The three-judge district court is a unique feature of our jurisprudence, created to alleviate a specific discontent within the federal system. The antecedent of s 2281 was a 1910 Act[7] passed 262 to assuage growing popular displeasure with the frequent grants of injunctions by federal courts against the operation of state legislation regulating railroads and utilities in particular.[8] The *117 federal courts of the early nineteenth century had occasionally issued injunctions at the behest of private litigants against state officials to prevent the enforcement of state statutes,[9] but such cases were rare and generally of a character that did not offend important state policies. The advent of the Granger and labor movements in the late nineteenth century,[10] and the acceleration of state social legislation especially through the creation of regulatory bodies met with opposition in the federal judiciary. In Chicago, M. & St. P.R. Co. v. State of Minnesota, 134 U.S. 418, 10 S.Ct. 462, 702, 33

L.Ed. 970, this Court held that the setting of rates not permitting a fair return violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 28 S.Ct. 441, 52 L.Ed. 714, established firmly the corollary that inferior federal courts could enjoin state officials from enforcing such unconstitutional state laws.

This confrontation between the uncertain contours of the Due Process Clause and developing state regulatory 118 legislation, arising in district courts that were generally considered unsympathetic to the policies of the States, had severe repercussions. Efforts were made in Congress to limit in various ways the jurisdiction of federal courts in these sensitive areas.[11] State officials spoke out against the obstruction and delay occasioned by these federal injunction suits.[12] The sponsor of the bill establishing the three-judge procedure for these cases, Senator Overman of North Carolina, noted:
'(T)here are 150 cases of this kind now where one federal judge has tied the hands of the state officers, the governor, and the attorney-general * * *.
Whenever one judge stands up in a State and enjoins the governor and the attorney-general, the people resent it, and public sentiment is stirred, as it was in my State, when there was almost a rebellion, whereas *263 if three judges declare that a state statute is unconstitutional the people would rest easy under it.' 45 Cong.Rec. 7256.[13]

119 In such an atmosphere was this three-judge court procedure put on the statute books, and although subsequent Congresses have amended the statute[14] its basic structure remains intact.

II.

Section 2281 was designed to provide a more responsible forum for the litigation of suits which, if successful, would render void state statutes embodying important state policies. The statute provides for notification to the State of a pending suit, 28 U.S.C. s 2284(2) (1964 ed.), thus preventing ex parte injunctions common previously.[15] It provides for three judges, one of whom must be a circuit judge, 28 U.S.C. s 2284(1) (1964 ed.), to allow a more authoritative determination and less opportunity for individual predilection in sensitive and politically emotional areas. It authorizes direct review by this Court, 28 U.S.C. s 1253, as a means of accelerating a final determination on the merits; an important criticism of the pre-1910 procedure was directed at the 120 length of time required to appeal through the circuit courts to the Supreme Court, and the consequent disruption of state tax and regulatory programs caused by the outstanding injunction.[16]

That this procedure must be used in any suit for an injunction against state officials on the ground that a state enactment is unconstitutional has been clear from the start. What yet remains unclear, in spite of decisions by this and other courts, is the scope of the phrase 'upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of such statute' when the complaint alleges not the traditional Due Process Clause, Equal Protection Clause, Commerce Clause, or Contract Clause arguments, but rather that the state statute or regulation in question is pre-empted by or in conflict with some federal statute or regulation thereunder. Any such pre-emption or conflict claim is of course grounded in the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution: if a state measure conflicts with a federal requirement, the state provision must give way. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L.Ed. 23. The basic question involved in these cases, however, is never one of interpretation of the Federal *264 Constitution but inevitably one of comparing two statutes. Whether one district judge or three must carry out this function is the question at hand.

The first decision of this Court casting light on the problem was Ex parte Buder, 271 U.S. 461, 46 S.Ct. 557, 70 L.Ed. 1036, in which the question presented was, as here, whether an appeal was properly taken directly from the District Court to the Supreme Court. At issue was whether a Missouri statute authorizing taxation of bank shares remained valid after the enactment of a federal statute which enlarged the scope of the States' power to tax national banks by permitting taxation of shares, or dividends, or 121 income. Under the federal scheme, States were apparently expected to choose one of the three methods. Although the Missouri law applied the first basis of assessment, the District Court held that because the State did not explicitly choose among the three types of taxation, but instead relied on a prior statute, the assessment was void. Mr. Justice Brandeis, writing for a unanimous Court, held that this was not properly a three-judge court case '* * * because no state statute was assailed as being repugnant to the federal Constitution.' 271 U.S., at 465, 46 S.Ct., at 558. Although the complaint in Buder did not explicitly invoke the Supremacy Clause, it should be noted that the defendants' answer asserted that if the federal statute was constitutional under the Tenth Amendment, then it would indeed be the "supreme law of the land' within the meaning and provisions of Article VI of the Constitution of the United States,' and thus controlling over the particular state statute unless that statute could be construed as consistent with the federal law. The District Court in Buder was thus clearly presented with the Supremacy Clause basis of the statutory conflict.

Ex parte Bransford, 310 U.S. 354, 60 S.Ct. 947, 84 L.Ed. 1249, raised a similar problem, also in the context of the validity of a state tax. The Court again held this type of federal-state confrontation outside the purview of the predecessor of s 2281:
'If such assessments are invalid, it is because they levy taxes upon property withdrawn from taxation by federal law or in a manner forbidden by the National Banking Act. The declaration of the supremacy clause gives superiority to valid federal acts over conflicting state statutes but this superiority for present purposes involves merely the construction of an act of Congress, not the constitutionality of the state enactment.' 310 U.S., at 358—359, 60 S.Ct. at 950:

122 In a third case, Case v. Bowles, 327 U.S. 92, 66 S.Ct. 438, 90 L.Ed. 552, the question involved the proposed sale by the State of Washington of timber on stateowned land at a price violating the Federal Emergency Price Control Act of 1942. A federal district court enjoined the sale, and on appeal the State argued that the single judge lacked jurisdiction. This Court held otherwise: 'the complaint did not challenge the constitutionality of the State statute but alleged merely that its enforcement would violate the Emergency Price Control Act. Consequently a three-judge court is not required.' 327 U.S., at 97, 66 S.Ct., at 441.[17]
*265 The upshot of these decisions seems abundantly clear: Supremacy Clause cases are not within the purview of s 2281.[18] This distinction between cases involving claims 123 that state statutes are unconstitutional within the scope of s 2281 and cases involving statutory preemption or conflict remained firm until Kesler v. Department of Public Safety, 369 U.S. 153, 82 S.Ct. 807, 7 L.Ed.2d 641, in which the plaintiff alleged a conflict between the federal bankruptcy laws and a state statute suspending the driving licenses of persons who are judgment debtors as a result of an adverse decision in an action involving the negligent operation of an automobile. It was argued that federal policy underlying the bankruptcy law overrode the State's otherwise legitimate exercise of its police power. Mr. Justice Frankfurter, for a majority, declared first that s 2281 made no distinction between the Supremacy Clause and other provisions of the Constitution as a ground for denying enforcement of a state statute, and second that Buder, Bransford, and Case could be distinguished on the ground that they presented no claims of unconstitutionality as such: 'If in immediate controversy is not the unconstitutionality of a state law but merely the construction of a state law or the federal law, the three-judge requirement does not become operative.' 369 U.S., at 157, 82 S.Ct., at 811. In the Kesler case itself, Mr. Justice Frankfurter said, there was no problem of statutory construction but only a 'constitutional question' whether the state enactment was pre-empted. After what can only be characterized as extensive statutory analysis (369 U.S., at 158—174, 82 S.Ct. at 811—820) the majority concluded that there had in fact been no pre-emption.[19]

124 III.

In re-examining the Kesler rule the admonition that s 2281 is to be viewed 'not as a measure of broad social policy to be construed with great liberality, but as an enactment technical in the strict sense of the term and to be applied as such,' Phillips v. United States, 312 U.S. 246, 251, 61 S.Ct. 480, 483, 85 L.Ed. 800, should be kept in mind. The Kesler opinion itself reflects this admonition, for its rationalization of Buder, Bransford, and Case as being consistent with the view that Supremacy Clause cases are not excluded from 'the comprehensive language of s 2281,' 369 U.S., at 156, 82 S.Ct., at 810, is otherwise most difficult to explain.

As a procedural rule governing the distribution of judicial responsibility the test for applying s 2281 must be clearly formulated. The purpose of the three-judge scheme was in major part to expedite important litigation: it should not be interpreted in such a way that litigation, like the present one, is delayed while *266 the proper composition of the tribunal is litigated. We are now convinced that the Kesler rule, distinguishing between cases in which substantial statutory construction is required and those in which the constitutional issue is 'immediately' apparent, is in practice unworkable. Not only has it been uniformly criticized by commentators,[20] but lower courts have quite evidently sought to avoid dealing with its application[21] or have interpreted it with uncertainty.[22] As Judge Friendly's opinion for the court below demonstrates, in order to ascertain the 125 correct forum, the merits must first be adjudicated in order to discover whether the court has 'engaged in so much more construction than in Kesler as to make that ruling inapplicable.' 230 F.Supp., at 410. Such a formulation, whatever its abstract justification, cannot stand as an every-day test for allocating litigation between district courts of one and three judges.

Two possible interpretations of s 2281 would provide a more practicable rule for three-judge court jurisdiction. The first is that Kesler might be extended to hold, as some of its language might be thought to indicate,[23] that all suits to enjoin the enforcement of a state statute, whatever the federal ground, must be channeled through three-judge courts. The second is that no such suits resting solely on 'supremacy' grounds fall within the statute.

The first alternative holds some attraction. First, it is relatively straightforward: a court need not distinguish among different constitutional grounds for the requested injunction; it need look only at the relief sought. Moreover, in those cases, as in that before us, in which an injunction is sought on several grounds, the proper forum would not depend on whether certain alleged constitutional grounds turn out to be insubstantial. Second, s 2281 speaks of 'unconstitutionality,' and, to be sure, any determination that a state statute is void for obstructing a federal statute does rest on the Supremacy Clause of the Federal Constitution. And, third, there is some policy justification for a wider rule. In a broad sense, what concerned the legislators who passed the progenitor of s 2281 was the voiding of state legislation by inferior federal courts. The sensibilities of the citizens, and 126 perhaps more particularly of the state officials, were less likely to be offended, the Congress thought, by a judgment considered and handed down by three judges rather than by one judge. This rationale can be thought to be as applicable to a suit voiding state legislation on grounds of conflict with a federal statute as it is to an identical suit alleging a conflict with the Federal Constitution directly.

Persuasive as these considerations may be, we believe that the reasons supporting the second interpretation, that is, returning to the traditional Buder-Bransford-Case rule, should carry the day. This restrictive view of the application of s 2281 is more consistent with a discriminating reading of the statute itself than is the first and more embracing interpretation. The statute requires a three-judge court in order to restrain the enforcement of a state statute 'upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of *267 such statute.' Since all federal actions to enjoin a state enactment rest ultimately on the Supremacy Clause,[24] the words 'upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of such statute' would appear to be superfluous unless they are read to exclude some types of such injunctive suits.[25] For a simple provision prohibiting the restraint of the enforcement of any state statute except by a three-judge court would manifestly have sufficed to embrace every such suit whatever its particular constitutional ground. It is thus quite permissible to read 127 the phrase in question as one of limitation, signifying a congressional purpose to confine the three-judge court requirement to injunction suits depending directly upon a substantive provision of the Constitution, leaving cases of conflict with a federal statute (or treaty) to follow their normal course in a single-judge court. We do not suggest that this reading of s 2281 is compelled. We do say, however, that it is an entirely appropriate reading, and one that is supported by all the precedents in this Court until Kesler and by sound policy considerations.

An examination of the origins of the three-judge procedure does not suggest what the legislators would have thought about this particular problem, but it does show quite clearly what sort of cases were of concern to them. Their ire was aroused by the frequent grants of injunctions against the enforcement of progressive state regulatory legislation, usually on substantive due process grounds. (See pp. 261—263, supra.) Requiring the collective judgment of three judges and accelerating appeals to this Court were designed to safeguard important state interests. In contrast, a case involving an alleged incompatibility between state and federal statutes, such as the litigation before us, involves more confining legal analysis and can hardly be thought to raise the worrisome possibilities that economic or political predilections will find their way into a judgment. Moreover, those who enacted the three-judge court statute should not be deemed to have been insensitive to the circumstance that single-judge decisions in conflict and pre-emption cases were always subject to the corrective power of Congress, whereas a 'constitutional' decision by such a judge would be beyond that ready means of correction and could be dealt with only by constitutional amendment. The purpose of s 2281 to provide greater restraint and dignity at the district court level cannot well be thought generally applicable to cases that involve conflicts 128 between state and federal statutes, in this instance determining whether the Department of Agriculture's regulations as applied to the labeling of total net weight on frozen stuffed turkeys necessarily renders invalid a New York statute requiring a supplemental net weight figure which excludes the stuffing.

Our decision that three-judge courts are not required in Supremacy Clause cases involving only federal-state statutory conflicts, in addition to being most consistent with the statute's structure, with pre-Kesler precedent, and with the section's historical purpose, is buttressed by important considerations of judicial administration. As Mr. Justice Frankfurther observed in *268 Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Jacobsen, 362 U.S. 73, 92—93, 80 S.Ct. 568, 579—580 (dissenting opinion):
'(T)he convening of a three-judge trial court makes for dislocation of the normal structure and functioning of the lower federal courts, particularly in the vast non-metropolitan regions; and direct review of District Court judgments by this Court not only expands this Court's obligatory jurisdiction but contradicts the dominant principle of having this Court review decisions only after they have gone through two judicial sieves * * *.'

Although the number of three-judge determinations each year should not be exaggerated,[26] this Court's concern for efficient operation of the lower federal courts persuades us to return to the Buder-Bransford-Case rule, 129 thereby conforming with the constrictive view of the three-judge jurisdiction which this Court has traditionally taken. Ex parte Collins, 277 U.S. 565, 48 S.Ct. 585, 72 L.Ed. 990; Oklahoma Gas & Elec. Co. v. Oklahoma Packing Co., 292 U.S. 386, 54 S.Ct. 732, 78 L.Ed. 1318; Rorick v. Board of Commissioners, 307 U.S. 208, 59 S.Ct. 808, 83 L.Ed. 1242; Phillips v. United States, 312 U.S. 246, 61 S.Ct. 480, 85 L.Ed. 800.

We hold therefore that this appeal is not properly before us under 28 U.S.C. s 1253 and that appellate review lies in the Court of Appeals, where appellants' alternative appeal is now pending. The appeal is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction

It is so ordered.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. Justice DOUGLAS, with whom Mr. Justice BLACK and Mr. Justice CLARK concur, dissenting.

Less than four years ago, this Court decided that a three-judge district court was required in suits brought under 28 U.S.C. s 2281, even though the alleged 'ground of the unconstitutionality' of the challenged statute was based upon a conflict between state and federal statutes. Kesler v. Department of Public Safety, 369 U.S. 153, 82 S.Ct. 807, 7 L.Ed.2d 641.

A state statute may violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or the Due Process Clause or some other express provision of the Constitution. If so a three-judge court is plainly required by 28 U.S.C. s 2281. But the issue of the 'unconstitutionality' of a state statute can be raised as clearly by a conflict between it and an Act of Congress as by a conflict between it and a provision of the Constitution. The Supremacy Clause, contained in Art. VI, cl. 2, of the Constitution, states as much in clear language:
'This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the 130 Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.'

An issue of the 'unconstitutionality' of a state statute is therefore presented whether the conflict is between a provision of the Constitution and a state enactment or between the latter and an Act of Congress. What Senator Overman, author of the three-judge provision, *269 said of it in 1910 is as relevant to enjoining a state law on the ground of federal pre-emption as it is to enjoining it because it violates the Fourteenth Amendment:
'The point is, this amendment is for peace and good order in the State. Whenever one judge stands up in a State and enjoins the governor and the attorney-general, the people resent it, and public sentiment is stirred, as it was in my State, when there was almost a rebellion, whereas if three judges declare that a state statute is unconstitutional the people would rest easy under it. But let one little judge stand up against the whole State, and you find the people of the State rising up in rebellion. The whole purpose of the proposed statute is for peace and good order among the people of the States.' 45 Cong.Rec. 7256.

Some of the most heated controversies between State and Nation which this Court has supervised have involved questions whether there was a conflict between a state statute and a federal one or whether a federal Act was so inclusive as to pre-empt state action in the particular area. One of the earliest and most tumultuous was Cohens v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 440, 5 L.Ed. 257, where the alleged unconstitutionality of a Virginia law was based on the argument that an Act of Congress, authorizing a lottery in the District of Columbia, barred Virginia from making it a criminal offense to sell lottery 131 tickets within that State. The protest from the States was vociferous[1] even though the Court in the end construed the federal Act to keep it from operating in Virginia. Id., at 447. I therefore see no difference between a charge of 'unconstitutionality' of a state statute whether the conflict be between it and the Constitution or between it and a federal law. Neither the language of the Supremacy Clause nor reason nor history makes any difference plain.

Pre-emption or conflict of a state law with a federal one is a recurring theme[2] arising in various contexts. The storm against Cohens v. Commonwealth of Virginia was a protest against this Court's acting as referee in a federal-state contest involving pre-emption or a conflict between the 132 laws of the two regimes. Congress has recently been concerned *270 with the problem in another aspect of the matter,[3] when efforts were made to curb the doctrine of pre-emption by establishing standards for an interpretation of an Act of Congress.[4] The three-judge court is only another facet of the self-same problem.

The history of 28 U.S.C. s 2281, as related by the Court speaks of the concern of Congress over the power 133 of one judge to bring a halt to an entire state regulatory scheme. That can—and will hereafter—happen in all cases of pre-emption or conflict where the Supremacy Clause is thought to require state policy to give way. A fairly recent example is Cloverleaf Butter Co. v. Patterson, 315 U.S. 148, 62 S.Ct. 491, 86 L.Ed. 754, where a federal court injunction in a pre-emption case suspended Alabama's program for control of renovated butter—a demonstrably important health measure. The Court in Florida Lime & Avocado Growers v. Jacobsen, 362 U.S. 73, 80 S.Ct. 568, 4 L.Ed.2d 568, where one of the issues was pre-emption or conflict between two statutory systems, emphasized that the interest of the States in being free from such injunctive interference at the instance of a single judge outweighed the additional burdens that such a rule imposed on the federal court system. On reflection I think that result better reflects congressional policy even though, as in Cohens v. Commonwealth of Virginia, the end result is only a matter of statutory construction.

On the basis of virtually no experience in applying that interpretation of the statute, a majority has now decided that the rule of Kesler is 'unworkable' and, therefore, that our previous interpretation of the statute must have been incorrect. I regret that I am unable to join in that decision. My objection is not that the Court has not given Kesler 'a more respectful burial,' Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 349, 83 S.Ct. 792, 799, 9 L.Ed.2d 799 (concurring opinion), but that the Court has engaged in unwarranted infanticide.

*271 Stare decisis is no immutable principle.[5] There are many occasions when this Court has overturned a prior decision, especially in matters involving an interpretation of the Constitution or where the problem of statutory construction had constitutional overtones.

An error in interpreting a federal statute may be easily remedied. If this Court has failed to perceive the intention 134 of Congress, or has interpreted a statute in such a manner as to thwart the legislative purpose, Congress may change it. The lessons of experience are not learned by judges alone.

I am unable to find a justification for overturning a decision of this Court interpreting this Act of Congress, announced only on March 26, 1962.

If the Court were able to show that our decision in Kesler had thrown the lower courts into chaos, a fair case for its demise might be made out. The Court calls the rule 'unworkable.' But it is not enough to attach that label. The Court broadly asserts that 'lower courts have quite evidently sought to avoid dealing with its (Kesler's) application or have interpreted it with uncertainty.' For this proposition only three cases (in addition to the instant case) are cited. The Court's failure to provide more compelling documentation for its indictment of Kesler is not the result of less than meticulous scholarship, for so far as I have been able to discover, the truth of the matter is that there are no cases (not even the three cited) even remotely warranting the conclusion that Kesler is 'unworkable.'

Kesler was an attempt to harmonize our earlier cases. If the Kesler test is 'unworkable' as the Court asserts, we should nonetheless accept its basic premise:
'Neither the language of s 2281 nor the purpose which gave rise to it affords the remotest reason for carving out an unfrivolous claim of unconstitutionality because of the Supremacy Clause from the comprehensive language of s 2281.' 369

U.S., at 156, 82 S.Ct., at 810.

If there is overruling to be done, we should overrule Ex parte Buder, 271 U.S. 461, 46 S.Ct. 557, 70 L.Ed. 1036, and Ex parte Bransford, 310 U.S. 354, 60 S.Ct. 947, 84 L.Ed. 1249.

That the ground of unconstitutionality in many so-called Supremacy Clause cases is found only in the asserted conflict between federal and state statutes is, 135 as I have said, no basis for distinguishing that class of cases from others in which three-judge courts are plainly required. While courts are, strictly speaking, engaging in statutory construction in such cases, the task of adjudication is much the same as in what all would concede to be constitutional adjudication. Though the purpose of Congress is the final touchstone, the interests which must be taken into account in either case are much the same, as Cohens v. Commonwealth of Virginia eloquently demonstrates.

The Court has decided, on no more than the gloomy predictions contained in a handful of law review articles, that Kesler would inevitably produce chaos in the federal courts, that the rule announced there is 'unworkable.' Those predictions have plainly not been borne out. If difficulties arise, Congress can cure them. Until Congress acts, I would let Kesler stand.

I therefore believe that a three-judge court was properly convened and that we should decide this appeal on the merits.

All Citations

382 U.S. 111, 86 S.Ct. 258, 15 L.Ed.2d 194

Footnotes

1 Section 457(b) declares:

'The use of any written, printed or graphic matter upon or accompanying any poultry product inspected or required to be inspected pursuant to the provisions of this chapter or the container thereof which is false or misleading in any particular is prohibited.'

Section 458(d) prohibits 'Using in commerce, or in a designated major consuming area, a false or misleading label on any poultry product.'

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized by s 463 to issue regulations. 7 CFR s 81.125 requires containers to bear 'approved labels'; s 81.130(a)(3) declares that labels must include the net weight of the contents and that 'The net weight marked on containers of poultry products shall be the net weight of the poultry products and shall not include the weights of the wet or dry packaging materials and giblet wrapping materials.'

2 Section 193, subd. 3 provides:

'All food and food products offered for sale at retail and not in containers shall be sold or offered for sale by net weight, standard measure or numerical count under such regulations as may be prescribed by the commissioner.'

Net weight was not defined in the regulation, 1 NYCRR s 221.40 (now s 221.9(c)), but '(t)he Director of the Bureau of Weights and Measures of the Department testified that he interpreted the regulation, as applied to stuffed turkeys, to require statement of the net weight both of the unstuffed and of the stuffed bird, and that, when asked, he so advised local sealers of weights and measures.' Swift & Co. v. Wickham, 230 F.Supp. 398, 401 (1964).

3 The court below rejected appellants' Commerce Clause and Fourteenth Amendment arguments, held that there had been no federal pre-emption of this field of regulation, and, though implying strongly that the New York labeling requirements did not conflict with federal requirements, held that this question should first be passed upon at a higher federal administrative level.

4 The three-judge court dismissed the complaint 'certifying out of abundant caution' that the original district judge, also a member of the three-judge panel, 'individually arrived at the same conclusion.' 230 F.Supp., at 410. This procedure for minimizing prejudice to litigants when the jurisdiction of a three-judge court is unclear has been used before, see Query v. United States, 316 U.S. 486, 62 S.Ct. 1122, 86 L.Ed. 1616.

5 Mr. Justice Whittaker took no part in the decision of the case.

6 Mr. Justice Brennan and the present writer were included in the Kesler majority.

7 Act of June 18, 1910, c. 309, s 17, 36 Stat. 557.

8 See Currie, The Three-Judge District Court in Constitutional Litigation, 32 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1, 3—9 (1964); Hutcheson, A Case for Three Judges, 47 Harv.L.Rev. 795 (1934); Warren, Federal and State Court Interference, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 345 (1930). For more contemporary accounts see, e.g., Baldwin, Presidential Address: The Progressive Unfolding of the Powers of the United States, VI Am.Pol.Sci.Rev. 1, 8—9 (1912); Scott, The Increased Control of State Activities by the Federal Courts, III Am.Pol.Sci.Rev. 347 (1909). Although various types of state legislation were being challenged in injunctive suits, see Lockwood, Maw, and Rosenberry, The Use of the Federal Injunction in Constitutional Litigation, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 426 (1930), most numerous and prominent were the railroad cases. Senator Overman noted that '* * * nine out of ten of the cases where application for an injunction has been made to test the constitutionality of state statutes have been railroad cases.' 45 Cong.Rec. 7254 (1910).

9 E.g., Spooner v. McConnell, 22 Fed.Cas. 939 (No. 13245) (1838).

10 See S. J. Buck, The Granger Movement, esp. 194—214, 231—237 (1913); Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy 48—68 (1949); 2 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 574—599 (1935). For the related story of the use of the equity power in the labor field, see Frankfurter and Greene, The Labor Injunction (1930).

11 See Hutcheson, supra, at 803—804.

12 See, e.g., 45 Cong.Rec. 7253 (1910) (remarks of Senator Crawford). Although some litigation of this sort dragged on for as much as five years, ibid., it is not clear that most state courts were any more expeditious, see Lilienthal, The Federal Courts and State Regulation of Public Utilities, 43 Harv.L.Rev. 379, 417 and n. 176 (1930).

13 Senator Overman was probably referring to Southern R. Co. v. McNeill, 4 Cir., 155 F. 756 (1907). There, after an injunction had been sustained by the Circuit Court, the Governor publicly urged state officials to ignore it. The railway complained to the Court that 'these attacks on the part of the Governor and state officials against the company and its agents * * * had the effect of demoralizing the servants, agents, and employe s of the company to such an extent as to render it well nigh impossible for complainant to properly discharge the duties which it owed the public * * *.' Id., at 790—791.

14 The procedure was extended to cover challenges to orders of state administrative commissions in 1913, 37 Stat. 1013, 28 U.S.C. s 2281, and in 1925 suits for permanent injunctions were brought within its purview, 43 Stat. 938, 28 U.S.C. s 2281. Three-judge district courts are also required in certain suits arising under federal law. See Note, The Three-Judge District Court: Scope and Procedure Under Section 2281, 77 Harv.L.Rev. 299, 300—301 and n. 19 (1963).

15 See Hutcheson, supra, at 800—801. Senator Crawford of South Dakota told the Congress that when his State Legislature was debating a maximum rate law, the railway companies had already prepared motions for injunctions:

'The statute passed and was presented to the governor for his signature, and in less than an hour after he had signed the bill and it was filed in the office of the secretary of state a restraining order came by telegraph from a United States judge, enjoining the governor and the attorney-general and all the officers in the State from proceeding to enforce that statute.' 45 Cong.Rec. 7252 (1910).

16 See, id., at 7256 (remarks of Senator Crawford); note 12, supra.

17 This basic rule has been reiterated in other familiar cases where the facts did not require its application. See Query v. United States, 316 U.S. 486, 62 S.Ct. 1122, 86 L.Ed. 1616, where, however, a three-judge court was found necessary because other not insubstantial constitutional claims had been clearly asserted. In Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Jacobsen, 362 U.S. 73, 80 S.Ct. 568, 4 L.Ed.2d 568, the majority held that if a state statute is sought to be enjoined on constitutional grounds (Commerce Clause, Equal Protection) it did not matter that a 'nonconstitutional' ground (pre-emption by the Federal Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act) was also asserted. Mr. Justice Frankfurter dissented, reasoning that the three-judge procedure should be read narrowly and that the mere availability of a 'non-constitutional' basis for enjoining the state statute should give jurisdiction to a single judge. Both majority and dissent assumed that an attack upon a state enactment on the ground that it was inconsistent with a federal statute was such a 'non-constitutional' ground.

18 None of these cases can be read to suggest that the result depends on whether or not the complaint specifically invokes the Supremacy Clause, for that clause is the inevitable underpinning for the striking down of a state enactment which is inconsistent with federal law. See the quotation from Bransford, supra, p. 264, a case in which the Supremacy Clause was not invoked in the complaint. See also the discussion of Ex parte Buder, supra, p. 264. Nor do any of these cases suggest that the issue turns on the amount of statutory construction involved, whether large, small, or simply of the character that entails laying the alleged conflicting statutes side by side.

19 In dissent it was stated that the Kesler opinion 'refutes the very test which it establishes.' 369 U.S., at 177, 82 S.Ct., at 821 (dissenting opinion of THE CHIEF JUSTICE). In addition, three Justices dissented in whole or in part from the conclusions derived from this statutory analysis.

20 See Currie, supra, at 61—64 (1964); Note, 77 Harv.L.Rev. 299, 313—315 (1963); Note, 49 Va.L.Rev. 538, 553—555 (1963); 76 Harv.L.Rev. 168 (1962); 15 Stan.L.Rev. 565 (1963); 1962 U.Ill.L.F. 467; 111 U.Pa.L.Rev. 113 (1962).

21 See Borden Co. v. Liddy, 8 Cir., 309 F.2d 871; American Travelers Club, Inc. v. Hostetter, D.C., 219 F.Supp. 95, 102, n. 7.

22 See, in addition to the case before us, Bartlett & Co. Grain v. State Corp. Comm'n of Kansas, D.C., 223 F.Supp. 975.

23 'Neither the language of s 2281 nor the purpose which gave rise to it affords the remotest reason for carving out an unfrivolous claim of unconstitutionality because of the Supremacy Clause from the comprehensive language of s 2281.' 369 U.S., at 156, 82 S.Ct. at 810.

24 Art. VI, cl. 2. 'This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.'

25 The 'unconstitutionality' clause of s 2281 can hardly be thought to encompass the voiding of a state statute for inconsistency with the state constitution. Cf. Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Jacobsen, 362 U.S. 73, 80, 80 S.Ct. 568, 573.

26 The statistics are summarized in Note; 77 Harv.L.Rev. 299, 303—305 (1963); Note, 72 Yale L.J. 1646, 1654—1659 (1963). The most recent figures show that out of the 11,485 trials completed in district courts in fiscal 1965, only 147 were heard by three-judge courts. Of these 60 dealt with I.C.C. regulations, 35 with civil rights, and only 52 with state or local law. 1965 Dir.Adm.Off. U.S. Courts Ann.Rep. II—25, II—28.

1 See 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History, p. 552 et seq. (1928).

'The Richmond Enquirer spoke of the opinion, 'so important in its consequences and so obnoxious in its doctrines,' and said that 'the very title of the case is enough to stir one's blood.' It feared that 'the Judiciary power, with a foot as noiseless as time and a spirit as greedy as the grave, is sweeping to their destruction the rights of the States. * * * These encroachments have increased, are increasing and ought to be diminished'; and it advocated a repeal of the fatal Section of the Judiciary Act as 'the most advisable and constitutional remedy for the evil.' A leading Ohio paper spoke of 'the alarming progress of the Supreme Court in subverting the Federalist principles of the Constitution and introducing on their ruins a mighty consolidated empire fitted for the sceptre of a great monarch'; and it continued: 'That the whole tenor of their decisions, when State-Rights have been involved, have had a direct tendency to reduce our governors to the condition of mere provincial satraps, and that a silent acquiescence in these decisions will bring us to this lamentable result, is to us as clear as mathematical demonstration. ""'' Id., at 552—553.

2 Thus the dissent in Cloverleaf Butter Co. v. Patterson, 315 U.S. 148, 179, 62 S.Ct. 491, 507, 86 L.Ed. 754, called that decision in favor of pre-emption 'purely destructive legislation.' And see Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 67 S.Ct. 1146, 91 L.Ed. 1447; Campbell v. Hussey, 368 U.S. 297, 82 S.Ct. 327, 7 L.Ed.2d 299; Cf. Hostetter v. Idlewild Bon Voyage Liquor Corp., 377 U.S. 324, 84 S.Ct. 1293, 12 L.Ed.2d 350.

3 H.R. 3, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., in material part provided:

'No Act of Congress shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of Congress to occupy the field in which such Act operates, to the exclusion of all State laws on the same subject matter, unless such Act contains an express provision to that effect, or unless there is a direct and positive conflict between such Act and a State law so that the two cannot be reconciled or consistently stand together.'

The first version of the bill was introduced in 1956. The House Committee on the Judiciary made numerous changes, limiting its application to the subject of subversion, and reported the bill out with a 'do pass' recommendation. H.R.Rep. No. 2576, 84th Cong., 2d Sess. The Senate version, S. 3143, was not so narrowed in Committee. S.Rep. No. 2230, 84th Cong., 2d Sess. The bill was not passed in either the House or the Senate.

H.R. 3 was again introduced in the Eighty-fifth Congress. The Judiciary Committee again recommended that the bill 'do pass,' but this time did not narrow its scope to the subject of subversion. See H.R.Rep. No. 1878, 85th Cong., 2d Sess. It was passed by the House on July 17, 1958.

H.R. 3, having once again been approved by the Judiciary Committee, H.R.Rep. No. 422, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., was approved by the House on June 24, 1959.

In the Eighty-seventh Congress, H.R. 3 was favorably reported out by the Judiciary Committee. H.R.Rep. No. 1820, 87th Cong.,

2d Sess., but was not acted upon by the full House.

4 The concern of Congress in this chapter of federal-state relations did not concern the three-judge court problem but the broader aspects envisaged by such cases as Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Nelson, 350 U.S. 497, 76 S.Ct. 477, 100 L.Ed. 640, Phillips Petroleum Co. v. State of Wisconsin, 347 U.S. 672, 74 S.Ct. 794, 98 L.Ed. 1035, Slochower v. Board of Education, 350 U.S. 551, 76 S.Ct. 637, 100 L.Ed. 692, Railway Employes v. Hanson, 351 U.S. 225, 76 S.Ct. 714, 100 L.Ed. 1112, and Cloverleaf Butter Co. v. Patterson, 315 U.S. 148, 62 S.Ct. 491, 86 L.Ed. 754. See H.R.Rep. No. 1820, 87th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 3 et seq.

5 See Radin, Case Law and Stare Decisis, 33 Col.L.Rev. 199 (1933).

124 S.Ct. 1978
Supreme Court of the United States

TENNESSEE, Petitioner,
v.
George LANE et al.

No. 02–1667.
|
Argued Jan. 13, 2004.
|
Decided May 17, 2004.

Synopsis
Background: Disabled citizens brought action against state under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), seeking to vindicate their right of access to the courts. The United States District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee, Thomas A. Higgins, J., denied state's motion to dismiss. State appealed. On petition for rehearing, the Court of Appeals, 315 F.3d 680,affirmed and remanded. Certiorari was granted.

The United States Supreme Court, Justice Stevens, held that Title II of the ADA, as applied to cases implicating the fundamental right of access to the courts, constitutes a valid exercise of Congress' enforcement power under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Affirmed.

Justice Souter filed a concurring opinion in which Justice Ginsburg joined.

Justice Ginsburg filed a concurring opinion in which Justices Souter and Breyer joined.

Chief Justice Rehnquist filed a dissenting opinion in which Justices Kennedy and Thomas joined.

Justices Scalia and Thomas filed dissenting opinions.

*1979 Syllabus[*]
Respondent paraplegics filed this action for damages and equitable relief, alleging that Tennessee and a number of its counties had denied them physical access to that State's courts in violation of Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990(ADA), which provides: "[N]o qualified individual with a disability shall, by reason of such disability, be excluded from participation or denied the benefits of the services, programs or activities of a public entity," 42 U.S.C. § 12132. After the District Court denied the State's motion to dismiss on Eleventh Amendment immunity grounds, the Sixth Circuit held the appeal in abeyance pending Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 121 S.Ct. 955, 148 L.Ed.2d 866. This Court later ruled in Garrett that the Eleventh Amendment bars private money damages actions for state violations of ADA Title I, which prohibits employment discrimination against the disabled. The en banc Sixth Circuit then issued its Popovich decision, in which it interpreted Garrett to bar private ADA suits against States based on equal protection principles, but not those relying on due process, and therefore permitted a Title II damages action to proceed despite the State's immunity claim. Thereafter, a Sixth Circuit panel affirmed the dismissal denial in this case, explaining that respondents' claims were not barred because they were based on due process principles. In response to a rehearing petition arguing that Popovich did not control because respondents' complaint did not allege due process violations, the panel filed an amended opinion, explaining that due process protects the right of access to the courts, and that the evidence before Congress when it enacted Title II established, 1980 inter alia, that physical barriers in courthouses and courtrooms have had the effect of denying disabled people the opportunity for such access.

Held: As it applies to the class of cases implicating the fundamental right of access to the courts, Title II constitutes a valid exercise of Congress' authority under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to enforce that Amendment's substantive guarantees. Pp. 1984–1994.

