,] includ[ing] the selection of its student body." Id., at 329, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (internal quotation marks omitted). None of these features is present in elementary and secondary schools. Those schools do not select their own students, and education in the elementary and secondary environment generally does not involve *2782 the free interchange of ideas thought to be an integral part of higher education. See 426 F.3d, at 1208 (Bea, J., dissenting). Extending Grutter to this context would require us to cut that holding loose from its theoretical moorings. Thus, only by ignoring Grutter's reasoning can the dissent claim that recognizing a compelling interest in these cases is an a fortiori application of Grutter.

C

Stripped of the baseless and novel interests the dissent asserts on their behalf, the school boards cannot plausibly maintain that their plans further a compelling interest. As I explained in Grutter, only "those measures the State must take to provide a bulwark against anarchy ... or to prevent violence" and "a government's effort to remedy past discrimination for which it is responsible" constitute compelling interests. 539 U.S., at 353, 351–352, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part). Neither of the parties has argued —nor could they—that race-based student assignment is necessary to provide a bulwark against anarchy or to prevent violence. And as I explained above, the school districts have no remedial interest in pursuing these programs. See Part I–B, supra. Accordingly, the school boards cannot satisfy strict scrutiny. These plans are unconstitutional.

772 III

Most of the dissent's criticisms of today's result can be traced to its rejection of the colorblind Constitution. See post, at 2815 – 2816. The dissent attempts to marginalize the notion of a colorblind Constitution by consigning it to me and Members of today's plurality.[19] See ibid.; see also post, at 2832 – 2833. But I am quite comfortable in the company I keep. My view of the Constitution is Justice Harlan's view in Plessy: "Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896) (dissenting opinion). And my view was the rallying cry for the lawyers who litigated Brown. See, e.g., Brief for Appellants in Nos. 1, 2, and 4, and for Respondents in No. 10 on Reargument in Brown v. Board of Education, O.T.1953, p. 65 ("That the Constitution is color blind is our dedicated belief"); Brief for Appellants in Brown v. Board of Education, O.T.1952, No. 8, p. 5 ("The Fourteenth Amendment precludes a state from imposing distinctions or classifications based upon race and color alone");[20] 773 see also *2783 In Memoriam: Honorable Thurgood Marshall, Proceedings of the Bar and Officers of the Supreme Court of the United States, p. X (1993) (remarks of Judge Motley) ("Marshall had a 'Bible' to which he turned during his most depressed moments. The 'Bible' would be known in the legal community as the first Mr. Justice Harlan's dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 552, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896). I do not know of any opinion which buoyed Marshall more in his pre-Brown days ...").

The dissent appears to pin its interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause to current societal practice and expectations, deference to local officials, likely practical consequences, and reliance on previous statements from this and other courts. Such a view was ascendant in this Court's jurisprudence for several decades. It first appeared in Plessy, where the Court asked whether a state law providing for segregated railway cars was "a reasonable regulation." 163 U.S., at 550, 16 S.Ct. 1138. The Court deferred to local authorities in making its determination, noting that in inquiring into reasonableness "there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature." Ibid. The Court likewise paid heed to societal practices, local expectations, and practical consequences by looking to "the established usages, customs and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order." Ibid. Guided by these principles, the Court concluded: "[W]e cannot say that a law which authorizes or even requires the separation of the two races in public conveyances is unreasonable, or more obnoxious to the Fourteenth Amendment than the acts of Congress requiring separate schools for colored children in the District of Columbia." Id., at 550–551, 16 S.Ct. 1138.

The segregationists in Brown embraced the arguments the Court endorsed in Plessy. Though Brown decisively rejected 774 those arguments, today's dissent replicates them to a distressing extent. Thus, the dissent argues that "[e]ach plan embodies the results of local experience and community consultation." Post, at 2825 – 2826. Similarly, the segregationists made repeated appeals to societal practice and expectation. See, e.g., Brief for Appellees on Reargument in Briggs v. Elliott, O.T.1953, No. 2, p. 76 ("[A] State has power to establish a school system which is capable of efficient administration, taking into account local problems and conditions").[21] The dissent argues that "weight [must be *2784 given] to a local school board's knowledge, expertise, and concerns," post, at 2826, and with equal vigor, the segregationists argued for deference 775 to local authorities. See, e.g., Brief for Kansas on Reargument in Brown v. Board of Education, O.T.1953, No. 1, p. 14 ("We advocate only a concept of constitutional law that permits determinations of state and local policy to be made on state and local levels. We defend only the validity of the statute that enables the Topeka Board of Education to determine its own course").[22] The dissent argues that today's decision "threatens to substitute for present calm a disruptive round of race-related litigation," post, at 2800 – 2801, and claims that today's decision "risks serious harm to the law and for the Nation," post, at 2835. The segregationists also relied upon the likely practical consequences of ending the state-imposed system of racial separation. See, e.g., Brief 776 for Appellees on Reargument in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1953, No. 4, p. 37 ("Yet a holding that school segregation by race violates the Constitution will result in upheaval in all of those places not now subject to Federal judicial scrutiny. This Court has made many decisions of widespread effect; none would affect more people more directly in more fundamental interests and, in fact, cause more chaos in local government than a reversal of the decision in this case").[23] *2785 And foreshadowing today's dissent, the segregationists most heavily relied upon judicial precedent. See, e.g., Brief for Appellees on Reargument in Briggs v. Elliott, O.T.1953, No. 2, at 59 ("[I]t would be difficult indeed to find a case so favored by precedent as is the case for South Carolina here").[24]

777 The similarities between the dissent's arguments and the segregationists' arguments do not stop there. Like the dissent, the segregationists repeatedly cautioned the Court to consider practicalities and not to embrace too theoretical a view of the Fourteenth Amendment.[25] And just as *2786 the dissent 778 argues that the need for these programs will lessen over time, the segregationists claimed that reliance on segregation was lessening and might eventually end.[26]

What was wrong in 1954 cannot be right today.[27] Whatever else the Court's rejection of the segregationists' arguments 779 in Brown might have established, it certainly made clear that state and local governments cannot take from the Constitution a right to make decisions on the basis of race by adverse possession. The fact that state and local governments had been discriminating on the basis of race for a long time was irrelevant to the Brown Court. The fact that racial discrimination was preferable to the relevant communities was irrelevant to the Brown Court. And the fact that the state and local governments had relied on statements in this Court's opinions was irrelevant to the Brown Court. The same principles guide today's decision. None of the considerations trumpeted by the dissent is relevant to the constitutionality of the school boards' race-based plans because no contextual detail—or collection of contextual details, post, at 2800 – 2812—can "provide refuge from the principle that under our Constitution, the government may not make distinctions on the basis of race." Adarand, 515 U.S., at 240, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).[28]

*2787 780 In place of the colorblind Constitution, the dissent would permit measures to keep the races together and proscribe measures to keep the races apart.[29] See post, at 2815 – 2818. Although no such distinction is apparent in the Fourteenth Amendment, the dissent would constitutionalize today's faddish social theories that embrace that distinction. The Constitution is not that malleable. Even if current social theories favor classroom racial engineering as necessary to "solve the problems at hand," post, at 2811, the Constitution enshrines principles independent of social theories. See Plessy, 163 U.S., at 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138 (Harlan, J., dissenting) ("The white race deems itself to be the dominant race in this country. And so it is, in prestige, in achievements, in education, in wealth and in power. So, I doubt not, it will continue to be for all time .... But in view of the Constitution, in the eye of the law, there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens. ... Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens"). Indeed, if our history has taught us anything, it has taught 781 us to beware of elites bearing racial theories.[30] See, e.g., *2788 Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393, 406, 407, 15 L.Ed. 691 (1857) ("[T]hey [members of the "negro African race"] had no rights which the white man was bound to respect"). Can we really be sure that the racial theories that motivated Dred Scott and Plessy are a relic of the past or that future theories will be 782 nothing but beneficent and progressive? That is a gamble I am unwilling to take, and it is one the Constitution does not allow.

* * *

The plans before us base school assignment decisions on students' race. Because "[o]ur Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens," such race-based decisionmaking is unconstitutional. Plessy, supra, at 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138 (Harlan, J., dissenting). I concur in THE CHIEF JUSTICE's opinion so holding.

Justice KENNEDY, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

The Nation's schools strive to teach that our strength comes from people of different races, creeds, and cultures uniting in commitment to the freedom of all. In these cases two school districts in different parts of the country seek to teach that principle by having classrooms that reflect the racial makeup of the surrounding community. That the school districts consider these plans to be necessary should remind us our highest aspirations are yet unfulfilled. But the solutions mandated by these school districts must themselves be lawful. To make race matter now so that it might not matter later may entrench the very prejudices we seek to overcome. In my view the state-mandated racial classifications at issue, official labels proclaiming the race of all persons in a broad class of citizens—elementary school students in one case, high school students in another—are unconstitutional as the cases now come to us.

I agree with THE CHIEF JUSTICE that we have jurisdiction to decide the cases before us and join Parts I and II of the Court's opinion. I also join Parts III–A and III–C for reasons provided below. My views do not allow me to join the balance of the opinion by THE CHIEF JUSTICE, which seems to me to be inconsistent in both its approach and its implications with the history, meaning, and reach of the Equal Protection 783 Clause. Justice BREYER's dissenting opinion, on the other hand, rests on what in my respectful submission is a misuse and mistaken interpretation of our precedents. This leads it to advance propositions that, in my view, are both erroneous and in fundamental conflict with basic equal protection principles. As a consequence, this separate opinion is necessary to set forth my conclusions in the two cases before the Court.

I

The opinion of the Court and Justice BREYER's dissenting opinion (hereinafter *2789 dissent) describe in detail the history of integration efforts in Louisville and Seattle. These plans classify individuals by race and allocate benefits and burdens on that basis; and as a result, they are to be subjected to strict scrutiny. See Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 505–506, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949 (2005); ante, at 2751 – 2752. The dissent finds that the school districts have identified a compelling interest in increasing diversity, including for the purpose of avoiding racial isolation. See post, at 2820 – 2824. The plurality, by contrast, does not acknowledge that the school districts have identified a compelling interest here. See ante, at 2755 – 2759. For this reason, among others, I do not join Parts III–B and IV. Diversity, depending on its meaning and definition, is a compelling educational goal a school district may pursue.

It is well established that when a governmental policy is subjected to strict scrutiny, "the government has the burden of proving that racial classifications 'are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests.' " Johnson, supra, at 505, 125 S.Ct. 1141 (quoting Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995)). "Absent searching judicial inquiry into the justification for such race-based measures, there is simply no way of determining what classifications are 'benign' or 'remedial' and what classifications are in fact motivated by illegitimate notions of racial inferiority or simple racial politics." Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493, 109 S.Ct. 706, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989) (plurality opinion). And the inquiry 784 into less restrictive alternatives demanded by the narrow tailoring analysis requires in many cases a thorough understanding of how a plan works. The government bears the burden of justifying its use of individual racial classifications. As part of that burden it must establish, in detail, how decisions based on an individual student's race are made in a challenged governmental program. The Jefferson County Board of Education fails to meet this threshold mandate.

Petitioner Crystal Meredith challenges the district's decision to deny her son Joshua McDonald a requested transfer for his kindergarten enrollment. The district concedes it denied his request "under the guidelines," which is to say, on the basis of Joshua's race. Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, p. 10; see also App. in No. 05–915, p. 97. Yet the district also maintains that the guidelines do not apply to "kindergartens," Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, at 4, and it fails to explain the discrepancy. Resort to the record, including the parties' stipulation of facts, further confuses the matter. See App. in No. 05–915, at 43 ("Transfer applications can be denied because of lack of available space or, for students in grades other than Primary 1 (kindergarten), the racial guidelines in the District's current student assignment plan"); id., at 29 ("The student assignment plan does not apply to ... students in Primary 1"); see also Stipulation of Facts in No. 3:02–CV–00620–JGH; Doc. 32, Exh. 44, p. 6 (2003–04 Jefferson County Public Schools Elementary Student Assignment Application, Section B) ("Assignment is made to a school for Primary 1 (Kindergarten) through Grade Five as long as racial guidelines are maintained. If the Primary 1 (Kindergarten) placement does not enhance racial balance, a new application must be completed for Primary 2 (Grade One)").

The discrepancy identified is not some simple and straightforward error that touches only upon the peripheries of the district's use of individual racial classifications. To the contrary, Jefferson County in its briefing has explained how and 785 when it employs these classifications *2790 only in terms so broad and imprecise that they cannot withstand strict scrutiny. See, e.g., Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, at 4–10. While it acknowledges that racial classifications are used to make certain assignment decisions, it fails to make clear, for example, who makes the decisions; what if any oversight is employed; the precise circumstances in which an assignment decision will or will not be made on the basis of race; or how it is determined which of two similarly situated children will be subjected to a given race-based decision. See ibid.; see also App. in No. 05–915, at 38, 42 (indicating that decisions are "based on ... the racial guidelines" without further explanation); id., at 81 (setting forth the blanket mandate that "[s]chools shall work cooperatively with each other and with central office to ensure that enrollment at all schools [in question] is within the racial guidelines annually and to encourage that the enrollment at all schools progresses toward the midpoint of the guidelines"); id., at 43, 76–77, 81–83; McFarland v. Jefferson Cty. Public Schools, 330 F.Supp.2d 834, 837–845, 855–862 (W.D.Ky.2004).

When litigation, as here, involves a "complex, comprehensive plan that contains multiple strategies for achieving racially integrated schools," Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, at 4, these ambiguities become all the more problematic in light of the contradictions and confusions that result. Compare, e.g., App. in No. 05–915, at 37 ("Each [Jefferson County] school ... has a designated geographic attendance area, which is called the 'resides area' of the school[, and each] such school is the 'resides school' for those students whose parent's or guardian's residence address is within the school's geographic attendance area"); id., at 82 ("All elementary students ... shall be assigned to the school which serves the area in which they reside"); and Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, at 5 ("There are no selection criteria for admission to [an elementary school student's] resides school, except attainment of the appropriate age and completion of 786 the previous grade"), with App. in No. 05–915, at 38 ("Decisions to assign students to schools within each cluster are based on available space within the [elementary] schools and the racial guidelines in the District's current student assignment plan"); id., at 82 (acknowledging that a student may not be assigned to his or her resides school if it "has reached ... the extremes of the racial guidelines").

One can attempt to identify a construction of Jefferson County's student assignment plan that, at least as a logical matter, complies with these competing propositions; but this does not remedy the underlying problem. Jefferson County fails to make clear to this Court—even in the limited respects implicated by Joshua's initial assignment and transfer denial—whether in fact it relies on racial classifications in a manner narrowly tailored to the interest in question, rather than in the far-reaching, inconsistent, and ad hoc manner that a less forgiving reading of the record would suggest. When a court subjects governmental action to strict scrutiny, it cannot construe ambiguities in favor of the State.

As for the Seattle case, the school district has gone further in describing the methods and criteria used to determine assignment decisions on the basis of individual racial classifications. See, e.g., Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, pp. 5–11. The district, nevertheless, has failed to make an adequate showing in at least one respect. It has failed to explain why, in a district composed of a diversity of races, with fewer than half of the students classified as "white," it has employed the crude racial categories of "white" and *2791 "non-white" as the basis for its assignment decisions. See, e.g., id., at 1–11.

The district has identified its purposes as follows: "(1) to promote the educational benefits of diverse school enrollments; (2) to reduce the potentially harmful effects of racial isolation by allowing students the opportunity to opt out of racially isolated schools; and (3) to make sure that racially segregated housing patterns did not prevent non-white 787 students from having equitable access to the most popular over-subscribed schools." Id., at 19. Yet the school district does not explain how, in the context of its diverse student population, a blunt distinction between "white" and "non-white" furthers these goals. As the Court explains, "a school with 50 percent Asian–American students and 50 percent white students but no African–American, Native–American, or Latino students would qualify as balanced, while a school with 30 percent Asian–American, 25 percent African–American, 25 percent Latino, and 20 percent white students would not." Ante, at 2754 – 2755; see also Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae in No. 05–908, pp. 13–14. Far from being narrowly tailored to its purposes, this system threatens to defeat its own ends, and the school district has provided no convincing explanation for its design. Other problems are evident in Seattle's system, but there is no need to address them now. As the district fails to account for the classification system it has chosen, despite what appears to be its ill fit, Seattle has not shown its plan to be narrowly tailored to achieve its own ends; and thus it fails to pass strict scrutiny.

II

Our Nation from the inception has sought to preserve and expand the promise of liberty and equality on which it was founded. Today we enjoy a society that is remarkable in its openness and opportunity. Yet our tradition is to go beyond present achievements, however significant, and to recognize and confront the flaws and injustices that remain. This is especially true when we seek assurance that opportunity is not denied on account of race. The enduring hope is that race should not matter; the reality is that too often it does.

This is by way of preface to my respectful submission that parts of the opinion by THE CHIEF JUSTICE imply an all-too-unyielding insistence that race cannot be a factor in instances when, in my view, it may be taken into account. The plurality opinion is too dismissive of the legitimate interest government 788 has in ensuring all people have equal opportunity regardless of their race. The plurality's postulate that "[t]he way to stop discrimination on the basis of race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race," ante, at 2767 – 2768, is not sufficient to decide these cases. Fifty years of experience since Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954), should teach us that the problem before us defies so easy a solution. School districts can seek to reach Brown's objective of equal educational opportunity. The plurality opinion is at least open to the interpretation that the Constitution requires school districts to ignore the problem of de facto resegregation in schooling. I cannot endorse that conclusion. To the extent the plurality opinion suggests the Constitution mandates that state and local school authorities must accept the status quo of racial isolation in schools, it is, in my view, profoundly mistaken.

The statement by Justice Harlan that "[o]ur Constitution is color-blind" was most certainly justified in the context of his dissent in *2792 Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896). The Court's decision in that case was a grievous error it took far too long to overrule. Plessy, of course, concerned official classification by race applicable to all persons who sought to use railway carriages. And, as an aspiration, Justice Harlan's axiom must command our assent. In the real world, it is regrettable to say, it cannot be a universal constitutional principle.

In the administration of public schools by the state and local authorities it is permissible to consider the racial makeup of schools and to adopt general policies to encourage a diverse student body, one aspect of which is its racial composition. Cf. Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003); id., at 387–388, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting). If school authorities are concerned that the student-body compositions of certain schools interfere with the objective of offering an equal educational opportunity to all of their students, they are free to devise race-conscious measures to address the problem in a 789 general way and without treating each student in different fashion solely on the basis of a systematic, individual typing by race.

School boards may pursue the goal of bringing together students of diverse backgrounds and races through other means, including strategic site selection of new schools; drawing attendance zones with general recognition of the demographics of neighborhoods; allocating resources for special programs; recruiting students and faculty in a targeted fashion; and tracking enrollments, performance, and other statistics by race. These mechanisms are race conscious but do not lead to different treatment based on a classification that tells each student he or she is to be defined by race, so it is unlikely any of them would demand strict scrutiny to be found permissible. See Bush v. Vera, 517 U.S. 952, 958, 116 S.Ct. 1941, 135 L.Ed.2d 248 (1996) (plurality opinion) ("Strict scrutiny does not apply merely because redistricting is performed with consciousness of race .... Electoral district lines are 'facially race neutral,' so a more searching inquiry is necessary before strict scrutiny can be found applicable in redistricting cases than in cases of 'classifications based explicitly on race' " (quoting Adarand, 515 U.S., at 213, 115 S.Ct. 2097)). Executive and legislative branches, which for generations now have considered these types of policies and procedures, should be permitted to employ them with candor and with confidence that a constitutional violation does not occur whenever a decisionmaker considers the impact a given approach might have on students of different races. Assigning to each student a personal designation according to a crude system of individual racial classifications is quite a different matter; and the legal analysis changes accordingly.

Each respondent has asserted that its assignment of individual students by race is permissible because there is no other way to avoid racial isolation in the school districts. Yet, as explained, each has failed to provide the support necessary for that proposition. Cf. Croson, 488 U.S., at 501, 109 S.Ct. 706 790 "The history of racial classifications in this country suggests that blind judicial deference to legislative or executive pronouncements of necessity has no place in equal protection analysis"). And individual racial classifications employed in this manner may be considered legitimate only if they are a last resort to achieve a compelling interest. See id., at 519, 109 S.Ct. 706 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).

In the cases before us it is noteworthy that the number of students whose assignment depends on express racial classifications is limited. I join Part III–C of the Court's opinion because I agree that in the *2793 context of these plans, the small number of assignments affected suggests that the schools could have achieved their stated ends through different means. These include the facially race-neutral means set forth above or, if necessary, a more nuanced, individual evaluation of school needs and student characteristics that might include race as a component. The latter approach would be informed by Grutter, though of course the criteria relevant to student placement would differ based on the age of the students, the needs of the parents, and the role of the schools.

III

The dissent rests on the assumptions that these sweeping race-based classifications of persons are permitted by existing precedents; that its confident endorsement of race categories for each child in a large segment of the community presents no danger to individual freedom in other, prospective realms of governmental regulation; and that the racial classifications used here cause no hurt or anger of the type the Constitution prevents. Each of these premises is, in my respectful view, incorrect.

A

The dissent's reliance on this Court's precedents to justify the explicit, sweeping, classwide racial classifications at issue 791 here is a misreading of our authorities that, it appears to me, tends to undermine well-accepted principles needed to guard our freedom. And in his critique of that analysis, I am in many respects in agreement with THE CHIEF JUSTICE. The conclusions he has set forth in Part III–A of the Court's opinion are correct, in my view, because the compelling interests implicated in the cases before us are distinct from the interests the Court has recognized in remedying the effects of past intentional discrimination and in increasing diversity in higher education. See ante, at 2752 – 2753. As the Court notes, we recognized the compelling nature of the interest in remedying past intentional discrimination in Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 494, 112 S.Ct. 1430, 118 L.Ed.2d 108 (1992), and of the interest in diversity in higher education in Grutter. At the same time, these compelling interests, in my view, do help inform the present inquiry. And to the extent the plurality opinion can be interpreted to foreclose consideration of these interests, I disagree with that reasoning.

As to the dissent, the general conclusions upon which it relies have no principled limit and would result in the broad acceptance of governmental racial classifications in areas far afield from schooling. The dissent's permissive strict scrutiny (which bears more than a passing resemblance to rational-basis review) could invite widespread governmental deployment of racial classifications. There is every reason to think that, if the dissent's rationale were accepted, Congress, assuming an otherwise proper exercise of its spending authority or commerce power, could mandate either the Seattle or the Jefferson County plans nationwide. There seems to be no principled rule, moreover, to limit the dissent's rationale to the context of public schools. The dissent emphasizes local control, see post, at 2826 – 2827, the unique history of school desegregation, see post, at 2800 – 2801, and the fact that these plans make less use of race than prior plans, see post, at 2830 – 2831, but these factors seem more rhetorical than integral to the analytical structure of the opinion.

792 This brings us to the dissent's reliance on the Court's opinions in Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257 (2003), and Grutter, 539 U.S. 306, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304. If *2794 today's dissent said it was adhering to the views expressed in the separate opinions in Gratz and Grutter, see Gratz, 539 U.S., at 281, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (BREYER, J., concurring in judgment); id., at 282, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); id., at 291, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (SOUTER, J., dissenting); id., at 298, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (GINSBURG, J., dissenting); Grutter, supra, at 344, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (GINSBURG, J., concurring), that would be understandable, and likely within the tradition—to be invoked, in my view, in rare instances—that permits us to maintain our own positions in the face of stare decisis when fundamental points of doctrine are at stake. See, e.g., Federal Maritime Comm'n v. South Carolina Ports Authority, 535 U.S. 743, 770, 122 S.Ct. 1864, 152 L.Ed.2d 962 (2002) (STEVENS, J., dissenting). To say, however, that we must ratify the racial classifications here at issue based on the majority opinions in Gratz and Grutter is, with all respect, simply baffling.

Gratz involved a system where race was not the entire classification. The procedures in Gratz placed much less reliance on race than do the plans at issue here. The issue in Gratz arose, moreover, in the context of college admissions where students had other choices and precedent supported the proposition that First Amendment interests give universities particular latitude in defining diversity. See Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 312–314, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978) (opinion of Powell, J.). Even so the race factor was found to be invalid. Gratz, supra, at 251, 123 S.Ct. 2411. If Gratz is to be the measure, the racial classification systems here are a fortiori invalid. If the dissent were to say that college cases are simply not applicable to public school systems in kindergarten through high school, this would seem to me wrong, but at least an arguable distinction. Under no fair reading, though, can the majority opinion in Gratz be cited as authority to sustain the racial classifications under consideration here.

793 The same must be said for the controlling opinion in Grutter. There the Court sustained a system that, it found, was flexible enough to take into account "all pertinent elements of diversity," 539 U.S., at 341, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (internal quotation marks omitted), and considered race as only one factor among many, id., at 340, 123 S.Ct. 2325. Seattle's plan, by contrast, relies upon a mechanical formula that has denied hundreds of students their preferred schools on the basis of three rigid criteria: placement of siblings, distance from schools, and race. If those students were considered for a whole range of their talents and school needs with race as just one consideration, Grutter would have some application. That, though, is not the case. The only support today's dissent can draw from Grutter must be found in its various separate opinions, not in the opinion filed for the Court.

B

To uphold these programs the Court is asked to brush aside two concepts of central importance for determining the validity of laws and decrees designed to alleviate the hurt and adverse consequences resulting from race discrimination. The first is the difference between de jure and de facto segregation; the second, the presumptive invalidity of a State's use of racial classifications to differentiate its treatment of individuals.

In the immediate aftermath of Brown the Court addressed other instances where laws and practices enforced de jure segregation. See, e.g., Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1967) (marriage); *2795 New Orleans City Park Improvement Assn. v. Detiege, 358 U.S. 54, 79 S.Ct. 99, 3 L.Ed.2d 46 (1958) (per curiam) (public parks); Gayle v. Browder, 352 U.S. 903, 77 S.Ct. 145, 1 L.Ed.2d 114 (1956) (per curiam) (buses); Holmes v. Atlanta, 350 U.S. 879, 76 S.Ct. 141, 100 L.Ed. 776 (1955) (per curiam) (golf courses); Mayor and City Council of Baltimore v. Dawson, 350 U.S. 877, 76 S.Ct. 133, 100 L.Ed. 774 (1955) (per curiam) (beaches). But with reference to schools, the effect of the legal wrong proved most difficult to correct. To remedy the wrong, school districts that had been segregated by law had no choice, whether 794 under court supervision or pursuant to voluntary desegregation efforts, but to resort to extraordinary measures including individual student and teacher assignment to schools based on race. See, e.g., Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 8–10, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971); see also Croson, 488 U.S., at 519, 109 S.Ct. 706 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) (noting that racial classifications "may be the only adequate remedy after a judicial determination that a State or its instrumentality has violated the Equal Protection Clause"). So it was, as the dissent observes, see post, at 2806 – 2807, that Louisville classified children by race in its school assignment and busing plan in the 1970's.

Our cases recognized a fundamental difference between those school districts that had engaged in de jure segregation and those whose segregation was the result of other factors. School districts that had engaged in de jure segregation had an affirmative constitutional duty to desegregate; those that were de facto segregated did not. Compare Green v. School Bd. of New Kent Cty., 391 U.S. 430, 437–438, 88 S.Ct. 1689, 20 L.Ed.2d 716 (1968), with Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 745, 94 S.Ct. 3112, 41 L.Ed.2d 1069 (1974). The distinctions between de jure and de facto segregation extended to the remedies available to governmental units in addition to the courts. For example, in Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 274, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986), the plurality noted: "This Court never has held that societal discrimination alone is sufficient to justify a racial classification. Rather, the Court has insisted upon some showing of prior discrimination by the governmental unit involved before allowing limited use of racial classifications in order to remedy such discrimination." The Court's decision in Croson, supra, reinforced the difference between the remedies available to redress de facto and de jure discrimination:

> "To accept [a] claim that past societal discrimination alone can serve as the basis for rigid racial preferences would be to open the door to competing claims for 'remedial relief' for every disadvantaged group. The dream 795 of a Nation of equal citizens in a society where race is irrelevant to personal opportunity and achievement would be lost in a mosaic of shifting preferences based on inherently unmeasurable claims of past wrongs." Id., at 505–506, 109 S.Ct. 706.

From the standpoint of the victim, it is true, an injury stemming from racial prejudice can hurt as much when the demeaning treatment based on race identity stems from bias masked deep within the social order as when it is imposed by law. The distinction between government and private action, furthermore, can be amorphous both as a historical matter and as a matter of present-day finding of fact. Laws arise from a culture and vice versa. Neither can assign to the other all responsibility for persisting injustices.

Yet, like so many other legal categories that can overlap in some instances, the constitutional distinction between de jure and de facto segregation has been thought *2796 to be an important one. It must be conceded its primary function in school cases was to delimit the powers of the Judiciary in the fashioning of remedies. See, e.g., Milliken, supra, at 746, 94 S.Ct. 3112. The distinction ought not to be altogether disregarded, however, when we come to that most sensitive of all racial issues, an attempt by the government to treat whole classes of persons differently based on the government's systematic classification of each individual by race. There, too, the distinction serves as a limit on the exercise of a power that reaches to the very verge of constitutional authority. Reduction of an individual to an assigned racial identity for differential treatment is among the most pernicious actions our government can undertake. The allocation of governmental burdens and benefits, contentious under any circumstances, is even more divisive when allocations are made on the basis of individual racial classifications. See, e.g., Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750; Adarand, 515 U.S. 200, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158.

Notwithstanding these concerns, allocation of benefits and burdens through individual racial classifications was found 796 sometimes permissible in the context of remedies for de jure wrong. Where there has been de jure segregation, there is a cognizable legal wrong, and the courts and legislatures have broad power to remedy it. The remedy, though, was limited in time and limited to the wrong. The Court has allowed school districts to remedy their prior de jure segregation by classifying individual students based on their race. See North Carolina Bd. of Ed. v. Swann, 402 U.S. 43, 45–46, 91 S.Ct. 1284, 28 L.Ed.2d 586 (1971). The limitation of this power to instances where there has been de jure segregation serves to confine the nature, extent, and duration of governmental reliance on individual racial classifications.

The cases here were argued upon the assumption, and come to us on the premise, that the discrimination in question did not result from de jure actions. And when de facto discrimination is at issue our tradition has been that the remedial rules are different. The State must seek alternatives to the classification and differential treatment of individuals by race, at least absent some extraordinary showing not present here.

C

The dissent refers to an opinion filed by Judge Kozinski in one of the cases now before us, and that opinion relied upon an opinion filed by Chief Judge Boudin in a case presenting an issue similar to the one here. See post, at 2818 – 2819 (citing 426 F.3d 1162, 1193–1196 (C.A.9 2005) (concurring opinion), in turn citing Comfort v. Lynn School Comm., 418 F.3d 1, 27, 29 (C.A.1 2005) (Boudin, C. J., concurring)). Though this may oversimplify the matter a bit, one of the main concerns underlying those opinions was this: If it is legitimate for school authorities to work to avoid racial isolation in their schools, must they do so only by indirection and general policies? Does the Constitution mandate this inefficient result? Why may the authorities not recognize the problem in candid fashion and solve it altogether through resort to direct assignments based on student racial classifications? So, the argument 797 proceeds, if race is the problem, then perhaps race is the solution.

The argument ignores the dangers presented by individual classifications, dangers that are not as pressing when the same ends are achieved by more indirect means. When the government classifies an individual by race, it must first define what it means to be of a race. Who exactly *2797 is white and who is nonwhite? To be forced to live under a state-mandated racial label is inconsistent with the dignity of individuals in our society. And it is a label that an individual is powerless to change. Governmental classifications that command people to march in different directions based on racial typologies can cause a new divisiveness. The practice can lead to corrosive discourse, where race serves not as an element of our diverse heritage but instead as a bargaining chip in the political process. On the other hand race-conscious measures that do not rely on differential treatment based on individual classifications present these problems to a lesser degree.

The idea that if race is the problem, race is the instrument with which to solve it cannot be accepted as an analytical leap forward. And if this is a frustrating duality of the Equal Protection Clause it simply reflects the duality of our history and our attempts to promote freedom in a world that sometimes seems set against it. Under our Constitution the individual, child or adult, can find his own identity, can define her own persona, without state intervention that classifies on the basis of his race or the color of her skin.

* * *

This Nation has a moral and ethical obligation to fulfill its historic commitment to creating an integrated society that ensures equal opportunity for all of its children. A compelling interest exists in avoiding racial isolation, an interest that a school district, in its discretion and expertise, may choose to pursue. Likewise, a district may consider it a 798 compelling interest to achieve a diverse student population. Race may be one component of that diversity, but other demographic factors, plus special talents and needs, should also be considered. What the government is not permitted to do, absent a showing of necessity not made here, is to classify every student on the basis of race and to assign each of them to schools based on that classification. Crude measures of this sort threaten to reduce children to racial chits valued and traded according to one school's supply and another's demand.

That statement, to be sure, invites this response: A sense of stigma may already become the fate of those separated out by circumstances beyond their immediate control. But to this the replication must be: Even so, measures other than differential treatment based on racial typing of individuals first must be exhausted.

The decision today should not prevent school districts from continuing the important work of bringing together students of different racial, ethnic, and economic backgrounds. Due to a variety of factors—some influenced by government, some not—neighborhoods in our communities do not reflect the diversity of our Nation as a whole. Those entrusted with directing our public schools can bring to bear the creativity of experts, parents, administrators, and other concerned citizens to find a way to achieve the compelling interests they face without resorting to widespread governmental allocation of benefits and burdens on the basis of racial classifications.

With this explanation I concur in the judgment of the Court.

Justice STEVENS, dissenting.

While I join Justice BREYER's eloquent and unanswerable dissent in its entirety, it is appropriate to add these words.

There is a cruel irony in THE CHIEF JUSTICE's reliance on our decision in 799 Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 75 S.Ct. 753, 99 L.Ed. 1083 1955). The first sentence in the concluding paragraph of his opinion states: "Before *2798 Brown, schoolchildren were told where they could and could not go to school based on the color of their skin." Ante, at 2767 – 2768. This sentence reminds me of Anatole

France's observation: "[T]he majestic equality of the la[w], ... forbid[s] rich and poor alike to sleep under the bridges, to beg in the streets, and to steal their bread."[1] THE CHIEF JUSTICE fails to note that it was only black schoolchildren who were so ordered; indeed, the history books do not tell stories of white children struggling to attend black schools.[2] In this and other ways, THE CHIEF JUSTICE rewrites the history of one of this Court's most important decisions. Compare ante, at 2767 ("history will be heard"), with Brewer v. Quarterman, 550 U.S. 286, 275, 127 S.Ct. 1706, 1720, 167 L.Ed.2d 622 (2007) (ROBERTS, C. J., dissenting) ("It is a familiar adage that history is written by the victors").

THE CHIEF JUSTICE rejects the conclusion that the racial classifications at issue here should be viewed differently than others, because they do not impose burdens on one race alone and do not stigmatize or exclude.[3] The only justification for 800 refusing to acknowledge the obvious importance of that difference is the citation of a few recent opinions—none of which even approached unanimity—grandly proclaiming that all racial classifications must be analyzed under "strict scrutiny." See, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995). Even today, two of our wisest federal judges have rejected such a wooden reading of the Equal Protection Clause in the context of school integration. See 426 F.3d 1162, 1193–1196 (C.A.9 2005) (Kozinski, J., concurring); Comfort v. Lynn School Comm., 418 F.3d 1, 27–29 (C.A.1 2005) (Boudin, C. J., concurring). The Court's misuse of the three-tiered approach to equal protection analysis merely reconfirms my own view that there is only one such Clause in the Constitution. See Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 211, 97 S.Ct. 451, 50 L.Ed.2d 397 (1976) (concurring opinion).[4]

*2799 If we look at cases decided during the interim between Brown and Adarand, we can see how a rigid adherence to 801 tiers of scrutiny obscures Brown's clear message. Perhaps the best example is provided by our approval of the decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in 1967 upholding a state statute mandating racial integration in that State's school system. See School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Education, 352 Mass. 693, 227 N.E.2d 729.[5] Rejecting arguments comparable to those that the plurality accepts today,[6] that court noted: "It would be the height of irony if the racial imbalance act, enacted as it was with the laudable purpose of achieving equal educational opportunities, should, by prescribing school pupil allocations based 802 on race, founder on unsuspected shoals in the Fourteenth Amendment." Id., at 698, 227 N.E.2d, at 733 (footnote omitted).

Invoking our mandatory appellate jurisdiction,[7] the Boston plaintiffs prosecuted an appeal in this Court. Our ruling on the merits simply stated that the appeal was "dismissed for want of a substantial federal question." School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Education, 389 U.S. 572, 88 S.Ct. 692, 19 L.Ed.2d 778 (1968) (per curiam). That decision not only expressed our appraisal of the merits of the appeal, but it constitutes a precedent that the Court *2800 overrules today. The subsequent statements by the unanimous Court in Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971), by then-Justice Rehnquist in chambers in Bustop, Inc. v. Los Angeles Bd. of Ed., 439 U.S. 1380, 1383, 99 S.Ct. 40, 58 L.Ed.2d 88 (1978), and by the host of state–court decisions cited by Justice BREYER, see post, at 2813 – 2815,[8] were 803 fully consistent with that disposition. Unlike today's decision, they were also entirely loyal to Brown.

The Court has changed significantly since it decided School Comm. of Boston in 1968. It was then more faithful to Brown and more respectful of our precedent than it is today. It is my firm conviction that no Member of the Court that I joined in 1975 would have agreed with today's decision.

Justice BREYER, with whom Justice STEVENS, Justice SOUTER, and Justice GINSBURG join, dissenting.
These cases consider the longstanding efforts of two local school boards to integrate their public schools. The school board plans before us resemble many others adopted in the last 50 years by primary and secondary schools throughout the Nation. All of those plans represent local efforts to bring about the kind of racially integrated education that Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954), long ago promised—efforts that this Court has repeatedly required, permitted, and encouraged local authorities to undertake. This Court has recognized that the public interests at stake in such cases are "compelling." We have approved of "narrowly tailored" plans that are no less race conscious than the plans before us. And we have understood that the Constitution permits local communities to adopt desegregation plans even where it does not require them to do so.

The plurality pays inadequate attention to this law, to past opinions' rationales, their language, and the contexts in which they arise. As a result, it reverses course and reaches the wrong conclusion. In doing so, it distorts precedent, it misapplies the relevant constitutional principles, it announces legal rules that will obstruct efforts by state and local governments to deal effectively with the growing resegregation of public schools, it threatens to substitute for present calm a disruptive round of race-related litigation, and it undermines Brown's promise of integrated primary and secondary education that local communities have sought 804 to make a *2801 reality. This cannot be justified in the name of the Equal Protection Clause.

I

Facts

The historical and factual context in which these cases arise is critical. In Brown, this Court held that the government's segregation of schoolchildren by race violates the Constitution's promise of equal protection. The Court emphasized that "education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments." 347 U.S., at 493, 74 S.Ct. 686. And it thereby set the Nation on a path toward public school integration.

In dozens of subsequent cases, this Court told school districts previously segregated by law what they must do at a minimum to comply with Brown's constitutional holding. The measures required by those cases often included race-conscious practices, such as mandatory busing and race-based restrictions on voluntary transfers. See, e.g., Columbus Bd. of Ed. v. Penick, 443 U.S. 449, 455, n. 3, 99 S.Ct. 2941, 61 L.Ed.2d 666 (1979); Davis v. Board of School Comm'rs of Mobile Cty., 402 U.S. 33, 37–38, 91 S.Ct. 1289, 28 L.Ed.2d 577 (1971); Green v. School Bd. of New Kent Cty., 391 U.S. 430, 441–442, 88 S.Ct. 1689, 20 L.Ed.2d 716 (1968).

Beyond those minimum requirements, the Court left much of the determination of how to achieve integration to the judgment of local communities. Thus, in respect to race-conscious desegregation measures that the Constitution permitted, but did not require (measures similar to those at issue here), this Court unanimously stated:

> "School authorities are traditionally charged with broad power to formulate and implement educational policy and might well conclude, for example, that in order to prepare students to live in a pluralistic society each school should have a prescribed ratio of Negro to white students reflecting the proportion for the district as a whole. To do this as an educational policy is within 805 the broad discretionary powers of school authorities." Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971) (emphasis added).

As a result, different districts—some acting under court decree, some acting in order to avoid threatened lawsuits, some seeking to comply with federal administrative orders, some acting purely voluntarily, some acting after federal courts had dissolved earlier orders—adopted, modified, and experimented with hosts of different kinds of plans, including race-conscious plans, all with a similar objective: greater racial integration of public schools. See F. Welch & A. Light, New Evidence on School Desegregation, p. v (1987) (hereinafter Welch) (prepared for the Commission on Civil Rights) (reviewing a sample of 125 school districts, constituting 20% of national public school enrollment, that had experimented with nearly 300 different plans over 18 years). The techniques that different districts have employed range "from voluntary transfer programs to mandatory reassignment." Id., at 21. And the design of particular plans has been "dictated by both the law and the specific needs of the district." Ibid.

Overall these efforts brought about considerable racial integration. More recently, however, progress has stalled. Between 1968 and 1980, the number of black children attending a school where minority children constituted more than half of the school fell from 77% to 63% in the Nation (from 81% to 57% in the South) but then reversed direction by the year 2000, rising from 63% to 72% in the Nation (from 57% *2802 to 69% in the South). Similarly, between 1968 and 1980, the number of black children attending schools that were more than 90% minority fell from 64% to 33% in the Nation (from 78% to 23% in the South), but that too reversed direction, rising by the year 2000 from 33% to 37% in the Nation (from 23% to 31% in the South). As of 2002, almost 2.4 million students, or over 5% of all public school enrollment, attended schools with a white population of less than 1%. Of these, 806 2.3 million were black and Latino students, and only 72,000 were white. Today, more than one in six black children attend a school that is 99%–100% minority. See Appendix A, infra. In light of the evident risk of a return to school systems that are in fact (though not in law) resegregated, many school districts have felt a need to maintain or to extend their integration efforts.

The upshot is that myriad school districts operating in myriad circumstances have devised myriad plans, often with race-conscious elements, all for the sake of eradicating earlier school segregation, bringing about integration, or preventing retrogression. Seattle and Louisville are two such districts, and the histories of their present plans set forth typical school integration stories.

I describe those histories at length in order to highlight three important features of these cases. First, the school districts' plans serve "compelling interests" and are "narrowly tailored" on any reasonable definition of those terms. Second, the distinction between de jure segregation (caused by school systems) and de facto segregation (caused, e.g., by housing patterns or generalized societal discrimination) is meaningless in the present context, thereby dooming the plurality's endeavor to find support for its views in that distinction. Third, real-world efforts to substitute racially diverse for racially segregated schools (however caused) are complex, to the point where the Constitution cannot plausibly be interpreted to rule out categorically all local efforts to use means that are "conscious" of the race of individuals.

In both Seattle and Louisville, the local school districts began with schools that were highly segregated in fact. In both cities, plaintiffs filed lawsuits claiming unconstitutional segregation. In Louisville, a Federal District Court found that school segregation reflected pre-Brown state laws separating the races. In Seattle, the plaintiffs alleged that school segregation unconstitutionally reflected not only generalized societal discrimination and residential housing patterns, 807 but also school board policies and actions that had helped to create, maintain, and aggravate racial segregation. In Louisville, a federal court entered a remedial decree. In Seattle, the parties settled after the school district pledged to undertake a desegregation plan. In both cities, the school boards adopted plans designed to achieve integration by bringing about more racially diverse schools. In each city, the school board modified its plan several times in light of, for example, hostility to busing, the threat of resegregation, and the desirability of introducing greater student choice. And in each city, the school boards' plans have evolved over time in ways that progressively diminish the plans' use of explicit race-conscious criteria.

The histories that follow set forth these basic facts. They are based upon numerous sources, which for ease of exposition I have cataloged, along with their corresponding citations, at Appendix B, infra.

A

Seattle

1. Segregation, 1945 to 1956. During and just after World War II, significant *2803 numbers of black Americans began to make Seattle their home. Few black residents lived outside the central section of the city. Most worked at unskilled jobs. Although black students made up about 3% of the total Seattle population in the mid–1950's, nearly all black children attended schools where a majority of the population was minority. Elementary schools in central Seattle were between 60% and 80% black; Garfield, the central district high school, was more than 50% minority; schools outside the central and southeastern sections of Seattle were virtually all white.

2. Preliminary Challenges, 1956 to 1969. In 1956, a memo for the Seattle School Board reported that school segregation reflected not only segregated housing patterns but also school board policies that permitted white students to 808 transfer out of black schools while restricting the transfer of black students into white schools. In 1958, black parents whose children attended Harrison Elementary School (with a black student population of over 75%) wrote the Seattle board, complaining that the " 'boundaries for the Harrison Elementary School were not set in accordance with the long-established standards of the School District ... but were arbitrarily set with an end to excluding colored children from McGilvra School, which is adjacent to the Harrison school district.' "

In 1963, at the insistence of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and other community groups, the school board adopted a new race-based transfer policy. The new policy added an explicitly racial criterion: If a place exists in a school, then, irrespective of other transfer criteria, a white student may transfer to a predominantly black school, and a black student may transfer to a predominantly white school.

At that time, one high school, Garfield, was about two-thirds minority; eight high schools were virtually all white. In 1963, the transfer program's first year, 239 black students and 8 white students transferred. In 1969, about 2,200 (of 10,383 total) of the district's black students and about 400 of the district's white students took advantage of the plan.

For the next decade, annual program transfers remained at approximately this level.

3. The NAACP's First Legal Challenge and Seattle's Response, 1966 to 1977. In 1966, the NAACP filed a federal lawsuit against the school board, claiming that the board had "unlawfully and unconstitutionally" "establish[ed]" and "maintain [ed]" a system of "racially segregated public schools." The complaint said that 77% of black public elementary school students in Seattle attended 9 of the city's 86 elementary schools and that 23 of the remaining schools had no black students at all. Similarly, of the 1,461 black students 809 enrolled in the 12 senior high schools in Seattle, 1,151 (or 78.8%) attended 3 senior high schools, and 900 (61.6%) attended a single school, Garfield.

The complaint charged that the school board had brought about this segregated system in part by "mak[ing] and enforc[ing]" certain "rules and regulations," in part by "drawing ... boundary lines" and "executing school attendance policies" that would create and maintain "predominantly Negro or non-white schools," and in part by building schools "in such a manner as to restrict the Negro plaintiffs and the class they represent to predominantly Negro or non-white schools." The complaint also charged that the board discriminated in assigning teachers.

The board responded to the lawsuit by introducing a plan that required race-based transfers and mandatory busing. The plan created three new middle schools *2804 at three school buildings in the predominantly white north end. It then created a "mixed" student body by assigning to those schools students who would otherwise attend predominantly white, or predominantly black, schools elsewhere. It used explicitly racial criteria in making these assignments (i.e., it deliberately assigned to the new middle schools black students, not white students, from the black schools and white students, not black students, from the white schools). And it used busing to transport the students to their new assignments. The plan provoked considerable local opposition. Opponents brought a lawsuit. But eventually a state court found that the mandatory busing was lawful.

In 1976–1977, the plan involved the busing of about 500 middle school students (300 black students and 200 white students). Another 1,200 black students and 400 white students participated in the previously adopted voluntary transfer program. Thus about 2,000 students out of a total district population of about 60,000 students were involved in one or the other transfer program. At that time, about 810 20% or 12,000 of the district's students were black. And the board continued to describe 26 of its 112 schools as "segregated."

4. The NAACP's Second Legal Challenge, 1977. In 1977, the NAACP filed another legal complaint, this time with the federal Department of Health, Education, and Welfare's Office for Civil Rights (OCR). The complaint alleged that the Seattle School Board had created or perpetuated unlawful racial segregation through, e.g., certain school-transfer criteria, a construction program that needlessly built new schools in white areas, district line-drawing criteria, the maintenance of inferior facilities at black schools, the use of explicit racial criteria in the assignment of teachers and other staff, and a general pattern of delay in respect to the implementation of promised desegregation efforts.

The OCR and the school board entered into a formal settlement agreement. The agreement required the board to implement what became known as the "Seattle Plan."

5. The Seattle Plan: Mandatory Busing, 1978 to 1988. The board began to implement the Seattle Plan in 1978. This plan labeled "racially imbalanced" any school at which the percentage of black students exceeded by more than 20% the minority population of the school district as a whole. It applied that label to 26 schools, including 4 high schools —Cleveland (72.8% minority), Franklin (76.6% minority), Garfield (78.4% minority), and Rainier Beach (58.9% minority). The plan paired (or "triaded") "imbalanced" black schools with "imbalanced" white schools. It then placed some grades (say, third and fourth grades) at one school building and other grades (say, fifth and sixth grades) at the other school building. And it thereby required, for example, all fourth grade students from the previously black and previously white schools first to attend together what would now be a "mixed" fourth grade at one of the school buildings and then the next year to attend what would now be a "mixed" fifth grade at the other school building.

811 At the same time, the plan provided that a previous "black" school would remain about 50% black, while a previous "white" school would remain about two-thirds white. It was consequently necessary to decide with some care which students would attend the new "mixed" grade. For this purpose, administrators cataloged the racial makeup of each neighborhood housing block. The school district met its percentage goals by assigning to the new *2805 "mixed" school an appropriate number of "black" housing blocks and "white" housing blocks. At the same time, transport from house to school involved extensive busing, with about half of all students attending a school other than the one closest to their home.

The Seattle Plan achieved the school integration that it sought. Just prior to the plan's implementation, for example, 4 of Seattle's 11 high schools were "imbalanced," i.e., almost exclusively "black" or almost exclusively "white." By 1979, only two were out of "balance." By 1980, only Cleveland remained out of "balance" (as the board defined it) and that by a mere two students.

Nonetheless, the Seattle Plan, due to its busing, provoked serious opposition within the State. See generally Washington v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 461–466, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896 (1982). Thus, Washington state voters enacted an initiative that amended state law to require students to be assigned to the schools closest to their homes. Id., at 462, 102 S.Ct. 3187. The Seattle School Board challenged the constitutionality of the initiative. Id., at 464, 102 S.Ct. 3187. This Court then held that the initiative—which would have prevented the Seattle Plan from taking effect—violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Id., at 470, 102 S.Ct. 3187.

6. Student Choice, 1988 to 1998. By 1988, many white families had left the school district, and many Asian families had moved in. The public school population had fallen from about 100,000 to less than 50,000. The racial makeup of the school population amounted to 43% white, 24% black, and 23% Asian or Pacific Islander, with Hispanics and Native 812 Americans making up the rest. The cost of busing, the harm that members of all racial communities feared that the Seattle Plan caused, the desire to attract white families back to the public schools, and the interest in providing greater school choice led the board to abandon busing and to substitute a new student assignment policy that resembles the plan now before us.

The new plan permitted each student to choose the school he or she wished to attend, subject to race-based constraints. In respect to high schools, for example, a student was given a list of a subset of schools, carefully selected by the board to balance racial distribution in the district by including neighborhood schools and schools in racially different neighborhoods elsewhere in the city. The student could then choose among those schools, indicating a first choice, and other choices the student found acceptable. In making an assignment to a particular high school, the district would give first preference to a student with a sibling already at the school. It gave second preference to a student whose race differed from a race that was "over-represented" at the school (i.e., a race that accounted for a higher percentage of the school population than of the total district population). It gave third preference to students residing in the neighborhood. It gave fourth preference to students who received child care in the neighborhood. In a typical year, say, 1995, about 20,000 potential high school students participated. About 68% received their first choice. Another 16% received an "acceptable" choice. A further 16% were assigned to a school they had not listed.

7. The Current Plan, 1999 to the Present. In 1996, the school board adopted the present plan, which began in 1999. In doing so, it sought to deemphasize the use of racial criteria and to increase the likelihood that a student would receive an assignment at his first or second choice high school. The district retained a racial tiebreaker *2806 for oversubscribed schools, which takes effect only if the school's minority or 813 majority enrollment falls outside of a 30% range centered on the minority/majority population ratio within the district. At the same time, all students were free subsequently to transfer from the school at which they were initially placed to a different school of their choice without regard to race. Thus, at worst, a student would have to spend one year at a high school he did not pick as a first or second choice.

The new plan worked roughly as expected for the two school years during which it was in effect (1999–2000 and 2000–2001). In the 2000–2001 school year, for example, with the racial tiebreaker, the entering ninth grade class at Franklin High School had a 60% minority population; without the racial tiebreaker that same class at Franklin would have had an almost 80% minority population. (We consider only the ninth grade since only students entering that class were subject to the tiebreaker, and because the plan was not in place long enough to change the composition of an entire school.) In the year 2005–2006, by which time the racial tiebreaker had not been used for several years, Franklin's overall minority enrollment had risen to 90%. During the period the tiebreaker applied, it typically affected about 300 students per year. Between 80% and 90% of all students received their first choice assignment; between 89% and 97% received their first or second choice assignment.

Petitioner Parents Involved in Community Schools objected to Seattle's most recent plan under the State and Federal Constitutions. In due course, the Washington Supreme Court, the Federal District Court, and the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit (sitting en banc) rejected the challenge and found Seattle's plan lawful.

B

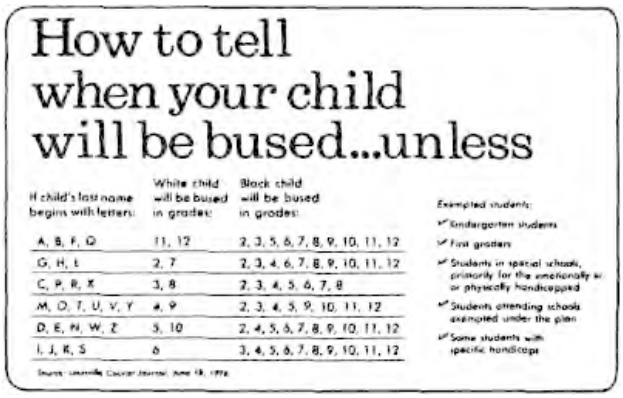
Louisville

1. Before the Lawsuit, 1954 to 1972. In 1956, two years after Brown made clear that Kentucky could no longer require racial segregation by law, the Louisville Board of Education 814 created a geography-based student assignment plan designed to help achieve school integration. At the same time, it adopted an open transfer policy under which approximately 3,000 of Louisville's 46,000 students applied for transfer. By 1972, however, the Louisville School District remained highly segregated. Approximately half the district's public school enrollment was black; about half was white. Fourteen of the district's nineteen nonvocational middle and high schools were close to totally black or totally white. Nineteen of the district's forty-six elementary schools were between 80% and 100% black. Twenty-one elementary schools were between roughly 90% and 100% white.

2. Court–Imposed Guidelines and Busing, 1972 to 1991. In 1972, civil rights groups and parents, claiming unconstitutional segregation, sued the Louisville Board of Education in federal court. The original litigation eventually became a lawsuit against the Jefferson County School System, which in April 1975 absorbed Louisville's schools and combined them with those of the surrounding suburbs. (For ease of exposition, I shall still use "Louisville" to refer to what is now the combined districts.) After preliminary rulings and an eventual victory for the plaintiffs in the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, the District Court in July 1975 entered an order requiring desegregation.

The order's requirements reflected a (newly enlarged) school district student population of about 135,000, approximately *2807 20% of whom were black. The order required the school board to create and to maintain schools with student populations that ranged, for elementary schools, between 12% and 40% black, and for secondary schools (with one exception), between 12.5% and 35% black.

The District Court also adopted a complex desegregation plan designed to achieve the order's targets. The plan required redrawing school attendance zones, closing 12 schools, and busing groups of students, selected by race and the first letter of their last names, to schools outside their immediate 815 neighborhoods. The plan's initial busing requirements were extensive, involving the busing of 23,000 students and a transportation fleet that had to "operate from early in the morning until late in the evening." For typical students, the plan meant busing for several years (several more years for typical black students than for typical white students). The following notice, published in a Louisville newspaper in 1976, gives a sense of how the district's race-based busing plan operated in practice:



How to tell when your child will be bused...unless

If child's last name begins with letters:	White child will be bused in grades:	Black child will be bused in grades:
A, B, F, Q	11, 12	2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12
G, H, I	2, 7	2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12
C, P, R, X	3, 8	2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8
M, O, T, U, V, Y	4, 9	2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12
D, E, N, W, Z	5, 10	2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12
J, K, S	6	3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12

Exempted students:
- Kindergarten students
- First graders
- Students in special schools, primarily for the emotionally ill or physically handicapped
- Students attending schools exempted under the plan
- Some students with specific handicaps

Louisville Courier–Journal, June 18, 1976 (reproduced in J. Wilkinson, From Brown to Bakke: The Supreme Court and School Integration 1954–1978, p. 176 (1979)).

The District Court monitored implementation of the plan. In 1978, it found that the plan had brought all of Louisville's schools within its " 'guidelines' for racial composition" for "at least a substantial portion of the [previous] three years." It removed the case from its active docket while stating that it expected the board "to continue to implement those portions of the desegregation order which are by their nature of a continuing effect."

816 By 1984, after several schools had fallen out of compliance with the order's racial percentages due to shifting demographics in the community, the school board revised its desegregation plan. In doing so, the board created a new racial "guideline," namely a "floating range of 10% above and 10% below the countywide average for the different grade levels." The board simultaneously redrew district boundaries so that middle school students could attend the same school for three years and high school students for four years. It added "magnet" programs at two high schools. And it adjusted its alphabet-based system for grouping and busing students. The board estimated 2808 that its new plan would lead to annual reassignment (with busing) of about 8,500 black students and about 8,000 white students.

3. Student Choice and Project Renaissance, 1991 to 1996. By 1991, the board had concluded that assigning elementary school students to two or more schools during their elementary school years had proved educationally unsound and, if continued, would undermine Kentucky's newly adopted Education Reform Act. It consequently conducted a nearly year-long review of its plan. In doing so, it consulted widely with parents and other members of the local community, using public presentations, public meetings, and various other methods to obtain the public's input. At the conclusion of this review, the board adopted a new plan, called "Project Renaissance," that emphasized student choice.

Project Renaissance again revised the board's racial guidelines. It provided that each elementary school would have a black student population of between 15% and 50%; each middle and high school would have a black population and a white population that fell within a range, the boundaries of which were set at 15% above and 15% below the general student population percentages in the county at that grade level. The plan then drew new geographical school assignment zones designed to satisfy these guidelines; the district could reassign students if particular schools failed to meet *817 the guidelines and was required to do so if a school repeatedly missed these targets.

In respect to elementary schools, the plan first drew a neighborhood line around each elementary school, and it then drew a second line around groups of elementary schools (called "clusters"). It initially assigned each student to his or her neighborhood school, but it permitted each student freely to transfer between elementary schools within each cluster provided that the transferring student (1) was black if transferring from a predominantly black school to a predominantly white school, or (2) was white if transferring from a predominantly white school to a predominantly black school. Students could also apply to attend magnet elementary schools or programs.

The plan required each middle school student to be assigned to his or her neighborhood school unless the student applied for, and was accepted by, a magnet middle school. The plan provided for "open" high school enrollment. Every 9th or 10th grader could apply to any high school in the system, and the high school would accept applicants according to set criteria —one of which consisted of the need to attain or remain in compliance with the plan's racial guidelines. Finally, the plan created two new magnet schools, one each at the elementary and middle school levels.

4. The Current Plan: Project Renaissance Modified, 1996 to 2003. In 1995 and 1996, the Louisville School Board, with the help of a special "Planning Team," community meetings, and other official and unofficial study groups, monitored the effects of Project Renaissance and considered proposals for improvement. Consequently, in 1996, the board modified Project Renaissance, thereby creating the present plan.

At the time, the district's public school population was approximately 30% black. The plan consequently redrew the racial "guidelines," setting the boundaries at 15% to 50% black for all schools. It again redrew school assignment boundaries. And it expanded the transfer opportunities *818 available to elementary and middle school pupils. The plan forbade transfers, however, if the transfer would lead to a school population outside the guidelines range, i.e., if it would create a school 2809 where fewer than 15% or more than 50% of the students were black.

The plan also established "Parent Assistance Centers" to help parents and students navigate the school selection and assignment process. It pledged the use of other resources in order to "encourage all schools to achieve an African–American enrollment equivalent to the average district-wide African–American enrollment at the school's respective elementary, middle or high school level." And the plan continued use of magnet schools.

In 1999, several parents brought a lawsuit in federal court attacking the plan's use of racial guidelines at one of the district's magnet schools. They asked the court to dissolve the desegregation order and to hold the use of magnet school racial guidelines unconstitutional. The board opposed dissolution, arguing that "the old dual system" had left a "demographic imbalance" that "prevent[ed] dissolution." In 2000, after reviewing the present plan, the District Court dissolved the 1975 order. It wrote that there was "overwhelming evidence of the Board's good faith compliance with the desegregation Decree and its underlying purposes." It added that the Louisville School Board had "treated the ideal of an integrated system as much more than a legal obligation—they consider it a positive, desirable policy and an essential element of any well-rounded public school education."

The court also found that the magnet programs available at the high school in question were "not available at other high schools" in the school district. It consequently held unconstitutional the use of race-based "targets" to govern admission to magnet schools. And it ordered the board not to control access to those scarce programs through the use of racial targets.

819 5. The Current Lawsuit, 2003 to the Present. Subsequent to the District Court's dissolution of the desegregation order (in 2000) the board simply continued to implement its 1996 plan as modified to reflect the court's magnet school determination. In 2003, the petitioner now before us, Crystal Meredith, brought this lawsuit challenging the plan's unmodified portions, i.e., those portions that dealt with ordinary, not magnet, schools. Both the District Court and the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit rejected Meredith's challenge and held the unmodified aspects of the plan constitutional.

C

The histories I have set forth describe the extensive and ongoing efforts of two school districts to bring about greater racial integration of their public schools. In both cases the efforts were in part remedial. Louisville began its integration efforts in earnest when a federal court in 1975 entered a school desegregation order. Seattle undertook its integration efforts in response to the filing of a federal lawsuit and as a result of its settlement of a segregation complaint filed with the federal OCR.

The plans in both Louisville and Seattle grow out of these earlier remedial efforts. Both districts faced problems that reflected initial periods of severe racial segregation, followed by such remedial efforts as busing, followed by evidence of resegregation, followed by a need to end busing and encourage the return of, e.g., suburban students through increased student choice. When formulating the plans under review, both districts drew upon their considerable experience with earlier plans, having revised their policies periodically in light of that experience. Both districts rethought their methods over time and explored a wide range of other means, including non-race-conscious policies. Both districts also *2810 considered elaborate studies and consulted widely within their communities.

820 Both districts sought greater racial integration for educational and democratic, as well as for remedial, reasons. Both sought to achieve these objectives while preserving their commitment to other educational goals, e.g., district wide commitment to high quality public schools, increased pupil assignment to neighborhood schools, diminished use of busing, greater student choice, reduced risk of white flight, and so forth. Consequently, the present plans expand student choice; they limit the burdens (including busing) that earlier plans had imposed upon students and their families; and they use race-conscious criteria in limited and gradually diminishing ways. In particular, they use race-conscious criteria only to mark the outer bounds of broad population-related ranges.

The histories also make clear the futility of looking simply to whether earlier school segregation was de jure or de facto in order to draw firm lines separating the constitutionally permissible from the constitutionally forbidden use of "race-conscious" criteria. Justice THOMAS suggests that it will be easy to identify de jure segregation because "[i]n most cases, there either will or will not have been a state constitutional amendment, state statute, local ordinance, or local administrative policy explicitly requiring separation of the races." Ante, at 2771, n. 4 (concurring opinion). But our precedent has recognized that de jure discrimination can be present even in the absence of racially explicit laws. See Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 373–374, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220 (1886).

No one here disputes that Louisville's segregation was de jure. But what about Seattle's? Was it de facto? De jure? A mixture? Opinions differed. Or is it that a prior federal court had not adjudicated the matter? Does that make a difference? Is Seattle free on remand to say that its schools were de jure segregated, just as in 1956 a memo for the school board admitted? The plurality does not seem confident as to the answer. Compare ante, at 2752 (opinion of the Court) ("[T]he Seattle public schools have not shown 821 that they were ever segregated by law" (emphasis added)), with ante, at 2761 – 2762 (plurality opinion) (assuming "the Seattle school district was never segregated by law," but seeming to concede that a school district with de jure segregation need not be subject to a court order to be allowed to engage in race-based remedial measures).

A court finding of de jure segregation cannot be the crucial variable. After all, a number of school districts in the South that the Government or private plaintiffs challenged as segregated by law voluntarily desegregated their schools without a court order—just as Seattle did. See, e.g., Coleman, Desegregation of the Public Schools in Kentucky—The Second Year After the Supreme Court's Decision, 25 J. Negro Educ. 254, 256, 261 (1956) (40 of Kentucky's 180 school districts began desegregation without court orders); Branton, Little Rock Revisited: Desegregation to Resegregation, 52 J. Negro Educ. 250, 251 (1983) (similar in Arkansas); Bullock & Rodgers, Coercion to Compliance: Southern School Districts and School Desegregation Guidelines, 38 J. Politics 987, 991 (1976) (similar in Georgia); McDaniel v. Barresi, 402 U.S. 39, 40, n. 1, 91 S.Ct. 1287, 28 L.Ed.2d 582 (1971) (Clarke County, Georgia). See also Letter from Robert F. Kennedy, Attorney General, to John F. Kennedy, President (Jan. 24, 1963) (hereinafter Kennedy Report), online at http://www.gilderlehrman.org/search/collection_pdfs/05/63/0/05630.pdf (all Internet materials as visited June 26, 2007, and available *2811 in Clerk of Court's case file) (reporting successful efforts by the Government to induce voluntary desegregation).

Moreover, Louisville's history makes clear that a community under a court order to desegregate might submit a race-conscious remedial plan before the court dissolved the order, but with every intention of following that plan even after dissolution. How could such a plan be lawful the day before dissolution but then become unlawful the very next day? On what legal ground can the majority rest its contrary view? But see ante, at 2752 – 2753, 2755, n. 12.

822 Are courts really to treat as merely de facto segregated those school districts that avoided a federal order by voluntarily complying with Brown's requirements? See ante, at 2752 (opinion of the Court), ante, at 2761 – 2762 (plurality opinion). This Court has previously done just the opposite, permitting a race-conscious remedy without any kind of court decree. See McDaniel, supra, at 41, 91 S.Ct. 1287. Because the Constitution emphatically does not forbid the use of race-conscious measures by districts in the South that voluntarily desegregated their schools, on what basis does the plurality claim that the law forbids Seattle to do the same? But see ante, at 2761.

The histories also indicate the complexity of the tasks and the practical difficulties that local school boards face when they seek to achieve greater racial integration. The boards work in communities where demographic patterns change, where they must meet traditional learning goals, where they must attract and retain effective teachers, where they should (and will) take account of parents' views and maintain their commitment to public school education, where they must adapt to court intervention, where they must encourage voluntary student and parent action—where they will find that their own good faith, their knowledge, and their understanding of local circumstances are always necessary but often insufficient to solve the problems at hand.

These facts and circumstances help explain why in this context, as to means, the law often leaves legislatures, city councils, school boards, and voters with a broad range of choice, thereby giving "different communities" the opportunity to "try different solutions to common problems and gravitate toward those that prove most successful or seem to them best to suit their individual needs." Comfort v. Lynn School Comm., 418 F.3d 1, 28 (C.A.1 2005) (Boudin, C. J., concurring) (citing United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 581, 115 S.Ct. 1624, 131 L.Ed.2d 626 (1995) (KENNEDY, J., concurring)), cert. denied, 546 U.S. 1061, 126 S.Ct. 798, 163 L.Ed.2d 627 (2005).

823 With this factual background in mind, I turn to the legal question: Does the United States Constitution prohibit these school boards from using race-conscious criteria in the limited ways at issue here?

II

The Legal Standard

A longstanding and unbroken line of legal authority tells us that the Equal Protection Clause permits local school boards to use race-conscious criteria to achieve positive race-related goals, even when the Constitution does not compel it. Because of its importance, I shall repeat what this Court said about the matter in Swann. Chief Justice Burger, on behalf of a unanimous Court in a case of exceptional importance, wrote:

> "School authorities are traditionally charged with broad power to formulate and implement educational policy and might well conclude, for example, that in order to prepare students to live in a *2812 pluralistic society each school should have a prescribed ratio of Negro to white students reflecting the proportion for the district as a whole. To do this as an educational policy is within the broad discretionary powers of school authorities." 402 U.S., at 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267.

The statement was not a technical holding in the case. But the Court set forth in Swann a basic principle of constitutional law—a principle of law that has found "wide acceptance in the legal culture." Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 443, 120 S.Ct. 2326, 147 L.Ed.2d 405 (2000) (internal quotation marks omitted); Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314, 330, 119 S.Ct. 1307, 143 L.Ed.2d 424 (1999); id., at 331, 332, 119 S.Ct. 1307 (SCALIA, J., dissenting) (citing " 'wide acceptance in the legal culture' " as "adequate reason not to overrule" prior cases).

Thus, in North Carolina Bd. of Ed. v. Swann, 402 U.S. 43, 45, 91 S.Ct. 1284, 28 L.Ed.2d 586 (1971), this Court, citing Swann, restated the point. "[S]chool authorities," the Court said, "have wide discretion 824 in formulating school policy, and ... as a matter of educational policy school authorities may well conclude that some kind of racial balance in the schools is desirable quite apart from any constitutional requirements." Then–Justice Rehnquist echoed this view in Bustop, Inc. v. Los Angeles Bd. of Ed., 439 U.S. 1380, 1383, 99 S.Ct. 40, 58 L.Ed.2d 88 (1978) (opinion in chambers), making clear that he too believed that Swann's statement reflected settled law: "While I have the gravest doubts that [a state supreme court] was required by the United States Constitution to take the [desegregation] action that it has taken in this case, I have very little doubt that it was permitted by that Constitution to take such action." (Emphasis in original.)

These statements nowhere suggest that this freedom is limited to school districts where court-ordered desegregation measures are also in effect. Indeed, in McDaniel, a case decided the same day as Swann, a group of parents challenged a race-conscious student assignment plan that the Clarke County School Board had voluntarily adopted as a remedy without a court order (though under federal agency pressure —pressure Seattle also encountered). The plan required that each elementary school in the district maintain 20% to 40% enrollment of African–American students, corresponding to the racial composition of the district. See Barresi v. Browne, 226 Ga. 456, 456–459, 175 S.E.2d 649, 650–651 (1970). This Court upheld the plan, see McDaniel, 402 U.S., at 41, 91 S.Ct. 1287, rejecting the parents' argument that "a person may not be included or excluded solely because he is a Negro or because he is white," Brief for Respondents in McDaniel, O.T.1970, No. 420, p. 25.

Federal authorities had claimed—as the NAACP and the OCR did in Seattle—that Clarke County schools were segregated in law, not just in fact. The plurality's claim that Seattle was "never segregated by law" is simply not accurate. Compare ante, at 2761 – 2762, with supra, at 2748 – 2750. The plurality could validly claim that no court ever found that Seattle 825 schools were segregated in law. But that is also true of the Clarke County schools in McDaniel. Unless we believe that the Constitution enforces one legal standard for the South and another for the North, this Court should grant Seattle the permission it granted Clarke County, Georgia. See McDaniel, supra, at 41, 91 S.Ct. 1287 ("[S]teps will almost invariably require that students be assigned 'differently because of their race.' ... Any other approach would freeze the status quo that is the very target of all desegregation processes").

*2813 This Court has also held that school districts may be required by federal statute to undertake race-conscious desegregation efforts even when there is no likelihood that de jure segregation can be shown. In Board of Ed. of City School Dist. of New York v. Harris, 444 U.S. 130, 148–149, 100 S.Ct. 363, 62 L.Ed.2d 275 (1979), the Court concluded that a federal statute required school districts receiving certain federal funds to remedy faculty segregation, even though in this Court's view the racial disparities in the affected schools were purely de facto and would not have been actionable under the Equal Protection Clause. Not even the dissenters thought the race-conscious remedial program posed a constitutional problem. See id., at 152, 100 S.Ct. 363 (opinion of Stewart, J.). See also, e.g., Crawford v. Board of Ed. of Los Angeles, 458 U.S. 527, 535–536, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 73 L.Ed.2d 948 (1982) ("[S]tate courts of California continue to have an obligation under state law to order segregated school districts to use voluntary desegregation techniques, whether or not there has been a finding of intentional segregation .... [S]chool districts themselves retain a state-law obligation to take reasonably feasible steps to desegregate, and they remain free to adopt reassignment and busing plans to effectuate desegregation " (emphasis added)); School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Education, 389 U.S. 572, 88 S.Ct. 692, 19 L.Ed.2d 778 (1968) (per curiam) (dismissing for want of a federal question a challenge to a voluntary statewide integration plan using express racial criteria).

Lower state and federal courts had considered the matter settled and uncontroversial even before this Court decided 826 Swann. Indeed, in 1968, the Illinois Supreme Court rejected an equal protection challenge to a race-conscious state law seeking to undo de facto segregation:

> "To support [their] claim, the defendants heavily rely on three Federal cases, each of which held, no State law being involved, that a local school board does not have an affirmative constitutional duty to act to alleviate racial imbalance in the schools that it did not cause. However, the question as to whether the constitution requires a local school board, or a State, to act to undo de facto school segregation is simply not here concerned. The issue here is whether the constitution permits, rather than prohibits, voluntary State action aimed toward reducing and eventually eliminating de facto school segregation.
>
> "State laws or administrative policies, directed toward the reduction and eventual elimination of de facto segregation of children in the schools and racial imbalance, have been approved by every high State court which has considered the issue. Similarly, the Federal courts which have considered the issue ... have recognized that voluntary programs of local school authorities designed to alleviate de facto segregation and racial imbalance in the schools are not constitutionally forbidden." Tometz v. Board of Ed., Waukegan School Dist. No. 61, 39 Ill.2d 593, 597–598, 237 N.E.2d 498, 501 (citing decisions from the high courts of Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, California, New York, and Connecticut, and from the Courts of Appeals for the First, Second, Fourth, and Sixth Circuits; citations omitted).

See also, e.g., Offermann v. Nitkowski, 378 F.2d 22, 24 (C.A.2 1967); Deal v. Cincinnati Bd. of Ed., 11 Ohio Misc. 184, 369 F.2d 55, 61 (C.A.6 1966), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 847, 88 S.Ct. 39, 19 L.Ed.2d 114 (1967); Springfield School Comm. v. Barksdale, 348 F.2d 261, 266 (C.A.1 1965); 827 *2814 Pennsylvania Human Relations Comm'n v. Chester School Dist., 427 Pa. 157, 164, 233 A.2d 290, 294 (1967); Booker v. Board of Ed. of Plainfield, Union Cty., 45 N.J. 161, 170, 212 A.2d 1, 5 (1965); Jackson v. Pasadena City School Dist., 59 Cal.2d 876, 881–882, 31 Cal.Rptr. 606, 382 P.2d 878, 881–882 (1963).

I quote the Illinois Supreme Court at length to illustrate the prevailing legal assumption at the time Swann was decided. In this respect, Swann was not a sharp or unexpected departure from prior rulings; it reflected a consensus that had already emerged among state and lower federal courts.

If there were doubts before Swann was decided, they did not survive this Court's decision. Numerous state and federal courts explicitly relied upon Swann's guidance for decades to follow. For instance, a Texas appeals court in 1986 rejected a Fourteenth Amendment challenge to a voluntary integration plan by explaining:

> "[T]he absence of a court order to desegregate does not mean that a school board cannot exceed minimum requirements in order to promote school integration. School authorities are traditionally given broad discretionary powers to formulate and implement educational policy and may properly decide to ensure to their students the value of an integrated school experience." Citizens for Better Ed. v. Goose Creek Consol. Independent School Dist., 719 S.W.2d 350, 352–353 (citing Swann and North Carolina Bd. of Ed.), appeal dism'd for want of substantial federal question, 484 U.S. 804, 108 S.Ct. 49, 98 L.Ed.2d 14 (1987).

Similarly, in Zaslawsky v. Board of Ed. of Los Angeles City Unified School Dist., 610 F.2d 661, 662–664 (1979), the Ninth Circuit rejected a federal constitutional challenge to a school district's use of mandatory faculty transfers to ensure that each school's faculty makeup would fall within 10% of the districtwide racial composition. Like the Texas court, the Ninth Circuit relied upon Swann and North Carolina Bd. 828 of Ed. to reject the argument that "a race-conscious plan is permissible only when there has been a judicial finding of de jure segregation." 610 F.2d, at 663–664. See also, e.g., Darville v. Dade Cty.School Bd., 497 F.2d 1002, 1004–1006 (C.A.5 1974); State ex rel. Citizens Against Mandatory Bussing v. Brooks, 80 Wash.2d 121, 128–129, 492 P.2d 536, 541–542 (1972) (en banc), overruled on other grounds, Cole v. Webster, 103 Wash.2d 280, 692 P.2d 799 (1984) (en banc); School Comm. of Springfield v. Board of Ed., 362 Mass. 417, 428–429, 287 N.E.2d 438, 447–448 (1972). These decisions illustrate well how lower courts understood and followed Swann's enunciation of the relevant legal principle.

Courts are not alone in accepting as constitutionally valid the legal principle that Swann enunciated—i.e., that the government may voluntarily adopt race-conscious measures to improve conditions of race even when it is not under a constitutional obligation to do so. That principle has been accepted by every branch of government and is rooted in the history of the Equal Protection Clause itself. Thus, Congress has enacted numerous race-conscious statutes that illustrate that principle or rely upon its validity. See, e.g., No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, 20 U.S.C. § 6311(b)(2)(C)(v) (2000 ed., Supp. IV); § 1067 et seq. (authorizing aid to minority institutions). In fact, without being exhaustive, I have counted 51 federal statutes that use racial classifications. I have counted well over 100 state statutes that similarly employ racial classifications. Presidential administrations for the past half century have used and supported various race-conscious measures. See, e.g., 2815 Exec. Order No. 10925, 26 Fed.Reg.1977 (1961) (President Kennedy); Exec. Order No. 11246, 30 Fed.Reg. 12319 (1965) (President Johnson); Sugrue, Breaking Through: The Troubled Origins of Affirmative Action in the Workplace, in Color Lines: Affirmative Action, Immigration, and Civil Rights Options for America 31 (J. Skrentny ed.2001) (describing President Nixon's lobbying for affirmative action plans, e.g., the PhiladelphiaPlan); *829 White, Affirmative Action's Alamo: Gerald Ford Returns to Fight Once More for Michigan, Time, Aug. 23, 1999, p. 48 (reporting on President Ford's support for affirmative action); Schuck, Affirmative Action: Past, Present, and Future, 20 Yale L. & Pol'y Rev. 1, 50 (2002) (describing President Carter's support for affirmation action). And during the same time, hundreds of local school districts have adopted student assignment plans that use race-conscious criteria. See Welch 83–91.

That Swann's legal statement should find such broad acceptance is not surprising. For Swann is predicated upon a well-established legal view of the Fourteenth Amendment. That view understands the basic objective of those who wrote the Equal Protection Clause as forbidding practices that lead to racial exclusion. The Amendment sought to bring into American society as full members those whom the Nation had previously held in slavery. See Slaughter–House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 71, 21 L.Ed. 394 (1873) ("[N]o one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in [all the Reconstruction amendments] ... we mean the freedom of the slave race"); Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 306, 25 L.Ed. 664 (1880) ("[The Fourteenth Amendment] is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose; namely, securing to a race recently emancipated ... all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy").

There is reason to believe that those who drafted an Amendment with this basic purpose in mind would have understood the legal and practical difference between the use of race-conscious criteria in defiance of that purpose, namely to keep the races apart, and the use of race-conscious criteria to further that purpose, namely to bring the races together. See generally R. Sears, A Utopian Experiment in Kentucky: Integration and Social Equality at Berea, 1866–1904 (1996) (describing federal funding, through the Freedman's Bureau, of race-conscious school integration programs). See also R. Fischer, The Segregation Struggle in Louisiana 1862–77, *830 p. 51 (1974) (describing the use of race-conscious remedies); Harlan, Desegregation in New Orleans Public Schools During Reconstruction, 67 Am. Hist. Rev. 663, 664 (1962) (same); W. Vaughn, Schools for All: The Blacks & Public Education in the South, 1865–1877, pp. 111–116 (1974) (same). Although the Constitution almost always forbids the former, it is significantly more lenient in respect to the latter. See Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244, 301, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257 (2003) (GINSBURG, J., dissenting); Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 243, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995) (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

Sometimes Members of this Court have disagreed about the degree of leniency that the Clause affords to programs designed to include. See Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 274, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986); Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 507, 100 S.Ct. 2758, 65 L.Ed.2d 902 (1980) (Powell, J., concurring). But I can find no case in which this Court has followed Justice THOMAS' "color-blind" approach. And I have found no case that otherwise repudiated this constitutional asymmetry between that which seeks to exclude and that 2816 which seeks to include members of minority races.

What does the plurality say in response? First, it seeks to distinguish Swann and other similar cases on the ground that those cases involved remedial plans in response to judicial findings of de jure segregation. As McDaniel and Harris show, that is historically untrue. See supra, at 2757 – 2759. Many school districts in the South adopted segregation remedies (to which Swann clearly applies) without any such federal order, see supra, at 2756 – 2757. See also Kennedy Report. Seattle's circumstances are not meaningfully different from those in, say, McDaniel, where this Court approved race-conscious remedies. Louisville's plan was created and initially adopted when a compulsory district court order was in place. And, in any event, the histories of Seattle and Louisville make clear that this distinction—between court-ordered and voluntary desegregation—seeks a line that sensibly cannot be drawn.

*831 Second, the plurality downplays the importance of Swann and related cases by frequently describing their relevant statements as "dicta." These criticisms, however, miss the main point. Swann did not hide its understanding of the law in a corner of an obscure opinion or in a footnote, unread but by experts. It set forth its view prominently in an important opinion joined by all nine Justices, knowing that it would be read and followed throughout the Nation. The basic problem with the plurality's technical "dicta"-based response lies in its overly theoretical approach to case law, an approach that emphasizes rigid distinctions between holdings and dicta in a way that serves to mask the radical nature of today's decision. Law is not an exercise in mathematical logic. And statements of a legal rule set forth in a judicial opinion do not always divide neatly into "holdings" and "dicta." (Consider the legal "status" of Justice Powell's separate opinion in Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978).) The constitutional principle enunciated in Swann, reiterated in subsequent cases, and relied upon over many years, provides, and has widely been thought to provide, authoritative legal guidance. And if the plurality now chooses to reject that principle, it cannot adequately justify its retreat simply by affixing the label "dicta" to reasoning with which it disagrees. Rather, it must explain to the courts and to the Nation why it would abandon guidance set forth many years before, guidance that countless others have built upon over time, and which the law has continuously embodied.

Third, a more important response is the plurality's claim that later cases—in particular Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949 (2005), Adarand, supra, and Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (2003)—supplanted Swann. See ante, at 2751 – 2752, 2762 – 2763, n. 16, 2764 – 2765 (citing Adarand, supra, at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097; Johnson, supra, at 505, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949; Grutter, supra at 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304). The plurality says that cases such as Swann and the others I have described all "were decided before this Court definitively determined 832 that 'all racial classifications ... must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny.' " Ante, at 2762 – 2763, n. 16 (quoting Adarand, 515 U.S., at 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097). This Court in Adarand added that "such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests." Ibid. And the Court repeated this same statement in Grutter. See 539 U.S., at 326, 123 S.Ct. 2325.

Several of these cases were significantly more restrictive than Swann in respect to the degree of leniency the Fourteenth Amendment grants to programs designed *2817 to include people of all races. See, e.g., Adarand, supra; Gratz, supra; Grutter, supra. But that legal circumstance cannot make a critical difference here for two separate reasons.

First, no case—not Adarand, Gratz, Grutter, or any other—has ever held that the test of "strict scrutiny" means that all racial classifications—no matter whether they seek to include or exclude—must in practice be treated the same. The Court did not say in Adarand or in Johnson or in Grutter that it was overturning Swann or its central constitutional principle.

Indeed, in its more recent opinions, the Court recognized that the "fundamental purpose" of strict scrutiny review is to "take relevant differences" between "fundamentally different situations ... into account." Adarand, 515 U.S., at 228, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court made clear that "[s]trict scrutiny does not trea[t] dissimilar race-based decisions as though they were equally objectionable." Ibid (internal quotation marks omitted). It added that the fact that a law "treats [a person] unequally because of his or her race ... says nothing about the ultimate validity of any particular law." Id., at 229–230, 115 S.Ct. 2097. And the Court, using the very phrase that Justice Marshall had used to describe strict scrutiny's application to any exclusionary use of racial criteria, sought to "dispel the notion that strict scrutiny" is as likely to condemn inclusive uses of "race-conscious" criteria 833 as it is to invalidate exclusionary uses. That is, it is not in all circumstances " 'strict in theory, but fatal in fact.' " Id., at 237, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (quoting Fullilove, 448 U.S., at 519, 100 S.Ct. 2758 (Marshall, J., concurring in judgment)).

The Court in Grutter elaborated:

> "Strict scrutiny is not 'strict in theory, but fatal in fact.' ... Although all governmental uses of race are subject to strict scrutiny, not all are invalidated by it....
>
> "Context matters when reviewing race-based governmental action under the Equal Protection Clause. See Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 343–344 [, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110] (1960) (admonishing that, 'in dealing with claims under broad provisions of the Constitution, which derive content by an interpretive process of inclusion and exclusion, it is imperative that generalizations, based on and qualified by the concrete situations that gave rise to them, must not be applied out of context in disregard of variant controlling facts')).... Not every decision influenced by race is equally objectionable, and strict scrutiny is designed to provide a framework for carefully examining the importance and the sincerity of the reasons advanced by the governmental decisionmaker for the use of race in that particular context." 539 U.S., at 326–327, 123 S.Ct. 2325.

The Court's holding in Grutter demonstrates that the Court meant what it said, for the Court upheld an elite law school's race-conscious admissions program.

The upshot is that the cases to which the plurality refers, though all applying strict scrutiny, do not treat exclusive and inclusive uses the same. Rather, they apply the strict scrutiny test in a manner that is "fatal in fact" only to racial classifications that harmfully exclude; they apply the test in a manner that is not fatal in fact to racial classifications that seek to include.

The plurality cannot avoid this simple fact. See ante, at 2764 – 2766. Today's opinion reveals that the plurality would 834 rewrite this Court's prior jurisprudence, at least in practical application, transforming the "strict scrutiny" test into a rule that is fatal in fact across the board. In doing so, the plurality parts company from *2818 this Court's prior cases, and it takes from local government the longstanding legal right to use race-conscious criteria for inclusive purposes in limited ways.

Second, as Grutter specified, "[c]ontext matters when reviewing race-based governmental action under the Equal Protection Clause." 539 U.S., at 327, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (citing Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 343–344, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960)). And contexts differ dramatically one from the other. Governmental use of race-based criteria can arise in the context of, for example, census forms, research expenditures for diseases, assignments of police officers patrolling predominantly minority-race neighborhoods, efforts to desegregate racially segregated schools, policies that favor minorities when distributing goods or services in short supply, actions that create majority-minority electoral districts, peremptory strikes that remove potential jurors on the basis of race, and others. Given the significant differences among these contexts, it would be surprising if the law required an identically strict legal test for evaluating the constitutionality of race-based criteria as to each of them.

Here, the context is one in which school districts seek to advance or to maintain racial integration in primary and secondary schools. It is a context, as Swann makes clear, where history has required special administrative remedies. And it is a context in which the school boards' plans simply set race-conscious limits at the outer boundaries of a broad range. This context is not a context that involves the use of race to decide who will receive goods or services that are normally distributed on the basis of merit and which are in short supply. It is not one in which race-conscious limits stigmatize 835 or exclude; the limits at issue do not pit the races against each other or otherwise significantly exacerbate racial tensions. They do not impose burdens unfairly upon members of one race alone but instead seek benefits for members of all races alike. The context here is one of racial limits that seek, not to keep the races apart, but to bring them together.

The importance of these differences is clear once one compares the present circumstances with other cases where one or more of these negative features are present. See, e.g., Strauder, 100 U.S. 303, 25 L.Ed. 664; Yick Wo, 118 U.S. 356, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220; Brown, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873; Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1967); Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750; Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 106 S.Ct. 1712, 90 L.Ed.2d 69 (1986); Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 109 S.Ct. 706, 102 L.Ed.2d 854 (1989); Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993); Adarand, 515 U.S. 200, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158; Grutter, supra; Gratz, 539 U.S. 244, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257; Johnson, 543 U.S. 499, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949.

If one examines the context more specifically, one finds that the districts' plans reflect efforts to overcome a history of segregation, embody the results of broad experience and community consultation, seek to expand student choice while reducing the need for mandatory busing, and use race-conscious criteria in highly limited ways that diminish the use of race compared to preceding integration efforts. Compare Wessmann v. Gittens, 160 F.3d 790, 809–810 (C.A.1 1998) (Boudin, J., concurring), with Comfort, 418 F.3d, at 28–29 (Boudin, C. J., concurring). They do not *2819 seek to award a scarce commodity on the basis of merit, for they are not magnet schools; rather, by design and in practice, they offer substantially equivalent academic programs and electives. Although some parents or children prefer some schools over others, school popularity has varied significantly over the years. In 2000, for example, Roosevelt was the most popular first choice high school in Seattle; in 2001, Ballard was the most popular; in 2000, West Seattle was one of the least popular; by 2003, it was one of the more popular. See Research, Evaluation and Assessment, Student Information 836 Services Office, Seattle Public Schools, Data Profile: District Summary December 2005 (hereinafter Data Profile: District Summary December 2005), online at http://www.seattleschools. org/area/siso/disprof/2005/DP05all.pdf. In a word, the school plans under review do not involve the kind of race-based harm that has led this Court, in other contexts, to find the use of race-conscious criteria unconstitutional.

These and related considerations convinced one Ninth Circuit judge in the Seattle case to apply a standard of constitutionality review that is less than "strict," and to conclude that this Court's precedents do not require the contrary. See 426 F.3d 1162, 1193–1194 (2005) (Parents Involved VII) (Kozinski, J., concurring) ("That a student is denied the school of his choice may be disappointing, but it carries no racial stigma and says nothing at all about that individual's aptitude or ability"). That judge is not alone. Cf. Gratz, supra, at 301, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (GINSBURG, J., dissenting); Adarand, supra, at 243, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (STEVENS, J., dissenting); Carter, When Victims Happen To Be Black, 97 Yale L.J. 420, 433–434 (1988).

The view that a more lenient standard than "strict scrutiny" should apply in the present context would not imply abandonment of judicial efforts carefully to determine the need for race-conscious criteria and the criteria's tailoring in light of the need. And the present context requires a court to examine carefully the race-conscious program at issue. In doing so, a reviewing judge must be fully aware of the potential dangers and pitfalls that Justice THOMAS and Justice KENNEDY mention. See ante, at 11–12 (THOMAS, J., concurring); ante, at 3, 17 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).

But unlike the plurality, such a judge would also be aware that a legislature or school administrators, ultimately accountable to the electorate, could nonetheless properly conclude that a racial classification sometimes serves a purpose important enough to overcome the risks they mention, for 837 example, helping to end racial isolation or to achieve a diverse student body in public schools. Cf. ante, at 2796 – 2797 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.). Where that is so, the judge would carefully examine the program's details to determine whether the use of race-conscious criteria is proportionate to the important ends it serves.

In my view, this contextual approach to scrutiny is altogether fitting. I believe that the law requires application here of a standard of review that is not "strict" in the traditional sense of that word, although it does require the careful review I have just described. See Gratz, supra, at 301, 123 S.Ct. 2411 (GINSBURG, J., joined by SOUTER, J., dissenting); Adarand, supra, at 242–249, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (STEVENS, J., joined by GINSBURG, J., dissenting); Parents Involved VII, supra, at 1193–1194 (Kozinski, J., concurring). Apparently Justice KENNEDY also agrees that strict scrutiny would not apply in respect to certain "race-conscious" school board policies. See ante, at 2793 – 2794 ("Executive and legislative branches, which for generations now have considered these types of policies and procedures, *2820 should be permitted to employ them with candor and with confidence that a constitutional violation does not occur whenever a decisionmaker considers the impact a given approach might have on students of different races").

Nonetheless, in light of Grutter and other precedents, see, e.g., Bakke, supra, at 290, 98 S.Ct. 2733 (opinion of Powell, J.), I shall adopt the first alternative. I shall apply the version of strict scrutiny that those cases embody. I shall consequently ask whether the school boards in Seattle and Louisville adopted these plans to serve a "compelling governmental interest" and, if so, whether the plans are "narrowly tailored" to achieve that interest. If the plans survive this strict review, they would survive less exacting review a fortiori. Hence, I conclude that the plans before us pass both parts of the strict scrutiny test. Consequently I must conclude that the plans here are permitted under the Constitution.

838 III

Applying the Legal Standard

A

Compelling Interest

The principal interest advanced in these cases to justify the use of race-based criteria goes by various names. Sometimes a court refers to it as an interest in achieving racial "diversity." Other times a court, like the plurality here, refers to it as an interest in racial "balancing." I have used more general terms to signify that interest, describing it, for example, as an interest in promoting or preserving greater racial "integration" of public schools. By this term, I mean the school districts' interest in eliminating school-by-school racial isolation and increasing the degree to which racial mixture characterizes each of the district's schools and each individual student's public school experience.

Regardless of its name, however, the interest at stake possesses three essential elements. First, there is a historical and remedial element: an interest in setting right the consequences of prior conditions of segregation. This refers back to a time when public schools were highly segregated, often as a result of legal or administrative policies that facilitated racial segregation in public schools. It is an interest in continuing to combat the remnants of segregation caused in whole or in part by these school-related policies, which have often affected not only schools, but also housing patterns, employment practices, economic conditions, and social attitudes. It is an interest in maintaining hard-won gains. And it has its roots in preventing what gradually may become the de facto resegregation of America's public schools. See Part I, supra, at 2801 – 2802; Appendix A, infra. See also ante, at 2796 – 2797 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.) ("This Nation has a moral and ethical obligation to fulfill its historic commitment to creating an integrated society that ensures equal opportunity for all of its children").

839 Second, there is an educational element: an interest in overcoming the adverse educational effects produced by and associated with highly segregated schools. Cf. Grutter, 539 U.S., at 345, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (GINSBURG, J., concurring). Studies suggest that children taken from those schools and placed in integrated settings often show positive academic gains. See, e.g., Powell, Living and Learning: Linking Housing and Education, in Pursuit of a Dream Deferred: Linking Housing and Education Policy 15, 35 (J. Powell, G. Kearney, & V. Kay eds.2001) (hereinafter Powell); Hallinan, Diversity Effects on Student Outcomes: Social Science Evidence, 59 Ohio St. L.J. 733, 741–742 (1998) (hereinafter Hallinan).

*2821 Other studies reach different conclusions. See, e.g., D. Armor, Forced Justice (1995). See also ante, at 2776 – 2777 (THOMAS, J., concurring). But the evidence supporting an educational interest in racially integrated schools is well established and strong enough to permit a democratically elected school board reasonably to determine that this interest is a compelling one.

Research suggests, for example, that black children from segregated educational environments significantly increase their achievement levels once they are placed in a more integrated setting. Indeed, in Louisville itself, the achievement gap between black and white elementary school students grew substantially smaller (by seven percentage points) after the integration plan was implemented in 1975. See Powell 35. Conversely, to take another example, evidence from a district in Norfolk, Virginia, shows that resegregated schools led to a decline in the achievement test scores of children of all races. Ibid.

One commentator, reviewing dozens of studies of the educational benefits of desegregated schooling, found that the studies have provided "remarkably consistent" results, showing that: (1) black students' educational achievement is improved in integrated schools as compared to racially isolated schools, (2) black students' educational achievement is improved 840 in integrated classes, and (3) the earlier that black students are removed from racial isolation, the better their educational outcomes. See Hallinan 741–742. Multiple studies also indicate that black alumni of integrated schools are more likely to move into occupations traditionally closed to African–Americans, and to earn more money in those fields. See, e.g., Schofield, Review of Research on School Desegregation's Impact on Elementary and Secondary School Students, in Handbook of Research on Multicultural Education 597, 606–607 (J. Banks & C. Banks eds.1995). Cf. W. Bowen & D. Bok, The Shape of the River 118 (1998) (hereinafter Bowen & Bok).

Third, there is a democratic element: an interest in producing an educational environment that reflects the "pluralistic society" in which our children will live. Swann, 402 U.S., at 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267. It is an interest in helping our children learn to work and play together with children of different racial backgrounds. It is an interest in teaching children to engage in the kind of cooperation among Americans of all races that is necessary to make a land of 300 million people one Nation.

Again, data support this insight. See, e.g., Hallinan 745; Quillian & Campbell, Beyond Black and White: The Present and Future of Multiracial Friendship Segregation, 68 Am. Sociological Rev. 540, 541 (2003) (hereinafter Quillian & Campbell); Dawkins & Braddock, The Continuing Significance of Desegregation: School Racial Composition and African American Inclusion in American Society, 63 J. Negro Educ. 394, 401–403 (1994) (hereinafter Dawkins & Braddock); Wells & Crain, Perpetuation Theory and the Long–Term Effects of School Desegregation, 64 Rev. Educ. Research 531, 550 (1994) (hereinafter Wells & Crain).

There are again studies that offer contrary conclusions. See, e.g., Schofield, School Desegregation and Intergroup Relations: A Review of the Literature, in 17 Review of Research in Education 335, 356 (G. Grant ed.1991). See also ante, at 2780 – 2781 (THOMAS, J., concurring). Again, however, 841 the evidence supporting a democratic interest in racially integrated schools is firmly established and sufficiently strong to permit a school board to determine, as this Court has itself often found, that this interest is compelling.

*2822 For example, one study documented that "black and white students in desegregated schools are less racially prejudiced than those in segregated schools," and that "interracial contact in desegregated schools leads to an increase in interracial sociability and friendship." Hallinan 745. See also Quillian & Campbell 541. Cf. Bowen & Bok 155. Other studies have found that both black and white students who attend integrated schools are more likely to work in desegregated companies after graduation than students who attended racially isolated schools. Dawkins & Braddock 401–403; Wells & Crain 550. Further research has shown that the desegregation of schools can help bring adult communities together by reducing segregated housing. Cities that have implemented successful school desegregation plans have witnessed increased interracial contact and neighborhoods that tend to become less racially segregated. Dawkins & Braddock 403. These effects not only reinforce the prior gains of integrated primary and secondary education; they also foresee a time when there is less need to use race-conscious criteria.

Moreover, this Court from Swann to Grutter has treated these civic effects as an important virtue of racially diverse education. See, e.g., Swann, supra, at 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267; Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S., at 472–473, 102 S.Ct. 3187. In Grutter, in the context of law school admissions, we found that these types of interests were, constitutionally speaking, "compelling." See 539 U.S., at 330, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (recognizing that Michigan Law School's race-conscious admissions policy "promotes cross-racial understanding, helps to break down racial stereotypes, and enables [students] to better understand persons of different races," and pointing out that "the skills needed in today's increasingly global marketplace can only be developed through exposure 842 to widely diverse people, cultures, ideas, and viewpoints" (internal quotation marks omitted; alteration in original)).

In light of this Court's conclusions in Grutter, the "compelling" nature of these interests in the context of primary and secondary public education follows here a fortiori. Primary and secondary schools are where the education of this Nation's children begins, where each of us begins to absorb those values we carry with us to the end of our days. As Justice Marshall said, "unless our children begin to learn together, there is little hope that our people will ever learn to live together." Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 783, 94 S.Ct. 3112, 41 L.Ed.2d 1069 (1974) (dissenting opinion).

And it was Brown, after all, focusing upon primary and secondary schools, not Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, 70 S.Ct. 848, 94 L.Ed. 1114 (1950), focusing on law schools, or McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents for Higher Ed., 339 U.S. 637, 70 S.Ct. 851, 94 L.Ed. 1149 (1950), focusing on graduate schools, that affected so deeply not only Americans but the world. R. Kluger, Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality, p. x (1975) (arguing that perhaps no other Supreme Court case has "affected more directly the minds, hearts, and daily lives of so many Americans"); J. Patterson, Brown v. Board of Education p. xxvii (2001) (identifying Brown as "the most eagerly awaited and dramatic judicial decision of modern times"). See also Parents Involved VII, 426 F.3d, at 1194 (Kozinski, J., concurring); Strauss, Discriminatory Intent and the Taming of Brown, 56 U. Chi. L.Rev. 935, 937 (1989) (calling Brown "the Supreme Court's greatest anti-discrimination decision"); Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae in Brown, O.T. *2823 1952, No. 8 etc.; Dudziak, Brown as a Cold War Case, 91 J. Am. Hist. 32 (2004); A Great Decision, Hindustan Times (New Delhi, May 20, 1954), p. 5; USA Takes Positive Step, West African Pilot (Lagos, May 22, 1954), p. 2 (stating that Brown is an acknowledgment that the "United States should set an example for all other nations by taking 843 the lead in removing from its national life all signs and traces of racial intolerance, arrogance or discrimination"). Hence, I am not surprised that Justice KENNEDY finds that "a district may consider it a compelling interest to achieve a diverse student population," including a racially diverse population. Ante, at 2796 – 2797.

The compelling interest at issue here, then, includes an effort to eradicate the remnants, not of general "societal discrimination," ante, at 2758 (plurality opinion), but of primary and secondary school segregation, see supra, at 2803, 2807; it includes an effort to create school environments that provide better educational opportunities for all children; it includes an effort to help create citizens better prepared to know, to understand, and to work with people of all races and backgrounds, thereby furthering the kind of democratic government our Constitution foresees. If an educational interest that combines these three elements is not "compelling," what is?

The majority acknowledges that in prior cases this Court has recognized at least two interests as compelling: an interest in "remedying the effects of past intentional discrimination," and an interest in "diversity in higher education." Ante, at 2806, 2807. But the plurality does not convincingly explain why those interests do not constitute a "compelling interest" here. How do the remedial interests here differ in kind from those at issue in the voluntary desegregation efforts that Attorney General Kennedy many years ago described in his letter to the President? Supra, at 2810 – 2811. How do the educational and civic interests differ in kind from those that underlie and justify the racial "diversity" that the law school sought in Grutter, where this Court found a compelling interest?

The plurality tries to draw a distinction by reference to the well-established conceptual difference between de jure segregation ("segregation by state action") and de facto segregation ("racial imbalance caused by other factors"). 844 Ante, at 2815. But that distinction concerns what the Constitution requires school boards to do, not what it permits them to do. Compare, e.g., Green, 391 U.S., at 437–438, 88 S.Ct. 1689 ("School boards ... operating state-compelled dual systems" have an "affirmative duty to take whatever steps might be necessary to convert to a unitary system in which racial discrimination would be eliminated root and branch"), with, e.g., Milliken, supra, at 745, 94 S.Ct. 3112 (the Constitution does not impose a duty to desegregate upon districts that have not been "shown to have committed any constitutional violation").

The opinions cited by the plurality to justify its reliance upon the de jure/de facto distinction only address what remedial measures a school district may be constitutionally required to undertake. See, e.g., Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 495, 112 S.Ct. 1430, 118 L.Ed.2d 108 (1992). As to what is permitted, nothing in our equal protection law suggests that a State may right only those wrongs that it committed. No case of this Court has ever relied upon the de jure/de facto distinction in order to limit what a school district is voluntarily allowed to do. That is what is at issue here. And Swann, McDaniel, Crawford, North Carolina Bd. of Ed., Harris, and Bustop made one thing clear: significant as the difference between de *2824 jure and de facto segregation may be to the question of what a school district must do, that distinction is not germane to the question of what a school district may do.

Nor does any precedent indicate, as the plurality suggests with respect to Louisville, ante, at 2815 – 2816, that remedial interests vanish the day after a federal court declares that a district is "unitary." Of course, Louisville adopted those portions of the plan at issue here before a court declared Louisville "unitary." Moreover, in Freeman, this Court pointed out that in "one sense of the term, vestiges of past segregation by state decree do remain in our society and in our schools. Past wrongs to the black race, wrongs committed by the State and in its name, are a stubborn fact of 845 history. And stubborn facts of history linger and persist." 503 U.S., at 495, 112 S.Ct. 1430. See also ante, at 2807 – 2808 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.). I do not understand why this Court's cases, which rest the significance of a "unitary" finding in part upon the wisdom and desirability of returning schools to local control, should deprive those local officials of legal permission to use means they once found necessary to combat persisting injustices.

For his part, Justice THOMAS faults my citation of various studies supporting the view that school districts can find compelling educational and civic interests in integrating their public schools. See ante, at 2776 – 2777, 2781 (concurring opinion). He is entitled of course to his own opinion as to which studies he finds convincing—although it bears mention that even the author of some of Justice THOMAS' preferred studies has found some evidence linking integrated learning environments to increased academic achievement. Compare ante, at 2776 – 2777 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (citing Armor & Rossell, Desegregation and Resegregation in the Public Schools, in Beyond the Color Line: New Perspectives on Race and Ethnicity in America 219, 239, 251 (A. Thernstrom & S. Thernstrom eds.2002)); Brief for David J. Armor et al. as Amici Curiae 29), with Rosen, Perhaps Not All Affirmative Action is Created Equal, N.Y. Times, June 11, 2006, section 4, p. 14 (quoting David Armor as commenting, " 'we did not find the [racial] achievement gap changing significantly ' " but acknowledging that he " 'did find a modest association for math but not reading in terms of racial composition and achievement, but there's a big state variation' " (emphasis added)). If we are to insist upon unanimity in the social science literature before finding a compelling interest, we might never find one. I believe only that the Constitution allows democratically elected school boards to make up their own minds as to how best to include people of all races in one America.

846 B

Narrow Tailoring

I next ask whether the plans before us are "narrowly tailored" to achieve these "compelling" objectives. I shall not accept the school boards' assurances on faith, cf. Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 920, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), and I shall subject the "tailoring" of their plans to "rigorous judicial review," Grutter, 539 U.S., at 388, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting). Several factors, taken together, nonetheless lead me to conclude that the boards' use of race-conscious criteria in these plans passes even the strictest "tailoring" test.

First, the race-conscious criteria at issue only help set the outer bounds of broad ranges. Cf. id., at 390, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (expressing concern about "narrow fluctuation band[s]"). They constitute but one part of plans that depend primarily upon other, nonracial elements. To use race in this way is not to set a forbidden "quota." See id., at 335, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (opinion of the Court) ("Properly understood, a 'quota' *2825 is a program in which a certain fixed number or proportion of opportunities are 'reserved exclusively for certain minority groups' " (quoting Croson, 488 U.S., at 496, 109 S.Ct. 706) (plurality opinion)).

In fact, the defining feature of both plans is greater emphasis upon student choice. In Seattle, for example, in more than 80% of all cases, that choice alone determines which high schools Seattle's ninth graders will attend. After ninth grade, students can decide voluntarily to transfer to a preferred district high school (without any consideration of race-conscious criteria). Choice, therefore, is the "predominant factor" in these plans. Race is not. See Grutter, supra, at 393, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting) (allowing consideration of race only if it does "not become a predominant factor").

Indeed, the race-conscious ranges at issue in these cases often have no effect, either because the particular school is not oversubscribed in the year in question, or because the 847 racial makeup of the school falls within the broad range, or because the student is a transfer applicant or has a sibling at the school. In these respects, the broad ranges are less like a quota and more like the kinds of "useful starting points" that this Court has consistently found permissible, even when they set boundaries upon voluntary transfers, and even when they are based upon a community's general population. See, e.g., North Carolina Bd. of Ed. v. Swann, 402 U.S., at 46, 91 S.Ct. 1284, 28 L.Ed.2d 586 (no "absolute prohibition against [the] use" of mathematical ratios as a "starting point"); Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S., at 24–25, 91 S.Ct. 1267 (approving the use of a ratio reflecting "the racial composition of the whole school system" as a "useful starting point," but not as an "inflexible requirement"). Cf. United States v. Montgomery County Bd. of Ed., 395 U.S. 225, 232, 89 S.Ct. 1670, 23 L.Ed.2d 263 (1969) (approving a lower court desegregation order that "provided that the [school] board must move toward a goal under which 'in each school the ratio of white to Negro faculty members is substantially the same as it is throughout the system,' " and "immediately" requiring "[t]he ratio of Negro to white teachers" in each school to be equal to "the ratio of Negro to white teachers in ... the system as a whole").

Second, broad-range limits on voluntary school choice plans are less burdensome, and hence more narrowly tailored, see Grutter, supra, at 341, 123 S.Ct. 2325, than other race-conscious restrictions this Court has previously approved. See, e.g., Swann, supra, at 26–27, 91 S.Ct. 1267; Montgomery County Bd. of Ed., supra, at 232, 89 S.Ct. 1670. Indeed, the plans before us are more narrowly tailored than the race-conscious admission plans that this Court approved in Grutter. Here, race becomes a factor only in a fraction of students' non-merit-based assignments—not in large numbers of students' merit-based applications. Moreover, the effect of applying race-conscious criteria here affects potentially disadvantaged students less severely, not more severely, than the criteria at issue in Grutter. Disappointed students are not rejected from a 848 State's flagship graduate program; they simply attend a different one of the district's many public schools, which in aspiration and in fact are substantially equal. Cf. Wygant, 476 U.S., at 283, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion). And, in Seattle, the disadvantaged student loses at most one year at the high school of his choice. One will search Grutter in vain for similarly persuasive evidence of narrow tailoring as the school districts have presented here.

Third, the manner in which the school boards developed these plans itself reflects "narrow tailoring." Each plan was devised to overcome a history of segregated public *2826 schools. Each plan embodies the results of local experience and community consultation. Each plan is the product of a process that has sought to enhance student choice, while diminishing the need for mandatory busing. And each plan's use of race-conscious elements is diminished compared to the use of race in preceding integration plans.

The school boards' widespread consultation, their experimentation with numerous other plans, indeed, the 40–year history that Part I sets forth, make clear that plans that are less explicitly race-based are unlikely to achieve the boards' "compelling" objectives. The history of each school system reveals highly segregated schools, followed by remedial plans that involved forced busing, followed by efforts to attract or retain students through the use of plans that abandoned busing and replaced it with greater student choice. Both cities once tried to achieve more integrated schools by relying solely upon measures such as redrawn district boundaries, new school building construction, and unrestricted voluntary transfers. In neither city did these prior attempts prove sufficient to achieve the city's integration goals. See Parts I–A and I–B, supra, at 2802 – 2809.

Moreover, giving some degree of weight to a local school board's knowledge, expertise, and concerns in these particular matters is not inconsistent with rigorous judicial scrutiny. It simply recognizes that judges are not well suited to act 849 as school administrators. Indeed, in the context of school desegregation, this Court has repeatedly stressed the importance of acknowledging that local school boards better understand their own communities and have a better knowledge of what in practice will best meet the educational needs of their pupils. See Milliken, 418 U.S., at 741–742, 94 S.Ct. 3112 ("No single tradition in public education is more deeply rooted than local control over the operation of schools; local autonomy has long been thought essential both to the maintenance of community concern and support for public schools and to quality of the educational process"). See also San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 49–50, 93 S.Ct. 1278, 36 L.Ed.2d 16 (1973) (extolling local control for "the opportunity it offers for participation in the decisionmaking process that determines how ... local tax dollars will be spent. Each locality is free to tailor local programs to local needs. Pluralism also affords some opportunity for experimentation, innovation, and a healthy competition for educational excellence"); Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 104, 89 S.Ct. 266, 21 L.Ed.2d 228 (1968) ("Judicial interposition in the operation of the public school system of the Nation raises problems requiring care and restraint.... By and large, public education in our Nation is committed to the control of state and local authorities"); Brown v. Board of Education, 349 U.S. 294, 299, 75 S.Ct. 753, 99 L.Ed. 1083 (1955) ("Full implementation of these constitutional principles may require solution of varied local school problems. School authorities have the primary responsibility for elucidating, assessing, and solving these problems; courts will have to consider whether the action of school authorities constitutes good faith implementation of the governing constitutional principles").

Experience in Seattle and Louisville is consistent with experience elsewhere. In 1987, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights studied 125 large school districts seeking integration. It reported that most districts—92 of them, in fact—adopted desegregation policies that combined two or more highly 850 race-conscious strategies, for example, rezoning or pairing. See Welch 83–91.

*2827 Having looked at dozens of amicus briefs, public reports, news stories, and the records in many of this Court's prior cases, which together span 50 years of desegregation history in school districts across the Nation, I have discovered many examples of districts that sought integration through explicitly race-conscious methods, including mandatory busing. Yet, I have found no example or model that would permit this Court to say to Seattle and to Louisville: "Here is an instance of a desegregation plan that is likely to achieve your objectives and also makes less use of race-conscious criteria than your plans." And, if the plurality cannot suggest such a model—and it cannot—then it seeks to impose a "narrow tailoring" requirement that in practice would never be met.

Indeed, if there is no such plan, or if such plans are purely imagined, it is understandable why, as the Court notes, ante, at 2759 – 2760, Seattle school officials concentrated on diminishing the racial component of their districts' plan, but did not pursue eliminating that element entirely. For the Court now to insist as it does, ante, at 2760 – 2761, that these school districts ought to have said so officially is either to ask for the superfluous (if they need only make explicit what is implicit) or to demand the impossible (if they must somehow provide more proof that there is no hypothetical other plan that could work as well as theirs). I am not aware of any case in which this Court has read the "narrow tailoring" test to impose such a requirement. Cf. People Who Care v. Rockford Bd. of Ed. School Dist. No. 205, 961 F.2d 1335, 1338 (C.A.7 1992) (Easterbrook, J.) ("Would it be necessary to adjudicate the obvious before adopting (or permitting the parties to agree on) a remedy ... ?").

The plurality also points to the school districts' use of numerical goals based upon the racial breakdown of the general school population, and it faults the districts for failing to prove that no other set of numbers will work. See 851 ante, at 2755 – 2757. The plurality refers to no case in support of its demand. Nor is it likely to find such a case. After all, this Court has in many cases explicitly permitted districts to use target ratios based upon the district's underlying population. See, e.g., Swann, 402 U.S., at 24–25, 91 S.Ct. 1267; North Carolina Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S., at 46, 91 S.Ct. 1284; Montgomery County Bd. of Ed., 395 U.S., at 232, 89 S.Ct. 1670. The reason is obvious: In Seattle, where the overall student population is 41% white, permitting 85% white enrollment at a single school would make it much more likely that other schools would have very few white students, whereas in Jefferson County, with a 60% white enrollment, one school with 85% white students would be less likely to skew enrollments elsewhere.

Moreover, there is research-based evidence supporting, for example, that a ratio no greater than 50% minority—which is Louisville's starting point, and as close as feasible to Seattle's starting point—is helpful in limiting the risk of "white flight." See Orfield, Metropolitan School Desegregation: Impacts on Metropolitan Society, in Pursuit of a Dream Deferred: Linking Housing and Education Policy 121, 125. Federal law also assumes that a similar target percentage will help avoid detrimental "minority group isolation." See No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, Title V, Part C, 115 Stat. 1806, 20 U.S.C. § 7231 et seq. (2000 ed., Supp. IV); 34 CFR §§ 280.2, 280.4 (2006) (implementing regulations). What other numbers are the boards to use as a "starting point"? Are they to spend days, weeks, or months seeking independently to validate the use of ratios that this Court has repeatedly authorized in prior cases? Are they to draw numbers out of thin air? These districts *2828 have followed this Court's holdings and advice in "tailoring" their plans. That, too, strongly supports the lawfulness of their methods.

Nor could the school districts have accomplished their desired aims (e.g., avoiding forced busing, countering white flight, maintaining racial diversity) by other means. Nothing in the extensive history of desegregation efforts over the 852 past 50 years gives the districts, or this Court, any reason to believe that another method is possible to accomplish these goals. Nevertheless, Justice KENNEDY suggests that school boards

> "may pursue the goal of bringing together students of diverse backgrounds and races through other means, including strategic site selection of new schools; drawing attendance zones with general recognition of the demographics of neighborhoods; allocating resources for special programs; recruiting students and faculty in a targeted fashion; and tracking enrollments, performance, and other statistics by race." Ante, at 2791 – 2792.

But, as to "strategic site selection," Seattle has built one new high school in the last 44 years (and that specialized school serves only 300 students). In fact, six of the Seattle high schools involved in this case were built by the 1920's; the other four were open by the early 1960's. See generally N. Thompson & C. Marr, Building for Learning: Seattle Public School Histories, 1862–2000 (2002). As to "drawing" neighborhood "attendance zones" on a racial basis, Louisville tried it, and it worked only when forced busing was also part of the plan. See supra, at 2806 – 2807. As to "allocating resources for special programs," Seattle and Louisville have both experimented with this; indeed, these programs are often referred to as "magnet schools," but the limited desegregation effect of these efforts extends at most to those few schools to which additional resources are granted. In addition, there is no evidence from the experience of these school districts that it will make any meaningful impact. See Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, p. 42. As to "recruiting faculty" on the basis of race, both cities have tried, but only as one part of a broader program. As to "tracking enrollments, performance, and other statistics by race," tracking reveals the problem; it does not cure it.

853 Justice KENNEDY sets forth two additional concerns related to "narrow tailoring." In respect to Louisville, he says first that officials stated (1) that kindergarten assignments are not subject to the race-conscious guidelines, and (2) that the child at issue here was denied permission to attend the kindergarten he wanted because of those guidelines. Both, he explains, cannot be true. He adds that this confusion illustrates that Louisville's assignment plan (or its explanation of it to this Court) is insufficiently precise in respect to "who makes the decisions," "oversight," "the precise circumstances in which an assignment decision" will be made; and "which of two similarly situated children will be subjected to a given race-based decision." Ante, at 2790.

The record suggests, however, that the child in question was not assigned to the school he preferred because he missed the kindergarten application deadline. See App. in No. 05–915, p. 20. After he had enrolled and after the academic year had begun, he then applied to transfer to his preferred school after the kindergarten assignment deadline had passed, id., at 21, possibly causing school officials to treat his late request as an application to transfer to the first grade, in respect to which the guidelines apply. I am not certain just how the remainder of Justice KENNEDY's *2829 concerns affect the lawfulness of the Louisville program, for they seem to be failures of explanation, not of administration. But Louisville should be able to answer the relevant questions on remand.

Justice KENNEDY's second concern is directly related to the merits of Seattle's plan: Why does Seattle's plan group Asian–Americans, Hispanic–Americans, Native–Americans, and African–Americans together, treating all as similar minorities? Ante, at 2790 – 2791. The majority suggests that Seattle's classification system could permit a school to be labeled "diverse" with a 50% Asian–American and 50% white student body, and no African–American students, Hispanic 854 students, or students of other ethnicity. Ante, at 2749 (opinion of Kennedy, J.); ante, at 2753 – 2754 (opinion of the Court).

The 50/50 hypothetical has no support in the record here; it is conjured from the imagination. In fact, Seattle apparently began to treat these different minority groups alike in response to the federal Emergency School Aid Act's requirement that it do so. A. Siqueland, Without A Court Order: The Desegregation of Seattle's Schools 116–117 (1981) (hereinafter Siqueland). See also F. Hanawalt & R. Williams, The History of Desegregation in Seattle Public Schools 1954–1981, p. 31 (1981) (hereinafter Hanawalt); Pub.L. 95–561, Title VI, 92 Stat. 2252 (prescribing percentage enrollment requirements for "minority" students); Siqueland 55 (discussing Department of Health, Education, and Welfare's definition of "minority"). Moreover, maintaining this federally mandated system of classification makes sense insofar as Seattle's experience indicates that the relevant circumstances in respect to each of these different minority groups are roughly similar, e.g., in terms of residential patterns, and call for roughly similar responses. This is confirmed by the fact that Seattle has been able to achieve a desirable degree of diversity without the greater emphasis on race that drawing fine lines among minority groups would require. Does the plurality's view of the Equal Protection Clause mean that courts must give no weight to such a board determination? Does it insist upon especially strong evidence supporting inclusion of multiple minority groups in an otherwise lawful government minority-assistance program? If so, its interpretation threatens to produce divisiveness among minority groups that is incompatible with the basic objectives of the Fourteenth Amendment. Regardless, the plurality cannot object that the constitutional defect is the individualized use of race and simultaneously object that not enough account of individuals' race has been taken.

Finally, I recognize that the Court seeks to distinguish Grutter from these cases by claiming that Grutter arose in 855 " 'the context of higher education.' " Ante, at 2808. But that is not a meaningful legal distinction. I have explained why I do not believe the Constitution could possibly find "compelling" the provision of a racially diverse education for a 23–year–old law student but not for a 13–year–old high school pupil. See supra, at 2824 – 2826. And I have explained how the plans before us are more narrowly tailored than those in Grutter. See supra, at 2824. I add that one cannot find a relevant distinction in the fact that these school districts did not examine the merits of applications "individual[ly]." See ante, at 2806 – 2808. The context here does not involve admission by merit; a child's academic, artistic, and athletic "merits" are not at all relevant to the child's placement. These are not affirmative action plans, and hence "individualized scrutiny" is simply beside the point.

The upshot is that these plans' specific features—(1) their limited and historically diminishing use of race, (2) their strong reliance upon other non-race-conscious elements, (3) their history and the manner in which the districts developed and modified their approach, (4) the comparison with *2830 prior plans, and (5) the lack of reasonably evident alternatives—together show that the districts' plans are "narrowly tailored" to achieve their "compelling" goals. In sum, the districts' race-conscious plans satisfy "strict scrutiny" and are therefore lawful.

IV

Direct Precedent

Two additional precedents more directly related to the plans here at issue reinforce my conclusion. The first consists of the District Court determination in the Louisville case when it dissolved its desegregation order that there was "overwhelming evidence of the Board's good faith compliance with the desegregation Decree and its underlying purposes," indeed that the board had "treated the ideal of an integrated system as much more than a legal obligation—they consider 856 it a positive, desirable policy and an essential element of any well-rounded public school education." Hampton v. Jefferson Cty. Bd. of Ed., 102 F.Supp.2d 358, 370 (W.D.Ky. 2000) (Hampton II). When the court made this determination in 2000, it did so in the context of the Louisville desegregation plan that the board had adopted in 1996. That plan, which took effect before 1996, is the very plan that in all relevant respects is in effect now and is the subject of the present challenge.

No one claims that (the relevant portion of) Louisville's plan was unlawful in 1996 when Louisville adopted it. To the contrary, there is every reason to believe that it represented part of an effort to implement the 1978 desegregation order. But if the plan was lawful when it was first adopted and if it was lawful the day before the District Court dissolved its order, how can the plurality now suggest that it became unlawful the following day? Is it conceivable that the Constitution, implemented through a court desegregation order, could permit (perhaps require) the district to make use of a race-conscious plan the day before the order was dissolved and then forbid the district to use the identical plan the day after? See id., at 380 ("The very analysis for dissolving desegregation decrees supports continued maintenance of a desegregated system as a compelling state interest"). The Equal Protection Clause is not incoherent. And federal courts would rightly hesitate to find unitary status if the consequences of the ruling were so dramatically disruptive.

Second, Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896, is directly on point. That case involves the original Seattle Plan, a more heavily race-conscious predecessor of the very plan now before us. In Seattle School Dist. No. 1, this Court struck down a state referendum that effectively barred implementation of Seattle's desegregation plan and "burden[ed] all future attempts to integrate Washington schools in districts throughout the State." Id., at 462–463, 483, 102 S.Ct. 3187. Because 857 the referendum would have prohibited the adoption of a school integration plan that involved mandatory busing, and because it would have imposed a special burden on school integration plans (plans that sought to integrate previously segregated schools), the Court found it unconstitutional. Id., at 483–487, 102 S.Ct. 3187.

In reaching this conclusion, the Court did not directly address the constitutional merits of the underlying Seattle Plan. But it explicitly cited Swann's statement that the Constitution permitted a local district to adopt such a plan. 458 U.S., at 472, n. 15, 102 S.Ct. 3187. It also cited to Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke, approving of the limited use of race-conscious criteria in a university-admissions "affirmative action" case. 458 U.S., at 472, n. 15, 102 S.Ct. 3187. In addition, the Court stated that "[a]ttending an ethnically diverse *2831 school," id., at 473, 102 S.Ct. 3187, could help prepare "minority children for citizenship in our pluralistic society," hopefully "teaching members of the racial majority to live in harmony and mutual respect with children of minority heritage." Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted).

It is difficult to believe that the Court that held unconstitutional a referendum that would have interfered with the implementation of this plan thought that the integration plan it sought to preserve was itself an unconstitutional plan. And if Seattle School Dist. No. 1 is premised upon the constitutionality of the original Seattle Plan, it is equally premised upon the constitutionality of the present plan, for the present plan is the Seattle Plan, modified only insofar as it places even less emphasis on race-conscious elements than its predecessors.

It is even more difficult to accept the plurality's contrary view, namely, that the underlying plan was unconstitutional. If that is so, then all of Seattle's earlier (even more race-conscious) plans must also have been unconstitutional. That necessary implication of the plurality's position strikes the 13th chime of the clock. How could the plurality adopt a 858 constitutional standard that would hold unconstitutional large numbers of race-conscious integration plans adopted by numerous school boards over the past 50 years while remaining true to this Court's desegregation precedent?

V

Consequences

The Founders meant the Constitution as a practical document that would transmit its basic values to future generations through principles that remained workable over time. Hence it is important to consider the potential consequences of the plurality's approach, as measured against the Constitution's objectives. To do so provides further reason to believe that the plurality's approach is legally unsound.

For one thing, consider the effect of the plurality's views on the parties before us and on similar school districts throughout the Nation. Will Louisville and all similar school districts have to return to systems like Louisville's initial 1956 plan, which did not consider race at all? See supra, at 2806. That initial 1956 plan proved ineffective. Sixteen years into the plan, 14 of 19 middle and high schools remained almost totally white or almost totally black. Ibid.

The districts' past and current plans are not unique. They resemble other plans, promulgated by hundreds of local school boards, which have attempted a variety of desegregation methods that have evolved over time in light of experience. A 1987 Civil Rights Commission study of 125 school districts in the Nation demonstrated the breadth and variety of desegregation plans:

> "The [study] documents almost 300 desegregation plans that were implemented between 1961 and 1985. The degree of heterogeneity within these districts is immediately apparent. They are located in every region of the country and range in size from Las Cruces, New Mexico, with barely over 15,000 students attending 23 schools in 1968, to New York City, with more than one 859 million students in 853 schools. The sample includes districts in urban areas of all sizes, suburbs (e.g., Arlington County, Virginia) and rural areas (e.g., Jefferson Parish, Louisiana, and Raleigh County, West Virginia). It contains 34 countywide districts with central cities (the 11 Florida districts fit this description, plus Clark County, Nevada and *2832 others) and a small number of consolidated districts (New Castle County, Delaware and Jefferson County, Kentucky).
>
> "The districts also vary in their racial compositions and levels of segregation. Initial plans were implemented in Mobile, Alabama and Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, and in a number of other southern districts in the face of total racial segregation. At the other extreme, Santa Clara, California had a relatively even racial distribution prior to its 1979 desegregation plan. When the 1965 plan was designed for Harford County, Maryland, the district was 92 percent white. Compton, California, on the other hand, became over 99 percent black in the 1980s, while Buffalo, New York had a virtual 50–50 split between white and minority students prior to its 1977 plan.
>
> "It is not surprising to find a large number of different desegregation strategies in a sample with this much variation." Welch 23 (footnote omitted).

A majority of these desegregation techniques explicitly considered a student's race. See id., at 24–28. Transfer plans, for example, allowed students to shift from a school in which they were in the racial majority to a school in which they would be in a racial minority. Some districts, such as Richmond, California, and Buffalo, New York, permitted only "one-way" transfers, in which only black students attending predominantly black schools were permitted to transfer to designated receiver schools. Id., at 25. Fifty-three of the one hundred twenty-five studied districts used transfers as a component of their plans. Id., at 83–91.

860 At the state level, 46 States and Puerto Rico have adopted policies that encourage or require local school districts to enact interdistrict or intradistrict open choice plans. Eight of those States condition approval of transfers to another school or district on whether the transfer will produce increased racial integration. Eleven other States require local boards to deny transfers that are not in compliance with the local school board's desegregation plans. See Education Commission of the States, StateNotes, Open Enrollment: 50–State Report (2007), online at http:// mb2.ecs.org/reports/Report.aspx?id =268.

Arkansas, for example, provides by statute that "[n]o student may transfer to a nonresident district where the percentage of enrollment for the student's race exceeds that percentage in the student's resident district." Ark.Code Ann. § 6–18–206(f)(1), as amended, 2007 Ark. Gen. Acts no. 552. An Ohio statute provides, in respect to student choice, that each school district must establish "[p]rocedures to ensure that an appropriate racial balance is maintained in the district schools." Ohio Rev.Code Ann. § 3313.98(B)(2)(b)(iii) (Lexis Supp.2006). Ohio adds that a "district may object to the enrollment of a native student in an adjacent or other district in order to maintain an appropriate racial balance." § 3313.98(F)(1)(a).

A Connecticut statute states that its student choice program will seek to "preserve racial and ethnic balance." Conn. Gen.Stat. § 10–266aa(b)(2) (2007). Connecticut law requires each school district to submit racial group population figures to the State Board of Education. § 10–226a. Another Connecticut regulation provides that "[a]ny school in which the Proportion for the School falls outside of a range from 25 percentage points less to 25 percentage points more than the Comparable Proportion for the School District, shall be determined to be racially imbalanced." Conn. Agencies Regs. § 10–226e–3(b) (1999). A "racial imbalance" determination requires the district to submit a plan to correct the 861 racial imbalance, which plan may include *2833 "mandatory pupil reassignment." §§ 10–226e–5(a) and (c)(4).

Interpreting that State's Constitution, the Connecticut Supreme Court has held legally inadequate the reliance by a local school district solely upon some of the techniques Justice KENNEDY today recommends (e.g., reallocating resources, etc.). See Sheff v. O'Neill, 238 Conn. 1, 678 A.2d 1267 (1996). The State Supreme Court wrote: "Despite the initiatives undertaken by the defendants to alleviate the severe racial and ethnic disparities among school districts, and despite the fact that the defendants did not intend to create or maintain these disparities, the disparities that continue to burden the education of the plaintiffs infringe upon their fundamental state constitutional right to a substantially equal educational opportunity." Id., at 42, 678 A.2d, at 1289.

At a minimum, the plurality's views would threaten a surge of race-based litigation. Hundreds of state and federal statutes and regulations use racial classifications for educational or other purposes. See supra, at 2814 – 2815. In many such instances, the contentious force of legal challenges to these classifications, meritorious or not, would displace earlier calm.

The wide variety of different integration plans that school districts use throughout the Nation suggests that the problem of racial segregation in schools, including de facto segregation, is difficult to solve. The fact that many such plans have used explicitly racial criteria suggests that such criteria have an important, sometimes necessary, role to play. The fact that the controlling opinion would make a school district's use of such criteria often unlawful (and the plurality's "colorblind" view would make such use always unlawful) suggests that today's opinion will require setting aside the laws of several States and many local communities.

As I have pointed out, supra, at 2801 – 2802, de facto resegregation is on the rise. See Appendix A, infra. It is reasonable 862 to conclude that such resegregation can create serious educational, social, and civic problems. See supra, at 2820 – 2824. Given the conditions in which school boards work to set policy, see supra, at 2811 – 2812, they may need all of the means presently at their disposal to combat those problems. Yet the plurality would deprive them of at least one tool that some districts now consider vital—the limited use of broad race-conscious student population ranges.

I use the words "may need" here deliberately. The plurality, or at least those who follow Justice THOMAS' " 'color-blind' " approach, see ante, at 2782 – 2783 (concurring opinion); Grutter, 539 U.S., at 353–354, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), may feel confident that, to end invidious discrimination, one must end all governmental use of race-conscious criteria including those with inclusive objectives. See ante, at 2767 – 2768 (plurality opinion); see also ante, at 2782 (THOMAS, J., concurring). By way of contrast, I do not claim to know how best to stop harmful discrimination; how best to create a society that includes all Americans; how best to overcome our serious problems of increasing de facto segregation, troubled inner-city schooling, and poverty correlated with race. But, as a judge, I do know that the Constitution does not authorize judges to dictate solutions to these problems. Rather, the Constitution creates a democratic political system through which the people themselves must together find answers. And it is for them to debate how best to educate the Nation's children and how best to administer America's schools to achieve that aim. The Court should leave them to their work. And it is for *2834 them to decide, to quote the plurality's slogan, whether the best "way to stop discrimination on the basis of race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race." Ante, at 2821 – 2822. See also Parents Involved VII, 426 F.3d, at 1222 (Bea, J., dissenting) ("The way to end racial discrimination is to stop discriminating by race"). That is why the Equal Protection Clause outlaws 863 invidious discrimination, but does not similarly forbid all use of race-conscious criteria.

Until today, this Court understood the Constitution as affording the people, acting through their elected representatives, freedom to select the use of "race-conscious" criteria from among their available options. See Adarand, 515 U.S., at 237, 115 S.Ct. 2097 ("[S]trict scrutiny" in this context is "[not] 'strict in theory, but fatal in fact' " (quoting Fullilove, 448 U.S., at 519, 100 S.Ct. 2758 (Marshall, J., concurring in judgment))). Today, however, the Court restricts (and some Members would eliminate) that leeway. I fear the consequences of doing so for the law, for the schools, for the democratic process, and for America's efforts to create, out of its diversity, one Nation.

VI

Conclusions

To show that the school assignment plans here meet the requirements of the Constitution, I have written at exceptional length. But that length is necessary. I cannot refer to the history of the plans in these cases to justify the use of race-conscious criteria without describing that history in full. I cannot rely upon Swann's statement that the use of race-conscious limits is permissible without showing, rather than simply asserting, that the statement represents a constitutional principle firmly rooted in federal and state law. Nor can I explain my disagreement with the Court's holding and the plurality's opinion without offering a detailed account of the arguments they propound and the consequences they risk.

Thus, the opinion's reasoning is long. But its conclusion is short: The plans before us satisfy the requirements of the Equal Protection Clause. And it is the plurality's opinion, not this dissent, that "fails to ground the result it would reach in law." Ante, at 2815.

Four basic considerations have led me to this view. First, the histories of Louisville and Seattle reveal complex circumstances 864 and a long tradition of conscientious efforts by local school boards to resist racial segregation in public schools. Segregation at the time of Brown gave way to expansive remedies that included busing, which in turn gave rise to fears of white flight and resegregation. For decades now, these school boards have considered and adopted and revised assignment plans that sought to rely less upon race, to emphasize greater student choice, and to improve the conditions of all schools for all students, no matter the color of their skin, no matter where they happen to reside. The plans under review—which are less burdensome, more egalitarian, and more effective than prior plans—continue in that tradition. And their history reveals school district goals whose remedial, educational, and democratic elements are inextricably intertwined each with the others. See Part I, supra, at 2801 – 2812.

Second, since this Court's decision in Brown, the law has consistently and unequivocally approved of both voluntary and compulsory race-conscious measures to combat segregated schools. The Equal Protection Clause, ratified following the Civil War, has always distinguished in practice between state action that excludes and thereby subordinates racial minorities *2835 and state action that seeks to bring together people of all races. From Swann to Grutter, this Court's decisions have emphasized this distinction, recognizing that the fate of race relations in this country depends upon unity among our children, "for unless our children begin to learn together, there is little hope that our people will ever learn to live together." Milliken, 418 U.S., at 783, 94 S.Ct. 3112 (Marshall, J., dissenting). See also Sumner, Equality Before the Law: Unconstitutionality of Separate Colored Schools in Massachusetts (Dec. 4, 1849), in 2 The Works of Charles Sumner 327, 371 (1870) ("The law contemplates not only that all shall be taught, but that all shall be taught together"). See Part II, supra, at 2811 – 2820.

865 Third, the plans before us, subjected to rigorous judicial review, are supported by compelling state interests and are narrowly tailored to accomplish those goals. Just as diversity in higher education was deemed compelling in Grutter, diversity in public primary and secondary schools —where there is even more to gain—must be, a fortiori, a compelling state interest. Even apart from Grutter, five Members of this Court agree that "avoiding racial isolation" and "achiev[ing] a diverse student population" remain today compelling interests. Ante, at 2796 – 2797 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.). These interests combine remedial, educational, and democratic objectives. For the reasons discussed above, however, I disagree with Justice KENNEDY that Seattle and Louisville have not done enough to demonstrate that their present plans are necessary to continue upon the path set by Brown. These plans are more "narrowly tailored" than the race-conscious law school admissions criteria at issue in Grutter. Hence, their lawfulness follows a fortiori from this Court's prior decisions. See Parts III–IV, supra, at 2820 – 2831.

Fourth, the plurality's approach risks serious harm to the law and for the Nation. Its view of the law rests either upon a denial of the distinction between exclusionary and inclusive use of race-conscious criteria in the context of the Equal Protection Clause, or upon such a rigid application of its "test" that the distinction loses practical significance. Consequently, the Court's decision today slows down and sets back the work of local school boards to bring about racially diverse schools. See Part V, supra, at 2831 – 2834.

Indeed, the consequences of the approach the Court takes today are serious. Yesterday, the plans under review were lawful. Today, they are not. Yesterday, the citizens of this Nation could look for guidance to this Court's unanimous pronouncements concerning desegregation. Today, they cannot. Yesterday, school boards had available to them a 866 full range of means to combat segregated schools. Today, they do not.

The Court's decision undermines other basic institutional principles as well. What has happened to stare decisis? The history of the plans before us, their educational importance, their highly limited use of race—all these and more—make clear that the compelling interest here is stronger than in Grutter. The plans here are more narrowly tailored than the law school admissions program there at issue. Hence, applying Grutter's strict test, their lawfulness follows a fortiori. To hold to the contrary is to transform that test from "strict" to "fatal in fact"—the very opposite of what Grutter said. And what has happened to Swann? To McDaniel? To Crawford? To Harris? To School Committee of Boston? To Seattle School Dist. No. 1? After decades of vibrant life, they would all, under the plurality's logic, be written out of the law.

And what of respect for democratic local decisionmaking by States and school *2836 boards? For several decades this Court has rested its public school decisions upon Swann's basic view that the Constitution grants local school districts a significant degree of leeway where the inclusive use of race-conscious criteria is at issue. Now localities will have to cope with the difficult problems they face (including resegregation) deprived of one means they may find necessary.

And what of law's concern to diminish and peacefully settle conflict among the Nation's people? Instead of accommodating different good-faith visions of our country and our Constitution, today's holding upsets settled expectations, creates legal uncertainty, and threatens to produce considerable further litigation, aggravating race-related conflict.