(a) Determining whether Congress has constitutionally abrogated a State's Eleventh Amendment immunity requires resolution of two predicate questions: (1) whether Congress unequivocally expressed its intent to abrogate; and (2), if so, whether it acted pursuant to a valid grant of *510 constitutional authority. Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 73, 120 S.Ct. 631, 145 L.Ed.2d 522. The first question is easily answered here, since the ADA specifically provides for abrogation. See § 12202. With regard to the second question, Congress can abrogate state sovereign immunity pursuant to a valid exercise of its power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. E.g., Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 456, 96 S.Ct. 2666, 49 L.Ed.2d 614. That power is not, however, unlimited. While Congress must have a wide berth in devising appropriate remedial and preventative measures for unconstitutional actions, those measures may not work a "substantive change in the governing law." City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 519, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624. In Boerne, the Court set forth the test for distinguishing between permissible remedial legislation and unconstitutional substantive redefinition: Section 5 legislation is valid if it exhibits "a congruence and proportionality" between an injury and the means adopted to prevent or remedy it. Id., at 520, 117 S.Ct. 2157. Applying the Boerne test in Garrett, the Court concluded that ADA Title I was not a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 power because the historical record and the statute's broad sweep suggested that Title I's true aim was not so much enforcement, but an attempt to "rewrite" this Court's Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence. 531 U.S., at 372–374, 121 S.Ct. 955. In view of significant differences between Titles I and II, however, Garrett left open the question whether Title II is a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 power, id., at 360, n. 1, 121 S.Ct. 955. Pp. 1985–1988.

(b) Title II is a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 enforcement power. Pp. 1988–1994.

(1) The Boerne inquiry's first step requires identification of the constitutional rights Congress sought to enforce when it enacted Title II. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 365, 121 S.Ct. 955. Like Title I, Title II seeks to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition on irrational disability discrimination. Id., at 366, 121 S.Ct. 955. But it also seeks to enforce a variety of other basic constitutional guarantees, including some, like the right of access to the courts here at issue, infringements of which are subject to heightened judicial scrutiny. See, e.g., Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 336–337, 92 S.Ct. 995, 31 L.Ed.2d 274. Whether Title II validly enforces such constitutional rights is a question that "must be judged with reference to the historical experience which it reflects." E.g., South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 308, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769. Congress enacted Title II against a backdrop of pervasive unequal treatment of persons with disabilities in the administration of state services and programs, including systematic deprivations of fundamental rights. The historical experience that Title II reflects is also documented in the decisions of this and other courts, which have identified unconstitutional treatment of disabled persons by state agencies in a variety of 1981 public programs and services. With respect to the particular services at issue, Congress learned that many individuals, in many States, were being excluded from courthouses and court proceedings by reason of their disabilities. *511 A Civil Rights Commission report before Congress showed that some 76% of public services and programs housed in state-owned buildings were inaccessible to and unusable by such persons. Congress also heard testimony from those persons describing the physical inaccessibility of local courthouses. And its appointed task force heard numerous examples of their exclusion from state judicial services and programs, including failure to make courtrooms accessible to witnesses with physical disabilities. The sheer volume of such evidence far exceeds the record in last Term's Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 728–733, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953, in which the Court approved the family-care leave provision of the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 as valid § 5 legislation. Congress' finding in the ADA that "discrimination against individuals with disabilities persists in such critical areas as ... access to public services," § 12101(a)(3), together with the extensive record of disability discrimination that underlies it, makes clear that inadequate provision of public services and access to public facilities was an appropriate subject for prophylactic legislation. Pp. 1988–1992.

(2) Title II is an appropriate response to this history and pattern of unequal treatment. Unquestionably, it is valid § 5 legislation as it applies to the class of cases implicating the accessibility of judicial services. Congress' chosen remedy for the pattern of exclusion and discrimination at issue, Title II's requirement of program accessibility, is congruent and proportional to its object of enforcing the right of access to the courts. The long history of unequal treatment of disabled persons in the administration of judicial services has persisted despite several state and federal legislative efforts to remedy the problem. Faced with considerable evidence of the shortcomings of these previous efforts, Congress was justified in concluding that the difficult and intractable problem of disability discrimination warranted added prophylactic measures. Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 737, 123 S.Ct. 1972. The remedy Congress chose is nevertheless a limited one. Recognizing that failure to accommodate persons with disabilities will often have the same practical effect as outright exclusion, Congress required the States to take reasonable measures to remove architectural and other barriers to accessibility. § 12132. But Title II does not require States to employ any and all means to make judicial services accessible or to compromise essential eligibility criteria for public programs. It requires only "reasonable modifications" that would not fundamentally alter the nature of the service provided, and only when the individual seeking modification is otherwise eligible for the service. Ibid. Title II's implementing regulations make clear that the reasonable modification requirement can be satisfied in various ways, including less costly measures than structural changes. This duty to accommodate is perfectly consistent with the well-established due process principle that, within the limits of practicability, a State 512 must afford to all individuals a meaningful opportunity to be heard in its courts. Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 379, 91 S.Ct. 780. A number of affirmative obligations flow from this principle. Cases such as Boddie, Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 76 S.Ct. 585, 100 L.Ed. 891, and Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 83 S.Ct. 792, 9 L.Ed.2d 799, make clear that ordinary considerations of *1982 cost and convenience alone cannot justify a State's failure to provide individuals with a meaningful right of access to the courts. Judged against this backdrop, Title II's affirmative obligation to accommodate is a reasonable prophylactic measure, reasonably targeted to a legitimate end. Pp. 1992–1994.

315 F.3d 680, affirmed.

STEVENS, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which O'CONNOR, SOUTER, GINSBURG, and BREYER, JJ., joined. SOUTER, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which GINSBURG, J., joined, post, p. 1995. GINSBURG, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which SOUTER and BREYER, JJ., joined, post, p. 1996. REHNQUIST, C. J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which KENNEDY and THOMAS, JJ., joined, post, p. 1997. SCALIA, J., post, p. 2007, and THOMAS, J., post, p. 2013, filed dissenting opinions.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Paul D. Clement, Washington, DC, for federal respondent the United States.

Paul G. Summers, Attorney General & Reporter for the State of Tennessee, Michael E. Moore, Counsel of Record, Solicitor General, S. Elizabeth Martin, Mary Martelle Collier, Senior Counsel Office of the Attorney General & Reporter for the State of Tennessee, Nashville, Tennessee, for Petitioner.

Theodore B. Olson, Solicitor, General Counsel of Record, R. Alexander Acosta, Assistant Attorney General, Paul D. Clement, Deputy, Solicitor General, Patricia A. Millett, Assistant to the Solicitor General, Jessica Dunsay Silver, Sarah E. Harrington, Kevin Russell, Attorneys Department of Justice, Washington, D.C., for the United States.

Samuel R. Bagenstos, Cambridge, MA, Thomas C. Goldstein, Goldstein & Howe, P.C., Washington, DC, William J. Brown, Counsel of Record, William J. Brown & Assocs., Cleveland, TN, for private respondents.

Opinion

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

513 Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA or Act), 104 Stat. 337, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12131–12165, provides that "no qualified individual with a disability shall, by reason of such disability, be excluded from participation in or be denied the benefits of the services, programs or activities of a public entity, or be subjected to discrimination by any such entity." § 12132. The question presented in this case is whether Title II exceeds Congress' power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

I

In August 1998, respondents George Lane and Beverly Jones filed this action against the State of Tennessee and a number of Tennessee counties, alleging past and ongoing violations of Title II. Respondents, both of whom are paraplegics who use wheelchairs for mobility, claimed that they were denied access to, and the services of, the state court system by reason of their disabilities. Lane alleged that he was compelled to appear to answer a set of criminal charges on the second floor of a county courthouse that had no elevator. 514 At his first appearance, Lane crawled up two flights of stairs to get to the courtroom. *1983 When Lane returned to the courthouse for a hearing, he refused to crawl again or to be carried by officers to the courtroom; he consequently was arrested and jailed for failure to appear. Jones, a certified court reporter, alleged that she has not been able to gain access to a number of county courthouses, and, as a result, has lost both work and an opportunity to participate in the judicial process. Respondents sought damages and equitable relief.

The State moved to dismiss the suit on the ground that it was barred by the Eleventh Amendment. The District Court denied the motion without opinion, and the State appealed.[1] The United States intervened to defend Title II's abrogation of the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity. On April 28, 2000, after the appeal had been briefed and argued, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit entered an order holding the case in abeyance pending our decision in Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 121 S.Ct. 955, 148 L.Ed.2d 866 (2001).

In Garrett, we concluded that the Eleventh Amendment bars private suits seeking money damages for state violations of Title I of the ADA. We left open, however, the question whether the Eleventh Amendment permits suits for money damages under Title II. Id., at 360, n. 1, 121 S.Ct. 955. Following the Garrett decision, the Court of Appeals, sitting en banc, heard argument in a Title II suit brought by a hearing-impaired litigant who sought money damages for the State's failure to accommodate his disability in a child custody proceeding. Popovich v. Cuyahoga County Court, 276 F.3d 808 (C.A.6 2002). A divided court permitted the suit to proceed 515 despite the State's assertion of Eleventh Amendment immunity. The majority interpreted Garrett to bar private ADA suits against States based on equal protection principles, but not those that rely on due process principles. 276 F.3d, at 811–816. The minority concluded that Congress had not validly abrogated the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity for any Title II claims, id., at 821, while the concurring opinion concluded that Title II validly abrogated state sovereign immunity with respect to both equal protection and due process claims, id., at 818.

Following the en banc decision in Popovich, a panel of the Court of Appeals entered an order affirming the District Court's denial of the State's motion to dismiss in this case. Judgt. order reported at 2002 WL 1580210 (C.A.6 2002). The order explained that respondents' claims were not barred because they were based on due process principles. In response to a petition for rehearing arguing that Popovich was not controlling because the complaint did not allege due process violations, the panel filed an amended opinion. It explained that the Due Process Clause protects the right of access to the courts, and that the evidence before Congress when it enacted Title II "established that physical barriers in government buildings, including courthouses and in the courtrooms themselves, have had the effect of denying disabled people the opportunity to access vital services and to exercise fundamental rights guaranteed by the Due Process Clause." 315 F.3d 680, 682 (2003). Moreover, that "record demonstrated that public entities' failure to accommodate the needs of qualified persons with disabilities *1984 may result directly from unconstitutional animus and impermissible stereotypes." Id., at 683. The panel did not, however, categorically reject the State's submission. It instead noted that the case presented difficult questions that "cannot be clarified absent a factual record," and remanded for further proceedings. Ibid. We granted certiorari, 539 U.S. 941, 123 S.Ct. 2622, 156 L.Ed.2d 626 (2003), and now affirm.

516 II

The ADA was passed by large majorities in both Houses of Congress after decades of deliberation and investigation into the need for comprehensive legislation to address discrimination against persons with disabilities. In the years immediately preceding the ADA's enactment, Congress held 13 hearings and created a special task force that gathered evidence from every State in the Union. The conclusions Congress drew from this evidence are set forth in the task force and Committee Reports, described in lengthy legislative hearings, and summarized in the preamble to the statute.[2] Central among these conclusions was Congress' finding that > "individuals with disabilities are a discrete and insular minority who have been faced with restrictions and limitations, subjected to a history of purposeful unequal treatment, and relegated to a position of political powerlessness in our society, based on characteristics that are beyond the control of such individuals and resulting from stereotypic assumptions not truly indicative of the individual ability of such individuals to participate in, and contribute to, society." 42 U.S.C. § 12101(a)(7).

Invoking "the sweep of congressional authority, including the power to enforce the fourteenth amendment and to regulate commerce," the ADA is designed "to provide a clear and comprehensive national mandate for the elimination of discrimination against individuals with disabilities." §§ 12101(b)(1), (b)(4). It forbids discrimination against persons with disabilities in three major areas of public life: employment, which is covered by Title I of the statute; public 517 services, programs, and activities, which are the subject of Title II; and public accommodations, which are covered by Title III.

Title II, §§ 12131–12134, prohibits any public entity from discriminating against "qualified" persons with disabilities in the provision or operation of public services, programs, or activities. The Act defines the term "public entity" to include state and local governments, as well as their agencies and instrumentalities. § 12131(1). Persons with disabilities are "qualified" if they, "with or without reasonable modifications to rules, policies, or practices, the removal of architectural, communication, or transportation barriers, or the provision of auxiliary aids and services, mee[t] the essential eligibility requirements for the receipt of services or the participation in programs or activities provided by a public entity." § 12131(2). Title II's enforcement provision incorporates by reference § 505 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 92 Stat. 2982, as added, 29 U.S.C. § 794a, which *1985 authorizes private citizens to bring suits for money damages. 42 U.S.C. § 12133.

III

The Eleventh Amendment renders the States immune from "any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted ... by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State." Even though the Amendment "by its terms ... applies only to suits against a State by citizens of another State," our cases have repeatedly held that this immunity also applies to unconsented suits brought by a State's own citizens. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 363, 121 S.Ct. 955; Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 72–73, 120 S.Ct. 631, 145 L.Ed.2d 522 (2000). Our cases have also held that Congress may abrogate the State's Eleventh Amendment immunity. To determine whether it has done so in any given case, we "must resolve two predicate questions: first, whether Congress unequivocally expressed its intent to abrogate that immunity; and second, if it did, whether Congress acted pursuant to a valid grant of constitutional authority." Id., at 73, 120 S.Ct. 631.

518 The first question is easily answered in this case. The Act specifically provides: "A State shall not be immune under the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States from an action in Federal or State court of competent jurisdiction for a violation of this chapter." 42 U.S.C. § 12202. As in Garrett, see 531 U.S., at 363–364, 121 S.Ct. 955, no party disputes the adequacy of that expression of Congress' intent to abrogate the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity. The question, then, is whether Congress had the power to give effect to its intent.

In Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 96 S.Ct. 2666, 49 L.Ed.2d 614 (1976), we held that Congress can abrogate a State's sovereign immunity when it does so pursuant to a valid exercise of its power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to enforce the substantive guarantees of that Amendment. Id., at 456, 96 S.Ct. 2666. This enforcement power, as we have often acknowledged, is a "broad power indeed." Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 732, 102 S.Ct. 3331, 73 L.Ed.2d 1090 (1982), citing Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 346, 25 L.Ed. 676 (1880).[3] It includes "the authority both to remedy and to deter violation of rights guaranteed [by the Fourteenth Amendment] by prohibiting a somewhat broader swath of conduct, including that which is not itself forbidden by the Amendment's text." Kimel, 528 U.S., at 81, 120 S.Ct. 631. We have thus repeatedly affirmed that "Congress may enact so-called prophylactic legislation that proscribes facially constitutional conduct, in order to prevent and deter unconstitutional conduct." Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 727–728, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003). See also 519 City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 518, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997).[4] The *1986 most recent affirmation of the breadth of Congress' § 5 power came in Hibbs, in which we considered whether a male state employee could recover money damages against the State for its failure to comply with the family-care leave provision of the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 (FMLA), 107 Stat. 6, 29 U.S.C. § 2601 et seq. We upheld the FMLA as a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 power to combat unconstitutional sex discrimination, even though there was no suggestion that the State's leave policy was adopted or applied with a discriminatory purpose that would render it unconstitutional under the rule of Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979). 520 When Congress seeks to remedy or prevent unconstitutional discrimination, § 5 authorizes it to enact prophylactic legislation proscribing practices that are discriminatory in effect, if not in intent, to carry out the basic objectives of the Equal Protection Clause.

Congress' § 5 power is not, however, unlimited. While Congress must have a wide berth in devising appropriate remedial and preventative measures for unconstitutional actions, those measures may not work a "substantive change in the governing law." Boerne, 521 U.S., at 519, 117 S.Ct. 2157. In Boerne, we recognized that the line between remedial legislation and substantive redefinition is "not easy to discern," and that "Congress must have wide latitude in determining where it lies." Id., at 519–520, 117 S.Ct. 2157. But we also confirmed that "the distinction exists and must be observed," and set forth a test for so observing it: Section 5 legislation is valid if it exhibits "a congruence and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end." Id., at 520, 117 S.Ct. 2157.

In Boerne, we held that Congress had exceeded its § 5 authority when it enacted the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA), 107 Stat. 1488, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb et seq. We began by noting that Congress enacted RFRA "in direct response" to our decision in Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Ore. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 110 S.Ct. 1595, 108 L.Ed.2d 876 (1990), for the stated purpose of "restor[ing]" a constitutional rule that Smith had rejected. *1987 521 U.S., at 512, 515, 117 S.Ct. 2157 (internal quotation marks omitted). Though the respondent attempted to defend the statute as a reasonable means of enforcing the Free Exercise Clause as interpreted in Smith, we concluded that RFRA was "so out of proportion" to that objective that it could be understood only as an attempt to work a "substantive change in constitutional protections." 521 U.S., at 529, 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157. Indeed, that was the very purpose of the law.

This Court further defined the contours of Boerne's "congruence and proportionality" test in Florida Prepaid Postsecondary 521 Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 119 S.Ct. 2199, 144 L.Ed.2d 575 (1999). At issue in that case was the validity of the Patent and Plant Variety Protection Remedy Clarification Act (hereinafter Patent Remedy Act), a statutory amendment Congress enacted in the wake of our decision in Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 105 S.Ct. 3142, 87 L.Ed.2d 171 (1985), to clarify its intent to abrogate state sovereign immunity from patent infringement suits. Florida Prepaid, 527 U.S., at 631–632, 119 S.Ct. 2199. Noting the virtually complete absence of a history of unconstitutional patent infringement on the part of the States, as well as the Act's expansive coverage, the Court concluded that the Patent Remedy Act's apparent aim was to serve the Article I concerns of "provid[ing] a uniform remedy for patent infringement and ... plac[ing] States on the same footing as private parties under that regime," and not to enforce the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. Id., at 647–648, 119 S.Ct. 2199. See also Kimel, 528 U.S. 62, 120 S.Ct. 631 (finding that the Age Discrimination in Employment Act exceeded Congress' § 5 powers under Boerne); United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598, 120 S.Ct. 1740, 146 L.Ed.2d 658 (2000) (Violence Against Women Act).

Applying the Boerne test in Garrett, we concluded that Title I of the ADA was not a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition on unconstitutional disability discrimination in public employment. As in Florida Prepaid, we concluded Congress' exercise of its prophylactic § 5 power was unsupported by a relevant history and pattern of constitutional violations. 531 U.S., at 368, 374, 121 S.Ct. 955. Although the dissent pointed out that Congress had before it a great deal of evidence of discrimination by the States against persons with disabilities, id., at 379, 121 S.Ct. 955 (opinion of BREYER, J.), the Court's opinion noted that the "overwhelming majority" of that evidence related to "the provision of public services and public accommodations, which areas are addressed in Titles II and III," rather than Title I, id., at 371, n. 7, 121 S.Ct. 955. We also noted that neither the ADA's legislative findings nor its legislative history reflected a concern that the States had been engaging in a pattern of 522 unconstitutional employment discrimination. We emphasized that the House and Senate Committee Reports on the ADA focused on " '[d]iscrimination [in] ... employment in the private sector,' " and made no mention of discrimination in public employment. Id., at 371–372, 121 S.Ct. 955 (quoting S.Rep. No.

101–116, p. 6 (1989), and H.R.Rep. No. 101–485, pt. 2, p. 28 (1990), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1990, pp. 303, 310) (emphasis in Garrett). Finally, we concluded that Title I's broad remedial scheme was insufficiently targeted to remedy or prevent unconstitutional discrimination in public employment. Taken together, the historical record and the broad sweep of the statute suggested that Title I's true aim was not so much to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibitions against disability discrimination in public employment as it was to "rewrite" this Court's Fourteenth Amendment *1988 jurisprudence. 531 U.S., at 372–374, 121 S.Ct. 955.

In view of the significant differences between Titles I and II, however, Garrett left open the question whether Title II is a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 enforcement power. It is to that question that we now turn.

IV

The first step of the Boerne inquiry requires us to identify the constitutional right or rights that Congress sought to enforce when it enacted Title II. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 365, 121 S.Ct. 955. In Garrett we identified Title I's purpose as enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment's command that "all persons similarly situated should be treated alike." Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 439, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985). As we observed, classifications based on disability violate that constitutional command if they lack a rational relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 366, 121 S.Ct. 955 (citing Cleburne, 473 U.S., at 446, 105 S.Ct. 3249).

Title II, like Title I, seeks to enforce this prohibition on irrational disability discrimination. But it also seeks to enforce a variety of other basic constitutional guarantees, infringements of which are subject to more searching judicial 523 review. See, e.g., Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 336–337, 92 S.Ct. 995, 31 L.Ed.2d 274 (1972); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600 (1969); Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 541, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942). These rights include some, like the right of access to the courts at issue in this case, that are protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Due Process Clause and the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, as applied to the States via the Fourteenth Amendment, both guarantee to a criminal defendant such as respondent Lane the "right to be present at all stages of the trial where his absence might frustrate the fairness of the proceedings." Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 819, n. 15, 95 S.Ct. 2525, 45 L.Ed.2d 562 (1975). The Due Process Clause also requires the States to afford certain civil litigants a "meaningful opportunity to be heard" by removing obstacles to their full participation in judicial proceedings. Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 379, 91 S.Ct. 780, 28 L.Ed.2d 113 (1971); M.L.B. v. S.L. J., 519 U.S. 102, 117 S.Ct. 555, 136 L.Ed.2d 473 (1996). We have held that the Sixth Amendment guarantees to criminal defendants the right to trial by a jury composed of a fair cross section of the community, noting that the exclusion of "identifiable segments playing major roles in the community cannot be squared with the constitutional concept of jury trial." Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 530, 95 S.Ct. 692, 42 L.Ed.2d 690 (1975). And, finally, we have recognized that members of the public have a right of access to criminal proceedings secured by the First Amendment. Press—Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court of Cal., County of Riverside, 478 U.S. 1, 8–15, 106 S.Ct. 2735, 92 L.Ed.2d 1 (1986).

Whether Title II validly enforces these constitutional rights is a question that "must be judged with reference to the historical experience which it reflects." South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 308, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966). See also Florida Prepaid, 527 U.S., at 639–640, 119 S.Ct. 2199; Boerne, 521 U.S., at 530, 117 S.Ct. 2157. While § 5 authorizes Congress to enact reasonably prophylactic remedial legislation, the appropriateness of the remedy depends on the gravity of the harm it seeks to prevent. 524 "Difficult and intractable problems often *1989 require powerful remedies," Kimel, 528 U.S., at 88, 120 S.Ct. 631, but it is also true that "[s]trong measures appropriate to address one harm may be an unwarranted response to another, lesser one," Boerne, 521 U.S., at 530, 117 S.Ct. 2157.

It is not difficult to perceive the harm that Title II is designed to address. Congress enacted Title II against a backdrop of pervasive unequal treatment in the administration of state services and programs, including systematic deprivations of fundamental rights. For example, "[a]s of 1979, most States ... categorically disqualified 'idiots' from voting, without regard to individual capacity."[5] The majority of these laws remain on the books,[6] and have been the subject of legal challenge as recently as 2001.[7] Similarly, a number of States have prohibited and continue to prohibit persons with disabilities from engaging in activities such as marrying[8] and serving as jurors.[9] The historical experience that Title II reflects is also documented in this Court's cases, which have identified unconstitutional treatment of disabled 525 persons by state agencies in a variety of settings, including unjustified commitment, e.g., Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 92 S.Ct. 1845, 32 L.Ed.2d 435 (1972); the abuse and neglect of persons committed to state mental health hospitals, Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 102 S.Ct. 2452, 73 L.Ed.2d 28 (1982);[10] and irrational discrimination in zoning decisions, Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985). The decisions of other courts, too, document a pattern of unequal treatment in the administration of a wide range of public services, programs, and activities, including the penal system,[11] public education,[12] and voting.[13] Notably, *1990 these decisions also demonstrate a pattern of unconstitutional treatment in the administration of justice.[14]

526 This pattern of disability discrimination persisted despite several federal and state legislative efforts to address it. In the deliberations that led up to the enactment of the ADA, Congress identified important shortcomings in existing laws that rendered them "inadequate to address the pervasive problems of discrimination that people with disabilities are facing." S.Rep. No. 101–116, at 18. See also H.R.Rep. No. 101–485, pt. 2, at 47, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1990, pp. 303, 329.[15] It also uncovered further evidence of those shortcomings, in the form of hundreds of examples of unequal treatment of persons with disabilities by States and their political subdivisions. See Garrett, 531 U.S., at 379, 121 S.Ct. 955 (BREYER, J., dissenting). See also id., at 391, 121 S.Ct. 955 (App. C to opinion of BREYER, J., dissenting). As the Court's opinion in Garrett observed, the "overwhelming majority" of these examples concerned discrimination in the administration of public programs and services. Id., at 371, n. 7, 121 S.Ct. 955; Government's Lodging in Garrett, O.T.2000, No. 99–1240 (available in Clerk of Court's case file).

527 With respect to the particular services at issue in this case, Congress learned that many individuals, in many States across the country, were being excluded from courthouses and court proceedings by reason of their disabilities. A report before Congress showed that some 76% of public services and programs housed in state-owned buildings were inaccessible to and unusable by persons with disabilities, even taking into account the possibility that the services and programs *1991 might be restructured or relocated to other parts of the buildings. U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Accommodating the Spectrum of Individual Abilities 39 (1983). Congress itself heard testimony from persons with disabilities who described the physical inaccessibility of local courthouses. Oversight Hearing on H.R. 4498 before the House Subcommittee on Select Education of the Committee on Education and Labor, 100th Cong., 2d Sess., 40–41, 48 (1988). And its appointed task force heard numerous examples of the exclusion of persons with disabilities from state judicial services and programs, including exclusion of persons with visual impairments and hearing impairments from jury service, failure of state and local governments to provide interpretive services for the hearing impaired, failure to permit the testimony of adults with developmental disabilities in abuse cases, and failure to make courtrooms accessible to witnesses with physical disabilities. Government's Lodging in Garrett, O.T.2000, No. 99–1240. See also Task Force on the Rights and Empowerment of Americans with Disabilities, From ADA to Empowerment (Oct. 12, 1990).[16]

528 Given the sheer volume of evidence demonstrating the nature and extent of unconstitutional discrimination against persons with disabilities in the provision of public services, the dissent's contention that the record is insufficient to justify Congress' exercise of its prophylactic power is puzzling, to say the least. Just last Term in Hibbs, we approved the family-care leave provision of the FMLA as valid § 5 legislation based primarily on evidence of disparate provision of parenting leave, little of which concerned unconstitutional state conduct. *1992 538 U.S., at 728–733, 123 S.Ct. 1972.[17] We explained that 529 because the FMLA was targeted at sex-based classifications, which are subject to a heightened standard of judicial scrutiny, "it was easier for Congress to show a pattern of state constitutional violations" than in Garrett or Kimel, both of which concerned legislation that targeted classifications subject to rational-basis review. 538 U.S., at 735–737, 123 S.Ct. 1972. Title II is aimed at the enforcement of a variety of basic rights, including the right of access to the courts at issue in this case, that call for a standard of judicial review at least as searching, and in some cases more searching, than the standard that applies to sex-based classifications. And in any event, the record of constitutional violations in this case—including judicial findings of unconstitutional state action, and statistical, legislative, and anecdotal evidence of the widespread exclusion of persons with disabilities from the enjoyment of public services—far exceeds the record in Hibbs.

The conclusion that Congress drew from this body of evidence is set forth in the text of the ADA itself: "[D]iscrimination against individuals with disabilities persists in such critical areas as ... education, transportation, communication, recreation, institutionalization, health services, voting, and access to public services." 42 U.S.C. § 12101(a)(3) (emphasis added). This finding, together with the extensive record of disability discrimination that underlies it, makes clear beyond peradventure that inadequate provision of public services and access to public facilities was an appropriate subject for prophylactic legislation.

530 V

The only question that remains is whether Title II is an appropriate response to this history and pattern of unequal treatment. At the outset, we must determine the scope of that inquiry. Title II—unlike RFRA, the Patent Remedy Act, and the other statutes we have reviewed for validity under § 5—reaches a wide array of official conduct in an effort to enforce an equally wide array of constitutional guarantees. Petitioner urges us both to examine the broad range of Title II's applications all at once, and to treat that breadth as a mark of the law's invalidity. According to petitioner, the fact that Title II applies not only to public education and voting-booth access but also to seating at state-owned hockey rinks indicates that Title II is not appropriately tailored to serve its objectives. But nothing in our case law requires us to consider Title II, with its wide variety of applications, as an undifferentiated whole.[18] Whatever might be said *1993 about Title II's other applications, the question presented in this case is not whether Congress can 531 validly subject the States to private suits for money damages for failing to provide reasonable access to hockey rinks, or even to voting booths, but whether Congress had the power under § 5 to enforce the constitutional right of access to the courts. Because we find that Title II unquestionably is valid § 5 legislation as it applies to the class of cases implicating the accessibility of judicial services, we need go no further. See United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 26, 80 S.Ct. 519, 4 L.Ed.2d 524 (1960).[19]

Congress' chosen remedy for the pattern of exclusion and discrimination described above, Title II's requirement of program accessibility, is congruent and proportional to its object of enforcing the right of access to the courts. The unequal treatment of disabled persons in the administration of judicial services has a long history, and has persisted despite several legislative efforts to remedy the problem of disability discrimination. Faced with considerable evidence of the shortcomings of previous legislative responses, Congress was justified in concluding that this "difficult and intractable proble[m]" warranted "added prophylactic measures in response." Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 737, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The remedy Congress chose is nevertheless a limited one. Recognizing that failure to accommodate persons with disabilities will often have the same practical effect as outright exclusion, Congress required the States to take reasonable measures to remove architectural and other barriers to accessibility. 42 U.S.C. § 12131(2). But Title II does not require States to employ any and all means to make judicial 532 services accessible to persons with disabilities, and it does not require States to compromise their essential eligibility criteria for public programs. It requires only "reasonable modifications" that would not fundamentally alter the nature of the service provided, and only when the individual seeking modification is otherwise eligible for the service. Ibid. As Title II's implementing regulations make clear, the reasonable modification requirement can be satisfied in a number of ways. In the case of facilities built or altered after 1992, the regulations require compliance with specific architectural accessibility standards. 28 CFR § 35.151 (2003). But in the case of older facilities, for which structural change is likely to be more difficult, a public entity may comply with Title II by adopting a variety of less costly measures, including relocating services to alternative, accessible sites and assigning aides to assist persons with disabilities in accessing services. § 35.150(b)(1). Only if *1994 these measures are ineffective in achieving accessibility is the public entity required to make reasonable structural changes. Ibid. And in no event is the entity required to undertake measures that would impose an undue financial or administrative burden, threaten historic preservation interests, or effect a fundamental alteration in the nature of the service. §§ 35.150(a)(2), (a)(3).

This duty to accommodate is perfectly consistent with the well-established due process principle that, "within the limits of practicability, a State must afford to all individuals a meaningful opportunity to be heard" in its courts. Boddie, 401 U.S., at 379, 91 S.Ct. 780 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).[20] Our cases have recognized a number of affirmative obligations that flow from this principle: the duty to waive 533 filing fees in certain family-law and criminal cases,[21] the duty to provide transcripts to criminal defendants seeking review of their convictions,[22] and the duty to provide counsel to certain criminal defendants.[23] Each of these cases makes clear that ordinary considerations of cost and convenience alone cannot justify a State's failure to provide individuals with a meaningful right of access to the courts. Judged against this backdrop, Title II's affirmative obligation to accommodate persons with disabilities in the administration of justice cannot be said to be "so out of proportion to a supposed remedial or preventive object that it cannot be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior." Boerne, 521 U.S., at 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157; Kimel, 528 U.S., at 86, 120 S.Ct.

631.[24] It is, rather, a reasonable prophylactic measure, reasonably targeted to a legitimate end.

For these reasons, we conclude that Title II, as it applies to the class of cases implicating the fundamental right of access 534 to the courts, constitutes a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 authority to enforce the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is therefore affirmed.

It is so ordered.

*1995 Justice SOUTER, with whom Justice GINSBURG joins, concurring.

I join the Court's opinion subject to the same caveats about the Court's recent cases on the Eleventh Amendment and § 5 of the Fourteenth that I noted in Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 740, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003) (SOUTER, J., concurring).

Although I concur in the Court's approach applying the congruence-and-proportionality criteria to Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 as a guarantee of access to courts and related rights, I note that if the Court engaged in a more expansive enquiry as THE CHIEF JUSTICE suggests, post, at 2005 (dissenting opinion), the evidence to be considered would underscore the appropriateness of action under § 5 to address the situation of disabled individuals before the courts, for that evidence would show that the judiciary itself has endorsed the basis for some of the very discrimination subject to congressional remedy under § 5. Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200, 47 S.Ct. 584, 71 L.Ed. 1000 (1927), was not grudging in sustaining the constitutionality of the once-pervasive practice of involuntarily sterilizing those with mental disabilities. See id., at 207, 47 S.Ct. 584 ("It is better for all the world, if instead of waiting to execute degenerate offspring for crime, or to let them starve for their imbecility, society can prevent those who are manifestly unfit from continuing their kind .... Three generations of imbeciles are enough"). Laws compelling sterilization were often accompanied by others indiscriminately requiring institutionalization, and prohibiting certain individuals with disabilities from marrying, from voting, from attending public schools, and even from appearing in public. 535 One administrative action along these lines was judicially sustained in part as a justified precaution against the very sight of a child with cerebral palsy, lest he "produc[e] a depressing and nauseating effect" upon others. State ex rel. Beattie v. Board of Ed. of Antigo, 169 Wis. 231, 232, 172 N.W. 153 (1919) (approving his exclusion from public school).[1]

Many of these laws were enacted to implement the quondam science of eugenics, which peaked in the 1920's, yet the statutes and their judicial vindications sat on the books long after eugenics lapsed into discredit.[2] See U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Accommodating the Spectrum of Individual Abilities 19–20 (1983). Quite apart from the fateful inspiration behind them, one pervasive fault of these provisions was their failure to reflect the "amount of flexibility and freedom" required to deal with "the wide variation in the abilities and needs" of people with disabilities. Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 445, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985). Instead, like other invidious discrimination, they classified people without regard to individual capacities, and by that lack of regard did great harm. In sustaining the application of Title II today, the Court takes a welcome step away from the judiciary's prior endorsement of blunt instruments imposing legal handicaps.

*1996 Justice GINSBURG, with whom Justice SOUTER and Justice BREYER join, concurring.

For the reasons stated by the Court, and mindful of Congress' objective in enacting the Americans with Disabilities 536 Act—the elimination or reduction of physical and social structures that impede people with some present, past, or perceived impairments from contributing, according to their talents, to our Nation's social, economic, and civic life—I join the Court's opinion.

The Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA or Act), 42 U.S.C. §§ 12101–12213, is a measure expected to advance equal-citizenship stature for persons with disabilities. See Bagenstos, Subordination, Stigma, and "Disability," 86 Va. L.Rev. 397, 471 (2000) (ADA aims both to "guarante[e] a baseline of equal citizenship by protecting against stigma and systematic exclusion from public and private opportunities, and [to] protec[t] society against the loss of valuable talents"). As the Court's opinion relates, see ante, at 1984, the Act comprises three parts, prohibiting discrimination in employment (Title I), public services, programs, and activities (Title II), and public accommodations (Title III). This case concerns Title II, which controls the conduct of administrators of public undertakings.

Including individuals with disabilities among people who count in composing "We the People," Congress understood in shaping the ADA, would sometimes require not blindfolded equality, but responsiveness to difference; not indifference, but accommodation. Central to the Act's primary objective, Congress extended the statute's range to reach all government activities, § 12132 (Title II), and required "reasonable modifications to [public actors'] rules, policies, or practices," §§ 12131(2)–12132 (Title II). See also § 12112(b)(5) (defining discrimination to include the failure to provide "reasonable accommodations") (Title I); § 12182(b)(2)(A)(ii) (requiring "reasonable modifications in [public accommodations'] policies, practices, or procedures") (Title III); Bagenstos, supra, at 435 (ADA supporters sought "to eliminate the practices that combine with physical and mental conditions to create what we call 'disability.' The society-wide universal access rules serve this function on the macro level, and the requirements 537 of individualized accommodation and modification fill in the gaps on the micro level." (footnote omitted)).

In Olmstead v. L. C., 527 U.S. 581, 119 S.Ct. 2176, 144 L.Ed.2d 540 (1999), this Court responded with fidelity to the ADA's accommodation theme when it held a State accountable for failing to provide community residential placements for people with disabilities. The State argued in Olmstead that it had acted impartially, for it provided no community placements for individuals without disabilities. Id., at 598, 119 S.Ct. 2176. Congress, the Court observed, advanced in the ADA "a more comprehensive view of the concept of discrimination," ibid., one that embraced failures to provide "reasonable accommodations," id., at 601, 119 S.Ct. 2176. The Court today is similarly faithful to the Act's demand for reasonable accommodation to secure access and avoid exclusion.

Legislation calling upon all government actors to respect the dignity of individuals with disabilities is entirely compatible with our Constitution's commitment to federalism, properly conceived. It seems to me not conducive to a harmonious federal system to require Congress, before it exercises authority under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, essentially to indict each State for disregarding the equal-citizenship stature of persons with disabilities. *1997 But see post, at 2012 (SCALIA, J., dissenting) ("Congress may impose prophylactic § 5 legislation only upon those particular States in which there has been an identified history of relevant constitutional violations."); Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 743, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003) (SCALIA, J., dissenting) (to be controlled by § 5 legislation, State "can demand that it be shown to have been acting in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment" (emphasis in original)). Members of Congress are understandably reluctant to condemn their own States as constitutional violators, complicit in maintaining the isolated and unequal status of persons with disabilities. I would not disarm a National Legislature for resisting an 538 adversarial approach to lawmaking better suited to the courtroom.

As the Court's opinion documents, see ante, at 1989–1992, Congress considered a body of evidence showing that in diverse parts of our Nation, and at various levels of government, persons with disabilities encounter access barriers to public facilities and services. That record, the Court rightly holds, at least as it bears on access to courts, sufficed to warrant the barrier-lowering, dignity-respecting national solution the People's representatives in Congress elected to order.

Chief Justice REHNQUIST, with whom Justice KENNEDY and Justice THOMAS join, dissenting.

In Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 121 S.Ct. 955, 148 L.Ed.2d 866 (2001), we held that Congress did not validly abrogate States' Eleventh Amendment immunity when it enacted Title I of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA or Act), 42 U.S.C. §§ 12111–12117. Today, the Court concludes that Title II of that Act, §§ 12131–12165, does validly abrogate that immunity, at least insofar "as it applies to the class of cases implicating the fundamental right of access to the courts." Ante, at 1994. Because today's decision is irreconcilable with Garrett and the well-established principles it embodies, I dissent.

The Eleventh Amendment bars private lawsuits in federal court against an unconsenting State. E.g., Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 726, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003); Garrett, supra, at 363, 121 S.Ct. 955; Kimel

v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 73, 120 S.Ct. 631, 145 L.Ed.2d 522 (2000). Congress may overcome States' sovereign immunity and authorize such suits only if it unmistakably expresses its intent to do so, and only if it "acts pursuant to a valid exercise of its power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment." Hibbs, supra, at 726, 123 S.Ct. 1972. While the Court correctly holds that Congress satisfied the first prerequisite, ante, at 1985, I disagree with its conclusion that Title II is valid § 5 enforcement legislation.

539 Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment grants Congress the authority "to enforce, by appropriate legislation," the familiar substantive guarantees contained in § 1 of that Amendment. U.S. Const., Amdt. 14, § 1 ("No State shall ... deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws"). Congress' power to enact " 'appropriate' " enforcement legislation is not limited to "mere legislative repetition" of this Court's Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence. Garrett, supra, at 365, 121 S.Ct. 955. Congress may "remedy" and "deter" state violations of constitutional rights by "prohibiting a somewhat broader swath of conduct, including that which is not itself forbidden by the Amendment's text." Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 727, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (internal quotation *1998 marks omitted). Such "prophylactic" legislation, however, "must be an appropriate remedy for identified constitutional violations, not 'an attempt to substantively redefine the States' legal obligations.' " Id., at 727–728, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (quoting Kimel, supra, at 88, 120 S.Ct. 631); City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 525, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997) (enforcement power is "corrective or preventive, not definitional"). To ensure that Congress does not usurp this Court's responsibility to define the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, valid § 5 legislation must exhibit " 'congruence and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end.' " Hibbs, supra, at 728, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (quoting City of Boerne, supra, at 520, 117 S.Ct. 2157). While the Court today pays lipservice to the " 'congruence and proportionality' " test, see ante, at 1986, it applies it in a manner inconsistent with our recent precedents.

In Garrett, we conducted the three-step inquiry first enunciated in City of Boerne to determine whether Title I of the ADA satisfied the congruence-and-proportionality test. A faithful application of that test to Title II reveals that it too " 'substantively redefine[s],' " rather than permissibly enforces, the rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. Hibbs, supra, at 728, 123 S.Ct. 1972.

540 The first step is to "identify with some precision the scope of the constitutional right at issue." Garrett, supra, at 365, 121 S.Ct. 955. This task was easy in Garrett, Hibbs, Kimel, and City of Boerne because the statutes in those cases sought to enforce only one constitutional right. In Garrett, for example, the statute addressed the equal protection right of disabled persons to be free from unconstitutional employment discrimination. 531 U.S., at 365, 121 S.Ct. 955. See also Hibbs, supra, at 728, 123 S.Ct. 1972 ("The [Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 (FMLA)] aims to protect the right to be free from gender-based discrimination in the workplace"); Kimel, supra, at 83, 120 S.Ct. 631 (right to be free from unconstitutional age discrimination in employment); City of Boerne, supra, at 529, 117 S.Ct. 2157 (right of free exercise of religion). The scope of that right, we explained, is quite limited; indeed, the Equal Protection Clause permits a State to classify on the basis of disability so long as it has a rational basis for doing so. Garrett, supra, at 366–368, 121 S.Ct. 955 (discussing Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985)); see also ante, at 1988.

In this case, the task of identifying the scope of the relevant constitutional protection is more difficult because Title II purports to enforce a panoply of constitutional rights of disabled persons: not only the equal protection right against irrational discrimination, but also certain rights protected by the Due Process Clause. Ante, at 1988. However, because the Court ultimately upholds Title II "as it applies to the class of cases implicating the fundamental right of access to the courts," ante, at 1994, the proper inquiry focuses on the scope of those due process rights. The Court cites four access-to-the-courts rights that Title II purportedly enforces: (1) the right of the criminal defendant to be present at all critical stages of the trial, Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 819, 95 S.Ct. 2525, 45 L.Ed.2d 562 (1975); (2) the right of litigants to have a "meaningful opportunity to be heard" in judicial proceedings, Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 379, 91 S.Ct. 780, 28 L.Ed.2d 113 (1971); (3) the right of the criminal defendant to trial by a jury composed 541 of a fair cross section of the community, *1999 Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 530, 95 S.Ct. 692, 42 L.Ed.2d 690 (1975); and (4) the public right of access to criminal proceedings, Press—Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court of Cal., County of Riverside, 478 U.S. 1, 8–15, 106 S.Ct. 2735, 92 L.Ed.2d 1 (1986). Ante, at 1988.

Having traced the "metes and bounds" of the constitutional rights at issue, the next step in the congruence-and-proportionality inquiry requires us to examine whether Congress "identified a history and pattern" of violations of these constitutional rights by the States with respect to the disabled. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 368, 121 S.Ct. 955. This step is crucial to determining whether Title II is a legitimate attempt to remedy or prevent actual constitutional violations by the States or an illegitimate attempt to rewrite the constitutional provisions it purports to enforce. Indeed, "Congress' § 5 authority is appropriately exercised only in response to state transgressions." Ibid. (emphasis added). But the majority identifies nothing in the legislative record that shows Congress was responding to widespread violations of the due process rights of disabled persons.

Rather than limiting its discussion of constitutional violations to the due process rights on which it ultimately relies, the majority sets out on a wide-ranging account of societal discrimination against the disabled. Ante, at 1988–1990. This digression recounts historical discrimination against the disabled through institutionalization laws, restrictions on marriage, voting, and public education, conditions in mental hospitals, and various other forms of unequal treatment in the administration of public programs and services. Some of this evidence would be relevant if the Court were considering the constitutionality of the statute as a whole; but the Court rejects that approach in favor of a narrower "as-applied" inquiry.[1] We discounted much the same type of outdated, generalized evidence in Garrett as unsupportive of 542 Title I's ban on employment discrimination. 531 U.S., at 368–372, 121 S.Ct. 955; see also City of Boerne, 521 U.S., at 530, 117 S.Ct. 2157 (noting that the "legislative record lacks ... modern instances of ... religious bigotry"). The evidence here is likewise irrelevant to Title II's purported enforcement of due process access-to-the-courts rights.

Even if it were proper to consider this broader category of evidence, much of it does not concern unconstitutional action by the States. The bulk of the Court's evidence concerns discrimination by nonstate governments, rather than the States themselves.[2] We have repeatedly held that such evidence is irrelevant to the inquiry whether Congress has validly abrogated Eleventh Amendment immunity, a privilege enjoyed only by the sovereign States. Garrett, supra, at 368–369, 121 S.Ct. 955; Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 640, 119 S.Ct. 2199, 144 L.Ed.2d 575 (1999); Kimel, 528 U.S., at 89, 120 S.Ct. 631. Moreover, the majority today cites the same congressional task force evidence we rejected in Garrett. *2000 Ante, at 1990 (citing Garrett, supra, at 379, 121 S.Ct. 955 (BREYER, J., dissenting), and 531 U.S., at 391–424, 121 S.Ct. 955 (App. C to opinion of BREYER, J., dissenting) (chronicling instances of "unequal treatment" in the "administration of public programs")). As in Garrett, this "unexamined, anecdotal" evidence does not suffice. 531 U.S., at 370, 121 S.Ct. 955. Most of the brief anecdotes do not involve States at all, and those that do are not sufficiently detailed to determine whether the instances of "unequal treatment" were irrational, and thus unconstitutional under our decision in Cleburne. Garrett, supra, at 370–371, 121 S.Ct. 955. 543 Therefore, even outside the "access to the courts" context, the Court identifies few, if any, constitutional violations perpetrated by the States against disabled persons.[3]

With respect to the due process "access to the courts" rights on which the Court ultimately relies, Congress' failure to identify a pattern of actual constitutional violations by the States is even more striking. Indeed, there is nothing in the legislative record or statutory findings to indicate that disabled persons were systematically denied the right to be present at criminal trials, denied the meaningful opportunity to be heard in civil cases, unconstitutionally excluded from jury service, or denied the right to attend criminal trials.[4]

The Court's attempt to disguise the lack of congressional documentation with a few citations to judicial decisions cannot retroactively provide support for Title II, and in any event, fails on its own terms. See, e.g., Garrett, 531 U.S., at 368, 121 S.Ct. 955 ("[W]e examine whether Congress identified a history and pattern" of constitutional violations); ibid. ("The legislative record (3)27 fails to show that Congress did in fact identify 544 a pattern" of constitutional violations (emphases added)). Indeed, because this type of constitutional violation occurs in connection with litigation, it is particularly telling that the majority is able to identify only two reported cases finding that a disabled person's federal constitutional rights were violated.[5] See ante, at 1990, n. 14 (citing Ferrell v. Estelle, 568 F.2d 1128, 1132–1133 (C.A.5), opinion withdrawn as moot, 573 F.2d 867 (1978); People v. Rivera, 125 Misc.2d 516, 528, 480 N.Y.S.2d 426, 434 (Sup.Ct.1984)).[6]

*2001 Lacking any real evidence that Congress was responding to actual due process violations, the majority relies primarily on three items to justify its decision: (1) a 1983 U.S. Civil Rights Commission Report showing that 76% of "public services and programs housed in state-owned buildings were inaccessible" to persons with disabilities, ante, at 1990; (2) testimony before a House subcommittee regarding the "physical inaccessibility" of local courthouses, ante, at 1991; and (3) evidence submitted to Congress' designated ADA task 545 force that purportedly contains "numerous examples of the exclusion of persons with disabilities from state judicial services and programs." Ibid.

On closer examination, however, the Civil Rights Commission's finding consists of a single conclusory sentence in its report, and it is far from clear that its finding even includes courthouses. The House subcommittee report, for its part, contains the testimony of two witnesses, neither of whom reported being denied the right to be present at constitutionally protected court proceedings.[7] Indeed, the witnesses' testimony, like the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights Report, concerns only physical barriers to access, and does not address whether States either provided means to overcome those barriers or alternative locations for proceedings involving disabled persons. Cf. n. 4, supra (describing alternative means of access offered to respondent Lane).

Based on the majority's description, ante, at 1990–1991, the report of the ADA Task Force on the Rights and Empowerment of Americans with Disabilities sounds promising. But the report itself says nothing about any disabled person being denied access to court. The Court thus apparently relies solely on a general citation to the Government's Lodging in Garrett, O.T.2000, No. 99–1240, which, amidst thousands of pages, contains only a few anecdotal handwritten reports of physically inaccessible courthouses, again with no mention of whether States provided alternative means of access. This evidence, moreover, was submitted not to Congress, but only to the task force, which itself made no 546 findings regarding disabled persons' access to judicial proceedings. Cf. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 370–371, 121 S.Ct. 955 (rejecting anecdotal task force evidence for similar reasons). As we noted in Garrett, "had Congress truly understood this [task force] information as reflecting a pattern of unconstitutional behavior by the States, one would expect some mention of *2002 that conclusion in the Act's legislative findings." Id., at 371, 121 S.Ct. 955. Yet neither the legislative findings, nor even the Committee Reports, contain a single mention of the seemingly vital topic of access to the courts.[8] Cf. ibid.; Florida Prepaid, 527 U.S., at 641, 119 S.Ct. 2199 (observing that Senate Report on Patent and Plant Variety Protection Remedy Clarification Act (Patent Remedy Act) "contains no evidence that unremedied patent infringement by States had become a problem of national import"). To the contrary, the Senate Report on the ADA observed that "[a]ll states currently mandate accessibility in newly constructed state-owned public buildings." S.Rep. No. 101–116, p. 92 (1989).

Even if the anecdotal evidence and conclusory statements relied on by the majority could be properly considered, the mere existence of an architecturally "inaccessible" courthouse—i.e., one a disabled person cannot utilize without assistance—does not state a constitutional violation. A violation of due process occurs only when a person is actually denied the constitutional right to access a given judicial proceeding. We have never held that a person has a constitutional right to make his way into a courtroom without any 547 external assistance. Indeed, the fact that the State may need to assist an individual to attend a hearing has no bearing on whether the individual successfully exercises his due process right to be present at the proceeding. Nor does an "inaccessible" courthouse violate the Equal Protection Clause, unless it is irrational for the State not to alter the courthouse to make it "accessible." But financial considerations almost always furnish a rational basis for a State to decline to make those alterations. See Garrett, 531 U.S., at 372, 121 S.Ct. 955 (noting that it would be constitutional for an employer to "conserve scarce financial resources" by hiring employees who can use existing facilities rather than making the facilities accessible to disabled employees). Thus, evidence regarding inaccessible courthouses, because it is not evidence of constitutional violations, provides no basis to abrogate States' sovereign immunity.

The near-total lack of actual constitutional violations in the congressional record is reminiscent of Garrett, wherein we found that the same type of minimal anecdotal evidence "f[e]ll far short of even suggesting the pattern of unconstitutional [state action] on which § 5 legislation must be based." Id., at 370, 121 S.Ct. 955. See also Kimel, 528 U.S., at 91, 120 S.Ct. 631 ("Congress' failure to uncover any significant pattern of unconstitutional discrimination here confirms that Congress had no reason to believe that broad prophylactic legislation was necessary"); Florida Prepaid, supra, at 645, 119 S.Ct. 2199 ("The legislative record thus suggests that the Patent Remedy Act did not respond to a history of 'widespread and persisting deprivation of constitutional rights' of the sort Congress has faced in enacting proper prophylactic § 5 legislation" (quoting City of Boerne, 521 U.S., at 526, 117 S.Ct. 2157)).

*2003 The barren record here should likewise be fatal to the majority's holding that Title II is valid legislation enforcing due process rights that involve access to the courts. This conclusion gains even more support when Title II's nonexistent record of constitutional violations is compared with legislation 548 that we have sustained as valid § 5 enforcement legislation. See, e.g., Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 729–732, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (tracing the extensive legislative record documenting States' gender discrimination in employment leave policies); South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 312–313, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966) (same with respect to racial discrimination in voting rights). Accordingly, Title II can only be understood as a congressional attempt to "rewrite the Fourteenth Amendment law laid down by this Court," rather than a legitimate effort to remedy or prevent state violations of that Amendment. Garrett, supra, at 374, 121 S.Ct. 955.[9]

The third step of our congruence-and-proportionality inquiry removes any doubt as to whether Title II is valid § 5 legislation. At this stage, we ask whether the rights and remedies created by Title II are congruent and proportional to the constitutional rights it purports to enforce and the record of constitutional violations adduced by Congress. Hibbs, supra, at 737–739, 123

S.Ct. 1972; Garrett, supra, at 372–373, 121 S.Ct. 955.

Title II provides that "no qualified individual with a disability shall, by reason of such disability, be excluded from participation in or be denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity, or be subjected to discrimination 549 by any such entity." 42 U.S.C. § 12132. A disabled person is considered "qualified" if he "meets the essential eligibility requirements" for the receipt of the entity's services or participation in the entity's programs, "with or without reasonable modifications to rules, policies, or practices, the removal of architectural, communication, or transportation barriers, or the provision of auxiliary aids and services." § 12131(2) (emphasis added). The ADA's findings make clear that Congress believed it was attacking "discrimination" in all areas of public services, as well as the "discriminatory effects" of "architectural, transportation, and communication barriers." §§ 12101(a)(3), (a)(5). In sum, Title II requires, on pain of money damages, special accommodations for disabled persons in virtually every interaction they have with the State.

"Despite subjecting States to this expansive liability," the broad terms of Title II "d[o] nothing to limit the coverage of the Act to cases involving arguable constitutional violations." Florida Prepaid, 527 U.S., at 646, 119 S.Ct. 2199. By requiring *2004 special accommodation and the elimination of programs that have a disparate impact on the disabled, Title II prohibits far more state conduct than does the equal protection ban on irrational discrimination. We invalidated Title I's similar requirements in Garrett, observing that "[i]f special accommodations for the disabled are to be required, they have to come from positive law and not through the Equal Protection Clause." 531 U.S., at 368, 121 S.Ct. 955; id., at 372–373, 121 S.Ct. 955 (contrasting Title I's reasonable accommodation and disparate-impact provisions with the Fourteenth Amendment's requirements). Title II fails for the same reason. Like Title I, Title II may be laudable public policy, but it cannot be seriously disputed that it is also an attempt to legislatively "redefine the States' legal obligations" under the Fourteenth Amendment. Kimel, supra, at 88, 120 S.Ct. 631.

The majority, however, claims that Title II also vindicates fundamental rights protected by the Due Process Clause— 550 in addition to access to the courts—that are subject to heightened Fourteenth Amendment scrutiny. Ante, at 1988 (citing Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 336–337, 92 S.Ct. 995, 31 L.Ed.2d 274 (1972) (voting); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 634, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 22 L.Ed.2d 600 (1969) (right to move to a new jurisdiction); Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535, 541, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942) (marriage and procreation)). But Title II is not tailored to provide prophylactic protection of these rights; instead, it applies to any service, program, or activity provided by any entity. Its provisions affect transportation, health, education, and recreation programs, among many others, all of which are accorded only rational-basis scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause. A requirement of accommodation for the disabled at a state-owned amusement park or sports stadium, for example, bears no permissible prophylactic relationship to enabling disabled persons to exercise their fundamental constitutional rights. Thus, as with Title I in Garrett, the Patent Remedy Act in Florida Prepaid, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 in Kimel, and the RFRA in City of Boerne, all of which we invalidated as attempts to substantively redefine the Fourteenth Amendment, it is unlikely "that many of the [state actions] affected by [Title II] have [any] likelihood of being unconstitutional." City of Boerne, supra, at 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157. Viewed as a whole, then, there is little doubt that Title II of the ADA does not validly abrogate state sovereign immunity.[10]

551 The majority concludes that Title II's massive overbreadth can be cured by considering the statute only "as it applies to the class of cases implicating the accessibility of judicial services." Ante, at 1993 *2005 (citing United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17, 26, 80 S.Ct. 519, 4 L.Ed.2d 524 (1960)). I have grave doubts about importing an "as applied" approach into the § 5 context. While the majority is of course correct that this Court normally only considers the application of a statute to a particular case, the proper inquiry under City of Boerne and its progeny is somewhat different. In applying the congruence-and-proportionality test, we ask whether Congress has attempted to statutorily redefine the constitutional rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. This question can only be answered by measuring the breadth of a statute's coverage against the scope of the constitutional rights it purports to enforce and the record of violations it purports to remedy.

In conducting its as-applied analysis, however, the majority posits a hypothetical statute, never enacted by Congress, that applies only to courthouses. The effect is to rig the congruence-and-proportionality test by artificially constricting the scope of the statute to closely mirror a recognized constitutional right. But Title II is not susceptible of being carved up in this manner; it applies indiscriminately to all "services," "programs," or "activities" of any "public entity." Thus, the majority's approach is not really an assessment of whether Title II is "appropriate legislation " at all, U.S. Const., Amdt. 14, § 5 (emphasis added), but a test of whether the Court can conceive of a hypothetical statute narrowly tailored enough to constitute valid prophylactic legislation.

Our § 5 precedents do not support this as-applied approach. In each case, we measured the full breadth of the statute or relevant provision that Congress enacted against 552 the scope of the constitutional right it purported to enforce. If we had arbitrarily constricted the scope of the statutes to match the scope of a core constitutional right, those cases might have come out differently. In Garrett, for example, Title I might have been upheld "as applied" to irrational employment discrimination; or in Florida Prepaid, the Patent Remedy Act might have been upheld "as applied" to intentional, uncompensated patent infringements. It is thus not surprising that the only authority cited by the majority is Raines, supra, a case decided long before we enunciated the congruence-and-proportionality test.[11]

I fear that the Court's adoption of an as-applied approach eliminates any incentive for Congress to craft § 5 legislation for the purpose of remedying or deterring actual constitutional violations. Congress can now simply rely on the courts to sort out which hypothetical applications of an undifferentiated statute, such as Title II, may be enforced against the States. All the while, States will be subjected to substantial litigation in a piecemeal attempt to vindicate their Eleventh Amendment rights. The majority's as-applied approach *2006 simply cannot be squared with either our recent precedent or the proper role of the Judiciary.

553 Even in the limited courthouse-access context, Title II does not properly abrogate state sovereign immunity. As demonstrated in depth above, Congress utterly failed to identify any evidence that disabled persons were denied constitutionally protected access to judicial proceedings. Without this predicate showing, Title II, even if we were to hypothesize that it applies only to courthouses, cannot be viewed as a congruent and proportional response to state constitutional violations. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 368, 121 S.Ct. 955 ("Congress' § 5 authority is appropriately exercised only in response to state transgressions").

Moreover, even in the courthouse-access context, Title II requires substantially more than the Due Process Clause. Title II subjects States to private lawsuits if, inter alia, they fail to make "reasonable modifications" to facilities, such as removing "architectural ... barriers." 42 U.S.C. §§ 12131(2), 12132. Yet the statute is not limited to occasions when the failure to modify results, or will likely result, in an actual due process violation—i.e., the inability of a disabled person to participate in a judicial proceeding. Indeed, liability is triggered if an inaccessible building results in a disabled person being "subjected to discrimination"—a term that presumably encompasses any sort of inconvenience in accessing the facility, for whatever purpose. § 12132.

The majority's reliance on Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 91 S.Ct. 780, 28 L.Ed.2d 113 (1971), and other cases in which we held that due process requires the State to waive filing fees for indigent litigants, is unavailing. While these cases support the principle that the State must remove financial requirements that in fact prevent an individual from exercising his constitutional rights, they certainly do not support a statute that subjects a State to liability for failing to make a vast array of special accommodations, without regard for whether the failure to accommodate results in a constitutional wrong.

554 In this respect, Title II is analogous to the Patent Remedy Act at issue in Florida Prepaid. That statute subjected States to monetary liability for any act of patent infringement. 527 U.S., at 646–647, 119 S.Ct. 2199. Thus, "Congress did nothing to limit" the Patent Remedy Act's coverage "to cases involving arguable [due process] violations," such as when the infringement was nonnegligent or uncompensated. Ibid. Similarly here, Congress has authorized private damages suits against a State for merely maintaining a courthouse that is not readily accessible to the disabled, without regard to whether a disabled person's due process rights are ever violated. Accordingly, even as applied to the "access to the courts" context, Title II's "indiscriminate scope offends [the congruence-and-proportionality] principle," particularly in light of the lack of record evidence showing that inaccessible courthouses cause actual due process violations. Id., at 647, 119 S.Ct. 2199.[12]

*2007 For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent.

Justice SCALIA, dissenting.

Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that Congress "shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions" of that Amendment—including, of course, the Amendment's Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses. In Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 86 S.Ct. 1717, 16 L.Ed.2d 828 (1966), we 555 decided that Congress could, under this provision, forbid English literacy tests for Puerto Rican voters in New York State who met certain educational criteria. Though those tests were not themselves in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, we held that § 5 authorizes prophylactic legislation—that is, "legislation that proscribes facially constitutional conduct," Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 728, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003), when Congress determines such proscription is desirable " 'to make the amendments fully effective,' " Morgan, supra, at 648, 86 S.Ct. 1717 (quoting Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 345, 25 L.Ed. 676 (1880)). We said that "the measure of what constitutes 'appropriate legislation' under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment" is the flexible "necessary and proper" standard of M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 342, 421, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819). Morgan, 384 U.S., at 651, 86 S.Ct. 1717. We described § 5 as "a positive grant of legislative power authorizing Congress to exercise its discretion in determining whether and what legislation is needed to secure the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment." Ibid.

The Morgan opinion followed close upon our decision in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966), which had upheld prophylactic application of the similarly worded "enforce" provision of the Fifteenth Amendment (§ 2) to challenged provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. But the Fourteenth Amendment, unlike the Fifteenth, is not limited to denial of the franchise and not limited to the denial of other rights on the basis of race. In City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997), we confronted Congress's inevitable expansion of the Fourteenth Amendment, as interpreted in Morgan, beyond the field of racial discrimination.[1] There Congress had sought, in the Religious Freedom Restoration 556 Act of 1993, 107 Stat. 1488, 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb et seq., to impose upon the States an interpretation of the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause that this Court had explicitly rejected. To avoid placing in congressional hands effective power to rewrite the Bill of Rights through the medium of § 5, we formulated the "congruence and proportionality" test for determining what legislation is "appropriate." When Congress enacts prophylactic legislation, we said, there must be "proportionality or congruence between the means adopted and the legitimate end to be achieved." 521 U.S., at 533, 117 S.Ct. 2157.

I joined the Court's opinion in Boerne with some misgiving. I have generally rejected tests based on such malleable standards as "proportionality," because *2008 they have a way of turning into vehicles for the implementation of individual judges' policy preferences. See, e.g., Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11, 31–32, 123 S.Ct. 1179, 155 L.Ed.2d 108 (2003) (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment) (declining to apply a "proportionality" test to the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment); Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, 954–956, 120 S.Ct. 2597, 147 L.Ed.2d 743 (2000) (SCALIA, J., dissenting) (declining to apply the "undue burden" standard of Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 112 S.Ct. 2791, 120 L.Ed.2d 674 (1992)); BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 599, 116 S.Ct. 1589, 134 L.Ed.2d 809 (1996) (SCALIA, J., dissenting) (declining to apply a "reasonableness" test to punitive damages under the Due Process Clause). Even so, I signed on to the "congruence and proportionality" test in Boerne, and adhered to it in later cases: Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 119 S.Ct. 2199, 144 L.Ed.2d 575 (1999), where we held that the provisions of the Patent and Plant Variety Protection Remedy Clarification Act, 35 U.S.C. §§ 271(h), 296(a), were " 'so out of proportion to a supposed remedial or preventive object that [they] cannot be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior,' " 527 U.S., at 646, 119 S.Ct. 2199 (quoting Boerne, supra, at 532, 117 S.Ct. 2157); Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 120 S.Ct. 631, 145 L.Ed.2d 522 (2000), where we held that 557 the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, 81 Stat. 602, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 621 et seq. (1994 ed. and Supp. III), imposed on state and local governments requirements "disproportionate to any unconstitutional conduct that conceivably could be targeted by the Act," 528 U.S., at 83, 120 S.Ct. 631; United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598, 120 S.Ct. 1740, 146 L.Ed.2d 658 (2000), where we held that a provision of the Violence Against Women Act of 1994, 42 U.S.C. § 13981, lacked congruence and proportionality because it was "not aimed at proscribing discrimination by officials which the Fourteenth Amendment might not itself proscribe," 529 U.S., at 626, 120 S.Ct. 1740; and Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 121 S.Ct. 955, 148 L.Ed.2d 866 (2001), where we said that Title I of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990(ADA), 104 Stat. 330, 42 U.S.C. §§ 12111–12117, raised "the same sort of concerns as to congruence and proportionality as were found in City of Boerne," 531 U.S., at 372, 121 S.Ct. 955.

But these cases were soon followed by Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, in which the Court held that the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993, 107 Stat. 9, 29 U.S.C. § 2612 et seq., which required States to provide their employees up to 12 work weeks of unpaid leave (for various purposes) annually, was "congruent and proportional to its remedial object [of preventing sex discrimination], and can be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior." 538 U.S., at 740, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (internal quotation marks omitted). I joined Justice KENNEDY's dissent, which established (conclusively, I thought) that Congress had identified no unconstitutional state action to which the statute could conceivably be a proportional response. And now we have today's decision, holding that Title II of the ADA is congruent and proportional to the remediation of constitutional violations, in the face of what seems to me a compelling demonstration of the opposite by THE CHIEF JUSTICE's dissent.

I yield to the lessons of experience. The "congruence and proportionality" standard, like all such flabby tests, is a *2009 *558 standing invitation to judicial arbitrariness and policy-driven decisionmaking. Worse still, it casts this Court in the role of Congress's taskmaster. Under it, the courts (and ultimately this Court) must regularly check Congress's homework to make sure that it has identified sufficient constitutional violations to make its remedy congruent and proportional. As a general matter, we are ill advised to adopt or adhere to constitutional rules that bring us into constant conflict with a coequal branch of Government. And when conflict is unavoidable, we should not come to do battle with the United States Congress armed only with a test ("congruence and proportionality") that has no demonstrable basis in the text of the Constitution and cannot objectively be shown to have been met or failed. As I wrote for the Court in an earlier case, "low walls and vague distinctions will not be judicially defensible in the heat of interbranch conflict." Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., 514 U.S. 211, 239, 115 S.Ct. 1447, 131 L.Ed.2d 328 (1995).

I would replace "congruence and proportionality" with another test—one that provides a clear, enforceable limitation supported by the text of § 5. Section 5 grants Congress the power "to enforce, by appropriate legislation," the other provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. U.S. Const., Amdt. 14 (emphasis added). Morgan notwithstanding, one does not, within any normal meaning of the term, "enforce" a prohibition by issuing a still broader prohibition directed to the same end. One does not, for example, "enforce" a 55–mile–per–hour speed limit by imposing a 45–mile–per–hour speed limit—even though that is indeed directed to the same end of automotive safety and will undoubtedly result in many fewer violations of the 55–mile–per–hour limit. And one does not "enforce" the right of access to the courts at issue in this case, see ante, at 1993, by requiring that disabled persons be provided access to all of the "services, programs, or activities" furnished or conducted by the State, 42 U.S.C. § 12132. That is simply not what the power to enforce means—or ever 559 meant. The 1860 edition of Noah Webster's American Dictionary of the English Language, current when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, defined "enforce" as: "To put in execution; to cause to take effect; as, to enforce the laws." Id., at 396. See also J. Worcester, Dictionary of the English Language 484 (1860) ("To put in force; to cause to be applied or executed; as, 'To enforce a law' "). Nothing in § 5 allows Congress to go beyond the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to proscribe, prevent, or "remedy" conduct that does not itself violate any provision of the Fourteenth Amendment. So-called "prophylactic legislation" is reinforcement rather than enforcement.

Morgan asserted that this commonsense interpretation "would confine the legislative power ... to the insignificant role of abrogating only those state laws that the judicial branch was prepared to adjudge unconstitutional, or of merely informing the judgment of the judiciary by particularizing the 'majestic generalities' of § 1 of the Amendment." 384 U.S., at 648–649, 86 S.Ct. 1717. That is not so. One must remember "that in 1866 the lower federal courts had no general jurisdiction of cases alleging a deprivation of rights secured by the Constitution." R. Berger, Government By Judiciary 247 (2d ed.1997). If, just after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, a State had enacted a law imposing racially discriminatory literacy tests (different questions for different races) a citizen prejudiced by such a test would have had no means of asserting his constitutional right to be free of it. Section 5 authorizes Congress to create a cause of action through which the citizen may vindicate *2010 his Fourteenth Amendment rights. One of the first pieces of legislation passed under Congress's § 5 power was the Ku Klux Klan Act of April 20, 1871, 17 Stat. 13, entitled "An Act to enforce the Provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other Purposes." Section 1 of that Act, later codified as Rev. Stat. § 1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, authorized a cause of action against "any person who, under 560 color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution of the United States." 17 Stat. 13. Section 5 would also authorize measures that do not restrict the States' substantive scope of action but impose requirements directly related to the facilitation of "enforcement"—for example, reporting requirements that would enable violations of the Fourteenth Amendment to be identified.[2] But what § 5 does not authorize is so-called "prophylactic" measures, prohibiting primary conduct that is itself not forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The major impediment to the approach I have suggested is stare decisis. A lot of water has gone under the bridge since Morgan, and many important and well-accepted measures, such as the Voting Rights Act, assume the validity of Morgan and South Carolina. As Prof. Archibald Cox put it in his Supreme Court Foreword: "The etymological meaning of section 5 may favor the narrower reading. Literally, 'to enforce' means to compel performance of the obligations imposed; but the linguistic argument lost much of its force once the South Carolina and Morgan cases decided that the power to enforce embraces any measure appropriate to effectuating the performance of the state's constitutional duty." Foreword: Constitutional Adjudication and the Promotion of Human Rights, 80 Harv. L.Rev. 91, 110–111 (1966).

561 However, South Carolina and Morgan, all of our later cases except Hibbs that give an expansive meaning to "enforce" in § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, and all of our earlier cases that even suggest such an expansive meaning in dicta, involved congressional measures that were directed exclusively against, or were used in the particular case to remedy, racial discrimination. See Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112, 91 S.Ct. 260, 27 L.Ed.2d 272 (1970) (see discussion infra); Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 25 L.Ed. 676 (1880) (dictum in a case involving a statute that imposed criminal penalties for officials' racial discrimination in jury selection); Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 311–312, 25 L.Ed. 664 (1880) (dictum in a case involving a statute that permitted removal to federal court of a black man's claim that his jury had been selected in a racially discriminatory manner); Virginia v. Rives, 100 U.S. 313, 318, 25 L.Ed. 667 (1880) (dictum in a racial discrimination case involving the same statute). See also *2011 City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 173–178, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980) (upholding as valid legislation under § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment the most sweeping provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965); Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., 392 U.S. 409, 439–441, 88 S.Ct. 2186, 20 L.Ed.2d 1189 (1968) (upholding a law, 42 U.S.C. § 1982, banning public or private racial discrimination in the sale and rental of property as appropriate legislation under § 2 of the Thirteenth Amendment).

Giving § 5 more expansive scope with regard to measures directed against racial discrimination by the States accords to practices that are distinctively violative of the principal purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment a priority of attention that this Court envisioned from the beginning, and that has repeatedly been reflected in our opinions. In the Slaughter–House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 81, 21 L.Ed. 394 (1873), the Court's first confrontation with the Fourteenth Amendment, we said the following with respect to the Equal Protection Clause:

> "We doubt very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to 562 come within the purview of this provision. It is so clearly a provision for that race and that emergency, that a strong case would be necessary for its application to any other."

Racial discrimination was the practice at issue in the early cases (cited in Morgan) that gave such an expansive description of the effects of § 5. See 384 U.S., at 648, 86 S.Ct. 1717 (citing Ex parte Virginia); 384 U.S., at 651, 86 S.Ct. 1717 (citing Strauder v. West Virginia and Virginia v. Rives).[3] In those early days, bear in mind, the guarantee of equal protection had not been extended beyond race to sex, age, and the many other categories it now covers. Also still to be developed were the incorporation doctrine (which holds that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates and applies against the States the Bill of Rights, see Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 147–148, 88 S.Ct. 1444, 20 L.Ed.2d 491 (1968)) and the doctrine of so-called "substantive due process" (which holds that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause protects unenumerated liberties, see generally 563 Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 123 S.Ct. 2472, 156 L.Ed.2d 508 (2003); Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 112 S.Ct. 2791, 120 L.Ed.2d 674 (1992)). Thus, the Fourteenth Amendment did not include the many guarantees that it now provides. In such a seemingly limited context, it did not appear to be a massive expansion of *2012 congressional power to interpret § 5 broadly. Broad interpretation was particularly appropriate with regard to racial discrimination, since that was the principal evil against which the Equal Protection Clause was directed, and the principal constitutional prohibition that some of the States stubbornly ignored. The former is still true, and the latter remained true at least as late as Morgan.