And what of the long history and moral vision that the Fourteenth Amendment itself embodies? The plurality cites in support those who argued in Brown against segregation, and Justice THOMAS likens the approach that I have taken to that of segregation's defenders. See ante, at 2767 –2768 867 (plurality opinion) (comparing Jim Crow segregation to Seattle and Louisville's integration polices); ante, at 2783 – 2786 (THOMAS, J., concurring). But segregation policies did not simply tell schoolchildren "where they could and could not go to school based on the color of their skin," ante, at 2767 – 2768 (plurality opinion); they perpetuated a caste system rooted in the institutions of slavery and 80 years of legalized subordination. The lesson of history, see ante, at 2767 (same), is not that efforts to continue racial segregation are constitutionally indistinguishable from efforts to achieve racial integration. Indeed, it is a cruel distortion of history to compare Topeka, Kansas, in the 1950's to Louisville and Seattle in the modern day—to equate the plight of Linda Brown (who was ordered to attend a Jim Crow school) to the circumstances of Joshua McDonald (whose request to transfer to a school closer to home was initially declined). This is not to deny that there is a cost in applying "a state-mandated racial label." Ante, at 2797 (KENNEDY, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). But that cost does not approach, in degree or in kind, the terrible harms of slavery, the resulting caste system, and 80 years of legal racial segregation.

* * *

Finally, what of the hope and promise of Brown? For much of this Nation's history, the races remained divided. It was not long ago that people of different races drank from separate fountains, rode on separate buses, and studied in separate schools. In this Court's finest hour, Brown v. Board of Education challenged this history and helped to change it. For Brown held out a promise. It was a promise embodied in three Amendments designed to make citizens of slaves. It was the promise of true racial equality—not as a matter of fine words on paper, but as a matter of everyday life in the Nation's cities and schools. It was about the nature of a democracy that must work for all Americans. It 868 sought one law, one Nation, one people, not simply as a matter of legal principle but in terms of how we actually live.

Not everyone welcomed this Court's decision in Brown. Three years after that decision was handed down, the Governor of Arkansas ordered state militia to block the doors of a white schoolhouse so that black children could not enter. The President of the United States dispatched the 101st Airborne Division to Little Rock, Arkansas, and federal troops were needed to enforce a desegregation decree. See Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 78 S.Ct. 1401, 3 L.Ed.2d 5 (1958). Today, almost 50 years later, attitudes toward race in this *2837 Nation have changed dramatically. Many parents, white and black alike, want their children to attend schools with children of different races. Indeed, the very school districts that once spurned integration now strive for it. The long history of their efforts reveals the complexities and difficulties they have faced. And in light of those challenges, they have asked us not to take from their hands the instruments they have used to rid their schools of racial segregation, instruments that they believe are needed to overcome the problems of cities divided by race and poverty. The plurality would decline their modest request.

The plurality is wrong to do so. The last half century has witnessed great strides toward racial equality, but we have not yet realized the promise of Brown. To invalidate the plans under review is to threaten the promise of Brown. The plurality's position, I fear, would break that promise. This is a decision that the Court and the Nation will come to regret.

I must dissent.

.

869 APPENDIXES

A

Resegregation Trends

Percentage of Black Students in 90–100 Percent Nonwhite and Majority Nonwhite Public Schools by Region, 1950–1954 to 2000, Fall Enrollment

Region	1950–1954	1960–1961	1968	1972	1976	1980	1989	1998	2000
Percentage in 90–100% Nonwhite Schools
Northeast	—	40	42.7	46.9	51.4	48.7	49.8	50.2	51.2
Border	100	59	60.2	54.7	42.5	37.0	33.7	39.7	39.6
South	100	100	77.8	24.7	22.4	23.0	26.0	31.1	30.9
Midwest	53	36	58.0	57.4	51.1	43.6	40.1	45.0	46.3
West	—	27	50.8	42.7	36.3	33.7	26.7	29.9	29.5
U. S.			64.3	38.7	35.9	33.2	33.8	37.4	37.4
Percentage in 50–100% Nonwhite Schools
Northeast	—	62	66.8	69.9	72.5	79.9	75.4	77.5	78.3
Border	100	69	71.6	67.2	60.1	59.2	58.0	64.8	67.0
South	100	100	80.9	55.3	54.9	57.1	59.3	67.3	69.0
Midwest	78	80	77.3	75.3	70.3	69.5	69.4	67.9	73.3
West	—	69	72.2	68.1	67.4	66.8	67.4	76.7	75.3
U. S.			76.6	63.6	62.4	62.9	64.9	70.1	71.6

Source: C. Clotfelter, After Brown: The Rise and Retreat of School Desegregation 56 (2004) (Table 2.1).

*2838

870 Changes in the Percentage of White Students in Schools Attended by the Average Black Student by State, 1970–2003 (includes States with 5% or greater enrollment of black students in 1970 and 1980)

	% White	% White Students in School of Average Black Student				Change
	2003	1970	1980	1991	2003	1970–1980	1980–1991	1991–2003
Alabama	60	33	38	35	30	5	-3	-5
Arkansas	70	43	47	44	36	4	-3	-8
California	33	26	28	27	22	2	-1	-5
Connecticut	68	44	40	35	32	-4	-5	-3
Delaware	57	47	69	65	49	22	-4	-16
Florida	51	43	51	43	34	8	-8	-9
Georgia	52	35	38	35	30	3	-3	-5
Illinois	57	15	19	20	19	4	1	-1
Indiana	82	32	39	47	41	7	8	-6
Kansas	76	52	59	58	51	7	-1	-7
Kentucky	87	49	74	72	65	25	-2	-7
Louisiana	48	31	33	32	27	2	-1	-5
Maryland	50	30	35	29	23	5	-6	-6
Massachusetts	75	48	50	45	38	2	-5	-7
Michigan	73	22	23	22	22	1	-1	0
Mississippi	47	30	29	30	26	-1	1	-4
Missouri	78	21	34	40	33	13	6	-7
Nebraska	80	33	66	62	49	33	-4	-13
New Jersey	58	32	26	26	25	-6	0	-1
New York	54	29	23	20	18	-6	-3	-2
Nevada	51	56	68	62	38	12	-6	-24
N. Carolina	58	49	54	51	40	5	-3	-11
Ohio	79	28	43	41	32	15	-2	-9
Oklahoma	61	42	58	51	42	16	-7	-9
Pennsylvania	76	28	29	31	30	1	2	-1
S. Carolina	54	41	43	42	39	2	-1	-3
Tennessee	73	29	38	36	32	9	-2	-4
Texas	39	31	35	35	27	4	0	-8
Virginia	61	42	47	46	41	5	-1	-5
Wisconsin	79	26	45	39	29	19	-6	-10

Source: G. Orfield & C. Lee, Racial Transformation and the Changing Nature of Segregation 18 (Jan. 2006) (Table 8), online at http://www.civilrightsproject.harvard.edu/research/deseg/Racial_Transformation.pdf.

*2839

871 Percentage of White Students in Schools Attended by the Average Black Student, 1968–2000

Source: Modified from E. Frankenberg, C. Lee, & G. Orfield, A Multiracial Society with Segregated Schools: Are We Losing the Dream?, p. 30, fig. 5 (Jan. 2003), online at http://www.civilrightsproject.harvard.edu/ research / reseg03 / AreWeLosingtheDream.pdf (using U.S. Dept. of Education and National Center for Education Statistics Common Core of Data).

872 Percentage of Students in Minority Schools by Race, 2000–2001

Source: Id., at 28, fig. 4.

*2840 *873 B

Sources for Parts I–A and I–B

Part I–A: Seattle

Section 1. Segregation, 1945 to 1956

¶ 1 C. Schmid & W. McVey, Growth and Distribution of Minority Races in Seattle, Washington, 3, 7–9 (1964); Hanawalt 1–7; Taylor, The Civil Rights Movement in the American West: Black Protest in Seattle, 1960–1970, 80 J. Negro Hist. 1, 2–3 (1995); Siqueland 10; D. Pieroth, Desegregating the Public Schools, Seattle, Washington, 1954–1968, p. 6 (Dissertation Draft 1979).

Section 2. Preliminary Challenges, 1956 to 1969

¶ 1 Id., at 32, 41; Hanawalt 4.

¶ 2 Id., at 11–13.

¶ 3 Id., at 5, 13, 27.

Section 3. The NAACP's First Legal Challenge and Seattle's Response, 1966 to 1977

¶ 1 Complaint in Adams v. Bottomly, Civ. No. 6704 (WD Wash., Mar. 18, 1966), pp. 10–11.

¶ 2 Id., at 10, 14–15.

¶ 3 Planning and Evaluation Dept., Seattle Public Schools, The Plan Adopted by the Seattle School Board to Desegregate Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Grade Pupils in the Garfield, Lincoln, and Roosevelt High School Districts by September, 1971, pp. 6, 11 (Nov. 12, 1970) (on file with the University of Washington Library); see generally Siqueland 12–15; Hanawalt 18–20.

¶ 4 Siqueland 5, 7, 21.

Section 4. The NAACP's Second Legal Challenge, 1977

¶ 1 Administrative Complaint in Seattle Branch, NAACP v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, pp. 2–3 (OCR, Apr. 22, 1977) 874 filed with Court as exhibit in Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896); see generally Siqueland 23–24.

¶ 2 Memorandum of Agreement between Seattle School District No. 1 of King Cty., Washington, and the OCR (June 9, 1978) (filed with the Court as Exh. A to Kiner Affidavit in Seattle School Dist. No. 1, supra).

Section 5. The Seattle Plan: Mandatory Busing, 1978 to 1988

¶ 1 See generally Seattle School Dist. No. 1, supra, at 461, 102 S.Ct. 3187; Seattle Public Schools Desegregation Planning Office, Proposed Alternative Desegregation Plans: Options for Eliminating Racial Imbalance by the 1979–80 School Year (1977) (filed with the Court in Seattle School Dist. No. 1, supra); Hanawalt 36–38, 40; Siqueland 3, 184, Table 4.

¶ 2 Id., at 151–152; Hanawalt 37–38; Seattle School Dist. No. 1, supra, at 461; Motion to Dismiss or Affirm in Seattle School Dist. No. 1, O.T. 1981, No. 81–9.

¶ 3 Seattle School Dist. No. 1, supra, at 461, 102 S.Ct. 3187; Hanawalt 40.

¶ 4 See generally Seattle School Dist. No. 1, supra.

Section 6. Student Choice, 1988 to 1998

¶ 1 L. Kohn, Priority Shift: The Fate of Mandatory Busing for School Desegregation in Seattle and the Nation 27–30, 32 (Mar.1996).

¶ 2 Id., at 32–34.

Section 7. The Current Plan, 1999 to the Present

¶ 1 App. in No. 05–908, p. 84a; Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, at 5–7; Parents Involved VII, 426 F.3d, at 1169–1170.

2841 ¶ 2 App. in No. 05–908, at 39a–42a; Data Profile: District Summary December 2005; Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, at 9–10, 47; App. in No. 05–908, at 309a; School Board Report, School Choices and Assignments 2005–2006 School *875 Year (Apr. 2005), online at http://www.seattleschools.org/ area/ facilities—plan/ Choice/ 05—06AppsChoicesBoardApril2005final.pdf.

¶ 3 Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 149 Wash.2d 660, 72 P.3d 151 (2003); 137 F.Supp.2d 1224 (WD Wash.2001); Parents Involved VII, supra.

Part I–B: Louisville

Section 1. Before the Lawsuit, 1954 to 1972

¶ 1 Hampton v. Jefferson Cty. Bd. of Ed., 72 F.Supp.2d 753, 756, and nn. 2, 4, 5 (WD Ky.1999) (Hampton I).

Section 2. Court–Imposed Guidelines and Busing, 1972 to 1991

¶ 1 Id., at 757–758, 762; Newburg Area Council, Inc. v. Board of Ed. of Jefferson Cty., 489 F.2d 925 (CA6 1973), vacated and remanded, 418 U.S. 918, 94 S.Ct. 3208, 3209, 41 L.Ed.2d 1160, reinstated with modifications, 510 F.2d 1358 (CA6 1974) (per curiam); Judgment and Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law in Newburg Area Council, Inc. v. Board of Ed. of Jefferson Cty., Nos. 7045 and 7291 (WD Ky., July 30, 1975).

¶ 2 Id., at 2, 3, and Attachment 1.

¶ 3 Id., at 4–16.

¶ 4 Memorandum Opinion and Order in Haycraft v. Board of Ed. of Jefferson Cty., Nos. 7045 and 7291 (WD Ky., June 16, 1978), pp. 1, 2, 4, 18.

¶ 5 Memorandum Opinion and Order, Haycraft v. Board of Ed. of Jefferson Cty., Nos. 7045 and 7291 (WD Ky., Sept. 24, 1985), p. 3; Memorandum from Donald W. Ingwerson, Superintendent, to the Board of Education, Jefferson County Public School District, pp. 1, 3, 5 (Apr. 4, 1984); Memorandum from Donald W. Ingwerson, Superintendent, to the Board of Education, Jefferson County Public School District, pp. 4–5 (Dec. 19, 1991) (1991 Memorandum).

*876 Section 3. Student Choice and Project Renaissance, 1991 to 1996

¶ 1 Id., at 1–4, 7–11 (Stipulated Exh. 72); Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, p. 12, n. 13.

¶ 2 1991 Memorandum 14–16.

¶ 3 Id., at 11, 14–15.

¶ 4 Id., at 15–16; Memorandum from Stephen W. Daeschner, Superintendent, to the Board of Education, Jefferson County Public School District, p. 2 (Aug. 6, 1996) (1996 Memorandum).

Section 4. The Current Plan: Project Renaissance Modified, 1996 to 2003

¶ 1 Id., at 1–4; Brief for Respondents in No. 05–915, at 12, and n. 13.

¶ 2 1996 Memorandum 4–7, and Attachment 2; Hampton I, supra, at 768.

¶ 3 1996 Memorandum 5–8; Hampton I, supra, at 768, n. 30.

¶ 4 Hampton II, 102 F.Supp.2d, at 359, 363, 370, 377.

¶ 5 Id., at 380–381.

Section 5. The Current Lawsuit, 2003 to the Present

¶ 1 McFarland v. Jefferson Cty. Public Schools, 330 F.Supp.2d 834 (W.D.Ky.2004); 2842 McFarland v. Jefferson Cty. Public Schools, 416 F.3d 513 (CA6, 2005) (per curiam); Memorandum from Stephen W. Daeschner, Superintendent, to the Board of Education, Jefferson County Public School District, 3–4 (Apr. 2, 2001).

All Citations

551 U.S. 701, 127 S.Ct. 2738, 168 L.Ed.2d 508, 75 USLW 4577, 220 Ed. Law Rep. 84, 07 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 7559, 2007 Daily Journal D.A.R. 9798, 2007 Daily Journal D.A.R. 10,272, 20 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 490

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 The plan was in effect from 1999–2002, for three school years. This litigation was commenced in July 2000, and the record in the District Court was closed before assignments for the 2001–2002 school year were made. See Brief for Respondents in No. 05–908, p. 9, n. 9. We rely, as did the lower courts, largely on data from the 2000–2001 school year in evaluating the plan. See 426 F.3d 1162, 1169–1171 (C.A.9 2005) (en banc) (Parents Involved VII).

2 The racial breakdown of this nonwhite group is approximately 23.8 percent Asian–American, 23.1 percent African–American, 10.3 percent Latino, and 2.8 percent Native–American. See 377 F.3d 949, 1005–1006 (C.A.9 2004) (Parents Involved VI) (Graber, J., dissenting).

3 For the 2001–2002 school year, the deviation permitted from the desired racial composition was increased from 10 to 15 percent. App. in No. 05–908, p. 38a. The bulk of the data in the record was collected using the 10 percent band, see n. 1, supra.

4 "No State shall ... deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U.S. Const., Amdt. 14, § 1.

5 "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race ... be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." 78 Stat. 252, 42 U.S.C. § 2000d.

6 "The state shall not discriminate against, or grant preferential treatment to, any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin in the operation of public employment, public education, or public contracting." Wash. Rev.Code § 49.60.400(1) (2006).

7 Middle and high school students are designated a single resides school and assigned to that school unless it is at the extremes of the racial guidelines. Students may also apply to a magnet school or program, or, at the high school level, take advantage of an open enrollment plan that allows ninth-grade students to apply for admission to any nonmagnet high school. App. in No. 05–915, pp. 39–41, 82–83.

8 It is not clear why the racial guidelines were even applied to Joshua's transfer application—the guidelines supposedly do not apply at the kindergarten level. Id., at 43. Neither party disputes, however, that Joshua's transfer application was denied under the racial guidelines, and Meredith's objection is not that the guidelines were misapplied but rather that race was used at all.

9 Meredith joined a pending lawsuit filed by several other plaintiffs. See id., at 7–11. The other plaintiffs all challenged assignments to certain specialized schools, and the District Court found these assignments, which are no longer at issue in this case, unconstitutional. McFarland I, 330 F.Supp.2d 834, 837, 864 (W.D.Ky.2004).

10 The districts point to dicta in a prior opinion in which the Court suggested that, while not constitutionally mandated, it would be constitutionally permissible for a school district to seek racially balanced schools as a matter of "educational policy." See Swann v. Charlotte–Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971). The districts also quote with approval an in-chambers opinion in which then-Justice Rehnquist made a suggestion to the same effect. See Bustop, Inc. v. Los Angeles Bd. of Ed., 439 U.S. 1380, 1383, 99 S.Ct. 40, 58 L.Ed.2d 88 (1978). The citations do not carry the significance the districts would ascribe to them. Swann, evaluating a school district engaged in court-ordered desegregation, had no occasion to consider whether a district's voluntary adoption of race-based assignments in the absence of a finding of prior de jure segregation was constitutionally permissible, an issue that was again expressly reserved in Washington v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, 458 U.S. 457, 472, n. 15, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896 (1982). Bustop, addressing in the context of an emergency injunction application a busing plan imposed by the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, is similarly unavailing. Then–Justice Rehnquist, in denying emergency relief, stressed that "equitable consideration[s]" counseled against preliminary relief. 439 U.S., at 1383, 99 S.Ct. 40. The propriety of preliminary relief and resolution of the merits are of course "significantly different" issues. University of Texas v. Camenisch, 451 U.S. 390, 393, 101 S.Ct. 1830, 68 L.Ed.2d 175 (1981).

11 The way Seattle classifies its students bears this out. Upon enrolling their child with the district, parents are required to identify their child as a member of a particular racial group. If a parent identifies more than one race on the form, "[t]he application will not be accepted and, if necessary, the enrollment service person taking the application will indicate one box." App. in No. 05–908, at 303a.

12 Jefferson County also argues that it would be incongruous to hold that what was constitutionally required of it one day —race-based assignments pursuant to the desegregation decree—can be constitutionally prohibited the next. But what was constitutionally required of the district prior to 2000 was the elimination of the vestiges of prior segregation—not racial proportionality in its own right. See Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 494–496, 112 S.Ct. 1430, 118 L.Ed.2d 108 (1992). Once those vestiges were eliminated, Jefferson County was on the same footing as any other school district, and its use of race must be justified on other grounds.

13 Data for the Seattle schools in the several years since this litigation was commenced further demonstrate the minimal role that the racial tiebreaker in fact played. At Ballard, in 2005–2006—when no class at the school was subject to the racial tiebreaker—the student body was 14.2 percent Asian–American, 9 percent African–American, 11.7 percent Latino, 62.3 percent Caucasian, and 2.8 percent Native–American. Reply Brief for Petitioner in No. 05–908, p. 7. In 2000–2001, when the racial tiebreaker was last used, Ballard's total enrollment was 17.5 percent Asian–American, 10.8 percent African–American, 10.7 percent Latino, 56.4 percent Caucasian, and 4.6 percent Native–American. App. in No. 05–908, at 283a. Franklin in 2005–2006 was 48.9 percent Asian–American, 33.5 percent African–American, 6.6 percent Latino, 10.2 percent Caucasian, and 0.8 percent Native–American. Reply Brief for Petitioner in No. 05–908, at 7. With the racial tiebreaker in 2000–2001, total enrollment was 36.8 percent Asian–American, 32.2 percent African–American, 5.2 percent Latino, 25.1 percent Caucasian, and 0.7 percent Native–American. App. in No. 05–908, at 284a. Nathan Hale's 2005–2006 enrollment was 17.3 percent Asian–American, 10.7 percent African–American, 8 percent Latino, 61.5 percent Caucasian, and 2.5 percent Native–American. Reply Brief for Petitioner in No. 05–908, at 7. In 2000–2001, with the racial tiebreaker, it was 17.9 percent Asian–American, 13.3 percent African–American, 7 percent Latino, 58.4 percent Caucasian, and 3.4 percent Native–American. App. in No. 05–908, at 286a.

14 In contrast, Seattle's Web site formerly described "emphasizing individualism as opposed to a more collective ideology" as a form of "cultural racism," and currently states that the district has no intention " 'to hold onto unsuccessful concepts such as [a] ... colorblind mentality.' " Harrell, School Web Site Removed: Examples of Racism Sparked Controversy, Seattle Post–Intelligencer, June 2, 2006, pp. B1, B5. Compare Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting) ("Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens. In respect of civil rights, all citizens are equal before the law").

15 Justice BREYER makes much of the fact that in 1978 Seattle "settled" an NAACP complaint alleging illegal segregation with the federal Office for Civil Rights (OCR). See post, at 2802, 2804, 2809 – 2810, 2812. The memorandum of agreement between Seattle and OCR, of course, contains no admission by Seattle that such segregation ever existed or was ongoing at the time of the agreement, and simply reflects a "desire to avoid the incovenience [sic] and expense of a formal OCR investigation," which OCR was obligated under law to initiate upon the filing of such a complaint. Memorandum of Agreement between Seattle School District No. 1 of King County, Washington, and the OCR, U.S. Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare 2 (June 9, 1978); see also 45 CFR § 80.7(c) (2006).

16 In fact, all the cases Justice BREYER's dissent cites as evidence of the "prevailing legal assumption," see post, at 2813 – 2815, were decided before this Court definitively determined that "all racial classifications ... must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny." Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995). Many proceeded under the now-rejected view that classifications seeking to benefit a disadvantaged racial group should be held to a lesser standard of review. See, e.g., Springfield School Comm. v. Barksdale, 348 F.2d 261, 266 (C.A.1 1965). Even if this purported distinction, which Justice STEVENS would adopt, post, at 2798, n. 3 (dissenting opinion), had not been already rejected by this Court, the distinction has no relevance to these cases, in which students of all races are excluded from the schools they wish to attend based solely on the racial classifications. See, e.g., App. in No. 05–908, at 202a (noting that 89 nonwhite students were denied assignment to a particular school by operation of Seattle's racial tiebreaker).

Justice STEVENS's reliance on School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Ed., 352 Mass. 693, 227 N.E.2d 729 (1967), appeal dism'd, 389 U.S. 572, 88 S.Ct. 692, 19 L.Ed.2d 778 (1968) (per curiam), post, at 2798 – 2800, is inapposite for the same reason that many of the cases cited by Justice BREYER are inapposite; the case involved a Massachusetts law that required school districts to avoid racial imbalance in schools but did not specify how to achieve this goal—and certainly did not require express racial classifications as the means to do so. The law was upheld under rational-basis review, with the state court explicitly rejecting the suggestion—which is now plainly the law—that "racial group classifications bear a far heavier burden of justification." 352 Mass., at 700, 227 N.E.2d, at 734 (internal quotation marks omitted). The passage Justice STEVENS quotes proves our point; all the quoted language says is that the school committee "shall prepare a plan to eliminate imbalance." Id., at 695, 227 N.E.2d, at 731; see post, at 2799, n. 5. Nothing in the opinion approves use of racial classifications as the means to address the imbalance. The suggestion that our decision today is somehow inconsistent with our disposition of that appeal is belied by the fact that neither the lower courts, the respondent school districts, nor any of their 51 amici saw fit even to cite the case. We raise this fact not to argue that the dismissal should be afforded any different stare decisis effect, but rather simply to suggest that perhaps—for the reasons noted above—the dismissal does not mean what Justice STEVENS believes it does.

17 Justice BREYER also tries to downplay the impact of the racial assignments by stating that in Seattle "students can decide voluntarily to transfer to a preferred district high school (without any consideration of race-conscious criteria)." Post, at 2824 – 2825. This presumably refers to the district's decision to cease, for 2001–2002 school year assignments, applying the racial tiebreaker to students seeking to transfer to a different school after ninth grade. See App. in No. 05–908, at 137a–139a. There are obvious disincentives for students to transfer to a different school after a full quarter of their high school experience has passed, and the record sheds no light on how transfers to the oversubscribed high schools are handled.

1 In this Court's paradigmatic segregation cases, there was a local ordinance, state statute, or state constitutional provision requiring racial separation. See, e.g., Brief for Petitioners in Bolling v. Sharpe, O.T.1952, No. 413, pp. 28–30 (cataloging state laws requiring separation of the races); id., at App. A (listing "Statutory and Constitutional Provisions in the States Where Segregation in Education is Institutionalized").

2 The dissent refers repeatedly and reverently to " 'integration.' " However, outside of the context of remediation for past de jure segregation, "integration" is simply racial balancing. See post, at 2820. Therefore, the school districts' attempts to further "integrate" are properly thought of as little more than attempts to achieve a particular racial balance.

3 The dissent's assertion that these plans are necessary for the school districts to maintain their "hard-won gains" reveals its conflation of segregation and racial imbalance. Post, at 2820 – 2821. For the dissent's purposes, the relevant hard-won gains are the present racial compositions in the individual schools in Seattle and Louisville. However, the actual hard-won gain in these cases is the elimination of the vestiges of the system of state-enforced racial separation that once existed in Louisville. To equate the achievement of a certain statistical mix in several schools with the elimination of the system of systematic de jure segregation trivializes the latter accomplishment. Nothing but an interest in classroom aesthetics and a hypersensitivity to elite sensibilities justifies the school districts' racial balancing programs. See Part II–B, infra. But "the principle of inherent equality that underlies and infuses our Constitution" required the disestablishment of de jure segregation. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 240, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). Assessed in any objective manner, there is no comparison between the two.

4 The dissent makes much of the supposed difficulty of determining whether prior segregation was de jure or de facto. See, e.g., post, at 2810 – 2811. That determination typically will not be nearly as difficult as the dissent makes it seem. In most cases, there either will or will not have been a state constitutional amendment, state statute, local ordinance, or local administrative policy explicitly requiring separation of the races. See, e.g., n. 1, supra. And even if the determination is difficult, it is one the dissent acknowledges must be made to determine what remedies school districts are required to adopt. Post, at 2823.

5 This Court's opinion in McDaniel v. Barresi, 402 U.S. 39, 91 S.Ct. 1287, 28 L.Ed.2d 582 (1971), fits comfortably within this framework. There, a Georgia school board voluntarily adopted a desegregation plan. At the time of Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954), Georgia's Constitution required that "[s]eparate schools shall be provided for the white and colored races." Ga. Const., Art. VIII, § 2–6401 (1945). Given that state law had previously required the school board to maintain a dual school system, the county was obligated to take measures to remedy its prior de jure segregation. This Court recognized as much in its opinion, which stated that the school board had an "affirmative duty to disestablish the dual school system." McDaniel, supra, at 41, 91 S.Ct. 1287.

6 As I have explained elsewhere, the remedies this Court authorized lower courts to compel in early desegregation cases like Green and Swann were exceptional. See Missouri v. Jenkins, 515 U.S. 70, 124–125, 115 S.Ct. 2038, 132 L.Ed.2d 63 (1995) (concurring opinion). Sustained resistance to Brown prompted the Court to authorize extraordinary race-conscious remedial measures (like compelled racial mixing) to turn the Constitution's dictate to desegregate into reality. 515 U.S., at 125, 115 S.Ct. 2038 (THOMAS, J., concurring). Even if these measures were appropriate as remedies in the face of widespread resistance to Brown's mandate, they are not forever insulated from constitutional scrutiny. Rather, "such powers should have been temporary and used only to overcome the widespread resistance to the dictates of the Constitution." 515 U.S., at 125, 115 S.Ct. 2038 (THOMAS, J., concurring).

7 Though the dissent cites every manner of complaint, record material, and scholarly article relating to Seattle's race-based student-assignment efforts, post, at 2839 – 2841, it cites no law or official policy that required separation of the races in Seattle's schools. Nevertheless, the dissent tries to cast doubt on the historical fact that the Seattle schools were never segregated by law by citing allegations that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other organizations made in court filings to the effect that Seattle's schools were once segregated by law. See post, at 2803 – 2805, 2812. These allegations were never proved and were not even made in this case. Indeed, the record before us suggests the contrary. See App. in No. 05–908, pp. 214a, 225a, 257a. Past allegations in another case provide no basis for resolving these cases.

8 Contrary to the dissent's argument, post, at 2823 – 2824, the Louisville school district's interest in remedying its past de jure segregation did vanish the day the District Court found that Louisville had eliminated the vestiges of its historic de jure segregation. See Hampton v. Jefferson Cty. Bd. of Ed., 102 F.Supp.2d 358, 360 (W.D.Ky.2000). If there were further remediation to be done, the District Court could not logically have reached the conclusion that Louisville "ha [d] eliminated the vestiges associated with the former policy of segregation and its pernicious effects." Ibid. Because Louisville could use race-based measures only as a remedy for past de jure segregation, it is not "incoherent," post, at 2830, to say that race-based decisionmaking was allowed to Louisville one day—while it was still remedying—and forbidden to it the next—when remediation was finished. That seemingly odd turnaround is merely a result of the fact that the remediation of de jure segregation is a jealously guarded exception to the Equal Protection Clause's general rule against government race-based decisionmaking.

9 The dissent's appeal to stare decisis, post, at 2835, is particularly ironic in light of its apparent willingness to depart from these precedents, post, at 2819 – 2820.

10 The idea that government racial classifications must be subjected to strict scrutiny did not originate in Adarand. As early as Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1817, 18 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1967), this Court made clear that government action that "rest[s] solely upon distinctions drawn according to race" had to be "subjected to the 'most rigid scrutiny.' " Id., at 11, 87 S.Ct. 1817 (quoting Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 216, 65 S.Ct. 193, 89 L.Ed. 194 (1944)); see also McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 196, 85 S.Ct. 283, 13 L.Ed.2d 222 (1964) (requiring a statute drawing a racial classification to be "necessary, and not merely rationally related, to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy"); id., at 197, 85 S.Ct. 283 (Harlan, J., concurring) ("The necessity test ... should be equally applicable in a case involving state racial discrimination").

11 At least one of the academic articles the dissent cites to support this proposition fails to establish a causal connection between the supposed educational gains realized by black students and racial mixing. See Hallinan, Diversity Effects on Student Outcomes: Social Science Evidence, 59 Ohio St. L.J. 733 (1998). In the pages following the ones the dissent cites, the author of that article remarks that "the main reason white and minority students perform better academically in majority white schools is likely that these schools provide greater opportunities to learn. In other words, it is not desegregation per se that improves achievement, but rather the learning advantages some desegregated schools provide." Id., at 744. Evidence that race is a good proxy for other factors that might be correlated with educational benefits does not support a compelling interest in the use of race to achieve academic results.

12 Of course, if the Seattle School Board were truly committed to the notion that diversity leads directly to educational benefits, operating a school with such a high "nonwhite" enrollment would be a shocking dereliction of its duty to educate the students enrolled in that school.

13 In fact, the available data from the Seattle school district appear to undercut the dissent's view. A comparison of the test results of the schools in the last year the racial balancing program operated to the results in the 2004–to–2005 school year (in which student assignments were race neutral) does not indicate the decline in black achievement one would expect to find if black achievement were contingent upon a particular racial mix. See Washington State Report Card, online at http://reportcard. ospi.k12.wa.us/summary.aspx?schoolId=1099&OrgType=4&reportLevel=School; http://reportcard.ospi.k12.wa.us/summary.aspx? schoolId=1104&reportLevel=School&orgLinkId=1104&yrs=; http: // reportcard. ospi.k12.wa.us/ summary.aspx?schoolId=1061&report Level=School&orgLinkId=1061&yrs=; http:// reportcard.ospi.k12.wa.us/sum mary.aspx?schoolId=1043&reportLevel=School&orgLinkId=1043&yrs= (showing that reading scores went up, not down, when Seattle's race-based assignment program ended at Sealth High School, Ingraham High School, Garfield High School, and Franklin High School—some of the schools most affected by the plan).

14 The dissent accuses me of "feel[ing] confident that, to end invidious discrimination, one must end all governmental use of race-conscious criteria" and chastises me for not deferring to democratically elected majorities. See post, at 2833 – 2834. Regardless of what Justice BREYER's goals might be, this Court does not sit to "create a society that includes all Americans" or to solve the problems of "troubled inner–city schooling." Ibid. We are not social engineers. The United States Constitution dictates that local governments cannot make decisions on the basis of race. Consequently, regardless of the perceived negative effects of racial imbalance, I will not defer to legislative majorities where the Constitution forbids it.

It should escape no one that behind Justice BREYER's veil of judicial modesty hides an inflated role for the Federal Judiciary. The dissent's approach confers on judges the power to say what sorts of discrimination are benign and which are invidious. Having made that determination (based on no objective measure that I can detect), a judge following the dissent's approach will set the level of scrutiny to achieve the desired result. Only then must the judge defer to a democratic majority. In my view, to defer to one's preferred result is not to defer at all.

15 The notion that a "democratic" interest qualifies as a compelling interest (or constitutes a part of a compelling interest) is proposed for the first time in today's dissent and has little basis in the Constitution or our precedent, which has narrowly restricted the interests that qualify as compelling. See Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 351–354, 123 S.Ct. 2325, 156 L.Ed.2d 304 (2003) (THOMAS, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact the dissent's newly minted understanding of liberty. See Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 75, 25 S.Ct. 539, 49 L.Ed. 937 (1905) (Holmes, J., dissenting) ("The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics").

16 The dissent does not explain how its recognition of an interest in teaching racial understanding and cooperation here is consistent with the Court's rejection of a similar interest in Wygant. In Wygant, a school district justified its race-based teacher-layoff program in part on the theory that "minority teachers provided 'role models' for minority students and that a racially 'diverse' faculty would improve the education of all students." Grutter, supra, at 352, 123 S.Ct. 2325 (opinion of THOMAS, J.) (citing Brief for Respondents, O.T.1985, No. 84–1340, pp. 27–28; Wygant, 476 U.S., at 315, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (STEVENS, J., dissenting)). The Court rejected the interests asserted to justify the layoff program as insufficiently compelling. Id., at 275–276, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (plurality opinion); id., at 295, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (White, J., concurring in judgment). If a school district has an interest in teaching racial understanding and cooperation, there is no logical reason why that interest should not extend to the composition of the teaching staff as well as the composition of the student body. The dissent's reliance on this interest is, therefore, inconsistent with Wygant.

17 Outside the school context, this Court's cases reflect the fact that racial mixing does not always lead to harmony and understanding. In Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949 (2005), this Court considered a California prison policy that separated inmates racially. Id., at 525–528, 125 S.Ct. 1141 (THOMAS, J., dissenting). That policy was necessary because of "numerous incidents of racial violence." Id., at 502, 125 S.Ct. 1141 (opinion of the Court); id., at 532–534, 125 S.Ct. 1141 (THOMAS, J., dissenting). As a result of this Court's insistence on strict scrutiny of that policy, but see id., at 538–547, 125 S.Ct. 1141, inmates in the California prisons were killed. See Beard v. Banks, 548 U.S. 521, 536 – 537, 126 S.Ct. 2572, 165 L.Ed.2d 697 (2006) (THOMAS, J., concurring in judgment) (noting that two were killed and hundreds were injured in race rioting subsequent to this Court's decision in Johnson).

18 After discussing the "democratic element," the dissent repeats its assertion that the social science evidence supporting that interest is "sufficiently strong to permit a school board to determine ... that this interest is compelling." Post, at 2821 – 2822. Again, though, the school boards have no say in deciding whether an interest is compelling. Strict scrutiny of race-based government decisionmaking is more searching than Chevron-style administrative review for reasonableness. See Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 845, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984).

19 The dissent halfheartedly attacks the historical underpinnings of the colorblind Constitution. Post, at 2815 – 2816. I have no quarrel with the proposition that the Fourteenth Amendment sought to bring former slaves into American society as full members. Post, at 2815 (citing Slaughter–House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 71–72, 21 L.Ed. 394 (1873)). What the dissent fails to understand, however, is that the colorblind Constitution does not bar the government from taking measures to remedy past state-sponsored discrimination—indeed, it requires that such measures be taken in certain circumstances. See, e.g., Part I–B, supra. Race-based government measures during the 1860's and 1870's to remedy state-enforced slavery were therefore not inconsistent with the colorblind Constitution.

20 See also Juris. Statement in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1952, No. 191, p. 8 ("[W]e take the unqualified position that the Fourteenth Amendment has totally stripped the state of power to make race and color the basis for governmental action"); Tr. of Oral Arg. in Brown v. Board of Education, O.T.1952, No. 8, p. 7 ("We have one fundamental contention which we will seek to develop in the course of this argument, and that contention is that no State has any authority under the equal-protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to use race as a factor in affording educational opportunities among its citizens"); Tr. of Oral Arg. in Briggs v. Elliott et al., O.T.1953, No. 2 etc., p. 50 ("[T]he state is deprived of any power to make any racial classifications in any governmental field").

21 See also Brief for Appellees in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1952, No. 191, p. 1 ("[T]he Court is asked ... to outlaw the fixed policies of the several States which are based on local social conditions well known to the respective legislatures"); id., at 9 ("For this purpose, Virginia history and present Virginia conditions are important"); Tr. of Oral Arg. in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1952, No. 191, p. 57 ("[T]he historical background that exists, certainly in this Virginia situation, with all the strife and the history that we have shown in this record, shows a basis, a real basis, for the classification that has been made"); id., at 69 (describing the potential abolition of segregation as "contrary to the customs, the traditions and the mores of what we might claim to be a great people, established through generations, who themselves are fiercely and irrevocably dedicated to the preservation of the white and colored races"). Accord, post, at 2836 – 2837 ("Today, almost 50 years later, attitudes toward race in this Nation have changed dramatically. Many parents, white and black alike, want their children to attend schools with children of different races. Indeed, the very school districts that once spurned integration now strive for it. The long history of their efforts reveals the complexities and difficulties they have faced"); post, at 2811 (emphasizing the importance of "local circumstances" and encouraging different localities to "try different solutions to common problems and gravitate toward those that prove most successful or seem to them best to suit their individual needs" (internal quotation marks omitted)); post, at 2826 (emphasizing the school districts' "40–year history" during which both school districts have tried numerous approaches "to achieve more integrated schools"); post, at 2834 ("[T]he histories of Louisville and Seattle reveal complex circumstances and a long tradition of conscientious efforts by local school boards").

22 See also Brief for Appellees in Brown v. Board of Education, O.T.1952, No. 8, p. 29 (" 'It is universally held, therefore, that each state shall determine for itself, subject to the observance of the fundamental rights and liberties guaranteed by the federal Constitution, how it shall exercise the police power .... And in no field is this right of the several states more clearly recognized than in that of public education' " (quoting Briggs v. Elliott, 98 F.Supp. 529, 532 (E.D.S.C.1951))); Brief for Appellees in Briggs v. Elliott, O.T.1952, No. 101, p. 7 ("Local self-government in local affairs is essential to the peace and happiness of each locality and to the strength and stability of our whole federal system. Nowhere is this more profoundly true than in the field of education"); Tr. of Oral Arg. in Briggs v. Elliott, O.T.1952, No. 101, pp. 54–55 ("What is the great national and federal policy on this matter? Is it not a fact that the very strength and fiber of our federal system is local self-government in those matters for which local action is competent? Is it not of all the activities of government the one which most nearly approaches the hearts and minds of people, the question of the education of their young? Is it not the height of wisdom that the manner in which that shall be conducted should be left to those most immediately affected by it, and that the wishes of the parents, both white and colored, should be ascertained before their children are forced into what may be an unwelcome contact?"). Accord, post, at 2826 ("[L]ocal school boards better understand their own communities and have a better knowledge of what in practice will best meet the educational needs of their pupils"); post, at 2835 – 2836 ("[W]hat of respect for democratic local decisionmaking by States and school boards?"); ibid. (explaining "that the Constitution grants local school districts a significant degree of leeway").

23 See also Brief for Appellees in Reply to Supp. Brief for the United States on Reargument in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1953, No. 4, p. 17 ("The Court is ... dealing with thousands of local school districts and schools. Is each to be the subject of litigation in the District Courts?"); Brief for Kansas on Reargument in Brown v. Board of Education, O.T.1953, No. 1, p. 51 ("The delicate nature of the problem of segregation and the paramount interest of the State of Kansas in preserving the internal peace and tranquility of its people indicates that this is a question which can best be solved on the local level, at least until Congress declares otherwise"). Accord, post, at 2833 ("At a minimum, the plurality's views would threaten a surge of race-based litigation. Hundreds of state and federal statutes and regulations use racial classifications for educational or other purposes .... In many such instances, the contentious force of legal challenges to these classifications, meritorious or not, would displace earlier calm"); post, at 2835 ("Indeed, the consequences of the approach the Court takes today are serious. Yesterday, the plans under review were lawful. Today, they are not"); post, at 2835 – 2836 (predicting "further litigation, aggravating race-related conflict").

24 See also Statement of Appellees Opposing Jurisdiction and Motion to Dismiss or Affirm in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1952, No. 191, p. 5 ("[I]t would be difficult to find from any field of law a legal principle more repeatedly and conclusively decided than the one sought to be raised by appellants"); Brief for Appellees on Reargument in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1953, No. 4, pp. 46–47 ("If this case were to be decided solely on the basis of precedent, this brief could have been much more limited. There is ample precedent in the decisions of this Court to uphold school segregation"); Brief for Petitioners in Gebhart v. Belton, O.T.1952, No. 448, p. 27 ("Respondents ask this Court to upset a long established and well settled principle recognized by numerous state Legislatures, and Courts, both state and federal, over a long period of years"); Tr. of Oral Arg. in Briggs v. Elliott, et al., O.T.1953, No. 2 etc., at 79 ("But be that doctrine what it may, somewhere, sometime to every principle comes a moment of repose when it has been so often announced, so confidently relied upon, so long continued, that it passes the limits of judicial discretion and disturbance .... We relied on the fact that this Court had not once but seven times, I think it is, pronounced in favor of the separate but equal doctrine. We relied on the fact that the courts of last appeal of some sixteen or eighteen States have passed upon the validity of the separate but equal doctrine vis-a-vis the Fourteenth Amendment. We relied on the fact that Congress has continuously since 1862 segregated its schools in the District of Columbia"); App. D. Brief for Appellees in Briggs v. Elliott, O.T.1952, No. 101 (collecting citations of state and federal cases "[w]hich [e]nunciate the [p]rinciple that [s]tate [l]aws [p]roviding for [r]acial [s]egregation in the [p]ublic [s]chools do not [c]onflict with the Fourteenth Amendment"). Accord, post, at 2811 – 2812 ("[T]he Court set forth in Swann a basic principle of constitutional law—a principle of law that has found wide acceptance in the legal culture" (internal quotation marks omitted)); post, at 2813 ("Lower state and federal courts had considered the matter settled and uncontroversial even before this Court decided Swann "); post, at 2813 – 2814 ("Numerous state and federal courts explicitly relied upon Swann's guidance for decades to follow"); post, at 2814 – 2815 (stating "how lower courts understood and followed Swann's enunciation of the relevant legal principle"); post, at 2816 ("The constitutional principle enunciated in Swann, reiterated in subsequent cases, and relied upon over many years, provides, and has widely been thought to provide, authoritative legal guidance"); post, at 2833 ("[T]oday's opinion will require setting aside the laws of several States and many local communities"); post, at 2835 – 2836 ("And what has happened to Swann? To McDaniel? To Crawford? To Harris? To School Committee of Boston? To Seattle School Dist. No. 1? After decades of vibrant life, they would all, under the plurality's logic, be written out of the law").

25 Compare Brief for Appellees in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1952, No. 191, at 16–17 (" 'It is by such practical considerations based on experience rather than by theoretical inconsistencies that the question of equal protection is to be answered' " (quoting Railway Express Agency, Inc. v. New York, 336 U.S. 106, 110, 69 S.Ct. 463, 93 L.Ed. 533 (1949))); Brief for Appellees on Reargument in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1953, No. 4, at 76 ("The question is a practical one for them to solve; it is not subject to solution in the theoretical realm of abstract principles"); Tr. of Oral Arg. in Briggs v. Elliot et al., O.T.1953, No. 2 etc., at 86 ("[Y]ou cannot talk about this problem just in a vacuum in the manner of a law school discussion"), with post, at 2830 – 2831 ("The Founders meant the Constitution as a practical document").

26 Compare Brief for Kansas on Reargument in Brown v. Board of Education, O.T.1953, No. 1, at 57 ("[T]he people of Kansas ... are abandoning the policy of segregation whenever local conditions and local attitudes make it feasible"); Brief for Appellees on Reargument in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1953, No. 4, at 76 ("As time passes, it may well be that segregation will end"), with post, at 2810 ("[T]hey use race-conscious criteria in limited and gradually diminishing ways"); post, at 2826 ("[E]ach plan's use of race-conscious elements is diminished compared to the use of race in preceding integration plans"); post, at 2829 – 2830 (describing the "historically diminishing use of race" in the school districts).

27 It is no answer to say that these cases can be distinguished from Brown because Brown involved invidious racial classifications whereas the racial classifications here are benign. See post, at 2833–2834. How does one tell when a racial classification is invidious? The segregationists in Brown argued that their racial classifications were benign, not invidious. See Tr. of Oral Arg. in Briggs v. Elliott, et al., O.T.1953, No. 2 etc., at 83 ("It [South Carolina] is confident of its good faith and intention to produce equality for all of its children of whatever race or color. It is convinced that the happiness, the progress and the welfare of these children is best promoted in segregated schools"); Brief for Appellees on Reargument in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1953, No. 4, at 82–83 ("Our many hours of research and investigation have led only to confirmation of our view that segregation by race in Virginia's public schools at this time not only does not offend the Constitution of the United States but serves to provide a better education for living for the children of both races"); Tr. of Oral Arg. in Davis v. County School Board, O.T.1952, No. 191, at 71 ("[T]o make such a transition, would undo what we have been doing, and which we propose to continue to do for the uplift and advancement of the education of both races. It would stop this march of progress, this onward sweep"). It is the height of arrogance for Members of this Court to assert blindly that their motives are better than others.

28 See also id., at 8–9 ("It has been urged that [these state laws and policies] derive validity as a consequence of a long duration supported and made possible by a long line of judicial decisions, including expressions in some of the decisions of this Court. At the same time, it is urged that these laws are valid as a matter of constitutionally permissible social experimentation by the States. On the matter of stare decisis, I submit that the duration of the challenged practice, while it is persuasive, is not controlling .... As a matter of social experimentation, the laws in question must satisfy the requirements of the Constitution. While this Court has permitted the States to legislate or otherwise officially act experimentally in the social and economic fields, it has always recognized and held that this power is subject to the limitations of the Constitution, and that the tests of the Constitution must be met"); Reply Brief for Appellants on Reargument in Briggs v. Elliott et al., O.T.1953, No. 2 etc., pp. 18–19 ("The truth of the matter is that this is an attempt to place local mores and customs above the high equalitarian principles of our Government as set forth in our Constitution and particularly the Fourteenth Amendment. This entire contention is tantamount to saying that the vindication and enjoyment of constitutional rights recognized by this Court as present and personal can be postponed whenever such postponement is claimed to be socially desirable").

29 The dissent does not face the complicated questions attending its proposed standard. For example, where does the dissent's principle stop? Can the government force racial mixing against the will of those being mixed? Can the government force black families to relocate to white neighborhoods in the name of bringing the races together? What about historically black colleges, which have "established traditions and programs that might disproportionately appeal to one race or another"? United States v. Fordice, 505 U.S. 717, 749, 112 S.Ct. 2727, 120 L.Ed.2d 575 (1992) (THOMAS, J., concurring). The dissent does not and cannot answer these questions because the contours of the distinction it propounds rest entirely in the eye of the beholder.

30 Justice BREYER's good intentions, which I do not doubt, have the shelf life of Justice BREYER's tenure. Unlike the dissenters, I am unwilling to delegate my constitutional responsibilities to local school boards and allow them to experiment with race-based decisionmaking on the assumption that their intentions will forever remain as good as Justice BREYER's. See The Federalist No. 51, p. 349 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) ("If men were angels, no government would be necessary"). Indeed, the racial theories endorsed by the Seattle School Board should cause the dissenters to question whether local school boards should be entrusted with the power to make decisions on the basis of race. The Seattle school district's Website formerly contained the following definition of "cultural racism": " 'Those aspects of society that overtly and covertly attribute value and normality to white people and whiteness, and devalue, stereotype, and label people of color as "other," different, less than, or render them invisible. Examples of these norms include defining white skin tones as nude or flesh colored, having a future time orientation, emphasizing individualism as opposed to a more collective ideology, defining one form of English as standard....' " See Harrell, School Web Site Removed: Examples of Racism Sparked Controversy, Seattle Post–Intelligencer, June 2, 2006, pp. B1, B5. After the site was removed, the district offered the comforting clarification that the site was not intended " 'to hold onto unsuccessful concepts such as melting pot or colorblind mentality.' " Ibid.; see also ante, at 2761, n. 14 (plurality opinion).

More recently, the school district sent a delegation of high school students to a "White Privilege Conference." See Equity and Race Relations White Privilege Conference, http://www.seattleschools.org/area/equityand race/ whiteprivilegeconference.xml. One conference participant described "white privilege" as "an invisible package of unearned assets which I can count on cashing in each day, but about which I was meant to remain oblivious. White Privilege is like an invisible weightless knapsack of special provisions, maps, passports, codebooks, visas, clothes, tools, and blank checks." See White Privilege Conference, Questions and Answers, http://www.uccs.edu/ wpc/ faqs.htm; see generally Westneat, District's Obsessed with Race, Seattle Times, Apr. 1, 2007, p. B1 (describing racial issues in Seattle schools).

1 Le Lys Rouge (The Red Lily) 95 (W. Stephens transl. 6th ed.1922).

2 See, e.g., J. Wilkinson, From Brown to Bakke 11 (1979) ("Everyone understands that Brown v. Board of Education helped deliver the Negro from over three centuries of legal bondage"); Black, The Lawfulness of the Segregation Decisions, 69 Yale L.J. 421, 424–425 (1960) ("History, too, tells us that segregation was imposed on one race by the other race; consent was not invited or required. Segregation in the South grew up and is kept going because and only because the white race has wanted it that way—an incontrovertible fact which in itself hardly consorts with equality").

3 I have long adhered to the view that a decision to exclude a member of a minority because of his race is fundamentally different from a decision to include a member of a minority for that reason. See, e.g., Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, 515 U.S. 200, 243, 248, n. 6, 115 S.Ct. 2097, 132 L.Ed.2d 158 (1995) (STEVENS, J., dissenting); Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., 476 U.S. 267, 316, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 (1986) (same). This distinction is critically important in the context of education. While the focus of our opinions is often on the benefits that minority schoolchildren receive from an integrated education, see, e.g., ante, at 2753 – 2754 (THOMAS, J., concurring), children of all races benefit from integrated classrooms and playgrounds, see Wygant, 476 U.S., at 316, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260 ("[T]he fact that persons of different races do, indeed, have differently colored skin, may give rise to a belief that there is some significant difference between such persons. The inclusion of minority teachers in the educational process inevitably tends to dispel that illusion whereas their exclusion could only tend to foster it").

4 THE CHIEF JUSTICE twice cites my dissent in Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 100 S.Ct. 2758, 65 L.Ed.2d 902 (1980). See ante, at 2752, 2758. In that case, I stressed the importance of confining a remedy for past wrongdoing to the members of the injured class. See 448 U.S., at 539, 100 S.Ct. 2758. The present cases, unlike Fullilove but like our decision in Wygant, 476 U.S. 267, 106 S.Ct. 1842, 90 L.Ed.2d 260, require us to "ask whether the Board[s'] action [s] advanc[e] the public interest in educating children for the future," id., at 313, 106 S.Ct. 1842 (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (emphasis added). See ibid. ("In my opinion, it is not necessary to find that the Board of Education has been guilty of racial discrimination in the past to support the conclusion that it has a legitimate interest in employing more black teachers in the future"). See also Adarand, 515 U.S., at 261–262, 115 S.Ct. 2097 (STEVENS, J., dissenting) ("This program, then, if in part a remedy for past discrimination, is most importantly a forward-looking response to practical problems faced by minority subcontractors").

5 THE CHIEF JUSTICE states that the Massachusetts racial imbalance Act did not require express classifications. See ante, at 2762 – 2763, n. 16. This is incorrect. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court expressly stated:

"The racial imbalance act requires the school committee of every municipality annually to submit statistics showing the percentage of nonwhite pupils in all public schools and in each school. Whenever the board finds that racial imbalance exists in a public school, it shall give written notice to the appropriate school committee, which shall prepare a plan to eliminate imbalance and file a copy with the board. 'The term "racial imbalance" refers to a ratio between nonwhite and other students in public schools which is sharply out of balance with the racial composition of the society in which nonwhite children study, serve and work. For the purpose of this section, racial imbalance shall be deemed to exist when the per cent of nonwhite students in any public school is in excess of fifty per cent of the total number of students in such school.' " 352 Mass., at 695, 227 N.E.2d, at 731.

6 Compare ante, at 2767 ("It was not the inequality of the facilities but the fact of legally separating children on the basis of race on which the Court relied to find a constitutional violation in 1954"), with Juris. Statement in School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Education, O.T.1967, No. 759, p. 11 ("It is implicit in Brown v. Board of Education[,] 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873[(1954)], that color or race is a constitutionally impermissible standard for the assignment of school children to public schools. We construe Brown as endorsing Mr. Justice Harlan's classical statement in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 559, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 [(1896) (dissenting opinion)]: 'Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens' ").

7 In 1968 our mandatory jurisdiction was defined by the provision of the 1948 Judicial Code then codified at 28 U.S.C. § 1257, see 62 Stat. 929; that provision was repealed in 1988, see 102 Stat. 662.

8 For example, prior to our decision in School Comm. of Boston, the Illinois Supreme Court had issued an unpublished opinion holding unconstitutional a similar statute aimed at eliminating racial imbalance in public schools. See Juris. Statement in School Comm. of Boston v. Board of Education, O.T.1967, No. 759, at 9 ("Unlike the Massachusetts Court, the Illinois Supreme Court has recently held its law to eliminate racial imbalance unconstitutional on the ground that it violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment"); ibid., n. 1. However, shortly after we dismissed the Massachusetts suit for want of a substantial federal question, the Illinois Supreme Court reversed course and upheld its statute in the published decision that Justice BREYER extensively quotes in his dissent. See Tometz v. Board of Ed., Waukegan City School Dist. No. 61, 39 Ill.2d 593, 237 N.E.2d 498 (1968). In so doing, the Illinois Supreme Court acted in explicit reliance on our decision in School Comm. of Boston. See 39 Ill.2d, at 599–600, 237 N.E.2d, at 502 ("Too, the United States Supreme Court on January 15, 1968, dismissed an appeal in School Committee of Boston v. Board of Education, (Mass.1967) 352 Mass. 693, 227 N.E.2d 729, which challenged the statute providing for elimination of racial imbalance in public schools 'for want of a substantial federal question.' 389 U.S. 572, 88 S.Ct. 692, 19 L.Ed.2d 778").

8 N.Y.3d 70, 861 N.E.2d 75, 828
N.Y.S.2d 260, 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 09499

1 The People of the State of New York, Respondent
v
Michael Barton, Appellant.

Court of Appeals of New York
Argued November 14, 2006

Decided December 19, 2006

CITE TITLE AS: People v Barton

SUMMARY

Appeal, by permission of the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals, from an order of the Monroe County Court (Alex R. Renzi, J.), entered March 10, 2006. The County Court (1) reversed an order of the Rochester City Court (Ann E. Pfeiffer, J.; op 8 Misc 3d 291), which had declared Rochester City Code § 44-4 (H) unconstitutional and invalid and granted defendant's motion to dismiss the accusatory instrument; (2) declared section 44-4 (H) constitutional; and (3) remanded the case to Rochester City Court for further proceedings on the accusatory instrument.

People v Barton, 12 Misc 3d 322, affirmed.

HEADNOTES

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Ordinance Addressing Aggressive Panhandling--Challenge to Ordinance as Overbroad

(1) Assuming that panhandling is speech or expressive conduct safeguarded by the First Amendment, entitled to protection tantamount to that afforded eleemosynary appeals by organized charities, defendant, who was charged with violating a municipal ordinance designed to address aggressive panhandling by prohibiting the solicitation of any occupant of a motor vehicle that is on a street or other public place, was entitled to challenge the ordinance as overbroad on behalf of others whose constitutionally-protected expression was potentially "chilled" by the provision's very existence, even though defendant's own conduct may have been unshielded by the First Amendment.

Constitutional Law
Validity of Statute
Ordinance Addressing Aggressive Panhandling

(2) A municipal ordinance designed to address aggressive panhandling by prohibiting the solicitation of any occupant of a motor vehicle that is on a street or other public place is not unconstitutionally overbroad. Content-neutral regulations of time, place and manner of expression are enforceable if they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest and leave open ample alternative channels of communication. The governmental interests served by the ordinance--to eliminate a source of distraction for motorists and thus promote the free and safe flow of traffic--are significant. Further, the ordinance is not a blanket ban and leaves open ample alternative avenues to communicate any message of indigency or need through begging. Because the ordinance focuses on specific conduct that the municipality has an interest in controlling in order to further a significant content-neutral government interest, it is narrowly tailored.

RESEARCH REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Constitutional Law §§ 450–454, 456, 459, 512, *71 523, 525, 920; Am Jur 2d, Municipal Corporations, Counties, and Other Political Subdivisions §§ 315, 321, 322, 331–333, 437.

NY Jur 2d, Constitutional Law §§ 51–53, 70, 71, 73, 217–219, 252, 256, 259, 261, 266, 400–402; NY Jur 2d, Counties, Towns, and Municipal Corporations §§ 291, 293–296.

US Const 1st Amend.

ANNOTATION REFERENCE

Laws regulating begging, panhandling, or similar activity by poor or homeless persons. 7 ALR5th 455.

FIND SIMILAR CASES ON WESTLAW

Database: NY-ORCS

Query: panhandl! /s ordinance & protected /s constitution!

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Donald M. Thompson, Rochester, for appellant.
The motion court correctly found Rochester City Code § 44-4 (H) to be unconstitutional. (Acorn v City of Phoenix, 798 F2d 1260; Schaumburg v Citizens for a Better Environment, 444 US 620; Loper v New York City Police Dept., 999 F2d 699; Hill v Colorado, 530 US 703; Madsen v Women's Health Center, Inc., 512 US 753; Carey v Brown, 447 US 455; People v Foley, 94 NY2d 668; Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601; Perry Ed. Assn. v Perry Local Educators' Assn., 460 US 37; International Socy. for Krishna Consciousness of New Orleans, Inc. v City of Baton Rouge, 876 F2d 494.)
Michael C. Green, District Attorney, Rochester (William Taylor of counsel), for respondent.
County Court properly held that the ordinance is constitutional. (United States v O'Brien, 391 US 367; Perry Ed. Assn. v Perry Local Educators' Assn., 460 US 37; Ward v Rock Against Racism, 491 US 781; Clark v Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 US 288; Heffron v International Soc. for Krishna Consciousness, Inc., 452 US 640; People v Foley, 94 NY2d 668; Matter of Rogers v New York City Tr. Auth., 89 NY2d 692; Renton v Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 US 41; Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 US 748; Acorn v City of Phoenix, 798 F2d 1260.)
Thomas S. Richards, Corporation Counsel, Rochester (Jeffrey Eichner of counsel), for City of Rochester, intervenor. I. Section 44-4 (H) of the Rochester City Code is constitutional. (72 Cornelius v NAACP Legal Defense & Ed. Fund, Inc., 473 US 788; United States v O'Brien, 391 US 367; Perry Ed. Assn. v Perry Local Educators' Assn., 460 US 37; Frisby v Schultz, 487 US 474; Ward v Rock Against Racism, 491 US 781; Clark v Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468 US 288; Members of City Council of Los Angeles v Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 US 789; Heffron v International Soc. for Krishna Consciousness, Inc., 452 US 640; Renton v Playtime Theatres, Inc., 475 US 41; Virginia Bd. of Pharmacy v Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, Inc., 425 US 748.) II. Section 44-4 (H) of the Rochester City Code is valid under the New York Constitution. (Matter of Town of Islip v Caviglia, 73 NY2d 544; Stringfellow's of N.Y. v City of New York, 91 NY2d 382.) III. Section 44-4 (H) of the Rochester City Code is not overbroad. (Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601; Coates v Cincinnati, 402 US 611; Alderman v United States, 394 US 165; Houston v Hill, 482 US 451; Boos v Barry, 485 US 312; Chicago v Morales, 527 US 41; International Socy. for Krishna Consciousness of New Orleans, Inc. v City of Baton Rouge, 876 F2d 494; Hill v Colorado, 530 US 703; People v Scott, 26 NY2d 286; People v Clark, 71 NY2d 376.)
Palyn Hung, New York City, Jeffrey E. Fogel and Arthur N. Eisenberg for New York Civil Liberties Union, amicus curiae. I. The ordinance, even if content-neutral, is not a reasonable time, place, or manner regulation because it is not narrowly tailored to a significant government interest and does not leave open ample alternative avenues of communication. (Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc. of N. Y., Inc. v Village of Stratton, 536 US 150; Schaumburg v Citizens for a Better Environment, 444 US 620; Loper v New York City Police Dept., 999 F2d 699; Hague v Committee for Industrial Organization, 307 US 496; Frisby v Schultz, 487 US 474; Houston v Hill, 482 US 451; Nichols v Village of Pelham Manor, 974 F Supp 243; Loper v New York City Police Dept., 802 F Supp 1029.) II. The ordinance constitutes a content-based enactment that is not narrowly tailored to the pursuit of a compelling state interest. (Police Dept. of Chicago v Mosley, 408 US 92; Cincinnati v Discovery Network, Inc., 507 US 410; Los Angeles v Alameda Books, Inc., 535 US 425; Perry Ed. Assn. v Perry Local Educators' Assn., 460 US 37; Ashcroft v American Civil Liberties Union, 542 US 656.) III. The ordinance is facially overbroad. (Houston v Hill, 482 US 451; New York v Ferber, 458 US 747; Members of City Council of Los Angeles v Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 US 789.)

73 OPINION OF THE COURT

Read, J.

On August 4, 2004, defendant Michael Barton was ticketed for violating section 44-4 (H) of the Code of the City of Rochester when he allegedly waded into traffic on a *2 highway exit ramp in downtown Rochester, soliciting money from motorists. Section 44-4 of the Code addresses aggressive panhandling, and subsection (H) specifies that "[n]o person on a sidewalk or alongside a roadway shall solicit from any occupant of a motor vehicle that is on a street or other public place." The Code defines "solicit" as "the spoken, written, or printed word or such other acts or bodily gestures as are conducted in furtherance of the purposes of immediately obtaining money or any other thing of value" (Rochester City Code § 44-4 [B]). Violations are punishable by fines ranging from $25 to $250, or an appropriate alternative sentence; a second conviction within a year could result in imprisonment for up to 15 days (Rochester City Code § 44-4 [I]).

Section 44-4, approved by the City Council and the Mayor of the City of Rochester in the spring of 2004, was nearly a decade in the making, spurred by the increasing incidence of panhandling in the downtown area and attendant citizen complaints. Subsection (A) of section 44-4, entitled "Legislative intent," states that this provision was > "adopted in order to protect persons from threatening, intimidating or harassing behavior, to keep public places safe and attractive for use by all members of the community and to maintain and preserve public places where all of the community can interact in a peaceful manner. This legislation is also intended to provide for the free flow of pedestrian and vehicular traffic on the streets and sidewalks in the City, to promote tourism and business and preserve the quality of urban life" (emphasis added).

The Council loosely patterned section 44-4 after panhandling ordinances adopted in other cities, including Atlanta, Baltimore, Cincinnati, New Haven, New York City, Philadelphia, Portland, San Francisco, Seattle and Washington, D.C.

As the Council's President explained, subsection (H) of section 44-4 was "aimed at specific conduct, and not at any type of speech or expression," because "[t]he conduct itself is offensive, for it leads to an interference with the free flow of vehicular traffic and raises traffic safety and traffic congestion concerns." In particular,

> 74 "[s]olicitation of contributions from occupants of motor vehicles is disruptive to the drivers of those vehicles and diverts their attention from the traffic on the street. Even if the vehicle is stopped, the driver is not paying attention to potential hazards in the road, observing traffic control signals, or preparing to move along the street or through the intersection."

Further, section 44-4 (H) treats all solicitation "the same whether it be for an individual or a charity, and whether the cause may be deemed by some to be favored or disfavored."

On August 31, 2004, defendant moved to dismiss the accusatory instrument lodged against him. He contended that section 44-4 (H) was overbroad in violation of the Free *3 Speech clauses of the federal and New York State constitutions. Defendant did not argue that section 44-4 (H) was unconstitutional as applied to him. Rather, he complained that this provision impermissibly "impact[ed] activities beyond its intended reach" as it applied not only to aggressive panhandling, but "to anyone who would solicit" motorists from the sidewalk, including an individual holding up a sign simply stating "Food," or participating in the city firefighters' annual "Fill-the-Boot" fundraising campaign.

City Court agreed, declaring section 44-4 (H) unconstitutional and dismissing the accusatory instrument. The court cited Perry Ed. Assn. v Perry Local Educators' Assn. (460 US 37, 45 [1983]) for the relevant constitutional standard: "The state may . . . enforce regulations of the time, place, and manner of expression which are content-neutral, are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest, and leave open ample alternative channels of communication." In City Court's view, section 44-4 (H) was content-neutral, but lacked narrow tailoring because it "allow[ed] for the prosecution of those . . . guilty of nothing more than peacefully asking for assistance" (8 Misc 3d 291, 298 [Rochester City Ct 2004]).

County Court reversed, concluding that section 44-4 (H) was content-neutral, sufficiently narrowly tailored, and left open ample alternative channels of communication. The court observed that section 44-4 (H) was "aimed specifically at a certain type of conduct engaged in at a certain location"--the "use [of] spoken or written words or acts, for the purpose of immediately obtaining money or any other thing of value from an occupant of a motor vehicle that is on a street or other public place" (12 Misc 3d 322, 330 [Monroe County Ct 2006]). The 75 court further pointed out that section 44-4 (H) was not overbroad because it applied to bona fide charitable canvassing as well as to defendant's soliciting. "Because a statute is evenhanded and applies equally to all persons conducting the same unwanted conduct does not make a statute overbroad" (id.) In short, section 44-4 (H)'s "overbreadth, if any, [was] not substantial when judged in relation to the [provision's] plainly legitimate sweep" (id.). Upon defendant's application, a Judge of this Court granted leave to appeal. We now affirm.

(1) As an initial matter, for purposes of this appeal the People do not contest, and we therefore assume, that panhandling is speech or expressive conduct safeguarded by the First Amendment, entitled to protection tantamount to that afforded eleemosynary appeals by organized charities (see Schaumburg v Citizens for a Better Environment, 444 US 620 [1980] [holding that there is sufficient nexus between solicitation by organized charities and a variety of speech interests to implicate First Amendment]). The United States Supreme Court has yet to rule on this issue, and lower courts have expressed differing views (e.g. compare Young v New York City Tr. Auth., 903 F2d 146, 154 [2d Cir 1990], cert denied 498 US 984 [1990] [sustaining prohibition on begging in subways, reasoning that panhandling is not constitutionally *4 protected speech or expressive conduct analogous to solicitation by organized charities: "Whether with or without words, the object of begging and panhandling is the transfer of money. Speech simply is not inherent to the act; it is not of the essence of the conduct"], with Loper v New York City Police Dept., 999 F2d 699, 704 [2d Cir 1993] [enjoining enforcement of statute prohibiting public loitering for purposes of begging, concluding that there is "little difference between those who solicit for organized charities and those who solicit for themselves in regard to the message conveyed," and that "(t)he distinction is not a significant one for First Amendment purposes"]). Second, even though defendant's own conduct may be unshielded by the First Amendment, he nonetheless may challenge section 44-4 (H) as overbroad on behalf of others whose constitutionally-protected expression is potentially "chilled" by the provision's very existence (Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601, 610-613 [1973]).

The test for determining overbreadth is whether the law on its face prohibits a real and substantial amount of constitutionally protected conduct (see Houston v Hill, 482 US 451, 458 [1987]; Broadrick, 413 US at 615). "[T]he mere fact that one 76 can conceive of some impermissible applications of a statute is not sufficient to render it susceptible to an overbreadth challenge" (Members of City Council of Los Angeles v Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 US 789, 800 [1984]). Here, section 44-4 (H) reaches any solicitation intended to obtain immediate funds or things of value from occupants of motor vehicles in Rochester's streets or other public places. Defendant claims that because section 44-4 (H) on its face concededly reaches "passive" panhandling targeting motorists--specifically, someone standing mute on the sidewalk, facing traffic in the street and holding a sign requesting immediate money or food--it is unconstitutionally overbroad. According to defendant, section 44-4 (H) thus runs afoul of the First Amendment because it is not limited to panhandlers who act aggressively, or solicit motorists successfully or actually walk into a lane of stopped or moving traffic. As this appeal is presented to us then, the parties dispute whether section 44-4 (H) is a reasonable time, place and manner restriction once it sweeps defendant's hypothetical passive panhandler within its coverage.

(2) "[C]ontent-neutral regulations of time, place, and manner of expression are enforceable if they are narrowly tailored to serve a significant government interest, and leave open ample alternative channels of communication" (International Socy. for Krishna Consciousness of New Orleans, Inc. v City of Baton Rouge, 876 F2d 494, 497 [5th Cir 1989] [citing Perry, 460 US at 45]; see also Matter of Rogers v New York City Tr. Auth., 89 NY2d 692 [1997] [indicating that public forum analysis under article I, § 8 of State Constitution mirrors federal standard]). In this case, the governmental interests served by section 44-4 (H)--to eliminate a source of distraction for motorists and thus promote the free and safe flow of traffic-- *5 are significant. Further, section 44-4 (H) is not a blanket ban (cf. Loper, 999 F2d at 705). This provision does not prohibit requests seeking something other than a handout. Moreover, section 44-4 (H) does not proscribe nonaggressive soliciting directed at pedestrians on the sidewalk; therefore, it leaves open ample alternative avenues to communicate any message of indigency or need through begging.

In determining whether a regulation is content neutral, the principal inquiry is > "whether the government has adopted a regulation of speech because of disagreement with the message 77 it conveys. The government's purpose is the controlling consideration. A regulation that serves purposes unrelated to the content of expression is deemed neutral, even if it has an incidental effect on some speakers or messages but not others. Government regulation of expressive activity is content neutral so long as it is justified without reference to the content of the regulated speech" (Ward v Rock Against Racism, 491 US 781, 791 [1989] [internal quotation marks and citations omitted]).

Content neutrality is not negated because a sign must be read by the police in order to determine whether section 44-4 (H) has been violated (i.e., whether the sign's message seeks to obtain money or any other thing of value on the spot), as defendant argues. The Council's reason for adopting section 44-4 (H)--to promote the free and safe flow of traffic--is the relevant consideration, and the ban covers all those asking motorists for immediate donations, regardless of their message (see Heffron v International Soc. for Krishna Consciousness, Inc., 452 US 640, 648-649 [1981] [speech restriction applying impartially to all persons or organizations, whether charitable or commercial, is content neutral]). Section 44-4 (H) does not attempt to silence one particular message; it does not frown on any particular viewpoint. Nor is it important that section 44-4 (H) may not reach every speech-related side-of-the-road distraction or source of traffic disruption in downtown Rochester; i.e., that it has "an incidental effect on some speakers or messages but not others."

Next, although "a regulation of the time, place, or manner of protected speech must be narrowly tailored to serve the government's legitimate, content-neutral interests . . . it need not be the least restrictive or least intrusive means of doing so" (Ward, 491 US at 798). Instead,

> "the requirement of narrow tailoring is satisfied so long as the . . . regulation promotes a substantial government interest that would be achieved less effectively absent the regulation. . . . So long as the means chosen are not substantially broader than necessary to achieve the government's interest . . . the regulation will not be invalid simply because a court concludes that the government's interest could be adequately served by some *6 less-speech-restrictive alternative. The validity of [time, place, or manner] regulations does not turn on a judge's agreement 78 with the responsible decisionmaker concerning the most appropriate method for promoting significant government interests or the degree to which those interests should be promoted" (id. at 799-800 [internal quotation marks and citations omitted]).

Section 44-4 (H) was designed to address a specific problem brought to the Council's attention: individuals seeking handouts from occupants of motor vehicles on a public thoroughfare or place, thereby creating a hazard and slowing or snarling traffic. Because section 44-4 (H) focuses on specific conduct that the City has an interest in controlling in order to further a significant content-neutral government interest, it is narrowly tailored.

Accordingly, the order of County Court should be affirmed.

Chief Judge Kaye and Judges Ciparick, Rosenblatt, Graffeo, Smith and Pigott concur.

Order affirmed.

94 N.Y.2d 668, 731 N.E.2d 123, 709
N.Y.S.2d 467, 2000 N.Y. Slip Op. 03641

The People of the State of New York, Respondent,
v.
Thomas R. Foley, Sr., Appellant.

Court of Appeals of New York
17
Argued and submitted February 16, 2000;

Decided April 11, 2000

CITE TITLE AS: People v Foley

SUMMARY

Appeal, by permission of an Associate Judge of the Court of Appeals, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the Fourth Judicial Department, entered June 18, 1999, which affirmed a judgment of the Oneida County Court (Michael L. Dwyer, J.), rendered upon a verdict convicting defendant of promoting a sexual performance by a child (two counts) and attempted disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree (two counts).

People v Foley, 257 AD2d 243, affirmed.

HEADNOTES

Crimes
Disseminating Indecent Material to Minors
Constitutionality--Overbreadth

(1) Penal Law § 235.22, which criminalizes the use of sexually explicit communications, via a computer communications system, designed to lure children into harmful conduct, is not overbroad on the ground that it exposes individuals to criminal liability who unintentionally address a minor through sexually-oriented communication. Under the First Amendment overbreadth doctrine, statutes attempting to restrict or burden the exercise of First Amendment rights must be narrowly drawn, but a statute is subjected to less scrutiny where the behavior sought to be prohibited by the State moves from pure speech toward conduct and that conduct--even if expressive--falls within the scope of otherwise valid criminal laws that reflect legitimate State interests. Where conduct and not merely speech is involved, the overbreadth doctrine can be invoked only where the overbreadth is substantial. Section 235.22 is not directed at the mere transmission of certain types of communication over the Internet. The terms "importune," "invite" or "induce" used in the second part of the statute--the "luring prong"--describe acts of communication, not the content of one's views, and they identify forms of conduct which may provide a predicate for criminal liability. Moreover, the statute should be read as requiring that an individual intend to initiate this kind of communication with a minor and thereby further intend to "importune, invite or induce" the minor to engage in sexual conduct for the sender's benefit. The term "harmful to minors" found in Penal Law § 235.22 (1) is not overbroad on the ground that it allows New York to impose its community standards nationwide. Thus, the legitimate reach of Penal Law § 235.22 outweighs its arguably impermissible applications.

Crimes
Disseminating Indecent Material to Minors
Constitutionality--Overbreadth of Term "Harmful to Minors"

(2) With respect to Penal Law § 235.22, entitled "Disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree," which was enacted to address the 669 convergence of predatory pedophile activity with Internet technology, the term "harmful to minors," used to describe the type of communication deemed indecent, is not overbroad on the ground that it allows New York to impose its community standards nationwide. Rather, that term was specifically defined according to the guidelines enunciated by the Supreme Court in Miller v California (413 US 15), and was further limited to "actual or simulated nudity, sexual conduct or sado-masochistic abuse" (see also, Penal Law § 235.20 [2], [3], [5]). It is difficult to envision a situation where that conduct would not be considered harmful to minors outside New York when the statute seeks specifically to prohibit the intentional dissemination of this type of material to a minor in conjunction with the sender's enticement or invitation to the child to engage in sexual activity.

Crimes
Disseminating Indecent Material to Minors
Constitutionality--Predatory Pedophile Activity on Internet--Vagueness

(3) Penal Law § 235.22, which is entitled "Disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree," and was enacted to address the convergence of predatory pedophile activity with Internet technology, is not unconstitutional on the ground of vagueness. The phrases "importunes, invites or induces," and "sexual conduct for [the defendant's] benefit," used to describe how and why a defendant influences the conduct of his minor victim, provide adequate notice of what is prohibited and permit evenhanded application of the law both by law enforcement authorities and fact finders called to interpret the speech at issue. Each and every term in the statute is either defined in the Penal Law (see, § 235.20) or has a plain and ordinary meaning. A person of ordinary intelligence would reasonably know that the statute is meant to prevent the intentional luring of minors to engage in sexual conduct through the dissemination of harmful, sexual images. There is no possibility of arbitrary or discriminatory enforcement: the combination of precise terms and the clearly pronounced elements adequately define the criminal conduct. The statute employs objective, ascertainable standards which do not provide room for law enforcement officials to apply the statute based upon their own personal ideas of right and wrong.

Crimes
Disseminating Indecent Material to Minors
Constitutionality--Predatory Pedophile Activity on Internet--Content-Based Restriction--Strict Scrutiny

(4) Penal Law § 235.22, which is entitled "Disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree," and was enacted to address the convergence of predatory pedophile activity with Internet technology, is not an unconstitutional content-based restriction. Although the statute is content-based, since it affects sexually explicit communication, it survives First Amendment strict scrutiny because it curtails the use of speech in a way which does not merit First Amendment protection, and is a carefully tailored means of serving a compelling State interest of protecting children from sexual exploitation. The speech conduct sought to be prohibited by the statute--the endangerment of children through the dissemination of sexually graphic material over the Internet--does not merit First Amendment protection, and, in any event, the statute does not effectuate a total ban on the dissemination of sexual content communication, but merely limits its use. While the statute may incidentally burden some protected expression in carrying out its objective, it serves the compelling interest of preventing the sexual abuse of children and is no broader than necessary to achieve its purpose. 670

Crimes
Disseminating Indecent Material to Minors
Constitutionality--Predatory Pedophile Activity on Internet--Commerce Clause--Burden on Interstate Trade

(5) Penal Law § 235.22, which is entitled "Disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree," and was enacted to address the convergence of predatory pedophile activity with Internet technology, does not unduly burden interstate trade in violation of the Commerce Clause. The statute, which prohibits individuals from luring children into sexual conduct, does not discriminate against or burden interstate trade; it regulates the conduct of individuals who intend to use the Internet to endanger the welfare of children. There is no legitimate commerce that is derived from the intentional transmission of sexually graphic images to minors for the purpose of luring them into sexual activity. The conduct sought to be sanctioned by the statute is of the sort that deserves no "economic" protection. Thus, section 235.22 is a valid exercise of the State's general police powers.

Crimes
Promoting Sexual Performance by Child
Constitutionality--Overbreadth

(6) Penal Law § 263.15, which prohibits the promotion of any performance which includes sexual conduct by a child under the age of 16, is not unconstitutional on the ground of overbreadth. The statutory scheme allows the fact finder to make a determination on the evidence submitted whether the performance involves an individual under 16, and defendant was permitted to introduce expert testimony challenging whether the images he transmitted to the undercover police officer posing as a 15-year-old girl actually depicted children or had been digitally spliced to "manufacture" the picture of a child performing a sexual act. Of the many images transmitted by defendant, defendant's expert could point to only one that may have been digitally altered, and defendant did not object to the court's charge concerning the proof of age of the children in the pictures. The jury was thus instructed to consider, from the evidence before it, if a child who participated in the performance was under 16. Accordingly, the statute is not unconstitutionally overbroad as applied to defendant.

TOTAL CLIENT SERVICE LIBRARY REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d, Constitutional Law, §§ 450-462; Lewdness, Indecency, and Obscenity, §§ 27-39.

McKinney's, Penal Law § 235.20 (2), (3), (5); §§ 235.22, 263.15.

NY Jur 2d, Criminal Law, §§ 4950-4952, 5130-5132, 5135.

ANNOTATION REFERENCES

Validity, construction, and effect of statutes or ordinances prohibiting the sale of obscene materials to minors. 93 ALR3d 297.

Validity, construction, and application of statutes or ordinances regulating sexual performance by child. 21 ALR4th 239. 671

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Lipsitz, Green, Fahringer, Roll, Salisbury & Cambria, L. L. P., Buffalo (Roger W. Wilcox, Jr., and Paul J. Cambria, Jr., of counsel), for appellant.

I. Penal Law § 235.22 is unconstitutionally overbroad in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution and article I, § 8 of the Constitution of the State of New York. (Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, 521 US 844; American Libs. Assn. v Pataki, 969 F Supp 160; American Civ. Liberties Union v Johnson, 4 F Supp 2d 1029; People v Barrows, 174 Misc 2d 367; Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601; Grayned v City of Rockford, 408 US 104; People v Dietze, 75 NY2d 47; Sable Communications v Federal Communications Commn., 492 US 115.) II. Penal Law § 235.22 violates the Commerce Clause and is therefore invalid. (Homier Distrib. Co. v City of Albany, 90 NY2d 153; C & A Carbone v Town of Clarkstown, 511 US 383; Hood & Sons v DuMond, 336 US 525; Pike v Bruce Church, Inc., 397 US 137; People v Concert Connection, 211 AD2d 310; American Libs. Assn. v Pataki, 969 F Supp 160; People v Barrows, 174 Misc 2d 367; Brown-Forman Distillers Corp. v New York State Liq. Auth., 476 US 573; Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, 521 US 844; Wabash, St. Louis & Pac. Ry. Co. v Illinois, 118 US 557.) III. Penal Law § 235.22 is unconstitutionally vague and must be declared void. (Kolender v Lawson, 461 US 352; Connally v General Constr. Co., 269 US 385; Coates v City of Cincinnati, 402 US 611; Grayned v City of Rockford, 408 US 104; Pro-Choice Network v Schenck, 67 F3d 359; People v New York Trap Rock Corp., 57 NY2d 371; Smith v Goguen, 415 US 566; People v Barrows, 174 Misc 2d 367.) IV. Penal Law § 235.22 is a content-based restriction on speech which cannot survive strict scrutiny. (Boos v Barry, 485 US 312; Sable Communications v Federal Communications Commn., 492 US 115; Simon & Schuster v Members of N. Y. State Crime Victims Bd., 502 US 105; Times Sq. Books v City of Rochester, 223 AD2d 270; Matter of Children of Bedford v Petromelis, 77 NY2d 713; Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, 521 US 844; People v Barrows, 174 Misc 2d 367.) V. Penal Law § 263.15 is overbroad in violation of the Federal and State Constitutions. (Grayned v City of Rockford, 408 US 104; New York v Ferber, 458 US 747; Miller v California, 413 US 15.) VI. Appellant's convictions for promoting the sexual performance of a child in violation of Penal Law § 263.15 are not supported by legally sufficient evidence. (New York v Ferber, 458 US 747; People v Keyes, 75 NY2d 343; People v Wong, 81 NY2d 600; 672 People v Hawkins-Rusch, 212 AD2d 961.) VII. The trial court's restriction of cross-examination by appellant denied appellant's constitutionally protected right as guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and article I, § 6 of the New York State Constitution. (People v Chin, 67 NY2d 22; Davis v Alaska, 415 US 308; Chambers v Mississippi, 410 US 284; People v Brown, 162 AD2d 695; People v Freeland, 36 NY2d 518.) VIII. The prosecution failed to establish an unbroken chain of custody for crucial physical evidence. (People v Julian, 41 NY2d 340; People v McGee, 49 NY2d 48; People v Connelly, 35 NY2d 171; People v Snyder, 90 AD2d 894.)

Michael A. Arcuri, District Attorney of Oneida County, Utica (William M. Weber of counsel), for respondent.

I. Penal Law § 235.22 is not impermissibly overbroad in violation of any of the provisions of the Federal or State Constitutions. (Ginsberg v New York, 390 US 629; New York v Ferber, 458 US 747; Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, 521 US 844; Globe Newspaper Co. v Superior Ct., 457 US 596; Miller v California, 413 US 15; Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601; Secretary of State of Md. v Munson Co., 467 US 947; Members of City Council v Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 US 789; People v Hollman, 68 NY2d 202.) II. Penal Law § 235.22 does not violate the Commerce Clause of the Federal Constitution. (Gibbons v Ogden, 9 Wheat [22 US] 1; Pike v Bruce Church, Inc., 397 US 137; City of Philadelphia v New Jersey, 437 US 617; Ginsberg v New York, 390 US 629; New York v Ferber, 458 US 747; Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, 521 US 844; Globe Newspaper Co. v Superior Ct., 457 US 596; American Libs. Assn. v Pataki, 969 F Supp 160; Pharmaceutical Mfrs. Assn. v Whalen, 54 NY2d 486; Matter of Chemical Specialties Mfrs. Assn. v Jorling, 85 NY2d 382.) III. Penal Law § 235.22 is not unconstitutionally vague. (Miller v California, 413 US 15.) IV. Penal Law § 235.22 is not an impermissible regulation on free speech. (Matter of Children of Bedford v Petromelis, 77 NY2d 713; Boos v Barry, 485 US 312; City of Renton v Playtime Theatres, 475 US 41; Ginsberg v New York, 390 US 629; Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, 521 US 844; Globe Newspaper Co. v Superior Ct., 457 US 596; New York v Ferber, 458 US 747; American Libs. Assn. v Pataki, 969 F Supp 160.) V. The constitutionality of Penal Law § 263.15 has been upheld by the United States Supreme Court and the New York State Court of Appeals. (New York v Ferber, 458 US 747.) VI. Defendant's convictions for promoting the sexual performance of a child in violation of Penal Law § 263.15 are supported by sufficient evidence and are not against the weight ofthe 673 evidence. (People v Lipsky, 57 NY2d 560; People v Contes, 60 NY2d 620; People v Benzinger, 36 NY2d 29; People v Kennedy, 47 NY2d 196; People v Vigo, 170 AD2d 192.) VII. The trial court did not improperly restrict defendant's right to cross-examination. (People v Walker, 83 NY2d 455; People v Freeland, 36 NY2d 518; People v Perotti, 233 AD2d 936, 89 NY2d 945; People v Van Nostrand, 217 AD2d 800, 87 NY2d 851.) VIII. The prosecution established an adequate chain of custody. (People v Clarke, 81 NY2d 777; People v Montgomery, 195 AD2d 886; People v Julian, 41 NY2d 340; People v Sarmiento, 168 AD2d 328, 77 NY2d 976; People v Newman, 129 AD2d 742; People v Waite, 243 AD2d 820; People v Miller, 242 AD2d 896.)

Eliot Spitzer, Attorney General, New York City (Preeta D. Bansal, Robin A. Forshaw, Mark H. Levine and James M. Hershler of counsel), in his statutory capacity under Executive Law § 71. I. Penal Law § 235.22 complies with the free speech provisions of the State and Federal Constitutions because it is narrowly tailored to effectuate the State's compelling interest in protecting children from pedophiles who seek to use the Internet to lure them into sexual encounters. (People v Bright, 71 NY2d 376; People v Davis, 43 NY2d 17, 435 US 998; People v Epton, 19 NY2d 496, 390 US 29; Fenster v Leary, 20 NY2d 309; Brockett v Spokane Arcades, 472 US 491; Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601; New York v Ferber, 458 US 747; Members of City Council v Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 US 789; Osborne v Ohio, 495 US 103.) II. Penal Law § 235.22 does not violate the Commerce Clause either facially or as applied because it serves a compelling State interest without unduly burdening interstate commerce. (Brecht v Abrahamson, 507 US 619; Associated Indus. v Lohman, 511 US 641; Kassel v Consolidated Freightways Corp., 450 US 662; Lewis v BT Inv. Mgrs., 447 US 27; United States v Lopez, 514 US 549; General Motors Corp. v Tracy, 519 US 278; People v Cooper, 90 NY2d 292; People v Cooper, 78 NY2d 476; People v Kibbe, 35 NY2d 407; People v Bell, 73 NY2d 153.) III. There is no merit to defendant's claim that Penal Law § 263.15 is overbroad because it fails to specify that it applies only to actual as opposed to fictional children. (New York v Ferber, 458 US 747, 57 NY2d 256; Osborne v Ohio, 495 US 103; People v Hollman, 68 NY2d 202; Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Wesley, J.

(1- 5) The main issue in this appeal focuses on the constitutionality 674 of Penal Law § 235.22, enacted to address the convergence of predatory pedophile activity with Internet technology. Defendant contends that Penal Law § 235.22 is overbroad and vague, that it is a content-based restriction that cannot survive strict scrutiny under the First Amendment, and that it violates the Commerce Clause. We disagree. The statute has a significant and distinct feature: it criminalizes the use of sexually explicit communications designed to lure children into harmful conduct. We thus hold that the statute withstands defendant's challenges.

In October 1996, a State Trooper assigned to the Computer Crime Unit logged onto the Internet and entered a chat room entitled "KidsofFamilySex." The Trooper used the screen name "Aimee_" and began a discussion with defendant, Thomas R. Foley, Sr., who was using the screen name "JustMee." JustMee inquired whether Aimee_ wanted to "chat sex?" Aimee_ answered "OK," identifying herself as a 15-year-old girl who had sex with her father. JustMee identified himself as a 51-year-old male. The conversation lasted approximately two hours and was almost exclusively about sex. JustMee asked Aimee_ how she enjoyed having sex with her father, described how he would have sex with her and encouraged her to masturbate during their conversation. Aimee_ mentioned that she lived in Utica and JustMee informed her that he lived near Buffalo. During the conversation, JustMee sent several pictures to Aimee_ of "preteen girls and men" engaging in sexual acts.

During November 1996, JustMee had three other private on-line chats with Aimee_. In each conversation Aimee_ indicated that she was 15 years old. The conversations centered around sex; JustMee would encourage Aimee_ to masturbate and to describe having sex with her father. He said that he wanted to have sex with her, described how he would do so, and sent her pictures of minors engaging in sexual acts with other minors and with adults. In their third conversation, JustMee expressed his interest in meeting Aimee_ but cautioned that they would have to be careful. Aimee_ answered that she had cousins in Buffalo and that she could possibly arrange a visit. During their fourth conversation, JustMee again discussed their meeting, stating that they would have to be discreet and make the arrangements ahead of time. The discussion turned to the possibility of meeting over Thanksgiving weekend.

The police obtained the identity of JustMee when they served a subpoena on the Internet service provider. As JustMee and 675 Aimee_, in their fifth on-line conversation, discussed where they could meet in Buffalo, the police executed a no-knock search warrant at defendant's residence and found him typing at his computer. Defendant admitted that he had used the screen name JustMee and had several chats with Aimee_, whom he believed to be 15 years old.

Defendant was indicted on three counts of promoting an obscene sexual performance by a child (Penal Law § 263.10), three counts of promoting a sexual performance by a child (Penal Law § 263.15), three counts of obscenity in the third degree (Penal Law § 235.05 [1]) and two counts of attempted disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree (Penal Law §§ 110.00, 235.22 [1], [2]). Prior to trial, defendant moved to dismiss the indictment on several grounds, among them that the statute defining each count of the indictment was unconstitutional. County Court denied the motion.

During trial, defendant introduced the testimony of a computer expert who explained that with current technology, computer images could be easily manipulated. Of the many graphics sent by defendant to Aimee_, however, the expert could only point to one that appeared as if it had been altered. The jury was permitted to examine the pictures and was instructed as follows:

"Section 263.25 of the Penal Law of the State of New York reads: Whenever it becomes necessary, for the purposes of the article, to determine whether a child who participated in a sexual performance was under the age of 16 years, the Court or jury may make such determination by any of the following: Personal inspection of the child, inspection of a photograph or motion picture which constituted the sexual performance, oral testimony by a witness to the sexual performance as to the age of the child based upon the child's appearance, expert medical testimony based upon the appearance of the child in the sexual performance, and any other method authorized by any applicable provision of law or by the rules of evidence at common law."

The jury found defendant guilty of two counts of promoting a sexual performance by a child and two counts of attempted disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree.

The Appellate Division unanimously affirmed the conviction, holding that Penal Law § 235.22 is constitutional. The Court 676 noted that Penal Law § 235.22 is a precise means of accomplishing the Legislature's objective to protect children from sexual abuse by prohibiting the dissemination of graphic images to a minor depicting nudity, sexual conduct or sadomasochistic abuse that is "harmful to minors," and the use of that material to lure the minor to engage in sexual activity. The Court determined that Penal Law § 235.22 is neither impermissibly vague nor overbroad. The Court further determined that the statute met First Amendment standards as a carefully drawn means of serving a compelling State interest. Finally, the Court concluded that the statute did not violate the Commerce Clause and rejected defendant's contention that Penal Law § 263.15 is unconstitutionally overbroad. We affirm.

I.

Penal Law § 235.22 provides:

"A person is guilty of disseminating indecent material to minors in the first degree when:

"1. Knowing the character and content of the communication which, in whole or in part, depicts actual or simulated nudity, sexual conduct or sado-masochistic abuse, and which is harmful to minors, he intentionally uses any computer communication system allowing the input, output, examination or transfer, of computer data or computer programs from one computer to another, to initiate or engage in such communication with a person who is a minor; and

"2. By means of such communication he importunes, invites or induces a minor to engage in sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, or sexual contact with him, or to engage in a sexual performance, obscene sexual performance, or sexual conduct for his benefit [emphasis added]."

Our analysis in this appeal focuses on two requirements that must be established before an individual can be subjected to criminal liability under the statute. First, an individual must intentionally use a computer system to initiate or engage in the transmission of actual or simulated depictions of sexual activity for the purpose of communicating with a minor, knowing the character and content of such communication (Penal Law § 235.22 [1]). The communication must be "harmful to 677 minors" as defined by Penal Law § 235.20 (6).[1] Second, the statute requires that an individual must "[b]y means of such communication" importune, invite or induce the minor to engage in sexual activity for his or her benefit (Penal Law § 235.22 [2]). The statute was enacted to address the growing concern that pedophiles are using the Internet as a forum to lure children (see, Governor's Mem approving L 1996, ch 600, 1996 McKinney's Session Laws of NY, at 1900-1901).

As a preamble to our analysis, we note that an enactment of the Legislature, a coequal branch of government, is presumed to be valid, and that one seeking to invalidate a statute bears the heavy burden of showing that it is unconstitutional (People v Bright, 71 NY2d 376, 382; People v Davis, 43 NY2d 17, 30).

II.

The Overbreadth Doctrine

(1) Defendant contends that, on its face, Penal Law § 235.22 is overbroad because it exposes individuals to criminal liability who unintentionally address a minor through sexually oriented communication. We reject defendant's challenge.

As a general rule, a court will not hear a challenge to a statute from a person to whom the statute may be constitutionally applied on the ground that its application to others, not before the court, may possibly impair their constitutional rights (New York v Ferber, 458 US 747, 767; Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601, 610; see also, People v Hollman, 68 NY2d 202, 208). An exception has been carved out in the area of the First Amendment.

It has been recognized that "statutes attempting to restrict or burden the exercise of First Amendment rights must be narrowly drawn and represent a considered legislative judgment that a particular mode of expression has to give way to other compelling needs of society" (Broadrick v Oklahoma, supra, 413 US 601, 611-612). Thus, a statute that attempts to proscribe constitutionally protected speech will not be enforced 678 unless a limiting construction effectively removes the apparent threat to constitutionally protected expression (id., at 613).

A statute is subjected to less scrutiny where the behavior sought to be prohibited by the State moves from "pure speech" toward conduct "and that conduct--even if expressive--falls within the scope of otherwise valid criminal laws that reflect legitimate state interests" (id., at 615). Even though the statute, "if too broadly worded, may deter protected speech to some unknown extent, there comes a point where that effect--at best a prediction--cannot, with confidence, justify invalidating a statute on its face and so prohibiting a State from enforcing the statute against conduct that is admittedly within its power to proscribe" (id.; see also, People v Hollman, 68 NY2d 202, 209, supra). Thus, where conduct and not merely speech is involved, the overbreadth doctrine can be invoked only where the overbreadth is "substantial" (New York v Ferber, supra, 458 US 747, 769; Broadrick v Oklahoma, supra, 413 US 601, 615). The First Amendment overbreadth doctrine is " 'strong medicine;' " it has been invoked by the courts with hesitation and " 'only as a last resort' " (New York v Ferber, supra, at 769, quoting Broadrick v Oklahoma, 413 US 601, 613, supra; see also, People v Hollman, supra, 68 NY2d 202, 208).

In Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union (521 US 844), the Supreme Court of the United States struck down the Communications Decency Act (47 USC § 223) as unconstitutionally overbroad. The Act prohibited the knowing transmission of "obscene or indecent" comments to any person under the age of 18 (47 USC § 223 [a] [1] [B]) and using the Internet to send or display any comment or image that "in context, depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs" to any person under the age of 18 (47 USC § 223 [d] [1] [B]). The Court noted that the breadth of the Act was unprecedented in that its scope was not limited to commercial speech or commercial entities; the statute's prohibitions embraced all entities and individuals posting indecent messages or displaying them on their own computers in the presence of minors (Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, supra, 521 US, at 877).[2] 679

Penal Law § 235.22 is readily distinguishable from the Communications Decency Act addressed in Reno. Unlike the Federal statute, Penal Law § 235.22 is not directed at the mere transmission of certain types of communication over the Internet. The second part of the statute--the "luring prong"--is significant. An invitation or enticement is distinguishable from pure speech. The terms "importune," "invite" or "induce" can be likened to terms such as "procure" or "solicit" used to define the advancement of prostitution (Penal Law § 230.15) or the terms "request" or "command" used to describe criminal liability for the conduct of another (Penal Law § 20.00). They describe acts of communication; they do not describe the content of one's views. The terms identify forms of conduct which may provide a predicate for criminal liability. Penal Law § 235.22 is a preemptive strike against sexual abuse of children by creating criminal liability for conduct directed toward the ultimate acts of abuse.

Defendant contends that constitutionally protected speech among adults on the Internet may be affected by the statute because the statute does not require an individual "know" that he or she is communicating with a minor. For example, a "chat room" participant who sends a sexually explicit graphic image file with an accompanying message inviting other "chat room" participants to get together for lawful sexual activities runs the risk that a minor may have access to the "chat room" and receive the transmission. Such a participant, according to defendant, could thus be exposed to criminal liability.

Penal Law § 235.22 (1) provides that a person is guilty of disseminating indecent material to a minor if, knowing the content of the communication, he "intentionally" uses any communication system to initiate or engage in such communication with a person who is a minor. The placement of the word "intentionally" in Penal Law § 235.22 (1) should be read to modify everything that follows. Where a statute contains only one reference to a particular mental state (such as "intentionally"), there is a presumption that the mental state applies to "every element of the offense unless an intent to limit its application clearly appears" (Penal Law § 15.15 [1]). Thus, contrary to defendant's assertion, the statute should be 680 read as requiring that an individual intend to initiate this kind of communication with a minor and thereby further intend to "importune, invite or induce" the minor to engage in sexual conduct for the sender's benefit.

Defendant suggests that the legislative history of Penal Law § 235.22 indicates that the statute was not to be so circumscribed. We conclude that the statute provides for the mental state of "intent" to limit the proscribed conduct. As one of the sponsors of the legislation stated, "[t]he purpose of this bill is [to] deter individuals who would use computer networks to lure children into sexual relations by intentionally transmitting indecent materials to children through the computer networks. The bill would not hold liable a computer network or other individual who did not intentionally transmit the materials to minors" (Letter from Senator Sears to Governor, July 11, 1996, Bill Jacket, L 1996, ch 600).

(2) Finally, we reject defendant's assertion that the term "harmful to minors" found in Penal Law § 235.22 (1) is overbroad because it allows New York to impose its community standards nationwide. The term "harmful to minors" is specifically defined according to the guidelines enunciated by the Supreme Court in Miller v California (413 US 15, 24) and is further limited to actual or simulated "nudity," "sexual conduct" or "sado-masochistic abuse" (see, Penal Law § 235.22 [1]; § 235.20 [2], [3], [5]). It is difficult to envision a situation where this conduct would not be considered harmful to minors outside New York when the statute seeks specifically to prohibit the intentional dissemination of this type of material to a minor in conjunction with the sender's enticement or invitation to the child to engage in sexual activity.

In short, the legitimate reach of Penal Law § 235.22 outweighs its "arguably impermissible applications" (New York v Ferber, supra, 458 US 747, 773). Thus, we conclude that the statute is not substantially overbroad.

Vagueness

(3) Defendant also challenges Penal Law § 235.22 as unconstitutionally vague, arguing that the luring prong of Penal Law § 235.22 (2) defines the prohibited conduct in unacceptably ambiguous terms. According to defendant, the phrase "importunes, invites or induces" and the phrase "sexual conduct for his benefit" not only fail to provide adequate notice of what is prohibited but also permit the arbitrary and discriminatory application of the law by both law enforcement 681 authorities and fact finders called upon to interpret the speech at issue. We disagree.

A statute is unconstitutionally vague if it fails to provide a person of ordinary intelligence with a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, and it is written in a manner that permits or encourages arbitrary or discriminatory enforcement (Grayned v City of Rockford, 408 US 104, 108; see also, People v Shack, 86 NY2d 529, 538-539; People v Bright, supra, 71 NY2d, at 382). A vague law impermissibly delegates basic policy matters to law enforcement officials, Judges and juries for resolution on an ad hoc, subjective basis "with the attendant dangers of arbitrary and discriminatory application" (Grayned v City of Rockford, supra, 408 US, at 109). However, imprecise language does not render a statute fatally vague so long as that language " 'conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices' " (People v Shack, supra, 86 NY2d 529, 538, citing United States v Petrillo, 332 US 1, 8).

In Reno, the major defect of the Communications Decency Act was its vagueness. Absent any definitions for the terms "indecent" and "patently offensive," the Act lacked the precision that the First Amendment requires when a statute regulates the content of speech (521 US, at 874). The Supreme Court noted that the open-ended nature of the proscribed material added to the threat that the statute would censor speech that, in fact, would fall outside its scope (id.).

Unlike the terms "indecent" or "patently offensive" held to be vague in the Communications Decency Act, each and every term of Penal Law § 235.22 is either defined in the Penal Law or has a plain and ordinary meaning (see, Penal Law § 235.20). The term "benefit" as used in "for his benefit" is defined as "any gain or advantage to the beneficiary and includes any gain or advantage to a third person pursuant to the desire or consent of the beneficiary" (Penal Law § 10.00 [17]). While "importune," "invite" and "induce" are not defined terms, a person of ordinary intelligence would reasonably know that the statute is meant to prevent the intentional luring of minors to engage in sexual conduct through the dissemination of harmful, sexual images.

Moreover, we find no possibility of arbitrary or discriminatory enforcement of the statute. The combination of the precise terms described in the statute and the clearly pronounced elements "adequately defines the criminal conduct for the police 682 officers, Judges and juries who will enforce the statute" (People v Shack, supra, 86 NY2d, at 539). Unlike the subjective terms used in the Federal Act, Penal Law § 235.22 employs objective, ascertainable standards which do not provide room for law enforcement officials to apply the statute based upon their own personal ideas of right and wrong (People v Bright, supra, 71 NY2d, at 383). We therefore conclude that Penal Law § 235.22 is not unconstitutionally vague.

Content-Based Restriction

In addition to contesting the validity of Penal Law § 235.22 on First Amendment overbreadth and vagueness grounds, defendant asserts that the statute is an unconstitutional content-based restriction. Because Penal Law § 235.22 proscribes "sexually oriented" communications, defendant maintains that it is an impermissible regulation on speech.

Content-based speech restrictions are presumptively invalid and will not survive strict scrutiny unless the government can show that the regulation promotes a compelling State interest and that it chose the least restrictive means to further the articulated interest (see, Sable Communications v Federal Communications Commn., 492 US 115, 126; Boos v Berry, 485 US 312, 321; see also, People ex rel. Arcara v Cloud Books, 68 NY2d 553, 559).

(4) Sexually explicit communication is affected by the statute and thus the statute is content-based (see, Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, supra, 521 US 844, 868); Penal Law § 235.22 prohibits the dissemination of a certain category of images to minors (Penal Law § 235.22 [1]). The justification for the statute is related to the impact on the minor listener and cannot be properly analyzed as a content-neutral, time, place and manner restriction (Reno v American Civ. Liberties Union, supra, at 868; compare, City of Erie v Pap's A.M., ___ US ___, 120 S Ct 1382, 1391). We nevertheless hold that Penal Law § 235.22 survives First Amendment strict scrutiny, because as noted earlier, it curtails the use of speech in a way which does not merit First Amendment protection and is a carefully tailored means of serving a compelling State interest (see, New York v Ferber, supra, 458 US 747, 773).

The primary legislative purpose behind the statute is "to protect the children of this State from high-tech cybersex abuse and actual sexual abuse" (Governor's Mem approving L 1996, ch 600, 1996 McKinney's Session Laws of NY, at 1901). The State plainly has a "compelling" interest in protecting children 683 from sexual exploitation in order to safeguard their " 'physical and psychological well-being' " (New York v Ferber, supra, 458 US 747, 756-757, quoting Globe Newspaper Co. v Superior Ct., 457 US 596, 607). " 'It rarely has been suggested that the constitutional freedom for speech and press extends its immunity to speech or writing used as an integral part of conduct in violation of a valid criminal statute' " (New York v Ferber, supra, 458 US 747, 761-762, quoting Giboney v Empire Stor. & Ice Co., 336 US 490, 498; see also, Osborne v Ohio, 495 US 103, 110). As a result, courts have recognized that speech used to further the sexual exploitation of children does not enjoy constitutional protection (see, New York v Ferber, supra, 458 US 747, on remand to People v Ferber, 57 NY2d 256, 259; United States v Kufrovich, 997 F Supp 246, 254 [D Conn]; United States v Powell, 1 F Supp 2d 1419, 1422 [ND Ala]).

The speech-conduct sought to be prohibited by Penal Law § 235.22--the endangerment of children through the dissemination of sexually graphic material over the Internet--does not merit First Amendment protection. In any event, the statute does not effectuate a total ban on the dissemination of sexual content communication, but merely limits its use (compare, City of Erie v Pap's A.M., supra, ___ US ___, 120 S Ct 1382, 1392-1393; Sable Communications v Federal Communications Commn., supra, 492 US 115, 129). Although the statute may incidentally burden some protected expression in carrying out its objective, Penal Law § 235.22 serves the compelling interest of preventing the sexual abuse of children and is no broader than necessary to achieve that purpose (see, People ex rel. Arcara v Cloud Books, supra, 68 NY2d 553, 558).

The Commerce Clause

Defendant's final assault on Penal Law § 235.22 is premised on the Commerce Clause. Relying on a recent Federal court decision--American Libs. Assn. v Pataki (969 F Supp 160 [SD NY])--defendant contends that Penal Law § 235.22 unduly burdens interstate trade.

In American Libs., the court struck down Penal Law § 235.21 (3) as a violation of the Commerce Clause. Penal Law § 235.21 (3) prohibits sending a sexually explicit depiction to a minor over the Internet. Because the Internet represents an instrument of interstate commerce, the court deemed Penal Law § 235.21 (3) to be "closely concerned with interstate commerce, and scrutiny of the [statute] under the Commerce Clause" was therefore "entirely appropriate" (id., at 173). The court 684 expressly distinguished Penal Law § 235.21 (3) from Penal Law § 235.22, recognizing that "plaintiffs do not challenge the sections of the statute that criminalize the sale of obscene materials to children, over the Internet or otherwise, and prohibit adults from luring children into sexual contact by communicating with them via the Internet" (id., at 179).

(5) Penal Law § 235.22 does not discriminate against or burden interstate trade; it regulates the conduct of individuals who intend to use the Internet to endanger the welfare of children. Although Penal Law § 235.22 contains some of the same language as the provision in Penal Law § 235.21 (3) struck down in American Libs., the statute challenged here contains the additional "luring" prong. We are hard pressed to ascertain any legitimate commerce that is derived from the intentional transmission of sexually graphic images to minors for the purpose of luring them into sexual activity. Indeed, the conduct sought to be sanctioned by Penal Law § 235.22 is of the sort that deserves no "economic" protection (see, New York v Ferber, supra, 458 US 747, 761-762). Thus, we conclude that Penal Law § 235.22 is a valid exercise of the State's general police powers (see, Lewis v BT Inv. Mgrs., 447 US 27, 36).

III.

Finally, we address defendant's constitutional challenge to Penal Law § 263.15, which prohibits promoting a sexual performance by a child. Although the Supreme Court in New York v Ferber (supra, 458 US 747) has held that Penal Law § 263.15 is not unconstitutionally overbroad, defendant attempts to revisit the matter. Defendant notes that today's computer technology permits the manipulation of images such that the concerns addressed in Ferber regarding the harm caused to children as a result of the production of sexual performances are not presented here. Defendant argues that in the absence of an express instruction from the trial court that the People must prove the actual use of children in the prohibited performances, the statute is fatally overbroad.

Penal Law § 263.15 prohibits the promotion of any performance which includes sexual conduct by a child younger than 16 years of age. In Ferber, the Supreme Court held that the value of permitting live performances and photographic reproductions of children engaged in lewd sexual conduct was de minimis (458 US, at 762). Since this class of material bears heavily on the welfare of children, in the balance of competing interests, "it is permissible to consider these materials as 685 without the protection of the First Amendment" (id., at 764). The Court then rejected the overbreadth challenge to Penal Law § 263.15, holding that the statute's legitimate reach in addressing the harm of child pornography outweighs any arguably impermissible application (id., at 773). The Court concluded that any overbreadth which may exist should be cured on a "case-by-case analysis" (id., at 774).

(6) We are unpersuaded by defendant's speculative and broad reading of Penal Law § 263.15. Defendant fails to demonstrate any real or substantial overbreadth to invalidate the statute.

The statutory scheme allows the fact finder to make a determination on the evidence submitted whether the performance involves an individual under the age of 16 (Penal Law § 263.25). In this case, defendant was permitted to introduce expert testimony challenging whether the images transmitted by defendant to Aimee_ actually depicted children or had been digitally spliced to "manufacture" the picture of a child performing a sexual act. Of the many images transmitted by defendant to Aimee_, defendant's expert could point to only one that may have been digitally altered. Defendant did not object to the trial court's charge on Penal Law § 263.25. The jury was thus instructed to consider, from the evidence before it, whether or not a child who participated in the performance was under the age of 16. Under these circumstances, we cannot conclude that, as applied to defendant, the statute is unconstitutionally overbroad. We reject defendant's remaining contentions.

Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed.

Chief Judge Kaye and Judges Bellacosa, Smith, Levine, Ciparick and Rosenblatt concur.
Order affirmed. 686

Footnotes

1 Under Penal Law § 235.20 (6), "harmful to minors" is described as "that quality of any description or representation, in whatever form, of nudity, sexual conduct, sexual excitement, or sado-masochistic abuse" when it "[c]onsidered as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest in sex of minors," is "patently offensive" to the "prevailing standards in the adult community" as to what is suitable material for minors and "[c]onsidered as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political and scientific value for minors" (Penal Law § 235.20 [6]).

2 One New York court has held that Penal Law § 235.22 similarly implicates the First Amendment. In People v Barrows (177 Misc 2d 712), the court turned to the second subdivision of Penal Law § 235.22 pertaining to the violator's conduct in "importun[ing], invit[ing] or induc [ing] a minor to engage" in sexual activity for his or her benefit and determined that this devolved to nothing more than "speech in its purest form" (id., at 732). Then, analogizing Penal Law § 235.22 to the Communications Decency Act, the court concluded that Penal Law § 235.22 was unconstitutionally overbroad and vague (id., at 733-734). We disagree with that analysis (see, People v Barrows, 174 Misc 2d 367).

New York Official Reports

42 N.Y.3d 60, 241 N.E.3d 770, 217 N.Y.S.3d 1, 2024 N.Y. Slip Op. 00926

1 The People of the State of New York, Respondent,

v

Darryl Watts, Appellant.

Court of Appeals of New York
10
Argued January 10, 2024

Decided February 22, 2024

CITE TITLE AS: People v Watts

SUMMARY

Appeal, on constitutional grounds, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the First Judicial Department, entered November 29, 2022. The Appellate Division affirmed an order of the Supreme Court, Bronx County (Diane R. Kiesel, J.; op 58 Misc 3d 552 [2017]), which had adjudicated defendant a risk level two sexually violent offender pursuant to the Sex Offender Registration Act.

People v Watts, 210 AD3d 595, affirmed.

HEADNOTES

Crimes
Sex Offenders
Sex Offender Registration Act—Due Process—Offender's Competency

(1) When there is a possibility that a sex offender may lack capacity to fully comprehend a Sex Offender Registration Act (SORA) (Correction Law art 6-C) risk-level assessment proceeding, due process does not preclude a court from determining the offender's risk level because the many safeguards already provided under SORA minimize the risk of inaccurate risk-level classification and adequately balance the competing private and State interests. Accordingly, where defendant was represented by counsel and provided the other protections listed in Correction Law article 6-C, his due process rights were not were violated when Supreme Court declined to order a competency hearing before adjudicating him a level two sex offender. Although the liberty interest at stake was not to be discounted, it was more limited than the interest threatened by a criminal proceeding. Defendant had not demonstrated that his proposed safeguard—which amounted to exempting incompetent registrants from SORA classification for the duration of their disability—would meaningfully reduce inaccurate risk-level classifications, even if the robust existing procedures left gaps through which a rare incompetent registrant might fall. Even admitting the possibility of an initial misclassification, defendant could still seek modification of his risk level on an annual basis. Finally, beyond the obvious financial and administrative costs associated with the additional proposed safeguard, the State also has a compelling interest in protecting its citizens by promptly notifying the public of registrants who pose a heightened threat of recidivism. Delaying the classification of incompetent registrants threatens that interest, in that it risks that some dangerous registrants will be released into the community for lengthy periods without accurate risk-level designations or public notice.

Crimes
Sex Offenders
Sex Offender Registration Act—Classification of Civilly Confined Offender

(2) The Sex Offender Registration Act (SORA) (Correction Law art 6-C) does not require courts to indefinitely postpone SORA classification until a *61 registrant's release from civil confinement, and doing so would inject a degree of uncertainty into the classification process not contemplated or intended by the legislature. Accordingly, a SORA classification hearing which adjudicated defendant a level two sex offender while he remained civilly committed to an Office of Mental Health psychiatric facility pursuant to Mental Hygiene Law article 9 was not premature. SORA's plain text and structure authorize risk-level determinations "[30] calendar days prior" to a registrant's release from incarceration following the completion of their prison sentence, regardless of pending civil commitment proceedings (see Correction Law § 168-n [2]). Unlike a registrant's release from incarceration, a registrant's release from civil confinement does not typically occur on a date scheduled far in advance: it is premised on changing conditions and can occur abruptly or on short notice (see e.g. Mental Hygiene Law §§ 9.33, 9.35). Given that unpredictability, defendant had not shown that it would be possible for the Board of Examiners of Sex Offenders, district attorneys' offices, and courts to reliably comply with the carefully developed SORA classification process—instituted to protect both the public and registrants' due process rights—if the various deadlines and milestones in that process were to be measured from release from civil confinement.

RESEARCH REFERENCES

Am Jur 2d Mentally Impaired Persons §§ 131, 134.

NY Jur 2d Penal and Correctional Institutions §§ 34, 382, 396, 397, 402.

ANNOTATION REFERENCE

See ALR Index under Incompetent or Insane Persons; Sex Offender Registration and Notification.

FIND SIMILAR CASES ON THOMSON REUTERS WESTLAW

Path: Home > Cases > New York State & Federal Cases > New York Official Reports

Query: SORA /s classification & "due process" & incompeten!

POINTS OF COUNSEL

Twyla Carter, The Legal Aid Society, New York City (Rachel L. Pecker of counsel), for appellant.

Holding a Sex Offender Registration Act (Correction Law art 6-C) hearing when a registrant lacks mental competency violates a registrant's constitutional rights, and thus, where there is evidence that a registrant lacks competency, fundamental fairness precludes the court from proceeding without first ordering a competency determination. (US Const Amends VI, XIV; NY Const, art I, § 6.) (People v David W., 95 NY2d 130; People v Baxin, 26 NY3d 6; Doe v Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d 456; 62 People v Lashway, 25 NY3d 478; People v Mingo, 12 NY3d 563; People v Gillotti, 23 NY3d 841; Mathews v Eldridge, 424 US 319; Doe 1 v Marshall, 367 F Supp 3d 1310; Drope v Missouri, 420 US 162.)

Darcel D. Clark, District Attorney, Bronx (Joshua P. Weiss and Yael V. Levy of counsel), for respondent.

I. Because a Sex Offender Registration Act (Correction Law art 6-C) risk-level classification hearing is a civil proceeding intended to protect the public rather than to punish the sex offender, defendant had no statutory or due process right to a competency assessment prior to the hearing. (LaRossa, Axenfeld & Mitchell v Abrams, 62 NY2d 583; People v Ramos, 85 NY2d 678; Mathews v Eldridge, 424 US 319; Doe v Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d 456; People v Windham, 10 NY3d 801; People v David W., 95 NY2d 130; People v Williams, 19 NY3d 100; People v Finnegan, 85 NY2d 53; People v Kupprat, 6 NY2d 88; Matter of Town of Riverhead v New York State Bd. of Real Prop. Servs., 5 NY3d 36.) II. The Sex Offender Registration Act's (Correction Law art 6-C) plain language, legislative history, and overall scheme confirm that a court's duty to conduct the hearing is triggered upon an offender's release from incarceration. (People v Staley, 104 AD3d 583; People v Lashway, 25 NY3d 478; People v Sherard, 73 AD3d 537; People v Rodriguez, 102 AD3d 457; People v Gillette, 189 AD3d 512; People v Norris, 168 AD3d 1003; People v Blum, 166 AD3d 571; People v Gordon, 147 AD3d 988; Matter of Charles B. v State of New York, 192 AD3d 1583; Matter of Christopher PP. v State of New York, 151 AD3d 1334.)

Natalie M. Chin, Disability Rights and Justice Clinic, Washington Square Legal Services, Inc., New York City, for Mental Hygiene Legal Service, amicus curiae.

I. Registrants have significant liberty interests that require protections under the due process clause of the New York and United States Constitutions. (Doe v Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d 456; Matter of Lopez v Evans, 25 NY3d 199.) II. Registrants' liberty interests are protected by the Due Process Clause of the New York and United States Constitutions and New York's Correction Law. (People ex rel. Garling v Van Allen, 55 NY 31; Ajaeb v Ajaeb, 276 App Div 1094, 301 NY 605; Lunney v Graham, 91 AD2d 592; Carlisle v County of Nassau, 64 AD2d 15; Shepherd v Swatling, 36 Misc 2d 881; Matter of Daniel Aaron D., 49 NY2d 788; People v Richetti, 302 NY 290; People v Johnson, 1 NY3d 302; People v Bradley, 8 NY3d 124; Crawford v Washington, 541 US 36.) III. Participation by a registrant in Sex Offender Registration Act (Correction Law art 6-C) hearings is required 63 given the dynamic and variable factors at issue. (People ex rel. Rivera v Superintendent, Woodbourne Corr. Facility, 40 NY3d 307; People v Gillotti, 23 NY3d 841; People v Crandall, 90 AD3d 628; People v Krull, 208 AD3d 163; People v Palmer, 20 NY3d 373; People v Cousin, 209 AD3d 1047; People v Snyder, 175 AD3d 1331; People v S.G., 4 Misc 3d 563; People v Santiago, 137 AD3d 762; People v Marsh, 116 AD3d 680.) IV. While the remedy may lie with the Legislature, this Court may take necessary interim steps to ensure that Sex Offender Registration Act (Correction Law art 6-C) proceedings comport with due process. (People v Schaffer, 86 NY2d 460; People v Lally, 19 NY2d 27; People v Mendez, 1 NY3d 15; People v Gensler, 72 NY2d 239; People v Armlin, 37 NY2d 167; Tennessee v Lane, 541 US 509.)

OPINION OF THE COURT

Cannataro, J.

The Sex Offender Registration Act (SORA) (Correction Law art 6-C) requires that every person convicted of a sex offense be given a risk-level classification corresponding to their assessed likelihood of recidivism and potential danger to the community. This risk level, in turn, determines the scope of information available to the public concerning the offender. To protect against erroneous classification, judicial determination of an offender's risk level can occur only after the offender has been provided notice, counsel, disclosure of relevant information, and an opportunity to object and present evidence at a hearing, at which the People must prove the appropriateness of the classification by clear and convincing evidence. An offender's risk level is also subject to re-evaluation on an annual basis.

The primary question on this appeal is whether due process precludes a court from determining a sex offender's risk level when there is a possibility that the offender—although represented by counsel and provided the other protections listed above—may lack capacity to fully comprehend risk-level assessment proceedings. We hold that the many safeguards already provided under SORA minimize the risk of inaccurate risk-level classification and adequately balance the competing private and State interests in these civil proceedings.

I.

In July 2011, defendant Darryl Watts was arrested and charged with various offenses, including sexual abuse in the 64 first degree and assault in the second degree, after he knocked a 66-year-old woman to the ground and attempted to rape her (see Penal Law §§ 120.05 [12]; 130.65 [1]). Defendant, who suffers from severe schizophrenia and psychosis, "was responding to internal voices" and claimed that "the victim was chosen for him." Six days after his arrest, a competency examination was conducted pursuant to CPL article 730 and Supreme Court determined that *2 defendant was not mentally fit to stand trial. He was therefore placed in the custody and care of the Office of Mental Health (OMH), where he remained for more than five years and underwent six additional competency examinations.[1] In February 2017, after he was examined for a seventh time and found competent to stand trial, defendant pleaded guilty to sexual abuse and assault. The court sentenced him to a determinate term of incarceration of six years, followed by 10 years of postrelease supervision.

Defendant's sexual abuse conviction subjected him to the registration and classification requirements of SORA (see Correction Law §§ 168-a [3] [a]; 168-d [1] [a]; 168-l [6]). In anticipation of his 2017 release from incarceration, the Board of Examiners of Sex Offenders (the Board) prepared a case summary and risk assessment instrument (RAI) recommending that defendant be classified as a level two (moderate risk) sex offender. On the date initially scheduled for the SORA classification hearing, defendant's new attorney requested and was granted an adjournment to familiarize herself with the case. Because he was due to be released imminently, the court gave defendant a provisional level two designation "without prejudice to reconsideration," on consent of the parties.

At the next hearing date, counsel informed the court that defendant had been transferred and confined to an OMH facility for treatment pursuant to Mental Hygiene Law article 9. His mental state was unstable and deteriorating such that OMH staff did not feel "comfortable" transporting him to court. Based on conversations with her client and OMH staff, counsel expressed concern that defendant would not be able to understand the nature of the SORA classification hearing or the requirements of the Act. Relying on the language of SORA, counsel argued that the hearing should be adjourned until defendant's 65 release into the community. Alternatively, counsel argued that "[a]lthough [defendant] doesn't have a full set of due process rights at [a SORA classification] hearing, he does have some due process rights," and therefore asked the court to order a competency examination before proceeding with classification. The court briefly adjourned the hearing without deciding these issues.

At the next hearing date, defendant was unable to appear due to a conflicting court appearance relating to his article 9 confinement. Although Supreme Court expressed its view that a competency hearing was not required to proceed with SORA risk-level classification, it granted another adjournment to give defendant an opportunity to attend in person.

The risk assessment hearing finally took place in October 2017. Defendant was physically present, but his attorney maintained that he was unable to understand the nature of the proceedings, the RAI, or his obligations under SORA, and reiterated her request for a competency hearing. Counsel further argued that it was premature to conduct the hearing because defendant was still confined to an OMH facility and would not be released into the community for an indefinite period of time. Citing People v Parris (153 AD3d 68 [2d Dept 2017], lv denied 30 NY3d 904 [2017]), the court rejected defense counsel's argument that due process requires a competency examination prior to a SORA classification hearing. The court then proceeded with the hearing and formally adjudicated defendant a level two sex offender (see 58 Misc 3d 552 [Sup Ct, Bronx County 2017]). The Appellate Division unanimously affirmed (see *3 210 AD3d 595 [1st Dept 2022]). Defendant appeals to this Court as of right based on the existence of a substantial constitutional question (see 39 NY3d 1103 [2023]; CPLR 5601 [b] [1]).

II.

The fundamental principle at the core of the Constitution's due process guarantee "is that when the State seeks to take life, liberty or property from an individual, the State must provide effective procedures that guard against an erroneous deprivation" (People v David W., 95 NY2d 130, 136 [2000]; see US Const, Amend XIV, § 1). "The bedrock of due process is notice and opportunity to be heard" (David W., 95 NY2d at 138). However, the United States Supreme Court has made clear that due process is a flexible requirement, cautioning that "not 66 all situations calling for procedural safeguards call for the same kind of procedure" (Morrissey v Brewer, 408 US 471, 481 [1972]; see also Medina v California, 505 US 437, 453 [1992]).

This Court has recognized that SORA classification proceedings are civil and not punitive in nature. Thus, although the State must provide "more than mere summary process" at a classification hearing, the safeguards required "are not as extensive as those required in a plenary criminal or civil trial" (People v Baxin, 26 NY3d 6, 10 [2015] [internal quotation marks omitted]). Determination of whether a particular safeguard must be provided requires consideration of three factors: (1) the private interest that will be affected by the official action; (2) the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of the additional or substitute procedural safeguard; and (3) the government's interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail (Mathews v Eldridge, 424 US 319, 334-335 [1976]; David W., 95 NY2d at 136-137).

We begin, then, with consideration of the private interest at stake. This Court has recognized that SORA registrants have a substantial interest in not being stigmatized by classifications that overstate their danger to the community (David W., 95 NY2d at 137; see also People v Knox, 12 NY3d 60, 66-67 [2009]; Doe v Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d 456, 469 [SD NY 1998]). "More than 'name calling by public officials,' [a SORA risk level] 'is a determination of status' that can have a considerable adverse impact on an individual's ability to live in a community and obtain or maintain employment" (see David W., 95 NY2d at 137, quoting Paul v Davis, 424 US 693, 703 [1976]). Specifically, when a registrant is classified as a level two (moderate risk) or level three (high-risk) sex offender, they must register for life, and information about the registrant appears in a public Internet directory (Correction Law §§ 168-b [6]; 168-l [6] [b], [c]; 168-q). Classification as a level three sex offender also subjects a registrant to more periodic verification requirements (see id. § 168-b [1] [b]), and to the residency restrictions of the Sexual Assault Reform Act (SARA) (Executive Law § 259-c [14]; see People ex rel. Rivera v Superintendent, Woodbourne Corr. Facility, 40 NY3d 307, 311 [2023]).

Thus, SORA risk-level classification implicates a private liberty interest and triggers due process safeguards (see 67 David W., 95 NY2d at 138). Nonetheless, this liberty interest does not rise to the level of a fundamental right or trigger a requirement that the State shield a sex offender from the social stigma flowing from their criminal conviction or an accurate assessment of their risk to the community (see Vega v Lantz, 596 F3d 77, 82 [2d Cir 2010]; Knox, 12 NY3d at 67). For that reason, although the liberty interest at stake here is not to be discounted, it is more limited than the interest threatened by a criminal proceeding, where an innocent person may be inaccurately branded a criminal and subjected not only to unjust stigma but the complete curtailment of liberty through a prison sentence. *4

The second factor to consider is the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the private liberty interest as a result of the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards (David W., 95 NY2d at 136, citing Mathews, 424 US at 335). Although SORA classification is a civil rather than criminal undertaking, courts have required and this State has long provided a panoply of safeguards aimed at protecting registrants from erroneous SORA classifications (see Doe v Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d at 471-472; see also Budget Rep on Bills, Bill Jacket, L 1999, ch 453 at 4 [amending SORA to cure the due process deficiencies identified in Pataki]). SORA risk levels are based on factors developed and applied in the first instance by an agency practiced in evaluating such matters (the Board), and then tested at an adversarial hearing before a judge (Correction Law §§ 168-l [5]-[6]; 168-n [2]); the registrant is entitled to an attorney at the hearing, including one appointed by the court if the registrant is unable to afford an attorney of their own choosing (id. § 168-n [3]); the registrant and counsel must be provided advance notice of the hearing, the Board's recommendation, its bases, and any contrary assessment by the People sufficiently in advance to allow a meaningful opportunity to prepare a defense (id. § 168-n [2]-[3]); the registrant is entitled to prehearing discovery of material relied upon by the Board in making its recommendation (id. § 168-n [3]); the People must prove, by clear and convincing evidence, that the assigned classification is warranted (id.); the registrant must have the opportunity to appeal the classification (id.); and the registrant can seek modification of their risk level once per year—with a right to counsel at the modification hearing—for as long as they remain registered (id. § 168-o; see generally Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d at 471-472; David W., 95 NY2d at 133; Baxin, 26 NY3d at 10-11; People v Lashway, 25 NY3d 478, 483-484 [2015]).

68 Defendant argues that his incompetency prevented him from taking full advantage of these protections, from being truly "present" at the hearing, and from assisting his counsel in preparing a defense. He therefore asks us to supplement the SORA procedures by requiring a competency examination when it appears that a registrant may lack capacity to understand the risk-level assessment proceeding. In addition, he "suggests that, upon a finding of incompetency, the SORA hearing and appropriate risk level designation would either be foreclosed or postponed indefinitely" (see Parris, 153 AD3d at 78).

Defendant has not demonstrated that his proposed safeguard —which amounts to exempting incompetent registrants from SORA classification for the duration of their disability—would meaningfully reduce inaccurate risk-level classifications, even if the robust existing procedures leave gaps through which a rare incompetent registrant might fall. If anything, defendant's proposal seems certain to create inaccuracy, especially with respect to registrants who meet the criteria for heightened risk levels. It would result in every incompetent registrant, including those who could justly be adjudicated level three (high-risk) offenders, being treated more favorably than a level one (low-risk) offender regardless of the particular circumstances or risk to the public[2] (see *5 Doe v Sex Offender Registry Bd., 81 Mass App Ct 610, 616, 966 NE2d 235, 242 [2012] [hereafter Doe (Massachusetts)] ["due process does not entitle (incompetent) offenders to greater protection than that afforded their competent counterparts"]).

In contrast, it is far from inevitable that incompetent registrants will be misclassified when courts follow the ordinary procedures, particularly given a registrant's right to counsel and the People's heightened burden of proof at a classification hearing. Here, no showing was made that postponing defendant's classification would have resulted in him being adjudicated a level one offender, rendering the value of the proposed additional safeguard conjectural rather than "probable" 69 (see Mathews, 424 US at 343).[3] And even admitting the possibility of an initial misclassification, defendant can still seek modification of his risk level on an annual basis (see Parris, 153 AD3d at 82). This being the case, defendant simply has not shown that exempting incompetent registrants from SORA classification for indefinite periods is necessary or likely to make this civil process meaningfully more reliable or accurate (see Doe [Massachusetts], 81 Mass App Ct at 615, 966 NE2d at 240 [concluding that "(t)he robust, adversary character of the classification process minimizes the risk of . . . erroneous classification," even when a defendant is incompetent (internal quotation marks omitted)]).

The final Mathews factor requires us to consider "the public interest" and the administrative and societal costs associated with the additional proposed safeguard (Mathews, 424 US at 347; see David W., 95 NY2d at 136-137). Obviously, conducting a psychiatric examination and additional hearing to determine a registrant's mental competency would impose additional burdens on the government, as would the task of continually monitoring registrants found to be incompetent over indefinite periods to determine whether they have regained fitness and can be accurately classified. In this case, it took over five years and seven competency examinations before defendant was found competent to stand trial, a timeframe that could have been extended even further had he elected not to plead guilty.

Beyond the financial and administrative costs, the State also has a "compelling interest" in protecting its citizens by promptly notifying the public of registrants who pose a heightened threat of recidivism (see Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d at 470). Delaying the classification of incompetent registrants threatens that interest, in that it risks that some dangerous registrants will be released into the community for lengthy periods without accurate risk-level designations or public notice. Defendant and the dissent dispute this point, noting that 70 offenders must still register with the Division of Criminal Justice Services at least 10 days prior to their release (see dissenting op at 81-82); however, risk-level classification determines the scope of information available to the public upon registration. Because the online sex offender database lists only level two and level three offenders (*6 Correction Law § 168-q), members of the public who search the database will not be informed of a registrant without a risk level, regardless of the actual risk they pose.[4]

The dissent asserts that the State's interest in protecting the public is not advanced by classifying offenders while they are in OMH custody under Mental Hygiene Law article 9. However, defendant has never limited his due process argument to his specific situation. Rather, defendant argues that it is unconstitutional to classify any incompetent registrant during the period of their disability. As Mathews itself holds, "procedural due process rules are shaped by the risk of error inherent in the truthfinding process as applied to the generality of cases, not the rare exceptions" (424 US at 344). The dissent is also selective in its analysis of the effects of Mental Hygiene Law article 9 confinement. Just as article 9 confinement shields the public from offenders, it also shields offenders from the public and its stigma, which cannot in this context impact any offender's "ability to live in a community and obtain or maintain employment" (David W., 95 NY2d at 137). Further, although it is possible that an offender may be denied placement at a particular residential treatment facility, such as a nursing home, as a result of their risk level (dissenting op at 90), this merely reinforces that an offender's risk level is useful in determining which custodial settings are suitable, and to avoid placing a potentially dangerous offender in an inappropriate facility.

(1) In the end, although the consequences of misclassification to registrants when they reenter society are "sufficiently serious to warrant more than mere summary process," the 71 State nevertheless maintains a compelling interest in an "expedited" process "without the burden of a new adversary criminal trial" and its greater concomitant due process protections (see Pataki, 3 F Supp 2d at 470 [internal quotation marks omitted]). As we have further recognized, " 'the Due Process Clause simply does not mandate that all governmental decisionmaking comply with standards that assure perfect, error-free determinations' " (Pringle v Wolfe, 88 NY2d 426, 434 [1996] [brackets omitted], quoting Mackey v Montrym, 443 US 1, 13 [1979]). What is required is a process that reasonably balances the competing interests at stake (see Tulsa Professional Collection Services, Inc. v Pope, 485 US 478, 484 [1988] ["The focus is on the reasonableness of the balance"]). Balancing the Mathews factors, we agree with the weight of authority that the State's substantial interest in efficiently assessing registrants' risk to the community outweighs that of incompetent registrants to a delay of SORA classification during an indefinite period of disability (see Parris, 153 AD3d at 78, 80-81; accord State v Khan, 2017-Ohio-4067, ¶ 17 [Ohio Ct App 2017]; Doe [Massachusetts], 81 Mass App Ct at 615-616, 966 NE2d at 240-242).

Our conclusion that incompetency does not preclude SORA classification is fully consistent with jurisprudence in analogous contexts. In Matter of Lopez v Evans, this Court held that due process requires that a parolee be competent before the Division of Parole can adjudicate an alleged violation of the terms and conditions of their release (25 NY3d 199 [2015]). But as the Appellate Division recognized, there are significant distinguishing factors between parole revocation *7 proceedings and SORA classification hearings. Most notably, parole revocation proceedings are punitive in nature and their purpose is to adjudicate wrongdoing, the consequence of which may be a defendant's re-incarceration (Parris, 153 AD3d at 78-79; see Lopez, 25 NY3d at 206 ["Clearly salient are constitutional concerns about the fundamental fairness of a proceeding in which a (defendant) who is unable to make decisions about his defense may be returned to prison"]). In contrast, SORA classification hearings are not intended to serve as a form of punishment, and incarceration is not a potential consequence of SORA classification in and of itself. That restriction of liberty can occur only if a registrant later violates the rules applicable to their classification, at which point additional procedures 72 must be followed before the registrant may be penalized by incarceration.[5]

The People more aptly analogize this situation to the multitude of civil proceedings in which comparatively greater private interests are threatened, but which under current law may proceed notwithstanding questions regarding a party's competency. These include civil commitment proceedings under the Sex Offender Management and Treatment Act (SOMTA) (see e.g. Matter of State of New York v Daniel OO., 88 AD3d 212 [3d Dept 2011], appeal dismissed 21 NY3d 1038 [2013]; United States v Comstock, 627 F3d 513 [4th Cir 2010], cert denied 564 US 1030 [2011]; Matter of Oxner, 440 SC 5, 889 SE2d 586 [2023]; In re Detention of Morgan, 180 Wash 2d 312, 330 P3d 774 [2014]; Moore v Superior Ct., 50 Cal 4th 802, 237 P3d 530 [2010]; Commonwealth v Burgess, 450 Mass 366, 878 NE2d 921 [2008]; In re Commitment of Weekly, 2011 IL App [1st] 102276, 956 NE2d 634 [Ill App Ct 2011], appeal denied 963 NE2d 246, 357 Ill Dec 293 [2012]; State ex rel. Nixon v Kinder, 129 SW3d 5 [Mo Ct App 2003], cert denied 543 US 979 [2004]), federal immigration removal proceedings (Munoz-Monsalve v Mukasey, 551 F3d 1 [1st Cir 2008]; Brue v Gonzales, 464 F3d 1227, 1232-1233 [10th Cir 2006]; Nee Hao Wong v Immigration & Naturalization Serv., 550 F2d 521 [9th Cir 1977]), and termination of parental rights proceedings (Matter of Joyce T., 65 NY2d 39, 50 [1985]). In addition, the Appellate Division has held that an order of protection can be issued against an incompetent respondent in a family offense proceeding (see Matter of Julie G. v Yu-Jen G., 81 AD3d 1079, 1081 [3d Dept 2011]). Under defendant's and the dissent's logic, incompetency would prevent the State from issuing such orders for the protection of domestic violence victims because they "place [the respondent] in jeopardy of criminal prosecution" in the event the respondent proceeds to contact (or harm) the subjects of the 73 protective order (see dissenting op at 83). Due process has not been held to require competency determinations in these types of proceedings—even though they can result in civil confinement, deportation, the severing of family relationships, and the threat of future prosecution—and it therefore follows that due process is not offended by the failure to hold a competency hearing before determining which of three risk-level classifications should be assigned to a convicted sex offender (see Parris, 153 AD3d at 80). *8

The dissent's broader assertion that there is "no need to balance interests" under Mathews because the "courts and the legislature have already struck a balance favoring" a competency requirement (dissenting op at 80) finds no support in statute or case law. We cannot "presume" that the legislature contemplated a CPL article 730 equivalent for SORA through silence, or through the provision of basic procedural safeguards like notice, counsel, and a hearing held on a specific timeline prior to a registrant's release (see id. at 78). The decision to foreclose the classification of incompetent registrants during the period of their disability would create very real administrative burdens and public safety risks which do not exist under the current scheme and which must be weighed against the conjectured additional benefit to incompetent registrants.[6] Our decision today respects the need for flexibility and limiting principles outside the criminal context to facilitate the government's ability to protect the citizens of this State whose interests may come into conflict with those of incompetent registrants. Balance and pragmatism are not antithetical to fundamental fairness; rather, they are essential to the administration of justice and demanded by the Constitution (see Lassiter v Department of Social Servs. of Durham Cty., 452 US 18, 24-25 [1981] [instructing that "what 'fundamental fairness' consists of in a particular situation" cannot be determined without "assessing the several interests that are at stake"]; see Morrissey, 408 US at 481 ["To say that the concept of due process is flexible does not mean that judges are at large to apply 74 it to any and all relationships. Its flexibility is in its scope once it has been determined that some process is due; it is a recognition that not all situations calling for procedural safeguards call for the same kind of procedure"]).