When congressional regulation has not been targeted at racial discrimination, we have given narrower scope to § 5. In Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112, 91 S.Ct. 260, 27 L.Ed.2d 272 (1970), the Court upheld, under § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment, that provision of the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970, 84 Stat. 314, which barred literacy tests and similar voter-eligibility requirements—classic tools of the racial discrimination in voting that the Fifteenth Amendment forbids; but found to be beyond the § 5 power of the Fourteenth Amendment the provision that lowered the voting age from 21 to 18 in state elections. See 400 U.S., at 124–130, 91 S.Ct. 260 (opinion of Black, J.); id., at 153–154, 91 S.Ct. 260 (Harlan, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); id., at 293–296, 91 S.Ct. 260 (Stewart, J., joined by Burger, C. J., and Blackmun, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). A third provision, which forbade States from disqualifying voters by reason of residency requirements, was also upheld—but only a minority of the Justices believed that § 5 was adequate authority. Justice Black's opinion in that case described exactly the line I am drawing here, suggesting that Congress's enforcement power is broadest when directed "to the goal of eliminating discrimination on account of race." Id., at 130, 91 S.Ct. 260. And of course the results reached in Boerne, Florida Prepaid, Kimel, Morrison, and Garrett are consistent with the narrower compass afforded congressional 564 regulation that does not protect against or prevent racial discrimination.

Thus, principally for reasons of stare decisis, I shall henceforth apply the permissive McCulloch standard to congressional measures designed to remedy racial discrimination by the States. I would not, however, abandon the requirement that Congress may impose prophylactic § 5 legislation only upon those particular States in which there has been an identified history of relevant constitutional violations. See Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 741–743, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (SCALIA, J., dissenting); Morrison, 529 U.S., at 626–627, 120 S.Ct. 1740; Morgan, 384 U.S., at 666–667, 669, 670–671, 86 S.Ct. 1717 (Harlan, J., dissenting).[4] I would also adhere to the requirement that the prophylactic remedy predicated upon such state violations must be directed against the States or state actors rather than the public at large. See Morrison, supra, at 625–626, 120 S.Ct. 1740. And I would not, of course, permit any congressional measures that violate other *2013 provisions of the Constitution. When those requirements have been met, however, I shall leave it to Congress, under constraints no tighter than those of the Necessary and Proper Clause, to decide what measures are appropriate under § 5 to prevent or remedy racial discrimination by the States.

565 I shall also not subject to "congruence and proportionality" analysis congressional action under § 5 that is not directed to racial discrimination. Rather, I shall give full effect to that action when it consists of "enforcement" of the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, within the broad but not unlimited meaning of that term I have described above. When it goes beyond enforcement to prophylaxis, however, I shall consider it ultra vires. The present legislation is plainly of the latter sort.

* * *

Requiring access for disabled persons to all public buildings cannot remotely be considered a means of "enforcing" the Fourteenth Amendment. The considerations of long accepted practice and of policy that sanctioned such distortion of language where state racial discrimination is at issue do not apply in this field of social policy far removed from the principal object of the Civil War Amendments. "The seductive plausibility of single steps in a chain of evolutionary development of a legal rule is often not perceived until a third, fourth, or fifth 'logical' extension occurs. Each step, when taken, appeared a reasonable step in relation to that which preceded it, although the aggregate or end result is one that would never have been seriously considered in the first instance. This kind of gestative propensity calls for the 'line drawing' familiar in the judicial, as in the legislative process: 'thus far but not beyond.' " United States v. 12 200—ft. Reels of Super 8MM. Film, 413 U.S. 123, 127, 93 S.Ct. 2665, 37 L.Ed.2d 500 (1973) (Burger, C. J., for the Court) (footnote omitted). It is past time to draw a line limiting the uncontrolled spread of a well-intentioned textual distortion. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent from the judgment of the Court.

Justice THOMAS, dissenting.

I join THE CHIEF JUSTICE's dissent. I agree that Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 cannot be a 566 congruent and proportional remedy to the States' alleged practice of denying disabled persons access to the courts. Not only did Congress fail to identify any evidence of such a practice when it enacted the ADA, ante, at 1998–2003, Title II regulates far more than the provision of access to the courts, ante, at 2003–2006. Because I joined the dissent in Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003), and continue to believe that Hibbs was wrongly decided, I write separately only to disavow any reliance on Hibbs in reaching this conclusion.

All Citations

541 U.S. 509, 124 S.Ct. 1978, 158 L.Ed.2d 820, 15 A.D. Cases 865, 28 NDLR P 65, 04 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 4207, 2004 Daily Journal D.A.R. 5854, 17 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 299, 17 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 997

Footnotes

[*] The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 50 L.Ed. 499.

1 In Puerto Rico Aqueduct and Sewer Authority v. Metcalf & Eddy, Inc., 506 U.S. 139, 113 S.Ct. 684, 121 L.Ed.2d 605 (1993), we held that "States and state entities that claim to be 'arms of the State' may take advantage of the collateral order doctrine to appeal a district court order denying a claim of Eleventh Amendment immunity." Id., at 147, 113 S.Ct. 684.

2 See 42 U.S.C. § 12101; Task Force on the Rights and Empowerment of Americans with Disabilities, From ADA to Empowerment 16 (Oct. 12, 1990); S.Rep. No. 101–116 (1989); H.R.Rep. No. 101–485 (1990), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1990, p. 267; H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 101–558 (1990); H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 101–596 (1990), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1990, p. 565; cf. Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 389–390, 121 S.Ct. 955, 148 L.Ed.2d 866 (2001) (App. A to opinion of BREYER, J., dissenting) (listing congressional hearings).

3 In Ex parte Virginia, we described the breadth of Congress' § 5 power as follows:

"Whatever legislation is appropriate, that is, adapted to carry out the objects the amendments have in view, whatever tends to enforce submission to the prohibitions they contain, and to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights and the equal protection of the laws against State denial or invasion, if not prohibited, is brought within the domain of congressional power." 100 U.S., at 345–346. See also City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 517–518, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997).

4 In Boerne, we observed:

"Legislation which deters or remedies constitutional violations can fall within the sweep of Congress' enforcement power even if in the process it prohibits conduct which is not itself unconstitutional and intrudes into 'legislative spheres of autonomy previously reserved to the States.' Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 455, 96 S.Ct. 2666, 49 L.Ed.2d 614 (1976). For example, the Court upheld a suspension of literacy tests and similar voting requirements under Congress' parallel power to enforce the provisions of the Fifteenth Amendment, see U.S. Const., Amdt. 15, § 2, as a measure to combat racial discrimination in voting, South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 308, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966), despite the facial constitutionality of the tests under Lassiter v. Northampton County Bd. of Elections, 360 U.S. 45, 79 S.Ct. 985, 3 L.Ed.2d 1072 (1959). We have also concluded that other measures protecting voting rights are within Congress' power to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, despite the burdens those measures placed on the States. South Carolina v. Katzenbach, supra (upholding several provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965); Katzenbach v. Morgan, [384 U.S. 641, 86 S.Ct. 1717, 16 L.Ed.2d 828 (1966)] (upholding ban on literacy tests that prohibited certain people schooled in Puerto Rico from voting); Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112, 91 S.Ct. 260, 27 L.Ed.2d 272 (1970) (upholding 5–year nationwide ban on literacy tests and similar voting requirements for registering to vote); City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 161, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980) (upholding 7–year extension of the Voting Rights Act's requirement that certain jurisdictions preclear any change to a " 'standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting' "); see also James Everard's Breweries v. Day, 265 U.S. 545, 44 S.Ct. 628, 68 L.Ed. 1174 (1924) (upholding ban on medical prescription of intoxicating malt liquors as appropriate to enforce Eighteenth Amendment ban on manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes)." Id., at 518, 117 S.Ct. 2157.

5 Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 464, and n. 14, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985) (Marshall, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part) (citing Note, Mental Disability and the Right to Vote, 88 Yale L.J. 1644 (1979)).

6 See Schriner, Ochs, & Shields, Democratic Dilemmas: Notes on the ADA and Voting Rights of People with Cognitive and Emotional Impairments, 21 Berkeley J. Emp. & Lab. L. 437, 456–472, tbl. II (2000) (listing state laws concerning the voting rights of persons with mental disabilities).

7 See Doe v. Rowe, 156 F.Supp.2d 35 (D.Me.2001).

8 E.g., D.C.Code § 46–403 (West 2001) (declaring illegal and void the marriage of "an idiot or of a person adjudged to be a lunatic"); Ky.Rev.Stat. Ann. § 402.990(2) (West 1992 Cumulative Service) (criminalizing the marriage of persons with mental disabilities); Tenn.Code Ann. § 36–3–109 (1996) (forbidding the issuance of a marriage license to "imbecile[s]").

9 E.g., Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. § 729.204 (West 2002) (persons selected for inclusion on jury list may not be "infirm or decrepit"); Tenn.Code Ann. § 22–2–304(c) (1994) (authorizing judges to excuse "mentally and physically disabled" persons from jury service).

10 The undisputed findings of fact in Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, 451 U.S. 1, 101 S.Ct. 1531, 67 L.Ed.2d 694 (1981), provide another example of such mistreatment. See id., at 7, 101 S.Ct. 1531 ("Conditions at Pennhurst are not only dangerous, with the residents often physically abused or drugged by staff members, but also inadequate for the 'habilitation' of the retarded").

11 E.g., LaFaut v. Smith, 834 F.2d 389, 394 (C.A.4 1987) (paraplegic inmate unable to access toilet facilities); Schmidt v. Odell, 64 F.Supp.2d 1014 (D.Kan.1999) (double amputee forced to crawl around the floor of jail). See also, e.g., Key v. Grayson, 179 F.3d 996 (C.A.6 1999) (deaf inmate denied access to sex offender therapy program allegedly required as precondition for parole).

12 E.g., New York State Assn. for Retarded Children, Inc. v. Carey, 466 F.Supp. 487, 504 (E.D.N.Y.1979) (segregation of mentally retarded students with hepatitis B); Mills v. Board of Ed. of District of Columbia, 348 F.Supp. 866 (D.D.C. 1972) (exclusion of mentally retarded students from public school system). See also, e.g., Robertson v. Granite City Community Unit School Dist. No. 9, 684 F.Supp. 1002 (S.D.Ill.1988) (elementary-school student with AIDS excluded from attending regular education classes or participating in extracurricular activities); Thomas v. Atascadero Unified School Dist., 662 F.Supp. 376 (C.D.Cal.1986) (kindergarten student with AIDS excluded from class).

13 E.g., Doe v. Rowe, 156 F.Supp.2d 35 (D.Me.2001) (disenfranchisement of persons under guardianship by reason of mental illness). See also, e.g., New York ex rel. Spitzer v. County of Delaware, 82 F.Supp.2d 12 (N.D.N.Y.2000) (mobility-impaired voters unable to access county polling places).

14 E.g., Ferrell v. Estelle, 568 F.2d 1128, 1132–1133 (C.A.5) (deaf criminal defendant denied interpretive services), opinion withdrawn as moot, 573 F.2d 867 (C.A.5 1978); State v. Schaim, 65 Ohio St.3d 51, 64, 600 N.E.2d 661, 672 (1992) (same); People v. Rivera, 125 Misc.2d 516, 528, 480 N.Y.S.2d 426, 434 (Sup.Ct.1984) (same). See also, e.g., Layton v. Elder, 143 F.3d 469, 470–472 (C.A.8 1998) (mobility-impaired litigant excluded from a county quorum court session held on the second floor of an inaccessible courthouse); Matthews v. Jefferson, 29 F.Supp.2d 525, 533–534 (W.D.Ark.1998) (wheelchair-bound litigant had to be carried to the second floor of an inaccessible courthouse, from which he was unable to leave to use restroom facilities or obtain a meal, and no arrangements were made to carry him downstairs at the end of the day); Pomerantz v. County of Los Angeles, 674 F.2d 1288, 1289 (C.A.9 1982) (blind persons categorically excluded from jury service); Galloway v. Superior Court of District of Columbia, 816 F.Supp. 12 (D.D.C. 1993) (same); DeLong v. Brumbaugh, 703 F.Supp. 399, 405 (W.D.Pa.1989) (deaf individual excluded from jury service); People v. Green, 148 Misc.2d 666, 669, 561 N.Y.S.2d 130, 133 (Cty.Ct.1990) (prosecutor exercised peremptory strike against prospective juror solely because she was hearing impaired).

15 For a comprehensive discussion of the shortcomings of state disability discrimination statutes, see Colker & Milani, The

Post-Garrett World: Insufficient State Protection against Disability Discrimination, 53 Ala. L.Rev. 1075 (2002).

16 THE CHIEF JUSTICE dismisses as "irrelevant" the portions of this evidence that concern the conduct of nonstate governments. Post, at 1999–2000 (dissenting opinion). This argument rests on the mistaken premise that a valid exercise of Congress' § 5 power must always be predicated solely on evidence of constitutional violations by the States themselves. To operate on that premise in this case would be particularly inappropriate because this case concerns the provision of judicial services, an area in which local governments are typically treated as "arm [s] of the State" for Eleventh Amendment purposes, Mt. Healthy City Bd. of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 280, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977), and thus enjoy precisely the same immunity from unconsented suit as the States. See, e.g., Callahan v. Philadelphia, 207 F.3d 668, 670–674 (C.A.3 2000) (municipal court is an "arm of the State" entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity); Kelly v. Municipal Courts, 97 F.3d 902, 907–908 (C.A.7 1996) (same); Franceschi v. Schwartz, 57 F.3d 828, 831 (C.A.9 1995) (same). Cf. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 368–369, 121 S.Ct. 955.

In any event, our cases have recognized that evidence of constitutional violations on the part of nonstate governmental actors is relevant to the § 5 inquiry. To be sure, evidence of constitutional violations by the States themselves is particularly important when, as in Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 119 S.Ct. 2199, 144 L.Ed.2d 575 (1999), Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 120 S.Ct. 631, 145 L.Ed.2d 522 (2000), and Garrett, the sole purpose of reliance on § 5 is to place the States on equal footing with private actors with respect to their amenability to suit. But much of the evidence in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 312–315, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966), to which THE CHIEF JUSTICE favorably refers, post, at 2003, involved the conduct of county and city officials, rather than the States. Moreover, what THE CHIEF JUSTICE calls an "extensive legislative record documenting States' gender discrimination in employment leave policies" in Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003), post, at 2003, in fact contained little specific evidence of a pattern of unconstitutional discrimination on the part of the States. Indeed, the evidence before the Congress that enacted the FMLA related primarily to the practices of private-sector employers and the Federal Government. See Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 730–735, 123 S.Ct. 1972. See also id., at 745–750, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (KENNEDY, J., dissenting).

17 Specifically, we relied on (1) a Senate Report citation to a Bureau of Labor Statistics survey revealing disparities in private-sector provision of parenting leave to men and women; (2) submissions from two sources at a hearing on the Parental and Medical Leave Act of 1986, a predecessor bill to the FMLA, that public-sector parental leave polices " 'diffe[r] little' " from private-sector policies; (3) evidence that 15 States provided women up to one year of extended maternity leave, while only 4 States provided for similarly extended paternity leave; and (4) a House Report's quotation of a study that found that failure to implement uniform standards for parenting leave would " 'leav[e] Federal employees open to discretionary and possibly unequal treatment,' " H.R.Rep. No. 103–8, pt. 2, p. 11 (1993). Hibbs, 538 U.S., at 728–733, 123 S.Ct. 1972.

18 Contrary to THE CHIEF JUSTICE, post, at 2005, neither Garrett nor Florida Prepaid lends support to the proposition that the Boerne test requires courts in all cases to "measur[e] the full breadth of the statute or relevant provision that Congress enacted against the scope of the constitutional right it purported to enforce." In fact, the decision in Garrett, which severed Title I of the ADA from Title II for purposes of the § 5 inquiry, demonstrates that courts need not examine "the full breadth of the statute" all at once. Moreover, Garrett and Florida Prepaid, like all of our other recent § 5 cases, concerned legislation that narrowly targeted the enforcement of a single constitutional right; for that reason, neither speaks to the issue presented in this case.

Nor is THE CHIEF JUSTICE's approach compelled by the nature of the Boerne inquiry. The answer to the question Boerne asks—whether a piece of legislation attempts substantively to redefine a constitutional guarantee—logically focuses on the manner in which the legislation operates to enforce that particular guarantee. It is unclear what, if anything, examining Title II's application to hockey rinks or voting booths can tell us about whether Title II substantively redefines the right of access to the courts.

19 In Raines, a State subject to suit under the Civil Rights Act of 1957 contended that the law exceeded Congress' power to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment because it prohibited "any person," and not just state actors, from interfering with voting rights. We rejected that argument, concluding that "if the complaint here called for an application of the statute clearly constitutional under the Fifteenth Amendment, that should have been an end to the question of constitutionality." 362 U.S., at 24–25, 80 S.Ct. 519.

20 Because this case implicates the right of access to the courts, we need not consider whether Title II's duty to accommodate exceeds what the Constitution requires in the class of cases that implicate only Cleburne's prohibition on irrational discrimination. See Garrett, 531 U.S., at 372, 121 S.Ct. 955.

21 Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371, 91 S.Ct. 780, 28 L.Ed.2d 113 (1971) (divorce filing fee); M.L.B. v. S.L. J., 519 U.S. 102, 117 S.Ct. 555, 136 L.Ed.2d 473 (1996) (record fee in parental rights termination action); Smith v. Bennett, 365 U.S. 708, 81 S.Ct. 895, 6 L.Ed.2d 39 (1961) (filing fee for habeas petitions); Burns v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 252, 79 S.Ct. 1164, 3 L.Ed.2d 1209 (1959) (filing fee for direct appeal in criminal case).

22 Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12, 76 S.Ct. 585, 100 L.Ed. 891 (1956).

23 Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 83 S.Ct. 792, 9 L.Ed.2d 799 (1963) (trial counsel for persons charged with felony offenses); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353, 83 S.Ct. 814, 9 L.Ed.2d 811 (1963) (counsel for direct appeals as of right).

24 THE CHIEF JUSTICE contends that Title II cannot be understood as remedial legislation because it "subjects a State to liability for failing to make a vast array of special accommodations, without regard for whether the failure to accommodate results in a constitutional wrong." Post, at 2006 (emphasis in original). But as we have often acknowledged, Congress "is not confined to the enactment of legislation that merely parrots the precise wording of the Fourteenth Amendment," and may prohibit "a somewhat broader swath of conduct, including that which is not itself forbidden by the Amendment's text." Kimel, 528 U.S., at 81, 120 S.Ct. 631. Cf. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (upholding the FMLA as valid remedial legislation without regard to whether failure to provide the statutorily mandated 12 weeks' leave results in a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment).

1 See generally Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 463–464, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985) (Marshall, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part); Burgdorf & Burgdorf, A History of Unequal Treatment: The Qualifications of Handicapped Persons As A "Suspect Class" Under the Equal Protection Clause, 15 Santa Clara Law. 855 (1975); Brief for United States 17–19.

2 As the majority opinion shows, some of them persist to this day, ante, at 1989–1990, to say nothing of their lingering effects on society.

1 For further discussion of the propriety of this approach, see infra, at 2004–2005.

2 E.g., ante, at 1989 (citing Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, Inc., 473 U.S. 432, 105 S.Ct. 3249, 87 L.Ed.2d 313 (1985) (irrational discrimination by city zoning board)); ante, at 1990, n. 13 (citing New York ex rel. Spitzer v. County of Delaware, 82 F.Supp.2d 12 (N.D.N.Y.2000) (ADA lawsuit brought by State against a county)); ante, at 1989–1990, n. 12 (citing four cases concerning local school boards' unconstitutional actions); ante, at 1989, n. 11 (citing one case involving conditions in federal prison and another involving a county jail inmate); ante, at 1990 (referring to "hundreds of examples of unequal treatment ... by States and their political subdivisions " (emphasis added)).

3 The majority obscures this fact by repeatedly referring to congressional findings of "discrimination" and "unequal treatment." Of course, generic findings of discrimination and unequal treatment vel non are insufficient to show a pattern of constitutional violations where rational-basis scrutiny applies. Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett, 531 U.S. 356, 370, 121 S.Ct. 955,

148 L.Ed.2d 866 (2001).

4 Certainly, respondents Lane and Jones were not denied these constitutional rights. The majority admits that Lane was able to attend the initial hearing of his criminal trial. Ante, at 1982. Lane was arrested for failing to appear at his second hearing only after he refused assistance from officers dispatched by the court to help him to the courtroom. Ante, at 1982. The court conducted a preliminary hearing in the first-floor library to accommodate Lane's disability, App. to Pet. for Cert. 16, and later offered to move all further proceedings in the case to a handicapped-accessible courthouse in a nearby town. In light of these facts, it can hardly be said that the State violated Lane's right to be present at his trial; indeed, it made affirmative attempts to secure that right. Respondent Jones, a disabled court reporter, does not seriously contend that she suffered a constitutional injury.

5 As two Justices noted in Garrett, if the States were violating the due process rights of disabled persons, "one would have expected to find in decisions of the courts ... extensive litigation and discussion of the constitutional violations." 531 U.S., at 376, 121 S.Ct. 955 (KENNEDY, J., joined by O'CONNOR, J., concurring).

6 The balance of the Court's citations refer to cases arising after enactment of the ADA or do not contain findings of federal constitutional violations. Ante, at 1990, n. 14 (citing Layton v. Elder, 143 F.3d 469 (C.A.8 1998) (post-ADA case finding ADA violations only); Matthews v. Jefferson, 29 F.Supp.2d 525 (W.D.Ark.1998) (same); Galloway v. Superior Court, 816 F.Supp. 12 (D.D.C. 1993) (same); State v. Schaim, 65 Ohio St.3d 51, 600 N.E.2d 661 (1992) (remanded for hearing on constitutional issue); People v. Green, 148 Misc.2d 666, 561 N.Y.S.2d 130 (Cty. Ct.1990) (finding violation of state constitution only); DeLong v. Brumbaugh, 703 F.Supp. 399 (W.D.Pa.1989) (statute upheld against facial constitutional challenge; Rehabilitation Act of 1973 violations only); Pomerantz v. Los Angeles County, 674 F.2d 1288 (C.A.9 1982) (Rehabilitation Act of 1973 claim; challenged jury-service statute later amended)). Accordingly, they offer no support whatsoever for the notion that Title II is a valid response to documented constitutional violations.

7 Oversight Hearing on H.R. 4498 before the House Subcommittee on Select Education of the Committee on Education and Labor, 100th Cong., 2d Sess., 40–41 (1988) (statement of Emeka Nwojke) (explaining that he encountered difficulties appearing in court due to physical characteristics of the courthouse and courtroom and the rudeness of court employees); id., at 48 (statement of Ellen Telker) (blind attorney "know[s] of at least one courthouse in New Haven where the elevators do not have tactile markings").

8 The majority rather peculiarly points to Congress' finding that " 'discrimination against individuals with disabilities persists in such critical areas as ... access to public services ' " as evidence that Congress sought to vindicate the due process rights of disabled persons. Ante, at 1992 (quoting 42 U.S.C. § 12101(a)(3) (emphasis added by the Court)). However, one does not usually refer to the right to attend a judicial proceeding as "access to [a] public servic[e]." Given the lack of any concern over courthouse accessibility issues in the legislative history, it is highly unlikely that this legislative finding obliquely refers to state violations of the due process rights of disabled persons to attend judicial proceedings.

9 The Court correctly explains that " 'it [i]s easier for Congress to show a pattern of state constitutional violations' " when it targets state action that triggers a higher level of constitutional scrutiny. Ante, at 1992 (quoting Nevada Dept. of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721, 736, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953 (2003)). However, this Court's precedents attest that Congress may not dispense with the required showing altogether simply because it purports to enforce due process rights. See Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 645–646, 119 S.Ct. 2199, 144 L.Ed.2d 575 (1999) (invalidating Patent Remedy Act, which purported to enforce the Due Process Clause, because Congress failed to identify a record of constitutional violations); City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 530–531, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997) (same with respect to Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA)). As the foregoing discussion demonstrates, that is precisely what the Court has sanctioned here. Because the record is utterly devoid of proof that Congress was responding to state violations of due process access-to-the-courts rights, this case is controlled by Florida Prepaid and City of Boerne, rather than Hibbs.

10 Title II's all-encompassing approach to regulating public services contrasts starkly with the more closely tailored laws we have upheld as legitimate prophylactic § 5 legislation. In Hibbs, for example, the FMLA was "narrowly targeted" to remedy widespread gender discrimination in the availability of family leave. 538 U.S., at 738–739, 123 S.Ct. 1972 (distinguishing City of Boerne, Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. 62, 120 S.Ct. 631, 145 L.Ed.2d 522 (2000), and Garrett on this ground). Similarly, in cases involving enforcement of the Fifteenth Amendment, we upheld "limited remedial scheme[s]" that were narrowly tailored to address massive evidence of discrimination in voting. Garrett, 531 U.S., at 373, 121 S.Ct. 955 (discussing South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 86 S.Ct. 803, 15 L.Ed.2d 769 (1966)). Unlike these statutes, Title II's "indiscriminate scope ... is particularly incongruous in light of the scant support for the predicate unconstitutional conduct that Congress intended to remedy." Florida Prepaid, 527 U.S., at 647, 119 S.Ct. 2199.

11 Raines is inapposite in any event. The Court there considered the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act of 1957—a statute designed to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment—whose narrowly tailored substantive provisions could "unquestionably" be applied to state actors (like the respondents therein). 362 U.S., at 25, 26, 80 S.Ct. 519. The only question presented was whether the statute was facially invalid because it might be read to constrain nonstate actors as well. Id., at 20, 80 S.Ct. 519. The Court upheld the statute as applied to respondents and declined to entertain the facial challenge. Id., at 24–26, 80 S.Ct. 519. The situation in this case is much different: The very question presented is whether Title II's indiscriminate substantive provisions can constitutionally be applied to the petitioner State. Raines thus provides no support for avoiding this question by conjuring up an imaginary statute with substantive provisions that might pass the congruence-and-proportionality test.

12 The majority's invocation of Hibbs to justify Title II's overbreadth is unpersuasive. See ante, at 1994, n. 24. The Hibbs Court concluded that "in light of the evidence before Congress" the FMLA's 12–week family-leave provision was necessary to "achiev[e] Congress' remedial object." 538 U.S., at 748, 123 S.Ct. 1972. The Court found that the legislative record included not only evidence of state constitutional violations, but evidence that a provision merely enforcing the Equal Protection Clause would actually perpetuate the gender stereotypes Congress sought to eradicate because employers could simply eliminate family leave entirely. Ibid. Without comparable evidence of constitutional violations and the necessity of prophylactic measures, the Court has no basis on which to uphold Title II's special-accommodation requirements.

1 Congress had previously attempted such an extension in the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970, 84 Stat. 318, which sought to lower the voting age in state elections from 21 to 18. This extension was rejected, but in three separate opinions, none of which commanded a majority of the Court. See infra, at 2012.

2 Professor Tribe's treatise gives some examples of such measures that facilitate enforcement in the context of the Fifteenth Amendment:

"The Civil Rights Act of 1957, 71 Stat. 634, authorized the Attorney General to seek injunctions against interference with the right to vote on racial grounds. The Civil Rights Act of 1960, 74 Stat. 86, permitted joinder of states as parties defendant, gave the Attorney General access to local voting records, and authorized courts to register voters in areas of systemic discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, 78 Stat. 241, expedited the hearing of voting cases before three-judge courts...." L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 931, n. 5 (3d ed.2000).

3 A later case cited in Morgan, James Everard's Breweries v. Day, 265 U.S. 545, 558–563, 44 S.Ct. 628, 68 L.Ed. 1174 (1924), applied the more flexible standard of M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L.Ed. 579 (1819), to the Eighteenth Amendment, which, in § 1, forbade "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States ... for beverage purposes" and provided, in § 2, that "Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." Congress had provided, in the Supplemental Prohibition Act of 1921, § 2, 42 Stat. 222, that "only spirituous and vinous liquor may be prescribed for medicinal purposes." That was challenged as unconstitutional because it went beyond the regulation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and hence beyond "enforcement." In an opinion citing none of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendment cases discussed in text, the Court held that the M'Culloch v. Maryland test applied. Unlike what is at issue here, that case did not involve a power to control the States in respects not otherwise permitted by the Constitution. The only consequence of the Federal Government's going beyond "enforcement" narrowly defined was its arguable incursion upon powers left to the States—which is essentially the same issue that M'Culloch addressed.

[4] Dicta in one of our earlier cases seemed to suggest that even nonprophylactic provisions could not be adopted under § 5 except in response to a State's constitutional violations:

"When the State has been guilty of no violation of [the Fourteenth Amendment's] provisions; when it has not made or enforced any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; when no one of its departments has deprived any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denied to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; when, on the contrary, the laws of the State, as enacted by its legislative, and construed by its judicial, and administered by its executive departments, recognize and protect the rights of all persons, the amendment imposes no duty and confers no power upon Congress." United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629, 639, 1 S.Ct. 601, 27 L.Ed. 290 (1883).

I do not see the textual basis for this interpretation.

End of Document

106 S.Ct. 2752
Supreme Court of the United States

Lacy H. THORNBURG, et al., Appellants
v.
Ralph GINGLES et al.

No. 83–1968
|
Argued Dec. 4, 1985.
|
Decided June 30, 1986.

Synopsis

Action was brought challenging use of multimember districts in North Carolina legislative apportionment. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina, 590 F.Supp. 345, found the plan to violate the Voting Rights Act and state officials appealed. The Supreme Court, Justice Brennan, J., held that: (1) plaintiffs claiming impermissive vote dilution must demonstrate that voting devices resulted in unequal access to electoral process; (2) use of multimember districts does not impede the ability of minority voters to elect representatives of their choice unless a bloc voting majority will usually be able to defeat candidates supported by a politically cohesive, geographically insular minority; (3) District Court applied proper standard in determining whether there was racial polarization and voting; (4) legal concept of racially polarized voting incorporates neither causation nor intent; (5) some electoral success by minority group does not foreclose successful section 2 claim; (6) finding of impermissible dilution was supported by the evidence; but (7) claim of dilution with respect to one multimember district was defeated by evidence that last six elections resulted in proportional representation for black residents.

Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Justice White filed a concurring opinion.

Justice O'Connor filed an opinion concurring in the judgment in which Chief Justice Burger, Justice Powell, and Justice Rehnquist joined.

Justice Stevens filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part in which Justice Marshall and Justice Blackmun joined.

*2755 *30 Syllabus[*]

In 1982, the North Carolina General Assembly enacted a legislative redistricting plan for the State's Senate and House of Representatives. Appellees, black citizens of North Carolina who are registered to vote, brought suit in Federal District Court, challenging one single-member district and six multimember districts on the ground, inter alia, that the redistricting plan impaired black citizens' ability to elect representatives of their choice in violation of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. After appellees brought suit, but before trial, § 2 was amended, largely in response to Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47, to make clear that a violation of § 2 could be proved by showing discriminatory effect alone, rather than having to show a discriminatory purpose, and to establish as the relevant legal standard the "results test." Section 2(a), as amended, prohibits a State or political subdivision from imposing any voting qualifications or prerequisites to voting, or any standards, practices, or procedures that result in the denial or abridgment of the right of any citizen to vote on account of race or color. Section 2(b), as amended, provides that § 2(a) is violated where the "totality of circumstances" reveals that "the political processes leading to nomination or election ... are not equally open to participation by members of a [protected class] ... in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice," and that the extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office is one circumstance that may be considered. The District Court applied the "totality of circumstances" test set forth in § 2(b) and held that the redistricting plan violated § 2(a) because it resulted in the dilution of black citizens' votes in all of the *2756 disputed districts. Appellants, the Attorney General of North Carolina and others, took a direct appeal to this Court with respect to five of the multimember districts.

Held: The judgment is affirmed in part and reversed in part.

590 F.Supp. 345, affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Justice BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III–A, III–B, IV–A, and V, concluding that:

31 1. Minority voters who contend that the multimember form of districting violates § 2 must prove that the use of a multimember electoral structure operates to minimize or cancel out their ability to elect their preferred candidates. While many or all of the factors listed in the Senate Report may be relevant to a claim of vote dilution through submergence in multimember districts, unless there is a conjunction of the following circumstances, the use of multimember districts generally will not impede the ability of minority voters to elect representatives of their choice. Stated succinctly, a bloc voting majority must usually be able to defeat candidates supported by a politically cohesive, geographically insular minority group. The relevance of the existence of racial bloc voting to a vote dilution claim is twofold: to ascertain whether minority group members constitute a politically cohesive unit and to determine whether whites vote sufficiently as a bloc usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. Thus, the question whether a given district experiences legally significant racial bloc voting requires discrete inquiries into minority and white voting practices. A showing that a significant number of minority group members usually vote for the same candidates is one way of proving the political cohesiveness necessary to a vote dilution claim, and consequently establishes minority bloc voting within the meaning of § 2. And, in general, a white bloc vote that normally will defeat the combined strength of minority support plus white "crossover" votes rises to the level of legally significant white bloc voting. Because loss of political power through vote dilution is distinct from the mere inability to win a particular election, a pattern of racial bloc voting that extends over a period of time is more probative of a claim that a district experiences significant polarization than are the results of a single election. In a district where elections are shown usually to be polarized, the fact that racially polarized voting is not present in one election or a few elections does not necessarily negate the conclusion that the district experiences legally significant bloc voting. Furthermore, the success of a minority candidate in a particular election does not necessarily prove that the district did not experience polarized voting in that election. Here, the District Court's approach, which tested data derived from three election years in each district in question, and which revealed that blacks strongly supported black candidates, while, to the black candidates' usual detriment, whites rarely did, satisfactorily addresses each facet of the proper standard for legally significant racial bloc voting. Pp. 2762–2772.

2. The language of § 2 and its legislative history plainly demonstrate that proof that some minority candidates have been elected does not foreclose a § 2 claim. Thus, the District Court did not err, as a matter of law, in refusing to treat the fact that some black candidates have 32 succeeded as dispositive of appellees' § 2 claims. Where multimember districting generally works to dilute the minority vote, it cannot be defended on the ground that it sporadically and serendipitously benefits minority voters. Pp. 2779–2780.

3. The clearly-erroneous test of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52(a) is the appropriate standard for appellate review of ultimate findings of vote dilution. As both amended § 2 and its legislative history make clear, in evaluating a statutory claim of vote dilution through districting, the trial court is to consider the "totality of the circumstances" and to determine, based upon a practical evaluation of the past and *2757 present realities, whether the political process is equally open to minority voters. In this case, the District Court carefully considered the totality of the circumstances and found that in each district racially polarized voting; the legacy of official discrimination in voting matters, education, housing, employment, and health services; and the persistence of campaign appeals to racial prejudice acted in concert with the multimember districting scheme to impair the ability of geographically insular and politically cohesive groups of black voters to participate equally in the political process and to elect candidates of their choice. Pp. 2780–2782.

Justice BRENNAN, joined by Justice MARSHALL, Justice BLACKMUN, and Justice STEVENS, concluded in Part III–C

that for purposes of § 2, the legal concept of racially polarized voting, as it relates to claims of vote dilution—that is, when it is used to prove that the minority group is politically cohesive and that white voters will usually be able to defeat the minority's preferred candidates—refers only to the existence of a correlation between the race of voters and the selection of certain candidates. Plaintiffs need not prove causation or intent in order to prove a prima facie case of racial bloc voting, and defendants may not rebut that case with evidence of causation or intent. Pp. 2772–2779.

Justice BRENNAN, joined by Justice WHITE, concluded in Part IV–B, that the District Court erred, as a matter of law, in ignoring the significance of the sustained success black voters have experienced in House District 23. The persistent proportional representation for black residents in that district in the last six elections is inconsistent with appellees' allegation that black voters' ability in that district to elect representatives of their choice is not equal to that enjoyed by the white majority. Pp. 2780–2781.

Justice O'CONNOR, joined by THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice POWELL, and Justice REHNQUIST, concluded that:

1. Insofar as statistical evidence of divergent racial voting patterns is admitted solely to establish that the minority group is politically cohesive and to assess its prospects for electoral success, such a showing cannot be rebutted by evidence that the divergent voting patterns may 33 be explained by causes other than race. However, evidence of the reasons for divergent voting patterns can in some circumstances be relevant to the overall vote dilution inquiry, and there is no rule against consideration of all evidence concerning voting preferences other than statistical evidence of racial voting patterns. Pp. 2766–2767.

2. Consistent and sustained success by candidates preferred by minority voters is presumptively inconsistent with the existence of a § 2 violation. The District Court erred in assessing the extent of black electoral success in House District 39 and Senate District 22, as well as in House District 23. Except in House District 23, despite these errors the District Court's ultimate conclusion of vote dilution is not clearly erroneous. But in House District 23 appellees failed to establish a violation of § 2. Pp. 2766–2769.