For these reasons, we reject the argument that defendant's due process rights were violated when Supreme Court declined to order a competency hearing before adjudicating him a level two sex offender.

III.

Defendant's counsel also argued below that the classification hearing was premature under SORA itself, and should not have been held while defendant remained civilly committed to an OMH psychiatric facility pursuant to Mental Hygiene Law article 9. More particularly, counsel argued that "the SORA Act itself says that the SORA hearing should be held before someone is released," and that the most sensible reading of that requirement is that the hearing must occur "at the time [the registrant] is actually being released into the community," not merely upon release from incarceration. We disagree.

(2) SORA's plain text and structure authorize risk-level determinations "[30] calendar days prior" to a registrant's release from incarceration following the completion of their prison sentence, regardless of pending civil commitment proceedings (see Correction Law § 168-n [2]). The statute does not require courts to indefinitely postpone SORA classification until a registrant's release from civil confinement, and doing so would inject a degree of uncertainty into the classification process not contemplated or intended by the legislature. Unlike a registrant's release from incarceration, a registrant's release from civil confinement does not typically occur on a date scheduled far in 9 advance: it is premised on changing conditions and can occur abruptly or on short notice (see e.g. Mental Hygiene Law §§ 9.33, 9.35). Given that unpredictability, defendant has not shown that it would be possible for the Board, district attorneys' offices, and courts to reliably comply with the carefully developed SORA classification process—instituted to protect both the public and registrants' due process rights—if the various deadlines and milestones in that process were to be measured from release from civil confinement.

Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, without costs.

Rivera, J. (dissenting). It is a matter of fundamental fairness *75 and due process that a person called to appear before a court where their liberty is at stake should have the mental capacity to understand the nature of the proceedings, consult with counsel, and assist in their defense. A defendant's competency is also a prerequisite to the constitutional and statutory due process safeguards that expressly apply to Sex Offender Registration Act (SORA) (Correction Law art 6-C) risk classification proceedings.

Defendant has a mental disability. He is also a convicted sex offender who for most of his prosecution was found unfit to stand trial. After his release and during his SORA risk classification hearing defendant was confined to a psychiatric facility. His counsel requested a competency hearing to determine whether defendant understood the nature and consequences of the SORA proceedings and was capable of assisting with his defense. No one disputes that this request was well founded given defendant's chronic mental illness, history of unfitness to stand trial, immediate commitment upon completion of his sentence, and disorganized and illogical communications with counsel. Nor does anyone dispute that defendant has a protected liberty interest that entitled him to a hearing adequate to guard against the risk of an erroneous risk classification, as due process requires. I cannot agree with the majority that the SORA hearing held with defendant's competency in doubt satisfies due process. If he could not understand the proceedings, could not lucidly communicate with his counsel in preparing arguments to the court, and lacked the ability to understand the consequences of the court's judgment, the hearing was a mockery. We are a society of laws and those laws protect the mentally disabled. I dissent from the majority's endorsement of this injustice.

I.

Defendant Darryl Watts is mentally disabled. His illness dates back over 50 years. The majority acknowledges that defendant "suffers from severe schizophrenia and psychosis," and at the time of his offense "was responding to internal voices" and believed that "the victim was chosen for him" (majority op at 64). During the six-year pendency of his criminal prosecution, he was found mentally unfit to stand trial five times. His CPL article 730 examiners reported that he was "actively psychotic" such that he had no "rational or factual understanding of the roles of courtroom personnel or legal proceedings," did not recognize his lawyer, and was "unable to discuss his *76 case in a rational manner." At one point, he expressed belief that the victim had been stalking him and that his lawyer was working for "both sides." In 2013, defendant was admitted to Mid-Hudson Forensic Psychiatric Center for treatment.

After he was deemed competent at his seventh examination in December 2016, defendant pleaded guilty to first-degree sexual abuse (Penal Law § 130.65 [1]) and second-degree assault (Penal Law § 120.05 [12]), automatically subjecting him to SORA registration requirements. The court sentenced him to six years in prison and 10 years of postrelease supervision. Due to the length of time he had already spent in custody during his periods of incompetence, his release was set for July 2017. In preparation for that release date, the Board of Examiners of Sex Offenders (Board) recommended that defendant be adjudicated a level two (moderate risk) offender under SORA. However, in August 2017, shortly after his anticipated release date, defendant was transferred from Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS) custody to involuntary confinement at South Beach Psychiatric Center—an Office of Mental Health (OMH) facility—pursuant to Mental Hygiene Law article 9.[1]

Prior to defendant's release and psychiatric confinement, the same judge that presided over defendant's several incompetency determinations, plea, and sentence adjourned the SORA hearing to a future date but provisionally designated defendant a level two risk "without prejudice" pending a final determination. Thereafter, defendant's counselor from the psychiatric center notified defense counsel that defendant "had a vastly different mental state presentation than the week before," and that the facility did not "feel comfortable or think it was appropriate to transport him with their staff." The counselor described defendant as "having very disorganized thinking, mood fluctuations, [and] unpredictable and . . . degenerative tendencies." The staff, in fact, did not transfer defendant to his rescheduled SORA hearing, but counsel appeared and informed the court of the staff's decision to hold defendant.

Counsel also expressed her "grave concerns" that defendant was not competent to understand his SORA hearing or its consequences. She explained that during her attempts to engage 77 defendant, "his spe[ech] is illogical. It is disorganized. He doesn't follow a fluid narrative so it is very difficult for me to follow what he is telling me as well as for me to comprehend whether he understands what I am saying." Counsel further argued that SORA required the court to hold the hearing closer in time to defendant's release into the community, and that holding the hearing while defendant was incompetent would violate his due process rights. The prosecution consented to an adjournment, and the court adjourned the case to consider defense counsel's arguments and to see if defendant's mental condition would improve.

Thirty days later, at the next court date, defendant was unavailable because he was appearing in Mental Hygiene Court the same morning. Defense counsel confirmed to the court that the psychiatric center was seeking to retain defendant, and again moved for a competency hearing. The court denied the motion, concluding that it was authorized to move forward with the SORA hearing without a competency determination, but granted another adjournment since defendant was only absent because of a conflicting court date.

The parties reconvened a few weeks later with defendant in attendance. Defense counsel stated her continued belief that defendant was not able to understand the nature of the proceedings and again argued that the hearing should be adjourned until closer in time to defendant's release from psychiatric confinement. The court proceeded with the hearing over counsel's objection, leaving counsel to present her arguments in support of a downward departure without defendant's assistance. Counsel focused on the difficulties defendant would have finding housing as a level two offender and *10 his lack of any prior violent criminal history. She also submitted studies showing that mental illness is not a reliable predictor of recidivism and that offenders above the age of 50 reoffend at a lower rate. Counsel supported her arguments with evidence from the existing record and outside expert sources, not on communications with or input from defendant.

In its written decision adjudicating defendant a level two sexually violent offender, the court acknowledged counsel's representations that defendant was committed to a secure psychiatric facility at the time of the hearing, and that in the eight months between defendant's sentencing and the hearing, "defendant was described as having 'decompensated' and according to counsel was traveling on a downward spiral into another 78 bout of mental illness." Based on its own observations, the court found that during the hearing defendant "sat at counsel table with a vacant stare and did not appear to have said a word to his lawyers." The court further acknowledged that defendant was being held at a psychiatric facility pursuant to a civil commitment order for at least another four months. On the merits, the court found defendant was properly assessed 90 points, placing him in the level two risk category. The court rejected defendant's request for a downward departure, in part, because it did "not know [defendant's] current mental state, [and] it hardly seems possible we can predict his future psychiatric condition and how it might impact his likelihood of offending."

II.

Defendant argues that competency is a fundamental right at a SORA classification hearing because an incompetent registrant is unable to meaningfully exercise the rights and procedural protections afforded them under the statute. Defendant also contends that his classification hearing was held prematurely because it was held long before he was set to be released into the community. The prosecution responds that SORA's list of procedural requirements is exhaustive and does not include a right to a competency hearing, and that the statute plainly mandates a hearing upon release from a correctional facility.

Contrary to the majority's conclusion, SORA's procedural safeguards presume the offender's competence to understand the nature and consequences of the hearing and meaningfully participate in and assist with his defense. The question before us does not require a rebalancing of defendant's interests against those of the State. Instead, the analysis here is controlled by prior case law recognizing an offender's right to due process, SORA's codification of judicially-identified procedural requirements, and the fundamental tenet of fairness at the core of any due process analysis.

We have previously recognized, as have federal courts, an offender's liberty interest in "not being required to register under an incorrect label" (People v Knox, 12 NY3d 60, 66 [2009], citing Paul v Davis, 424 US 693, 701-710 & n 5 [1976]; People v David W., 95 NY2d 130, 137 [2000]; People v Gillotti, 23 NY3d 841, 863 [2014]). As we reaffirmed in People v Brown, an offender has a "liberty interest in a criminal designation that 79 rationally fits [their] conduct and public safety risk" (41 NY3d 279, 290 [2023]). The protections afforded an offender in a SORA risk classification proceeding were recognized in the Doe v Pataki federal litigation, wherein the courts held offenders have a right to constitutional due process and invalidated the prior framework that lacked those safeguards (3 F Supp 2d 456 [SD NY 1998], on remand from 120 F3d 1263 [2d Cir 1997]). The federal district court observed that risk level classification hearings fall "somewhere *11 between a criminal proceeding . . . and a simple administrative proceeding," and that, although the due process protections required for these proceedings "are not as extensive" as those required in a criminal trial, registrants are entitled to, at a minimum: a hearing; notice of the hearing which explains the proceeding's purpose and discloses the Board's recommendation; counsel; prehearing discovery of evidence that informed the Board's recommendation; a requirement that the State prove the facts supporting each risk factor by clear and convincing evidence; and the right to appeal the determination (3 F Supp 2d at 470-472).

To comply with the federal court's order, the legislature codified these procedural safeguards by amending SORA (see Mem of NY St Atty Gen Legis Bur Chief, Bill Jacket, Bill Jacket, L 1999, ch 453 at 6 [explaining that the changes to Correction Law § 168-n respond to the concerns set forth in Doe]). SORA thus provides that a court shall make a risk level determination prior to a sex offender's "discharge, parole, release to post-release supervision or release . . . by the sentencing court" (Correction Law § 168-n [1]; People v Boone, 41 NY3d 573 [2024] [reading this language to mean release from DOCCS custody]). The court shall also make a determination on the level of notification after receiving a recommendation from the Board (id. § 168-n [2]). In advance of the risk assessment, a sex offender is entitled to counsel, notice of the SORA hearing date, a copy of the Board's risk level recommendation to the court with the Board's reasons, notice that the purpose of the hearing is to determine the offender's risk level (one, two or three) and the registration requirements (id. § 168-n [3]). The notice must also advise the offender that "[f]ailure to appear may result in a longer period of registration or a higher level of community notification because you are not present to offer evidence or contest evidence offered by the district attorney" (id.). The notice must also advise the offender that they have a right to a hearing and to be represented by counsel—and, if the offender 80 is eligible, one will be appointed—and the right to the prosecution's statement with its proposed determinations and reasons therefore (id.). The offender has a right to discovery and to present evidence on their behalf, including witnesses and documentary materials, as well as the right to testify in support of their arguments and downward departure request, if any (id.). The prosecutor bears the burden to establish by clear and convincing evidence the facts supporting its recommendation (id.). The court must set forth its written factual findings and conclusions of law supporting its risk level determination (id.).

The majority plows unnecessarily through a thicket of legal issues that are irrelevant because an offender's liberty interest and their constitutional right to due process in a risk classification proceeding are constitutionally and statutorily established. There is simply no need to balance interests under Mathews v Eldridge (424 US 319 [1976]) because the courts and the legislature have already struck a balance favoring offenders' rights to procedural safeguards.

The question is not whether defendant is entitled to a competency hearing prior to his risk classification as some additional form of due process, but whether it violates an offender's extant due process rights to conduct a risk level assessment hearing when they are not competent to participate in the proceeding or their competence is in question. Put another way, the question is whether an offender must be competent for the procedural safeguards to be meaningful. The answer is so obvious it hardly bears discussion and yet the majority ignores first principles and concludes that a competency requirement is unnecessary because the procedural safeguards are sufficient without consideration of the offender's mental capacity. That analysis is fatally flawed because it fails to recognize that the existing safeguards presume the offender's competence to invoke their protections. *12

As a matter of fundamental fairness and common sense, this panoply of due process guarantees acquires significance only when the offender is competent to participate in the hearing.[2] Notice is meaningless unless the offender understands its 81 contents. The right to counsel is meaningless if the offender cannot communicate lucidly with their legal representative. Indeed, as appellate counsel argues on this appeal, an offender is denied effective representation by counsel if due to their mental disability they are unable to engage counsel and provide information to assist in their defense. The right to be present and participate is illusory if an offender attends court physically without the mental capacity to understand and participate in the proceedings. And an offender's rights to controvert the prosecution's evidence and recommended risk level classification, to challenge an upward departure request and argue in support of a downward departure are made a mockery if the offender is mentally unable to articulate their thoughts, express remorse to the court, or explain why they present a lower risk of offense than the Board and the prosecution contend.

Nor does this inherent competency requirement undermine "the purpose underlying SORA—to protect the public from sex offenders" (People v Mingo, 12 NY3d 563, 574 [2009]). Under SORA, an offender must register with the Division of Criminal Justice Services "at least ten calendar days prior to discharge, parole, release to post-release supervision or release from any state or local correctional facility, hospital or institution where [they were] confined or committed" or "at the time sentence is imposed for any sex offender released on probation or discharged upon payment of a fine, conditional discharge or unconditional discharge" (Correction Law § 168-f [1]). The legislature ensured with this pre-risk classification mandate that there would be no lapse in registration during any potential delay between an offender's release from custody and the court's risk classification determination. In other words, an offender will not "slip through the cracks" if they were released into the community without having been designated a SORA risk level. The risk level classification sets the community notification level that applies to an already-registered offender. Level one offenders and those who have not yet received a risk 82 level classification must register annually for 20 years from the date of their registration, while level two and three offenders must register annually for life (id. § 168-h [1]-[2]). Level three offenders must also verify their address every 90 calendar days with local law enforcement (id. § 168-h [3]). All registered offenders—classified or not—are listed in a telephone database available to the public (id. § 168-p [1]), while level two and three offenders also appear in the online database which makes public the offender's name, address, place of employment, photo, crimes of conviction, and other identifying *13 information (id. § 168-q [1]).[3] Thus, there is no lapse in law enforcement notification and the public has a mechanism for learning certain information about an offender even without a risk level classification. Of course, persons like defendant, whose mental disability renders them incompetent to participate in a SORA hearing may very well not be released into the community for some time. As of this appeal, defendant is still confined in a psychiatric facility. He poses no danger to the public.

III.

Even under the majority's unnecessary analysis, the Mathews v Eldridge balancing test leads to the same conclusion: an offender's competency at the risk classification hearing is an indispensable requirement of the process due (see 424 US at 335). Indeed, contrary to the majority's view, all three Mathews factors tip in favor of a competency requirement.

As to the first factor, the majority acknowledges an offender's liberty interest in an accurate risk classification but concludes that the interest is limited based on the civil nature of SORA registration and risk classification proceedings (majority op at 66-67). Only by constricting the lens through which it views this interest can the majority reach such a conclusion. 83 Offenders who are not competent or whose competence is in doubt have an additional interest at stake because they are at greater risk of failing to comply with SORA due to their mental disability. Failure to comply with SORA registration requirements—and for offenders subject to Sexual Assault Reform Act (SARA), the additional requirements that flow from a level two or three designation—places an offender in jeopardy of criminal prosecution, with an attendant loss of liberty. Reporting requirements differ by risk level. For example, level one and two offenders must report in person for a current photograph every three years, while level three offenders must appear every year. Level three offenders designated as a sexual predator must also verify their address every 90 days. An incompetent registrant who cannot understand the nature of the proceeding—particularly ones who, like defendant here, have a long history of mental illness—may be incapable of complying with these heightened requirements year after year. As one Ohio court queried, how could "an individual in the throes of Alzheimer's disease . . . functionally be able to comply with the annual registration requirements"? (State v Chambers, 151 Ohio App 3d 243, 248, 783 NE2d 965, 969 [2002]). Of course, noncompliance puts the individual at risk of incarceration. Failure to register or verify is a class E felony for a first offense and a class D felony for a second or subsequent offense, and may also be a basis for parole revocation (Correction Law § 168-t). Further, a level three designation subjects an offender to the residency restrictions of SARA (Executive Law § 259-c [14]). Level two and three offenders are ineligible for certain housing, including with the New York City Housing Authority, making it significantly more difficult to find a suitable, SARA-compliant residence. If the offender is unable to find compliant housing, they may be confined past their conditional or maximum release date.[4] Thus, the outcome of a SORA hearing may directly result in continued incarceration and may indirectly result in re-incarceration should the mentally disabled offender be unable to comply with the heightened reporting requirements of a moderate or high-risk designation. The 84 majority fails to account for and accommodate this liberty interest of a mentally incompetent offender.

As to the second factor—the likelihood of an erroneous determination absent the procedure sought by an offender—the majority bootstraps its way to a conclusion that there are already "robust" procedural requirements in a SORA hearing that sufficiently protect against erroneous deprivation of the narrow interest it believes is at stake (majority op at 68). As discussed, the Constitution and SORA guarantee an offender a host of rights (Correction Law §§ 168-n [2], [3]; 168-o [2]; Doe, 3 F Supp 2d at 470-472). The majority fails to recognize that these statutorily codified constitutional rights cannot be exercised by an incompetent defendant.

Indeed, many of these rights are identical to the ones afforded to defendants in parole revocation hearings, which this Court has expressly held cannot be exercised by an incompetent individual (see Matter of Lopez v Evans, 25 NY3d 199, 206 [2015]). The majority attempts to distinguish Lopez on the ground that parole revocation proceedings are "punitive in nature and their primary purpose is to adjudicate wrongdoing, the consequence of which may be a defendant's re-incarceration," compared with SORA risk classification hearings which "are not intended to serve as a form of punishment, and incarceration is not a potential consequence of SORA classification in and of itself" (majority op at 71). This minimizes the interest at stake in SORA hearings. Although the Court has stated that SORA is not a penal statute, there is no question that its "consequences" are "unlimited," and that registration—especially at a higher risk level classification—carries stigma that "pervades into every aspect of an offender's life" (Doe, 120 F3d at 1279). Additionally, as discussed with respect to the offender's interest under the first Mathews factor, the threat of incarceration is implicated in a SORA classification hearing, particularly for incompetent registrants.

The majority holds that SORA hearings are "more aptly analogize[d]" to civil commitment proceedings under the Sex Offender Management and Treatment Act (SOMTA), which "may proceed notwithstanding questions regarding a party's competency" (majority op at 72). But those proceedings are instituted only where the State believes there is sufficient evidence that the defendant is "a detained sex offender who suffers from a mental abnormality," defined in the statute as "a congenital or acquired condition, disease or disorder that affects 85 the emotional, cognitive, or volitional capacity of a person" in a manner that predisposes them to criminal sexual conduct (Mental Hygiene Law §§ 10.07 [a]; 10.03 [i]). It is self-evident that such proceedings can go forward without a competency *14 determination; they are instituted precisely because the individual has some alleged mental condition or disorder. That mental condition or disorder cannot hinder a SOMTA proceeding when it is the very reason for the proceeding. Moreover, the purposes of SOMTA and SORA hearings are not the same. While a SOMTA hearing is, in part, designed to protect the community, its purpose is also to provide care and treatment to mentally ill sex offenders (Mental Hygiene Law § 10.01 [c], [f] ["The goal of a comprehensive system should be to protect the public, reduce recidivism, and ensure offenders have access to proper treatment," and "the system should offer meaningful forms of treatment to sex offenders in all criminal and civil phases, including during incarceration, civil commitment, and outpatient supervision"]). Although a SORA risk classification is civil, its purpose is in no way to assist the offender but solely to set the proper risk level to ensure public safety (Brown, 41 NY3d at 284; Mingo, 12 NY3d at 574).

The majority references other types of civil hearings but those comparisons are similarly inapt (see majority op at 72). In the immigration context, the federal government has "broad power" to "make[ ] rules that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens" (Reno v Flores, 507 US 292, 305-306 [1993], quoting Fiallo v Bell, 430 US 787, 792 [1977]). Thus, the individual's interest is outweighed by federal authority. The termination of parental rights can be effected where a parent is, "by reason of mental illness or intellectual disability, [unable] to provide proper and adequate care" for their child (Social Services Law § 384-b [4] [c]). Those termination proceedings, like SOMTA proceedings, necessarily involve an incompetent party. It would be impractical and contradictory to create a rule that would require a parent to argue that they are too mentally ill to understand the proceeding but are mentally fit to care for their child. The majority also cites one Appellate Division decision for the proposition that "an order of protection can be issued against an incompetent respondent in a family offense proceeding" (majority op at 72, citing Matter of Julie G. v Yu-Jen G., 81 AD3d 1079, 1081 [3d Dept 2011]). Julie G. says no such thing. The Appellate Division held that "the competency procedures under CPL article 730, applicable in criminal actions, 86 do not govern in family offense proceedings in Family Court" but nevertheless "[i]n civil proceedings, the court can appoint a guardian ad litem for a party who cannot understand the proceedings, defend [their] rights or assist counsel" (id., citing CPLR 1201). Thus, the Appellate Division recognized what the majority chooses to ignore: the law does not run roughshod over the mentally disabled but instead protects their rights.

Two of the most critical rights that an incompetent offender cannot fully exercise is the right to counsel and the right to be present at the hearing. SORA guarantees the right to counsel, including assigned counsel for eligible offenders. But that right is rendered meaningless unless counsel can communicate with their client because the client "provide[s] the factual underpinnings of the presentation" (Lopez, 25 NY3d at 206). An attorney cannot advance their client's interests if the client lacks "sufficient present ability to consult with [their] lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding" (Dusky v United States, 362 US 402, 402 [1960]).

Defendant's case illustrates the lawyer's quandary. Defendant gave such a limited personal history that counsel was not even sure what grade level defendant completed in school. There was no way for counsel to seek relevant documentary evidence outside of the record, such as medical records related to defendant's family history of schizophrenia or letters of support from loved ones. Defendant also at one point had suggested his trial attorney was working "on both sides," indicating that, as a result of his mental disability, he might not have trusted counsel enough to disclose personal information to her. Medical records in particular often require a defendant to sign medical *15 release forms that someone who is paranoid as a result of their mental disability may refuse to sign, without understanding the consequences of this decision. This defendant was without the benefit of any additional mitigating evidence that counsel might have been able to find with defendant's assistance, and thus counsel was hampered in her presentation of relevant materials under Correction Law § 168-n (3).

Being forced to present a defense without the participation of the client doubtless causes an ethical dilemma for defense attorneys. "To be meaningful the right to counsel 'requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings' " (People v Joseph, 84 NY2d 995, 997 [1994], citing Powell v Alabama, 287 US 45, 69 [1932]). The Court's decision today will require counsel in a SORA proceeding to present their client's 87 defense knowing they have not "guided" their client at all, nor, with the assistance of their client, collected mitigating evidence that would ordinarily be their responsibility to present in support of a defense or an affirmative request for a downward departure. The Appellate Division has held counsel ineffective at SORA hearings where counsel failed to sufficiently communicate with their client (see e.g. People v Moore, 208 AD3d 1514, 1515 [3d Dept 2022] [counsel at SORA hearing was ineffective where he "had not had a chance to speak with defendant" and further failed to present a defense]; People v VonRapacki, 204 AD3d 41, 44 [3d Dept 2022] [counsel "did not communicate with his client at all" and "essentially agreed to the Board's recommendation"]). The majority's decision ignores our effective assistance of counsel standards by sanctioning an attorney's inability to adequately discuss the defense with their client or seek mitigating evidence based on their client's input—conduct that would be considered ineffective in any other context where assistance of counsel is guaranteed (see People v Oliveras, 21 NY3d 339, 344-345 [2013] [counsel in criminal trial was ineffective where he argued that the defendant "was not playing with a full deck" but did not obtain or review any of the defendant's psychiatric records (internal quotation marks omitted)]; Matter of Mark T. v Joyanna U., 64 AD3d 1092, 1093 [3d Dept 2009] [assigned counsel in Family Court was ineffective where he represented what he believed to be in his child client's best interest but revealed he "had neither met nor spoken with the child"], lv denied 15 NY3d 715 [2010]).

The majority's decision also fails to account for and accommodate a mentally disabled offender's right to be present at the SORA hearing, as provided in SORA (Correction Law § 168-n [3]). The prosecution in this case and the Appellate Division in People v Parris (153 AD3d 68, 82 [2d Dept 2017])—which the majority cites approvingly (majority op at 69, 71)—acknowledged that an incompetent defendant is not "present" to participate in the SORA proceeding. That is correct as an incompetent defendant is present physically but does not possess the mental acuity necessary to understand the proceedings and assist in their defense (see Drope v Missouri, 420 US 162, 171 [1975] ["Some have viewed the common-law prohibition" against trials of incompetent defendants "as a by-product of the ban against trials in absentia; the mentally incompetent defendant, though physically present in the courtroom, is in 88 reality afforded no opportunity to defend himself" (internal quotation marks omitted)]). Indeed, the SORA court found that during the hearing defendant had "a vacant stare" and did not say "a word to his lawyers." This is not even due process in name only.

The majority recognizes that errors will occur but rather than avoid them up front, unwisely adopts the approach taken in Parris and declares that a misclassified offender can simply seek modification on an annual basis (majority op at 68-69, citing Parris, 153 AD3d at 82). A modification hearing is legally inadequate for several reasons. First, a post-deprivation proceeding cannot remedy the due process violation suffered by a mentally disabled offender who is unable to understand the *16 proceedings and assist in their defense. The hearing held under these circumstances is the violation. Indeed, pre-deprivation hearings are the norm. "Due process requires that a person whose constitutional rights are affected by government action is entitled to be heard and it makes obvious sense in most cases 'to minimize substantially unfair or mistaken deprivations' by insisting that the hearing be granted at a time when the deprivation can still be prevented" (Matter of Lee TT. v Dowling, 87 NY2d 699, 713 [1996], citing Fuentes v Shevin, 407 US 67, 79-82 [1972]). Second, post-deprivation proceedings are particularly inappropriate in cases like this one involving reputational harm (id.). That is obvious here because once an individual is classified as a level two or three offender and placed on the online database, that bell cannot be unrung and the stigma is near impossible to shake off (Doe v Pataki, 940 F Supp 603, 626-627 [SD NY 1996] ["the consequences of community notification are unlimited" and cause stigma that "by its very nature pervades into every aspect of an offender's life" (brackets omitted)]; see also brief for Office of the Public Defender for the State of New Jersey et al., amici curiae, in Smith v Doe, 538 US 84 [2003], available at 2002 WL 1798881, *7-21 [discussing examples of ostracism and vigilante violence against sex offenders]). Third, a modification hearing is meaningless to an offender determined to be incompetent for the rest of their life.

As to the third Mathews factor, I agree that the State has an interest in protecting the public from sex offenders (People v Mingo, 12 NY3d 563, 574 [2009] [referring to SORA's purpose of protecting the public as a "significan(t) . . . mission"]). That interest is not furthered by adjudicating defendant's risk level 89 at a time when he is civilly committed in a secure OMH facility for treatment pursuant to article 9 and must register as a sex offender now (see Correction Law § 168-f). The majority cannot explain how defendant poses a risk to public safety serious enough to outweigh the other Mathews factors while he is locked up with no release date in sight.[5] Instead, the majority and the prosecution raise the specter of "dangerous registrants" (who are incompetent) possibly being released into the community for "lengthy periods" without the additional notice that accompanies a SORA level two or level three classification. To be sure, we must take seriously the legislature's determination that SORA's three-tiered classification scheme effectively serves the critical purpose of "protect[ing] the public from sex offenders" (Mingo, 12 NY3d at 574). But the prosecution has offered no details about who this group might include and how sizable it might be, nor has the prosecution answered with any precision why incompetent offenders cannot be treated similarly to other individuals who register first and have their SORA level adjudicated after they are living in the community (i.e., when a person moves to New York from a different jurisdiction or is released from *17 federal custody, or when for some other reason a court is unable to hold a hearing prior to the offender's release) (see Correction Law § 168-l [8]).[6]

90 Additionally, as we recognized in Brown, "[p]opulating the registry with the names and information of individuals who do not pose a danger of sexual recidivism to children undermines the usefulness of the registry and wastes government resources on tracking people who are not the intended targets of SORA nor implicate the public risk and law enforcement needs that first necessitated SORA registries" (41 NY3d at 297 [internal quotation marks and some brackets omitted]). The usefulness of the registry is similarly undermined when its classification system is inaccurate, and government resources are wasted when individuals who pose a lower risk of recidivism are subjected to the heightened notification requirements of a high-risk classification (see E.B. v Verniero, 119 F3d 1077, 1107-1108 [3d Cir 1997] [holding that the government has no "interest in notifying those who will come into contact with a registrant who has erroneously been identified as a moderate or high risk"]). There is no way to guarantee that an offender is accurately assessed when they are not competent to understand the proceeding or participate in their defense.

The majority puts its thumb on the scale in favor of the State's interest in protecting the public by minimizing the harm to a mentally ill offender that inheres in a hearing violative of due process. Indeed, the majority suggests that, because defendant is civilly confined, he is "shield[ed]" from "the public and its stigma" (majority op at 70). First, the majority ignores that the deprivation of defendant's right to counsel and right to be present at his SORA hearing was harm in and of itself. Second, mentally ill sex offenders—including those who are institutionalized—are whole human beings who may still experience stigma and reputational harm. The fact that the public cannot immediately act upon that stigma by denying the offender a job or refusing them service does not render the stigmatizing label meaningless; to the contrary, an erroneous overclassification creates real and practical harms for committed offenders. For example, a high-risk classification increases the risk that an otherwise clinically-appropriate residential treatment setting will deny the offender placement. In this way, an inaccurate classification while hospitalized may doom the offender to commitment more restrictive than their actual risk of recidivism warrants, potentially denying them access to 91 the least restrictive alternative. Indeed, defense counsel represented to the Court that OMH doctors have recommended a nursing home as the "best place" for defendant, but his level two classification has "hampered" their ability to find placement for him.

Finally, the majority considers the "additional burdens on the government" posed by "a psychiatric examination and additional hearing to determine a registrant's mental competency" and the *18 "continual[ ] monitoring [of] registrants found to be incompetent over indefinite periods to determine whether they have regained fitness and can be accurately classified" (majority op at 69). That concern is without factual basis in the record. Indeed, the courts below did not find—nor did the prosecution ever specifically argue—that pre-hearing competency evaluations would burden the State. The defense also represents that, in at least one case, the prosecution agreed that "a registrant is entitled to a competency determination if the SORA court is aware of the possibility of incompetence" (brief for defendant-appellant at 32, citing People v Hood, 35 AD3d 1138 [3d Dept 2006]). Moreover, while administrative burden is a relevant consideration under Mathews, it is not enough to override the substantial liberty interest at stake in a SORA proceeding, especially when the offender, as is the case here, is civilly committed at the time of hearing.

IV.

The majority is wrong on the law that due process tolerates a SORA risk classification hearing conducted when the offender is not competent to understand the nature and consequences of the proceeding and is unable to assist counsel with their defense. The majority endorses two systems of justice: one for competent offenders and one less protective for those with mental illness. It is time for the legislature to act where the Court has failed and accord equal rights to mentally disabled offenders.

Judges Garcia, Singas and Troutman concur. Judge Rivera dissents in an opinion, in which Chief Judge Wilson concurs. Judge Halligan dissents, would apply the Mathews v Eldridge (424 US 319 [1976]) balancing test and, doing so, reverse for reasons stated in part III of the dissenting opinion.

Order affirmed, without costs.

Footnotes

1 In July 2012, defendant was found fit to proceed and was arraigned. But in April 2013, he was again declared unfit and criminal proceedings paused. Subsequent competency examinations conducted in November 2013, November 2014, and April 2016 reaffirmed his unfitness.

2 The dissent suggests that exempting incompetent registrants from SORA classification would treat them no differently than persons who "move[ ] to New York from a different jurisdiction or [are] released from federal custody, or when for some other reason a court is unable to hold a hearing prior to the offender's release" (dissenting op at 89). The classes of offenders the dissent is referencing are required to be given risk levels "expeditiously" (Correction Law § 168-l [8]). SORA does not permit the type of avoidable and indefinite delay in risk-level classification the dissent and defendant are advocating for here.

3 Defendant was represented by counsel who diligently defended his interests. Among other things, counsel successfully argued against the Board's assessment of points based on defendant's purported failure to accept responsibility at his parole intake interview, because there was "no evidence whether [he] was fully competent or fit" at the time of his alleged denial of guilt. Counsel also made creditable arguments in support of a request for a downward modification from level two based on defendant's age and mental health issues, with supporting literature. Defendant does not seek our review of the court's discretionary determination to deny a downward departure based on those factors.

4 The dissent also references a telephone number the public can call, but only limited information is available to the public through that method. Calling the number allows a person to "inquire whether a named individual required to register pursuant to [SORA] is listed," if the caller can supply the individual's "exact street address, including apartment number, driver's license number or birth date, along with additional information that may include social security number, hair color, eye color, height, weight, distinctive markings, ethnicity[,] or . . . any combination of the above listed characteristics if an exact birth date or address is not available" (Correction Law § 168-p [1]).

5 Specifically, a registrant who fails to register or verify in the manner and within the time periods provided for under SORA may be prosecuted for committing a class E felony (see Correction Law § 168-t). Although we have no occasion here to decide the culpable mental state required for the crime of failure to register, we note that the Criminal Jury Instructions provide that, to be guilty, "a sex offender must know that he or she is required to register and must know the manner and time periods within which he or she is required to do so" (CJI2d[NY] Correction Law § 168-t, Failure to Register or Verify as a Sex Offender, https://www.nycourts.gov/judges/cji/4-SORA/SORA/Correction_168-t.SORA.pdf; see People v Haddock, 48 AD3d 969, 970-971 [3d Dept 2008], lv dismissed 12 NY3d 854 [2009]; Gary Muldoon, Handling a Criminal Case in New York § 23:91 [Sept. 2023 update]).

6 For precisely the same reason, we cannot avoid Mathews and circumvent consideration of a registrant's liberty interest simply by "presuming" that prior courts and the legislature weighed the interests involved and decided against a competency requirement, which after all appears nowhere in SORA, its legislative history, or this Court's precedents. As the dissent acknowledges, "this Court has no authority to replace its preferred policy for that of the legislature" (dissenting op at 82 n 3, citing People v Davis, 43 NY2d 17, 30 [1977]).

1 Under article 9, a person with a mental illness may be involuntarily committed for care and treatment essential to their welfare when their "judgment is so impaired that [they are] unable to understand the need for such care and treatment" (Mental Hygiene Law § 9.01).

2 The importance of a defendant's competence throughout the legal proceedings against them has been recognized since the mid-eighteenth century. Blackstone's Commentaries discussed an earlier law in place during the reign of Henry VIII which said that a person who commits a crime while "being compos mentis" and then later "fall[s] into madness" may "be tried in [their] absence" and even "suffer death, as if [they] were of perfect memory." Blackstone called this law "savage and inhuman," and observed that, even for an individual who commits a crime while sane, they "ought not to be arraigned for it" if they are not competent "to plead to it with that advice and caution that [they] ought," and should not be tried if they cannot "make [their] defense" (4 William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England at 24-25). The critical observation holds true in the SORA context: an incompetent individual cannot defend themselves.

3 The majority asserts that incompetent, unclassified offenders would not be listed on the online sex offender database, and that the telephone hotline would only disclose the offender's presence on the registry to callers who can supply certain identifying information about the offender (majority op at 70 & n 4). This distinction matters little with respect to offenders who, like defendant, are civilly committed to a secure treatment facility and therefore pose no danger to the public. Moreover, this pre-classification registration applies to all offenders until the time that their risk level can be correctly classified, after a hearing in which they are able to participate. To the extent the majority believes it to be inadequate, this Court has no authority to replace its preferred policy for that of the legislature (see People v Davis, 43 NY2d 17, 30 [1977]).

4 This is a significant problem for offenders with additional housing requirements. Disabled offenders, for example, are "held in prison an average of three years past their release date awaiting [SARA]-compliant housing" (Kevin Bliss, New York's SARA Requirements Force Sex-Offenders into Homelessness Then Hold Them in Prison Due to Their Homelessness, Criminal Legal News [Apr. 2020]).

5 The prosecution suggests without any data that a risk classification might provide protection to patients, staff, and visitors at his treatment facility. There is no basis to conclude that defendant poses any greater risk to those individuals than he did to corrections officers, other inmates, and visitors while he was in DOCCS custody, nor that the OMH facility's knowledge of a risk level classification would in any way change its treatment or handling of defendant. Staff at secure treatment facilities are aware of their patients' diagnoses and criminal history and are equipped to handle individuals who may pose a danger to others (see OMH Official Policy Manual § A-3018, Criminal Histories [Aug. 25, 2023] ["To provide a safe environment at OMH facilities criminal histories of adult patients are checked on admission to the facility"]; see also § A-3024, Responding to Crisis Situations [Aug. 25, 2023] [explaining OMH policy on "Responding to Behavioral Codes and Psychiatric Crisis Situations"]).

6 The majority posits that because SORA mandates an "expeditious [ ]" hearing for such offenders, it cannot permit "indefinite delay[s]" for incompetent offenders (majority op at 68 n 2). The majority misses the point: the sole purpose of the statute is public safety, yet the legislature expressly contemplated that in some cases, strict adherence to its timing scheme would not be feasible and an individual may be living in their community before a risk level hearing can take place. It is illogical to say that, although some offenders will rejoin their community—where they will pose some risk of recidivism—without a risk level adjudication, an incompetent individual who is civilly confined and therefore presents no risk to the public must be adjudicated a risk level upon their transfer from one kind of custody to another.

End of Document

15 Cal.5th 292
Supreme Court of California.

PICO NEIGHBORHOOD ASSOCIATION et al., Plaintiffs and Respondents,

v.

CITY OF SANTA MONICA, Defendant and Appellant.

S263972
|
August 24, 2023
|
As Modified September 20, 2023

Synopsis

Background: Neighborhood organization and registered voter brought action alleging that city's at-large voting system for nonpartisan elections for city council discriminated against Latinos, in violation of California Voting Rights Act and California Constitution's Equal Protection Clause. Following bench trial, the Superior Court, Los Angeles County, No. BC616804, Yvette M. Palazuelos, J., 2019 WL 10854474, entered judgment in plaintiffs' favor on constitutional and statutory claims and ordered city to switch to district-based voting. City appealed. The Court of Appeal, 51 Cal.App.5th 1002, 265 Cal.Rptr.3d 530, reversed. Review was granted.

[Holding:] The Supreme Court, Evans, J., held that plaintiffs, after establishing existence of racially polarized voting, were not required to prove that minority group of Latino voters would constitute a majority, or near majority, of hypothetical single-member district.

Court of Appeal reversed; remanded.

Opinion, 51 Cal.App.5th 1002, 265 Cal.Rptr.3d 530, depublished.

West Headnotes (17)

[1] Election Law Vote Dilution

Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

In two significant respects, California Voting Rights Act (CVRA) makes it easier than § 2 of VRA to challenge State's or political subdivision's at-large method of election: first, CVRA, unlike VRA, does not require plaintiff to demonstrate that members of minority group would be geographically compact or concentrated enough to constitute a majority of hypothetical single-member district, and second, while plaintiff can succeed under either VRA or CVRA by showing that at-large method dilutes minority group's voting power by impairing its ability to elect candidates of its choice, only CVRA allows plaintiff to prevail by demonstrating, in the alternative, that at-large method impairs minority group's ability to influence election outcome. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b); Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14027, 14028(c).

[2] Election Law Vote Dilution

A court presented with a vote-dilution claim challenging an at-large voting system under § 2 of the VRA, or under the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA), which applies to nonpartisan elections, should undertake a searching evaluation of the totality of the facts and circumstances, including the characteristics of the specific locality, its electoral history, and an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact of the contested electoral mechanisms, as well as the design and impact of the potential alternative electoral system. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b); Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c), 14027, 14028(e).

[3] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

An at-large electoral system or multimember district can qualify as a prohibited vote-dilution practice under § 2 of the VRA when the plaintiff can show that a bloc-voting majority is usually able to defeat candidates supported by a politically cohesive, geographically insular minority group, and the greater the degree to which the electoral minority is homogenous and insular and the greater the degree that bloc voting occurs along majority-minority lines, the greater will be the extent to which the minority's voting power is diluted. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[4] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

Plaintiff asserting vote-dilution challenge to at-large voting system, under § 2 of VRA, must satisfy three threshold conditions under Gingles: first, minority group must be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute majority in single-member district, second, minority group must be politically cohesive, and third, white majority must vote sufficiently as bloc to enable it, in absence of special circumstances, such as minority candidate running unopposed, usually to defeat minority group's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[5] Election Law Vote Dilution

Once the plaintiff asserting vote-dilution challenge to at-large voting system, under § 2 of VRA, has satisfied the three threshold conditions under Gingles, trial court is to consider totality of the circumstances and determine, based upon a searching practical evaluation of past and present reality, whether the political process is equally open to minority voters, and this determination is peculiarly dependent upon the facts of each case, and requires an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact of contested electoral mechanisms. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[6] Election Law Vote Dilution

Under totality of circumstances approach for considering vote-dilution challenge to at-large voting system, under § 2 of VRA, court considers a number of factors that typically may be relevant, including: history of voting-related discrimination in State or political subdivision; extent to which voting is racially polarized; extent to which State or political subdivision has used voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance opportunity for discrimination against minority group, such as unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, and prohibitions against bullet voting; exclusion of members of minority group from candidate slating processes; extent to which minority group members bear effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in political process; use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns; and extent to which members of minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[7] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

For a vote-dilution challenge to an at-large method of election under Section 2 of the VRA, or under the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA), which applies to nonpartisan elections, a plaintiff must show polarized voting, i.e., members of minority group vote as a politically cohesive unit, while the majority votes sufficiently as a bloc usually to defeat minority group's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301; Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c, e), 14027, 14028(a).

[8] Statutes Context

A court construing a statute does not view a fragment in isolation, but considers the statute as a whole, in context with related provisions and the overall statutory structure, so that it may best identify and effectuate the scheme's underlying purpose.

[9] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

To establish vote dilution under § 2 of the VRA, a court must find a reasonable alternative practice as a benchmark against which to measure the existing voting practice. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[10] Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

While the existence of racially polarized voting is relevant to a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the VRA, and is indeed a key element for the claim, it is not in itself sufficient, and dilution requires a showing that the minority group has less ability to elect its preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[11] Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

The existence of racially polarized voting is not, in itself, sufficient for a vote-dilution claim under the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA) challenging a nonpartisan at-large voting system, and dilution requires a showing that the minority group has less ability to elect its preferred candidate or influence the election's outcome than it would have if the at-large system had not been adopted. Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c), 14027.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[12] Election Law Vote Dilution

To establish the dilution element for a vote-dilution claim under the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA) challenging a nonpartisan at-large voting system, the plaintiff must identify a reasonable alternative voting practice to the existing at-large electoral system that will serve as the benchmark undiluted voting practice. Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c), 14027.

[13] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

The rationale for requiring, in a vote-dilution challenge under § 2 of the VRA to an at-large voting system, that the challenger demonstrate that the minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district is that if the minority group is spread evenly throughout a multimember district, or if, although geographically compact, the minority group is so small in relation to the surrounding white population that it could not constitute a majority in a single-member district, these minority voters cannot maintain that they would have been able to elect representatives of their choice in the absence of the multimember electoral structure. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[14] Municipal Corporations Nature and constitution of body in general

To prevail on vote-dilution challenge under California Voting Rights Act (CVRA) to at-large method of nonpartisan elections for city council, challengers, after establishing existence of racially polarized voting, were not required to prove that minority group of Latino voters would constitute a majority, or near majority, of hypothetical single-member district, where winning candidates often earned only plurality of vote; accordingly, what was required to establish dilution of Latino voters' ability to elect candidates of their choice was proof that, under some lawful alternative electoral system, Latino voters would have potential, on their own or with help of crossover voters, to elect their preferred candidate, and lawful alternative electoral systems could include, but were not limited to, single-member district elections. Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c, e), 14027, 14028(a).

1 Case that cites this headnote

[15] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

To establish, under the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA), that an at-large voting system for nonpartisan elections dilutes a minority group's ability to elect its preferred candidate, a plaintiff must demonstrate the potential to elect representatives under some lawful alternative electoral method, and one way to do this would be to show that minority group would be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district, but that is not the only way, and plaintiff could demonstrate minority group's ability to attract crossover votes for its preferred candidate, or plaintiff may identify nondistrict remedies that would enable minority group, on its own or with assistance of crossover votes, to elect its preferred candidate. Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c, e), 14027.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[16] Election Law Vote Dilution

Key inquiry in establishing dilution, in vote-dilution challenge to at-large voting system for nonpartisan elections under California Voting Rights Act (CVRA), of minority group's ability to elect its preferred candidate is what percentage of vote would be required to win, an inquiry that is not short-circuited merely because minority group may fall short of absolute majority or something close to it, and in predicting how many candidates are likely to run and what percentage may be necessary to win, courts may consider experiences of similar jurisdictions that use district elections or other alternatives to traditional at-large elections, and courts should keep in mind that the inquiry at liability stage is simply to prove that a solution is possible, and not necessarily to present final solution. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b); Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c), 14027, 14028(e).

[17] Election Law Vote Dilution

The dilution element for a vote-dilution challenge to an at-large voting system under § 2 of the VRA, or under the California Voting Rights Act (CVRA), which applies to nonpartisan elections, ensures that the minority group is not made worse off, and to replace at-large elections with district elections under a dilution theory, a successful plaintiff must show not merely that the minority group would have a real electoral opportunity in one or more hypothetical districts, but also that the incremental gain in the group's ability to elect its candidate of choice in such districts would not be offset by a loss of the group's potential to elect its candidates of choice elsewhere in the locality. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b); Cal. Elec. Code §§ 14026(a, c), 14027.

*57 322 Second Appellate District, Division Eight, B295935, Los Angeles County Superior Court, BC 616804, Yvette M. Palazuelos, Judge

Attorneys and Law Firms

Lane Dilg, City Attorney, George Cardona, Interim City Attorney; Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, Theodore J. Boutrous, Jr., Marcellus A. McRae, Kahn A. Scolnick, Tiaunia N. Henry and Daniel R. Adler, Los Angeles, for Defendant and Appellant.

Cole Huber and Derek P. Cole for League of California Cities and California Special Districts Association as Amici Curiae on behalf of Defendant and Appellant.

Strumwasser & Woocher, Bryce A. Gee, Los Angeles, and Caroline C. Chiappetti for The Santa Monica Transparency Project as Amicus Curiae on behalf of Defendant and Appellant.

John K. Haggerty as Amicus Curiae on behalf of Defendant and Appellant.

The Law Office of Joseph Pertel, Joseph A. Pertel; and Christopher M. Harding, Santa Monica, for League of Women Voters of Santa Monica, Alliance of Santa Monica Latino and Black Voters, Human Relations Council Santa Monica Bay Area and Community for Excellent Public Schools as Amici Curiae on behalf of Defendant and Appellant.

Shenkman & Hughes, Kevin I. Shenkman, Mary R. Hughes, Los Angeles, Andrea A. Alarcon; Law Office of Robert Rubin, Robert Rubin, San Francisco; Goldstein, Borgen, Dardarian & Ho, Morris J. Baller, Laura L. Ho, Anne P. Bellows, Ginger L. Grimes, Oakland; Parris Law Firm, R. Rex Parris, Ellery S. Gordon, Lancaster; Law Offices of Milton C. Grimes, Milton C. Grimes; Schonbrun Seplow Harris & Hoffman, Paul Hoffman and John Washington, Culver City, for Plaintiffs and Respondents.

Panish Shea & Boyle and Brian Panish, Los Angeles, for Richard Polanco, Sergio Farias, Juan Carrillo, Richard Loa and Austin Bishop as Amici Curiae on behalf of Plaintiffs and Respondents.

Hogan Lovells US, Ira M. Feinberg, Erin Chapman, Zach Martinez, Patrick C. Hynds, Derek Centola and Joseph M. Charlet for FairVote as Amicus Curiae on behalf of Plaintiffs and Respondents.

Greenberg Glusker Fields Claman & Machtinger, Douglas E. Mirell and Michelle A. Mabugat, Los Angeles, for Sara Sadhwani, Bernard Fraga, Janelle Wong, Marisa Abrajano, Jason Casellas, Lorrie Frasure, Matthew Mendez Garcia, Christian Grose, Eric Gonzalez Juenke, Jane Junn, Taeku Lee, Gabriele Magni, Jennifer Merolla, Melissa Michelson, Jessica Lavariega Monforti, Jason Morin, Ricardo Ramírez, Paru Shah, LaFleur Stephens, Dara Strolovitch, Christopher Towler and Tom Wong as Amici Curiae on behalf of Plaintiffs and Respondents.

UCLA Voting Rights Project, Chad W. Dunn and Sonni Waknin for Matt Barreto, Lorrie Frasure, Chelsea Jones, Natalie Masuoka, Gary Segura, Efrén Pérez and Chris Zepeda-Millán as Amici Curiae on behalf of Plaintiffs and Respondents.

Keker, Van Nest & Peters, R. Adam Lauridsen and Connie P. Sung, San Francisco, for Asian Americans Advancing Justice–Asian Law Caucus, Asian Americans Advancing Justice–Los Angeles and Asian Law Alliance as Amici Curiae on behalf of Plaintiffs and Respondents.

Rosenfeld Meyer & Susman and Todd W. Bonder, Beverly Hills, for Oscar de la Torre as Amicus Curiae on behalf of Plaintiffs and Respondents.

Lowenstein & Weatherwax, Nathan Lowenstein and Kenneth J. Weatherwax, Los Angeles, for Bruce A. Wessel as Amicus Curiae.

Rob Bonta, Attorney General, Jonathan L. Wolff, Chief Assistant Attorney General, Heather Hoesterey and Kristin A. Liska, Deputy Attorneys General, for the Attorney General as Amicus Curiae.

Stephen Bosworth and L. Stevan Leonard as Amicus Curiae.

Opinion

Opinion of the Court by Evans, J.

305 *58 323 Local governments make many of the most important decisions that affect Californians' everyday lives. They build and repair public streets, they define a neighborhood's character through planning and zoning, and they decide where to place public parks and where to allow restaurants, bars, and liquor stores to operate. They make decisions about public transit and decide where to site industries that cause pollution. They provide police services and determine the level and type of policing and other first responder services, they educate our children, they operate or regulate local utilities, and they have the power to levy taxes. The people exercise control over these choices by electing representatives to city councils, county boards, boards of education, community college boards, special district boards, and other bodies.

The genius of representative government, in all its guises, is that it is responsive to the people it serves. But its ability to be responsive is dependent in a fundamental way on the assumption that each 324 person's vote is of equal weight. While we often take that assumption for granted, sometimes the actual value of one's vote can vary based on the way the voting is structured. For example, a minority of voters may find itself unable to elect even a single member of a multimember body when the members are elected 306 at large, but would be able to elect one or more representatives if the members were elected by districts or by another lawful method.

In such circumstances, the voting rules may effectively decide whether a group of voters can have a voice in the myriad decisions made by local representatives. With a seat at the table, the voters' representative can have a say in the topics and terms of the debate on the many crucial decisions that local governments make. Without a seat, though, the voters' voice may be effectively muted or silenced and their needs and preferences may be ignored or given less weight.

To address this problem, federal and state law restrict at-large voting systems from unfairly submerging or diluting the votes of a minority in the majority's greater numbers. Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act of *59 1965 (52 U.S.C. § 10301; VRA) prohibits states and their political subdivisions from using an at-large method of election when such a scheme would "result in unequal access to the electoral process" based on protected characteristics of race, color, or membership in a language minority group. (Thornburg v. Gingles (1986) 478 U.S. 30, 46, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (Gingles).) In an effort to provide greater protections to California voters than those provided by the VRA, the Legislature subsequently enacted the California Voting Rights Act of 2001 (Elec. Code, § 14025 et seq.; CVRA). The CVRA prohibits an at-large method of election "that impairs the ability of a protected class" (id., § 14027) — as defined by race, color, or language minority group (id., § 14026, subd. (d)) — "to elect candidates of its choice or its ability to influence the outcome of an election, as a result of the dilution or the abridgment of the rights of voters who are members of a protected class" (id., § 14027).

[1] Both statutory schemes require a plaintiff to show racially polarized voting — i.e., that the protected class members vote as a politically cohesive unit, while the majority votes "sufficiently as a bloc usually to defeat" the protected class's preferred candidate. (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 56, 106 S.Ct. 2752; accord, Elec. Code, §§ 14026, subd. (e) [providing that "racially polarized voting" may be established by "[t]he methodologies for estimating group voting behavior as approved in applicable federal cases to enforce the [VRA]"], 14028, subd. (a).) The CVRA, however, "make[s] it easier to successfully challenge at-large districts" in two significant respects. (Assem. Com. on Elections, Reapportionment and Const. Amends., Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 976 (2001–2002 Reg. Sess.) as amended Mar. 18, 2002, p. 4.) First, the CVRA, unlike the VRA, does not require a plaintiff to demonstrate that the members of the protected class would be geographically compact or concentrated enough to constitute a majority of a hypothetical single-member district. (Compare Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (c) with Gingles, at p. 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) 307 Second, while a plaintiff can succeed under either the VRA or the CVRA by showing that the at-large method dilutes a protected class's voting power by impairing its ability "to elect" candidates of its choice (52 U.S.C. § 10301(b); Elec. Code, § 14027), only the CVRA allows the plaintiff to prevail by demonstrating, in the alternative, that the at-large method impairs the class's ability "to influence the outcome of an election." 325 (Elec. Code, § 14027, italics added; cf. League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry (2006) 548 U.S. 399, 446, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (LULAC) (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.) ["The failure to create an influence district ... does not run afoul of § 2 of the [VRA]"].)

In this case, the trial court determined that because of racially polarized voting, the at-large method of electing city council members in the City of Santa Monica (the City) diluted Latino voters' ability to elect their preferred candidates and their ability to influence the outcome of council elections, as compared to several alternative electoral methods, including district elections. To remedy this violation, the trial court ordered the City to promptly conduct a special election using a seven-district map drafted by an expert who testified at trial.

The Court of Appeal granted a stay of the judgment and then reversed. It disagreed with the trial court's finding that the at-large method of election had "impaired Latinos' ability to elect candidates of their choice or to influence the outcome of an election." In the Court of Appeal's view, there had been no dilution of Latino voters' ability to elect their preferred candidates because Latino voters were too few and too geographically dispersed "to muster a majority, no matter how the City might slice itself into districts." The court likewise found no dilution of Latino voters' ability to influence the outcome of an election because a group's ability to influence an election, the Court of Appeal reasoned, has no meaning independent of the group's ability to elect its preferred candidate. In light of its findings, the Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to consider whether racially polarized voting had been established.

We conclude the Court of Appeal misconstrued the CVRA. To prevail on a CVRA *60 claim, a plaintiff who has established the existence of racially polarized voting in an at-large system need not prove that the protected class would constitute a majority — or, as the City proposes, a near majority — of a hypothetical single-member district. City council elections, after all, are nonpartisan (Cal. Const., art. II, § 6), and the record here shows that winning candidates often earn only a plurality of the vote. Accordingly, what is required to establish "dilution" of a protected class's "ability ... to elect candidates of its choice" (Elec. Code, § 14027) is proof that, under some lawful alternative electoral system, the protected class would have the 308 potential, on its own or with the help of crossover voters, to elect its preferred candidate. The lawful alternative electoral system may include, but is not limited to, single-member district elections.

[2] A court presented with a dilution claim should undertake a searching evaluation of the totality of the facts and circumstances (see, e.g., Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (e)), including the characteristics of the specific locality, its electoral history, and " 'an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact' of the contested electoral mechanisms" as well as the design and impact of the potential alternative electoral system. (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752; see Allen v. Milligan (2023) 599 U.S. 1, ——, 143 S.Ct. 1487 [216 L.Ed.2d 60, 75] (Milligan).) In predicting how many candidates are likely to run and what percentage may be necessary to win, courts may also consider the experiences of other similar jurisdictions that use alternative electoral systems. (Cf. Gingles, at p. 56, 106 S.Ct. 2752.)

Because the Court of Appeal did not evaluate the dilution element of the CVRA under this standard, we reverse the judgment and remand the matter to the Court 326 of Appeal for it to reconsider in the first instance the CVRA claim presented here.

I. Background

Defendant, the City of Santa Monica, has a seven-member city council. Members are elected at large through staggered elections: four are elected during the year of a presidential election, while the other three are elected during the year of a gubernatorial election. Plaintiff Pico Neighborhood Association is a nonprofit organization dedicated to advancing the interests of the residents of the City's Pico neighborhood, where its Latino residents are concentrated. While Latinos constitute only 13.64 percent of the City's citizen-voting-age population, they make up 30 percent of Pico's citizen-voting-age population.

In April 2016, plaintiffs Pico Neighborhood Association and Maria Loya, a Latina registered voter, filed this action against the City, alleging that the City's at-large method of electing its city council unlawfully impaired the ability of Latino voters to elect their preferred candidates or, alternatively, to influence the outcome of council elections. The at-large scheme, in plaintiffs' view, violated the CVRA as well as the equal protection clause of the California Constitution (Cal. Const., art. I, § 7, subd. (a)).

Following a six-week trial, the Los Angeles County Superior Court ruled in plaintiffs' favor on both claims, but this appeal concerns only the CVRA claim. After reviewing elections over the preceding 24 years, the court *309 declared that "a consistent pattern of racially-polarized voting emerges. In most elections where the choice is available, Latino voters strongly prefer a Latino candidate running for Defendant's city council, but, despite that support, the preferred Latino candidate loses." Indeed, at the time of the court's ruling, "only one Latino ha[d] been elected to the Santa Monica City Council in the 72 years of the current election system."[1] The court further observed that the statistical evidence of racially polarized voting was corroborated by multiple qualitative factors within the meaning of Elections Code section 14028, subdivision (e): a history of discrimination against Latinos in Los Angeles County generally and in the City specifically; the use 61 of staggered elections, which may have discriminatory effects in some circumstances; an income disparity between the City's Latinos and its majority population that is "far greater than the national disparity"; the use of racist appeals in city council campaigns; and the lack of responsiveness to the interests and concerns of the City's Latino community, including the substantial underrepresentation of Latinos on the City's various commissions.

The trial court further found that the City's at-large voting system unlawfully diluted the electoral strength of its Latino residents within the meaning of the CVRA, in that several alternative voting systems — e.g., district-based elections, cumulative voting, limited voting, and ranked choice voting — would better enable Latino voters "to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcomes of elections." In light of "the national, state and local experiences with district elections, particularly those involving districts in which the minority group is not a majority of eligible voters," the court adopted the election map drafted by plaintiffs' expert, 327 which created seven council districts. The court ordered a special, district-based election for all seven seats to be held on July 2, 2019.

The City successfully petitioned for a writ of supersedeas to stay the trial court's order for new elections pending resolution of its appeal. In that appeal, the Second Appellate District, Division Eight, reversed the trial court judgment, finding that the City's at-large voting system violated neither the CVRA nor the California Constitution. The Court of Appeal began by rejecting plaintiffs' one-sentence argument that a CVRA violation could be established merely by evidence of racially polarized voting without any further showing that the City's at-large voting system "diluted" Latino voting power as compared to " 'some alternative method of election.' " The court next concluded that changing from an at-large system (where Latinos constituted approximately 14 percent of the voting population) to a district system 310 (where Latinos would constitute 30 percent of a district centered around the Pico neighborhood) would not enhance Latino voters' ability to elect their candidates of choice or influence the outcome of an election in a "legally significant" way and therefore failed to demonstrate that the City's at-large system "dilut[ed]" their voting power within the meaning of the CVRA. Plaintiffs' theory, the Court of Appeal reasoned, "would create absurd results," in that "any unrealized increase in a group's percentage would satisfy the dilution element," even if the group had "a vanishingly small numerical presence." The court likewise rejected plaintiffs' contention that other voters might " 'cross over' and vote for Latino candidates, buoying Latino power and clearing the 50 percent threshold to electoral success." Such a suggestion, the Court of Appeal claimed, "arbitrarily embraces racially polarized voting when it helps and abandons it when it hurts." In light of its conclusion that plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate dilution, the court did not consider whether plaintiffs had demonstrated the existence of racially polarized voting.

We granted plaintiffs' petition for review to determine what constitutes dilution of a protected class's ability to elect candidates of its choice or to influence the outcome of an election within the meaning of the CVRA. We also ordered depublication of the Court of Appeal opinion. (Pico Neighborhood Assn. v. City of Santa Monica (2020) 270 Cal.Rptr.3d, 474 P.3d 635 .)

II. Discussion

Different electoral systems can lead to different outcomes. (See Engstrom, Modified Multi-Seat Election Systems As Remedies for Minority Vote Dilution (1992) 21 Stetson L.Rev. 743, 743 (Engstrom).) For example, where a racial minority and a racial majority consistently prefer different candidates, "multimember districts and at-large voting schemes may ' "operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial [minorities in] the voting population." ' " (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 47, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) The use of at-large voting schemes in such circumstances allows the majority, by virtue of its numerical superiority, not only to regularly defeat the candidates preferred by the minority (id. at p. 48, 106 S.Ct. 2752), but also to " 'ignore [minority] interests without fear of political consequences,' [citation] leaving *62 the minority effectively unrepresented." (Id. at p. 48, fn. 14, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) If, on the other hand, the political unit were "divided into single-member districts," those same minority groups "may be able to elect several representatives." (Rogers v. Lodge (1982) 458 U.S. 613, 616, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012.) This potential disparity is why the high court has "stated on many occasions that multimember districting 328 plans, as well as at-large plans, generally pose greater threats to minority-voter 311 participation in the political process than do single-member districts." (Growe v. Emison (1993) 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 122 L.Ed.2d 388.)

The VRA and the CVRA each offer an opportunity for racial and language minority groups to challenge the dilution of their voting power caused by at-large voting systems. But they do so in somewhat different ways. Because the CVRA bears some similarities to the VRA, while also seeking to address perceived inadequacies in the VRA, we begin with a review of both statutory schemes.

A. The VRA and the CVRA, Compared

1. The VRA

[3] The VRA, as amended in 1982, prohibits a state or its political subdivisions from using any "voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure" that "results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or [membership in a language minority group]" where, "based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of [the protected] class of citizens ... in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate ... to elect representatives of their choice." (52 U.S.C. § 10301(a), (b).) An at-large electoral system or multimember district[2] can qualify as a prohibited practice under the VRA when the plaintiff can show that a bloc-voting majority is "usually ... able to defeat candidates supported by a politically cohesive, geographically insular minority group." (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 49, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) " '[T]he greater the degree to which the electoral minority is homogenous and insular and the greater the degree that bloc voting occurs along majority-minority lines, the greater will be the extent to which the minority's voting power is diluted by multimember districting.' " (Id. at p. 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752.)

[4] [5] [6] A plaintiff asserting a "vote dilution" challenge to an at-large voting system under the VRA must satisfy "three threshold conditions." (Voinovich v. Quilter (1993) 507 U.S. 146, 157, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 122 L.Ed.2d 500.) "First, the minority group must be able to demonstrate that it is sufficiently large and 312 geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district. ... Second, the minority group must be able to show that it is politically cohesive. ... Third, the minority must be able to demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it — in the absence of special circumstances, such as the minority candidate running unopposed, [citation] — usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at pp. 50–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, fn. omitted.) Once those predicate facts have been established, "the trial court is to consider the 'totality of the circumstances' and to determine, based 'upon a searching practical evaluation of the "past and present reality," ' [citation], whether the political process is equally open to minority voters. ' "This determination is peculiarly dependent 329 upon the facts of each case," ' [citation], and requires 'an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact' of the contested electoral mechanisms." (Id. at p. 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) In undertaking this analysis, the court considers a number of factors that "typically may be relevant" to a claim under the VRA (Gingles, at p. 44, 106 S.Ct. 2752) and that are sometimes called " 'the Senate factors' *63 "[3] because they appeared in the 1982 Senate Judiciary Committee majority report that accompanied the bill amending the VRA (Yumori-Kaku v. City of Santa Clara (2020) 59 Cal.App.5th 385, 394, 273 Cal.Rptr.3d 437).

2. The CVRA

While the CVRA is "much like" the VRA in some ways, there are notable differences between the two statutory schemes. (Assem. Com. on Judiciary, Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 976 (2001–2002 Reg. Sess.) as amended Apr. 9, 2002, p. 2.) Four stand out in this proceeding. First, unlike the VRA, the CVRA applies only to "[a]n at-large method of election" (Elec. Code, § 14027) for nonpartisan offices (id., § 14026, subds. (a), (c); see Cal. Const., art. II, § 6). Second, the CVRA addresses not only impairments to a protected class's "ability ... to elect candidates of its choice" (Elec. Code, § 14027; cf. 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b) ["opportunity ... to elect representatives of their choice"]), but also the class's "ability to influence the outcome of an election" (Elec. Code, § 14027, italics added). Third, the CVRA made it easier to challenge at-large electoral systems by explicitly rejecting the first Gingles 313 precondition: "The fact that members of a protected class are not geographically compact or concentrated may not preclude a finding of racially polarized voting, or a violation of Section 14027 and this section, but may be a factor in determining an appropriate remedy." (Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (c).) Fourth, the CVRA includes its own list of potentially probative factors, many of which overlap with the Senate factors above, but cautions that they are "not necessary factors to establish a violation" of the CVRA. (Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (e).)[4]

[7] Despite these differences, the CVRA, like the VRA, requires a plaintiff claiming vote dilution arising from an at-large voting system to establish the existence of racially polarized voting — i.e., that the protected class members vote as a 330 politically cohesive unit, while the majority votes "sufficiently as a bloc usually to defeat" the protected class's preferred candidate. (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 56, 106 S.Ct. 2752; accord, Elec. Code, §§ 14026, subd. (e) [providing that "racially polarized voting" may be established by "[t]he methodologies for estimating group voting behavior as approved in applicable federal cases to enforce the [VRA]"], 14028, subd. (a).)[5]

B. Defining Terms in the CVRA

The CVRA prohibits the use of an at-large method of election when it "impairs the ability of a protected class to elect candidates of its choice or its ability to influence the outcome of an election, as a result of the dilution or the abridgment of the rights of voters who *64 are members of a protected class." (Elec. Code, § 14027.) Plaintiffs contend that the City's at-large city council elections prevent Latino voters from electing, either on their own or with the support of crossover voters, their preferred candidate. They argue this diluted their ability to elect their candidate of choice as well as their ability to influence the outcome of an election. The statute, however, does not define "dilution," "ability ... to elect candidates of its choice," or "ability ... to influence the outcome of an election." (Ibid.) The meaning of these 314 undefined terms presents a pure question of law that we review de novo. (See Lopez v. Ledesma (2022) 12 Cal.5th 848, 857, 290 Cal.Rptr.3d 532, 505 P.3d 212.)

1. "Dilution"

In plaintiffs' view, proof of racially polarized voting, in itself, establishes "dilution" within the meaning of the CVRA. They rely on the "plain language" of Elections Code section 14028, subdivision (a), which provides, "A violation of Section 14027 is established if it is shown that racially polarized voting occurs in elections for members of the governing body of the political subdivision ...." (Italics added.) According to plaintiffs, "Section 14028 expressly states how a violation of Section 14027 is shown" — i.e., simply by demonstrating the existence of racially polarized voting in an at-large jurisdiction.

[8] [9] [10] When considered in isolation, this single sentence might arguably be susceptible to plaintiffs' reading. However, a court construing a statute does not view a fragment in isolation, but considers the statute as a whole, in context with related provisions and the overall statutory structure, so that it may best identify and effectuate the scheme's underlying purpose. (See People v. Pennington (2017) 3 Cal.5th 786, 795, 221 Cal.Rptr.3d 448, 400 P.3d 14.) As plaintiffs concede, and as the legislative history reveals, the CVRA is in many ways "very similar" to the VRA. (Governor's Off. of Planning & Research, Enrolled Bill Rep. on Sen. Bill No. 976 (2001–2002 Reg. Sess.) July 1, 2002, p. 4.) When we construe "dilution" under the CVRA, we must therefore be mindful that it is a term of art with a settled meaning under section 2 of the VRA: " 'The phrase vote dilution itself suggests a norm with respect to which the fact of dilution may be ascertained.' " (Holder v. Hall (1994) 512 U.S. 874, 880, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.).) To establish vote dilution under the VRA, "a court must find a reasonable alternative practice as a benchmark 331 against which to measure the existing voting practice." (Holder, at p. 880, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.); id. at p. 887, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (conc. opn. of O'Connor, J.) ["On this, there is general agreement"]; id. at p. 951, 114 S.Ct. 2581 (dis. opn. of Blackmun, J.) ["There is widespread agreement"].) So while the existence of racially polarized voting " 'is relevant to a vote dilution claim' " under the VRA (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 55, 106 S.Ct. 2752) — and is indeed "a key element" (ibid.) — it is not in itself sufficient.