BRENNAN, J., announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III–A, III–B, IV–A, and V, in which WHITE, MARSHALL, BLACKMUN, and STEVENS, JJ., joined, an opinion with respect to Part III–C, in which MARSHALL, BLACKMUN, and STEVENS, JJ., joined, and an opinion with respect to Part IV–B, in which WHITE, J., joined. WHITE, J., filed a concurring opinion, post, p. ——. O'CONNOR, J., filed an opinion concurring in the judgment, in which BURGER, C.J., and POWELL and REHNQUIST, JJ., joined, post, p. ——. STEVENS, J., filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part, in which MARSHALL and BLACKMUN, JJ., joined, post, p. ——.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Lacy H. Thornburg, Attorney General of North Carolina, pro se, argued the cause for appellants. With him on the briefs were Jerris Leonard, Kathleen Heenan McGuan, James Wallace, Jr., Deputy Attorney General for Legal Affairs, and Tiare B. Smiley and Norma S. Harrell, Assistant Attorneys General.

Solicitor General Fried argued the cause for the United States as amicus curiae urging reversal. With him on the brief were Assistant Attorney General Reynolds and Deputy Assistant Attorney General Cooper.

Julius LeVonne Chambers argued the cause for appellees. With him on the briefs for appellees Gingles et al. were Eric Schnapper, C. Lani Guinier, and Leslie J. Winner. C. Allen Foster, Kenneth J. Gumbiner, Robert N. 34 Hunter, Jr., and Arthur J. Donaldson filed briefs for appellees Eaglin et al.*

* Daniel J. Popeo and George C. Smith filed a brief for the Washington Legal Foundation as amicus curiae urging reversal.

Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance were filed for the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, Inc., et al. by Cynthia Hill, Maureen T. Thornton, Laughlin McDonald, and Neil Bradley; for Common Cause by William T. Lake; for the Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights Under Law et al. by James Robertson, Harold R. Tyler, Jr., Norman Redlich, William L. Robinson, Frank R. Parker, Samuel Rabinove, and Richard T. Foltin; for James G. Martin, Governor of North Carolina, by Victor S. Friedman; for Legal Services of North Carolina by David H. Harris, Jr., Susan M. Perry, Richard Taylor, and Julian Pierce; for the Republican National Committee by Roger Allan Moore and Michael A. Hess; and for Senator Dennis DeConcini et al. by Walter J. Rockler.

Opinion

*2758 Justice BRENNAN announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II, III–A, III–B, IV–A, and V, and an opinion with respect to Part III–C, in which Justice MARSHALL, Justice BLACKMUN, and Justice STEVENS join, and an opinion with respect to Part IV–B, in which Justice WHITE joins.

This case requires that we construe for the first time § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended June 29, 1982. 42 U.S.C. § 1973. The specific question to be decided is whether the three-judge District Court, convened in the Eastern District of North Carolina pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284(a) and 42 U.S.C. § 1973c, correctly held that the use in a legislative redistricting plan of multimember districts in five North Carolina legislative districts violated § 2 by impairing the opportunity of black voters "to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." § 2(b), 96 Stat. 134.

I

BACKGROUND

In April 1982, the North Carolina General Assembly enacted a legislative redistricting plan for the State's Senate 35 and House of Representatives. Appellees, black citizens of North Carolina who are registered to vote, challenged seven districts, one single-member[1] and six multimember[2] districts, alleging that the redistricting scheme impaired black citizens' ability to elect representatives of their choice in violation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution and of § 2 of the Voting Rights Act.[3]

After appellees brought suit, but before trial, Congress amended § 2. The amendment was largely a response to this Court's plurality opinion in Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980), which had declared that, in order to establish a violation either of § 2 or of the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendments, minority voters must prove that a contested electoral mechanism was intentionally adopted or maintained by state officials for a discriminatory purpose. Congress substantially revised § 2 to make clear that a violation could be proved by showing discriminatory effect alone and to establish as the relevant legal standard the "results test," applied by this Court in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), and by other federal courts before Bolden, supra. S.Rep. No. 97–417, 97th Cong.2nd Sess. 28 (1982), U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, pp. 177, 205 (hereinafter S.Rep.).

36 Section 2, as amended, 96 Stat. 134, reads as follows:

> "(a) No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the *2759 guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2), as provided in subsection (b).
>
> "(b) A violation of subsection (a) is established if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by subsection (a) in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." Codified at 42 U.S.C. § 1973.

The Senate Judiciary Committee majority Report accompanying the bill that amended § 2, elaborates on the circumstances that might be probative of a § 2 violation, noting the following "typical factors":[4]

> "1. the extent of any history of official discrimination in the state or political subdivision that touched the right of 37 the members of the minority group to register, to vote, or otherwise to participate in the democratic process;
>
> "2. the extent to which voting in the elections of the state or political subdivision is racially polarized;
>
> "3. the extent to which the state or political subdivision has used unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, anti-single shot provisions, or other voting practices or procedures that may enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group;
>
> "4. if there is a candidate slating process, whether the members of the minority group have been denied access to that process;
>
> "5. the extent to which members of the minority group in the state or political subdivision bear the effects of discrimination in such areas as education, employment and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process;
>
> "6. whether political campaigns have been characterized by overt or subtle racial appeals;
>
> "7. the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction.
>
> "Additional factors that in some cases have had probative value as part of plaintiffs' evidence to establish a violation are:
>
> "whether there is a significant lack of responsiveness on the part of elected officials to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group.
>
> "whether the policy underlying the state or political subdivision's use of such voting qualification, prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice or procedure is tenuous." S.Rep., at 28–29, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, pp. 206–207.

The District Court applied the "totality of the circumstances" test set forth in § 2(b) to appellees' statutory claim, and, relying principally on the factors outlined in the Senate 38 Report, held that the redistricting scheme violated § 2 because it resulted in the dilution of black citizens' votes in all seven disputed districts. In light of this conclusion, the court did not reach appellees' constitutional claims. Gingles v. Edmisten, 590 F.Supp. 345 (EDNC 1984).

Preliminarily, the court found that black citizens constituted a distinct population and registered-voter minority in each challenged *2760 district. The court noted that at the time the multimember districts were created, there were concentrations of black citizens within the boundaries of each that were sufficiently large and contiguous to constitute effective voting majorities in single-member districts lying wholly within the boundaries of the multimember districts. With respect to the challenged single-member district, Senate District No. 2, the court also found that there existed a concentration of black citizens within its boundaries and within those of adjoining Senate District No. 6 that was sufficient in numbers and in contiguity to constitute an effective voting majority in a single-member district. The District Court then proceeded to find that the following circumstances combined with the multimember districting scheme to result in the dilution of black citizens' votes.

First, the court found that North Carolina had officially discriminated against its black citizens with respect to their exercise of the voting franchise from approximately 1900 to 1970 by employing at different times a poll tax, a literacy test, a prohibition against bullet (single-shot) voting[5] 39 and designated seat plans[6] for multimember districts. The court observed that even after the removal of direct barriers to black voter registration, such as the poll tax and literacy test, black voter registration remained relatively depressed; in 1982 only 52.7% of age-qualified blacks statewide were registered to vote, whereas 66.7% of whites were registered. The District Court found these statewide depressed levels of black voter registration to be present in all of the disputed districts and to be traceable, at least in part, to the historical pattern of statewide official discrimination.

Second, the court found that historic discrimination in education, housing, employment, and health services had resulted in a lower socioeconomic status for North Carolina blacks as a group than for whites. The court concluded that this lower status both gives rise to special group interests and hinders blacks' ability to participate effectively in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice.

Third, the court considered other voting procedures that may operate to lessen the opportunity of black voters to elect candidates of their choice. It noted that North Carolina has a majority vote requirement for primary elections and, while acknowledging that no black candidate for election to the State General Assembly had failed to win solely because of this requirement, the court concluded that it nonetheless presents a continuing practical impediment to the opportunity of black voting minorities to elect candidates of their choice. The court also remarked on the fact that North Carolina does not have a subdistrict residency requirement for members of the General Assembly elected from multimember 40 districts, a requirement which the court found could offset to some extent the disadvantages minority voters often experience in multimember districts.

Fourth, the court found that white candidates in North Carolina have encouraged *2761 voting along color lines by appealing to racial prejudice. It noted that the record is replete with specific examples of racial appeals, ranging in style from overt and blatant to subtle and furtive, and in date from the 1890's to the 1984 campaign for a seat in the United States Senate. The court determined that the use of racial appeals in political campaigns in North Carolina persists to the present day and that its current effect is to lessen to some degree the opportunity of black citizens to participate effectively in the political processes and to elect candidates of their choice.

Fifth, the court examined the extent to which blacks have been elected to office in North Carolina, both statewide and in the challenged districts. It found, among other things, that prior to World War II, only one black had been elected to public office in this century. While recognizing that "it has now become possible for black citizens to be elected to office at all levels of state government in North Carolina," 590 F.Supp., at 367, the court found that, in comparison to white candidates running for the same office, black candidates are at a disadvantage in terms of relative probability of success. It also found that the overall rate of black electoral success has been minimal in relation to the percentage of blacks in the total state population. For example, the court noted, from 1971 to 1982 there were at any given time only two-to-four blacks in the 120-member House of Representatives—that is, only 1.6% to 3.3% of House members were black. From 1975 to 1983 there were at any one time only one or two blacks in the 50-member State Senate—that is, only 2% to 4% of State Senators were black. By contrast, at the time of the District Court's opinion, blacks constituted about 22.4% of the total state population.

41 With respect to the success in this century of black candidates in the contested districts, see also Appendix B to opinion, post, p. ——, the court found that only one black had been elected to House District 36—after this lawsuit began. Similarly, only one black had served in the Senate from District 22, from 1975–1980. Before the 1982 election, a black was elected only twice to the House from District 39 (part of Forsyth County); in the 1982 contest two blacks were elected. Since 1973 a black citizen had been elected each 2-year term to the House from District 23 (Durham County), but no black had been elected to the Senate from Durham County. In House District 21 (Wake County), a black had been elected twice to the House, and another black served two terms in the State Senate. No black had ever been elected to the House or Senate from the area covered by House District No. 8, and no black person had ever been elected to the Senate from the area covered by Senate District No. 2.

The court did acknowledge the improved success of black candidates in the 1982 elections, in which 11 blacks were elected to the State House of Representatives, including 5 blacks from the multimember districts at issue here. However, the court pointed out that the 1982 election was conducted after the commencement of this litigation. The court found the circumstances of the 1982 election sufficiently aberrational and the success by black candidates too minimal and too recent in relation to the long history of complete denial of elective opportunities to support the conclusion that black voters' opportunities to elect representatives of their choice were not impaired.

Finally, the court considered the extent to which voting in the challenged districts was racially polarized. Based on statistical evidence presented by expert witnesses, supplemented to some degree by the testimony of lay witnesses, the court found that all of the challenged districts exhibit severe and persistent racially polarized voting.

42 Based on these findings, the court declared the contested portions of the 1982 redistricting plan violative of § 2 and enjoined appellants from conducting elections pursuant to those portions of the plan. Appellants, the Attorney General of North Carolina and others, took a direct appeal to *2762 this Court, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1253, with respect to five of the multimember districts—House Districts 21, 23, 36, and 39, and Senate District 22. Appellants argue, first, that the District Court utilized a legally incorrect standard in determining whether the contested districts exhibit racial bloc voting to an extent that is cognizable under § 2. Second, they contend that the court used an incorrect definition of racially polarized voting and thus erroneously relied on statistical evidence that was not probative of polarized voting. Third, they maintain that the court assigned the wrong weight to evidence of some black candidates' electoral success. Finally, they argue that the trial court erred in concluding that these multimember districts result in black citizens having less opportunity than their white counterparts to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. We noted probable jurisdiction, 471 U.S. 1064, 105 S.Ct. 2137, 85 L.Ed.2d 495 (1985), and now affirm with respect to all of the districts except House District 23. With regard to District 23, the judgment of the District Court is reversed.

II

SECTION 2 AND VOTE DILUTION THROUGH USE OF MULTIMEMBER DISTRICTS

An understanding both of § 2 and of the way in which multimember districts can operate to impair blacks' ability to elect representatives of their choice is prerequisite to an evaluation of appellants' contentions. First, then, we review amended § 2 and its legislative history in some detail. Second, we explain the theoretical basis for appellees' claim of vote dilution.

43 A

SECTION 2 AND ITS LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Subsection 2(a) prohibits all States and political subdivisions from imposing any voting qualifications or prerequisites to voting, or any standards, practices, or procedures which result in the denial or abridgment of the right to vote of any citizen who is a member of a protected class of racial and language minorities. Subsection 2(b) establishes that § 2 has been violated where the "totality of the circumstances" reveal that "the political processes leading to nomination or election ... are not equally open to participation by members of a [protected class] ... in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." While explaining that "[t]he extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered" in evaluating an alleged violation, § 2(b) cautions that "nothing in [§ 2] establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population."

The Senate Report which accompanied the 1982 amendments elaborates on the nature of § 2 violations and on the proof required to establish these violations.[7] First and foremost, the Report dispositively rejects the position of the plurality in Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980), which 44 required proof that the contested electoral practice or mechanism was adopted or maintained with the intent to discriminate against minority *2763 voters.[8] See, e.g., S.Rep., at 2, 15–16, 27. The intent test was repudiated for three principal reasons—it is "unnecessarily divisive because it involves charges of racism on the part of individual officials or entire communities," it places an "inordinately difficult" burden of proof on plaintiffs, and it "asks the wrong question." Id., at 36, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 214. The "right" question, as the Report emphasizes repeatedly, is whether "as a result of the challenged practice or structure plaintiffs do not have an equal opportunity to participate in the political processes and to elect candidates of their choice."[9] Id., at 28, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 206. See also id., at 2, 27, 29, n. 118, 36.

In order to answer this question, a court must assess the impact of the contested structure or practice on minority electoral opportunities "on the basis of objective factors." Id., at 27, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 205. The Senate Report specifies factors which typically may be relevant to a § 2 claim: the history of voting-related discrimination in the State or political subdivision; the extent to which voting in the elections of the State or political 45 subdivision is racially polarized; the extent to which the State or political subdivision has used voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group, such as unusually large election districts, majority vote requirements, and prohibitions against bullet voting; the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes; the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process; the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns; and the extent to which members of the minority group have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction. Id., at 28–29; see also supra, at ——. The Report notes also that evidence demonstrating that elected officials are unresponsive to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group and that the policy underlying the State's or the political subdivision's use of the contested practice or structure is tenuous may have probative value. Id., at 29. The Report stresses, however, that this list of typical factors is neither comprehensive nor exclusive. While the enumerated factors will often be pertinent to certain types of § 2 violations, particularly to vote dilution claims,[10] other factors may also be relevant and may be considered. Id., at 29–30. Furthermore, the Senate Committee observed that "there is no requirement that any particular number of factors be proved, or that a majority of them point one way or the other." Id., at 29, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 207. Rather, *2764 the Committee determined that "the question whether the political processes are 'equally open' depends upon a searching practical evaluation of the 'past and present reality,' " id., at 30, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208 (footnote omitted), and on a "functional" view of the political process. Id., at 30, n. 120, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208.

46 Although the Senate Report espouses a flexible, fact-intensive test for § 2 violations, it limits the circumstances under which § 2 violations may be proved in three ways. First, electoral devices, such as at-large elections, may not be considered per se violative of § 2. Plaintiffs must demonstrate that, under the totality of the circumstances, the devices result in unequal access to the electoral process. Id., at 16. Second, the conjunction of an allegedly dilutive electoral mechanism and the lack of proportional representation alone does not establish a violation. Ibid. Third, the results test does not assume the existence of racial bloc voting; plaintiffs must prove it. Id., at 33.

B

VOTE DILUTION THROUGH THE USE OF MULTIMEMBER DISTRICTS

Appellees contend that the legislative decision to employ multimember, rather than single-member, districts in the contested jurisdictions dilutes their votes by submerging them in a white majority,[11] thus impairing their ability to elect representatives of their choice.[12]

47 The essence of a § 2 claim is that a certain electoral law, practice, or structure interacts with social and historical conditions to cause an inequality in the opportunities enjoyed by black and white voters to elect their preferred representatives. This Court has long recognized that multimember districts and at-large voting schemes may " 'operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial [minorities in] the voting population.' "[13] *2765 48 Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 88, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 1294, 16 L.Ed.2d 376 (1966) (quoting Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 439, 85 S.Ct. 498, 501, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965)). See also Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S. 613, 617, 102 S.Ct. 3272, 3275, 73 L.Ed.2d 1012 (1982); White v. Regester, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339; Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 143, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 1869, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971). The theoretical basis for this type of impairment is that where minority and majority voters consistently prefer different candidates, the majority, by virtue of its numerical superiority, will regularly defeat the choices of minority voters.[14] See, e.g., Grofman, Alternatives, in Representation and Redistricting Issues 113–114. Multimember districts and at-large election schemes, however, are not per se violative of minority voters' rights. S.Rep., at 16. Cf. Rogers v. Lodge, supra, 458 U.S., at 617, 102 S.Ct., at 3275; Regester, supra, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339; Whitcomb, supra, 403 U.S., at 142, 91 S.Ct., at 1868. Minority voters who contend that the multimember form of districting violates § 2, must prove that the use of a multimember electoral structure operates to minimize or cancel out their ability to elect their preferred candidates. See, e.g., S.Rep., at 16.

While many or all of the factors listed in the Senate Report may be relevant to a claim of vote dilution through submergence in multimember districts, unless there is a conjunction of the following circumstances, the use of multimember districts generally will not impede the ability of minority voters to elect representatives of their choice.[15] Stated succinctly, 49 a *2766 bloc voting majority must usually be able to defeat candidates supported by a politically cohesive, geographically insular minority group. Bonapfel 355; Blacksher & Menefee 34; Butler 903; Carpeneti 696–699; Davidson, Minority Vote Dilution: An Overview (hereinafter Davidson), in Minority Vote Dilution 4; Grofman, Alternatives 117. Cf. Bolden, 446 U.S., at 105, n. 3, 100 S.Ct., at 1520, n. 3 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting) ("It is obvious 50 that the greater the degree to which the electoral minority is homogeneous and insular and the greater the degree that bloc voting occurs along majority-minority lines, the greater will be the extent to which the minority's voting power is diluted by multimember districting"). These circumstances are necessary preconditions for multimember districts to operate to impair minority voters' ability to elect representatives of their choice for the following reasons. First, the minority group must be able to demonstrate that it is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district.[16] If it is not, as would be the case in a substantially integrated district, the multi-member form of the district cannot be responsible for minority voters' inability to elect its candidates.[17] Cf. 51 Rogers, 458 U.S., at 616, 102 S.Ct., at 3275. See also, Blacksher & Menefee 51–56, 58; Bonapfel 355; Carpeneti 696; Davidson 4; Jewell 130. Second, the minority group must be able to show that it is politically cohesive. If the minority group is not politically cohesive, it cannot be said that the selection of a multimember electoral structure thwarts distinctive minority group interests. Blacksher & Menefee 51–55, 58–60, and n. 344; Carpeneti 696–697; Davidson 4. Third, the minority must be able to demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it—in the absence of special circumstances, such as the minority candidate running unopposed, see, infra, at ——, and n. 26—usually *2767 to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. See, e.g., Blacksher & Menefee 51, 53, 56–57, 60. Cf. Rogers, supra, at 616–617, 102 S.Ct., at 3274–3275; Whitcomb, 403 U.S., at 158–159, 91 S.Ct., at 1877; McMillan v. Escambia County, Fla., 748 F.2d 1037, 1043 (CA5 1984). In establishing this last circumstance, the minority group demonstrates that submergence in a white multimember district impedes its ability to elect its chosen representatives.

Finally, we observe that the usual predictability of the majority's success distinguishes structural dilution from the mere loss of an occasional election. Cf. Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 131–133, 139–140, 106 S.Ct. 2797, ——, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986) (opinion of WHITE, J.); Bolden, supra, 446 U.S., at 111, n. 7, 100 S.Ct., at 1523, n. 7 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting); Whitcomb, supra, 403 U.S., at 153, 91 S.Ct., at 1874. See also Blacksher & Menefee 57, n. 333; Note, Geometry and Geography: Racial Gerrymandering and the Voting Rights Act, 94 Yale L.J. 189, 200, n. 66 (1984) (hereinafter Note, Geometry and Geography).

52 III

RACIALLY POLARIZED VOTING

Having stated the general legal principles relevant to claims that § 2 has been violated through the use of multimember districts, we turn to the arguments of appellants and of the United States as amicus curiae addressing racially polarized voting.[18] First, we describe the District Court's treatment of racially polarized voting. Next, we consider appellants' claim that the District Court used an incorrect legal standard to determine whether racial bloc voting in the contested districts was sufficiently severe to be cognizable as an element of a § 2 claim. Finally, we consider appellants' contention that the trial court employed an incorrect definition of racially polarized voting and thus erroneously relied on statistical evidence that was not probative of racial bloc voting.

A

THE DISTRICT COURT'S TREATMENT OF RACIALLY POLARIZED VOTING

The investigation conducted by the District Court into the question of racial bloc voting credited some testimony of lay witnesses, but relied principally on statistical evidence presented by appellees' expert witnesses, in particular that offered by Dr. Bernard Grofman. Dr. Grofman collected and evaluated data from 53 General Assembly primary and general elections involving black candidacies. These elections were held over a period of three different election years in the six originally challenged multimember districts.[19] Dr. Grofman subjected the data to two complementary methods of analysis—extreme case analysis and bivariate ecological 53 regression analysis[20] —in order to determine whether blacks and whites in these districts differed in their voting behavior. These analytic techniques yielded data concerning the voting patterns of the two races, including estimates of the percentages of members of each race who voted for black candidates.

The court's initial consideration of these data took the form of a three-part inquiry: did the data reveal any correlation between *2768 the race of the voter and the selection of certain candidates; was the revealed correlation statistically significant; and was the difference in black and white voting patterns "substantively significant"? The District Court found that blacks and whites generally preferred different candidates and, on that basis, found voting in the districts to be racially correlated.[21] The court accepted Dr. Grofman's expert opinion that the correlation between the race of the voter and the voter's choice of certain candidates was statistically significant.[22] Finally, adopting Dr. Grofman's terminology, see 54 Tr. 195, the court found that in all but 2 of the 53 elections[23] the degree of racial bloc voting was "so marked as to be substantively significant, in the sense that the results of the individual election would have been different depending upon whether it had been held among only the white voters or only the black voters." 590 F.Supp., at 368.

The court also reported its findings, both in tabulated numerical form and in written form, that a high percentage of black voters regularly supported black candidates and that most white voters were extremely reluctant to vote for black candidates. The court then considered the relevance to the existence of legally significant white bloc voting of the fact that black candidates have won some elections. It determined that in most instances, special circumstances, such as incumbency and lack of opposition, rather than a diminution in usually severe white bloc voting, accounted for these candidates' success. The court also suggested that black voters' reliance on bullet voting was a significant factor in their successful efforts to elect candidates of their choice. Based on all of the evidence before it, the trial court concluded that each of the districts experienced racially polarized voting "in a persistent and severe degree." Id., at 367.

B

THE DEGREE OF BLOC VOTING THAT IS LEGALLY SIGNIFICANT UNDER § 2

1

Appellants' Arguments

North Carolina and the United States argue that the test used by the District Court to determine whether voting patterns in the disputed districts are racially polarized to an extent cognizable under § 2 will lead to results that are inconsistent with congressional intent. North Carolina maintains 55 that the court considered legally significant racially polarized voting to occur whenever "less than 50% of the white voters cast a ballot for the black candidate." Brief for Appellants 36. Appellants also argue that racially polarized voting is legally significant only when it always results in the defeat of black candidates. Id., at 39–40.

The United States, on the other hand, isolates a single line in the court's opinion and identifies it as the court's complete test. According to the United States, the District Court adopted a standard under which legally significant racial bloc voting is deemed to exist whenever " 'the results of the individual election would have been different depending upon whether it had been held among only the white voters or only the black voters in the election.' " 2769 Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 29 (quoting 590 F.Supp., at 368). We read the District Court opinion differently.

2

The Standard for Legally Significant Racial Bloc Voting

The Senate Report states that the "extent to which voting in the elections of the state or political subdivision is racially polarized," S.Rep., at 29, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 206, is relevant to a vote dilution claim. Further, courts and commentators agree that racial bloc voting is a key element of a vote dilution claim. See, e.g., Escambia County, Fla., 748 F.2d, at 1043; United States v. Marengo County Comm'n, 731 F.2d 1546, 1566 (CA11), appeal dism'd and cert. denied, 469 U.S. 976, 105 S.Ct. 375, 83 L.Ed.2d 311 (1984); Nevett v. Sides, 571 F.2d 209, 223 (CA5 1978), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 951, 100 S.Ct. 2916, 64 L.Ed.2d 807 (1980); Johnson v. Halifax County, 594 F.Supp. 161, 170 (EDNC 1984); Blacksher & Menefee; Engstrom & Wildgen, 465, 469; Parker 107; Note, Geometry and Geography 199. Because, as we explain below, the extent of bloc voting necessary to demonstrate that a minority's ability to elect its preferred representatives is impaired varies according to several factual circumstances, the degree of bloc voting which constitutes the threshold of legal significance will vary *56 from district to district. Nonetheless, it is possible to state some general principles and we proceed to do so.

The purpose of inquiring into the existence of racially polarized voting is twofold: to ascertain whether minority group members constitute a politically cohesive unit and to determine whether whites vote sufficiently as a bloc usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidates. See supra, at ——. Thus, the question whether a given district experiences legally significant racially polarized voting requires discrete inquiries into minority and white voting practices. A showing that a significant number of minority group members usually vote for the same candidates is one way of proving the political cohesiveness necessary to a vote dilution claim, Blacksher & Menefee 59–60, and n. 344, and, consequently, establishes minority bloc voting within the context of § 2. And, in general, a white bloc vote that normally will defeat the combined strength of minority support plus white "crossover" votes rises to the level of legally significant white bloc voting. Id., at 60. The amount of white bloc voting that can generally "minimize or cancel," S.Rep., at 28, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 205; Regester, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339, black voters' ability to elect representatives of their choice, however, will vary from district to district according to a number of factors, including the nature of the allegedly dilutive electoral mechanism; the presence or absence of other potentially dilutive electoral devices, such as majority vote requirements, designated posts, and prohibitions against bullet voting; the percentage of registered voters in the district who are members of the minority group; the size of the district; and, in multimember districts, the number of seats open and the number of candidates in the field.[24] See, e.g., Butler 874–876; Davidson 5; Jones, The Impact of Local Election Systems on Black Political Representation, 11 Urb.Aff.Q. 345 (1976); United States Commission *57 on Civil Rights, The Voting Rights Act: Unfulfilled Goals 38–41 (1981).

Because loss of political power through vote dilution is distinct from the mere inability to win a particular election, Whitcomb, 403 U.S., at 153, 91 S.Ct., at 1874, a pattern of racial bloc voting that extends over a period of time is more probative of a claim that a district experiences legally significant polarization than are the results of a single election.[25] Blacksher & Menefee 61; Note, Geometry and Geography 2770 200, n. 66 ("Racial polarization should be seen as an attribute not of a single election, but rather of a polity viewed over time. The concern is necessarily temporal and the analysis historical because the evil to be avoided is the subordination of minority groups in American politics, not the defeat of individuals in particular electoral contests"). Also for this reason, in a district where elections are shown usually to be polarized, the fact that racially polarized voting is not present in one or a few individual elections does not necessarily negate the conclusion that the district experiences legally significant bloc voting. Furthermore, the success of a minority candidate in a particular election does not necessarily prove that the district did not experience polarized voting in that election; special circumstances, such as the absence of an opponent, incumbency, or the utilization of bullet voting, may explain minority electoral success in a polarized contest.[26]

As must be apparent, the degree of racial bloc voting that is cognizable as an element of a § 2 vote dilution claim will 58 vary according to a variety of factual circumstances. Consequently, there is no simple doctrinal test for the existence of legally significant racial bloc voting. However, the foregoing general principles should provide courts with substantial guidance in determining whether evidence that black and white voters generally prefer different candidates rises to the level of legal significance under § 2.

3

Standard Utilized by the District Court

The District Court clearly did not employ the simplistic standard identified by North Carolina—legally significant bloc voting occurs whenever less than 50% of the white voters cast a ballot for the black candidate. Brief for Appellants 36. And, although the District Court did utilize the measure of " 'substantive significance" that the United States ascribes to it—" 'the results of the individual election would have been different depending on whether it had been held among only the white voters or only the black voters,' " Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 29 (quoting 590 F.Supp., at 368)—the court did not reach its ultimate conclusion that the degree of racial bloc voting present in each district is legally significant through mechanical reliance on this standard.[27] While the court did not phrase the standard for legally significant racial bloc voting exactly as we do, a fair reading of the court's opinion reveals that the court's analysis conforms to our view of the proper legal standard.

The District Court's findings concerning black support for black candidates in the five multimember districts at issue 59 here clearly establish the political cohesiveness of black voters. As is apparent from the District Court's tabulated findings, reproduced in Appendix A to opinion, post, p. ——, black voters' support for black candidates was overwhelming in almost every election. In all but 5 of 16 primary elections, black support for black candidates ranged between 71% and 92%; and in the general elections, black support for black Democratic candidates ranged between 87% and 96%.

*2771 In sharp contrast to its findings of strong black support for black candidates, the District Court found that a substantial majority of white voters would rarely, if ever, vote for a black candidate. In the primary elections, white support for black candidates ranged between 8% and 50%, and in the general elections it ranged between 28% and 49%. See ibid. The court also determined that, on average, 81.7% of white voters did not vote for any black candidate in the primary elections. In the general elections, white voters almost always ranked black candidates either last or next to last in the multicandidate field, except in heavily Democratic areas where white voters consistently ranked black candidates last among the Democrats, if not last or next to last among all candidates. The court further observed that approximately two-thirds of white voters did not vote for black candidates in general elections, even after the candidate had won the Democratic primary and the choice was to vote for a Republican or for no one.[28]

60 While the District Court did not state expressly that the percentage of whites who refused to vote for black candidates in the contested districts would, in the usual course of events, result in the defeat of the minority's candidates, that conclusion is apparent both from the court's factual findings and from the rest of its analysis. First, with the exception of House District 23, see infra, at ——, the trial court's findings clearly show that black voters have enjoyed only minimal and sporadic success in electing representatives of their choice. See Appendix B to opinion, post, p. ——. Second, where black candidates won elections, the court closely examined the circumstances of those elections before concluding that the success of these blacks did not negate other evidence, derived from all of the elections studied in each district, that legally significant racially polarized voting exists in each district. For example, the court took account of the benefits incumbency and running essentially unopposed conferred on some of the successful black candidates,[29] as well as of the 61 very different order of preference blacks and whites assigned black candidates,[30] in *2772 reaching its conclusion that legally significant racial polarization exists in each district.

We conclude that the District Court's approach, which tested data derived from three election years in each district, and which revealed that blacks strongly supported black candidates, while, to the black candidates' usual detriment, whites rarely did, satisfactorily addresses each facet of the proper legal standard.

C

EVIDENCE OF RACIALLY POLARIZED VOTING

1

Appellants' Argument

North Carolina and the United States also contest the evidence upon which the District Court relied in finding that voting patterns in the challenged districts were racially polarized. They argue that the term "racially polarized voting" must, as a matter of law, refer to voting patterns for which the principal cause is race. They contend that the District Court utilized a legally incorrect definition of racially polarized voting by relying on bivariate statistical analyses which merely demonstrated a correlation between the race of the voter and the level of voter support for certain candidates, but which did not prove that race was the primary determinant of voters' choices. According to appellants and the United States, only multiple regression analysis, which can take account of other variables which might also explain voters' choices, such as "party affiliation, age, religion, income [,] incumbency, education, campaign expenditures," Brief for 62 Appellants 42, "media use measured by cost, ... name, identification, or distance that a candidate lived from a particular precinct," Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 30, n. 57, can prove that race was the primary determinant of voter behavior.[31]

Whether appellants and the United States believe that it is the voter's race or the candidate's race that must be the primary determinant of the voter's choice is unclear; indeed, their catalogs of relevant variables suggest both.[32] Age, religion, income, and education seem most relevant to the voter; incumbency, campaign expenditures, name identification, and media use are pertinent to the candidate; and party affiliation could refer both to the voter and the candidate. In either case, we disagree: For purposes of § 2, the legal concept of racially polarized voting incorporates neither causation nor intent. It means simply that the race of voters correlates with the selection of a certain candidate or candidates; that is, it refers to the situation where different races (or minority language groups) vote in blocs for different candidates. Grofman, Migalski, & Noviello 203. As we demonstrate infra, appellants' theory of racially polarized voting would thwart the goals Congress sought to achieve when it amended § 2 and would prevent courts from performing the "functional" analysis of the political process, S.Rep., at 30, n. 119, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208, and the "searching practical evaluation of the 'past 63 and present reality,' " id., at 30, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208 (footnote omitted), mandated by the Senate Report.

2

Causation Irrelevant to Section 2 Inquiry

The first reason we reject appellants' argument that racially polarized voting refers *2773 to voting patterns that are in some way caused by race, rather than to voting patterns that are merely correlated with the race of the voter, is that the reasons black and white voters vote differently have no relevance to the central inquiry of § 2. By contrast, the correlation between race of voter and the selection of certain candidates is crucial to that inquiry.

Both § 2 itself and the Senate Report make clear that the critical question in a § 2 claim is whether the use of a contested electoral practice or structure results in members of a protected group having less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. See, e.g., S.Rep., at 2, 27, 28, 29, n. 118, 36. As we explained, supra, at ——, multimember districts may impair the ability of blacks to elect representatives of their choice where blacks vote sufficiently as a bloc as to be able to elect their preferred candidates in a black majority, single-member district and where a white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc usually to defeat the candidates chosen by blacks. It is the difference between the choices made by blacks and whites—not the reasons for that difference—that results in blacks having less opportunity than whites to elect their preferred representatives. Consequently, we conclude that under the "results test" of § 2, only the correlation between race of voter and selection of certain candidates, not the causes of the correlation, matters.

The irrelevance to a § 2 inquiry of the reasons why black and white voters vote differently supports, by itself, our rejection of appellants' theory of racially polarized voting. However, their theory contains other equally serious flaws 64 that merit further attention. As we demonstrate below, the addition of irrelevant variables distorts the equation and yields results that are indisputably incorrect under § 2 and the Senate Report.

3

Race of Voter as Primary Determinant of Voter Behavior

Appellants and the United States contend that the legal concept of "racially polarized voting" refers not to voting patterns that are merely correlated with the voter's race, but to voting patterns that are determined primarily by the voter's race, rather than by the voter's other socioeconomic characteristics.

The first problem with this argument is that it ignores the fact that members of geographically insular racial and ethnic groups frequently share socioeconomic characteristics, such as income level, employment status, amount of education, housing and other living conditions, religion, language, and so forth. See, e.g., Butler 902 (Minority group "members' shared concerns, including political ones, are ... a function of group status, and as such are largely involuntary.... As a group blacks are concerned, for example, with police brutality, substandard housing, unemployment, etc., because these problems fall disproportionately upon the group"); S. Verba & N. Nie, Participation in America 151–152 (1972) ("Socioeconomic status ... is closely related to race. Blacks in American society are likely to be in lower-status jobs than whites, to have less education, and to have lower incomes"). Where such characteristics are shared, race or ethnic group not only denotes color or place of origin, it also functions as a shorthand notation for common social and economic characteristics. Appellants' definition of racially polarized voting is even more pernicious where shared characteristics are causally related to race or ethnicity. The opportunity to achieve high employment status and income, for example, is often influenced by the presence or absence of racial or ethnic discrimination. A definition of racially polarized voting which 65 holds that black bloc voting does not exist when black voters' choice of certain candidates is most strongly influenced by the fact that the voters have low incomes *2774 and menial jobs—when the reason most of those voters have menial jobs and low incomes is attributable to past or present racial discrimination—runs counter to the Senate Report's instruction to conduct a searching and practical evaluation of past and present reality, S.Rep., at 30, and interferes with the purpose of the Voting Rights Act to eliminate the negative effects of past discrimination on the electoral opportunities of minorities. Id., at 5, 40.

Furthermore, under appellants' theory of racially polarized voting, even uncontrovertible evidence that candidates strongly preferred by black voters are always defeated by a bloc voting white majority would be dismissed for failure to prove racial polarization whenever the black and white populations could be described in terms of other socioeconomic characteristics.

To illustrate, assume a racially mixed, urban multimember district in which blacks and whites possess the same socioeconomic characteristics that the record in this case attributes to blacks and whites in Halifax County, a part of Senate District 2. The annual mean income for blacks in this district is $10,465, and 47.8% of the black community lives in poverty. More than half—51.5%—of black adults over the age of 25 have only an eighth-grade education or less. Just over half of black citizens reside in their own homes; 48.9% live in rental units. And, almost a third of all black households are without a car. In contrast, only 12.6% of the whites in the district live below the poverty line. Whites enjoy a mean income of $19,042. White residents are better educated than blacks—only 25.6% of whites over the age of 25 have only an eighth-grade education or less. Furthermore, only 26.2% of whites live in rental units, and only 10.2% live in households with no vehicle available. 1 App., Ex–44. As is the case in Senate District 2, blacks in this 66 hypothetical urban district have never been able to elect a representative of their choice.

According to appellants' theory of racially polarized voting, proof that black and white voters in this hypothetical district regularly choose different candidates and that the blacks' preferred candidates regularly lose could be rejected as not probative of racial bloc voting. The basis for the rejection would be that blacks chose a certain candidate, not principally because of their race, but principally because this candidate best represented the interests of residents who, because of their low incomes, are particularly interested in government-subsidized health and welfare services; who are generally poorly educated, and thus share an interest in job training programs; who are, to a greater extent than the white community, concerned with rent control issues; and who favor major public transportation expenditures. Similarly, whites would be found to have voted for a different candidate, not principally because of their race, but primarily because that candidate best represented the interests of residents who, due to their education and income levels, and to their property and vehicle ownership, favor gentrification, low residential property taxes, and extensive expenditures for street and highway improvements.

Congress could not have intended that courts employ this definition of racial bloc voting. First, this definition leads to results that are inconsistent with the effects test adopted by Congress when it amended § 2 and with the Senate Report's admonition that courts take a "functional" view of the political process, S.Rep. 30, n. 119, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208, and conduct a searching and practical evaluation of reality. Id., at 30. A test for racially polarized voting that denies the fact that race and socioeconomic characteristics are often closely correlated permits neither a practical evaluation of reality nor a functional analysis of vote dilution. And, contrary to Congress' intent in adopting the "results test," appellants' proposed definition could result in the inability of minority voters to establish a critical 67 element of a vote dilution claim, even though both races engage in "monolithic" bloc voting, id., at 33, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News *2775 1982, p. 211, and generations of black voters have been unable to elect a representative of their choice.

Second, appellants' interpretation of "racially polarized voting" creates an irreconcilable tension between their proposed treatment of socioeconomic characteristics in the bloc voting context and the Senate Report's statement that "the extent to which members of the minority group ... bear the effects of discrimination in such areas as education, employment and health" may be relevant to a § 2 claim. Id., at 29, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 206. We can find no support in either logic or the legislative history for the anomalous conclusion to which appellants' position leads—that Congress intended, on the one hand, that proof that a minority group is predominately poor, uneducated, and unhealthy should be considered a factor tending to prove a § 2 violation; but that Congress intended, on the other hand, that proof that the same socioeconomic characteristics greatly influence black voters' choice of candidates should destroy these voters' ability to establish one of the most important elements of a vote dilution claim.

4

Race of Candidate as Primary Determinant of Voter Behavior

North Carolina's and the United States' suggestion that racially polarized voting means that voters select or reject candidates principally on the basis of the candidate's race is also misplaced.

First, both the language of § 2 and a functional understanding of the phenomenon of vote dilution mandate the conclusion that the race of the candidate per se is irrelevant to racial bloc voting analysis. Section 2(b) states that a violation is established if it can be shown that members of a protected minority group "have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to ... elect representatives of their choice." 68 Emphasis added.) Because both minority and majority voters often select members of their own race as their preferred representatives, it will frequently be the case that a black candidate is the choice of blacks, while a white candidate is the choice of whites. Cf. Letter to the Editor from Chandler Davidson, 17 New Perspectives 38 (Fall 1985). Indeed, the facts of this case illustrate that tendency—blacks preferred black candidates, whites preferred white candidates. Thus, as a matter of convenience, we and the District Court may refer to the preferred representative of black voters as the "black candidate" and to the preferred representative of white voters as the "white candidate." Nonetheless, the fact that race of voter and race of candidate is often correlated is not directly pertinent to a § 2 inquiry. Under § 2, it is the status of the candidate as the chosen representative of a particular racial group, not the race of the candidate, that is important.

An understanding of how vote dilution through submergence in a white majority works leads to the same conclusion. The essence of a submergence claim is that minority group members prefer certain candidates whom they could elect were it not for the interaction of the challenged electoral law or structure with a white majority that votes as a significant bloc for different candidates. Thus, as we explained in Part III, supra, the existence of racial bloc voting is relevant to a vote dilution claim in two ways. Bloc voting by blacks tends to prove that the black community is politically cohesive, that is, it shows that blacks prefer certain candidates whom they could elect in a single-member, black majority district. Bloc voting by a white majority tends to prove that blacks will generally be unable to elect representatives of their choice. Clearly, only the race of the voter, not the race of the candidate, is relevant to vote dilution analysis. See, e.g., Blacksher & Menefee 59–60; Grofman, Should Representatives be Typical?, in Representation and Redistricting Issues 98; Note, Geometry and Geography 207.

69 2776 Second, appellants' suggestion that racially polarized voting refers to voting patterns where whites vote for white candidates because they prefer members of their own race or are hostile to blacks, as opposed to voting patterns where whites vote for white candidates because the white candidates spent more on their campaigns, utilized more media coverage, and thus enjoyed greater name recognition than the black candidates, fails for another, independent reason. This argument, like the argument that the race of the voter must be the primary determinant of the voter's ballot, is inconsistent with the purposes of § 2 and would render meaningless the Senate Report factor that addresses the impact of low socioeconomic status on a minority group's level of political participation.

Congress intended that the Voting Rights Act eradicate inequalities in political opportunities that exist due to the vestigial effects of past purposeful discrimination. S.Rep., at 5, 40; H.R.Rep. No. 97–227, p. 31 (1981). Both this Court and other federal courts have recognized that political participation by minorities tends to be depressed where minority group members suffer effects of prior discrimination such as inferior education, poor employment opportunities, and low incomes. See, e.g., White v. Regester, 412 U.S., at 768–769, 93 S.Ct., at 2340–2341; Kirksey v. Board of Supervisors of Hinds County, Miss., 554 F.2d 139, 145–146 (CA5) (en banc), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 968, 98 S.Ct. 512, 54 L.Ed.2d 454 (1977). See also S. Verba & N. Nie, Participation in America 152 (1972). The Senate Report acknowledges this tendency and instructs that "the extent to which members of the minority group ... bear the effects of discrimination in such areas as education, employment and health, which hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process," S.Rep., at 29, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 206 (footnote omitted), is a factor which may be probative of unequal opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives. Courts and commentators have recognized further that candidates generally must spend more money in order to win 70 election in a multimember district than in a single-member district. See, e.g., Graves v. Barnes, 343 F.Supp. 704, 720–721 (WD Tex.1972), aff'd in part and rev'd in part sub nom. White v. Regester, supra. Berry & Dye 88; Davidson & Fraga, Nonpartisan Slating Groups in an At-Large Setting, in Minority Vote Dilution 122–123; Derfner 554, n. 126; Jewell 131; Karnig, Black Representation on City Councils, 12 Urb.Aff.Q. 223, 230 (1976). If, because of inferior education and poor employment opportunities, blacks earn less than whites, they will not be able to provide the candidates of their choice with the same level of financial support that whites can provide theirs. Thus, electoral losses by candidates preferred by the black community may well be attributable in part to the fact that their white opponents outspent them. But, the fact is that, in this instance, the economic effects of prior discrimination have combined with the multimember electoral structure to afford blacks less opportunity than whites to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. It would be both anomalous and inconsistent with congressional intent to hold that, on the one hand, the effects of past discrimination which hinder blacks' ability to participate in the political process tend to prove a § 2 violation, while holding on the other hand that, where these same effects of past discrimination deter whites from voting for blacks, blacks cannot make out a crucial element of a vote dilution claim. Accord, Escambia County, 748 F.2d, at 1043 (" '[T]he failure of the blacks to solicit white votes may be caused by the effects of past discrimination' ") (quoting United States v. Dallas County Comm'n, 739 F.2d 1529, 1536 (CA11 1984)); United States v. Marengo County Comm'n, 731 F.2d, at 1567.

5

Racial Animosity as Primary Determinant of Voter Behavior

Finally, we reject the suggestion that racially polarized voting refers only to *2777 white bloc voting which is caused by 71 white voters' racial hostility toward black candidates.[33] To accept this theory would frustrate the goals Congress sought to achieve by repudiating the intent test of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980), and would prevent minority voters who have clearly been denied an opportunity to elect representatives of their choice from establishing a critical element of a vote dilution claim.

In amending § 2, Congress rejected the requirement announced by this Court in Bolden, supra, that § 2 plaintiffs must prove the discriminatory intent of state or local governments in adopting or maintaining the challenged electoral mechanism.[34] Appellants' suggestion that the discriminatory intent of individual white voters must be proved in order to make out a § 2 claim must fail for the very reasons Congress rejected the intent test with respect to governmental bodies. See Engstrom, The Reincarnation of the Intent Standard: Federal Judges and At-Large Election Cases, 28 How. L.J. 495 (1985).

The Senate Report states that one reason the Senate Committee abandoned the intent test was that "the Committee ... heard persuasive testimony that the intent test is unnecessarily divisive because it involves charges of racism on the part of individual officials or entire communities." S.Rep., at 36, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 214. The Committee found the testimony of Dr. Arthur S. 72 Flemming, Chairman of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, particularly persuasive. He testified:

> " '[Under an intent test] [l]itigators representing excluded minorities will have to explore the motivations of individual council members, mayors, and other citizens. The question would be whether their decisions were motivated by invidious racial considerations. Such inquiries can only be divisive, threatening to destroy any existing racial progress in a community. It is the intent test, not the results test, that would make it necessary to brand individuals as racist in order to obtain judicial relief.' " Ibid. (footnote omitted).

The grave threat to racial progress and harmony which Congress perceived from requiring proof that racism caused the adoption or maintenance of a challenged electoral mechanism is present to a much greater degree in the proposed requirement that plaintiffs demonstrate that racial animosity determined white voting patterns. Under the old intent test, plaintiffs might succeed by proving only that a limited number of elected officials were racist; under the new intent test plaintiffs would be required to prove that most of the white community is racist in order to obtain judicial relief. It is difficult to imagine a more racially divisive requirement.

A second reason Congress rejected the old intent test was that in most cases it placed an "inordinately difficult burden" on § 2 plaintiffs. Ibid. The new intent test would be equally, if not more, burdensome. In order to prove that a specific factor—racial hostility—determined white voters' ballots, it would be necessary to demonstrate that other potentially relevant *2778 causal factors, such as socioeconomic characteristics and candidate expenditures, do not correlate better than racial animosity with white voting behavior. As one commentator has explained:

> 73 "Many of the[se] independent variables ... would be all but impossible for a social scientist to operationalize as interval-level independent variables for use in a multiple regression equation, whether on a step-wise basis or not. To conduct such an extensive statistical analysis as this implies, moreover, can become prohibitively expensive.
>
> "Compared to this sort of effort, proving discriminatory intent in the adoption of an at-large election system is both simple and inexpensive." McCrary, Discriminatory Intent: The Continuing Relevance of "Purpose" Evidence in Vote-Dilution Lawsuits, 28 How. L.J. 463, 492 (1985) (footnote omitted).

The final and most dispositive reason the Senate Report repudiated the old intent test was that it "asks the wrong question." S.Rep., at 36, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 214. Amended § 2 asks instead "whether minorities have equal access to the process of electing their representatives." Ibid.

Focusing on the discriminatory intent of the voters, rather than the behavior of the voters, also asks the wrong question. All that matters under § 2 and under a functional theory of vote dilution is voter behavior, not its explanations. Moreover, as we have explained in detail, supra, requiring proof that racial considerations actually caused voter behavior will result—contrary to congressional intent—in situations where a black minority that functionally has been totally excluded from the political process will be unable to establish a § 2 violation. The Senate Report's remark concerning the old intent test thus is pertinent to the new test: The requirement that a "court ... make a separate ... finding of intent, after accepting the proof of the factors involved in the White [v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314] analysis ... [would] seriously clou[d] the prospects of eradicating the remaining instances of racial discrimination in American elections." Id., at 37, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 215. We therefore decline to adopt such a requirement.

74 6

Summary

In sum, we would hold that the legal concept of racially polarized voting, as it relates to claims of vote dilution, refers only to the existence of a correlation between the race of voters and the selection of certain candidates. Plaintiffs need not prove causation or intent in order to prove a prima facie case of racial bloc voting and defendants may not rebut that case with evidence of causation or intent.

IV

THE LEGAL SIGNIFICANCE OF SOME BLACK CANDIDATES' SUCCESS

A

North Carolina and the United States maintain that the District Court failed to accord the proper weight to the success of some black candidates in the challenged districts. Black residents of these districts, they point out, achieved improved representation in the 1982 General Assembly election.[35] They also note that blacks in House District 23 have enjoyed proportional representation consistently since 1973 and that blacks in the other districts have occasionally enjoyed nearly *2779 proportional representation.[36] This electoral 75 success demonstrates conclusively, appellants and the United States argue, that blacks in those districts do not have "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b). Essentially, appellants and the United States contend that if a racial minority gains proportional or nearly proportional representation in a single election, that fact alone precludes, as a matter of law, finding a § 2 violation.

Section 2(b) provides that "[t]he extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office ... is one circumstance which may be considered." 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b). The Senate Committee Report also identifies the extent to which minority candidates have succeeded as a pertinent factor. S.Rep., at 29. However, the Senate Report expressly states that "the election of a few minority candidates does not 'necessarily foreclose the possibility of dilution of the black vote,' " noting that if it did, "the possibility exists that the majority citizens might evade [§ 2] by manipulating the election of a 'safe' minority candidate." Id., at 29, n. 115, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 207, quoting Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297, 1307 (CA5 1973) (en banc), aff'd sub nom. East Carroll Parish School Board v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636, 96 S.Ct.

1083, 47 L.Ed.2d 296 (1976) (per curiam). The Senate Committee decided, instead, to " 'require an independent consideration of the record.' " S.Rep., at 29, n. 115, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 207. The Senate Report also emphasizes that the question whether "the political processes are 'equally open' depends upon a searching practical evaluation of the 'past and present reality.' " Id., at 30, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208 (footnote omitted). Thus, the language of § 2 and its legislative history plainly demonstrate that proof that some minority candidates have been elected does not foreclose a § 2 claim.

Moreover, in conducting its "independent consideration of the record" and its "searching practical evaluation of the 'past 76 and present reality,' " the District Court could appropriately take account of the circumstances surrounding recent black electoral success in deciding its significance to appellees' claim. In particular, as the Senate Report makes clear, id., at 29, n. 115, the court could properly notice the fact that black electoral success increased markedly in the 1982 election—an election that occurred after the instant lawsuit had been filed—and could properly consider to what extent "the pendency of this very litigation [might have] worked a one-time advantage for black candidates in the form of unusual organized political support by white leaders concerned to forestall single-member districting."[37] 590 F.Supp., at 367, n. 27.

Nothing in the statute or its legislative history prohibited the court from viewing with some caution black candidates' success in the 1982 election, and from deciding on the basis of all the relevant circumstances to accord greater weight to blacks' relative lack of success over the course of several recent elections. Consequently, we hold that the District Court did not err, as *2780 a matter of law, in refusing to treat the fact that some black candidates have succeeded as dispositive of appellees' § 2 claim. Where multimember districting generally works to dilute the minority vote, it cannot be defended on the ground that it sporadically and serendipitously benefits minority voters.

77 B

The District Court did err, however, in ignoring the significance of the sustained success black voters have experienced in House District 23. In that district, the last six elections have resulted in proportional representation for black residents. This persistent proportional representation is inconsistent with appellees' allegation that the ability of black voters in District 23 to elect representatives of their choice is not equal to that enjoyed by the white majority.

In some situations, it may be possible for § 2 plaintiffs to demonstrate that such sustained success does not accurately reflect the minority group's ability to elect its preferred representatives,[38] but appellees have not done so here. Appellees presented evidence relating to black electoral success in the last three elections; they failed utterly, though, to offer any explanation for the success of black candidates in the previous three elections. Consequently, we believe that the District Court erred, as a matter of law, in ignoring the sustained success black voters have enjoyed in House District 23, and would reverse with respect to that District.

V

ULTIMATE DETERMINATION OF VOTE DILUTION

Finally, appellants and the United States dispute the District Court's ultimate conclusion that the multimember districting scheme at issue in this case deprived black voters of an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice.

A

As an initial matter, both North Carolina and the United States contend that the District Court's ultimate conclusion that the challenged multimember districts operate to dilute 78 black citizens' votes is a mixed question of law and fact subject to de novo review on appeal. In support of their proposed standard of review, they rely primarily on Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 104 S.Ct. 1949, 80 L.Ed.2d 502 (1984), a case in which we reconfirmed that, as a matter of constitutional law, there must be independent appellate review of evidence of "actual malice" in defamation cases. Appellants and the United States argue that because a finding of vote dilution under amended § 2 requires the application of a rule of law to a particular set of facts it constitutes a legal, rather than factual, determination. Reply Brief for Appellants 7; Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 18–19. Neither appellants nor the United States cite our several precedents in which we have treated the ultimate finding of vote dilution as a question of fact subject to the clearly-erroneous standard of Rule 52(a). See, e.g., Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S., at 622–627, 102 S.Ct., at 3278–3281; City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 183, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 1564, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980); White v. Regester, 412 U.S., at 765–770, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–2341. Cf. Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 1511, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985).

In Regester, supra, we noted that the District Court had based its conclusion that minority voters in two multimember districts in Texas had less opportunity to participate in the political process than majority voters on the totality of the circumstances and stated that > *2781 "we are not inclined to overturn these findings, representing as they do a blend of history and an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact of the ... multimember district in the light of past and present reality, political and otherwise." Id., 412 U.S., at 769–770, 93 S.Ct., at 2341.

Quoting this passage from Regester with approval, we expressly held in Rogers v. Lodge, supra, that the question whether an at-large election system was maintained for discriminatory purposes and subsidiary issues, which include whether that system had the effect of diluting the minority vote, were questions of fact, reviewable under Rule 52(a)'s 79 clearly-erroneous standard. 458 U.S., at 622–623, 102 S.Ct., at 3278–3279. Similarly, in City of Rome v. United States, we declared that the question whether certain electoral structures had a "discriminatory effect," in the sense of diluting the minority vote, was a question of fact subject to clearly-erroneous review. 446 U.S., at 183, 100 S.Ct., at 1565.

We reaffirm our view that the clearly-erroneous test of Rule 52(a) is the appropriate standard for appellate review of a finding of vote dilution. As both amended § 2 and its legislative history make clear, in evaluating a statutory claim of vote dilution through districting, the trial court is to consider the "totality of the circumstances" and to determine, based "upon a searching practical evaluation of the 'past and present reality,' " S.Rep., at 30, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208 (footnote omitted), whether the political process is equally open to minority voters. " 'This determination is peculiarly dependent upon the facts of each case,' " Rogers, supra, 458 U.S., at 621, 102 S.Ct., at 3277, quoting Nevett v. Sides, 571 F.2d 209, 224 (CA5 1978), and requires "an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact" of the contested electoral mechanisms. 458 U.S., at 622, 102 S.Ct., at 3278. The fact that amended § 2 and its legislative history provide legal standards which a court must apply to the facts in order to determine whether § 2 has been violated does not alter the standard of review. As we explained in Bose, Rule 52(a) "does not inhibit an appellate court's power to correct errors of law, including those that may infect a so-called mixed finding of law and fact, or a finding of fact that is predicated on a misunderstanding of the governing rule of law." 466 U.S., at 501, 104 S.Ct., at 1960, citing Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 287, 102 S.Ct. 1781, 1789, 72 L.Ed.2d 66 (1982); Inwood Laboratories, Inc. v. Ives Laboratories, Inc., 456 U.S. 844, 855, n. 15, 102 S.Ct. 2182, 2189, n. 15, 72 L.Ed.2d 606 (1982). Thus, the application of the clearly-erroneous standard to ultimate findings of vote dilution preserves the benefit of the trial court's particular familiarity with the indigenous political reality without endangering the rule of law.

80 B

The District Court in this case carefully considered the totality of the circumstances and found that in each district racially polarized voting; the legacy of official discrimination in voting matters, education, housing, employment, and health services; and the persistence of campaign appeals to racial prejudice acted in concert with the multimember districting scheme to impair the ability of geographically insular and politically cohesive groups of black voters to participate equally in the political process and to elect candidates of their choice. It found that the success a few black candidates have enjoyed in these districts is too recent, too limited, and, with regard to the 1982 elections, perhaps too aberrational, to disprove its conclusion.

Excepting House District 23, with respect to which the District Court committed legal error, see supra, at ——, we affirm the District Court's judgment. We cannot say that the District Court, composed of local judges who are well acquainted with the political realities of the State, clearly erred in concluding that use of a multimember electoral structure has caused black voters in the districts other than House District 23 *2782 to have less opportunity than white voters to elect representatives of their choice.

The judgment of the District Court is

Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

APPENDIX A TO OPINION OF BRENNAN, J.

Percentages of Votes Cast by Black and White Voters for Black Candidates in the Five Contested Districts

Senate District 22

	Primary		General
	White	Black	White	Black
1978 (Alexander)	47	87	41	94
1980 (Alexander)	23	78	n/a	n/a
1982 (Polk)	32	83	33	94

House District 21

	Primary		General

	White	Black	White	Black
1978 (Blue)	21	76	n/a	n/a
1980 (Blue)	31	81	44	90
1982 (Blue)	39	82	45	91

House District 23

	Primary		General
	White	Black	White	Black
1978 Senate
Barns (Repub.)	n/a	n/a	17	5
1978 House
Clement	10	89	n/a	n/a
Spaulding	16	92	37	89

	Primary		General
	White	Black	White	Black
1980 House
Spaulding	n/a	n/a	49	90
1982 House

Clement	26	32	n/a	n/a
Spaulding	37	90	43	89

House District 36

	Primary		General
	White	Black	White	Black
1980 (Maxwell)	22	71	28	92
1982 (Berry)	50	79	42	92
1982 (Richardson)	39	71	29	88

House District 39

	Primary		General
	White	Black	White	Black
1978 House
Kennedy, H.	28	76	32	93
Norman	8	29	n/a	n/a

Ross	17	53	n/a	n/a
Sumter (Repub.)	n/a	n/a	33	25
1980 House
Kennedy, A.	40	86	32	96
Norman	18	36	n/a	n/a
1980 Senate
Small	12	61	n/a	n/a
1982 House
Hauser	25	80	42	87
Kennedy, A.	36	87	46	94

590 F. Supp., at 369-371.

APPENDIX B TO OPINION OF BRENNAN, J.

Black Candidates Elected From 7 Originally Contested Districts

District	Prior to
(No. Seats)	1972	1972	1974	1976	1978	1980	1982
House 8 (4)	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
House 21 (6)	0	0	0	0	0	1	1
House 23 (3)	0	1	1	1	1	1	1
House 36 (8)	0	0	0	0	0	0	1
House 39 (5)	0	0	1	1	0	0	2

Senate 2 (2)	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Senate 22 (4)	0	0	1	1	1	0	0

See Brief for Appellees, table printed between pages 8 and 9; App. 93-94.

82 2783 Justice WHITE, concurring.

I join Parts I, II, III–A, III–B, IV–A, and V of the Court's opinion and agree with Justice BRENNAN's opinion as to Part IV–B. I disagree with Part III–C of Justice BRENNAN's opinion.

83 Justice BRENNAN states in Part III–C that the crucial factor in identifying polarized voting is the race of the voter and that the race of the candidate is irrelevant. Under this test, there is polarized voting if the majority of white voters vote for different candidates than the majority of the blacks, regardless of the race of the candidates. I do not agree. Suppose an eight-member multimember district that is 60% white and 40% black, the blacks being geographically located so that two safe black single-member districts could be drawn. Suppose further that there are six white and two black Democrats running against six white and two black Republicans. Under Justice BRENNAN's test, there would be polarized voting and a likely § 2 violation if all the Republicans, including the two blacks, are elected, and 80% of the blacks in the predominantly black areas vote Democratic. I take it that there would also be a violation in a single-member district that is 60% black, but enough of the blacks vote with the whites to elect a black candidate who is not the choice of the majority of black voters. This is interest-group politics rather than a rule hedging against racial discrimination. I doubt that this is what Congress had in mind in amending § 2 as it did, and it seems quite at odds with the discussion in Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 149–160, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 1872–1878, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971). Furthermore, on the facts of this case, there is no need to draw the voter/candidate distinction. The District Court did not and reached the correct result except, in my view, with respect to District 23.

Justice O'CONNOR, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice POWELL, and Justice REHNQUIST join, concurring in the judgment.

In this case, we are called upon to construe § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended June 29, 1982. Amended § 2 is intended to codify the "results" test employed in Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971), and White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), and to reject the "intent" test propounded in the plurality opinion in 84 Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980). S.Rep. No. 97–417, pp. 27–28 (1982) (hereinafter S.Rep.). Whereas Bolden required members of a racial minority who *2784 alleged impairment of their voting strength to prove that the challenged electoral system was created or maintained with a discriminatory purpose and led to discriminatory results, under the results test, "plaintiffs may choose to establish discriminatory results without proving any kind of discriminatory purpose." S.Rep., at 28, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 206. At the same time, however, § 2 unequivocally disclaims the creation of a right to proportional representation. This disclaimer was essential to the compromise that resulted in passage of the amendment. See id., at 193–194 (additional views of Sen. Dole).

In construing this compromise legislation, we must make every effort to be faithful to the balance Congress struck. This is not an easy task. We know that Congress intended to allow vote dilution claims to be brought under § 2, but we also know that Congress did not intend to create a right to proportional representation for minority voters. There is an inherent tension between what Congress wished to do and what it wished to avoid, because any theory of vote dilution must necessarily rely to some extent on a measure of minority voting strength that makes some reference to the proportion between the minority group and the electorate at large. In addition, several important aspects of the "results" test had received little attention in this Court's cases or in the decisions of the Courts of Appeals employing that test on which Congress also relied. See id., at 32. Specifically, the legal meaning to be given to the concepts of "racial bloc voting" and "minority voting strength" had been left largely unaddressed by the courts when § 2 was amended.

The Court attempts to resolve all these difficulties today. First, the Court supplies definitions of racial bloc voting and minority voting strength that will apparently be applicable in all cases and that will dictate the structure of vote dilution litigation. Second, the Court adopts a test, based on the 85 level of minority electoral success, for determining when an electoral scheme has sufficiently diminished minority voting strength to constitute vote dilution. Third, although the Court does not acknowledge it expressly, the combination of the Court's definition of minority voting strength and its test for vote dilution results in the creation of a right to a form of proportional representation in favor of all geographically and politically cohesive minority groups that are large enough to constitute majorities if concentrated within one or more single-member districts. In so doing, the Court has disregarded the balance struck by Congress in amending § 2 and has failed to apply the results test as described by this Court in Whitcomb and White.

I

In order to explain my disagreement with the Court's interpretation of § 2, it is useful to illustrate the impact that alternative districting plans or types of districts typically have on the likelihood that a minority group will be able to elect candidates it prefers, and then to set out the critical elements of a vote dilution claim as they emerge in the Court's opinion.

Consider a town of 1,000 voters that is governed by a council of four representatives, in which 30% of the voters are black, and in which the black voters are concentrated in one section of the city and tend to vote as a bloc. It would be possible to draw four single-member districts, in one of which blacks would constitute an overwhelming majority. The black voters in this district would be assured of electing a representative of their choice, while any remaining black voters in the other districts would be submerged in large white majorities. This option would give the minority group roughly proportional representation.

Alternatively, it would usually be possible to draw four single-member districts in two of which black voters constituted much narrower majorities of about 60%. The black 86 voters in these districts would often be able to elect the representative of their choice in each of these two districts, *2785 but if even 20% of the black voters supported the candidate favored by the white minority in those districts the candidates preferred by the majority of black voters might lose. This option would, depending on the circumstances of a particular election, sometimes give the minority group more than proportional representation, but would increase the risk that the group would not achieve even roughly proportional representation.

It would also usually be possible to draw four single-member districts in each of which black voters constituted a minority. In the extreme case, black voters would constitute 30% of the voters in each district. Unless approximately 30% of the white voters in this extreme case backed the minority candidate, black voters in such a district would be unable to elect the candidate of their choice in an election between only two candidates even if they unanimously supported him. This option would make it difficult for black voters to elect candidates of their choice even with significant white support, and all but impossible without such support.

Finally, it would be possible to elect all four representatives in a single at-large election in which each voter could vote for four candidates. Under this scheme, white voters could elect all the representatives even if black voters turned out in large numbers and voted for one and only one candidate. To illustrate, if only four white candidates ran, and each received approximately equal support from white voters, each would receive about 700 votes, whereas black voters could cast no more than 300 votes for any one candidate. If, on the other hand, eight white candidates ran, and white votes were distributed less evenly, so that the five least favored white candidates received fewer than 300 votes while three others received 400 or more, it would be feasible for blacks to elect one representative with 300 votes even without substantial white support. If even 25% of the white voters 87 backed a particular minority candidate, and black voters voted only for that candidate, the candidate would receive a total of 475 votes, which would ensure victory unless white voters also concentrated their votes on four of the eight remaining candidates, so that each received the support of almost 70% of white voters. As these variations show, the at-large or multimember district has an inherent tendency to submerge the votes of the minority. The minority group's prospects for electoral success under such a district heavily depend on a variety of factors such as voter turnout, how many candidates run, how evenly white support is spread, how much white support is given to a candidate or candidates preferred by the minority group, and the extent to which minority voters engage in "bullet voting" (which occurs when voters refrain from casting all their votes to avoid the risk that by voting for their lower ranked choices they may give those candidates enough votes to defeat their higher ranked choices, see ante, at 2760, n. 5).

There is no difference in principle between the varying effects of the alternatives outlined above and the varying effects of alternative single-district plans and multimember districts. The type of districting selected and the way in which district lines are drawn can have a powerful effect on the likelihood that members of a geographically and politically cohesive minority group will be able to elect candidates of their choice.

Although § 2 does not speak in terms of "vote dilution," I agree with the Court that proof of vote dilution can establish a violation of § 2 as amended. The phrase "vote dilution," in the legal sense, simply refers to the impermissible discriminatory effect that a multimember or other districting plan has when it operates "to cancel out or minimize the voting strength of racial groups." White, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339. See also Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 439, 85 S.Ct. 498, 501, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965). This definition, however, conceals some very formidable difficulties. Is the "voting strength" of a racial group to be assessed solely 88 with reference to its *2786 prospects for electoral success, or should courts look at other avenues of political influence open to the racial group? Insofar as minority voting strength is assessed with reference to electoral success, how should undiluted minority voting strength be measured? How much of an impairment of minority voting strength is necessary to prove a violation of § 2? What constitutes racial bloc voting and how is it proved? What weight is to be given to evidence of actual electoral success by minority candidates in the face of evidence of racial bloc voting?

The Court resolves the first question summarily: minority voting strength is to be assessed solely in terms of the minority group's ability to elect candidates it prefers. Ante, at ——— – ———. Under this approach, the essence of a vote dilution claim is that the State has created single-member or multimember districts that unacceptably impair the minority group's ability to elect the candidates its members prefer.

In order to evaluate a claim that a particular multimember district or single-member district has diluted the minority group's voting strength to a degree that violates § 2, however, it is also necessary to construct a measure of "undiluted" minority voting strength. "[T]he phrase [vote dilution] itself suggests a norm with respect to which the fact of dilution may be ascertained." Mississippi Republican Executive Committee v. Brooks, 469 U.S. 1002, 1012, 105 S.Ct. 416, 422, 83 L.Ed.2d 343 (1984) (REHNQUIST, J., dissenting from summary affirmance). Put simply, in order to decide whether an electoral system has made it harder for minority voters to elect the candidates they prefer, a court must have an idea in mind of how hard it "should" be for minority voters to elect their preferred candidates under an acceptable system.

Several possible measures of "undiluted" minority voting strength suggest themselves. First, a court could simply use proportionality as its guide: if the minority group constituted 30% of the voters in a given area, the court would regard the minority group as having the potential to elect 30% 89 of the representatives in that area. Second, a court could posit some alternative districting plan as a "normal" or "fair" electoral scheme and attempt to calculate how many candidates preferred by the minority group would probably be elected under that scheme. There are, as we have seen, a variety of ways in which even single-member districts could be drawn, and each will present the minority group with its own array of electoral risks and benefits; the court might, therefore, consider a range of acceptable plans in attempting to estimate "undiluted" minority voting strength by this method. Third, the court could attempt to arrive at a plan that would maximize feasible minority electoral success, and use this degree of predicted success as its measure of "undiluted" minority voting strength. If a court were to employ this third alternative, it would often face hard choices about what would truly "maximize" minority electoral success. An example is the scenario described above, in which a minority group could be concentrated in one completely safe district or divided among two districts in each of which its members would constitute a somewhat precarious majority.

The Court today has adopted a variant of the third approach, to wit, undiluted minority voting strength means the maximum feasible minority voting strength. In explaining the elements of a vote dilution claim, the Court first states that "the minority group must be able to demonstrate that it is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district." Ante, at 2766. If not, apparently the minority group has no cognizable claim that its ability to elect the representatives of its choice has been impaired.[1] Second, "the minority group must *2787 be able 90 to show that it is politically cohesive," that is, that a significant proportion of the minority group supports the same candidates. Ante, at ——. Third, the Court requires the minority group to "demonstrate that the white majority votes sufficiently as a bloc to enable it—in the absence of special circumstances ...—usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate." Ibid. If these three requirements are met, "the minority group demonstrates that submergence in a white multimember district impedes its ability to elect its chosen representatives." Ibid. That is to say, the minority group has proved vote dilution in violation of § 2.

The Court's definition of the elements of a vote dilution claim is simple and invariable: a court should calculate minority voting strength by assuming that the minority group is concentrated in a single-member district in which it constitutes a voting majority. Where the minority group is not large enough, geographically concentrated enough, or politically cohesive enough for this to be possible, the minority group's claim fails. Where the minority group meets these requirements, the representatives that it could elect in the hypothetical district or districts in which it constitutes a 91 majority will serve as the measure of its undiluted voting strength. Whatever plan the State actually adopts must be assessed in terms of the effect it has on this undiluted voting strength. If this is indeed the single, universal standard for evaluating undiluted minority voting strength for vote dilution purposes, the standard is applicable whether what is challenged is a multimember district or a particular single-member districting scheme.

The Court's statement of the elements of a vote dilution claim also supplies an answer to another question posed above: how much of an impairment of undiluted minority voting strength is necessary to prove vote dilution. The Court requires the minority group that satisfies the threshold requirements of size and cohesiveness to prove that it will usually be unable to elect as many representatives of its choice under the challenged districting scheme as its undiluted voting strength would permit. This requirement, then, constitutes the true test of vote dilution. Again, no reason appears why this test would not be applicable to a vote dilution claim challenging single-member as well as multimember districts.

This measure of vote dilution, taken in conjunction with the Court's standard for measuring undiluted minority voting strength, creates what amounts to a right to usual, roughly proportional representation on the part of sizable, compact, cohesive minority groups. If, under a particular multimember or single-member district plan, qualified minority groups usually cannot elect the representatives they would be likely to elect under the most favorable single-member districting plan, then § 2 is violated. Unless minority success under the challenged electoral system regularly approximates this rough version of proportional representation, that system dilutes minority voting strength and violates § 2.

*2788 To appreciate the implications of this approach, it is useful to return to the illustration of a town with four council representatives given above. Under the Court's approach, if the 92 black voters who constitute 30% of the town's voting population do not usually succeed in electing one representative of their choice, then regardless of whether the town employs at-large elections or is divided into four single-member districts, its electoral system violates § 2. Moreover, if the town had a black voting population of 40%, on the Court's reasoning the black minority, so long as it was geographically and politically cohesive, would be entitled usually to elect two of the four representatives, since it would normally be possible to create two districts in which black voters constituted safe majorities of approximately 80%.

To be sure, the Court also requires that plaintiffs prove that racial bloc voting by the white majority interacts with the challenged districting plan so as usually to defeat the minority's preferred candidate. In fact, however, this requirement adds little that is not already contained in the Court's requirements that the minority group be politically cohesive and that its preferred candidates usually lose. As the Court acknowledges, under its approach, "in general, a white bloc vote that normally will defeat the combined strength of minority support plus white 'crossover' votes rises to the level of legally significant white bloc voting." Ante, at 2770. But this is to define legally significant bloc voting by the racial majority in terms of the extent of the racial minority's electoral success. If the minority can prove that it could constitute a majority in a single-member district, that it supported certain candidates, and that those candidates have not usually been elected, then a finding that there is "legally significant white bloc voting" will necessarily follow. Otherwise, by definition, those candidates would usually have won rather than lost.