[11] We find, for several reasons, the same is true under the CVRA. The similarities between the two schemes strongly suggest that "dilution" requires not only a showing that racially polarized voting exists, but also that the protected class thereby has less ability to elect its preferred candidate or 315 influence the election's outcome than it would have if the at-large system had not been adopted. (Cf. Ferra v. Loews Hollywood Hotel, LLC (2021) 11 Cal.5th 858, 874, 280 Cal.Rptr.3d 783, 489 P.3d 1166 [concluding that the Legislature intended to adopt the " 'widely understood' " meaning of a term in federal law]; Davis v. City of Berkeley (1988) 47 Cal.3d 512, 533, 253 Cal.Rptr. 839, 765 P.2d 46 [concluding that undefined "terms of art" in a statute refer to the definitions provided by federal law].) Although the legislative history materials can be read in different ways, one committee analysis recognized that the CVRA targets racially polarized voting in at-large elections only "if it Impairs the Right of Protected Groups" to elect their preferred candidates or influence the outcome of an election. (Assem. Com. on Judiciary, Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 976, supra, as amended Apr. 9, 2002, p. 2.) After all, "the very concept of vote dilution implies — and, indeed, necessitates — the existence of an 'undiluted' practice against which the fact of dilution may be measured." (*65 Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd. (1997) 520 U.S. 471, 480, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730.)

[12] Plaintiffs' construction would allow a party to prevail based solely on proof of racially polarized voting that could not be remedied or ameliorated by any other electoral system. Moreover, such a construction would render the word "dilution" in Elections Code section 14027 surplusage. Accordingly, we agree with the Court of Appeal that dilution is a separate element under the CVRA. To establish the dilution element, a plaintiff in a CVRA action must identify "a reasonable alternative voting practice" to the existing at-large electoral system that will "serve as the benchmark 'undiluted' voting practice." (Reno v. Bossier Parish School Bd., supra, 520 U.S. at p. 480, 117 S.Ct. 1491.)

2. "The Ability ... to Elect Candidates of Its Choice"

The CVRA does not explicitly define what it means to "impair[ ] the ability of a protected class to elect candidates of its choice." (Elec. Code, § 14027.) On this question, we find the VRA illuminating, but not dispositive.

[13] An at-large electoral system impairs a protected class's ability "to elect representatives of their choice" under the federal act (52 U.S.C. § 10301(b)) only when the class can "demonstrate that it is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district." (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) The rationale for the VRA approach is that "if the minority group is spread evenly throughout a multimember district, or if, although geographically compact, the minority group is so small in relation to the surrounding white population that it could not constitute 332 a majority in a single-member district, these minority voters *316 cannot maintain that they would have been able to elect representatives of their choice in the absence of the multimember electoral structure." (Gingles, at p. 50, fn. 17, 106 S.Ct. 2752.)

For some period after Gingles, it was uncertain whether the first Gingles requirement (i.e., whether the minority group is sufficiently large and compact) could be satisfied by proof that the minority population "is large enough to elect the candidate of its choice with help from voters who are members of the majority and who cross over to support the minority's preferred candidate." (Bartlett v. Strickland (2009) 556 U.S. 1, 13, 129 S.Ct. 1231, 173 L.Ed.2d 173 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.) (Strickland).) Strickland settled the question. It held that the VRA does not impose "a duty to give minority voters the most potential, or the best potential, to elect a candidate by attracting crossover voters." (Strickland, at p. 15, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.).) Dispensing with the requirement that the minority group, by itself, be sufficiently large and compact to constitute a majority in the hypothetical district, the court reasoned, "would call in question the Gingles framework." (Strickland, at p. 16, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.).)

The Court of Appeal effectively embraced the Strickland approach in construing the CVRA. It required a showing that Latino voters could constitute a majority, all by themselves, in a hypothetical single-member district. Indeed, it noted that "30 percent is not enough to win a majority" and rejected plaintiffs' contention that an ability to elect a preferred candidate could be shown in this case if non-Latino voters were to " 'cross over' and vote for Latino candidates, buoying Latino power and clearing the 50 percent threshold to electoral success."

The Court of Appeal erred in importing the VRA's majority-minority requirement into the CVRA. In enacting the CVRA, the Legislature wanted to make it "easier" for protected classes to demonstrate an ability to elect their preferred candidates under an alternative voting system. (Assem. Com. on Elections, Reapportionment and Const. Amends., Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 976, supra, as amended Mar. 18, 2002, p. 4.) No longer would plaintiffs need to show the protected class was sufficiently large and geographically compact to muster a majority in a hypothetical district: "The fact that members of a protected class are not geographically compact or concentrated may not preclude a finding of racially polarized voting, or a violation 66 of Section 14027 and this section ...." (Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (c); see Sen. Com. on Elections and Reapportionment, Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 976 (2001–2002 Reg. Sess.) as amended May 1, 2001, p. 3 ["Unlike the preconditions established by the Supreme Court in Thornburg v. Gingles, this bill does not require that the minority community be geographically compact or concentrated"]; Assem. Com. on Elections, Reapportionment and Const. *317 Amends., Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 976, supra, as amended Mar. 18, 2002, p. 4 ["This bill requires that only two of those [Gingles] conditions be met"].)

The Legislature's rationale for rejecting the majority-minority requirement seems clear enough: It would make little sense to require CVRA plaintiffs to show that the protected class could constitute a majority of a hypothetical district, given that the CVRA is not limited to ability-to-elect claims nor are its remedies limited to district elections. (See, e.g., Sanchez v. City of Modesto (2006) 145 Cal.App.4th 660, 670, 51 Cal.Rptr.3d 821 ["In a cumulative voting system, a politically cohesive but geographically dispersed minority group can 333 elect a single candidate ... although it would be unable to elect any candidates in a conventional winner-take-all at-large system and could not form a majority in any feasible district in a district system"].) Though the parties have focused in this court on district elections, the trial court found that, in addition to district elections, several alternative at-large election methods — cumulative voting, [6] limited voting, [7] and ranked choice voting [8] — would each enhance Latino voting power and their ability to elect candidates of their choice. None of these methods would require a winning candidate to muster a majority in a hypothetical district. We can think of no reason why a CVRA claim based on any of these alternate at-large election methods should depend on such a showing. (Cf. Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (c) ["that members of a protected class are not geographically compact or concentrated ... may be a factor in determining an appropriate remedy"].) Furthermore, the Legislature clearly intended to make the CVRA more expansive than the VRA — by, for example, explicitly recognizing claims based on dilution of the "ability to influence the outcome of an election." (Elec. Code, § 14027.)

Even in the context of district elections, the Court of Appeal's focus on a majority-minority district was misguided. The Court of Appeal feared that allowing a plaintiff to rely on crossover votes "arbitrarily embraces racially polarized voting when it helps and abandons it when it hurts," which it viewed as creating "a manipulable standard boiling down to plaintiff always wins." But far from embracing racially polarized voting "when it 318 helps" and abandoning it "when it hurts," plaintiffs are merely pointing out the differing effects of racially polarized voting in two different settings. To challenge an at-large electoral system, a plaintiff must first demonstrate the existence of racially polarized voting — i.e., cognizable differences "in the choice of candidates or other electoral choices that are preferred by voters in a protected class, and in the choice of candidates and electoral choices that are preferred by voters in the rest of the electorate." (Elec. Code, § 14026, subd. (e).) The plaintiff must next show that the protected class would have the potential to elect its preferred candidate or candidates under a different electoral system (say, district elections). In calculating the protected class's voting strength under the alternative system, the plaintiff does not "abandon[ ]" racially polarized voting. Rather, the plaintiff must *67 prove that, assuming the same degree of racial polarization, the greater concentration of protected class voters in the hypothetical district would nonetheless be sufficient to enable them to elect their preferred candidate when combined with the available crossover votes. Alternatively, the plaintiff may be able to demonstrate sufficient voting strength where racially polarized voting by other 334 voters in the hypothetical district is lower than in the community as a whole. In neither instance is the plaintiff seeking to "abandon" racially polarized voting "when it hurts."[9]

[14] The City's position in this court is slightly more nuanced, but no more persuasive. The City allows that there may be "room to expand vote-dilution claims beyond section 2's narrow ambit," but only "where the relevant minority group would account for a near-majority of voters in a hypothetical district with a history of reliable crossover support from other voters." The City does not dispute, however, that defining a near majority presents a new set of line-drawing problems. And in any case the CVRA permits consideration of at-large remedies such as cumulative voting, limited voting, or ranked choice voting — none of which would depend on the existence of a near majority in some hypothetical district that would never be drawn or used.

319 These omissions counsel against adoption of the City's position. Rather than quibble over whether a protected class falls on one side or the other of an undefined near-majority line, we think it more sensible to inquire directly whether the prospect of crossover support from other voters under a lawful alternative electoral scheme would offer the protected class, whatever its size, the potential to elect its preferred candidate. When the hypothetical alternative is district elections, a high degree of racially polarized voting may, in many cases, effectively require the protected class to constitute a substantial or very substantial minority of voters. The higher the degree of racial polarization, the greater the percentage required by the protected class to demonstrate it would be able, in combination with crossover voters, to elect its preferred candidate. But there is no reason to layer this inquiry with an additional predicate showing of some undefined near majority. All that is required is that the protected class be "sufficiently large ... to elect candidates of its choice," even if it falls short of "an absolute majority of the relevant population." (De Grandy, supra, 512 U.S. at pp. 1008, 1009, 114 S.Ct. 2647.)[10]

We are also sensitive to the fact that Gingles's majority-minority requirement is a poor fit for the CVRA, which applies 335 exclusively to nonpartisan elections. (See Cal. Const., art. II, § 6.) In the City, for example, multiple candidates may vie for office, and a plurality can be sufficient to win. Requiring a protected class to demonstrate it could constitute a majority or near-majority of a hypothetical district would impose a threshold far higher than what the protected class's preferred candidate would actually need to be *68 elected. (See Romero v. City of Pomona (9th Cir. 1989) 883 F.2d 1418, 1424, fn. 7 ["Less than a majority, of course, might suffice in a district where candidates are elected by plurality"], overruled on other grounds in Townsend v. Holman Consulting Corp. (9th Cir. 1990) 929 F.2d 1358, 1363.) We therefore decline to require a protected class demonstrate it would constitute a majority or near majority of a hypothetical district in all circumstances.

3. "Dilution" of "the Ability ... to Elect Candidates of Its Choice"

[15] Accordingly, to establish dilution of a protected class's ability to elect its preferred candidate under the CVRA, a plaintiff must demonstrate "the potential to elect representatives" under some lawful alternative electoral 320 method. (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 50, fn. 17, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) One way to demonstrate the class's potential to elect its preferred candidates would be to show, as the VRA requires, that the class would be "sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district." (Gingles, at p. 50, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) But that is not the only way. (See Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (c).) Because the CVRA applies exclusively to nonpartisan elections, where there may be more than two candidates, the winner may prevail with far less than a majority of the vote. Moreover, the protected class may be able to demonstrate its ability to attract crossover votes for its preferred candidate. Finally, a plaintiff may identify nondistrict remedies that would enable the class, on its own or with the assistance of crossover votes, to elect its preferred candidate. The minority population percentage necessary to win an election under some alternative at-large electoral systems — cumulative or ranked-choice voting, for example — may be less than 25 percent. (See Dillard v. Chilton County Bd. of Education (M.D.Ala. 1988) 699 F.Supp. 870, 874 (Dillard) ["in a jurisdiction with seven seats, the threshold of exclusion[11] would be 12.5% plus" in a cumulative voting system]; Mulroy, The Way Out: A Legal Standard for Imposing Alternative Electoral Systems as Voting Rights Remedies (1998) 33 Harv. C.R.-C.L. L.Rev. 333, 342 [threshold for ranked-choice voting "is identical to that of cumulative voting"].)

Determining whether the protected class has the potential to elect its preferred candidate under some alternative system requires a " 'functional' analysis of the political process" in that locality and a " 'searching practical evaluation of the "past and present reality." ' " (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at pp. 62–63, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) Courts should consider the totality of the facts and circumstances of the particular case (see, e.g., Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (e)), including the characteristics of the specific locality, its electoral history, and " 'an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact' of the contested electoral mechanisms" as well as the design and impact of the potential alternative system. (Gingles, at p. 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752; see 336 Milligan, supra, 599 U.S. 1, 143 S.Ct. 1487 [216 L.Ed.2d at p. 75].) This fact-specific inquiry accords with the legislative understanding that California is a large and diverse state that needs a flexible approach to address our changing demographics. (See Assem. Com. on Judiciary, Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 976, supra, as amended Apr. 9, 2002, p. 2 ["In California, we face a unique situation where we are all minorities"].)

[16] The key inquiry in establishing dilution of a protected class's ability to elect its preferred candidate under the CVRA, therefore, is what percentage of the vote would be required to win — an inquiry that is not short-circuited *321 merely because the protected class may fall short of an absolute majority (or something close to that). In predicting how many candidates are likely to run and what percentage may be necessary to win, courts may also consider the experiences of other similar jurisdictions that use district elections or other alternatives to traditional at-large elections. Courts should likewise keep in mind that the inquiry at the liability 69 stage "is simply 'to prove that a solution is possible, and not necessarily to present the final solution to the problem.' " (Pope v. County of Albany (2d Cir. 2012) 687 F.3d 565, 576; see Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 50, fn. 17, 106 S.Ct. 2752.)

At the remedial stage the focus will shift to which electoral system is "appropriate" and "tailored to remedy the violation." (Elec. Code, § 14029.) If the court selects a district remedy, then there must also be at least two public hearings before the maps are drafted and at least two more hearings once the maps have been drawn and published. (Id., § 10010, subds. (a)(1), (2), (c).) In other words, the remedy the court ends up selecting under section 14029 may, but need not, be the benchmark the plaintiff offered to show the element of dilution.

The Court of Appeal feared that failing to craft a majority-minority requirement "would give a winning cause of action to any group, no matter how small, that can draw a district map that would improve its voting power by any amount, no matter how miniscule." To prove its point, the court offered a hypothetical in which a protected class's share of the electorate could increase from 0.1 percent under an at-large system to 1.5 percent in a proposed district. Even though the group's voting power would increase 15-fold, it could have "no practical numerical influence in any voting system" because there would be "simply too few voters ... to be numerically effective in an environment of race-based voting." This would, the Court of Appeal warned, "merely ensure plaintiffs always win."

We agree with the Court of Appeal that a plaintiff cannot prove dilution of its ability to elect its preferred candidate under the CVRA by showing that its voting share would increase 15-fold, from 0.1 percent to 1.5 percent, in a hypothetical district. In that circumstance, as the Court of Appeal explained, "[t]here are simply too few voters ... to be numerically effective in an environment of race-based voting." But it does not follow that a majority (or near-majority) requirement should be judicially engrafted onto the CVRA. After all, by eliminating Gingles's geographic compactness requirement, the Legislature rejected any requirement that the protected class constitute a majority of a hypothetical district. (See Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (c).) What enables courts to sort successful claims from unsuccessful claims is the dilution element itself, which requires the plaintiff to show that the protected class would, under some lawful alternative, have a "real 322 electoral opportunity" to elect its candidate of choice, either on its own or with the aid of crossover voters. (337 LULAC, supra, 548 U.S. at p. 428, 126 S.Ct. 2594; see Pope v. County of Albany, supra, 687 F.3d at p. 575, fn. 8.)[12]

[17] The dilution element also ensures the protected class is not made worse off. To replace at-large with district elections under a dilution theory, a successful plaintiff must show not merely that the protected class would have a real electoral opportunity in one or more hypothetical districts, but also that the incremental gain in the class's ability to elect its candidate of choice in such districts would not be offset by a loss of the class's potential to elect its candidates of choice elsewhere in the locality. (Cf. Georgia v. Ashcroft (2003) 539 U.S. 461, 479, 123 S.Ct. 2498, 156 L.Ed.2d 428 ["in examining whether the new plan is retrogressive, the inquiry must encompass the entire statewide plan as a whole"].) While "[t]he fact that the proposed remedy does not benefit all of the [protected class] in the City does not justify denying any remedy at all" (Gomez v. Watsonville (9th Cir. 1988) 863 F.2d 1407, 1414, italics added), it remains the plaintiff's burden to demonstrate that some lawful alternative method of election would improve the protected class's overall ability to elect its preferred candidates. As both sides in this proceeding agree, unless the plaintiff can demonstrate a net gain in the protected class's potential to elect candidates under an alternative system, it has not shown the at-large method of election "impairs" the ability of the protected class to elect its preferred *70 candidates. (Elec. Code, § 14027; cf. Beer v. United States (1976) 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 ["the purpose of § 5 [of the VRA] has always been to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise"].)

We also reject the City's contention that a majority-minority requirement — or something close to it in the form of a near-majority requirement — is necessary to avoid difficult constitutional questions under the equal protection clause. In the City's view, it would be perilous for courts to draw race-based districts in the absence of a compelling justification. (See Cooper v. Harris (2017) 581 U.S. 285, 291–293, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837.) Merely increasing the percentage of minority voters in a hypothetical district where "the increase will have no real-world effect," the City warns, is not a compelling justification. But the CVRA does not require a court to grant relief that has no real world effect. As stated above, the alternative voting system must offer the protected class at least a "potential" to elect its preferred candidates that did not exist under the at-large system. (323 Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at p. 50, fn. 17, 106 S.Ct. 2752.) Moreover, nothing in the CVRA requires a municipality or a court to select a district-based remedy or, even if it chooses to do so, to draw district lines, as the City contends, based "principally on race." To the contrary: California law directs that district boundaries comply with the state and federal Constitutions (as well as the VRA) (Elec. Code, § 21621, subd. (b)) and requires, to the extent practicable, that boundaries be "geographically contiguous" and maintain the integrity of "any local neighborhood or local community of interest." (Id., subd. (c)(1), (2).) State law also encourages district lines to be drawn along 338 "natural and artificial barriers" and with "geographical compactness." (Id., subd. (c)(3), (4).) The City does not explain how or why districts drawn in accordance with the above criteria would run afoul of the Constitution. (See Miller v. Johnson (1995) 515 U.S. 900, 916, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 ["legislatures will ... almost always be aware of racial demographics"]; cf. ibid. [strict scrutiny applies only where "race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision" and "the legislature subordinated traditional race-neutral districting principles, including but not limited to compactness, contiguity, and respect for political subdivisions or communities defined by actual shared interests, to racial considerations"].) Indeed, assuming lines are drawn "based on proper factors," whether to create a district where a protected class has the potential to elect its candidate of choice is "a matter of legislative choice or discretion." (Strickland, supra, 556 U.S. at p. 23, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.); see Higginson v. Becerra (9th Cir. 2019) 786 Fed.Appx. 705, 707–708.) That's precisely the choice the Legislature made in enacting the CVRA: "An at-large method of election may not be imposed or applied in a manner that impairs the ability of a protected class to elect candidates of its choice ...." (Elec. Code, § 14027.)

4. "Dilution" of "the Ability ... to Influence the Outcome of an Election"

Unlike its federal analogue, the CVRA prohibits the use of an at-large electoral system that dilutes not only the ability of a protected class "to elect candidates of its choice," but also "its ability to influence the outcome of an election." (Elec. Code, § 14027.) The inclusion of the latter phrase further supports our conclusion that the CVRA cannot be read in the limited manner the City would like; indeed, the influence prong suggests a focus broader than the class's ability to elect its preferred candidates (with or without the help of crossover voters). (Cf. Strickland, supra, 556 U.S. at p. 13, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.) ["a minority group can influence the outcome of an election even if its preferred candidate cannot be elected"]; LULAC, supra, 548 U.S. at pp. 445–446, 126 S.Ct. 2594 (plur. opn. of Kennedy, J.) [distinguishing between a group's "ability to influence the outcome [of an election] between some candidates, none of whom is their candidate of choice," and the ability to elect "their candidate of choice"]; *71 10 Ill. Comp. Stat. 120/5-5(b) ["The phrase 324 'influence district' means a district where a racial minority or language minority can influence the outcome of an election even if its preferred candidate cannot be elected"].) As the Attorney General (who is appearing in this action as amicus curiae) suggests, a protected class's ability to influence the outcome of an election could include, for example, "forming a coalition with another group to elect a candidate acceptable to each" or "blocking an unacceptable candidate."

We need not decide the scope of the CVRA's ability-to-influence prong in this case, however. Plaintiffs did not argue in the trial court or in this court an influence theory distinct from their claim that the City's at-large election system diluted their ability to elect their candidates of choice.

III. Conclusion

A group's ability "to compete successfully at electoral politics, in short, is often dependent on how the competition is structured." (Engstrom, supra, 21 Stetson L.Rev. at p. 743.) The CVRA represents the Legislature's effort to make that competition more fair. It bars the use of an at-large method of election if that method 339 dilutes a protected class's ability to elect candidates of its choice or its ability to influence the outcome of an election. Dilution occurs when an at-large system denies a protected class the potential to elect its preferred candidate or influence the election's outcome. The plaintiff in a CVRA action must identify a lawful alternative to the existing at-large electoral system that will serve as the benchmark undiluted voting system.

A protected class has the ability to elect its preferred candidate if it would have the potential to elect that candidate, on its own or with the assistance of crossover support from other voters, under an alternative voting system; there is no additional requirement that the protected class constitute a majority or near-majority of a hypothetical district. A court presented with a dilution claim should undertake a searching evaluation of the totality of circumstances (see, e.g., Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (e)), including the characteristics of the specific locality, its electoral history, and the design and impact of the at-large system as well as the potential impact of lawful alternative electoral systems. In predicting how many candidates are likely to run and what percentage may be necessary to win, courts may also consider the experiences of other similar jurisdictions that use district elections or some method other than traditional at-large elections.

We express no view on the ultimate question of whether the City's at-large voting system is consistent with the CVRA. The parties vigorously contested in the Court of Appeal whether plaintiffs had established two elements of a 325 CVRA claim: whether voting in city council elections was racially polarized and whether the at-large method of election diluted the voting power of Latino residents in those elections. Because the Court of Appeal concluded that plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate dilution of the Latino vote, it did not consider whether voting in council elections was racially polarized. We have determined that the Court of Appeal relied on an incorrect legal standard to conclude that plaintiffs had failed to satisfy the dilution element of their CVRA claim. Under the circumstances, we find it appropriate to remand the matter to the Court of Appeal to decide in the first instance whether, under the correct legal standard, plaintiffs have established that at-large elections dilute their ability to elect their preferred candidate; whether plaintiffs have demonstrated the existence of racially polarized voting; and any of the other unresolved issues in the City's appeal. (See Central Coast Forest Assn. v. Fish & Game Com. (2017) 2 Cal.5th 594, 606, 214 Cal.Rptr.3d 265, 389 P.3d 840.)

Disposition

We reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal and remand for further proceedings consistent with our opinion.

We Concur:

GUERRERO, C. J.

CORRIGAN, J.

LIU, J.

KRUGER, J.

GROBAN, J.

JENKINS, J.

All Citations

15 Cal.5th 292, 534 P.3d 54, 312 Cal.Rptr.3d 319, 23 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 8126, 2023 Daily Journal D.A.R. 8739

Footnotes

1 The City asserts that in the 2020 city council election, four and one-half years after plaintiffs filed this action, three of the five winning candidates were Latino. Plaintiffs dispute this characterization of the winning candidates' ethnicities. Given the limited issue before us, we express no view on the dispute.

2 "In an at-large (or multi-member district) system, all voters elect all representatives, and each voter has as many ballots as there are positions available. This system contrasts with a single-member district plan, under which the entire political jurisdiction is divided into districts roughly equal in population, each of which selects one representative by vote within the district." (Badillo v. Stockton (9th Cir. 1992) 956 F.2d 884, 889.)

3 The Senate factors include "the history of voting-related discrimination in the State or political subdivision; the extent to which voting in the elections of the State or political subdivision is racially polarized; the extent to which the State or political subdivision has used voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group, such as unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, and prohibitions against bullet voting; the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes; the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process; the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns; and the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction." (Gingles, supra, 478 U.S. at pp. 44–45, 106 S.Ct. 2752.)

4 The CVRA factors include "the history of discrimination, the use of electoral devices or other voting practices or procedures that may enhance the dilutive effects of at-large elections, denial of access to those processes determining which groups of candidates will receive financial or other support in a given election, the extent to which members of a protected class bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process, and the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns." (Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (e).)

5 We do not consider here whether the City's elections are racially polarized — an issue the Court of Appeal has not yet addressed — but we do note that, under the CVRA, "[e]lections conducted prior to the filing of an action ... are more probative to establish the existence of racially polarized voting than elections conducted after the filing of the action." (Elec. Code, § 14028, subd. (a).)

6 Under cumulative voting, "a voter receives as many votes as there are candidates to elect, but may cast multiple votes for a single candidate." (Portugal v. Franklin County (Wash. 2023) 530 P.3d 994, 1002 (Portugal).)

7 Under limited voting, "a voter receives fewer votes than there are candidates to elect." (Portugal, supra, 530 P.3d at p. 1002.)

8 Under ranked choice voting, a voter ranks candidates in order of preference. In an election to fill more than one seat, such as for a city council, each ballot is counted at the start of tabulation as one vote for its first-choice ranked candidate. Any candidate with more votes than the election threshold (see fn. 11, post) is declared elected. If the first round of the vote counting does not fill all the seats, then the system consults the next-ranked choices from the ballots supporting the candidate with the least number of votes, the next-ranked choices from the surplus ballots (i.e., those in excess of what was needed for the elected candidate to win), or both. Jurisdictions use a variety of methods to determine when and how to transfer the nextranked choices from surplus ballots. This form of tabulation continues until all seats are filled. (See Tideman, The Single Transferable Vote (Winter 1995) 9 J. Econ. Persp. 27, 27–28, 32–35; see generally Note, The Madisonian Case for Ranked Choice Voting: Federalist No. 10, Preferential Voting, and the American Democratic Tradition (2021) 23 N.Y.U. J. Legis. & Pub. Pol'y 953, 963.)

9 We recognize that where there is complete racial polarization, the protected class may itself need to make up a majority of the district in order to have an ability to elect its preferred candidate. But " '[i]n practice, such extreme conditions are never present.' " (Strickland, supra, 556 U.S. at p. 45, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (dis. opn. of Breyer, J.) ["No voting group is 100% cohesive"]; see id. at pp. 32–33, 129 S.Ct. 1231 (dis. opn. of Souter, J.) ["of course minority voters constituting less than 50% of the voting population can have an opportunity to elect the candidates of their choice, as amply shown by empirical studies confirming that such minority groups regularly elect their preferred candidates with the help of modest crossover by members of the majority"].) As the high court has acknowledged, "there are communities in which minority citizens are able to form coalitions with voters from other racial and ethnic groups, having no need to be a majority within a single district in order to elect candidates of their choice." (Johnson v. De Grandy (1994) 512 U.S. 997, 1020, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (De Grandy).)

10 An amicus curiae letter submitted in support of Pico Neighborhood Association's petition for review by the chairs of the Assembly's Latino, Black, and Asian and Pacific Islander caucuses recites that while some members were elected in majority-minority districts, many others were elected in districts in which their membership group made up only 20 to 40 percent of the eligible voters. The trial court here similarly found that candidates from minority groups who had been "unsuccessful in at-large elections have won district elections" in districts "where the minority group is one-third or less of a district's electorate."

11 "The threshold of exclusion 'is the percentage of the vote that will guarantee the winning of a seat even under the most unfavorable circumstances.' " (Dillard, supra, 699 F.Supp. at p. 874.) It "is calculated according to the following formula: 1/(1 + number of seats available)." (U.S. v. Vill. of Port Chester (S.D.N.Y. 2010) 704 F.Supp.2d 411, 450.)

12 Plaintiffs suggest it would be rare for a group constituting less than 25 percent of the relevant voting population to make the required showing. We have no occasion here to explore that suggestion, since the Latino population in the proposed district exceeds that threshold.

1 Wash.3d 629
Supreme Court of Washington,
En Banc.

Gabriel PORTUGAL, Brandon Paul Morales, Jose Trinidad Corral, and League of United Latin American Citizens, Respondents,

v.

FRANKLIN COUNTY, a Washington municipal entity, Clint Didier, Rodney J. Mullen, Lowell B. Peck, in their official capacities as members of the Franklin County Board of Commissioners, Defendants, James Gimenez, Appellant.

No. 100999-2
|
Argued May 11, 2023
|
Filed June 15, 2023

Synopsis

Background: Latino voters brought action against county and county board of commissioners, alleging that county's system for electing board members diluted votes of Latino/a voters by cracking the population into different districts in violation of Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA). After intervenor's motion to intervene was granted and intervenor's motion to dismiss was denied, the Superior Court, Franklin County, Alexander Ekstrom, J., entered a final order approving parties' settlement agreement. Intervenor appealed, and plaintiffs requested attorney fees and costs on appeal against intervenor.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Yu, J., held that:

[1] voters had standing;

[2] as a matter of first impression, legislature had not implicitly repealed WVRA:

[3] facial equal protection claim triggered rational basis review, not strict scrutiny;

[4] WVRA survived rational basis review on facial equal protection challenge;

[5] plaintiffs were entitled to nongovernmental, prevailing party trial and appellate attorney fees and costs under WVRA; and

[6] Supreme Court would decline to assess nongovernmental prevailing party attorney fees against county commissioner.

Affirmed, request for attorney fees granted, and remanded.

West Headnotes (40)

[1] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

An abridgement of the right to vote, within meaning of the federal Voting Rights Act (VRA), refers to an electoral system or practice that impairs voting rights on the basis of race, color, or language minority group, regardless of whether there was outright denial of the right to vote. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[2] Election Law Vote Dilution

Dilution of voting rights under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA) is a specific type of abridgment, which arises from the features of legislative districting plans. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[3] Election Law Vote Dilution

Under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), vote dilution can be caused by the use of multimember districts and at-large voting schemes, as opposed to single-member districts and district-based elections. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[4] Election Law Vote Dilution

Under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, at-large elections, in which voters of the entire jurisdiction elect the members to the governing body, may minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial minorities because the majority, by virtue of its numerical superiority, will regularly defeat the choices of minority voters. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.010(1)(a).

[5] Election Law Vote Dilution

Under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), vote dilution can occur in district-based elections through the manipulation of district lines. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(a).

[6] Election Law Dispersal or concentration of minority voters

"Cracking" occurs when a group of voters is split up among multiple districts so that they fall short of a majority in each one.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[7] Election Law Dispersal or concentration of minority voters

"Packing" occurs when a group of voters is concentrated in a few districts that they win by overwhelming margins, thus preventing the group from electing its preferred candidates in other districts.

[8] Election Law Majority-minority districts

Under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), in majority-minority voting districts, a minority group composes a numerical, working majority of the voting-age population, thereby creating an opportunity for the minority group to elect its candidate of choice in that district. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[9] Election Law Relief in General

Federal courts may order the creation of majority-minority voting districts if necessary to remedy a violation of federal law.

[10] Election Law Relief in General

Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA) does not require remedies such as so-called influence districts in which a minority group can influence the outcome of an election even if its preferred candidate cannot be elected, or crossover districts in which the minority population, at least potentially, is large enough to elect the candidate of its choice with help from voters who are members of the majority and who cross over to support the minority's preferred candidate; instead, courts adjudicating § 2 claims are generally limited to ordering single-member districts and, in some cases, majority-minority districts. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[11] Election Law Vote Dilution

A plaintiff asserting a § 2 vote dilution claim under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) must prove three threshold conditions: (1) that the minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district; (2) that the minority group is politically cohesive; and (3) that the majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[12] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Gingles factors are necessary in § 2 vote dilution cases under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) to ensure that the plaintiff has stated a redressable injury. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[13] Election Law Majority-minority districts

Election Law Vote Dilution

The Gingles factors require the plaintiff bringing a vote-dilution case under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) to show that the plaintiff's concerns could, at least potentially, be addressed by implementing single-member districts, majority-minority districts, or both. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[14] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

The showings of geographically compact majority and minority political cohesion for a vote-dilution case under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA) are needed to establish that the minority has the potential to elect a representative of its own choice in some single-member district, and the minority political cohesion and majority bloc voting showings are needed to establish that the challenged districting thwarts a distinctive minority vote by submerging it in a larger voting population. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[15] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Only when a party has established the Gingles requirements for a vote-dilution case under the Voting Rights Act (VRA) does a court proceed to analyze whether a violation of Section 2 has occurred based on the totality of the circumstances. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[16] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

States Dilution of voting power in general

States are free to implement remedies for vote dilution that are not required pursuant to § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), so long as those remedies are not otherwise prohibited. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[17] Election Law Majority-minority districts

Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

If the plaintiff in a case under the Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA) seeks the creation of a so-called majority-minority district, the plaintiff may be required at the remedy stage to show that the minority group is sufficiently geographically compact to constitute a majority in the proposed district, just as a plaintiff bringing a claim under § 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act (VRA) would need to do at the threshold stage; by contrast, if the plaintiff in a WVRA case seeks only the implementation of a ranked choice voting system for at-large elections, a showing of geographical compactness would be both irrelevant and unnecessary at any stage. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301(b); Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.010(3).

[18] Appeal and Error Statutory or legislative law

Statutory interpretation is a matter of law, so Supreme Court review is de novo.

[19] Election Law Scope of review

Constitutional challenges to the Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA) are subject to de novo review. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.020.

[20] Constitutional Law Presumptions and Construction as to Constitutionality

Constitutional Law Burden of Proof

Courts presume statutes are constitutional, and the party challenging constitutionality bears the burden of proving otherwise.

[21] Constitutional Law Facial invalidity

Facial challenges must be rejected unless there is no set of circumstances in which the statute can constitutionally be applied.

[22] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Strict scrutiny could certainly be triggered in an as-applied equal protection challenge to districting maps that sort voters on the basis of race or to some other race-based sorting of voters. U.S. Const. Amend. 14.

[23] Election Law Racial and language minorities in general

Under its plain language, Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA) prohibiting voting discrimination against members of a protected class or classes of voters who are members of a race, color, or language minority group applies to all Washington voters; last antecedent rule shows that "minority group" modifies only "language," not "race" or "color," if legislature had intended otherwise, then WVRA would refer to "racial" groups, not "race" groups, WVRA allows for a challenge by any voter who resides in a political subdivision where a violation is alleged, it would improperly frustrate WVRA's purpose to hold that WVRA's protections are inapplicable to many Washington voters, and it would be both absurd and contrary to precedent to hold that statement of legislative findings negates plain language of WVRA's operative provisions. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. §§ 29A.92.010(5), 29A.92.020, 29A.92.090(1).

[24] Statutes Relative and qualifying terms and provisions, and their relation to antecedents

When evaluating the language of a statute, courts apply the last antecedent rule absent evidence of a contrary legislative intent.

[25] Statutes Construction based on multiple factors

Statutory language must be interpreted in the context of the statute, related provisions, and the statutory scheme as a whole.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[26] Statutes Purpose

In resolving a question of statutory construction, the Supreme Court will ultimately adopt the interpretation which best advances the legislative purpose.

[27] Statutes Other Jurisdictions

Absent contrary legislative intent, when a state statute is taken substantially verbatim from another jurisdiction, it carries the same construction.

[28] Constitutional Law Judicial rewriting or revision

Courts may not rewrite unambiguous statutory language under the guise of interpretation.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[29] Statutes Statements of purpose, intent, or policy in general

Declarations of legislative intent are not controlling; instead, they serve only as an important guide in determining the intended effect of the operative sections.

[30] Election Law Racial and language minorities in general

Under the Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA), abridgment of the right to vote can occur regardless of which racial group is in the majority. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.020.

[31] Counties Nature and constitution in general

Latino voters had standing to bring action against county and county board of commissioners, alleging that county's system for electing board members diluted votes of Latino/a voters by cracking the population into different districts in violation of Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA) which protects all Washington voters from discrimination on the basis of race, color, or language minority group. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.020.

[32] Counties Constitutional and statutory provisions

Election Law In general; power to prohibit discrimination

On its face, Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA) requires equality, not race-based favoritism, in electoral systems, such that WVRA did not irreconcilably conflict with section providing that when a county engages in periodic redistricting after a census, population data may not be used for purposes of favoring or disfavoring any racial group or political party, and therefore legislature had not implicitly repealed WVRA; WVRA's protections applied to all Washington voters, all Washington voters had standing to bring a WVRA challenge, and a political subdivision could not be compelled to do anything pursuant to WVRA based on the single factor of racially polarized voting, meaning the fact that voters of different races tend to vote for different candidates. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. §§ 29A.76.010(4)(d), 29A.92.020.

[33] Constitutional Law In General; State Constitutional Provisions

For a violation of privileges and immunities clause of the state constitution to occur, the law must confer a privilege to a class of citizens. Wash. Const. art. 1, § 12.

[34] Constitutional Law Elections

Election Law In general; power to prohibit discrimination

Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA), which protects the equal opportunity of voters of all races, colors, and language minority groups to elect candidates of their choice, does not confer any privilege to any class of citizens, and thus WVRA does not facially violate privileges and immunities clause of the state constitution; all Washington voters have equal rights to challenge their local governments for alleged WVRA violations. Wash. Const. art. 1, § 12; Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.020.

[35] Constitutional Law Elections, Voting, and Political Rights

Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA) on its face did not classify voters on the basis of race, nor does it deprive anyone of the fundamental right to vote, but instead mandated equal voting opportunities for members of every race, color, and language minority group, and therefore, facial equal protection claim triggered rational basis review, not strict scrutiny. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.020.

[36] Constitutional Law Statutes and other written regulations and rules

In an equal protection case, rational basis review is satisfied if there is a rational relationship between the challenged statute and any legitimate governmental interests. U.S. Const. Amend. 14.

[37] Constitutional Law Equality of Voting Power (One Person, One Vote)

Election Law In general; power to prohibit discrimination

Washington Voting Rights Act's (WVRA) mandate for equal voting opportunities was clearly rationally related to the state's legitimate interest in protecting Washington voters from discrimination, and thus WVRA survived rational basis review on facial equal protection challenge in vote-dilution case. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 29A.92.020.

[38] Constitutional Law Statutes and other written regulations and rules

A law directing state actors to provide equal protection is facially neutral, and cannot violate the Constitution. U.S. Const. Amend. 14.

[39] Counties Costs

Latino voters, as nongovernmental prevailing parties, were entitled to trial and appellate attorney fees and costs under Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA) attributable to their litigation against intervenor in vote-dilution action against county; intervenor's appeal forced Latino voters to spend an entire year litigating case after county had settled their WVRA claim. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. §§ 4.84.010, 29A.92.020, 29A.92.130(1).

[40] Counties Costs

Supreme Court would decline to assess nongovernmental prevailing party attorney fees against county commissioner, in Latino voters' vote-dilution action against county and members of county board of commissioners under Washington Voting Rights Act (WVRA), notwithstanding evidence that commissioner was involved in intervenor's intervention or appeal of settlement between county, board members, and Latino voters; commissioner had not filed anything on appeal. Wash. Rev. Code Ann. §§ 29A.92.020, 29A.92.130(1).

*998 Appeal from Franklin County Superior Court, Docket No: 21-2-50210-4, Honorable Alexander C. Ekstrom, Judge

Attorneys and Law Firms

Joel Bernard Ard, Ard Law Group PLLC, P. O. Box 11633, Bainbridge Island, WA, 98110-5633, for Appellant.

Edwardo Morfin, Morfin Law Firm PLLC, 732 N. Center Pkwy., Kennewick, WA, 99336-8100, Sonni Waknin, Bernadette Samson Reyes, Chad W. Dunn, UCLA Voting Rights Project, 3250 Public Affairs Building, Los Angeles, CA, Francis Stanley Floyd, Amber L. Pearce, Amanda Dawn Daylong, Floyd Pflueger & Ringer PS, 3101 Western Ave. Ste. 400, Seattle, WA, 98121-3017, for Respondents.

Tera Marie Heintz, Jeffrey Todd Even, Office of The Attorney General, P. O. Box 40100, 1125 Washington Street Se, Olympia, WA, 98504, Sarah Elizabeth Smith, Office of The Attorney General, 800 Fifth Ave. Ste. 2000, Seattle, WA, 98104-3188, for Amicus Curiae on behalf of State of Washington.

David A.Perez, Hannah Elizabeth Mar Parman, Heath Loring Hyatt, Perkins Coie LLP, 1201 3rd Ave. Ste. 4900, Seattle, WA, 98101, for Amici Curiae on behalf of Fred T. Korematsu Center, ACLU of Washington.

Yurij Alexandrovich Rudensky, Wendy Weiser, Alicia Bannon, Brennan Center For Justice, 120 Broadway Ste. 1750, New York, NY, 10271, Nathaniel B. Edmonds, Lindsey Ware Dieselman, Tor Tarantola, 2050 M St. Nw, Washington, DC, 20036, for Amicus Curiae on behalf of Brennan Center for Justice.

Tiffany Mae Cartwright, MacDonald Hoague & Bayless, 705 2nd Ave. Ste. 1500, Seattle, WA, 98104-1745, Simone Leeper, Mark P. Gaber, Molly E. Danahy, Aseem Mulji, Valencia Richardson, Benjamin Phillips, Campaign Legal Center, 1101 14th Street Nw, Suite 400, Washington, DC, 20005, Annabelle Harless, Campaign Legal Center, 55 Monroe Street, Suite 1925, Chicago, IL, 60603, for Amicus Curiae on behalf of OneAmerica and Campaign Legal Center.

David B. Owens, Attorney at Law, 100 S King St. Ste. 100, Seattle, WA, 98104-2885, Ruth Greenwood, Nicholas Stephanopoulos, 6 Everett Street, Suite 4105, Cambridge, MA, 02138, for Amicus Curiae on behalf of Law School Clinics.

Jonathan Franklin Mitchell, Attorney at Law, 111 Congress Ave. Ste. 400, Austin, TX, 78701-4143, Daniel I. Morenoff, P. O. Box 12207, Dallas, TX, 75225, for Amicus Curiae on behalf of American Civil Rights Project.

Opinion

YU, J.

632 ¶1—This case presents matters of first impression concerning the interpretation and facial validity of the Washington Voting Rights Act of 2018 (WVRA), ch. 29A.92 RCW.[1] As detailed below, the WVRA protects the rights of Washington voters in local elections. In this case, three Latino[2] voters from *999 Franklin County alleged that the county's system for electing its board of commissioners violated the WVRA by "dilut[ing] the votes of Latino/a voters." Clerk's Papers (CP) at 1. The plaintiffs (respondents on appeal) ultimately settled with defendants Franklin County and the Franklin County Board of Commissioners. The defendants are not participants on appeal. We are not asked to 633 review the merits of the plaintiffs' claim or the parties' settlement agreement.

¶2 The issues on appeal were raised by James Gimenez, a Franklin County voter who was allowed to intervene by the trial court. Immediately after his motion to intervene was granted, Gimenez moved to dismiss the plaintiffs' claim, arguing that the plaintiffs do not have standing and that the WVRA is facially invalid. The trial court denied Gimenez's motion to dismiss, and he was not an active participant in the case thereafter. After the trial court entered a final order approving the parties' settlement, Gimenez appealed directly to this court.

¶3 Gimenez's arguments are all based on his view that the WVRA protects some Washington voters but excludes others. The WVRA's protections apply to "a class of voters who are members of a race, color, or language minority group."[3] RCW 29A.92.010(5). Gimenez interprets this language to mean that the WVRA protects only members of " 'race minority groups,' 'color minority groups,' or 'language minority group[s].' " Br. of Appellant at 2 (underlining added) (alteration in original). Based on this interpretation, Gimenez argues that the plaintiffs do not have standing because the WVRA does not protect Latinx voters from Franklin County as a matter of law. Gimenez also argues that the WVRA has been repealed by implication and is facially unconstitutional because it requires local governments to implement electoral systems that favor protected voters and disfavor others on the basis of race.

¶4 Gimenez's arguments cannot succeed because his reading of the statute is incorrect. The WVRA protects all Washington voters from discrimination on the basis of race, color, and language minority group. On its face, the WVRA 634 does not require race-based favoritism in local electoral systems, nor does it trigger strict scrutiny by granting special privileges, abridging voting rights, or otherwise classifying voters on the basis of race. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiffs have standing and that the WVRA is valid and constitutional on its face.[4] We affirm the trial court, grant the plaintiffs' request for attorney fees and costs on appeal against Gimenez, and remand for a determination of fees and costs incurred at the trial court.

OVERVIEW OF THE WVRA

¶5 No Washington appellate court has previously considered the WVRA. To provide context for this case, it is important to begin with an overview of the relevant law and terminology.

A. General provisions

¶6 The WVRA recognizes "that electoral systems that deny race, color, or language minority groups an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice are inconsistent with the right to free and equal elections." RCW 29A.92.005 (citing Wash. Const. art. I, § 19, art. VI, § 1; U.S. Const. amends. XIV, XV). However, prior to the WVRA's enactment, Washington law "often prohibited" local governments from making changes to their electoral systems, even in response to changing demographics. Id. The legislature found that "in some cases, this has resulted in an improper dilution of voting power," particularly as applied to "minority groups." Id.

¶7 To protect the rights of Washington voters in local elections, the legislature *1000 passed the WVRA in 2018. The WVRA provides that > no method of electing the governing body of a political subdivision may be imposed or applied in a manner that impairs the 635 ability of members of a protected class or classes to have an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice as a result of the dilution or abridgment of the rights of voters who are members of a protected class or classes.

RCW 29A.92.020. A " '[p]rotected class' means a class of voters who are members of a race, color, or language minority group, as this class is referenced and defined in the federal voting rights act [of 1965 (FVRA)], 52 U.S.C. 10301 et seq." RCW 29A.92.010(5). A " '[p]olitical subdivision' " includes "any county, city, town, school district, fire protection district, port district, or public utility district, but does not include the state." RCW 29A.92.010(4). Small cities, towns, and school districts are exempt from most of the WVRA's provisions. RCW 29A.92.700.

¶8 Two elements must be shown before a political subdivision may be found in violation of the WVRA:

> (a) Elections in the political subdivision exhibit polarized voting[5]; and
>
> (b) Members of a protected class or classes do not have an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice as a result of the dilution or abridgment of the rights of members of that protected class or classes.

RCW 29A.92.030(1). There are definitions and guidelines for applying these elements in individual cases. See RCW 29A.92.010, .030(2)-(6).

B. Types of prohibited voting discrimination

¶9 The WVRA expressly protects against two types of voting discrimination: "abridgment" and "dilution." RCW 29A.92.020, .030(1)(b). These terms are not statutorily defined, and their meaning is not necessarily obvious. However, "courts may rely on relevant federal case law for guidance" in interpreting the WVRA. RCW 29A.92.010.

636 ¶10 Federal cases use "abridgment" as a relatively general term. Practices that "abridge" the right to vote on the basis of race or color have been expressly prohibited by the Fifteenth Amendment since 1870 and by section 2 of the FVRA (Section 2) since 1965. U.S. Const. amend. XV, § 1; Brnovich v. Democratic Nat'l Comm., 594 U.S. ___, 141 S. Ct. 2321, 2331, 210 L. Ed. 2d 753 (2021) (citing 79 Stat. 437). In its current form, Section 2 prohibits electoral systems and practices "which result[U.S.] in a denial or abridgement" of voting rights based on "race," "color," or membership in a "language minority group." 52 U.S.C. §§ 10301(a), 10303(f)(2).

[1] ¶11 A Section 2 violation may be found if "the totality of circumstances" show > that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the [jurisdiction] are not equally open to participation by members of a [protected class] in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice.

52 U.S.C. § 10301(b). Thus, "an 'abridgement' of the right to vote" refers to an electoral system or practice that impairs voting rights on the basis of race, color, or language minority group, regardless of whether there was "outright denial of the right" to vote. Brnovich, 141 S. Ct. at 2341.

¶12 For example, abridgment may be caused "by the requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a precondition to voting" or by "the discriminatory use of literacy tests." 52 U.S.C. § 10306(a); Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112, 132, 91 S. Ct. 260, 27 L. Ed. 2d 272 (1970) (plurality opinion). For many years, Washington State abridged voting rights by imposing an English-language literacy requirement for voter registration, while at the same time "vesting unlimited discretion in state registration officers" to decide whether *1001 to administer a literacy test before registering any particular individual to vote. 1967 Op. Att'y Gen. No. 21, at 637 5; see Laws of 1901, ch. 135, § 4; Laws of 1965, ch. 9, § 29.07.070(13).

[2] ¶13 In contrast to "abridgment," federal courts use "dilution" as a technical term of art. Dilution is a specific type of abridgment, which arises from the "features of legislative districting plans." Brnovich, 141 S. Ct. at 2331. In a dilution claim, the plaintiff alleges that their jurisdiction's districting plan "dilute[s] the ability of particular voters to affect the outcome of elections." Id. Federal cases recognize two primary forms of vote dilution.

[3] [4] ¶14 First, vote dilution can be caused by the use of "multimember districts and at-large voting schemes,"[6] as opposed to single-member districts and district-based elections.[7] Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 47, 106 S. Ct. 2752, 92 L. Ed. 2d 25 (1986). At-large elections may " 'minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial [minorities]' " because "the majority, by virtue of its numerical superiority, will regularly defeat the choices of minority voters." Id. at 47-48 (alteration in original) (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 88, 86 S. Ct. 1286, 16 L. Ed. 2d 376 (1966)).

[5] [6] [7] ¶15 Second, vote dilution can occur in district-based elections through "the manipulation of district lines." Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 153, 113 S. Ct. 1149, 122 L. Ed. 2d 500 (1993). This often involves so-called " 'cracking' and 'packing.' " Gill v. Whitford, 585 U.S. ___, 138 S. Ct. 1916, 1923, 201 L. Ed. 2d 313 (2018) (quoting record). "Cracking" occurs when a group of voters is split up " 'among multiple districts so that they fall short of a majority in each one.' " Id. at 1924 (quoting record). "Packing" occurs when a group of voters is concentrated " 'in a few districts that they win by overwhelming margins,' " thus preventing the group from 638 electing its preferred candidates in other districts. Id. (quoting record).

¶16 Both the WVRA and Section 2 of the FVRA prohibit vote dilution. RCW 29A.92.020; Brnovich, 141 S. Ct. at 2333. However, there are significant differences between the two, which affect both the range of available remedies and the elements required for a successful claim.

C. The WVRA recognizes a broader range of redressable claims for vote dilution than those recognized by Section 2 of the FVRA

[8] [9] [10] ¶17 Section 2 recognizes only a few potential remedies for vote dilution. Federal courts "have strongly preferred single-member districts" as the remedy of choice. Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S. Ct. 1075, 122 L. Ed. 2d 388 (1993). In addition, federal courts may order "the creation of majority-minority[8] districts [if] necessary to remedy a violation of federal law." Quilter, 507 U.S. at 156. However, Section 2 does not require other remedies, such as so-called "influence districts"[9] or "crossover district[s]."[10] Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 13, 129 S. Ct. 1231, 173 L. Ed. 2d 173 (2009) (plurality opinion). Instead, courts adjudicating Section 2 claims are generally limited to ordering single-member districts and, in some cases, majority-minority districts.

*1002 [11] ¶18 Due to these limits on available remedies, a plaintiff asserting a Section 2 vote dilution claim > must prove three threshold conditions: first, "that [the minority group] is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute 639 a majority in a single-member district"; second, "that [the minority group] is politically cohesive"; and third, "that the ... majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate."

Emison, 507 U.S. at 40 (some alterations in original) (quoting Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50-51). These threshold conditions are generally referred to as the "Gingles factors" or "Gingles requirements."

[12] [13] [14] [15] ¶19 As the United States Supreme Court has explained, the Gingles factors are necessary in Section 2 vote dilution cases to ensure that the plaintiff has stated a redressable injury. In other words, the Gingles factors require the plaintiff to show that their concerns could, at least potentially, be addressed by implementing single-member districts, majority-minority districts, or both:

> The "geographically compact majority" and "minority political cohesion" showings are needed to establish that the minority has the potential to elect a representative of its own choice in some single-member district, [a]nd the "minority political cohesion" and "majority bloc voting" showings are needed to establish that the challenged districting thwarts a distinctive minority vote by submerging it in a larger ... voting population.

Id. (citing Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50 n.17, 51). "[O]nly when a party has established the Gingles requirements does a court proceed to analyze whether a violation [of Section 2] has occurred based on the totality of the circumstances." Strickland, 556 U.S. at 11-12.

¶20 By contrast, the WVRA contemplates a much broader range of available remedies. Similar to Section 2, the WVRA permits courts to order a political subdivision to implement "a district-based election system" and "to draw or redraw district boundaries." RCW 29A.92.110(1). However, unlike Section 2, courts adjudicating WVRA claims are "not limited to" these examples, and any remedy must be "tailor[ed]" to the political subdivision at issue. RCW 29A.92.110(1)-(2).

640 ¶21 For example, in direct contrast to the FVRA, the WVRA explicitly allows for the creation of a crossover or "coalition"[11] district "that provides the protected class the opportunity to join in a coalition of two or more protected classes to elect candidates of their choice if there is demonstrated political cohesion among the protected classes." RCW 29A.92.110(2). Other potential remedies include, but are not necessarily limited to,

- limited voting, where a voter receives fewer votes than there are candidates to elect;
- cumulative voting, where a voter receives as many votes as there are candidates to elect, but may cast multiple votes for a single candidate; and
- single transferrable or ranked choice voting, where a voter ranks candidates in order of preference, and votes are transferred to lower-ranked candidates who are not elected on first-place votes if a majority is not reached.

Final B. Rep. on Engrossed Substitute S.B. 6002, at 2, 65th Leg., Reg. Sess. (Wash. 2018).

[16] ¶22 Thus, on its face, the WVRA permits remedies that Section 2 does not. This does not create a conflict between state and federal law because the states are free to implement remedies that are not required pursuant to Section 2, so long as those remedies are not otherwise prohibited. See Strickland, 556 U.S. at 23 ("Our holding that [Section] 2 does not require crossover districts does not consider the permissibility of such districts as a matter of legislative choice or discretion."); League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 430, 126 S. Ct. 2594, 165 L. Ed. 2d 609 (2006) (LULAC) ("To be sure, [Section] 2 *1003 does not forbid the creation of a noncompact majority-minority district.").

¶23 Because the WVRA contemplates a broader range of remedies than Section 2, a WVRA plaintiff can state a redressable injury under a broader range of circumstances 641 than a Section 2 plaintiff. This is reflected in the elements required to prove a WVRA claim.

¶24 Similar to Section 2, the WVRA requires the plaintiff to show that "[e]lections in the political subdivision exhibit polarized voting." RCW 29A.92.030(1)(a). This requirement corresponds to the second and third Gingles factors, discussed above: "the minority group must be able to show that it is politically cohesive" and that the "majority [group] votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 51; see RCW 29A.92.010(3). The WVRA is also similar to Section 2 in placing the ultimate burden on the plaintiff to prove that "[m]embers of a protected class or classes do not have an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice as a result of the dilution or abridgment of the rights of members of that protected class or classes." RCW 29A.92.030(1)(b); cf. 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b).

¶25 However, unlike Section 2, the WVRA specifically rejects the first Gingles factor as a threshold requirement: "The fact that members of a protected class are not geographically compact or concentrated to constitute a majority in a proposed or existing district-based election district shall not preclude a finding of a violation under this chapter." RCW 29A.92.030(2). Contra Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50. Instead, the WVRA provides that geographical compactness "may be a factor in determining a remedy." RCW 29A.92.030(2) (emphasis added).

[17] ¶26 Thus, if the plaintiff in a WVRA case seeks the creation of a so-called "majority-minority" district, they may be required at the remedy stage to show that the minority group is sufficiently geographically compact to constitute a majority in the proposed district—just as a Section 2 plaintiff would need to do at the threshold stage. Cf. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50 & n.17. By contrast, if the plaintiff in a WVRA case seeks only the implementation of a ranked choice voting system for at-large elections, a showing of geographical compactness would be both irrelevant and unnecessary at any stage.

642 D. Enforcement of the WVRA

¶27 The WVRA includes two mechanisms to promote compliance: voluntary changes by political subdivisions and challenges by local voters.

¶28 A political subdivision may voluntarily "change its electoral system ... to remedy a potential violation" of the WVRA. RCW 29A.92.040(1). If the political subdivision wishes to draw or redraw its election districts, then it must comply with specific criteria. RCW 29A.92.050(3). In addition, before implementing any voluntary changes, "the political subdivision must provide public notice" and "hold at least one public hearing." RCW 29A.92.050(1)(a)-(b).

¶29 Local voters may also "challenge a political subdivision's electoral system" for alleged WVRA violations. RCW 29A.92.060(1). The voter must "first notify the political subdivision," which must work with the voter "in good faith." Id.; RCW 29A.92.070(1). If the political subdivision wishes to implement a remedy at this stage, it must "seek a court order acknowledging that the ... remedy complies with RCW 29A.92.020 and was prompted by a plausible violation." RCW 29A.92.070(2). There is "a rebuttable presumption that the court will decline to approve the political subdivision's proposed remedy." Id.

¶30 If a political subdivision receives notice of an alleged WVRA violation but fails to implement a court-approved remedy within a specified time frame, then "any voter who resides in [the] political subdivision ... may file an action" in superior court. RCW 29A.92.090(1). Such an action is subject to the WVRA's provisions on venue, time for trial, statute of limitations, and similar issues. See RCW 29A.92.090-.100. If the trial court finds that the political subdivision has violated the WVRA, then it "may order appropriate remedies," as discussed above. RCW 29A.92.110(1). Once the political subdivision *1004 implements a court-approved remedy, it is largely shielded from WVRA challenges for the next four years. See RCW 29A.92.070(3), .080(3), .120(1).

643 ¶31 Since the WVRA was enacted in 2018, several political subdivisions have made changes to their electoral systems. However, this will be the first time that any Washington appellate court addresses the WVRA.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

¶32 This case arises from a voter-initiated challenge to Franklin County's system for electing its three-member board of commissioners. Franklin County is located in southeastern Washington, with its county seat in the city of Pasco. Find Us, Franklin County, https://www.franklincountywa.gov/508/Find-Us (last visited June 5, 2023). About 54 percent of the county's total population is "Hispanic or Latino."[12] QuickFacts, Franklin County, Washington, U.S. Census Bureau, https://www.census.gov/quickfacts/franklincountywashington (last visited June 5, 2023). "Latino citizens make up over one third, or 34.4%, of Franklin County's citizen voting age population." CP at 5.

A. The plaintiffs notify Franklin County of an alleged WVRA violation and ultimately file suit

¶33 Prior to this case, Franklin County used "a 'hybrid' election system," which combined district-based primaries with at-large general elections:

> [P]otential candidates [ran] in their respective districts and the top two candidates proceed[ed] to the general election. The general election [was] then conducted as an at-large election, in which all voters in the County cast votes to seat a county commissioner in each seat the year that position is up for election.

644 Id. at 1010. In October 2020, counsel for the plaintiffs[13] sent Franklin County a notice alleging that its electoral system violated the WVRA.

¶34 According to the plaintiffs' notice, the county's "at-large general elections for commissioners prevent Latinos from electing a candidate of choice" and "Franklin County has diluted the Latino community's votes by cracking the population into different districts." Id. at 116-17. The notice further alleged that "as a result of the County's discriminatory electoral scheme, there are no Latino preferred candidates currently serving on the Franklin County Board of Commissioners, nor has there ever been one elected to serve on the commission." Id. at 116.

¶35 Franklin County did not take remedial action within the then applicable six-month time frame. See RCW 29A.92.080(1). The plaintiffs subsequently filed a WVRA claim in Franklin County Superior Court against Franklin County and each member of the Franklin County Board of Commissioners (Clint Didier, Rodney J. Mullen, and Lowell B. Peck) in their official capacities.

B. James Gimenez intervenes to defend Franklin County's electoral system

¶36 The procedural history of this litigation is fairly complicated, but many of the details are irrelevant to our review. To briefly summarize, the plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment on the issue of whether Franklin County's electoral system violated the WVRA. The defendants conceded the WVRA violation because they could not make a contrary argument "in good faith." CP at 170. The trial court granted partial summary judgment and ordered the parties to "work cooperatively together on the development 645 of the district map." Id. at 259. However, this *1005 order was vacated shortly after it was entered.

¶37 Three days after the trial court granted partial summary judgment, Gimenez moved to intervene to defend Franklin County's existing electoral system, alleging that the plaintiffs lack standing and that the WVRA is facially unconstitutional. One week later, the Franklin County Board of Commissioners adopted a resolution directing the county prosecutor to "seek reconsideration of the order granting Summary Judgement [sic]." Id. at 275. As directed, the prosecutor moved to vacate the summary judgment order, asserting that the "Board of Commissioners never authorized or gave direction in an open public meeting to the Franklin County Prosecutor to stipulate to an order granting summary judgment in favor of the Plaintiffs." Id. at 318.

¶38 Over the plaintiffs' objections, the trial court granted the defendants' motion to vacate and Gimenez's motion to intervene.

C. The trial court denies Gimenez's motion to dismiss and approves the parties' CR 2A settlement agreement

¶39 After his motion to intervene was granted, Gimenez immediately moved for dismissal pursuant to CR 12(c), arguing that the plaintiffs lack standing and that the WVRA is facially invalid. The trial court denied Gimenez's CR 12(c) motion on its merits.

¶40 The plaintiffs subsequently filed a second motion for partial summary judgment. As they had done in their first motion, the plaintiffs sought a ruling that Franklin County's electoral system violated the WVRA, leaving only "the question of an appropriate remedial map" for trial. Id. at 682. The defendants initially opposed summary judgment, but the parties ultimately entered into a CR 2A settlement agreement, "which was ratified by Defendant Commissioners in a Franklin County commissioner meeting." Id. at 1288.

646 ¶41 The settlement agreement allowed Franklin County to use a district map that its board of commissioners had already "approved and adopted" following the 2020 U.S. Census. Id. at 1292. However, "[b]eginning with the 2024 election cycle, all future elections for the office of Franklin County Commissioner will be conducted under a single-member district election system for both primary and general elections." Id. The plaintiffs also agreed to accept a reduced award of attorney fees and costs from the defendants. Over Gimenez's objection, the trial court approved the parties' CR 2A settlement and dismissed the plaintiffs' claims with prejudice.

¶42 Gimenez appealed directly to this court. The plaintiffs opposed Gimenez's arguments on the merits, but they agreed that direct review was appropriate. We retained the case for a decision on the merits and accepted six amici briefs for filing.[14] We have not received any appellate filings from Franklin County or any member of the Franklin County Board of Commissioners.

ISSUES

¶43 A. Do the plaintiffs have standing to bring a WVRA claim?

¶44 B. Did the legislature repeal the WVRA by implication?

¶45 C. Does the WVRA facially violate the privileges and immunities clause of article I, section 12 of the Washington Constitution?

¶46 D. Does the WVRA facially violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution?

647 ¶47 E. Should we reach the additional issues raised by plaintiffs and amici?

¶48 F. Should we grant the plaintiffs' request for attorney fees and costs?

*1006 ANALYSIS

¶49 Each of Gimenez's arguments is based on his interpretation of the WVRA's definition of a "protected class." He believes that this definition protects some racial groups, while excluding others. As a result, Gimenez believes that the WVRA requires local governments to implement electoral systems that favor some racial groups, while disfavoring others.

[18] ¶50 Statutory interpretation is a matter of law, so our review is de novo. Woods v. Seattle's Union Gospel Mission, 197 Wn.2d 231, 238, 481 P.3d 1060 (2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 1094 (2022). We reject Gimenez's interpretation of the WVRA. The plain language of the statute and basic principles of statutory interpretation show that the WVRA protects all Washington voters from discrimination on the basis of race, color, and language minority group. Therefore, the plaintiffs in this case have standing and the WVRA has not been repealed by implication.

[19] [20] [21] ¶51 Gimenez's constitutional challenges to the WVRA are also subject to de novo review. Id. "We presume statutes are constitutional, and the party challenging constitutionality bears the burden of proving otherwise." Id. at 239. Because Gimenez makes facial challenges, his arguments "must be rejected unless there is 'no set of circumstances in which the statute ... can constitutionally be applied.' " Id. at 240 (quoting In re Det. of Turay, 139 Wn.2d 379, 417 n.27, 986 P.2d 790 (1999)). The WVRA can clearly be applied in a manner that does not violate article I, section 12 because, on its face, the WVRA does not grant any privilege or immunity to any class of citizens.

648 [22] ¶52 Finally, contrary to Gimenez's view, his federal equal protection claim does not trigger strict scrutiny because the WVRA, on its face, does not "create racial classifications." Contra Br. of Appellant at 17. Strict scrutiny could certainly be triggered in an as-applied challenge to "districting maps that sort voters on the basis of race" or to some other "race-based sorting of voters." Wis. Legislature v. Wis. Elections Comm'n, 595 U.S. ___, 142 S. Ct. 1245, 1248, 212 L. Ed. 2d 251 (2022) (per curiam). However, on its face, the WVRA requires "equal opportunit[ies]" for voters of all races, colors, and language minority groups, not race-based sorting of voters. RCW 29A.92.020.

¶53 Gimenez appears to argue that the WVRA makes "racial classifications" by recognizing the existence of race, color, and language minority groups and prohibiting discrimination on that basis. Br. of Appellant at 17. He also appears to argue that the WVRA must favor some racial groups and disfavor others because "[e]lections are quintessentially zero-sum." Id. at 53. We cannot agree. If Gimenez's position were correct, then every statute prohibiting racial discrimination or mandating equal voting rights would be subject to facial equal protection challenges triggering strict scrutiny. No authority supports that position. Therefore, we hold that Gimenez's equal protection claim triggers only rational basis review, which the WVRA easily satisfies on its face.

¶54 We grant the plaintiffs' request for attorney fees in part. We award fees and costs incurred at trial and on appeal against Gimenez, and we remand to the trial court for a calculation of the fees and costs incurred at the trial court. However, we decline the plaintiffs' request to assess fees against Commissioner Didier.

A. The plaintiffs have standing

¶55 According to Gimenez, the WVRA's protections simply do not apply to members of a race, color, or language minority group that comprises a numerical majority of the 649 total population in their local jurisdiction. Slightly over 50 percent of Franklin County's total population is Latinx. Therefore, according to Gimenez, it is impossible for any Latinx voter in Franklin County to have standing to bring a WRVA claim, unless they happen to be a member of some other protected class. The trial court rejected Gimenez's interpretation and ruled that the plaintiffs have standing. We affirm.

*1007 1. The plain statutory language and principles of statutory interpretation show that the WVRA's protections apply to all Washington voters

[23] ¶56 The plain meaning of the WVRA applies to all Washington voters. As discussed above, the WVRA prohibits voting discrimination against "members of a protected class or classes." RCW 29A.92.020. A "protected class" is "a class of voters who are members of a race, color, or language minority group." RCW 29A.92.010(5). Everyone can be a member of a race or races, everyone has a color, and "language minority group" includes ethnic groups that might otherwise be wrongfully excluded—"persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives or of Spanish heritage."[15] 52 U.S.C. § 10310(c)(3). As a result, every Washington voter is a member of at least one protected class, so every Washington voter is protected by the WVRA.

650 [24] ¶57 The statute's plain meaning is confirmed by "traditional rules of grammar." PeaceHealth St. Joseph Med. Ctr. v. Dep't of Revenue, 196 Wn.2d 1, 8, 468 P.3d 1056 (2020). For instance, "[w]hen evaluating the language of a statute, we apply the last antecedent rule" absent evidence of a contrary legislative intent. City of Spokane v. Spokane County, 158 Wn.2d 661, 673, 146 P.3d 893 (2006). The last antecedent rule shows that "minority group" modifies only "language," not "race" or "color." See id.; RCW 29A.92.010(5). If the legislature had intended otherwise, then the WVRA would refer to "racial" groups, not "race" groups.

[25] ¶58 Principles of statutory interpretation further confirm that the WVRA " 'says what it means and means what it says.' " City of Seattle v. Long, 198 Wn.2d 136, 149, 493 P.3d 94 (2021) (quoting State v. Costich, 152 Wn.2d 463, 470, 98 P.3d 795 (2004)). Statutory language must be interpreted in "the context of the statute, related provisions, and the statutory scheme as a whole." Id. at 148. The WVRA recognizes that voters must have an "equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice." RCW 29A.92.020, .030(1)(b) (emphasis added). Equality would not be possible if the WVRA protected the members of some racial groups and excluded others. Moreover, the WVRA does not say that a political subdivision's electoral system may be challenged by "minorities," "minority voters," "minority groups," or anything similar. Instead, the WVRA allows for a challenge by "any voter who resides in a political subdivision where a violation of RCW 29A.92.020 is alleged."[16] RCW 29A.92.090(1) (emphasis added).

[26] ¶59 In addition, as the trial court correctly ruled, Gimenez's narrow statutory interpretation is inconsistent with the WVRA's remedial purpose. "Ultimately, in resolving a question of statutory construction, this court will adopt the interpretation which best advances the legislative purpose." Bennett v. Hardy, 113 Wn.2d 912, 928, 784 P.2d 1258 (1990). 651 The stated legislative purpose of the WVRA is to prohibit "electoral systems that deny race, color, or language minority groups an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice." RCW 29A.92.005. It would improperly frustrate this purpose to hold that the WVRA's protections are inapplicable to many Washington voters, as Gimenez claims.

1008 ¶60 Finally, we consider persuasive authority from California and federal courts. The WVRA's definition of a protected class is identical to the definition of a protected class in California's voting rights act. Compare RCW 29A.92.010(5), with Cal. Elec. Code § 14026(d). In 2006, the California Court of Appeals recognized that this definition "simply gives a cause of action to members of any racial or ethnic group that can establish that its members' votes are diluted." Sanchez v. City of Modesto, 145 Cal. App. 4th 660, 666, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 821 (2006). The WVRA adopted the same definition 12 years later.

[27] ¶61 If our legislature intended to enact a different definition of a protected class, it had ample time to change the language. Instead, our legislature adopted California's definition verbatim. Absent "contrary legislative intent, when a state statute is 'taken substantially verbatim' " from another jurisdiction, " 'it carries the same construction.' " Anfinson v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 174 Wn.2d 851, 868, 281 P.3d 289 (2012) (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting State v. Bobic, 140 Wn.2d 250, 264, 996 P.2d 610 (2000)). Thus, California's broad interpretation of the definition of a protected class is highly persuasive when interpreting the same language in the WVRA.

¶62 In addition, "courts may rely on relevant federal case law for guidance" when interpreting the WVRA. RCW 29A.92.010. As the California Court of Appeals explained, "In a variety of contexts, the [United States] Supreme Court has held that the term 'race' is expansive and covers all ethnic and racial groups." Sanchez, 145 Cal. App. 4th at 684. Notably, the Supreme Court has held that the Fifteenth *652 Amendment's prohibition on "deny[ing] or abridg[ing] the right to vote on account of race ... grants protection to all persons, not just members of a particular race." Rice v. Cayetano, 528 U.S. 495, 512, 120 S. Ct. 1044, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1007 (2000) (emphasis added).

¶63 Like the United States Supreme Court, this court has previously refused to apply narrow definitions when deciding whether a person is protected from discrimination on the basis of "race." See State v. Zamora, 199 Wn.2d 698, 704 n.6, 512 P.3d 512 (2022) (quoting Peña-Rodriguez v. Colorado, 580 U.S. 206, 214, 137 S. Ct. 855, 197 L. Ed. 2d 107 (2017)). We decline to change our approach now. Instead, we apply the plain statutory language and hold that the WVRA's protections apply to all Washington voters.

2. We decline Gimenez's invitation to rewrite the statute

[28] ¶64 Gimenez acknowledges that it is both "plausible" and "grammatically permissible" to interpret the WVRA as protecting all Washington voters. Br. of Appellant at 13-14. Nevertheless, he argues that we must restructure and rewrite the statute as follows:

> "U.S.'Protected class' means
>
> (a) a class of voters who are members of a race minority group; or
>
> (b) a class of voters who are members of a color minority group; or
>
> (c) a class of voters who are members of a language minority group, as this class is referenced and defined in the federal voting rights act, 52 U.S.C. 10301 et seq."

Id. at 10 (underlining added). "Courts may not 'rewrite unambiguous statutory language under the guise of interpretation.' " State v. Hawkins, 200 Wn.2d 477, 492, 519 P.3d 182 (2022) (quoting Jespersen v. Clark County, 199 Wn. App. 568, 578, 399 P.3d 1209 (2017)). However, Gimenez argues that this court must judicially rewrite the WVRA. He is incorrect.

*653 ¶65 First, Gimenez points to the WVRA's statement of legislative findings and intent, which appears to use "minority groups" as a shorthand for "race, color, or language minority groups." RCW 29A.92.005. However, there is no indication that this was intended to exclude certain racial groups from the WVRA's protections. Indeed, the stand-alone phrase "minority groups" is not defined (or even used) anywhere else in the WVRA.

[29] ¶66 It would be both absurd and contrary to precedent to hold that the statement of legislative findings negates the plain language of the WVRA's operative provisions. "Declarations of intent are not controlling; 1009 instead, they serve 'only as an important guide in determining the intended effect of the operative sections.'U.S." State v. Reis, 183 Wn.2d 197, 212, 351 P.3d 127 (2015) (quoting Kilian v. Atkinson, 147 Wn.2d 16, 23, 50 P.3d 638 (2002) (plurality opinion)). The legislature may have found that minority groups would benefit from the WVRA, but that does not mean the legislature intended to exclude everyone else.

¶67 Next, Gimenez appears to argue that the WVRA cannot be intended to protect all racial groups because it is "impossible" for a majority group to experience voting discrimination. Br. of Appellant at 26. According to Gimenez, "if the 'protected class' constitutes a majority of the political subdivision ... it would not lack an equal opportunity to elect candidates of choice due to vote dilution within that subdivision." Id. at 25-26 (emphasis omitted).

[30] ¶68 In this argument, Gimenez appears to assume that the WVRA recognizes only vote dilution claims. To the contrary, as discussed above, the WVRA prohibits both "dilution" and "abridgment" of voting rights on the basis of race, color, or language minority group. RCW 29A.92.020. Abridgment of the right to vote can occur regardless of which racial group is in the majority.

¶69 For instance, abridgment would likely be found if voting registration officials "administered literacy tests to Mexican-American members of the plaintiffs' class more 654 frequently, more carefully, and more stringently than they have administered them to other persons, including Anglo-Americans whose ability to read and speak English is imperfect or limited." Mexican-Am. Fed'n-Wash. State v. Naff, 299 F. Supp. 587, 593 (E.D. Wash. 1969), judgment vacated sub nom. Jimenez v. Naff, 400 U.S. 986 (1971); see also 1967 Op. Att'y Gen. No. 21. "Indeed, the most egregious examples of Jim Crow era voter suppression—such as poll taxes and literacy tests—were specifically designed to prevent Black majorities from participating in elections." Amicus Br. of State of Wash. at 11-12 (citing Brad Epperly et al., Rule by Violence, Rule by Law: Lynching, Jim Crow, and the Continuing Evolution of Voter Suppression in the U.S., 18 Persps. on Pol. 756, 761-64 (2020)).

¶70 Moreover, it is entirely possible to dilute the voting power of majority groups through the manipulation of district lines. The United States Supreme Court has already explained how:

> Assume a hypothetical jurisdiction of 1,000 voters divided into 10 districts of 100 each, where members of a minority group make up 40 percent of the voting population and voting is totally polarized along racial lines. With the right geographic dispersion to satisfy the compactness requirement, and with careful manipulation of district lines, the minority voters might be placed in control of as many as 7 of the 10 districts.

Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1016, 114 S. Ct. 2647, 129 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1994). Thus, to the extent that Gimenez believes that the WVRA does not protect majority groups because they do not need the WVRA's protection, he is simply incorrect.

[31] ¶71 In sum, the WVRA means exactly what it says. All Washington voters are protected from discrimination on the basis of race, color, or language minority group. That includes the plaintiffs. Therefore, the trial court correctly ruled that the plaintiffs have standing to bring their WVRA claim.

655 B. The WVRA has not been repealed by implication

¶72 Next, Gimenez argues that the WVRA gives minority groups the exclusive "right to sue to compel redistricting, and require[s] the county to favor the racial group which sued in drawing new district lines." Br. of Appellant at 17-18. He contends that this irreconcilably conflicts with RCW 29A.76.010(4)(d), which provides that when a county engages in periodic redistricting after a census, "[p]opulation data may not be used for purposes of favoring or disfavoring any racial group or political party." Due to this alleged conflict, Gimenez believes that every time RCW 29A.76.010 was amended, the WVRA was implicitly repealed, at least as applied to counties. He is incorrect. The WVRA neither requires nor allows the kind *1010 of race-based favoritism that RCW 29A.76.010(4)(d) prohibits.

¶73 First, as discussed above, the WVRA's protections apply to all Washington voters, and all Washington voters have standing to bring a WVRA challenge. The WVRA does not compel race-based favoritism; it explicitly requires "an equal opportunity" in local elections for voters of all races, colors, and language minority groups. RCW 29A.92.020.

¶74 Second, contrary to Gimenez's interpretation, a political subdivision cannot be compelled to do anything pursuant to the WVRA based on the "single factor" of "racially polarized voting, i.e., the fact that voters of different races tend to vote for different candidates." Contra Br. of Appellant at 45. In fact, the plain language of the WVRA provides that a plaintiff must prove both that "[e]lections in the political subdivision exhibit polarized voting" and that "[m]embers of a protected class or classes do not have an equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice as a result of the dilution or abridgment of the rights of members of that protected class or classes." RCW 29A.92.030(1)(a)-(b). Thus, the WVRA does not require local governments to favor "race minority 'haves' " at the expense of "race majority 'have-nots.' " Contra Reply Br. of Appellant at 656 18. The WVRA does not compel local governments to do anything based on race. Instead, the WVRA may compel local governments to change their electoral systems to remedy proven racial discrimination.

¶75 Gimenez appears to believe that actions to remedy proven racial discrimination are indistinguishable from actions based on race alone. He also argues that the WVRA actually "forbids consideration of ... past discrimination" because the WVRA does not require "[p]roof of intent on the part of the voters or elected officials to discriminate against a protected class." Br. of Appellant at 4 (emphasis added); RCW 29A.92.030(5). We disagree. On its face, the WVRA simply codifies the following, indisputable propositions:

¶76 (1) Voters can be "members of a race, color, or language minority group." RCW 29A.92.010(5). Recognizing the existence of race, color, and language minority groups does not, in itself, "create racial classifications." Contra Br. of Appellant at 17. See U.S. Const. amend. XV; 52 U.S.C. §§ 10301(a), 10303(f)(2).

¶77 (2) "Polarized voting" is possible. RCW 29A.92.010(3). Recognizing the possibility of racially polarized voting is neither novel nor unique to the WVRA. See generally Gingles, 478 U.S. 30. Moreover, even where polarized voting is proved to exist, that is not sufficient, by itself, to prove a WVRA violation. RCW 29A.92.030(1).

¶78 (3) A combination of polarized voting and "dilution or abridgment" of voting rights can deprive members of a race, color, or language minority group of an "equal opportunity to elect candidates of their choice" in local elections. RCW 29A.92.030(1)(b); cf. U.S. Const. amend. XV; 52 U.S.C. §§ 10301, 10303(f)(2).

¶79 (4) Where a class of voters has been deprived of equal electoral opportunities on the basis of race, color, or language minority group, the law can provide a remedy based on "discriminatory effect alone," even in the absence of discriminatory intent. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 35; see U.S. Const. amend. XV, § 2; 52 U.S.C. §§ 10301, 10303(f)(2).

657 [32] ¶80 We hold that the WVRA does not irreconcilably conflict with RCW 29A.76.010(4)(d) because on its face, the WVRA requires equality, not race-based favoritism, in electoral systems. Thus, the legislature has not implicitly repealed the WVRA.

C. The WVRA does not facially violate article I, section 12

¶81 Next, Gimenez argues that the WVRA violates article I, section 12 on its face because "it grants to a specific identified class the right and privilege to have county commissioner boundaries drawn so that members of that identified class—but not the public at large, or members of other definable classes—can elect a 'candidate of choice.' " Br. of Appellant at 52. As detailed above, Gimenez fundamentally misinterprets what *1011 the WVRA says and does. We therefore reject his article I, section 12 argument.

[33] [34] ¶82 " 'For a violation of article I, section 12 to occur, the law ... must confer a privilege to a class of citizens.' " Madison v. State, 161 Wn.2d 85, 95, 163 P.3d 757 (2007) (plurality opinion) (quoting Grant County Fire Prot. Dist. No. 5 v. City of Moses Lake, 150 Wn.2d 791, 812, 83 P.3d 419 (2004)). The WVRA does not confer any privilege to any class of citizens. Instead, the WVRA protects the "equal opportunity" of voters of all races, colors, and language minority groups "to elect candidates of their choice." RCW 29A.92.020, .030(1)(b) (emphasis added). Therefore, all Washington voters have equal rights to challenge their local governments for alleged WVRA violations. If, in some future case, the WVRA is applied or interpreted in a way that grants privileges to some racial groups while excluding others, then the WVRA will be subject to an as-applied challenge. But on its face, the WVRA simply does not implicate article I, section 12.

D. The WVRA does not facially violate the equal protection clause

[35] [36] ¶83 Finally, Gimenez argues that the WVRA facially violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth 658 Amendment because the WVRA cannot survive strict scrutiny. However, as explained above, the WVRA on its face does not classify voters on the basis of race, nor does it deprive anyone of the fundamental right to vote. Instead, the WVRA mandates equal voting opportunities for members of every race, color, and language minority group. Therefore, Gimenez's facial equal protection claim triggers rational basis review, not strict scrutiny. Cf. Madison, 161 Wn.2d at 103. Rational basis review is satisfied if "there is a rational relationship between" the WVRA "and any legitimate governmental interests." Id. at 106.

[37] [38] ¶84 To the extent that Gimenez's equal protection argument is based on his misinterpretation of the WVRA, we reject it. The WVRA's mandate for equal voting opportunities is clearly rationally related to the State's legitimate interest in protecting Washington voters from discrimination. "[A] law directing state actors to provide equal protection is (to say the least) facially neutral, and cannot violate the Constitution." Schuette v. Coal. to Def. Affirmative Action, 572 U.S. 291, 318, 134 S. Ct. 1623, 188 L. Ed. 2d 613 (2014) (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment).

¶85 Gimenez further points out, correctly, that Section 2 of the FVRA has a threshold requirement for vote dilution claims that the WVRA does not have. As discussed above, before a federal court will reach the merits of a Section 2 vote dilution claim, a "group must be able to demonstrate that it is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50. By contrast, the WVRA provides that "[t]he fact that members of a protected class are not geographically compact or concentrated to constitute a majority in a proposed or existing district-based election district shall not preclude a finding of a violation under this chapter, but may be a factor in determining a remedy." RCW 29A.92.030(2).

¶86 Gimenez argues that the WVRA is unconstitutional on its face because "[w]ithout the compactness precondition, the [United States] Supreme Court has made clear, 659 Section 2 could never" satisfy the equal protection clause. Br. of Appellant at 40-41. However, he does not cite a single case—from any court—that actually says what he claims. Instead, Gimenez relies on cases addressing as-applied challenges to specific redistricting plans based on allegations of racial gerrymandering. See id. at 37-50.[17] These *1012 cases consistently hold that Section 2 requires a threshold showing of compactness in a vote dilution claim. E.g., Strickland, 556 U.S. at 10-16, 20-21; Emison, 507 U.S. at 40-41. However, Gimenez cites no case holding that the equal protection clause imposes the same requirement in every voting discrimination claim.

¶87 Without a doubt, the WVRA could be applied in an unconstitutional manner, and it is subject to as-applied challenges. However, Gimenez did not bring an as-applied challenge. He brought a facial challenge. As detailed above, the WVRA, on its face, does not require unconstitutional actions.

¶88 Moreover, as amici point out, "entire pages of Gimenez's argument on this point are word-for-word identical" to the briefing from a recent challenge to California's voting rights act. Br. of Law Sch. Clinics Focused on C.R. as Amici Curiae at 14 n.1. Compare Br. of Appellant at 37-43, with Appellant's Opening Br. at 3-7, 32, Higginson v. Becerra, No. 19-55275 (9th Cir. June 17, 2019), and Pet. for Writ of Cert. at 4-6, Higginson v. Becerra, No. 19-1199 (U.S. Apr. 2, 2020). The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the arguments Gimenez makes here and the United States 660 Supreme Court denied certiorari. Higginson v. Becerra, 786 F. App'x 705 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2807 (2020). Gimenez does not explain why we should reach a different conclusion based on the same arguments.

¶89 Finally, even under federal law, the threshold compactness requirement applies only in the specific context of a vote dilution claim. It does not apply to all voting rights cases. As the United States Supreme Court has explained:

> The reason that a minority group making such a [vote dilution] challenge must show, as a threshold matter, that it is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district is this: Unless minority voters possess the potential to elect representatives in the absence of the challenged structure or practice, they cannot claim to have been injured by that structure or practice.

Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50 n.17.

¶90 The WVRA protects voters from all forms of abridgment, not just dilution. Gimenez does not explain why a group must demonstrate compactness to prove that their voting rights have been abridged by, for instance, the discriminatory administration of literacy tests. See Mexican-Am. Fed'n, 299 F. Supp. 587. Thus, even if the equal protection clause does require a threshold compactness inquiry for a vote dilution claim, that would not make the WVRA facially unconstitutional. At most, the WVRA would be unconstitutional as applied in the context of vote dilution claims. Gimenez did not bring an as-applied challenge.

¶91 Gimenez argues that he cannot be required to prove that the WVRA is unconstitutional in all of its potential applications "because it is impossible to explore and describe every possible circumstance" that might arise. Reply Br. of Appellant at 9. However, that is the standard that applies to a facial constitutional challenge in accordance with this court's controlling precedent. Woods, 197 Wn.2d at 240. Gimenez does not show that our precedent is "U.S.'incorrect and harmful' " or that its " 'legal underpinnings' " have 661 changed. State v. Otton, 185 Wn.2d 673, 678, 374 P.3d 1108 (2016) (quoting In re Rts. to Waters of Stranger Creek, 77 Wn.2d 649, 653, 466 P.2d 508 (1970); W.G. Clark Constr. Co.

v. Pac. Nw. Reg'l Council of Carpenters, 180 Wn.2d 54, 66, 322 P.3d 1207 (2014)).

¶92 Therefore, because it is impossible for Gimenez to show that the WVRA is unconstitutional in all of its potential applications, his facial equal protection challenge to the WVRA must be rejected.

E. We decline to reach the additional issues raised by the plaintiffs and amici

¶93 As detailed above, each of Gimenez's arguments fails on its merits. We affirm the trial court on that basis alone. We therefore decline to reach the alternative arguments *1013 raised by the plaintiffs and amici concerning RCW 7.24.110 and Gimenez's standing to appeal.[18]

F. We award the plaintiffs' request for attorney fees and costs against Gimenez and remand for a calculation of fees incurred at the trial court

¶94 Finally, the plaintiffs request attorney fees and costs based on the WVRA, as well as the statutes and court rules governing frivolous claims. We need not decide whether Gimenez's claims are frivolous. Instead, we award the plaintiffs' request for fees against Gimenez pursuant to the WVRA.

662 [39] ¶95 The WVRA allows, but does not require, an award of "reasonable attorneys' fees, all nonattorney fee costs as defined by RCW 4.84.010, and all reasonable expert witness fees" to "the prevailing plaintiff or plaintiffs, other than the state or political subdivision thereof." RCW 29A.92.130(1). Here, the plaintiffs are the prevailing parties, they are not the state or a political subdivision, and Gimenez's appeal forced the plaintiffs to spend an entire year litigating this case after Franklin County settled their WVRA claim. We therefore exercise our discretion to award the plaintiffs' request for fees and costs attributable to their litigation against Gimenez.[19]

¶96 The plaintiffs request their appellate attorney fees, as well as "a fee award at trial" for the "time and expense incurred litigating with Gimenez." Br. of Resp'ts at 52 & n.16. The WVRA's fee provision is explicitly discretionary, providing that "the court may allow" fees to a prevailing, nongovernmental plaintiff. RCW 29A.92.130(1) (emphasis added). Thus, we grant both trial and appellate fees, but we remand the calculation of trial court fees to the trial court's discretion.

1. The WVRA's fee provision is constitutional

¶97 Gimenez argues that we cannot assess fees against him because "it is unconstitutional to permit a group of lawyers who are funded by another state's government[20] to collect fees from an individual Washington Hispanic citizen because of his exercise of his fundamental right to access the state courts and petition the government." Reply Br. of Appellant at 26. However, he misrepresents the authorities he cites to support this argument.

¶98 Gimenez relies primarily on 663 Miller v. Bonta, No. 22cv1446-BEN(JLB), 2022 WL 17811114, 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 228197 (S.D. Cal. 2022) (court order). According to Gimenez, Miller considered "a California punitive fee-shifting provision such as this one that Plaintiffs seek to exercise" in this case, and "the California attorney general refused to even defend such a statute." Reply Br. of Appellant at 26. In fact, the statute in Miller was nothing like the fee provision in the WVRA.

¶99 The fee-shifting statute in Miller "applie[d] only to cases challenging firearm restrictions." 2022 WL 17811114, at *1, 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 228197, at *3. The statute "insulate[d] laws from judicial review by permitting fee awards in favor of the government, tilting the table in the government's favor, and making a plaintiff's attorney jointly and severally liable for fee awards." 2022 WL 17811114, at *1, 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 228197, at *3. The statute also provided that "[a]s a matter of law, a California plaintiff *1014 cannot be a prevailing party." 2022 WL 17811114, at *1, 2022 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 228197, at *3. The WVRA, by contrast, allows prevailing plaintiffs to recover fees, but only if they are not the government. RCW 29A.92.130(1). Moreover, the WVRA does not "tilt the table" in favor of any government entity, and it does not automatically make any party's attorney jointly and severally liable for fees. Miller simply does not apply here.

¶100 Gimenez also suggests that applying the WVRA's fee provision in this case would violate Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 91 S. Ct. 780, 28 L. Ed. 2d 113 (1971). Boddie struck down "state procedures for the commencement of litigation, including requirements for payment of court fees and costs for service of process, that restrict[ed the appellants'] access to the courts in their effort to bring an action for divorce." Id. at 372. The WVRA's prevailing party fee provision applies at the conclusion of an action, not its commencement. Boddie does not apply.

664 2. We decline to assess fees against Commissioner Didier

[40] ¶101 Finally, the plaintiffs argue that "Commissioner Didier, who is a named party in the suit in their official capacity, should also be held responsible for any fee award where he was in cahoots with Gimenez's action designed to torpedo the WVRA settlement." Br. of Resp'ts at 54-55. We decline to assess fees against Commissioner Didier.

¶102 To be sure, there is significant evidence in the record supporting the plaintiffs' factual allegations. Initially, Commissioner Didier planned to intervene in his personal capacity to challenge the validity of the WVRA. However, after the plaintiffs questioned how a named defendant could also be an intervenor, Gimenez intervened instead. Gimenez has at all times been represented by the same attorney who had originally intended to represent Commissioner Didier in his personal capacity.

¶103 Thus, the plaintiffs may be correct that "Commissioner Didier's involvement in Gimenez's intervention was transparent to all those involved in the matter." Id. at 55. Indeed, the trial court's order denying Gimenez's CR 12(c) motion begins by stating, "This matter came before the court for hearing on December 13, 2021 on Intervenor, Clint Didier's, Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings." CP at 678 (emphasis added). However, that appears to be a typo, not a finding of fact. The plaintiffs do not cite any trial court findings that Commissioner Didier is the real party behind Gimenez's intervention or appeal.

¶104 This court is not a fact-finding court. Moreover, the plaintiffs settled their claims with the defendants, including Commissioner Didier, and Commissioner Didier has not filed anything on appeal. We therefore decline to assess fees against Commissioner Didier based on the plaintiffs' allegations. We express no opinion as to whether Gimenez may have viable claims against Commissioner Didier or anyone else arising from this litigation.

665 CONCLUSION

¶105 All of Gimenez's arguments are based on his interpretation of the WVRA's definition of a protected class. His interpretation is incorrect. We therefore affirm the trial court, award attorney fees and costs to the plaintiffs against Gimenez, and remand for a calculation of fees incurred at the trial court.

González, C.J.; Johnson, Madsen, Owens, Stephens, Gordon McCloud, and Montoya-Lewis, JJ.; and Judge, J. Pro Tem., concur.

References Annotated Revised Code of Washington by LexisNexis United States Code Service (USCS) by LexisNexis

All Citations

1 Wash.3d 629, 530 P.3d 994

Footnotes

1 The legislature amended the WVRA while this appeal was pending, effective January 1, 2024. See Laws of 2023, ch. 56, § 14. This opinion does not address those amendments.

2 When referring to the race or ethnicity of specific individuals, this opinion uses the terminology used by that individual. When quoting from another source, this opinion uses the terminology from the source material. Otherwise, this opinion uses gender-neutral terminology.

3 "Language minority group" is a term that is "referenced and defined in the federal voting rights act [of 1965 (FVRA)], 52 U.S.C. 10301 et seq." RCW 29A.92.010(5). The FVRA, in turn, defines "language minority group" as "persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives or of Spanish heritage." 52 U.S.C. § 10310(c)(3).

4 We decline to reach the plaintiffs' argument that Gimenez failed to comply with RCW 7.24.110 and amici's argument that Gimenez lacks standing to appeal as a matter of right.

5 As discussed further below, “polarized voting” is “a difference ... in the choice of candidates or other electoral choices that are preferred by voters in a protected class, and in the choice of candidates and electoral choices that are preferred by voters in the rest of the electorate.” RCW 29A.92.010(3).

6 In an “at-large” election system, “voters of the entire jurisdiction elect the members to the governing body.” RCW 29A.92.010(1)(a).

7 In a “district-based” election system, “the candidate must reside within an election district that is a divisible part of the political subdivision and is elected only by voters residing within that election district.” RCW 29A.92.010(2).

8 “In majority-minority districts, a minority group composes a numerical, working majority of the voting-age population,” thereby creating an opportunity for the minority group to elect its candidate of choice in that district. Bartlett v. Strickland, 556 U.S. 1, 13, 129 S. Ct. 1231, 173 L. Ed. 2d 173 (2009) (plurality opinion).

9 In an “influence district[U.S.] ... a minority group can influence the outcome of an election even if its preferred candidate cannot be elected.” Id.

10 “[I]n a crossover district, the minority population, at least potentially, is large enough to elect the candidate of its choice with help from voters who are members of the majority and who cross over to support the minority's preferred candidate.” Id.

11 In a coalition district, “two minority groups form a coalition to elect the candidate of the coalition's choice.” Id.

12 “The [United States] Office of Management and Budget (OMB) requires federal agencies to use a minimum of two ethnicities in collecting and reporting data: Hispanic or Latino and Not Hispanic or Latino. OMB defines ‘Hispanic or Latino’ as a person of Cuban, Mexican, Puerto Rican, South or Central American, or other Spanish culture or origin regardless of race.” CP at 558.

13 The individual plaintiffs are Gabriel Portugal, Brandon Paul Morales, and Jose Trinidad Corral, “Latino registered voters who reside in Franklin County.” Id. at 2. League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) is also a named plaintiff. Id. at 3. None of the parties or amici distinguish between the individual plaintiffs and LULAC.

14 An amicus brief supporting Gimenez was filed by the American Civil Rights Project (ACRP). Amici briefs supporting the plaintiffs were filed by (1) the Civil Rights and Justice Clinic at the University of Washington School of Law and the Election Law Clinic at Harvard Law School, (2) OneAmerica and the Campaign Legal Center, (3) the Fred T. Korematsu Center for Law and Equality and the American Civil Liberties Union of Washington, (4) the Brennan Center for Justice, and (5) the State of Washington.

15 Gimenez and amicus ACRP argue that “Spanish heritage” does not refer to ethnicity but to “those who speak Spanish.” Br. of Appellant at 36; see generally Br. of ACRP as Amicus Curiae in Supp. of Intervenor Def.-Appellant (Amicus Br. of ACRP). They acknowledge that no case law supports this interpretation. To the contrary, United States Supreme Court precedent has applied the FVRA's protections to Latinx voters. E.g., LULAC, 548 U.S. 399 (partial plurality opinion). Nevertheless, Gimenez argues that if “Spanish heritage” refers to ethnicity, then it is “superfluous” because ethnicity is “already captured by the preceding categories” of race and color. Br. of Appellant at 36. However, elsewhere in his briefing, Gimenez questions whether “ ‘Hispanics’ are a race,” and amicus argues that they are not. Reply Br. of Appellant at 1 n.1; see also Amicus Br. of ACRP at 13-14 n.30. Including Latinx ethnicities within “language minority groups,” as other courts have consistently done based on the statute's plain language, forecloses the need for such arguments and, therefore, is not superfluous.

16 It is undisputed that the voter bringing the challenge must be a member of the race, color, or language minority group whose rights they seek to vindicate.

17 Citing Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 642-43, 647, 651, 657, 113 S. Ct. 2816, 125 L. Ed. 2d 511 (1993); Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 926-28, 115 S. Ct. 2475, 132 L. Ed. 2d 762 (1995); Georgia v. Ashcroft, 539 U.S. 461, 491, 123 S. Ct. 2498, 156 L. Ed. 2d 428 (2003) (Kennedy, J., concurring); Strickland, 556 U.S. at 10-13, 15-16, 20-21; Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 906-08, 116 S. Ct. 1894, 135 L. Ed. 2d 207 (1996); Emison, 507 U.S. at 40-41; De Grandy, 512 U.S. at 1016 (majority), 1028-29 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment); Cooper v. Harris, 581 U.S.

285, 292, 137 S. Ct. 1455, 197 L. Ed. 2d 837 (2017); Bethune-Hill v. Va. State Bd. of Elections, 580 U.S. 178, 189-90, 137 S. Ct. 788, 197 L. Ed. 2d 85 (2017); LULAC, 548 U.S. at 446 (plurality portion); Abrams v. Johnson, 521 U.S. 74, 85-86, 117 S. Ct. 1925, 138 L. Ed. 2d 285 (1997); United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 744-45, 115 S. Ct. 2431, 132 L. Ed. 2d 635 (1995).

18 The plaintiffs and amici argue that Gimenez's constitutional claims should not be considered on their merits because Gimenez did not serve his pleading on the attorney general pursuant to RCW 7.24.110. It is undisputed that Gimenez did not serve the attorney general before filing his CR 12(c) motion for judgment on the pleadings. Yet, arguably, Gimenez did not file any pleading seeking declaratory judgment that would be subject to RCW 7.24.110. Gimenez attached a proposed pleading to his motion to intervene, which included counterclaims for declaratory judgment. However, the trial court's order granting the motion to intervene did not address the proposed pleading, and Gimenez did not subsequently file his proposed pleading as a separate document. Instead, he chose to file a CR 12(c) motion for judgment on the existing pleadings—the plaintiffs' amended complaint and the defendants' answer. We decline to interpret RCW 7.24.110 as applied to these specific facts.

19 The plaintiffs were already awarded fees attributable to their litigation with Franklin County and its board of commissioners in the parties' settlement agreement.

20 Some, but not all, of the plaintiffs' attorneys are affiliated with the UCLA (University of California, Los Angeles) Voting Rights Project.

2011 WL 5025251
Only the Westlaw citation is currently available.
United States District Court,
N.D. Illinois,
Eastern Division.

Christine RADOGNO, in her official capacity as Minority Leader of the Illinois Senate, Thomas Cross, in his official capacity as Minority Leader of the Illinois House of Representatives, Adam Brown, in his official capacity as a state representative from the 101st Representative District and individually as a registered voter, Veronica Vera, Chloe Moore, Joe Trevino, Angel Garcia, Elidia Mares, Edwin Tolentino, and the Illinois Republican Party, Plaintiffs,

v.

ILLINOIS STATE BOARD OF ELECTIONS, Rupert Borgsmiller, Executive Director of the Illinois State Board of Elections, Harold D. Byers, Bryan A. Schneider, Betty J. Coffrin, Ernest C. Gowen, William F. McGuffage, Judith C. Rice, Charles W. Scholz, Jesse R. Smart, all named in their official capacities as members of the Illinois State Board of Elections, African Americans for Legislative Redistricting, and Latino Coalition for Fair Representation, Defendants.

No. 1:11–cv–04884.
|
Oct. 21, 2011.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Brian J. Armstrong, Phillip Anthony Luetkehans, Stephanie Jane Luetkehans, Schirott, Luetkehans & Garner PC, Itasca, IL, Peter Gene Baroni, Thomas More Leinenweber, Leinenweber Baroni & Daffada, LLC, Andrew T. Sperry, Larose & Bosco Ltd., Michael Paul Persoon, Despres Schwartz & Geoghegan, Chicago, IL, for Plaintiffs.

Richard J. Prendergast, Michael Thomas Layden, Richard J. Prendergast, Ltd., Brent Douglas Stratton, Office of the Attorney General, Michael James Kasper, Fletcher Topol & O'Brien, Chicago, IL, David W. Ellis, Special Assistant Attorney General, Eric Michael Madiar, Chief Legal Counsel Office of the Senate President, Springfield, IL, for Defendants.

ELAINE E. BUCKLO, District Judge, DIANE S. SYKES, District Judge, PHILIP P. SIMON, Chief Judge.

OPINION AND ORDER

1 Like a periodic comet, once every ten years this Court sees a challenge to the redistricting of Illinois's state legislative districts. The comet is back before us in the form of an Amended Complaint brought by a mix of citizen-voters, Republican state legislators, and interested parties who claim, for one reason or another, that the redistricting plan recently passed by the Illinois Legislature runs afoul of various state and federal laws. The Defendants—the Illinois State Board of Elections and its members—have now filed a motion to dismiss [DE 28] which, for the reasons stated below, will be granted in part and denied in part.

BACKGROUND

The federal Census occurs once every ten years, which provides states with new population data and an opportunity to redraw their legislative districts. In Illinois, the state Constitution provides that "in the year following each Federal decennial census year, the General Assembly by law shall redistrict the Legislative and the Representative Districts." Ill. Const., art. IV, § 3(b). Illinois has 59 Legislative (or "Senate") districts and 118 Representative (or "House") districts; each Senate district is composed of two House districts.

Illinois's 2011 redistricting process occurred throughout the spring and summer of this year. The Illinois Senate and House each formed redistricting committees. Those committees held public hearings throughout the state during March, April, and May. Plans for the new districts were proposed and amended throughout late May, and on June 3, 2011 the General Assembly Redistricting Act of 2011 was signed into law, which cemented the new map of 118 House districts and 59 Senate districts.

Plaintiffs Christine Radogno, Thomas Cross, Adam Brown, Veronica Vera, Chloe Moore, Joe Trevino, and Angel Garcia filed their complaint on July 20, 2011, and then filed an amended complaint on August 10, 2011. The Amended Complaint adds two more plaintiffs—Elidia Mares and Edwin Tolentino—and challenges the redistricting map in eight counts that raise, variously, the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965, the First and Fourteenth Amendments, the Illinois Voting Rights Act of 2011, and the Illinois Constitution. The Illinois Republican Party was granted leave to intervene as a plaintiff in the case on August 20, 2011, and it has adopted the Amended Complaint as its own.

DISCUSSION

The Defendants raise a variety of arguments in favor of dismissal for each of the eight counts in the Amended Complaint. Simplifying things somewhat, Plaintiffs agree that the Illinois State Board of Elections should be dismissed as a defendant from Counts 3 through 8 and that Counts 7 and 8 should be dismissed in their entirety. So Defendants' motion will be granted as to that Defendant and those counts without further discussion. We will consider the remaining six counts in detail below.

Counts 1 and 2

The first two counts of the Amended Complaint allege that some of the House districts dilute the voting power of African–Americans (Count 1) and Latinos (Count 2), in violation of Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act. Count 1 focuses on House districts 7 and 114; Count 2 focuses on House districts 1, 2, 21, 22, 23, 60, 77 and 83, but also states that it is "not limited to" these districts. [DE 21 at 18.]

2 Section 2 violations exist when minority plaintiffs prove that they have been denied an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and to select candidates of their choice in a particular representative district. 42 U.S.C.1973(b). The Supreme Court in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986) established a three-prong framework for analyzing Section 2 claims:

> Plaintiffs must show three threshold conditions: first, the minority group "is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district"; second, the minority group is "politically cohesive"; and third, the majority "votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Once plaintiffs establish these conditions, the court considers whether, "on the totality of circumstances," minorities have been denied an "equal opportunity" to "participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).

Abrams v. Johnson, 521 U.S. 74, 91, 117 S.Ct. 1925, 138 L.Ed.2d 285 (1997) (quoting Gingles) (ellipsis in original; internal citations omitted).

The first thing to note about Section 2 claims is that they are district-specific, which means, among other things, that for plaintiffs to have standing to bring a claim in any given district they must be registered voters residing in that district. See United States v. Hays, 515 U.S. 737, 745, 115 S.Ct. 2431, 132 L.Ed.2d 635 (1995) (as a matter of standing, plaintiffs stating race-based equal protection challenges to redistricting must be voters who actually reside in the districts they are challenging); Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 137 n. 17, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971) (in electoral districting cases, the plaintiff must be a resident of the challenged district to have standing to sue). As Defendants rightly point out, with respect to districts 1, 22, 23, 77, 83, and 114, the Amended Complaint alleges that one of the Plaintiffs resides in the district, but it fails to make the additional allegation that the resident-plaintiff is also registered to vote in that district. Moreover, with respect to districts 2, 7, 21, and 60, the Amended Complaint does not identify any registered voter residing in the district. Therefore, Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged standing for any of the specifically identified districts that they seek to challenge. Plaintiffs now acknowledge this oversight and have proposed that they be given leave to file a Second Amended Complaint in order to insert the necessary allegations. That request will be granted.

There are, however, additional defects in Counts 1 and 2 that also need to be corrected if those counts are to go forward. First, while Plaintiffs have specifically pointed to some of the challenged districts, the Amended Complaint also states that the counts are "not limited to" these districts. Since Gingles claims are district-specific, this qualifier is unacceptable. Plaintiffs must specifically identify each district they are challenging and demonstrate that at least one of them has standing to challenge that district.

3 Moreover, Plaintiffs have failed to sufficiently allege the third Gingles prong—i.e., that in each of the challenged districts the majority "votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Gingles, 478 U.S. at 51. The closest they ever get to this prong is in Paragraph 106 of the Amended Complaint, where they allege that "racial bloc voting is pervasive in Illinois, both among majority and minority groups." [DE 21 at 15.] But this allegation is entirely too broad: it is not specific to any of the challenged districts, nor does it actually allege that the purported racial bloc voting is sufficient to defeat the minority's preferred candidate in each of those districts.

Plaintiffs counter by saying that fact-pleading of every element is not required in federal court. That's true, but "[e]ven notice pleading requires pleading the elements" of a claim, Stark Trading v. Falconbridge Ltd., 552 F.3d 568, 574 (7th Cir.2009), and Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint doesn't come close to sufficiently pleading the third Gingles element. In fact, we are skeptical as to whether the Amended Complaint even sufficiently pleads the first Gingles element —whether the minority group "is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district"—for each challenged district. Gingles, 478 U.S. at 50. Plaintiffs only make the allegation that districts 7, 23, 60, and 114 are "sufficiently large and geographically compact," but never make this allegation with respect to districts 1, 2, 21, 22, 77, and 83.

Therefore, in amending Counts 1 and 2 of their Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs must include allegations for each challenged district sufficient to indicate that at least one of the plaintiffs has standing to challenge that district and that it satisfies each of the three Gingles prongs for each of the districts they believe violates Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act.

Counts 3 and 4

Counts 3 and 4 bring claims for political gerrymandering under the First and Fourteenth Amendments, respectively.

We'll first address the standing issue raised by these two counts before turning to the murky world of the merits of political gerrymandering claims. Plaintiff Radogno is the Minority Leader of the Illinois Senate and brings her claims only in her official capacity. Plaintiff Cross is the Minority Leader of the Illinois House and also brings his claims only in his official capacity. Plaintiff Brown is a state representative from what is currently the 101st Representative District. His claims are alleged in both his official capacity and individually as a registered voter and citizen living in what would be District 96, if the new redistricting plan is upheld. (Brown's individual standing to challenge District 96—the subject of Count 6—is discussed below.)

Plaintiffs' Response brief did not address the challenge to the official-capacity standing of Brown. Plaintiffs did respond to the challenges to Radogno and Cross, though they are not particularly specific as to which counts they believe Radogno and Cross have standing to assert. Nevertheless, all of their arguments on this issue really revolve around the political gerrymandering claims, so it makes sense to address the challenge to the standing of Radogno and Cross here. [See DE 40 at 12 ("[T]he Redistricting Plan ... systematically and unequally burdens the ability of Leaders Cross and Radogno to carry out their constitutionally prescribed duty of representing the interests of their caucuses and Republican voters throughout the State.").]

4 The standing analysis for political gerrymandering claims is complicated by the largely unresolved status of political gerrymandering claims in general. That is, even if such claims are theoretically viable—which we discuss more below—it is not particularly clear who would have standing to bring them. In Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267, 124 S.Ct. 1769, 158 L.Ed.2d 546 (2004), for example, Justice Stevens suggested that the standing analysis for racial and political gerrymander claims should be the same, which would require that plaintiffs bringing political gerrymander claims be registered voters who reside in the challenged districts. Vieth, 541 U.S. at 328 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Justices Souter and Ginsburg proposed the same analysis. Vieth, 541 U.S. at 347 (Souter, J., dissenting).

Moreover, the standing analysis for Radogno and Cross to bring these claims is further complicated by the limited circumstances under which legislators have standing in their official capacity. Under the standard set in Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 117 S.Ct. 2312, 138 L.Ed.2d 849 (1997), a legislator-plaintiff only has official-capacity standing when actions "deprive individual legislators of something to which they are personally entitled ... [like] the 'effectiveness of their votes.' " Alaska Legislative Council v. Babbitt, 181 F.3d 1333, 1337 (D.C.Cir.1999) (citing Raines). But when a legislator only alleges an "abstract dilution of institutional legislative power," that is insufficient to confer any official-capacity standing. Raines, 521 U.S. at 826.

In this case, Plaintiffs allege that the redistricting plan burdens their ability "to carry out their constitutionally prescribed duty of representing the interests of their caucuses and Republican voters throughout the State." This allegation seems more like an "abstract dilution of institutional legislative power" that would not confer any official-capacity standing under Raines. However, given the unsettled question of who has standing to bring a political gerrymandering claims, and giving Plaintiffs the benefit of the doubt under notice pleading, we find their allegations sufficient to meet the Raines-standard solely for the political gerrymandering counts.

Now on to the merits of the political gerrymandering claims. For reasons of expediency and simplicity, we'll start with Count 4 of Plaintiff's Amended Complaint, which claims that the redistricting map passed by Democrats is an unconstitutional political gerrymander in violation of Republicans' equal protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. The caselaw addressing political gerrymandering claims under the Equal Protection Clause is foggy at best. The two most recent decisions on the issue from the Supreme Court—Vieth and League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006)—are cobbled-together plurality opinions that place district courts in the untenable position of evaluating political gerrymandering claims without any definitive standards. See LULAC, 548 U.S. at 512 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (the Court's political gerrymandering jurisprudence "provides no guidance to lower court judges and perpetuates a cause of action with no discernible content").

5 The two critical questions raised—and left basically unanswered—by Vieth and L ULAC are: 1) Are political gerrymandering claims justiciable as equal protection claims under the Fourteenth Amendment? 2) If so, is there a manageable and reliable standard of fairness by which to evaluate these claims?

In Vieth, a district court sitting with a three-judge panel granted a motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' political gerrymandering claims. On direct appeal to the Supreme Court, a four-justice plurality opinion affirmed this dismissal, concluding that political gerrymandering claims are nonjusticiable political questions because no judicially discernible and manageable standard for adjudicating such claims exists. Vieth, 541 U.S. at 305–06 (plurality). Justice Kennedy concurred with the plurality in so much as he agreed that plaintiffs' political gerrymandering claims had to be dismissed, but he would not "foreclose all possibility of judicial relief if some limited and precise rationale were found to" decide political gerrymandering claims in the future. Vieth, 541 U.S. at 306 (Kennedy, J., concurring).

The plurality judgment of the Court in Vieth thus appears to be that political gerrymandering claims are justiciable, but subject to dismissal because no definitive standard yet exists to judge them. This leaves lower courts evaluating political gerrymandering claims in a difficult position. Justice Scalia invited lower courts to treat Justice Kennedy's opinion "as a reluctant fifth vote against justiciability at district and statewide levels—a vote that may change in some future case but that holds, for the time being, that this matter is nonjusticiable." Vieth, 541 U.S. at 305 (plurality).

Two years later, LULAC did little to clarify the issues for lower courts. In another plurality opinion, the Court punted on the question of justiciability—finding that the issue was not before it—but held that plaintiffs' claims must nevertheless be dismissed because of "the absence of any workable test for judging partisan gerrymanders." LULAC, 548 at 420 (plurality). As summarized by Justice Kennedy, writing for the plurality: "a successful claim attempting to identify unconstitutional acts of partisan gerrymandering must ... show a burden, as measured by a reliable standard, on the complainants' representational rights." LULAC, 548 at 418 (plurality) (emphasis added). See also Vieth, 541 at 307–08 (Kennedy, J., concurring) (concurring in dismissal of political gerrymandering claims because "there are yet no agreed upon substantive principles of fairness in districting, we have no basis on which to define clear, manageable, and politically neutral standards for measuring the particular burden a given partisan classification imposes on representational rights").

In the wake of these two cases, some courts have read Vieth to mean that political gerrymandering claims are simply not justiciable. Lulac of Texas v. Texas Democratic Party, 651 F.Supp.2d 700, 712 (W.D.Tex.2009) (Vieth held "political gerrymandering to be non justiciable"); Miller v. Cunningham, 512 F.3d 98, 102 (4th Cir.2007) (same); Meza v. Galvin, 322 F.Supp.2d 52, 58 (D.Mass.2004) (Vieth concluded "that political gerrymandering cases are nonjusticiable").

6 Other courts and commentators have reached the conclusion that "partisan gerrymanders are justiciable yet unsolvable." David Schultz, The Party's Over: Partisan Gerrymandering and the First Amendment, 36 Cap. U.L.Rev. 1, 1 (Fall 2007). See, e.g., Kidd v. Cox, 2006 WL 1341302, at *15 (N.D.Ga.2006) ("[T]he Court cannot ascertain from the materials submitted what manageable or politically-neutral standards might exist in this case that would make a political gerrymandering dispute based on the Equal Protection Clause justiciable."); Shapiro v. Berger, 328 F.Supp.2d 496, 504 (S.D.N.Y.2004) (dismissing political gerrymandering claim because Plaintiff had "not suggested any manageable standard under which I could evaluate such a claim if one had been advanced").

On our reading of Vieth and LULAC, political gerrymandering claims are justiciable in principle, but also currently unsolvable. This means that Plaintiffs' political gerrymandering claim based on the Equal Protection Clause may be justiciable, but only if they articulate a workable standard of fairness by which to assess that claim and make allegations sufficient to give rise to a plausible inference that the redistricting plan violates the standard. Plaintiffs have not stated any such standard in their Amended Complaint. Indeed, since the Supreme Court was unable on two occasions to agree on any standard, it may be an exercise in futility. Nevertheless, Plaintiffs will be given leave to amend Count 4 of their Amended Complaint in order to attempt to provide a "workable test" or a "reliable standard" for judging partisan gerrymanders under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

As noted, the preceding substantive analysis all applies to political gerrymandering claims brought under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But in Count 3, Plaintiffs also allege a political gerrymandering claim under the First Amendment, a claim that grows out of a theory offered by Justice Kennedy in his Vieth concurrence. He wrote:

> The First Amendment may be the more relevant constitutional provision in future cases that allege unconstitutional partisan gerrymandering. After all, these allegations involve the First Amendment interest of not burdening or penalizing citizens because of their participation in the electoral process, their voting history, their association with a political party, or their expression of political views. Under general First Amendment principles those burdens in other contexts are unconstitutional absent a compelling government interest.... First Amendment concerns arise where a State enacts a law that has the purpose and effect of subjecting a group of voters or their party to disfavored treatment by reason of their views. In the context of partisan gerrymandering, that means that First Amendment concerns arise where an apportionment has the purpose and effect of burdening a group of voters' representational rights.

7 Vieth, 541 U.S. at 314 (Kennedy, J., concurring) (citations omitted).

The four justice plurality opinion in Vieth rejected the idea that the First Amendment could be used to bring political gerrymandering claims because "a First Amendment claim, if it were sustained, would render unlawful all consideration of political affiliation in districting, just as it renders unlawful all consideration of political affiliation in hiring for non-policy-level government jobs." Vieth, 541 U.S. at 294 (plurality). Nevertheless, Plaintiffs read Justice Kennedy's concurrence as an opening for political gerrymandering claims under the First Amendment, and they thus allege in Count 3 that the redistricting plan "systematically and intentionally unfairly burdens the rights to political expression and expressive association of voters who vote Republican because of their political views" and that this is done without a "compelling reason." [DE 21 at 22.]

So from Plaintiffs' viewpoint, because the redistricting plan means that Republican voters in some districts are less likely to be successful in electing their preferred candidate, these voters' First Amendment rights of expression and association have been violated. Even assuming that this claim is justiciable—something of a big assumption, as the previous section demonstrates—we find it unpersuasive.

It is of course true that the First Amendment protects political expression and political association, particularly in the context of campaigns for political office. Citizens United v. Fed. Election Comm'n, —— U.S. ——, 130 S.Ct. 876, 898, 175 L.Ed.2d 753 (2010) ("The First Amendment has its fullest and most urgent application to speech uttered during a campaign for political office.") (internal quotations omitted). But what is the connection between the alleged burden imposed on Plaintiffs' ability to elect their preferred candidate and a restriction on their freedom of political expression? There is none. As another court rejecting these sorts of claims explained: "Plaintiffs are every bit as free under the new [redistricting] plan to run for office, express their political views, endorse and campaign for their favorite candidates, vote, or otherwise influence the political process through their expression." Kidd, 2006 WL 1341302, at 17.* Plaintiffs' freedom of expression is simply not burdened by the redistricting plan. It may very well be that Plaintiffs' ability to successfully elect their preferred candidate is burdened by the redistricting plan, but that has nothing to do with their First Amendment rights. See, e.g., Washington v. Finlay, 664 F.2d 913, 927–28 (4th Cir.1981) ("The first amendment's protection of the freedom of association and of the rights to run for office, have one's name on the ballot, and present one's views to the electorate do not also include entitlement to success in those endeavors.").

Nor does the redistricting plan inhibit Plaintiffs' freedom of association. It is true that fielding candidates for political office and participating in campaigns are acts of political association and thus receive First Amendment protection. See Eu v. S.F. County Democratic Cent. Comm., 489 U.S. 214, 224, 109 S.Ct. 1013, 103 L.Ed.2d 271 (1989) (noting freedom of association includes the freedom "to select a standard bearer who best represents the party's ideologies and preferences") (internal quotations omitted). But the redistricting plan at issue here "has no effect on Plaintiffs' ability to field candidates for office, participate in campaigns, vote for their preferred candidate, or otherwise associate with others for the advancement of common political beliefs." Kidd, 2006 WL 1341302, at * 17. It thus does not restrict in any way Plaintiffs' freedom of association under the First Amendment.

8 In the end, the Amended Complaint does not allege a cognizable claim for political gerrymandering under the First Amendment. We entirely endorse the conclusion reached by Kidd:

> [B]ased on our review of First Amendment jurisprudence in the election context, we find the deleterious effects of political gerrymandering on the ability of a political party and its voters to elect a member of the party to a seat in the state legislature implicates no recognized First Amendment right. The party and its voters remain free to associate with whom they please, field candidates of their choice, campaign, vote, and express their political views. What Plaintiffs demand is the right to have their views represented in state government by the representative of their choice. We decline to recognize such a right under the First Amendment.

Kidd, 2006 WL 1341302, at *19. Count 3 of Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint will therefore be dismissed with prejudice.

Count 5

Plaintiffs' fifth count challenges the constitutionality of the Illinois Voting Rights Act of 2011 ("IVRA"), both facially and as-applied.

The IVRA is a concise piece of legislation—barely 400 words in total—focused entirely on the redistricting process. It is intended to prevent what is commonly known as the "fracturing" of minority voting districts—i.e., it is intended to preserve a cluster of minority voters within a given legislative district if they are of a size and cohesion that could exert collective electoral power. 10 ILCS 120/5–5. The IVRA thus explicitly directs that "racial minorities or language minorities" be taken into account in the redistricting process. 10 ILCS 120/5–5(b).

Plaintiffs first argue that, by explicitly taking race into account, the IVRA is facially unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, Plaintiffs believe that "redistricting laws that use racial classifications, such as those contained in the text of IVRA, are expressly prohibited under the Equal Protection Clause, even those that appear neutral on their face." [DE 40 at 9.] But Plaintiffs' position is simply not the law in redistricting cases. Rather, as the Supreme Court recognized in Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993), "redistricting differs from other kinds of state decisionmaking in that the legislature always is aware of race when it draws district lines." Shaw, 509 U.S. at 646 (emphasis in original). Thus, unlike in many other contexts, redistricting laws can take race into consideration.

It is true that redistricting laws cannot elevate race to be the predominant factor in the way a district is drawn. Easley v. Cromartie, 532 U.S. 234, 242, 121 S.Ct. 1452, 149 L.Ed.2d 430 (2001) (for a district to violate equal protection, "[r]ace must not simply have been a motivation for the drawing of a majority-minority district, but the predominant factor motivating the legislature's districting decision") (italics in original; internal citations and quotations omitted). But the IVRA expends a large percentage of its words ensuring that it complies with this rule. Subsection 5(a) of the IVRA states: "The requirements imposed by this Article are in addition and subordinate to any requirements or obligations imposed by the United States Constitution, any federal law regarding redistricting Legislative Districts or Representative Districts, including but not limited to the federal Voting Rights Act, and the Illinois Constitution." 10 ILCS 120/5–5(a). Subsection 5(d) reiterates the point: "Nothing in this Act shall be construed, applied, or implemented in a way that imposes any requirement or obligation that conflicts with the United States Constitution, any federal law regarding redistricting Legislative Districts or Representative Districts, including but not limited to the federal Voting Rights Act, or the Illinois Constitution." 10 ILCS 120/5–5(d). The IVRA is thus not unconstitutional on its face.

9 Count 5 also raises an as-applied constitutional challenge to the IVRA. The Amended Complaint is less than entirely clear exactly which districts this challenge applies to—other than District 96, which in Plaintiffs' view demonstrates that "the Illinois Voting Rights Act of 2011 violates the Plaintiffs' rights to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution on its face and as applied." [DE 21 at 25.] Plaintiffs may have intended this as-applied challenge to apply to other districts, but in responding to Defendants' motion to dismiss, Plaintiffs only pursued the argument with respect to District 96, thus waiving a challenge to any of the other districts. Lekas v. Briley, 405 F.3d 602, 614–15 (7th Cir.2005) (a plaintiff waives an argument by failing to raise it in response to a motion to dismiss).

Count 5 thus remains as only a constitutional challenge to the IVRA as it is applied to District 96. That claim amounts to nothing more than a Shaw challenge—i.e., that race was the predominate factor in the creation of District 96—and is, as we will see, identical to the claim brought in Count 6. Since the only remaining part of Count 5 is thus duplicative, it will be dismissed with prejudice.

Count 6

The Amended Complaint's sixth count is a straightforward Shaw challenge: Plaintiffs claim that District 96 was drawn in such a way that race was the predominant factor. Defendants originally sought to dismiss this count because it was unclear whether it was a racial gerrymandering challenge or a political gerrymandering challenge. Plaintiffs clarified that Count 6 was a race-based Shaw challenge, however, and Defendants subsequently dropped their challenge to this count in their reply brief. Defendants' Motion to Dismiss will therefore be denied with respect to Count 6 of Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint.

As for the standing for Count 6, Adam Brown is a registered voter and citizen living in what would be District 96. Therefore, he has standing to challenge the drawing of District 96. Hays, 515 U.S. at 745.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Amended Complaint [DE 28] is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Counts 3, 5, 7 and 8 of Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint are DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE. Counts 1, 2 and 4 of Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint are DISMISSED WITH LEAVE TO REPLEAD, and any newly amended complaint repleading these counts must be filed within 7 days of the date of this Order. Defendants' Motion is DENIED with respect to Count 6 of Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint. Defendant Illinois State Board of Elections is DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE from Counts 3 though 8 of Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint.

SO ORDERED.

All Citations

Not Reported in F.Supp.2d, 2011 WL 5025251

End of Document

117 S.Ct. 1491
Supreme Court of the United States

Janet RENO, Attorney General, Appellant,
v.
BOSSIER PARISH SCHOOL BOARD et al.
George PRICE, et al., Appellants,
v.
BOSSIER PARISH SCHOOL BOARD et al.

Nos. 95–1455, 95–1508.
|
Argued Dec. 9, 1996.
|
Decided May 12, 1997.

Synopsis

Louisiana parish school board sought preclearance under Voting Rights Act for its proposed redistricting plan. The United States District Court for the District of Columbia, Silberman, Circuit Judge, 907 F.Supp. 434, granted request. Attorney General appealed. The Supreme Court, Justice O'Connor, held that: (1) preclearance under Voting Rights Act may not be denied solely on basis that covered jurisdiction's new voting standard, practice, or procedure violates Act section barring states and their political subdivisions from maintaining voting standard, practice or procedure that results in denial or abridgment of right to vote on account of race or color; (2) evidence that covered jurisdiction's redistricting plan dilutes minorities' voting power may be relevant to inquiry whether covered jurisdiction acted with purpose of denying or abridging right to vote on account or race or color under Voting Rights Act preclearance section; and (3) whether district court considered relevant proffered evidence showing that board's redistricting plan diluted minorities' voting power was unclear.

Vacated and remanded.

Justice Thomas, concurred and filed opinion.

Justice Breyer, concurred in part and in judgment and filed opinion in which Justice Ginsburg joined.

Justice Stevens, dissented in part and concurred in part and filed opinion in which Justice Souter joined.

West Headnotes (14)

[1] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Preclearance under Voting Rights Act may not be denied solely on basis that covered jurisdiction's new voting standard, practice, or procedure violates Act section barring states and their political subdivisions from maintaining voting standard, practice or procedure that results in denial or abridgment of right to vote on account of race or color. Voting Rights Act of 1965, §§ 2(a), 5, 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 1973(a), 1973c.

16 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Election Law Bailout suits; judicial preclearance

To obtain judicial preclearance under Voting Rights Act, covered jurisdiction bears burden of proving that electoral change does not have purpose and will not have effect of denying or abridging right to vote on account of race. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

7 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Voting Rights Act preclearance section focuses on freezing election procedures, and thus, plan has impermissible "effect" under section only if it would lead to retrogression in position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of electoral franchise. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

21 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Under Voting Rights Act preclearance section, proposed voting practice is measured against existing voting practice to determine whether retrogression would result from proposed change. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

23 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Election Law In general; covered jurisdictions

Under Voting Rights Act preclearance section, covered jurisdiction's existing voting plan is benchmark against which "effect" of voting changes is measured. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 5, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973c.

19 Cases that cite this headnote

[6] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Plaintiff claiming vote dilution under Voting Rights Act section barring states and their political subdivisions from maintaining voting standard, practice or procedure that results in denial or abridgment of right to vote on account of race or color must initially establish the following: racial group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute majority in single member district; group is politically cohesive; and white majority votes sufficiently as bloc to enable it usually to defeat minority's preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a).

21 Cases that cite this headnote

[7] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Plaintiff claiming vote dilution under Voting Rights Act section barring states and their political subdivisions from maintaining voting standard, practice or procedure that results in denial or abridgment of right to vote on account of race or color must demonstrate that totality of circumstances supports finding that voting scheme is dilutive. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a).

20 Cases that cite this headnote

[8] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Plaintiff claiming vote dilution under Voting Rights Act section barring states and their political subdivisions from maintaining voting standard, practice or procedure that results in denial or abridgment of right to vote on account of race or color must postulate reasonable alternative voting practice to serve as benchmark undiluted voting practice. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a).

32 Cases that cite this headnote

[9] Constitutional Law Fifteenth Amendment

Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

Violation of Voting Rights Act section barring states and their political subdivisions from maintaining voting standard, practice or procedure that results in denial or abridgment of right to vote on account of race or color is not a fortiori violation of Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendment to Constitution; plaintiff bringing constitutional vote dilution challenge must establish that state or political subdivision acted with discriminatory purpose, which Act section does not require. U.S.C.A. Const.Amends. 14, 15; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2(a), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973(a).

43 Cases that cite this headnote

[10] Election Law Discrimination; Voting Rights Act

Although Supreme Court normally accords Attorney General's construction of Voting Rights Act great deference, Supreme Court only does so if Congress has not expressed its intent with respect to question, and then only if administrative interpretation is reasonable. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 2 et seq., 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973 et seq.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[11] Equity Constitutional and statutory provisions

Courts of equity can no more disregard statutory and constitutional requirements and provisions than can courts of law.

5 Cases that cite this headnote

[12] Election Law Evidence

Evidence that covered jurisdiction's redistricting plan dilutes minorities' voting power may be relevant to inquiry whether covered jurisdiction acted with purpose of denying or abridging right to vote on account of race or color under Voting Rights Act preclearance section. Voting Rights Act of 1965, §§ 2(a), 5, 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 1973(a), 1973c.

12 Cases that cite this headnote

[13] Federal Courts Particular cases

Whether district court considered relevant proffered evidence showing that parish school board's reapportionment plan diluted minorities' voting power in determining whether to grant board preclearance under Voting Rights Act was unclear, requiring remand of that aspect of district court's holding. Voting Rights Act of 1965, §§ 2(a), 5, 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 1973(a), 1973c.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[14] Constitutional Law Intentional or purposeful action

Important starting point for assessing discriminatory intent under Arlington Heights, which sets forth framework for analyzing whether invidious discriminatory purpose was motivating factor in government body's decision making, is impact of official action, whether it bears more heavily on one race than another; other relevant considerations include historical background of jurisdiction's decision, specific sequence of events leading up to challenged decision, departures from normal procedural sequence, and legislative or administrative history, especially any contemporary statements by members of decision making body.

64 Cases that cite this headnote

1493 Syllabus [*]

471 Appellee Bossier Parish School Board (Board) is subject to the preclearance requirements 1494 of § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (Act) and must therefore obtain the approval of either the United States Attorney General or the United States District Court for the District of Columbia before implementing any changes to a voting "qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure." Based on the 1990 census, the Board redrew its 12 single-member districts, adopting the redistricting plan that the Attorney General had recently precleared for use in elections of the parish's primary governing body (the Jury plan). In doing so, the Board rejected a plan proposed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), which would have created two majority-black districts. The Attorney General objected to preclearance, finding that the NAACP plan, which had not been available when the Jury plan was originally approved, demonstrated that black residents were sufficiently numerous and geographically compact to constitute a majority in two districts; that, compared with this alternative, the Board's plan unnecessarily limited the opportunity for minority voters to elect their candidates of choice and thereby diluted their voting strength in violation of § 2 of the Act; and that the Attorney General must withhold preclearance where necessary to prevent a clear § 2 violation. The Board then filed this action with the District Court, and appellant Price and others intervened as defendants. A three-judge panel granted the preclearance request, rejecting appellants' contention that a voting change's failure to satisfy § 2 constituted an independent reason to deny preclearance under § 5 and their related argument that a court must still consider evidence of a § 2 violation as evidence of discriminatory purpose under § 5.

Held:

1. Preclearance under § 5 may not be denied solely on the basis that a covered jurisdiction's new voting "standard, practice, or procedure" violates § 2. This Court has consistently understood § 5 and § 2 to combat 472 different evils and, accordingly, to impose very different duties upon the States. See Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 883, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 2587, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (plurality opinion). Section 5 freezes election procedures in a covered jurisdiction until that jurisdiction proves that its proposed changes do not have the purpose, and will not have the effect, of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race. See Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 140, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1363, 47 L.Ed.2d 629. It is designed to combat only those effects that are retrogressive. Retrogression, by definition, requires a comparison of a jurisdiction's new voting plan with its existing plan, see Holder, supra, at 883, 114 S.Ct., at 2587 (plurality opinion), and necessarily implies that the jurisdiction's existing plan is the benchmark against which the "effect" of voting changes is measured. Section 2, on the other hand, applies in all jurisdictions and uses as its benchmark for comparison in vote dilution claims a hypothetical, undiluted plan. Making compliance with § 5 contingent upon compliance with § 2, as appellants urge, would, for all intents and purposes, replace the standards for § 5 with those for § 2, thus contradicting more than 20 years of precedent interpreting § 5. See, e.g., Beer, supra. Appellants' contentions that their reading of § 5 is supported by the Beer decision, by the Attorney General's regulations, and by public policy considerations are rejected. Pp. 1496–1501.

2. Evidence showing that a jurisdiction's redistricting plan dilutes minorities' voting power may be relevant to establish a jurisdiction's "intent to retrogress" under § 5, so there is no need to decide today whether such evidence is relevant to establish other types of discriminatory intent or whether § 5's purpose inquiry ever extends beyond the search for retrogressive intent. Because this Court cannot say with confidence that the District Court considered the evidence proffered to show that the Board's reapportionment plan was dilutive, this aspect of that court's holding must be vacated. Pp. 1501–1503.

(a) Section 2 evidence may be "relevant" within the meaning of Federal Rule of Evidence 401, for the fact that a plan has a dilutive impact makes it "more probable" that the jurisdiction adopting that plan acted *1495 with an intent to retrogress than "it would be without the evidence." This does not, of course, mean that evidence of a plan's dilutive impact is dispositive of the § 5 purpose inquiry. Indeed, if it were, § 2 would be effectively incorporated into § 5, a result this Court finds unsatisfactory. In conducting their inquiry into a jurisdiction's motivation in enacting voting changes, courts should look for guidance to Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450, which sets forth a framework for examining discriminatory purpose. Pp. 1501–1503.

(b) This Court is unable to determine whether the District Court deemed irrelevant all evidence of the dilutive impact of the redistricting 473 plan adopted by the Board. While some language in its opinion is consistent with today's holding that the existence of less dilutive options was at least relevant to the purpose inquiry, the District Court also appears to have endorsed the notion that dilutive impact evidence is irrelevant even to an inquiry into retrogressive intent. The District Court will have the opportunity to apply the Arlington Heights test on remand as well as to address appellants' additional arguments that it erred in refusing to consider evidence that the Board was in violation of an ongoing injunction to remedy any remaining vestiges of a dual school system. P. 1503.

907 F.Supp. 434, vacated and remanded.

O'CONNOR, J., , delivered the opinion of the Court, in which REHNQUIST, C.J., and SCALIA, KENNEDY, and THOMAS, JJ., joined in full, and in which GINSBURG and BREYER, JJ., joined except insofar as Part III is inconsistent with the views expressed in the concurrence of BREYER, J., THOMAS, J., filed a concurring opinion, post, p. 1503. BREYER, J., iled an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment, in which GINSBURG, J., joined, post, p. 1505. STEVENS, J., filed an opinion dissenting in part and concurring in part, in which SOUTER, J., joined, post, p. 1507.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Deval L. Patrick, Boston, MA, for appellant in No. 94–1455.

John W. Borkowski, Washington, DC, for appellants in No. 95–1508.

Michael A. Carvin, Washington, DC, for appellees.

Opinion

474 Justice O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

Today we clarify the relationship between § 2 and § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 437, 439, as amended, 42 U.S.C. §§ 1973, 1973c. Specifically, we decide two questions: (i) whether preclearance must be denied under § 5 whenever a covered jurisdiction's new voting "standard, practice, or procedure" violates § 2; and (ii) whether evidence that a new "standard, practice, or procedure" has a dilutive impact is always irrelevant to the inquiry whether the covered jurisdiction acted with "the purpose ... of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color" under § 5. We answer both in the negative.

I

Appellee Bossier Parish School Board (Board) is a jurisdiction subject to the preclearance requirements of § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, and must therefore obtain the approval of either the United States Attorney General or the United States District Court for the District of Columbia before implementing any changes to a voting "qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure." The Board has 12 members who are elected from single-member districts by majority vote to serve 4–year terms. When the 1990 census revealed wide population disparities among its districts, see App. to Juris. Statement 93a (Stipulations of Fact and Law ¶ 82), the Board decided to redraw the districts to equalize the population distribution.

During this process, the Board considered two redistricting plans. It considered, and initially rejected, the redistricting plan that had been recently adopted by the Bossier *1496 Parish Police Jury, the parish's primary governing body (the Jury plan), to govern its own elections. Just months before, the Attorney General had precleared the Jury plan, which also contained 12 districts. Id., at 88a (Stipulations ¶ 68). None of the 12 districts in the Board's existing plan or in the Jury plan contained a majority of black residents. Id., at 475 93a (Stipulations ¶ 82) (under 1990 population statistics in the Board's existing districts, the three districts with highest black concentrations contain 46.63%, 43.79%, and 30.13% black residents, respectively); id., at 85a (Stipulations ¶ 59) (population statistics for the Jury plan, with none of the plan's 12 districts containing a black majority). Because the Board's adoption of the Jury plan would have maintained the status quo regarding the number of black-majority districts, the parties stipulated that the Jury plan was not "retrogressive." Id., at 141a (Stipulations ¶ 252) ("The ... plan is not retrogressive to minority voting strength compared to the existing benchmark plan ..."). Appellant George Price, president of the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), presented the Board with a second option —a plan that created two districts each containing not only a majority of black residents, but a majority of voting-age black residents. Id., at 98a (Stipulations ¶ 98). Over vocal opposition from local residents, black and white alike, the Board voted to adopt the Jury plan as its own, reasoning that the Jury plan would almost certainly be precleared again and that the NAACP plan would require the Board to split 46 electoral precincts.