As shaped by the Court today, then, the basic contours of a vote dilution claim require no reference to most of the "Zimmer factors" that were developed by the Fifth Circuit to implement White 's results test and which were highlighted in the Senate Report. S.Rep., at 28–29; see 93 Zimmer v. Mc Keithen, 485 F.2d 1297 (CA5 1973) (en banc), aff'd sub nom. East Carroll Parish School Board v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636, 96 S.Ct. 1083, 47 L.Ed.2d 296 (1976) (per curiam). If a minority group is politically and geographically cohesive and large enough to constitute a voting majority in one or more single-member districts, then unless white voters usually support the minority's preferred candidates in sufficient numbers to enable the minority group to elect as many of those candidates as it could elect in such hypothetical districts, it will routinely follow that a vote dilution claim can be made out, and the multimember district will be invalidated. There is simply no need for plaintiffs to establish "the history of voting-related discrimination in the State or political subdivision," ante, at ——, or "the extent to which the State or political subdivision has used voting practices or procedures that tend to enhance the opportunity for discrimination against the minority group," ante, at —— or "the exclusion of members of the minority group from candidate slating processes," ante, at —— or "the extent to which minority group members bear the effects of past discrimination in areas such as education, employment, and health," ibid., or "the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns," ibid., or that "elected officials are unresponsive to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group." Ibid.. Of course, these other factors may be supportive of such a claim, because they may strengthen a court's confidence that minority voters will be unable to overcome the relative disadvantage at which they are placed by a particular districting plan, or suggest a more general lack of opportunity to participate in the political process. But the fact remains that electoral success has now emerged, under the Court's standard, as the linchpin of vote dilution claims, and *2789 that the elements of a vote dilution claim create an entitlement to roughly proportional representation within the framework of single-member districts.

94 II

In my view, the Court's test for measuring minority voting strength and its test for vote dilution, operating in tandem, come closer to an absolute requirement of proportional representation than Congress intended when it codified the results test in § 2. It is not necessary or appropriate to decide in this case whether § 2 requires a uniform measure of undiluted minority voting strength in every case, nor have appellants challenged the standard employed by the District Court for assessing undiluted minority voting strength.

In this case, the District Court seems to have taken an approach quite similar to the Court's in making its preliminary assessment of undiluted minority voting strength:

> "At the time of the creation of these multi-member districts, there were concentrations of black citizens within the boundaries of each that were sufficient in numbers and contiguity to constitute effective voting majorities in single-member districts lying wholly within the boundaries of the multi-member districts, which single-member districts would satisfy all constitutional requirements of population and geographical configuration." Gingles v. Edmisten, 590 F.Supp. 345, 358–359 (EDNC1984).

The Court goes well beyond simply sustaining the District Court's decision to employ this measure of undiluted minority voting strength as a reasonable one that is consistent with § 2. In my view, we should refrain from deciding in this case whether a court must invariably posit as its measure of "undiluted" minority voting strength single-member districts in which minority group members constitute a majority. There is substantial doubt that Congress intended "undiluted minority voting strength" to mean "maximum feasible minority voting strength." Even if that is the appropriate definition in some circumstances, there is no indication that Congress intended to mandate a single, universally applicable 95 standard for measuring undiluted minority voting strength, regardless of local conditions and regardless of the extent of past discrimination against minority voters in a particular State or political subdivision. Since appellants have not raised the issue, I would assume that what the District Court did here was permissible under § 2, and leave open the broader question whether § 2 requires this approach.

What appellants do contest is the propriety of the District Court's standard for vote dilution. Appellants claim that the District Court held that "[a]lthough blacks had achieved considerable success in winning state legislative seats in the challenged districts, their failure to consistently attain the number of seats that numbers alone would presumptively give them (i.e., in proportion to their presence in the population)," standing alone, constituted a violation of § 2. Brief for Appellants 20 (emphasis in original). This holding, appellants argue, clearly contravenes § 2's proviso that "nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population." 42

U.S.C. § 1973.

I believe appellants' characterization of the District Court's holding is incorrect. In my view, the District Court concluded that there was a severe diminution in the prospects for black electoral success in each of the challenged districts, as compared to single-member districts in which blacks could constitute a majority, and that this severe diminution was in large part attributable to the interaction of the multimember form of the district with persistent racial bloc voting on the part of the white majorities in those districts. See 590 F.Supp., at 372.[2] The District Court attached *2790 great weight 96 to this circumstance as one part of its ultimate finding that "the creation of each of the multi-member districts challenged in this action results in the black registered voters of that district being submerged as a voting minority in the district and thereby having less opportunity than do other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." Id., at 374. But the District Court's extensive opinion clearly relies as well on a variety of the other Zimmer factors, as the Court's thorough summary of the District Court's findings indicates. See ante, at —— – ——.

If the District Court had held that the challenged multi-member districts violated § 2 solely because blacks had not consistently attained seats in proportion to their presence in the population, its holding would clearly have been inconsistent with § 2's disclaimer of a right to proportional representation. Surely Congress did not intend to say, on the one hand, that members of a protected class have no right to proportional representation, and on the other, that any consistent failure to achieve proportional representation, without more, violates § 2. A requirement that minority representation usually be proportional to the minority group's proportion in the population is not quite the same as a right to strict proportional representation, but it comes so close to such a right as to be inconsistent with § 2's disclaimer and with the results test that is codified in § 2. In the words of Senator Dole, the architect of the compromise that resulted in passage of the amendments to § 2:

> "The language of the subsection explicitly rejects, as did White and its progeny, the notion that members of a protected class have a right to be elected in numbers equal to their proportion of the population. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected under the challenged practice or structure is just one factor, among the totality of circumstances to be considered, 97 and is not dispositive." S.Rep., at 194, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 364 (additional views of Sen. Dole).

On the same reasoning, I would reject the Court's test for vote dilution. The Court measures undiluted minority voting strength by reference to the possibility of creating single-member districts in which the minority group would constitute a majority, rather than by looking to raw proportionality alone. The Court's standard for vote dilution, when combined with its test for undiluted minority voting strength, makes actionable every deviation from usual, rough proportionality in representation for any cohesive minority group as to which this degree of proportionality is feasible within the framework of single-member districts. Requiring that every minority group that could possibly constitute a majority in a single-member district be assigned to such a district would approach a requirement of proportional representation as nearly as is possible within the framework of single-member districts. Since the Court's analysis entitles every such minority group usually to elect as many representatives under a multimember district as it could elect under the most favorable single-member district scheme, it follows that the Court is requiring a form of proportional representation. This approach is inconsistent with the results test and with § 2's disclaimer of a right to proportional representation.

In enacting § 2, Congress codified the "results" test this Court had employed, as an interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, in White and Whitcomb. The factors developed by the Fifth Circuit and relied on by the Senate Report simply fill in the contours of the "results" test as described in those decisions, and do not purport *2791 to redefine or alter the ultimate showing of discriminatory effect required by Whitcomb and White. In my view, therefore, it is to Whitcomb and White that we should look in the first instance in determining how great an impairment of minority voting strength is required to establish vote dilution in violation of § 2.

98 The "results" test as reflected in Whitcomb and White requires an inquiry into the extent of the minority group's opportunities to participate in the political processes. See White, 412 U.S., at 766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–40. While electoral success is a central part of the vote dilution inquiry, White held that to prove vote dilution, "it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential," id., at 765–766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–40, and Whitcomb flatly rejected the proposition that "any group with distinctive interests must be represented in legislative halls if it is numerous enough to command at least one seat and represents a majority living in an area sufficiently compact to constitute a single member district." 403 U.S., at 156, 91 S.Ct., at 1875. To the contrary, the results test as described in White requires plaintiffs to establish "that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question—that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice." 412 U.S., at 766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–40. By showing both "a history of disproportionate results" and "strong indicia of lack of political power and the denial of fair representation," the plaintiffs in White met this standard, which, as emphasized just today, requires "a substantially greater showing of adverse effects than a mere lack of proportional representation to support a finding of unconstitutional vote dilution." Davis v. Bandemer, 478 U.S. 109, 169–170, 106 S.Ct. 2797, ——, ——, 92 L.Ed.2d 85 (1986) (plurality opinion).

When Congress amended § 2 it intended to adopt this "results" test, while abandoning the additional showing of discriminatory intent required by Bolden. The vote dilution analysis adopted by the Court today clearly bears little resemblance to the "results" test that emerged in Whitcomb and White. The Court's test for vote dilution, combined with its standard for evaluating "voting potential," White, supra, 412 U.S., at 766, 93 S.Ct., at 2339–2340, means that any racial minority with distinctive interests must usually "be represented in legislative halls if 99 it is numerous enough to command at least one seat and represents a minority living in an area sufficiently compact to constitute" a voting majority in "a single member district." Whitcomb, 403 U.S., at 156, 91 S.Ct., at 1875. Nothing in Whitcomb, White, or the language and legislative history of § 2 supports the Court's creation of this right to usual, roughly proportional representation on the part of every geographically compact, politically cohesive minority group that is large enough to form a majority in one or more single-member districts.

I would adhere to the approach outlined in Whitcomb and White and followed, with some elaboration, in Zimmer and other cases in the Courts of Appeals prior to Bolden. Under that approach, a court should consider all relevant factors bearing on whether the minority group has "less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 42 U.S.C. § 1973 (emphasis added). The court should not focus solely on the minority group's ability to elect representatives of its choice. Whatever measure of undiluted minority voting strength the court employs in connection with evaluating the presence or absence of minority electoral success, it should also bear in mind that "the power to influence the political process is not limited to winning elections." Davis v. Bandemer, supra, 478 U.S., at 132, 106 S.Ct., at ——. Of course, the relative lack of minority electoral success under a challenged plan, when compared *2792 with the success that would be predicted under the measure of undiluted minority voting strength the court is employing, can constitute powerful evidence of vote dilution. Moreover, the minority group may in fact lack access to or influence upon representatives it did not support as candidates. Cf. Davis v. Bandemer, supra, at 169–170, 106 S.Ct., at —— (POWELL, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Nonetheless, a reviewing court should be required to find more than simply that the minority group does not usually attain an undiluted measure of electoral success. The court must find that even substantial minority success will be highly infrequent 100 under the challenged plan before it may conclude, on this basis alone, that the plan operates "to cancel out or minimize the voting strength of [the] racial grou[p]." White, supra, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339.

III

Only three Justices of the Court join Part III–C of Justice BRENNAN's opinion, which addresses the validity of the statistical evidence on which the District Court relied in finding racially polarized voting in each of the challenged districts. Insofar as statistical evidence of divergent racial voting patterns is admitted solely to establish that the minority group is politically cohesive and to assess its prospects for electoral success, I agree that defendants cannot rebut this showing by offering evidence that the divergent racial voting patterns may be explained in part by causes other than race, such as an underlying divergence in the interests of minority and white voters. I do not agree, however, that such evidence can never affect the overall vote dilution inquiry. Evidence that a candidate preferred by the minority group in a particular election was rejected by white voters for reasons other than those which made that candidate the preferred choice of the minority group would seem clearly relevant in answering the question whether bloc voting by white voters will consistently defeat minority candidates. Such evidence would suggest that another candidate, equally preferred by the minority group, might be able to attract greater white support in future elections.

I believe Congress also intended that explanations of the reasons why white voters rejected minority candidates would be probative of the likelihood that candidates elected without decisive minority support would be willing to take the minority's interests into account. In a community that is polarized along racial lines, racial hostility may bar these and other indirect avenues of political influence to a much greater extent than in a community where racial animosity is absent although the interests of racial groups diverge. Indeed, the 101 Senate Report clearly stated that one factor that could have probative value in § 2 cases was "whether there is a significant lack of responsiveness on the part of elected officials to the particularized needs of the members of the minority group." S.Rep., at 29, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 207. The overall vote dilution inquiry neither requires nor permits an arbitrary rule against consideration of all evidence concerning voting preferences other than statistical evidence of racial voting patterns. Such a rule would give no effect whatever to the Senate Report's repeated emphasis on "intensive racial politics," on "racial political considerations," and on whether "racial politics ... dominate the electoral process" as one aspect of the "racial bloc voting" that Congress deemed relevant to showing a § 2 violation. Id., at 33–34. Similarly, I agree with Justice WHITE that Justice BRENNAN's conclusion that the race of the candidate is always irrelevant in identifying racially polarized voting conflicts with Whitcomb and is not necessary to the disposition of this case. Ante, at 2783 (concurring).

In this case, as the Court grudgingly acknowledges, the District Court clearly erred in aggregating data from all of the challenged districts, and then relying on the fact that on average, 81.7% of white voters did not vote for any black candidate *2793 in the primary elections selected for study. Ante, at 2771, n. 28. Although Senate District 22 encompasses House District 36, with that exception the districts at issue in this case are distributed throughout the State of North Carolina. White calls for "an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact of the ... multimember district," 412 U.S., at 769–770, 93 S.Ct., at 2341, and racial voting statistics from one district are ordinarily irrelevant in assessing the totality of the circumstances in another district. In view of the specific evidence from each district that the District Court also considered, however, I cannot say that its conclusion that there was severe racial bloc voting was clearly erroneous with regard to any of the challenged districts. Except in House District 23, where racial bloc voting did not prevent sustained and virtuallyproportional 102 minority electoral success, I would accordingly leave undisturbed the District Court's decision to give great weight to racial bloc voting in each of the challenged districts.

IV

Having made usual, roughly proportional success the sole focus of its vote dilution analysis, the Court goes on to hold that proof that an occasional minority candidate has been elected does not foreclose a § 2 claim. But Justice BRENNAN, joined by Justice WHITE, concludes that "persistent proportional representation" will foreclose a § 2 claim unless the plaintiffs prove that this "sustained success does not accurately reflect the minority group's ability to elect its preferred representatives." Ante, at 2780. I agree with Justice BRENNAN that consistent and sustained success by candidates preferred by minority voters is presumptively inconsistent with the existence of a § 2 violation. Moreover, I agree that this case presents no occasion for determining what would constitute proof that such success did not accurately reflect the minority group's actual voting strength in a challenged district or districts.

In my view, the District Court erred in assessing the extent of black electoral success in House District 39 and Senate District 22, as well as in House District 23, where the Court acknowledges error. As the evidence summarized by the Court in table form shows, ante, at ——, Appendix B, the degree of black electoral success differed widely in the seven originally contested districts. In House District 8 and Senate District 2, neither of which is contested in this Court, no black candidate had ever been elected to the offices in question. In House District 21 and House District 36, the only instances of black electoral success came in the two most recent elections, one of which took place during the pendency of this litigation. By contrast, in House District 39 and Senate District 22, black successes, although intermittent, dated back to 1974, and a black candidate had been elected in each 103 of these districts in three of the last five elections. Finally, in House District 23 a black candidate had been elected in each of the last six elections.

The District Court, drawing no distinctions among these districts for purposes of its findings, concluded that "[t]he overall results achieved to date at all levels of elective office are minimal in relation to the percentage of blacks in the total population." 590 F.Supp., at 367. The District Court clearly erred to the extent that it considered electoral success in the aggregate, rather than in each of the challenged districts, since, as the Court states, "[t]he inquiry into the existence of vote dilution ... is district-specific." Ante, at 2771, n. 28. The Court asserts that the District Court was free to regard the results of the 1982 elections with suspicion and to decide "on the basis of all the relevant circumstances to accord greater weight to blacks' relative lack of success over the course of several recent elections," ante, at 2790, but the Court does not explain how this technique would apply in Senate District 22, where a black candidate was elected in three consecutive elections from 1974 to 1978, but no black candidate was elected in 1982, or in House District 39, where black *2794 candidates were elected in 1974 and 1976 as well as in 1982. Contrary to what the District Court thought, see 590 F.Supp., at 367, these pre-1982 successes, which were proportional or nearly proportional to black population in these three multimember districts, certainly lend some support for a finding that black voters in these districts enjoy an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice.

Despite this error, I agree with the Court's conclusion that, except in House District 23, minority electoral success was not sufficiently frequent to compel a finding of equal opportunity to participate and elect. The District Court found that "in each of the challenged districts racial polarization in voting presently exists to a substantial or severe degree, and ... in each district it presently operates to 104 minimize the voting strength of black voters." Id., at 372. I cannot say that this finding was clearly erroneous with respect to House District 39 or Senate District 22, particularly when taken together with the District Court's findings concerning the other Zimmer factors, and hence that court's ultimate conclusion of vote dilution in these districts is adequately supported.

This finding, however, is clearly erroneous with respect to House District 23. Blacks constitute 36.3% of the population in that district and 28.6% of the registered voters. In each of the six elections since 1970 one of the three representatives from this district has been a black. There is no finding, or any reason even to suspect, that the successful black candidates in District 23 did not in fact represent the interests of black voters, and the District Court did not find that black success in previous elections was aberrant.

Zimmer's caveat against necessarily foreclosing a vote dilution claim on the basis of isolated black successes, 485 F.2d, at 1307; see S.Rep., at 29, n. 115, cannot be pressed this far. Indeed, the 23 Court of Appeals decisions on which the Senate Report relied, and which are the best evidence of the scope of this caveat, contain no example of minority electoral success that even remotely approximates the consistent, decade-long pattern in District 23. See, e.g., Turner v. McKeithen, 490 F.2d 191 (CA5 1973) (no black candidates elected); Wallace v. House, 515 F.2d 619 (CA5 1975) (one black candidate elected), vacated on other grounds, 425 U.S. 947, 96 S.Ct. 1721, 48 L.Ed.2d 191 (1976).

I do not propose that consistent and virtually proportional minority electoral success should always, as a matter of law, bar finding a § 2 violation. But, as a general rule, such success is entitled to great weight in evaluating whether a challenged electoral mechanism has, on the totality of the circumstances, operated to deny black voters an equal opportunity to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. With respect to House District 23, the District Court's failure to accord black electoral success such 105 weight was clearly erroneous, and the District Court identified no reason for not giving this degree of success preclusive effect. Accordingly, I agree with Justice BRENNAN that appellees failed to establish a violation of § 2 in District 23.

V

When members of a racial minority challenge a multimember district on the grounds that it dilutes their voting strength, I agree with the Court that they must show that they possess such strength and that the multimember district impairs it. A court must therefore appraise the minority group's undiluted voting strength in order to assess the effects of the multimember district. I would reserve the question of the proper method or methods for making this assessment. But once such an assessment is made, in my view the evaluation of an alleged impairment of voting strength requires consideration of the minority group's access to the political processes generally, not solely consideration of the chances that its preferred candidates will actually be elected. Proof that white voters withhold their support from minority-preferred *2795 candidates to an extent that consistently ensures their defeat is entitled to significant weight in plaintiffs' favor. However, if plaintiffs direct their proof solely towards the minority group's prospects for electoral success, they must show that substantial minority success will be highly infrequent under the challenged plan in order to establish that the plan operates to "cancel out or minimize" their voting strength. White, 412 U.S., at 765, 93 S.Ct., at 2339.

Compromise is essential to much if not most major federal legislation, and confidence that the federal courts will enforce such compromises is indispensable to their creation. I believe that the Court today strikes a different balance than Congress intended to when it codified the results test and disclaimed any right to proportional representation under § 2. For that reason, I join the Court's judgment but not its opinion.

106 Justice STEVENS, with whom Justice MARSHALL and Justice BLACKMUN join, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

In my opinion, the findings of the District Court, which the Court fairly summarizes, ante, at —— – ——; —— – ——, and n. 23; —— – ——, and nn. 28 and 29, adequately support the District Court's judgment concerning House District 23 as well as the balance of that judgment.

I, of course, agree that the election of one black candidate in each election since 1972 provides significant support for the State's position. The notion that this evidence creates some sort of a conclusive, legal presumption, ante, at —— – —— is not, however, supported by the language of the statute or by its legislative history.[1] I therefore cannot agree with the Court's view that the District Court committed error by failing to apply a rule of law that emerges today without statutory support. The evidence of candidate success in District 23 is merely one part of an extremely large record which the District Court carefully considered before making its ultimate findings of fact, all of which should be upheld under a normal application of the "clearly erroneous" standard that the Court traditionally applies.[2]

The Court identifies the reason why the success of one black candidate in the elections in 1978, 1980, and 1982 is not 107 inconsistent with the District Court's ultimate finding concerning House District 23.[3] The fact that one black candidate was also elected in the 1972, 1974, and 1976 elections, ante, at ——, Appendix B, is not sufficient, in my opinion, to overcome the additional findings that apply to House District 23, as well as to other districts in the State for each of those years. The Court accurately summarizes those findings:

> "The District Court in this case carefully considered the totality of the circumstances and found that in each district racially polarized voting; the legacy of official discrimination in voting matters, education, housing, employment, and health services; and the persistence of campaign appeals to racial prejudice acted in concert with the multimember districting scheme to impair the ability of geographically insular and politically *2796 cohesive groups of black voters to participate equally in the political process and to elect candidates of their choice. It found that the success a few black candidates have enjoyed in these districts is too recent, too limited, and, with regard to the 1982 elections, perhaps too aberrational, to disprove its conclusion." Ante, at 2782.

To paraphrase the Court's conclusion about the other districts, ibid., I cannot say that the District Court, composed of local judges who are well acquainted with the political realities of the State, clearly erred in concluding that use of a multimember electoral structure has caused black voters in House District 23 to have less opportunity than white voters to elect representatives of their choice.[4] Accordingly, I concurin 108 the Court's opinion except Part IV–B and except insofar as it explains why it reverses the judgment respecting House District 23.

All Citations

478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25, 54 USLW 4877, 4 Fed.R.Serv.3d 1082

Footnotes

[*] The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

[1] Appellees challenged Senate District No. 2, which consisted of the whole of Northampton, Hertford, Gates, Bertie, and Chowan Counties, and parts of Washington, Martin, Halifax, and Edgecombe Counties.

[2] Appellees challenged the following multimember districts: Senate No. 22 (Mecklenburg and Cabarrus Counties—four members), House No. 36 (Mecklenburg County—eight members), House No. 39 (part of Forsyth County—five members), House No. 23 (Durham County—three members), House No. 21 (Wake County—six members), and House No. 8 (Wilson, Nash, and Edgecombe Counties—four members).

[3] Appellants initiated this action in September 1981, challenging the North Carolina General Assembly's July 1981 redistricting. The history of this action is recounted in greater detail in the District Court's opinion in this case, Gingles v. Edmisten, 590 F.Supp. 345, 350–358 (EDNC 1984). It suffices here to note that the General Assembly revised the 1981 plan in April 1982 and that the plan at issue in this case is the 1982 plan.

[4] These factors were derived from the analytical framework of White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), as refined and developed by the lower courts, in particular by the Fifth Circuit in Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297 (1973) (en banc), aff'd sub nom. East Carroll Parish School Board v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636, 96 S.Ct. 1083, 47 L.Ed.2d 296 (1976) (per curiam). S.Rep., at 28, n. 113.

[5] Bullet (single-shot) voting has been described as follows:

" 'Consider [a] town of 600 whites and 400 blacks with an at-large election to choose four council members. Each voter is able to cast four votes. Suppose there are eight white candidates, with the votes of the whites split among them approximately equally, and one black candidate, with all the blacks voting for him and no one else. The result is that each white candidate receives about 300 votes and the black candidate receives 400 votes. The black has probably won a seat. This technique is called single-shot voting. Single-shot voting enables a minority group to win some at-large seats if it concentrates its vote behind a limited number of candidates and if the vote of the majority is divided among a number of candidates.' " City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 184, n. 19, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 1565, n. 19, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980), quoting United States Commission on Civil Rights, The Voting Rights Act: Ten Years After, pp. 206–207 (1975).

[6] Designated (or numbered) seat schemes require a candidate for election in multimember districts to run for specific seats, and can, under certain circumstances, frustrate bullet voting. See, e.g., City of Rome, supra, at 185, n. 21, 100 S.Ct., at 1566, n. 21.

[7] The United States urges this Court to give little weight to the Senate Report, arguing that it represents a compromise among conflicting "factions," and thus is somehow less authoritative than most Committee Reports. Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 8, n. 12, 24, n. 49. We are not persuaded that the legislative history of amended § 2 contains anything to lead us to conclude that this Senate Report should be accorded little weight. We have repeatedly recognized that the authoritative source for legislative intent lies in the Committee Reports on the bill. See, e.g., Garcia v. United States, 469 U.S. 70, 76, and n. 3, 105 S.Ct. 479, 483, and n. 3, 83 L.Ed.2d 472 (1984); Zuber v. Allen, 396 U.S. 168, 186, 90 S.Ct. 314, 324, 24 L.Ed.2d 345 (1969).

8 The Senate Report states that amended § 2 was designed to restore the "results test"—the legal standard that governed voting discrimination cases prior to our decision in Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980). S.Rep., at 15–16. The Report notes that in pre-Bolden cases such as White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973), and Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297 (CA5 1973), plaintiffs could prevail by showing that, under the totality of the circumstances, a challenged election law or procedure had the effect of denying a protected minority an equal chance to participate in the electoral process. Under the "results test," plaintiffs are not required to demonstrate that the challenged electoral law or structure was designed or maintained for a discriminatory purpose. S.Rep., at 16, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 193.

9 The Senate Committee found that "voting practices and procedures that have discriminatory results perpetuate the effects of past purposeful discrimination." Id., at 40, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 218 (footnote omitted). As the Senate Report notes, the purpose of the Voting Rights Act was " 'not only to correct an active history of discrimination, the denying to Negroes of the right to register and vote, but also to deal with the accumulation of discrimination.' " Id., 5, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 182 (quoting 111 Cong.Rec. 8295 (1965) (remarks of Sen. Javits)).

10 Section 2 prohibits all forms of voting discrimination, not just vote dilution. S.Rep., at 30.

11 Dilution of racial minority group voting strength may be caused by the dispersal of blacks into districts in which they constitute an ineffective minority of voters or from the concentration of blacks into districts where they constitute an excessive majority. Engstrom & Wildgen, Pruning Thorns from the Thicket: An Empirical Test of the Existence of Racial Gerrymandering, 2 Legis.Stud.Q. 465, 465–466 (1977) (hereinafter Engstrom & Wildgen). See also Derfner, Racial Discrimination and the Right to Vote, 26 Vand.L.Rev. 523, 553 (1973) (hereinafter Derfner); F. Parker, Racial Gerrymandering and Legislative Reapportionment (hereinafter Parker), in Minority Vote Dilution 86–100 (Davidson ed., 1984) (hereinafter Minority Vote Dilution).

12 The claim we address in this opinion is one in which the plaintiffs alleged and attempted to prove that their ability to elect the representatives of their choice was impaired by the selection of a multimember electoral structure. We have no occasion to consider whether § 2 permits, and if it does, what standards should pertain to, a claim brought by a minority group, that is not sufficiently large and compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district, alleging that the use of a multimember district impairs its ability to influence elections.

We note also that we have no occasion to consider whether the standards we apply to respondents' claim that multimember districts operate to dilute the vote of geographically cohesive minority groups, that are large enough to constitute majorities in single-member districts and that are contained within the boundaries of the challenged multimember districts, are fully pertinent to other sorts of vote dilution claims, such as a claim alleging that the splitting of a large and geographically cohesive minority between two or more multimember or single-member districts resulted in the dilution of the minority vote.

13 Commentators are in widespread agreement with this conclusion. See, e.g., Berry & Dye, The Discriminatory Effects of At-Large Elections, 7 Fla.St.U.L.Rev. 85 (1979) (hereinafter Berry & Dye); Blacksher & Menefee, From Reynolds v. Sims to City of Mobile v. Bolden, 34 Hastings L.J. 1 (1982) (hereinafter Blacksher & Menefee); Bonapfel, Minority Challenges to At-Large Elections: The Dilution Problem, 10 Ga.L.Rev. 353 (1976) (hereinafter Bonapfel); Butler, Constitutional and Statutory Challenges to Election Structures: Dilution and the Value of the Right to Vote, 42 La.L.Rev. 851 (1982) (hereinafter Butler); Carpeneti, Legislative Apportionment: Multimember Districts and Fair Representation, 120 U.Pa.L.Rev. 666 (1972) (hereinafter Carpeneti); Davidson & Korbel, At-Large Elections and Minority Group Representation, in Minority Vote Dilution 65; Derfner; B. Grofman, Alternatives to Single-Member Plurality Districts: Legal and Empirical Issues (hereinafter Grofman, Alternatives), in Representation and Redistricting Issues 107 (B. Grofman, R. Lijphart, H. McKay, & H. Scarrow eds., 1982) (hereinafter Representation and Redistricting Issues); Hartman, Racial Vote Dilution and Separation of Powers, 50 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 689 (1982); Jewell, The Consequences of Single-and Multimember Districting, in Representation and Redistricting Issues 129 (1982) (hereinafter Jewell); Jones, The Impact of Local Election Systems on Political Representation, 11 Urb.Aff.Q. 345 (1976); Karnig, Black Resources and

City Council Representation, 41 J.Pol. 134 (1979); Karnig, Black Representation on City Councils, 12 Urb.Aff.Q. 223 (1976); Parker 87–88.

14 Not only does "[v]oting along racial lines" deprive minority voters of their preferred representative in these circumstances, it also "allows those elected to ignore [minority] interests without fear of political consequences," Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S., at 623, 102 S.Ct., at 3279, leaving the minority effectively unrepresented. See, e.g., Grofman, Should Representatives be Typical of Their Constituents?, in Representation and Redistricting Issues 97; Parker 108.

15 Under a "functional" view of the political process mandated by § 2, S.Rep., at 30, n. 120, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 208, the most important Senate Report factors bearing on § 2 challenges to multimember districts are the "extent to which minority group members have been elected to public office in the jurisdiction" and the "extent to which voting in the elections of the state or political subdivision is racially polarized." Id., 28–29, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 206. If present, the other factors, such as the lingering effects of past discrimination, the use of appeals to racial bias in election campaigns, and the use of electoral devices which enhance the dilutive effects of multimember districts when substantial white bloc voting exists—for example antibullet voting laws and majority vote requirements, are supportive of, but not essential to, a minority voter's claim.

In recognizing that some Senate Report factors are more important to multimember district vote dilution claims than others, the Court effectuates the intent of Congress. It is obvious that unless minority group members experience substantial difficulty electing representatives of their choice, they cannot prove that a challenged electoral mechanism impairs their ability "to elect." § 2(b). And, where the contested electoral structure is a multimember district, commentators and courts agree that in the absence of significant white bloc voting it cannot be said that the ability of minority voters to elect their chosen representatives is inferior to that of white voters. See, e.g., McMillan v. Escambia County, Fla., 748 F.2d 1037, 1043 (CA5 1984); United States v. Marengo County Comm'n, 731 F.2d 1546, 1566 (CA11), appeal dism'd and cert. denied, 469 U.S. 976, 105 S.Ct. 375, 83 L.Ed.2d 311 (1984); Nevett v. Sides, 571 F.2d 209, 223 (CA5 1978), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 951, 100 S.Ct. 2916, 64 L.Ed.2d 807 (1980); Johnson v. Halifax County, 594 F.Supp. 161, 170 (EDNC 1984); Blacksher & Menefee; Engstrom & Wildgen 469; Parker 107. Consequently, if difficulty in electing and white bloc voting are not proved, minority voters have not established that the multimember structure interferes with their ability to elect their preferred candidates. Minority voters may be able to prove that they still suffer social and economic effects of past discrimination, that appeals to racial bias are employed in election campaigns, and that a majority vote is required to win a seat, but they have not demonstrated a substantial inability to elect caused by the use of a multimember district. By recognizing the primacy of the history and extent of minority electoral success and of racial bloc voting, the Court simply requires that § 2 plaintiffs prove their claim before they may be awarded relief.

16 In this case appellees allege that within each contested multimember district there exists a minority group that is sufficiently large and compact to constitute a single-member district. In a different kind of case, for example a gerrymander case, plaintiffs might allege that the minority group that is sufficiently large and compact to constitute a single-member district has been split between two or more multimember or single-member districts, with the effect of diluting the potential strength of the minority vote.

17 The reason that a minority group making such a challenge must show, as a threshold matter, that it is sufficiently large and geographically compact to constitute a majority in a single-member district is this: Unless minority voters possess the potential to elect representatives in the absence of the challenged structure or practice, they cannot claim to have been injured by that structure or practice. The single-member district is generally the appropriate standard against which to measure minority group potential to elect because it is the smallest political unit from which representatives are elected. Thus, if the minority group is spread evenly throughout a multimember district, or if, although geographically compact, the minority group is so small in relation to the surrounding white population that it could not constitute a majority in a single-member district, these minority voters cannot maintain that they would have been able to elect representatives of their choice in the absence of the multimember electoral structure. As two commentators have explained:

"To demonstrate [that minority voters are injured by at-large elections], the minority voters must be sufficiently concentrated and politically cohesive that a putative districting plan would result in districts in which members of a racial minority would constitute a majority of the voters, whose clear electoral choices are in fact defeated by at-large voting. If minority voters' residences are substantially integrated throughout the jurisdiction, the at-large district cannot be blamed for the defeat of minority-supported candidates.... [This standard] thus would only protect racial minority votes from diminution proximately caused by the districting plan; it would not assure racial minorities proportional representation." Blacksher & Menefee 55–56 (footnotes omitted; emphasis added).

18 The terms "racially polarized voting" and "racial bloc voting" are used interchangeably throughout this opinion.

19 The 1982 reapportionment plan left essentially undisturbed the 1971 plan for five of the original six contested multimember districts. House District 39 alone was slightly modified. Brief for Appellees 8.

20 The District Court found both methods standard in the literature for the analysis of racially polarized voting. 590 F.Supp., at 367–368, n. 28, n. 32. See also Engstrom & McDonald, Quantitative Evidence in Vote Dilution Litigation: Political Participation and Polarized Voting, 17 Urb.Law. 369 (Summer 1985); Grofman, Migalski, & Noviello, The "Totality of Circumstances Test" in Section 2 of the 1982 Extension of the Voting Rights Act: A Social Science Perspective, 7 Law & Policy 199 (Apr.1985) (hereinafter Grofman, Migalski, & Noviello).

21 The court used the term "racial polarization" to describe this correlation. It adopted Dr. Grofman's definition—"racial polarization" exists where there is "a consistent relationship between [the] race of the voter and the way in which the voter votes," Tr. 160, or to put it differently, where "black voters and white voters vote differently." Id., at 203. We, too, adopt this definition of "racial bloc" or "racially polarized" voting. See, infra, at ——.

22 The court found that the data reflected positive relationships and that the correlations did not happen by chance. 590 F.Supp., at 368, and n. 30. See also D. Barnes & J. Conley, Statistical Evidence in Litigation 32–34 (1986); Fisher, Multiple Regression in Legal Proceedings, 80 Colum.L.Rev. 702, 716–720 (1980); Grofman, Migalski, & Noviello 206.

23 The two exceptions were the 1982 State House elections in Districts 21 and 23. 590 F.Supp., at 368, n. 31.

24 This list of factors is illustrative, not comprehensive.

25 The number of elections that must be studied in order to determine whether voting is polarized will vary according to pertinent circumstances. One important circumstance is the number of elections in which the minority group has sponsored candidates. Where a minority group has never been able to sponsor a candidate, courts must rely on other factors that tend to prove unequal access to the electoral process. Similarly, where a minority group has begun to sponsor candidates just recently, the fact that statistics from only one or a few elections are available for examination does not foreclose a vote dilution claim.

26 This list of special circumstances is illustrative, not exclusive.

27 The trial court did not actually employ the term "legally significant." At times it seems to have used "substantive significance" as Dr. Grofman did, to describe polarization severe enough to result in the selection of different candidates in racially separate electorates. At other times, however, the court used the term "substantively significant" to refer to its ultimate determination that racially polarized voting in these districts is sufficiently severe to be relevant to a § 2 claim.

28 In stating that 81.7% of white voters did not vote for any black candidates in the primary election and that two-thirds of white voters did not vote for black candidates in general elections, the District Court aggregated data from all six challenged multimember districts, apparently for ease of reporting. The inquiry into the existence of vote dilution caused by submergence in a multimember district is district specific. When considering several separate vote dilution claims in a single case, courts must not rely on data aggregated from all the challenged districts in concluding that racially polarized voting exists in each district. In the instant case, however, it is clear from the trial court's tabulated findings and from the exhibits that were before it, 1 App., Exs. 2–10, that the court relied on data that were specific to each individual district in concluding that each district experienced legally significant racially polarized voting.

29 For example, the court found that incumbency aided a successful black candidate in the 1978 primary in Senate District 22. The court also noted that in House District 23, a black candidate who gained election in 1978, 1980, and 1982, ran uncontested in the 1978 general election and in both the primary and general elections in 1980. In 1982 there was no Republican opposition, a fact the trial court interpreted to mean that the general election was for all practical purposes unopposed. Moreover, in the 1982 primary, there were only two white candidates for three seats, so that one black candidate had to succeed. Even under this condition, the court remarked, 63% of white voters still refused to vote for the black incumbent—who was the choice of 90% of the blacks. In House District 21, where a black won election to the six-member delegation in 1980 and 1982, the court found that in the relevant primaries approximately 60% to 70% of white voters did not vote for the black candidate, whereas approximately 80% of blacks did. The court additionally observed that although winning the Democratic primary in this district is historically tantamount to election, 55% of whites declined to vote for the Democratic black candidate in the general election.