But the Board's hopes for rapid preclearance were dashed when the Attorney General interposed a formal objection to the Board's plan on the basis of "new information" not available when the Justice Department had precleared the plan for the Police Jury—namely, the NAACP's plan, which demonstrated that "black residents are sufficiently numerous and geographically compact so as to constitute a majority in two single-member districts." Id., at 155a–156a (Attorney General's August 30, 1993, objection letter). The objection letter asserted that the Board's plan violated § 2 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973, because it "unnecessarily limit[ed] the opportunity for minority voters to elect their candidates of choice," App. to Juris. Statement, at 156a, as compared to the new alternative. Relying on 28 CFR § 51.55(b)(2) (1996), which 476 provides that the Attorney General shall withhold preclearance where "necessary to prevent a clear violation of amended Section 2 [42 U.S.C. § 1973]," the Attorney General concluded that the Board's redistricting plan warranted a denial of preclearance under § 5. App. to Juris. Statement 157a. The Attorney General declined to reconsider the decision. Ibid.

The Board then filed this action seeking preclearance under § 5 in the District Court for the District of Columbia. Appellant Price and others intervened as defendants. The three-judge panel granted the Board's request for preclearance, over the dissent of one judge. 907 F.Supp. 434, 437 (1995). The District Court squarely rejected the appellants' contention that a voting change's alleged failure to satisfy § 2 constituted an independent reason to deny preclearance under § 5: "We hold, as has every court that has considered the question, that a political subdivision that does not violate either the 'effect' or the 'purpose' prong of section 5 cannot be denied preclearance because of an alleged section 2 violation." Id., at 440–441. Given this holding, the District Court quite properly expressed no opinion on whether the Jury plan in fact violated § 2, and its refusal to reach out and decide the issue in dicta does not require us, as Justice STEVENS insists, to "assume that the record discloses a 'clear violation' of § 2." See post, at 1508 (opinion dissenting in part and concurring in part). That issue has yet to be decided by any court. The District Court did, however, reject appellants' related argument that a court "must still consider evidence of a section 2 violation as evidence of discriminatory purpose under section 5." Id., at 445. We noted probable jurisdiction on June 3, 1996. 517 U.S. 1232, 116 S.Ct. 1874, 135 L.Ed.2d 171.

II

[1] The Voting Rights Act of 1965(Act), 42 U.S.C. § 1973 et seq., was enacted by Congress in 1964 to "attac[k] the blight of *1497 voting discrimination" across the Nation. S.Rep. No. 97–417, 477 2d Sess., p. 4 (1982) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982 pp. 177, 180; South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 308, 86 S.Ct. 803, 808, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966). Two of the weapons in the Federal Government's formidable arsenal are § 5 and § 2 of the Act. Although we have consistently understood these sections to combat different evils and, accordingly, to impose very different duties upon the States, see Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 883, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 2587, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (plurality opinion) (noting how the two sections "differ in structure, purpose, and application"), appellants nevertheless ask us to hold that a violation of § 2 is an independent reason to deny preclearance under § 5. Unlike Justice sTEVENS, post, at 1509–1510, and n. 5 (opinion dissenting in part and concurring in part), we entertain little doubt that the Department of Justice or other litigants would "routinely" attempt to avail themselves of this new reason for denying preclearance, so that recognizing § 2 violations as a basis for denying § 5 preclearance would inevitably make compliance with § 5 contingent upon compliance with § 2. Doing so would, for all intents and purposes, replace the standards for § 5 with those for § 2. Because this would contradict our longstanding interpretation of these two sections of the Act, we reject appellants' position.

[2] [3] Section 5, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, was enacted as > "a response to a common practice in some jurisdictions of staying one step ahead of the federal courts by passing new discriminatory voting laws as soon as the old ones had been struck down.... Congress therefore decided, as the Supreme Court held it could, 'to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victim,' by 'freezing election procedures in the covered areas unless the changes can be shown to be nondiscriminatory.' " Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 140, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1363, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976) (quoting H.R.Rep. No. 94–196, pp. 57–58 (1970)).

In light of this limited purpose, § 5 applies only to certain States and their political subdivisions. Such a covered jurisdiction 478 may not implement any change in a voting "qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure" unless it first obtains either administrative preclearance of that change from the Attorney General or judicial preclearance from the District Court for the District of Columbia. 42 U.S.C. § 1973c. To obtain judicial preclearance, the jurisdiction bears the burden of proving that the change "does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color." Ibid.; City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 183, n. 18, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 1565, n. 18, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980) (covered jurisdiction bears burden of proof). Because § 5 focuses on "freez[ing] election procedures," a plan has an impermissible "effect" under § 5 only if it "would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise." Beer, supra, at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1364.

[4] [5] Retrogression, by definition, requires a comparison of a jurisdiction's new voting plan with its existing plan. See Holder, supra, at 883, 114 S.Ct., at 2587 (plurality opinion) ("Under § 5, then, the proposed voting practice is measured against the existing voting practice to determine whether retrogression would result from the proposed change"). It also necessarily implies that the jurisdiction's existing plan is the benchmark against which the "effect" of voting changes is measured. In Beer, for example, we concluded that the city of New Orleans' reapportionment of its council districts, which created one district with a majority of voting-age blacks where before there had been none, had no discriminatory "effect." 425 U.S., at 141–142, 96 S.Ct., at 1364 ("It is thus apparent that a legislative reapportionment that enhances the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise can hardly have the 'effect' of diluting or abridging the right to vote on account of race within the meaning of § 5"). Likewise, in City of Lockhart v. United States, 460 U.S. 125, 103 S.Ct. 998, 74 L.Ed.2d 863 (1983), we found that the city's new charter had no retrogressive "effect" even though it maintained 479 the city's prior *1498 practice of electing its council members at-large from numbered posts, and instituted a new practice of electing two of the city's four council members every year (instead of electing all the council members every two years). While each practice could "have a discriminatory effect under some circumstances," id., at 135, 103 S.Ct., at 1004, the fact remained that "[s]ince the new plan did not increase the degree of discrimination against [the city's Mexican–American population], it was entitled to § 5 preclearance [because it was not retrogressive]," id., at 134, 103 S.Ct., at 1004 (emphasis added).

[6] [7] [8] Section 2, on the other hand, was designed as a means of eradicating voting practices that "minimize or cancel out the voting strength and political effectiveness of minority groups," S.Rep. No. 97–417, at 28, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982 pp. 177, 205. Under this broader mandate, § 2 bars all States and their political subdivisions from maintaining any voting "standard, practice, or procedure" that "results in a denial or abridgement of the right ... to vote on account of race or color." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(a). A voting practice is impermissibly dilutive within the meaning of § 2

> "if, based on the totality of the circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by [members of a class defined by race or color] in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).

A plaintiff claiming vote dilution under § 2 must initially establish that: (i) "[the racial group] is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district"; (ii) the group is "politically cohesive"; and (iii) "the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it ... usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." 480 Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 50–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2766–2767, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986); Growe v. Emison, 507 U.S. 25, 40, 113 S.Ct. 1075, 1084, 122 L.Ed.2d 388 (1993). The plaintiff must also demonstrate that the totality of the circumstances supports a finding that the voting scheme is dilutive. Johnson v. DeGrandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1011, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 2657, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994); see Gingles, supra, at 44–45, 106 S.Ct., at 2762–2764 (listing factors to be considered by a court in assessing the totality of the circumstances). Because the very concept of vote dilution implies—and, indeed, necessitates—the existence of an "undiluted" practice against which the fact of dilution may be measured, a § 2 plaintiff must also postulate a reasonable alternative voting practice to serve as the benchmark "undiluted" voting practice. Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S., at 881, 114 S.Ct., at 2586 (plurality opinion); id., at 950–951, 114 S.Ct., at 2621–2622 (Blackmun, J., dissenting).

Appellants contend that preclearance must be denied under § 5 whenever a covered jurisdiction's redistricting plan violates § 2. The upshot of this position is to shift the focus of § 5 from nonretrogression to vote dilution, and to change the § 5 benchmark from a jurisdiction's existing plan to a hypothetical, undiluted plan.

But § 5, we have held, is designed to combat only those effects that are retrogressive. See supra, at 1497–1498. To adopt appellants' position, we would have to call into question more than 20 years of precedent interpreting § 5. See, e. g., Beer, supra; City of Lockhart, supra. This we decline to do. Section 5 already imposes upon a covered jurisdiction the difficult burden of proving the absence of discriminatory purpose and effect. See, e.g., Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 218, 80 S.Ct. 1437, 1445, 4 L.Ed.2d 1669 (1960) ("[A]s a practical matter it is never easy to prove a negative"). To require a jurisdiction to litigate whether its proposed redistricting plan also has a dilutive "result" before it can implement that plan—even if the Attorney General bears the burden of proving that "result"—is to increase further the serious federalism costs already implicated by § 5. See Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 926, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 2493, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995) (noting the "federalism costs exacted by § 5 preclearance").

*1499 481 Appellants nevertheless contend that we should adopt their reading of § 5 because it is supported by our decision in Beer, by the Attorney General's regulations, and by considerations of public policy. In Beer, we held that § 5 prohibited only retrogressive effects and further observed that "an ameliorative new legislative apportionment cannot violate § 5 unless the new apportionment itself so discriminates on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution." 425 U.S., at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1364. Although there had been no allegation that the redistricting plan in Beer "so ... discriminate[d] on the basis of race or color as to be unconstitutional," we cited in dicta a few cases to illustrate when a redistricting plan might be found to be constitutionally offensive. Id., at 142, n. 14, 96 S.Ct., at 1364, n. 14. Among them was our decision in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), in which we sustained a vote dilution challenge, brought under the Equal Protection Clause, to the use of multimember election districts in two Texas counties. Appellants argue that "[b]ecause vote dilution standards under the Constitution and Section 2 were generally coextensive at the time Beer was decided, Beer ' s discussion meant that practices that violated Section 2 would not be entitled to preclearance under Section 5." Brief for Federal Appellant 36–37.

[9] Even assuming, arguendo, that appellants' argument had some support in 1976, it is no longer valid today because the applicable statutory and constitutional standards have changed. Since 1980, a plaintiff bringing a constitutional vote dilution challenge, whether under the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendment, has been required to establish that the State or political subdivision acted with a discriminatory purpose. See City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 62, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 1497, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (plurality opinion) ("Our decisions ... have made clear that action by a State that is racially neutral on its face violates the Fifteenth Amendment only if motivated by a discriminatory purpose"); id., at 66, 100 S.Ct., at 1499 ("[O]nly if there is purposeful discrimination can there be a violation of the Equal Protection 482 Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment"); see also Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 265, 97 S.Ct. 555, 563, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977) ("Proof of racially discriminatory intent or purpose is required to show a violation of the Equal Protection Clause"). When Congress amended § 2 in 1982, it clearly expressed its desire that § 2 not have an intent component, see S.Rep. No. 97–417, at 2, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982 pp. 177, 178 ("Th[e 1982] amendment is designed to make clear that proof of discriminatory intent is not required to establish a violation of Section 2"). Because now the Constitution requires a showing of intent that § 2 does not, a violation of § 2 is no longer a fortiori a violation of the Constitution. Congress itself has acknowledged this fact. See id., at 39 ("The Voting Rights Act is the best example of Congress' power to enact implementing legislation that goes beyond the direct prohibitions of the Constitution itself").

Justice STEVENS argues that the subsequent divergence of constitutional and statutory standards is of no moment because, in his view, we "did not [in Beer] purport to distinguish between challenges brought under the Constitution and those brought under the [Voting Rights] statute." Post, at 1510 (opinion dissenting in part and concurring in part). Our citation to White, he posits, incorporated White 's standard into our exception for nonretrogressive apportionments that violate § 5, whether or not that standard continued to coincide with the constitutional standard. In essence, Justice sTEVENS reads Beer as creating an exception for nonretrogressive apportionments that so discriminate on the basis of race or color as to violate any federal law that happens to coincide with what would have amounted to a constitutional violation in 1976. But this reading flatly contradicts the plain language of the exception we recognized, which applies solely to apportionments that "so discriminat[e] on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution." Beer, supra, at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1364 (emphasis added). We cited White, not for itself, but because it embodied the current 483 constitutional standard for a violation of the *1500 Equal Protection Clause. See also 425 U.S., at 142, n. 14, 96 S.Ct., at 1364, n. 14 (noting that New Orleans' plan did "not remotely approach a violation of the constitutional standards enunciated in" White and other cited cases (emphasis added)). When White ceased to represent the current understanding of the Constitution, a violation of its standard—even though that standard was later incorporated in § 2—no longer constituted grounds for denial of preclearance under Beer.

[10] Appellants' next claim is that we must defer to the Attorney General's regulations interpreting the Act, one of which states:

> "In those instances in which the Attorney General concludes that, as proposed, the submitted change is free of discriminatory purpose and retrogressive effect, but also concludes that a bar to implementation of the change is necessary to prevent a clear violation of amended Section 2, the Attorney General shall withhold Section 5 preclearance." 28 CFR § 51.55(b)(2) (1996).

Although we normally accord the Attorney General's construction of the Act great deference, "we only do so if Congress has not expressed its intent with respect to the question, and then only if the administrative interpretation is reasonable." Presley v. Etowah County Comm'n, 502 U.S. 491, 508, 112 S.Ct. 820, 831, 117 L.Ed.2d 51 (1992). Given our longstanding interpretation of § 5, see supra, at 1496–1498, 1498–1500, which Congress has declined to alter by amending the language of § 5, Arkansas Best Corp. v. Commissioner, 485 U.S. 212, 222, n. 7, 108 S.Ct. 971, 977, n. 7, 99 L.Ed.2d 183 (1988) (placing some weight on Congress' failure to express disfavor with our 25–year interpretation of a tax statute), we believe Congress has made it sufficiently clear that a violation of § 2 is not grounds in and of itself for denying preclearance under § 5. That there may be some suggestion to the contrary in the Senate Report to the 1982 Voting Rights Act amendments, S.Rep. No. 97–417, supra, at 12, n. 31, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982 pp. 177, 189, does not 484 change our view. With those amendments, Congress, among other things, renewed § 5 but did so without changing its applicable standard. We doubt that Congress would depart from the settled interpretation of § 5 and impose a demonstrably greater burden on the jurisdictions covered by § 5, see supra, at 1498, by dropping a footnote in a Senate Report instead of amending the statute itself. See Pierce v. Underwood, 487 U.S. 552, 567, 108 S.Ct. 2541, 2551, 101 L.Ed.2d 490 (1988) ("Quite obviously, reenacting precisely the same language would be a strange way to make a change"). See also City of Lockhart v. United States, 460 U.S. 125, 103 S.Ct. 998, 74 L.Ed.2d 863 (1983) (reaching its holding over Justice Marshall's dissent, which raised the argument now advanced by appellants regarding this passage in the Senate Report).

Nor does the portion of the House Report cited by Justice sTEVENS unambiguously call for the incorporation of § 2 into § 5. That portion of the Report states:

> "[M]any voting and election practices currently in effect are outside the scope of [§ 5] ... because they were in existence before 1965.... Under the Voting Rights Act, whether a discriminatory practice or procedure is of recent origin affects only the mechanism that triggers relief, i.e., litigation [under § 2] or preclearance [under § 5]." H.R.Rep. No. 97–227, p. 28 (1981).

The obvious thrust of this passage is to establish that pre–1965 discriminatory practices are not free from scrutiny under the Act just because they need not be precleared under § 5: Such practices might still violate § 2. But to say that pre–1965 practices can be reached solely by § 2 is not to say that all post–1965 changes that might violate § 2 may be reached by both § 2 and § 5 or that "the substantive standards for § 2 and § 5 [are] the same," see post, at 1511 (opinion dissenting in part and concurring in part). Our ultimate conclusion is also not undercut by statements found in the "postenactment legislative record," see post, at 1511, n. 9, given that "the views of a subsequent Congress form a hazardous 485 basis for inferring the intent of an earlier one." United States v. Price, 361 U.S. 304, 313, 80 S.Ct. 326, 332, 4 L.Ed.2d 334 (1960). We therefore decline to give these sources controlling weight.

*1501 Appellants' final appeal is to notions of public policy. They assert that if the district court or Attorney General examined whether a covered jurisdiction's redistricting plan violates § 2 at the same time as ruling on preclearance under § 5, there would be no need for two separate actions and judicial resources would be conserved. Appellants are undoubtedly correct that adopting their interpretation of § 5 would serve judicial economy in those cases where a § 2 challenge follows a § 5 proceeding. But this does not always happen, and the burden on judicial resources might actually increase if appellants' position prevailed because § 2 litigation would effectively be incorporated into every § 5 proceeding.

[11] Appellants lastly argue that preclearance is an equitable remedy, obtained through a declaratory judgment action in district court, see 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, or through the exercise of the Attorney General's discretion, see 28 CFR § 51.52(a) (1996). A finding that a redistricting plan violates § 2 of the Act, they contend, is an equitable "defense," on the basis of which a decisionmaker should, in the exercise of its equitable discretion, be free to deny preclearance. This argument, however, is an attempt to obtain through equity that which the law—i.e., the settled interpretation of § 5—forbids. Because "it is well established that '[c]ourts of equity can no more disregard statutory and constitutional requirements and provisions than can courts of law,' " INS v. Pangilinan, 486 U.S. 875, 883, 108 S.Ct. 2210, 2216, 100 L.Ed.2d 882 (1988) (citing Hedges v. Dixon County, 150 U.S. 182, 192, 14 S.Ct. 71, 74–75, 37 L.Ed. 1044 (1893)), this argument must fail.

Of course, the Attorney General or a private plaintiff remains free to initiate a § 2 proceeding if either believes that a jurisdiction's newly enacted voting "qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure" may violate that section. All we hold today is that preclearance under § 5 may not be denied on that basis alone.

486 III

[12] [13] Appellants next contend that evidence showing that a jurisdiction's redistricting plan dilutes the voting power of minorities is at least relevant in a § 5 proceeding because it tends to prove that the jurisdiction enacted its plan with a discriminatory "purpose." The District Court, reasoning that "[t]he line [between § 2 and § 5] cannot be blurred by allowing a defendant to do indirectly what it cannot do directly," 907 F.Supp., at 445, rejected this argument and held that it "will not permit section 2 evidence to prove discriminatory purpose under section 5," ibid. Because we hold that some of this "§ 2 evidence" may be relevant to establish a jurisdiction's "intent to retrogress" and cannot say with confidence that the District Court considered the evidence proffered to show that the Board's reapportionment plan was dilutive, we vacate this aspect of the District Court's holding and remand. In light of this conclusion, we leave open for another day the question whether the § 5 purpose inquiry ever extends beyond the search for retrogressive intent. See Kentucky Dept. of Corrections v. Thompson, 490 U.S. 454,

465, n. 5, 109 S.Ct. 1904, 1911, n. 5, 104 L.Ed.2d 506 (1989) (declining to decide an issue that "is not necessary to our decision"). Reserving this question is particularly appropriate when, as in this suit, it was not squarely addressed by the decision below or in the parties' briefs on appeal. See Brief for Federal Appellant 23; Brief for Appellant Price et al. 31–33, 34–35; Brief for Appellee 42–43. But in doing so, we do not, contrary to Justice sTEVENS' view, see post, at 1507-1508 (opinion dissenting in part and concurring in part), necessarily assume that the Board enacted the Jury plan with some nonretrogressive, but nevertheless discriminatory, "purpose." The existence of such a purpose, and its relevance to § 5, are issues to be decided on remand.

Although § 5 warrants a denial of preclearance if a covered jurisdiction's voting change "ha[s] the purpose [or] ... the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account 487 of race or color," 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, we have consistently interpreted this language in light of the purpose underlying § 5—"to insure that no voting-procedure *1502 changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities." Beer, 425 U.S., at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1364. Accordingly, we have adhered to the view that the only "effect" that violates § 5 is a retrogressive one. Ibid.; City of Lockhart, 460 U.S., at 134, 103 S.Ct., at 1004.

Evidence is "relevant" if it has "any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence." Fed. Rule Evid. 401. As we observed in Arlington Heights, 429 U.S., at 266, 97 S.Ct., at 563–564, the impact of an official action is often probative of why the action was taken in the first place since people usually intend the natural consequences of their actions. Thus, a jurisdiction that enacts a plan having a dilutive impact is more likely to have acted with a discriminatory intent to dilute minority voting strength than a jurisdiction whose plan has no such impact. A jurisdiction that acts with an intent to dilute minority voting strength is more likely to act with an intent to worsen the position of minority voters—i.e., an intent to retrogress—than a jurisdiction acting with no intent to dilute. The fact that a plan has a dilutive impact therefore makes it "more probable" that the jurisdiction adopting that plan acted with an intent to retrogress than "it would be without the evidence." To be sure, the link between dilutive impact and intent to retrogress is far from direct, but "the basic standard of relevance ... is a liberal one," Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 587, 113 S.Ct. 2786, 2794, 125 L.Ed.2d 469 (1993), and one we think is met here.

That evidence of a plan's dilutive impact may be relevant to the § 5 purpose inquiry does not, of course, mean that such evidence is dispositive of that inquiry. In fact, we have previously observed that a jurisdiction's single decision to choose a redistricting plan that has a dilutive impact does not, without 488 more, suffice to establish that the jurisdiction acted with a discriminatory purpose. Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 914, n. 6, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 1904, n. 6, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) ("[W]e doubt that a showing of discriminatory effect under § 2, alone, could support a claim of discriminatory purpose under § 5"). This is true whether the jurisdiction chose the more dilutive plan because it better comported with its traditional districting principles, see Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S., at 922, 115 S.Ct., at 2491 (rejecting argument that a jurisdiction's failure to adopt the plan with the greatest possible number of majority black districts establishes that it acted with a discriminatory purpose); Shaw, supra, at 912–913, 116 S.Ct., at 1904 (same), or if it chose the plan for no reason at all. Indeed, if a plan's dilutive impact were dispositive, we would effectively incorporate § 2 into § 5, which is a result we find unsatisfactory no matter how it is packaged. See Part II, supra.

As our discussion illustrates, assessing a jurisdiction's motivation in enacting voting changes is a complex task requiring a "sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence as may be available." Arlington Heights, 429 U.S., at 266, 97 S.Ct., at 564. In conducting this inquiry, courts should look to our decision in Arlington Heights for guidance. There, we set forth a framework for analyzing "whether invidious discriminatory purpose was a motivating factor" in a government body's decisionmaking. Ibid. In addition to serving as the framework for examining discriminatory purpose in cases brought under the Equal Protection Clause for over two decades, see, e. g., Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 644, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2825, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (citing Arlington Heights standard in context of Equal Protection Clause challenge to racial gerrymander of districts); Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 618, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 3276, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1982) (evaluating vote dilution claim under Equal Protection Clause using Arlington Heights test); Mobile, 446 U.S., at 70–74, 100 S.Ct., at 1501–1503 (same), the Arlington Heights framework has also been used, at least in part, to evaluate purpose in our previous § 5 cases. See Pleasant Grove v. United States, 479 U.S. 462, 469–470, 107 S.Ct. 794, 798–799, 93 L.Ed.2d 866 (1987) (considering city's history in rejecting annexation of 489 black neighborhood and its departure from normal procedures when calculating costs of annexation *1503 alternatives); see also Busbee v. Smith, 549 F.Supp. 494, 516–517 (D.C. 1982), summarily aff'd, 459 U.S. 1166, 103 S.Ct. 809, 74 L.Ed.2d 1010 (1983) (referring to Arlington Heights test); Port Arthur v. United States, 517 F.Supp. 987, 1019, aff'd, 459 U.S. 159, 103 S.Ct. 530, 74 L.Ed.2d 334 (1982) (same).

[14] The "important starting point" for assessing discriminatory intent under Arlington Heights is "the impact of the official action whether it 'bears more heavily on one race than another.' " 429 U.S., at 266, 97 S.Ct., at 564 (citing Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 242, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 2048–2049, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976)). In a § 5 case, "impact" might include a plan's retrogressive effect and, for the reasons discussed above, its dilutive impact. Other considerations relevant to the purpose inquiry include, among other things, "the historical background of the [jurisdiction's] decision"; "[t]he specific sequence of events leading up to the challenged decision"; "[d]epartures from the normal procedural sequence"; and "[t]he legislative or administrative history, especially ... [any] contemporary statements by members of the decisionmaking body." 429 U.S., at 268, 97 S.Ct., at 565.

We are unable to determine from the District Court's opinion in this action whether it deemed irrelevant all evidence of the dilutive impact of the redistricting plan adopted by the Board. At one point, the District Court correctly stated that "the adoption of one nonretrogressive plan rather than another nonretrogressive plan that contains more majority-black districts cannot by itself give rise to the inference of discriminatory intent." 907 F.Supp., at 450 (emphasis added). This passage implies that the District Court believed that the existence of less dilutive options was at least relevant to, though not dispositive of, its purpose inquiry. While this language is consistent with our holding today, see supra, at 1501–1502, the District Court also declared that "we will not permit section 2 evidence to prove discriminatory purpose under section 5," ibid. With this statement, the District Court appears to endorse the notion that evidence 490 of dilutive impact is irrelevant even to an inquiry into retrogressive intent, a notion we reject. See supra, at 1501–1502.

The Board contends that the District Court actually "presumed that white majority districts had [a dilutive] effect," Brief for Appellee 35, and "cut directly to the dispositive question 'started' by the existence of [a dilutive] impact: did the Board have 'legitimate, nondiscriminatory motives' for adopting its plan[?]" Id., at 33. Even if the Board were correct, the District Court gave no indication that it was assuming the plan's dilutive effect, and we hesitate to attribute to the District Court a rationale it might not have employed. Because we are not satisfied that the District Court considered evidence of the dilutive impact of the Board's redistricting plan, we vacate this aspect of the District Court's opinion. The District Court will have the opportunity to apply the Arlington Heights test on remand as well as to address appellants' additional arguments that it erred in refusing to consider evidence that the Board was in violation of an ongoing injunction "to 'remedy any remaining vestiges of [a] dual [school] system,' " 907 F.Supp., at 449, n. 18.

* * *

The judgment of the District Court is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this decision.

It is so ordered.

Justice THOMAS, concurring.

Although I continue to adhere to the views I expressed in Holder v. Hall, 512 U.S. 874, 891, 114 S.Ct. 2581, 2591, 129 L.Ed.2d 687 (1994) (opinion concurring in judgment), I join today's opinion because it is consistent with our vote dilution precedents. I fully anticipate, however, that as a result of today's holding, all of the problems we have experienced in § 2 vote dilution cases will now be replicated and, indeed, exacerbated in the § 5 retrogression inquiry.

I have trouble, for example, imagining a reapportionment change that could not be deemed "retrogressive" under our 491 vote dilution jurisprudence by a court inclined to find it so. We have held that a reapportionment plan that "enhances the position of racial minorities" by increasing the number *1504 of majority-minority districts does not "have the 'effect' of diluting or abridging the right to vote on account of race within the meaning of § 5." Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1364, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976). But in so holding we studiously avoided addressing one of the necessary consequences of increasing majority-minority districts: Such action necessarily decreases the level of minority influence in surrounding districts, and to that extent "dilutes" the vote of minority voters in those other districts, and perhaps dilutes the influence of the minority group as a whole. See, e.g., Hays v. Louisiana, 936 F.Supp.

360, 364, n. 17 (W.D.La.1996) (three-judge court) (noting that plaintiffs' expert "argues convincingly that our plan, with its one black majority and three influence districts, empowers more black voters statewide than does" a plan with two black-majority districts and five "bleached" districts in which minority influence was reduced in order to create the second black-majority district); cf. Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1007, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 2655, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994) (noting that dilution can occur by "fragmenting the minority voters among several districts ... or by packing them into one or a small number of districts to minimize their influence in the districts next door").

Under our vote dilution jurisprudence, therefore, a court could strike down any reapportionment plan, either because it did not include enough majority-minority districts or because it did (and thereby diluted the minority vote in the remaining districts). A court could presumably even strike down a new reapportionment plan that did not significantly alter the status quo at all, on the theory that such a plan did not measure up to some hypothetical ideal. With such an indeterminate "rule," § 5 ceases to be primarily a prophylactic tool in the important war against discrimination in voting, and instead becomes the means whereby the Federal Government, and particularly the Department of Justice, usurps 492 the legitimate political judgments of the States. And such an empty "rule" inevitably forces the courts to make political judgments regarding which type of apportionment best serves supposed minority interests —judgments that the courts are ill equipped to make.

I can at least find some solace in the belief that today's opinion will force us to confront, with a renewed sense of urgency, this fundamental inconsistency that lies at the heart of our vote dilution jurisprudence.

Beyond my general objection to our vote dilution precedent, the one portion of the majority opinion with which I disagree is the majority's new suggestion that preclearance standards established by the Department of Justice are "normally" entitled to deference. See ante, at 1500.[*] Section 5 sets up alternative routes for preclearance, and the primary route specified is through the District Court for the District of Columbia, not through the Attorney General's office. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973c (generally requiring District Court preclearance, with a proviso that covered jurisdictions may obtain preclearance by the Attorney General in lieu of District Court preclearance, but providing no authority for the Attorney General to preclude judicial preclearance). Requiring the District Court to defer to adverse preclearance decisions by the Attorney General based upon the very preclearance standards she articulates would essentially render the independence of the District Court preclearance route a nullity.

Moreover, given our own "longstanding interpretation of § 5," see ante, at 1500, deference to the particular preclearance regulation addressed in this action would be inconsistent with another of the Attorney General's regulations, which provides: "In making determinations [under § 5] the Attorney General will be guided by the relevant decisions of the 493 Supreme Court of the United States and of other Federal courts." 28 CFR § 51.56 (1996). Thus, while I agree with the majority's decision *1505 not to defer to the Attorney General's standards, I would reach that result on different grounds.

Justice BREYER, with whom Justice GINSBURG joins, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.
I join Parts I and II of the majority opinion, and Part III insofar as it is not inconsistent with this opinion. I write separately to express my disagreement with one aspect of the majority opinion. The majority says that we need not decide "whether the § 5 purpose inquiry ever extends beyond the search for retrogressive intent." Ante, at 1501. In my view, we should decide the question, for otherwise the District Court will find it difficult to evaluate the evidence that we say it must consider. Cf. post, at 1512 (STEVENS, J ., dissenting in part and concurring in part). Moreover, the answer to the question is that the "purpose" inquiry does extend beyond the search for retrogressive intent. It includes the purpose of unconstitutionally diluting minority voting strength.

The language of § 5 itself forbids a change in "any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting," where that change either (1) has the "purpose" or (2) will have the "effect" of "denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color." 42 U.S.C. § 1973c. These last few words reiterate in context the language of the Fifteenth Amendment itself: "The right of citizens ... to vote shall not be denied or abridged ... on account of race [or] color...." This use of constitutional language indicates that one purpose forbidden by the statute is a purpose to act unconstitutionally. And a new plan enacted with the purpose of unconstitutionally diluting minority votes is an unconstitutional plan. Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 62–63, 66, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 1497–1498, 1499, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (plurality opinion); ante, at 1499.

494 Of course, the constitutional language also applies to § 5's prohibition that rests upon "effects." The Court assumes, in its discussion of "effects," that the § 5 word "effects" does not now embody a purely constitutional test, whether or not it ever did so. See ante, at 1497; City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 173, 177, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 1559–1560, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980). And that fact, here, is beside the point. The separate argument about the meaning of the word "effect" concerns how far beyond the Constitution's requirements Congress intended that word to reach. The argument about "purpose" is simply whether Congress intended the word to reach as far as the Constitution itself, embodying those purposes that, in relevant context, the Constitution itself would forbid. I can find nothing in the Court's discussion that shows that Congress intended to restrict the meaning of the statutory word "purpose" short of what the Constitution itself requires. And the Court has previously expressly indicated that minority vote dilution is a harm that § 5 guards against. Allen v. State Bd. of Elections, 393 U.S. 544, 569, 89 S.Ct. 817, 833–834, 22 L.Ed.2d 1 (1969).

Consider a hypothetical example that will clarify the precise legal question here at issue. Suppose that a covered jurisdiction is choosing between two new voting plans, A and B. Neither plan is retrogressive. Plan A violates every traditional districting principle, but from the perspective of minority representation, it maintains the status quo, thereby meeting the "effects" test of § 5. See ante, at 1497–1498. Plan B is basically consistent with traditional districting principles and it also creates one or two new majority-minority districts (in a State where the number of such districts is significantly less than proportional to minority voting age population). Suppose further that the covered jurisdiction adopts Plan A. Without any other proposed evidence or justification, ordinary principles of logic and human experience suggest that the jurisdiction would likely have adopted Plan A with "the purpose ... of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color." § 1973c. It is reasonable 495 to assume that the Constitution would forbid the use of such a plan. See Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 617, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 3275, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1982) (Fourteenth Amendment covers vote dilution claims); Mobile, 446 U.S., at 66, 100 S.Ct., at 1499 (plurality opinion) (same). And compare id., at 62–63, 100 S.Ct., at 1497–1498 *1506 (intentional vote dilution may be illegal under the Fifteenth Amendment) and Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 346, 81 S.Ct. 125, 129–130, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960) (Fifteenth Amendment covers municipal boundaries drawn to exclude blacks), with Mobile, supra, at 84, n. 3, 100 S.Ct., at 1509, n. 3 (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment) (Mobile plurality said that Fifteenth Amendment does not reach vote dilution); Voinovich v. Quilter, 507 U.S. 146, 159, 113 S.Ct. 1149, 1158, 122 L.Ed.2d 500 (1993) ("This Court has not decided whether the Fifteenth Amendment applies to vote-dilution claims ..."); Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 645, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 2825–2826, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993) (endorsing the Gomillion concurrence's Fourteenth Amendment approach); and Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 142, n. 14, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1364, n. 14, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976). Then, to read § 5's "purpose" language to require approval of Plan A, even though the jurisdiction cannot provide a neutral explanation for its choice, would be both to read § 5 contrary to its plain language and also to believe that Congress would have wanted a § 5 court (or the Attorney General) to approve an unconstitutional plan adopted with an unconstitutional purpose.

In light of this example, it is not surprising that this Court has previously indicated that the purpose part of § 5 prohibits a plan adopted with the purpose of unconstitutionally diluting minority voting strength, whether or not the plan is retrogressive in its effect. In Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996); for example, the Court doubted "that a showing of discriminatory effect under § 2, alone, could support a claim of discriminatory purpose under § 5." Id., at 914, n. 6, 116 S.Ct., at 1904, n. 6 (emphasis added). The word "alone" suggests that the evidence of a discriminatory effect there at issue—evidence of dilution—could be relevant to a discriminatory purpose claim. And if so, the more natural understanding of § 5 is that an unlawful purpose includes more than simply a purpose to 496 retrogress. Otherwise, dilution would either dispositively show an unlawful discriminatory effect (if retrogressive) or it would almost always be irrelevant (if not retrogressive). Either way, it would not normally have much to do with unlawful purpose. See also the discussions in Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358, 378–379, 95 S.Ct. 2296, 2307–2308, 45 L.Ed.2d 245 (1975) (annexation plan did not have an impermissible dilutive effect but the Court remanded for a determination of whether there was an impermissible § 5 purpose); Pleasant Grove v. United States, 479 U.S. 462, 471–472, and n. 11, 107 S.Ct. 794, 800, and n. 11, 93 L.Ed.2d 866 (1987) (purpose to minimize future black voting strength is impermissible under § 5); Port Arthur v. United States, 459 U.S. 159, 168, 103 S.Ct. 530, 536, 74 L.Ed.2d 334 (1982) (a plan adopted for a discriminatory purpose is invalid under § 5 even if it "might otherwise be said to reflect the political strength of the minority community"); post, at 1512 (STEVENS, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part).

Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995), also implicitly assumed that § 5's "purpose" stretched beyond the purely retrogressive. There, the Justice Department pointed out that Georgia made a choice between two redistricting plans, one of which (call it Plan A) had more majority-black districts than the other (call it Plan B). The Department argued that the fact that Georgia chose Plan B showed a forbidden § 5 discriminatory purpose. The Court rejected this argument, but the reason that the majority gave for that rejection is important. The Court pointed out that Plan B embodied traditional state districting principles. It reasoned that "[t]he State's policy of adhering to other districting principles instead of creating as many majority-minority districts as possible does not support an inference" of an unlawful discriminatory purpose. Id., at 924, 115 S.Ct., at 2492. If the only relevant "purpose" were a retrogressive purpose, this reasoning, with its reliance upon traditional districting principles, would have been beside the point. The Court would have concerned itself only with Georgia's intent to worsen the position of minorities, not with the reasons why Georgia could 497 have adopted one of two potentially ameliorative plans. Indeed, the Court indicated that an ameliorative plan would run afoul of the § 5 purpose test if it violated the Constitution. *1507 Ibid. See also Shaw v. Hunt, supra, at 912–913, 116 S.Ct., at 1904.

In sum, the Court today should make explicit an assumption implicit in its prior cases. Section 5 prohibits a covered State from making changes in its voting practices and procedures where those changes have the unconstitutional "purpose" of unconstitutionally diluting minority voting strength.

Justice STEVENS, with whom Justice SOUTER joins, dissenting in part and concurring in part.

In my view, a plan that clearly violates § 2 is not entitled to preclearance under § 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The majority's contrary view would allow the Attorney General of the United States to place her stamp of approval on a state action that is in clear violation of federal law. It would be astonishing if Congress had commanded her to do so. In fact, however, Congress issued no such command. Surely no such command can be found in the text of § 5 of the Voting Rights Act.[1] Moreover, a fair review of the text 498 and the legislative history of the 1982 amendment to § 2 of that Act indicates that Congress intended the Attorney General to deny preclearance under § 5 whenever it was clear that a new voting practice was prohibited by § 2. This does not mean that she must make an independent inquiry into possible violations of § 2 whenever a request for preclearance is made. It simply means that, as her regulations provide, she must refuse preclearance when "necessary to prevent a clear violation of amended section 2." 28 CFR § 51.55(b)(2) (1996).

It is, of course, well settled that the Attorney General must refuse to preclear a new election procedure in a covered jurisdiction if it will "lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise." Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 141, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 1364, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976). A retrogressive effect or a retrogressive purpose is a sufficient basis for denying a preclearance request under § 5. Today, however, the Court holds that retrogression is the only kind of effect that will justify denial of preclearance under § 5, ante, at 1496–1501, and it assumes that "the § 5 purpose inquiry [never] extends beyond the search for retrogressive intent." Ante, at 1501. While I agree that this action must be remanded even under the Court's miserly interpretation of § 5, I disagree with the Court's holding/assumption that § 5 is concerned only with retrogressive effects and purposes.

Before explaining my disagreement with the Court, I think it important to emphasize the three factual predicates that underlie our analysis of the issues. First, we assume 499 that the plan submitted by the Bossier Parish School Board (Board) was not "retrogressive" because it did not make matters any worse than they had been in the past. None of the 12 districts had ever had a black majority and a black person had never been elected to the Board. App. to Juris. Statement 67a. Second, because the majority in *1508 both the District Court and this Court found that even clear violations of § 2 must be precleared and thus found it unnecessary to discuss whether § 2 was violated in this action, we may assume that the record discloses a "clear violation" of § 2. This means that, in the language of § 2, it is perfectly clear that "the political processes leading to nomination or election [to positions on the Board] are not equally open to participation by members of [the African–American race] in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to ... elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).[2] Third, if the Court is correct in assuming that the purpose inquiry under § 5 may be limited to evidence of "retrogressive intent," it must also be willing to assume that the documents submitted in support of the request for preclearance clearly establish that the plan was adopted for the specific purpose of preventing African–Americans from obtaining representation on the Board. Indeed, for the purpose of analyzing the legal issues, we must assume that Judge Kessler, concurring in part and dissenting in part, accurately summarized the evidence when she wrote:

> "The evidence in this case demonstrates overwhelmingly that the School Board's decision to adopt the Police Jury redistricting plan was motivated by discriminatory 500 purpose. The adoption of the Police Jury plan bears heavily on the black community because it denies its members a reasonable opportunity to elect a candidate of their choice. The history of discrimination by the Bossier School System and the Parish itself demonstrates the Board's continued refusal to address the concerns of the black community in Bossier Parish. The sequence of events leading up to the adoption of the plan illustrate the Board's discriminatory purpose. The School Board's substantive departures from traditional districting principles is similarly probative of discriminatory motive. Three School Board members have acknowledged that the Board is hostile to black representation. Moreover, some of the purported rationales for the School Board's decision are flat-out untrue, and others are so glaringly inconsistent with the facts of the case that they are obviously pretexts." 907 F.Supp. 434, 463 (D.C.1995).
>
> If the purpose and the effect of the Board's plan were simply to maintain the discriminatory status quo as described by Judge Kessler, the plan would not have been retrogressive. But, as I discuss below, that is not a sufficient reason for concluding that it complied with § 5.

I

In the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Congress enacted a complex scheme of remedies for racial discrimination in voting. As originally enacted, § 2 of the Act was "an uncontroversial provision" that "simply restated" the prohibitions against such discrimination "already contained in the Fifteenth Amendment," Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 61, 100 S.Ct., at 1496–1497 (1980) (plurality opinion). Like the constitutional prohibitions against discriminatory districting practices that were invalidated in cases like Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960), and White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), § 2 was made applicable to every State and political subdivision in the country. 501 Section 5, on the other hand, was highly controversial because it imposed novel, extraordinary remedies in certain areas where discrimination had been most flagrant. See South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 334–335, 86 S.Ct. 803, 821–822, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966).[3] *1509 Jurisdictions like Bossier Parish in Louisiana are covered by § 5 because their history of discrimination against African–Americans was a matter of special concern to Congress. Because these jurisdictions had resorted to various strategies to avoid complying with court orders to remedy discrimination, "Congress had reason to suppose that [they] might try similar maneuvers in the future in order to evade the remedies for voting discrimination contained in the Act itself." Id., at 335, 86 S.Ct., at 822. Thus Congress enacted § 5, not to maintain the discriminatory status quo, but to stay ahead of efforts by the most resistant jurisdictions to undermine the Act's purpose of "rid[ding] the country of racial discrimination." Id., at 315, 86 S.Ct., at 812 ("The heart of the Act is a complex scheme of stringent remedies aimed at areas where voting discrimination has been most flagrant").

In areas of the country lacking a history of pervasive discrimination, Congress presumed that voting practices were generally lawful. Accordingly, the burden of proving a violation of § 2 has always rested on the party challenging the voting practice. The situation is dramatically different in covered jurisdictions. In those jurisdictions, § 5 flatly prohibits the adoption of any new voting procedure unless the State or political subdivision institutes an action in the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia and obtains a declaratory judgment that the change will not have a discriminatory purpose or effect. See 42 U.S.C. § 1973c. The burden of proving compliance with the Act rests on the jurisdiction. A proviso to § 5 gives the Attorney General the authority to allow the new procedure to go into effect, but 502 like the immigration statutes that give her broad discretion to waive deportation of undesirable aliens, it does not expressly impose any limit on her discretion to refuse preclearance. See ibid. The Attorney General's discretion is, however, cabined by regulations that are presumptively valid if they "are reasonable and do not conflict with the Voting Rights Act itself," Georgia v. United States, 411 U.S. 526, 536, 93 S.Ct. 1702, 1708, 36 L.Ed.2d 472 (1973). Those regulations provide that preclearance will generally be granted if a proposed change "is free of discriminatory purpose and retrogressive effect"; they also provide, however, that in "those instances" in which the Attorney General concludes "that a bar to implementation of the change is necessary to prevent a clear violation of amended section

2," preclearance shall be withheld.[4] There is no basis for the Court's speculation that litigants would so " 'routinely,' " ante, at 1497, employ this 10–year–old regulation as to "make compliance with § 5 contingent upon compliance with § 2," ibid. Nor do the regulations require the jurisdiction to assume the burden of proving the absence of vote 503 dilution, see ante, at 1498. They merely preclude preclearance when "necessary to prevent a clear violation of ... section 2." While the burden of disproving discriminatory purpose or retrogressive effect is on the submitting jurisdiction, if the Attorney General's conclusion that the change would clearly violate § 2 is challenged, the burden on that issue, as in *1510 any § 2 challenge, should rest on the Attorney General.[5]

The Court does not suggest that this regulation is inconsistent with the text of § 5. Nor would this be persuasive, since the language of § 5 forbids preclearance of any voting practice that would have "the purpose [or] effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color." 42 U.S.C. § 1973c. Instead the Court rests its entire analysis on the flawed premise that our cases hold that a change, even if otherwise unlawful, cannot have an effect prohibited by § 5 unless that effect is retrogressive. The two cases on which the Court relies, Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976), and City of Lockhart v. United States, 460 U.S. 125, 103 S.Ct. 998, 74 L.Ed.2d 863 (1983), do hold (as the current regulations provide) that proof that a change is not retrogressive is normally sufficient to justify preclearance under § 5. In neither case, however, was the Court confronted with the question whether that showing would be sufficient if the proposed change was so discriminatory that it clearly violated some other federal law. 504 In fact, in Beer—which held that a legislative reapportionment enhancing the position of African–American voters did not have a discriminatory effect—the Court stated that "an ameliorative new legislative apportionment cannot violate § 5 unless the new apportionment itself so discriminates on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution." 425 U.S., at 141, 96 S.Ct., at 1364.[6] Thus, to the extent that the Beer Court addressed the question at all, it suggested that certain nonretrogressive changes that were nevertheless discriminatory should not be precleared.

The Court discounts the significance of the "unless" clause because it refers to a constitutional violation rather than a statutory violation. According to the Court's reading, the Beer dictum at most precludes preclearance of changes that violate the Constitution rather than changes that violate § 2. This argument is unpersuasive. As the majority notes, the Beer Court cites White v. Regester, 412 U.S., at 766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–2340, which found unconstitutional a reapportionment scheme that gave African–American residents "less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice." Because, in 1976, when Beer was decided, the § 2 standard was coextensive with the constitutional standard, Beer did not purport to distinguish between challenges brought under the Constitution and those brought under the statute. Rather Beer 's dictum suggests that any changes that violate the standard established in White v. Regester should not be precleared.[7]

505 As the Court recognizes, ante, at 1499, the law has changed in two respects since the announcement of the Beer dictum. In 1980, in what was perceived by Congress to be a change in the standard applied in White v. Regester, a plurality of this Court concluded that discriminatory purpose is an essential *1511 element of a constitutional vote dilution challenge. See Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S., at 62, 100 S.Ct., at 1497. In reaction to that decision, in 1982 Congress amended § 2 by placing in the statute the language used in the White opinion to describe what is commonly known as the "results" standard for evaluating vote dilution challenges. See 96 Stat. 134 (now codified at 42 U.S.C. §§ 1973(a)-(b)); Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 35, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 2758, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986).[8] Thus Congress preserved, as a matter of statutory law, the very same standard that the Court had identified in Beer as an exception to the general rule requiring preclearance of nonretrogressive changes. Because in 1975 Beer required denial of preclearance for voting plans that violated the White standard, it follows that Congress, in preserving the White standard, intended also that the Attorney General should continue to refuse to preclear plans violating that standard.

That intent is confirmed by the legislative history of the 1982 Act. The Senate Report states:

> "Under the rule of Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976), a voting change which is ameliorative is not objectionable unless the change 'itself so discriminates on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution.' 425 U.S. at 141 [96 S.Ct., at 1364]; see also 142 n. 14 [96 S.Ct., at 1364, n. 14] (citing to the dilution cases from Fortson v. Dorsey [379 U.S. 433, 85 S.Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965),] through White v. Regester). In light of the amendment to section

2, it is intended that a section 5 objection also follow if a new voting procedure itself so 506 discriminates as to violate section 2." S.Rep. No. 97–417, p. 12, n. 31 (1982) U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982 pp. 177, 189.

The House Report conveys the same message in different language. It unequivocally states that whether a discriminatory practice or procedure was in existence before 1965 (and therefore only subject to attack under § 2) or is the product of a recent change (and therefore subject to preclearance under § 5) "affects only the mechanism that triggers relief." H.R.Rep. No. 97–227, p. 28 (1981). This statement plainly indicates that the Committee understood the substantive standards for § 2 and § 5 violations to be the same whenever a challenged practice in a covered jurisdiction represents a change subject to the dictates of § 5.[9] Thus, it is reasonable to assume that Congress, by endorsing the "unless" clause in Beer, contemplated the denial of preclearance for any change that clearly violates amended § 2. The majority, by belittling this legislative history, abrogates Congress'effort, 507 in enacting the 1982 amendments, "to broaden the protection afforded by the Voting Rights Act." Chisom v. Roemer, 501 U.S. 380, 404, 111 S.Ct. 2354, 2368, 115 L.Ed.2d 348 (1991).

Despite this strong evidence of Congress' intent, the majority holds that no deference to the Attorney General's regulation is warranted. The Court suggests that had Congress wished to alter "our longstanding interpretation" *1512 of § 5, Congress would have made this clear. Ante, at 1500. But nothing in our "settled interpretation" of § 5, ante, at 1500, is inconsistent with the Attorney General's reading of the statute. To the contrary, our precedent actually indicates that nonretrogressive plans that are otherwise discriminatory under White v. Regester should not be precleared. As neither the language nor the legislative history of § 5 can be said to conflict with the view that changes that clearly violate § 2 are not entitled to preclearance, there is no legitimate basis for refusing to defer to the Attorney General's regulation. See Presley v. Etowah County Comm'n, 502 U.S. 491, 508, 112 S.Ct. 820, 831, 117 L.Ed.2d 51 (1992).

II

In Part III of its opinion the Court correctly concludes that this action must be remanded for further proceedings because the District Court erroneously refused to consider certain evidence that is arguably relevant to whether the Board has proved an absence of discriminatory purpose under § 5. Because the Court appears satisfied that the disputed evidence may be probative of an " 'intent to retrogress,' " it concludes that it is unnecessary to decide "whether the § 5 purpose inquiry ever extends beyond the search for retrogressive intent." Ante, at 1501. For two reasons, I think it most unwise to reverse on such a narrow ground.

First, I agree with Justice bREYER, see ante, at 1505, that there is simply no basis for imposing this limitation on the purpose inquiry. None of our cases have held that § 5's purpose test is limited to retrogressive intent. In 508 Pleasant Grove v. United States, 479 U.S. 462, 469–472, 107 S.Ct. 794, 798–801, 93 L.Ed.2d 866 (1987), for instance, we found that the city had failed to prove that its annexation of certain white areas lacked a discriminatory purpose. Despite the fact that the annexation lacked a retrogressive effect, we found it was subject to § 5 preclearance. Ibid.; see also id., at 474–475, 107 S.Ct., at 801–802 (Powell, J., dissenting) (contending that the majority erred in holding that a discriminatory purpose could be found even though there was no intent "to have a retrogressive effect"). Furthermore, limiting the § 5 purpose inquiry to retrogressive intent is inconsistent with the basic purpose of the Act. Assume, for example, that the record unambiguously disclosed a long history of deliberate exclusion of African–Americans from participating in local elections, including a series of changes each of which was adopted for the specific purpose of maintaining the status quo. None of those changes would have been motivated by an "intent to regress," but each would have been motivated by a "discriminatory purpose" as that term is commonly understood. Given the long-settled understanding that § 5 of the Act was enacted to prevent covered jurisdictions from "contriving new rules of various kinds for the sole purpose of perpetuating voting discrimination," South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S., at 335, 86 S.Ct., at 822, it is inconceivable that Congress intended to authorize preclearance of changes adopted for the sole purpose of perpetuating an existing pattern of discrimination.

Second, the Court's failure to make this point clear can only complicate the task of the District Court on remand. If that court takes the narrow approach suggested by the Court, another appeal will surely follow; if a majority ultimately agrees with my view of the issue, another remand will then be necessary. On the other hand, if the District Court does not limit its consideration to evidence of retrogressive intent, and if it therefore rules against the Board, appellees will bring the action back and the Court would then have to resolve the issue definitively.

509 In sum, both the interest in orderly procedure and the fact that a correct answer to the issue is pellucidly clear should be sufficient to persuade the Court to state definitively that § 5 preclearance should be denied if Judge Kessler's evaluation of the record is correct.

Accordingly, while I concur in the judgment insofar as it remands the action for further proceedings, I dissent from the decision insofar as it fails to authorize proceedings in accordance with the views set forth above.

All Citations

520 U.S. 471, 117 S.Ct. 1491, 137 L.Ed.2d 730, 65 USLW 4308, 97 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 3519, 97 Daily Journal D.A.R. 6001, 97 CJ C.A.R. 679, 10 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 437

Footnotes

* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

* I do not address the separate question, not presented by this action, whether the Department's interpretation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as opposed to its articulation of standards applicable to its own preclearance determinations, is entitled to deference. The regulation at issue here only purports to be the latter.

1 As originally enacted, § 5 provided:

"Sec. 5. Whenever a State or political subdivision with respect to which the prohibitions set forth in section 4(a) are in effect shall enact or seek to administer any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on November 1, 1964, such State or subdivision may institute an action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, and unless and until the court enters such judgment no person shall be denied the right to vote for failure to comply with such qualification prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure: Provided, That such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure may be enforced without such proceeding if the qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure has been submitted by the chief legal officer or other appropriate official of such State or subdivision to the Attorney General and the Attorney General has not interposed an objection within sixty days after such submission, except that neither the Attorney General's failure to object nor a declaratory judgment entered under this section shall bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure. Any action under this section shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28 of the United States Code [28 U.S.C. § 2284] and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court." 79 Stat. 439.

2 Although the majority in the District Court refused to consider any of the evidence relevant to a § 2 violation, the parties' stipulations suggest that the plan violated § 2. For instance, the parties' stipulated that there had been a long history of discrimination against black voters in Bossier Parish, see App. to Juris. Statement 130a–140a; that voting in Bossier Parish was racially polarized, see id., at 122a–127a; and that it was possible to draw two majority black districts without violating traditional districting principles, see id., at 76a, 82a–83a, 114a–115a.

3 Section 4 of the Act sets forth the formula for identifying the jurisdictions in which such discrimination had occurred, see South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S., at 317–318, 86 S.Ct., at 812–813.

4 Title 28 CFR § 51.55 (1996) provides:

"Consistency with constitutional and statutory requirements.

"(a) Consideration in general. In making a determination the Attorney General will consider whether the change is free of discriminatory purpose and retrogressive effect in light of, and with particular attention being given to, the requirements of the 14th, 15th, and 24th amendments to the Constitution, 42 U.S.C. 1971(a) and (b), sections 2, 4(a), 4(f)(2), 4(f)(4), 201, 203(c), and 208 of the Act, and other constitutional and statutory provisions designed to safeguard the right to vote from denial or abridgment on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group.

"(b) Section 2. (1) Preclearance under section 5 of a voting change will not preclude any legal action under section 2 by the Attorney General if implementation of the change subsequently demonstrates that such action is appropriate.

"(2) In those instances in which the Attorney General concludes that, as proposed, the submitted change is free of discriminatory purpose and retrogressive effect, but also concludes that a bar to implementation of the change is necessary to prevent a clear violation of amended section 2, the Attorney General shall withhold section 5 preclearance."

5 Thus, I agree with those courts that have found that the jurisdiction is not required to prove that its proposed change will not violate § 2 in order to receive preclearance. See Arizona v. Reno, 887 F.Supp. 318, 321 (D.D.C.1995). Although several three-judge District Courts have concluded that § 2 standards should not be incorporated into § 5, none has held that preclearance should be granted when there is a clear violation of § 2; rather, they appear simply to have determined that a § 2 inquiry is not routinely required in a § 5 case. See, e.g., Georgia v. Reno, 881 F.Supp. 7, 12–14 (D.D.C.1995); New York v. United States, 874 F.Supp. 394, 398–399 (D.D.C.1994); cf. Burton v. Sheheen, 793 F.Supp. 1329, 1350 (D.S.C.1992) (holding that although courts are not "obligated to completely graft" § 2 standards onto § 5, "[i]t would be incongruous for the court to adopt a plan which did not comport with the standards and guidelines of § 2").

6 In Lockhart the Court disavowed reliance on the ameliorative character of the change reviewed in Beer, see 460 U.S., at 134, n. 10, 103 S.Ct., at 1004, n. 10. It left open the question whether Congress had altered the Beer standard when it amended § 2 in 1982, 460 U.S., at 133, n. 9, 103 S.Ct., at 1003, n. 9, and said nothing about the possible significance of a violation of a constitutional or statutory prohibition against vote dilution.

7 In response to this dissent, the majority contends that, at most, Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 96 S.Ct. 1357, 47 L.Ed.2d 629 (1976), allows denial of preclearance for those changes that violate the Constitution. See ante, at 1499–1500. Thus, the majority apparently concedes that our "settled interpretation," ante, at 1500, of § 5 supports a denial of preclearance for at least some nonretrogressive changes.

8 The amended version of § 2 tracks the language in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 2339–2340, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973).

9 The postenactment legislative record also supports the Attorney General's interpretation of § 5. In 1985, the Attorney General first proposed regulations requiring a denial of preclearance "based upon violation of Section 2 if there is clear and convincing evidence of such a violation." 50 Fed.Reg. 19122, 19131. Congress held oversight hearings in which several witnesses, including the Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, testified that clear violations of § 2 should not be precleared. See Oversight Hearings before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary, Proposed Changes to Regulations Governing Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 99th Cong., 1st Sess., 47, 149, 151–152 (1985). Following these hearings, the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights issued a Report in which it concluded "that it is a proper interpretation of the legislative history of the 1982 amendments to use Section 2 standards in the course of making Section 5 determinations." Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary, Voting Rights Act: Proposed Section 5 Regulations, 99th Cong., 2d Sess., Ser. No. 9, p. 5 (Comm. Print 1986). Although this history does not provide direct evidence of the enacting Congress' intent, it does constitute an informed expert opinion concerning the validity of the Attorney General's regulation.

86 F.4th 574
United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.

Press ROBINSON; Edgar Cage; Dorothy Nairne; Edwin Rene Soule; Alice Washington; Clee Earnest Lowe; Davante Lewis; Martha Davis; Ambrose Sims; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Louisiana State Conference, also known as NAACP;Power Coalition for Equity and Justice, Plaintiffs—Appellees,

v.

Kyle ARDOIN, in his official capacity as Secretary of State for Louisiana, Defendant—Appellant,

Clay Schexnayder; Patrick Page Cortez; State of Louisiana - Attorney General Jeff Landry, Intervenor Defendants—Appellants, Edward Galmon, Sr.; Ciara Hart; Norris Henderson; Tramelle Howard, Plaintiffs—Appellees,

v.

Kyle Ardoin, in his official capacity as Secretary of State for Louisiana, Defendant —Appellant,

Clay Schexnayder; Patrick Page Cortez; State of Louisiana - Attorney General Jeff Landry, Movants—Appellants.

No. 22-30333
|
FILED November 10, 2023

Synopsis

Background: Black voters brought actions against Louisiana officials under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, alleging that congressional redistricting map enacted by the state legislature unlawfully diluted their voting rights, in violation of § 2, by including only one majority-minority district rather than two. The actions were consolidated, and voters moved for a preliminary injunction barring use of the legislature's map and requiring adoption of a remedial map. The United States District Court for the Middle District of Louisiana, Shelly D. Dick, Chief Judge, 605 F. Supp. 3d 759, granted voters' motion. Defendants appealed, and on defendants' request, the Court of Appeals initially granted an administrative stay but subsequently, 37 F.4th 208, vacated that stay and denied a stay pending appeal. On defendants' application for a stay, the Supreme Court, 142 S. Ct. 2892, stayed the district court's order pending the decision later issued in Allen v. Milligan, 599 U.S. 1, and granted a writ of certiorari before judgment. Upon issuance of the decision in Allen, the Supreme Court vacated the stay and dismissed the writ of certiorari as improvidently granted, thereby returning the matter to the Court of Appeals.

Holdings: The Court of Appeals, Southwick, Circuit Judge, held that:

[1] district court did not clearly err in finding that voters were likely to establish first element of Gingles framework, namely that the Black voting-age population was sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district;

[2] district court did not clearly err in finding that illustrative redistricting plans offered by voters were not racially predominant gerrymanders prohibited by Equal Protection Clause;

[3] district court did not clearly err in finding that voters were likely to establish third element of Gingles framework, namely that the white majority voted sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat the minority-preferred candidate;

[4] district court, when assessing the totality of the circumstances in connection with granting preliminary injunction, properly considered racial proportionality as one factor among many;

[5] preliminary injunction granted by district court was not barred, or required to be stayed, because of proximity of injunction's issuance to election that had been upcoming at time of its issuance;

[6] preliminary injunction pending trial was no longer warranted given the amount of time remaining before next election; and

[7] appellate court would afford Louisiana legislature a chance to enact a new redistricting map before further proceedings, and substantive proceedings in district court would be stayed for specified period.

Preliminary injunction vacated; remanded with instructions.

West Headnotes (39)

[1] Federal Courts Preliminary injunction; temporary restraining order

An appellate court reviews a grant of a preliminary injunction by a district court for any abuse of discretion.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Injunction Extraordinary or unusual nature of remedy

Injunction Grounds in general; multiple factors

A preliminary injunction is an extraordinary remedy that will be issued only if a movant establishes four elements: (1) a substantial likelihood of success on the merits; (2) a substantial threat of irreparable injury if the injunction is not issued; (3) that the threatened injury if the injunction is denied outweighs any harm that will result if the injunction is granted; and (4) that the grant of an injunction will not disserve the public interest.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Federal Courts Preliminary injunction; temporary restraining order

Because each of the four elements a movant must show to obtain a preliminary injunction presents a mixed question of fact and law, the district court's legal conclusions as to the elements are reviewed de novo, and its factual findings as to the elements are reviewed for clear error.

[4] Federal Courts Preliminary injunction; temporary restraining order

A district court's factual finding with respect to a movant's request for a preliminary injunction is "clearly erroneous" when a reviewing court is left with the definite and firm conviction, after reviewing the entire record, that the district court erred.

[5] Election Law Parties; standing

Federal Courts Civil rights and discrimination in general

Congress waived state sovereign immunity in enacting the Voting Rights Act, and § 2 of the act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, can therefore be enforced by any "aggrieved person," including a private party. U.S. Const. Amend. 11; Voting Rights Act of 1965 §§ 2, 3, 52 U.S.C.A. §§ 10301, 10302.

[6] Election Law Vote Dilution

Claims under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, for dilution of a minority group's voting rights are evaluated under the Gingles framework, which requires a plaintiff to satisfy three preconditions: (1) the minority group must be sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district, meaning the district complies with traditional districting criteria, such as being contiguous and reasonably compact; (2) the minority group must be politically cohesive; and (3) the white majority must be shown to vote sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat the minority-preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[7] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

The essence of a claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, is that a certain electoral law, practice, or structure interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by Black and white voters to elect their preferred representatives.

[8] Election Law Dilution of voting power in general

If a plaintiff bringing a claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act for dilution of a minority group's voting rights fails to establish any one of the three preconditions under the Gingles framework for such a claim, a court need not consider the other two, leaving the plaintiff with no remedy. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[9] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Once a plaintiff has shown the three threshold conditions under the Gingles framework for establishing a violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, the plaintiff then must show, under the totality of the circumstances, that the political process is not equally open to minority voters, causing a § 2 violation. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[10] Election Law Apportionment and Reapportionment

When addressing the merits of a claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, a court must determine whether plaintiffs have an equal opportunity in the voting process to elect their preferred candidate under the challenged districting map, and if the answer is no, there likely is a § 2 violation. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[11] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

District court did not clearly err in finding, in connection with granting preliminary injunction to Black voters in their vote-dilution action against Louisiana officials under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, that voters were likely to establish the first element of the Gingles framework for their claim, namely that the minority group was sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district, where voters' experts testified that state's Black population was compacted in easily definable areas, and voters' illustrative redistricting plans were more compact than enacted plan. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[12] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

The first Gingles precondition for a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, focuses on geographical compactness and numerosity and establishes whether a minority population has the potential to elect its preferred candidate in a single-member district. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[13] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Election Law Weight and sufficiency

To satisfy the first Gingles precondition for a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, the plaintiff must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the minority population in the potential election district is greater than 50%; this percentage is analyzed in terms of the Black voting-age population (BVAP) because only eligible voters can affect the Gingles analysis, and the large minority population must also be sufficiently compact such that a reasonably compact majority-minority district can be drawn. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[14] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

"Compactness" of a minority population in a potential election district, for purposes of the first Gingles precondition for a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, is an imprecise concept, but traditional districting principles like maintaining communities of interest and traditional boundaries should be considered. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 3, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10302.

[15] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

"Communities of interest," for purposes assessing the compactness of a minority population in a potential election district under the first Gingles precondition for a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, vary between states and are generally defined by the given state's districting guidelines. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[16] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

When evaluating geographical compactness and numerosity of proposed election districts, the first Gingles precondition for a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, courts must determine if the proposed illustrative districts have similar needs and interests beyond race.

[17] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

In a vote-dilution action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, when assessing the first element of the Gingles framework for such a claim, namely that a minority group is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district, a court is not required to conduct a beauty contest between a challenged redistricting map and illustrative maps offered by plaintiffs. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[18] Federal Courts Definite and firm conviction of mistake

Under the clear-error standard for appellate review of a district court's factual findings, reversal requires the appellate court to be left with a definite and firm conviction that the district court erred after reviewing the record.

[19] Injunction Actions and Proceedings

How a party addresses an issue at the time that a preliminary injunction is being sought, particularly when a Supreme Court decision is later handed down before the next stage of the proceedings, does not bind the party as the case moves along further.

[20] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Impermissible racial gerrymandering in a plaintiff's proposed redistricting maps in vote-dilution action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, can be found when the minority population is compacted together and there is no integrity in terms of traditional, neutral redistricting criteria. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[21] Election Law Method of apportionment

Awareness of race is permissible under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, and redistricting will often require awareness of the demographics of proposed districts; such race consciousness does not inevitably lead to impermissible race discrimination, but awareness of race becomes impermissible racial predominance when district lines are drawn with the traditional, race-neutral districting criteria considered after a race-based decision is made. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[22] Federal Courts Elections, voting, and political rights

An appellate court reviews for clear error a district court's finding as to whether race predominated in the drawing of proposed redistricting maps in an action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[23] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

District court did not clearly err in finding, in connection with granting preliminary injunction to Black voters in their vote-dilution action against Louisiana officials under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a way that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, that illustrative redistricting plans offered by voters were not racially predominant gerrymanders prohibited by Equal Protection Clause, even though plans had goal of achieving two majority-minority districts, where that goal was considered alongside and subordinate to other race-neutral traditional redistricting criteria such as communities of interest, political subdivisions, parish lines, culture, religion, etc. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[24] Election Law Method of apportionment

An express racial target for composition of a voting district in a proposed redistricting map is just one consideration in a traditional redistricting analysis under Gingles in an action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a way that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[25] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

Racial gerrymandering is prohibited by the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. U.S. Const. Amend. 14.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[26] Election Law Vote Dilution

Racial consciousness as a factor in the drawing of illustrative maps does not defeat a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color; such a claim under § 2 is distinct from a racial gerrymander in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. U.S. Const. Amend. 14; Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[27] Constitutional Law Electoral districts and gerrymandering

A racial gerrymander that violates the Equal Protection Clause is present when citizens are assigned by the state to legislative districts based on race, such that one district will have racially similar individuals who otherwise have little in common geographically or politically. U.S. Const. Amend. 14.

[28] Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

The third Gingles precondition for a vote-dilution claim under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, focuses on racially polarized voting; it requires establishing the plausibility that the challenged legislative districting thwarts minority voting on account of race, meaning proof not merely that white bloc voting is present, but rather that white bloc voting amounts to legally significant racially polarized voting that can generally minimize or cancel Black voters' ability to elect their preferred candidate. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[29] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

District court did not clearly err in finding, in connection with granting preliminary injunction to Black voters in their vote-dilution action against Louisiana officials under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a way that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, that, despite the existence of white crossover voting in relevant geographical areas, voters established the third Gingles precondition for their claim, namely that the white majority voted sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat the minority-preferred candidate, where experts concluded that under challenged redistricting plan adopted by state, minority-preferred candidates would usually fail. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[30] Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

In a vote-dilution action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, the relevant consideration under the third Gingles precondition, which asks whether the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat the minority-preferred candidate, is the challenged redistricting plan, not some hypothetical plan that could have been, but was not, drawn by the state. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[31] Election Law Compactness and cohesiveness of minority group

Election Law Racially polarized or bloc voting

The analysis of whether white crossover voting undermines the potential of electing minority-preferred candidates is properly determined in a vote-dilution action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act under the first Gingles precondition, namely whether a minority population is sufficiently large and geographically compact that it has the potential to elect its preferred candidate in a single-member district, and not under the third Gingles precondition, namely whether the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to usually defeat the minority-preferred candidate; the analysis of crossover voting dictates the answer to whether a minority makes up a sufficient Black voting-age population (BVAP) in the relevant geographic area, not solely whether white bloc voting is legally significant.

1 Case that cites this headnote

[32] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

District court properly considered racial proportionality as a factor in connection with granting preliminary injunction to Black voters in their vote-dilution action against Louisiana officials under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA), which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a way that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, where court did not require racial proportionality and recognized that there was no right to proportional representation, court considered proportionality along with other factors in examining the totality of the circumstances, and court found that the fact that Black representation, under the challenged redistricting plan, was not proportional to the Black population weighed in favor of voters. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[33] Election Law Discriminatory practices proscribed in general

Once the Gingles preconditions are achieved, liability in an action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color, is determined based on the totality of the circumstances, which requires application of the Gingles analysis specifically to the facts of each case and the state electoral mechanism while also considering as a guide the factors identified in Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[34] Election Law Majority-minority districts

Whether the number of districts in which the minority group forms an effective majority is roughly proportional to its share of the population in the relevant area is a relevant consideration for courts to make in an action under § 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which bars use by a state of a standard, practice, or procedure in a manner that results in denial or abridgement of voting rights on account of race or color. Voting Rights Act of 1965 § 2, 52 U.S.C.A. § 10301.

[35] Injunction Redistricting and reapportionment