30 The court noted that in the 1982 primary held in House District 36, out of a field of eight, the successful black candidate was ranked first by black voters, but seventh by whites. Similarly, the court found that the two blacks who won seats in the five-member delegation from House District 39 were ranked first and second by black voters, but seventh and eighth by white voters.

31 Appellants argue that plaintiffs must establish that race was the primary determinant of voter behavior as part of their prima facie showing of polarized voting; the United States suggests that plaintiffs make out a prima facie case merely by showing a correlation between race and the selection of certain candidates, but that defendants should be able to rebut by showing that factors other than race were the principal causes of voters' choices. We reject both arguments.

32 The Fifth Circuit cases on which North Carolina and the United States rely for their position are equally ambiguous. See Lee County Branch of NAACP v. Opelika, 748 F.2d 1473, 1482 (1984); Jones v. Lubbock, 730 F.2d 233, 234 (1984) (Higginbotham, J., concurring).

33 It is true, as we have recognized previously, that racial hostility may often fuel racial bloc voting. United Jewish Organizations v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144, 166, 97 S.Ct. 996, 1010, 51 L.Ed.2d 229 (1977); Rogers v. Lodge, 458 U.S., at 623, 102 S.Ct., at 3278. But, as we explain in this decision, the actual motivation of the voter has no relevance to a vote dilution claim. This is not to suggest that racial bloc voting is race neutral; because voter behavior correlates with race, obviously it is not. It should be remembered, though, as one commentator has observed, that "[t]he absence of racial animus is but one element of race neutrality." Note, Geometry and Geography 208.

34 The Senate Report rejected the argument that the words "on account of race," contained in § 2(a), create any requirement of purposeful discrimination. "[I]t is patently [clear] that Congress has used the words 'on account of race or color' in the Act to mean 'with respect to' race or color, and not to connote any required purpose of racial discrimination." S.Rep., at 27–28, n. 109, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1982, p. 205.

35 The relevant results of the 1982 General Assembly election are as follows. House District 21, in which blacks make up 21.8% of the population, elected one black to the six-person House delegation. House District 23, in which blacks constitute 36.3% of the population, elected one black to the three-person House delegation. In House District 36, where blacks constitute 26.5% of the population, one black was elected to the eight-member delegation. In House District 39, where 25.1% of the population is black, two blacks were elected to the five-member delegation. In Senate District 22, where blacks constitute 24.3% of the population, no black was elected to the Senate in 1982.

36 The United States points out that, under a substantially identical predecessor to the challenged plan, see n. 15, supra, House District 21 elected a black to its six-member delegation in 1980, House District 39 elected a black to its five-member delegation in 1974 and 1976, and Senate District 22 had a black Senator between 1975 and 1980.

37 See also Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d, at 1307 ("[W]e cannot endorse the view that the success of black candidates at the polls necessarily forecloses the possibility of dilution of the black vote. Such success might, on occasion, be attributable to the work of politicians, who, apprehending that the support of a black candidate would be politically expedient, campaign to insure his election. Or such success might be attributable to political support motivated by different considerations—namely that election of a black candidate will thwart successful challenges to electoral schemes on dilution grounds. In either situation, a candidate could be elected despite the relative political backwardness of black residents in the electoral district").

38 We have no occasion in this case to decide what types of special circumstances could satisfactorily demonstrate that sustained success does not accurately reflect the minority's ability to elect its preferred representatives.

1 I express no view as to whether the ability of a minority group to constitute a majority in a single-member district should constitute a threshold requirement for a claim that the use of multimember districts impairs the ability of minority voters to participate in the political processes and to elect representatives of their choice. Because the plaintiffs in this case would meet that requirement, if indeed it exists, I need not decide whether it is imposed by § 2. I note, however, the artificiality of the Court's distinction between claims that a minority group's "ability to elect the representatives of [its] choice" has been impaired and claims that "its ability to influence elections" has been impaired. Ante, at 2765–2765, n. 12. It is true that a minority group that could constitute a majority in a single-member district ordinarily has the potential ability to elect representatives without white support, and that a minority that could not constitute such a majority ordinarily does not. But the Court recognizes that when the candidates preferred by a minority group are elected in a multimember district, the minority group has elected those candidates, even if white support was indispensable to these victories. On the same reasoning, if a minority group that is not large enough to constitute a voting majority in a single-member district can show that white support would probably be forthcoming in some such district to an extent that would enable the election of the candidates its members prefer, that minority group would appear to have demonstrated that, at least under this measure of its voting strength, it would be able to elect some candidates of its choice.

2 At times, the District Court seems to have looked to simple proportionality rather than to hypothetical single-member districts in which black voters would constitute a majority. See, e.g., 590 F.Supp., at 367. Nowhere in its opinion, however, did the District Court state that § 2 requires that minority groups consistently attain the level of electoral success that would correspond with their proportion of the total or voting population.

1 See ante, at 2779 ("Section 2(b) provides that '[t]he extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office ... is one circumstance which may be considered.' 42 U.S.C. § 1973(b).... However, the Senate Report expressly states that 'the election of a few minority candidates does not "necessarily foreclose the possibility of dilution of the black vote," ' noting that if it did, 'the possibility exists that the majority citizens might evade [§ 2] by manipulating the election of a "safe" minority candidate.' ... The Senate Committee decided, instead, to ' "require an independent consideration of the record" ' ") (internal citations omitted).

2 See ante, at 46 ("[T]he application of the clearly-erroneous standard to ultimate findings of vote dilution preserves the benefit of the trial court's particular familiarity with the indigenous political reality without endangering the rule of law").

[3] See ante, at —— – ——, and n. 23, ——, n. 29, —— – ——.

[4] Even under the Court's analysis, the decision simply to reverse—without a remand—is mystifying. It is also extremely unfair. First, the Court does not give appellees an opportunity to address the new legal standard that the Court finds decisive. Second, the Court does not even bother to explain the contours of that standard, and why it was not satisfied in this case. Cf. ante, at 2780, n. 38 ("We have no occasion in this case to decide what types of special circumstances could satisfactorily demonstrate that sustained success does not accurately reflect the minority's ability to elect its preferred representatives"). Finally, though couched as a conclusion about a "matter of law," ante, at 2782, the Court's abrupt entry of judgment for appellants on District 23 reflects an unwillingness to give the District Court the respect it is due, particularly when, as in this case, the District Court has a demonstrated knowledge and expertise of the entire context that Congress directed it to consider.

End of Document

144 S.Ct. 662
Supreme Court of the United States.

Donald J. TRUMP, Petitioner
v.
Norma ANDERSON, et al.

No. 23-719
|
March 4, 2024

Synopsis

Background: State voters eligible filed petition in state court, under Colorado's Uniform Election Code, against former President and Colorado's Secretary of State, seeking to prohibit Secretary of State from placing former President's name on Colorado Republican presidential primary ballot, alleging that during his presidency, former President had engaged in insurrection in connection with January 6, 2021, attack on the United States Capitol after swearing oath as President to support Constitution, making him constitutionally ineligible for office of presidency based on Section Three of Fourteenth Amendment. Following removal, the United States District Court for the District of Colorado, Philip A. Brimmer, Chief Judge, 2023 WL 5938828, granted voters' unopposed motion to remand. Following intervention by former President and Colorado Republican State Central Committee (CRSCC), the Colorado District Court, City and County of Denver, Sarah B. Wallace, J., 2023 WL 7017744, denied former President's motion to dismiss and denied CRSCC's motion to dismiss and motion for judgment on pleadings, denied, 2023 WL 7017745, former President's motion to dismiss based on Fourteenth Amendment, and after bench trial, 2023 WL 8006216, determined that events at Capitol constituted insurrection and that former President engaged in insurrection, but that Section Three did not apply to former President. Voters and former President appealed. The Colorado Supreme Court, 2023 WL 8770111, affirmed in part and reversed in part, ordering Secretary of State to exclude former President from Republican primary ballot in State and to disregard any write-in votes that Colorado voters might cast for him, and the ruling was automatically stayed pending review by the United States Supreme Court. Certiorari was granted.

The Supreme Court held that only Congress, pursuant to its power under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to pass appropriate legislation to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment, and not States, may disqualify persons from holding federal office or from being federal candidates under Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Judgment of Colorado Supreme Court reversed.

Chief Justice Roberts, and Justices Thomas, Alito, Gorsuch, Kavanaugh joined, and Justice Barrett joined in part.

Justice Barrett filed an opinion concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

Justices Sotomayor, Kagan, and Jackson filed an opinion concurring in the judgment.

Attorneys and Law Firms

*664 David A. Warrington, Jonathan M. Shaw, Gary M. Lawkowski, Dhillon Law Group Inc., Alexandria, VA, Harmeet Dhillon, Dhillon Law Group Inc., San Francisco, CA, Jonathan F. Mitchell, Counsel of Record, Mitchell Law PLLC, Austin, Texas, Scott E. Gessler, Gessler Blue LLC, Greenwood Village, CO, for Petitioner.

Jason Murray, Counsel of Record, Sean Grimsley, Eric Olson, Isabel Broer, Olson Grimsley Kawanabe Hinchcliff & Murray LLC, Denver, CO, Donald Sherman, Nikhel Sus, Jonathan Maier, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, Martha Tierney, Tierney Lawrence Stiles LLC., Mario Nicolais, KBN Law, LLC., for Respondents.

Philip J. Weiser, Attorney General, Natalie Hanlon Leh, Deputy Attorney General, Shannon Wells Stevenson, Solicitor General, Counsel of Record, Office of the Colorado, Attorney General, Denver, CO, Allison Block, Cata Cuneo, Dayna Zolle Hauser, Michael Kotlarczyk, Michael McMaster, Joseph Michaels, LeeAnn Morrill, Helen Norton, Olivia Probetts, Counsel for Respondent Jena Griswold.

Opinion

Per Curiam.

104 A group of Colorado voters contends that Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution prohibits former President Donald J. Trump, who seeks the Presidential nomination 105 of the Republican Party in this year's election, from becoming President again. The Colorado Supreme Court agreed with that contention. *665 It ordered the Colorado secretary 106 of state to exclude the former President from the Republican primary ballot in the State and to disregard any write-in votes that Colorado voters might cast for him.

Former President Trump challenges that decision on several grounds. Because the Constitution makes Congress, rather than the States, responsible for enforcing Section 3 against federal officeholders and candidates, we reverse.

I

Last September, about six months before the March 5, 2024, Colorado primary election, four Republican and two unaffiliated Colorado voters filed a petition against former President Trump and Colorado Secretary of State Jena Griswold in Colorado state court. These voters—whom we refer to as the respondents—contend that after former President Trump's defeat in the 2020 Presidential election, he disrupted the peaceful transfer of power by intentionally organizing and inciting the crowd that breached the Capitol as Congress met to certify the election results on January 6, 2021. One consequence of those actions, the respondents maintain, is that former President Trump is constitutionally ineligible to serve as President again.

Their theory turns on Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Section 3 provides:

> "No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the 107 Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability."

According to the respondents, Section 3 applies to the former President because after taking the Presidential oath in 2017, he intentionally incited the breaching of the Capitol on January 6 in order to retain power. They claim that he is therefore not a qualified candidate, and that as a result, the Colorado secretary of state may not place him on the primary ballot. See Colo. Rev. Stat. §§ 1–1–113(1), 1–4–1101(1), 1–4–1201, 1–4–1203(2)(a), 1–4–1204 (2023).

After a five-day trial, the state District Court found that former President Trump had "engaged in insurrection" within the meaning of Section 3, but nonetheless denied the respondents' petition. The court held that Section 3 did not apply because the Presidency, which Section 3 does not mention by name, is not an "office ... under the United States" and the President is not an "officer of the United States" within the meaning of that provision. See App. to Pet. for Cert. 184a–284a.

In December, the Colorado Supreme Court reversed in part and affirmed in part by a 4 to 3 vote. Reversing the District Court's operative holding, the majority concluded that for purposes of Section 3, the Presidency is an office under the United States and the President is an officer of the United States. The court otherwise affirmed, holding (1) that the Colorado Election Code permitted the respondents' challenge based on Section 3; (2) that Congress need not pass implementing legislation for disqualifications under Section 3 to attach; (3) that the political question doctrine did not preclude judicial review of former President Trump's eligibility; (4) that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting *666 into evidence portions of a congressional Report on the events of January 6; (5) that the District Court 108 did not err in concluding that those events constituted an "insurrection" and that former President Trump "engaged in" that insurrection; and (6) that former President Trump's speech to the crowd that breached the Capitol on January 6 was not protected by the First Amendment. See id., at 1a–114a.

The Colorado Supreme Court accordingly ordered Secretary Griswold not to "list President Trump's name on the 2024 presidential primary ballot" or "count any write-in votes cast for him." Id., at 114a. Chief Justice Boatright and Justices Samour and Berkenkotter each filed dissenting opinions. Id., at 115a–124a, 125a–161a, 162a–183a.

Under the terms of the opinion of the Colorado Supreme Court, its ruling was automatically stayed pending this Court's review. See id., at 114a. We granted former President Trump's petition for certiorari, which raised a single question: "Did the Colorado Supreme Court err in ordering President Trump excluded from the 2024 presidential primary ballot?" See 601 U. S. ——, 144 S.Ct. 662, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2024). Concluding that it did, we now reverse.

II

A

Proposed by Congress in 1866 and ratified by the States in 1868, the Fourteenth Amendment "expand[ed] federal power at the expense of state autonomy" and thus "fundamentally altered the balance of state and federal power struck by the Constitution." Seminole Tribe of Fla. v. Florida, 517 U.S. 44, 59, 116 S.Ct. 1114, 134 L.Ed.2d 252 (1996); see also Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 345, 25 L.Ed. 676 (1880). Section 1 of the Amendment, for instance, bars the States from "depriv[ing] any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law" or "deny[ing] to any person ... the equal protection of the laws." And Section 5 confers on Congress "power to enforce" those prohibitions, along with the other provisions of the Amendment, "by appropriate legislation."

109 Section 3 of the Amendment likewise restricts state autonomy, but through different means. It was designed to help ensure an enduring Union by preventing former Confederates from returning to power in the aftermath of the Civil War. See, e.g., Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., 2544 (1866) (statement of Rep. Stevens, warning that without appropriate constitutional reforms "yelling secessionists and hissing copperheads" would take seats in the House); id., at 2768 (statement of Sen. Howard, lamenting prospect of a "State Legislature ... made up entirely of disloyal elements" absent a disqualification provision). Section 3 aimed to prevent such a resurgence by barring from office "those who, having once taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, afterward went into rebellion against the Government of the United States." Cong. Globe, 41st Cong., 1st Sess., 626 (1869) (statement of Sen. Trumbull).

Section 3 works by imposing on certain individuals a preventive and severe penalty—disqualification from holding a wide array of offices—rather than by granting rights to all. It is therefore necessary, as Chief Justice Chase concluded and the Colorado Supreme Court itself recognized, to " 'ascertain[ ] what particular individuals are embraced' " by the provision. App. to Pet. for Cert. 53a (quoting Griffin's Case, 11 F.Cas. 7, 26 (No. 5,815) (CC Va. 1869) (Chase, Circuit Justice)). Chase went on to explain that "[t]o accomplish *667 this ascertainment and ensure effective results, proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcements of decisions, more or less formal, are indispensable." Id., at 26. For its part, the Colorado Supreme Court also concluded that there must be some kind of "determination" that Section 3 applies to a particular person "before the disqualification holds meaning." App. to Pet. for Cert. 53a.

The Constitution empowers Congress to prescribe how those determinations should be made. The relevant provision is Section 5, which enables Congress, subject of course to judicial review, to pass "appropriate legislation" to "enforce" 110 the Fourteenth Amendment. See City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 536, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997). Or as Senator Howard put it at the time the Amendment was framed, Section 5 "casts upon Congress the responsibility of seeing to it, for the future, that all the sections of the amendment are carried out in good faith." Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., at 2768.

Congress's Section 5 power is critical when it comes to Section 3. Indeed, during a debate on enforcement legislation less than a year after ratification, Sen. Trumbull noted that "notwithstanding [Section 3] ... hundreds of men [were] holding office" in violation of its terms. Cong. Globe, 41st Cong., 1st Sess., at 626. The Constitution, Trumbull noted, "provide[d] no means for enforcing" the disqualification, necessitating a "bill to give effect to the fundamental law embraced in the Constitution." Ibid. The enforcement mechanism Trumbull championed was later enacted as part of the Enforcement Act of 1870, "pursuant to the power conferred by § 5 of the [Fourteenth] Amendment." General Building Contractors Assn., Inc. v. Pennsylvania, 458 U.S. 375, 385, 102 S.Ct. 3141, 73 L.Ed.2d 835 (1982); see 16 Stat. 143–144.

B

This case raises the question whether the States, in addition to Congress, may also enforce Section 3. We conclude that States may disqualify persons holding or attempting to hold state office. But States have no power under the Constitution to enforce Section 3 with respect to federal offices, especially the Presidency.

"In our federal system, the National Government possesses only limited powers; the States and the people retain the remainder." Bond v. United States, 572 U.S. 844, 854, 134 S.Ct. 2077, 189 L.Ed.2d 1 (2014). Among those retained powers is the power of a State to "order the processes of its own governance." Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706, 752, 119 S.Ct. 2240, 144 L.Ed.2d 636 (1999). In particular, the States enjoy sovereign "power to prescribe the qualifications of their own officers" and "the manner of their election ... 111 free from external interference, except so far as plainly provided by the Constitution of the United States." Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U. S. 548, 570–571, 20 S.Ct. 890, 44 L.Ed. 1187 (1900). Although the Fourteenth Amendment restricts state power, nothing in it plainly withdraws from the States this traditional authority. And after ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, States used this authority to disqualify state officers in accordance with state statutes. See, e.g., Worthy v. Barrett, 63 N.C. 199, 200, 204 (1869) (elected county sheriff); State ex rel. Sandlin v. Watkins, 21 La.Ann. 631, 631–633 (1869) (state judge).

Such power over governance, however, does not extend to federal officeholders and candidates. Because federal officers " 'owe their existence and functions to the united voice of the whole, not of a *668 portion, of the people,' " powers over their election and qualifications must be specifically "delegated to, rather than reserved by, the States." U. S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 803–804, 115 S.Ct. 1842, 131 L.Ed.2d 881 (1995) (quoting 1 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States § 627, p. 435 (3d ed. 1858)). But nothing in the Constitution delegates to the States any power to enforce Section 3 against federal officeholders and candidates.

As an initial matter, not even the respondents contend that the Constitution authorizes States to somehow remove sitting federal officeholders who may be violating Section 3. Such a power would flout the principle that "the Constitution guarantees 'the entire independence of the General Government from any control by the respective States.' " Trump v.Vance, 591 U. S. 786, 800, 140 S.Ct. 2412, 207 L.Ed.2d (2020) (quoting Farmers and Mechanics Sav. Bank of Minneapolis v. Minnesota, 232 U.S. 516, 521, 34 S.Ct. 354, 58 L.Ed. 706 (1914)). Indeed, consistent with that principle, States lack even the lesser powers to issue writs of mandamus against federal officials or to grant habeas corpus relief to persons in federal custody. See McClung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat. 598, 603–605 (1821); Tarble's Case, 13 Wall. 397, 405–410 (1872).

112 The respondents nonetheless maintain that States may enforce Section 3 against candidates for federal office. But the text of the Fourteenth Amendment, on its face, does not affirmatively delegate such a power to the States. The terms of the Amendment speak only to enforcement by Congress, which enjoys power to enforce the Amendment through legislation pursuant to Section 5.

This can hardly come as a surprise, given that the substantive provisions of the Amendment "embody significant limitations on state authority." Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 456, 96 S.Ct. 2666, 49 L.Ed.2d 614 (1976). Under the Amendment, States cannot abridge privileges or immunities, deprive persons of life, liberty, or property without due process, deny equal protection, or deny male inhabitants the right to vote (without thereby suffering reduced representation in the House). See Amdt. 14, §§ 1, 2. On the other hand, the Fourteenth Amendment grants new power to Congress to enforce the provisions of the Amendment against the States. It would be incongruous to read this particular Amendment as granting the States the power—silently no less—to disqualify a candidate for federal office.

The only other plausible constitutional sources of such a delegation are the Elections and Electors Clauses, which authorize States to conduct and regulate congressional and Presidential elections, respectively. See Art. I, § 4, cl. 1; Art. II, § 1, cl. 2.[1] But there is little reason to think that these Clauses implicitly authorize the States to enforce Section 3 against federal officeholders and candidates. Granting the States that authority would invert the Fourteenth Amendment's rebalancing of federal and state power.

113 The text of Section 3 reinforces these conclusions. Its final sentence empowers Congress to "remove" any Section 3 "disability" by a two-thirds vote of each house. The text imposes no limits on that *669 power, and Congress may exercise it any time, as the respondents concede. See Brief for Respondents 50. In fact, historically, Congress sometimes exercised this amnesty power postelection to ensure that some of the people's chosen candidates could take office.[2] But if States were free to enforce Section 3 by barring candidates from running in the first place, Congress would be forced to exercise its disability removal power before voting begins if it wished for its decision to have any effect on the current election cycle. Perhaps a State may burden congressional authority in such a way when it exercises its "exclusive" sovereign power over its own state offices. Taylor, 178 U. S., at 571, 20 S.Ct. 890. But it is implausible to suppose that the Constitution affirmatively delegated to the States the authority to impose such a burden on congressional power with respect to candidates for federal office. Cf. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (1819) ("States have no power ... to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control, the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress").

Nor have the respondents identified any tradition of state enforcement of Section 3 against federal officeholders or candidates in the years following ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[3] Such a lack of historical precedent is generally 114 a " 'telling indication' " of a " 'severe constitutional problem' " with the asserted power. United States v. Texas, 599 U.S. 670, 677, 143 S.Ct. 1964, 216 L.Ed.2d 624 (2023) (quoting Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Company Accounting Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 505, 130 S.Ct. 3138, 177 L.Ed.2d 706 (2010)). And it is an especially telling sign here, because as noted, States did disqualify persons from holding state offices following ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. That pattern of disqualification with respect to state, but not federal offices provides "persuasive evidence of a general understanding" that the States lacked enforcement power with respect to the latter. U. S. Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 826, 115 S.Ct. 1842.

Instead, it is Congress that has long given effect to Section 3 with respect to would-be or existing federal officeholders. Shortly after ratification of the Amendment, Congress enacted the Enforcement Act of 1870. That Act authorized federal district attorneys to bring civil actions in federal court to remove anyone holding nonlegislative office—federal or state—in violation of Section 3, and made holding or attempting to hold office in violation of Section 3 a federal crime. §§ 14, 15, 16 Stat. 143–144 (repealed, 35 Stat. 1153–1154, 62 Stat. 992–993). In the years following ratification, the House and Senate exercised their unique powers under Article I to adjudicate challenges contending *670 that certain prospective or sitting Members could not take or retain their seats due to Section 3. See Art. I, § 5, cls. 1, 2; 1 A. Hinds, Precedents of the House of Representatives §§ 459–463, pp. 470–486 (1907). And the Confiscation Act of 1862, which predated Section 3, effectively provided an additional procedure for enforcing disqualification. That law made engaging in insurrection or rebellion, among other acts, a federal 115 crime punishable by disqualification from holding office under the United States. See §§ 2, 3, 12 Stat. 590. A successor to those provisions remains on the books today. See 18 U.S.C. § 2383.

Moreover, permitting state enforcement of Section 3 against federal officeholders and candidates would raise serious questions about the scope of that power. Section 5 limits congressional legislation enforcing Section 3, because Section 5 is strictly "remedial." City of Boerne, 521 U.S. at 520, 117 S.Ct. 2157. To comply with that limitation, Congress "must tailor its legislative scheme to remedying or preventing" the specific conduct the relevant provision prohibits. Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 639, 119 S.Ct. 2199, 144 L.Ed.2d 575 (1999). Section 3, unlike other provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, proscribes conduct of individuals. It bars persons from holding office after taking a qualifying oath and then engaging in insurrection or rebellion—nothing more. Any congressional legislation enforcing Section 3 must, like the Enforcement Act of 1870 and § 2383, reflect "congruence and proportionality" between preventing or remedying that conduct "and the means adopted to that end." City of Boerne, 521 U.S. at 520, 117

S.Ct. 2157. Neither we nor the respondents are aware of any other legislation by Congress to enforce Section 3. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 123.

Any state enforcement of Section 3 against federal officeholders and candidates, though, would not derive from Section 5, which confers power only on "[t]he Congress." As a result, such state enforcement might be argued to sweep more broadly than congressional enforcement could under our precedents. But the notion that the Constitution grants the States freer rein than Congress to decide how Section 3 should be enforced with respect to federal offices is simply implausible.

Finally, state enforcement of Section 3 with respect to the Presidency would raise heightened concerns. "[I]n the context 116 of a Presidential election, state-imposed restrictions implicate a uniquely important national interest." Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 794–795, 103 S.Ct. 1564, 75 L.Ed.2d 547 (1983) (footnote omitted). But state-by-state resolution of the question whether Section 3 bars a particular candidate for President from serving would be quite unlikely to yield a uniform answer consistent with the basic principle that "the President ... represent[s] all the voters in the Nation." Id., at 795, 103 S.Ct. 1564 (emphasis added).

Conflicting state outcomes concerning the same candidate could result not just from differing views of the merits, but from variations in state law governing the proceedings that are necessary to make Section 3 disqualification determinations. Some States might allow a Section 3 challenge to succeed based on a preponderance of the evidence, while others might require a heightened showing. Certain evidence (like the congressional Report on which the lower courts relied here) might be admissible in some States but inadmissible hearsay in others. Disqualification might be possible only through criminal prosecution, as opposed to expedited civil proceedings, in particular States. Indeed, in some States—unlike Colorado (or Maine, where *671 the secretary of state recently issued an order excluding former President Trump from the primary ballot)—procedures for excluding an ineligible candidate from the ballot may not exist at all. The result could well be that a single candidate would be declared ineligible in some States, but not others, based on the same conduct (and perhaps even the same factual record).

The "patchwork" that would likely result from state enforcement would "sever the direct link that the Framers found so critical between the National Government and the people of the United States" as a whole. U. S. Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 822, 115 S.Ct. 1842. But in a Presidential election "the impact of the votes cast in each State is affected by the votes cast"—or, in this case, the votes not allowed to be cast—"for the various candidates in other States." Anderson, 460 U.S. at 795, 103 S.Ct. 1564. An evolving electoral map could dramatically change the behavior of voters, parties, and States across the country, 117 in different ways and at different times. The disruption would be all the more acute—and could nullify the votes of millions and change the election result—if Section 3 enforcement were attempted after the Nation has voted. Nothing in the Constitution requires that we endure such chaos—arriving at any time or different times, up to and perhaps beyond the Inauguration.

* * *

For the reasons given, responsibility for enforcing Section 3 against federal officeholders and candidates rests with Congress and not the States. The judgment of the Colorado Supreme Court therefore cannot stand.

All nine Members of the Court agree with that result. Our colleagues writing separately further agree with many of the reasons this opinion provides for reaching it. See post, Part I (joint opinion of SOTOMAYOR, KAGAN, and JACKSON, JJ.); see also post, pp. 671 – 672 (opinion of BARRETT, J.). So far as we can tell, they object only to our taking into account the distinctive way Section 3 works and the fact that Section 5 vests in Congress the power to enforce it. These are not the only reasons the States lack power to enforce this particular constitutional provision with respect to federal offices. But they are important ones, and it is the combination of all the reasons set forth in this opinion—not, as some of our colleagues would have it, just one particular rationale—that resolves this case. In our view, each of these reasons is necessary to provide a complete explanation for the judgment the Court unanimously reaches.

The judgment of the Colorado Supreme Court is reversed.

The mandate shall issue forthwith.

It is so ordered.

Justice BARRETT, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I join Parts I and II–B of the Court's opinion. I agree that States lack the power to enforce Section 3 against Presidential 118 candidates. That principle is sufficient to resolve this case, and I would decide no more than that. This suit was brought by Colorado voters under state law in state court. It does not require us to address the complicated question whether federal legislation is the exclusive vehicle through which Section 3 can be enforced.

The majority's choice of a different path leaves the remaining Justices with a choice of how to respond. In my judgment, this is not the time to amplify disagreement with stridency. The Court has settled a politically charged issue in the volatile season of a Presidential election. Particularly in this circumstance, writings on the Court should turn the national temperature down, not up. For present purposes, our differences *672 are far less important than our unanimity: All nine Justices agree on the outcome of this case. That is the message Americans should take home.

Justice SOTOMAYOR, Justice KAGAN, and Justice JACKSON, concurring in the judgment.

"If it is not necessary to decide more to dispose of a case, then it is necessary not to decide more." Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Organization, 597 U.S. 215, 348, 142 S.Ct. 2228, 213 L.Ed.2d 545 (2022) (ROBERTS, C. J., concurring in judgment). That fundamental principle of judicial restraint is practically as old as our Republic. This Court is authorized "to say what the law is" only because "[t]hose who apply [a] rule to particular cases ... must of necessity expound and interpret that rule." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 1 Cranch 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803) (emphasis added).

Today, the Court departs from that vital principle, deciding not just this case, but challenges that might arise in the future. In this case, the Court must decide whether Colorado may keep a Presidential candidate off the ballot on the ground that he is an oathbreaking insurrectionist and thus disqualified from holding federal office under Section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Allowing Colorado to do so would, 119 we agree, create a chaotic state-by-state patchwork, at odds with our Nation's federalism principles. That is enough to resolve this case. Yet the majority goes further. Even though "[a]ll nine Members of the Court" agree that this independent and sufficient rationale resolves this case, five Justices go on. They decide novel constitutional questions to insulate this Court and petitioner from future controversy. Ante, at 671. Although only an individual State's action is at issue here, the majority opines on which federal actors can enforce Section 3, and how they must do so. The majority announces that a disqualification for insurrection can occur only when Congress enacts a particular kind of legislation pursuant to Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. In doing so, the majority shuts the door on other potential means of federal enforcement. We cannot join an opinion that decides momentous and difficult issues unnecessarily, and we therefore concur only in the judgment.

I

Our Constitution leaves some questions to the States while committing others to the Federal Government. Federalism principles embedded in that constitutional structure decide this case. States cannot use their control over the ballot to "undermine the National Government." U. S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779, 810, 115 S.Ct. 1842, 131 L.Ed.2d 881 (1995). That danger is even greater "in the context of a Presidential election." Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 794–795, 103 S.Ct. 1564, 75 L.Ed.2d 547 (1983). State restrictions in that context "implicate a uniquely important national interest" extending beyond a State's "own borders." Ibid. No doubt, States have significant "authority over presidential electors" and, in turn, Presidential elections. Chiafalo v.Washington, 591 U. S. 578, 588, 140 S.Ct. 2316, 207 L.Ed.2d 761 (2020). That power, however, is limited by "other constitutional constraint[s]," including federalism principles. Id., at 589.

The majority rests on such principles when it explains why Colorado cannot take Petitioner off the ballot. "[S]tate-by-state 120 resolution of the question whether Section 3 bars a particular candidate for President from serving," the majority explains, "would be quite unlikely to yield a uniform answer consistent with the basic principle that 'the President ... represent[s] all the *673 voters in the Nation.' " Ante, at 670 (quoting Anderson, 460 U.S. at 795, 103 S.Ct. 1564). That is especially so, the majority adds, because different States can reach "[c]onflicting ... outcomes concerning the same candidate ... not just from differing views of the merits, but from variations in state law governing the proceedings" to enforce Section 3. Ante, at 670.

The contrary conclusion that a handful of officials in a few States could decide the Nation's next President would be especially surprising with respect to Section 3. The Reconstruction Amendments "were specifically designed as an expansion of federal power and an intrusion on state sovereignty." City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 179, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 (1980). Section 3 marked the first time the Constitution placed substantive limits on a State's authority to choose its own officials. Given that context, it would defy logic for Section 3 to give States new powers to determine who may hold the Presidency. Cf. ante, at 668 ("It would be incongruous to read this particular Amendment as granting the States the power—silently no less—to disqualify a candidate for federal office").

That provides a secure and sufficient basis to resolve this case. To allow Colorado to take a presidential candidate off the ballot under Section 3 would imperil the Framers' vision of "a Federal Government directly responsible to the people." U. S. Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 821, 115 S.Ct. 1842. The Court should have started and ended its opinion with this conclusion.

II

Yet the Court continues on to resolve questions not before us. In a case involving no federal action whatsoever, the 121 Court opines on how federal enforcement of Section 3 must proceed. Congress, the majority says, must enact legislation under Section 5 prescribing the procedures to " ' "ascertain[ ] what particular individuals" ' " should be disqualified. Ante, at 666 (quoting Griffin's Case, 11 F.Cas. 7, 26 (No. 5,815) (CC Va. 1869) (Chase, Circuit Justice)). These musings are as inadequately supported as they are gratuitous.

To start, nothing in Section 3's text supports the majority's view of how federal disqualification efforts must operate. Section 3 states simply that "[n]o person shall" hold certain positions and offices if they are oathbreaking insurrectionists. Amdt. 14. Nothing in that unequivocal bar suggests that implementing legislation enacted under Section 5 is "critical" (or, for that matter, what that word means in this context). Ante, at 666 – 667. In fact, the text cuts the opposite way. Section 3 provides that when an oathbreaking insurrectionist is disqualified, "Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability." It is hard to understand why the Constitution would require a congressional supermajority to remove a disqualification if a simple majority could nullify Section 3's operation by repealing or declining to pass implementing legislation. Even petitioner's lawyer acknowledged the "tension" in Section 3 that the majority's view creates. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 31.

Similarly, nothing else in the rest of the Fourteenth Amendment supports the majority's view. Section 5 gives Congress the "power to enforce [the Amendment] by appropriate legislation." Remedial legislation of any kind, however, is not required. All the Reconstruction Amendments (including the due process and equal protection guarantees and prohibition of slavery) "are self-executing," meaning that they do not depend on legislation. City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 524, 117 S.Ct. 2157, 138 L.Ed.2d 624 (1997); see Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 20, 3 S.Ct. 18, 27 L.Ed. 835 (1883). Similarly, other constitutional *674 rules of disqualification, like the two-term limit on the Presidency, do not require 122 implementing legislation. See, e.g., Art. II, § 1, cl. 5 (Presidential Qualifications); Amdt. 22 (Presidential Term Limits). Nor does the majority suggest otherwise. It simply creates a special rule for the insurrection disability in Section 3.

The majority is left with next to no support for its requirement that a Section 3 disqualification can occur only pursuant to legislation enacted for that purpose. It cites Griffin's Case, but that is a nonprecedential, lower court opinion by a single Justice in his capacity as a circuit judge. See ante, at 666 – 667 (quoting 11 F.Cas. at 26). Once again, even petitioner's lawyer distanced himself from fully embracing this case as probative of Section 3's meaning. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 35–36. The majority also cites Senator Trumbull's statements that Section 3 " 'provide[d] no means for enforcing' " itself. Ante, at 667 (quoting Cong. Globe, 41st Cong., 1st Sess., 626 (1869)). The majority, however, neglects to mention the Senator's view that "[i]t is the [F]ourteenth [A]mendment that prevents a person from holding office," with the proposed legislation simply "affor[ding] a more efficient and speedy remedy" for effecting the disqualification. Cong. Globe, 41st Cong., 1st Sess., at 626–627.

Ultimately, under the guise of providing a more "complete explanation for the judgment," ante, at 671, the majority resolves many unsettled questions about Section 3. It forecloses judicial enforcement of that provision, such as might occur when a party is prosecuted by an insurrectionist and raises a defense on that score. The majority further holds that any legislation to enforce this provision must prescribe certain procedures " 'tailor[ed]' " to Section 3, ante, at 669 – 670, ruling out enforcement under general federal statutes requiring the government to comply with the law. By resolving these and other questions, the majority attempts to insulate all alleged insurrectionists from future challenges to their holding federal office.

123
* * *

"What it does today, the Court should have left undone." Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98, 158, 121 S.Ct. 525, 148 L.Ed.2d 388 (2000) (BREYER, J., dissenting). The Court today needed to resolve only a single question: whether an individual State may keep a Presidential candidate found to have engaged in insurrection off its ballot. The majority resolves much more than the case before us. Although federal enforcement of Section 3 is in no way at issue, the majority announces novel rules for how that enforcement must operate. It reaches out to decide Section 3 questions not before us, and to foreclose future efforts to disqualify a Presidential candidate under that provision. In a sensitive case crying out for judicial restraint, it abandons that course.

Section 3 serves an important, though rarely needed, role in our democracy. The American people have the power to vote for and elect candidates for national office, and that is a great and glorious thing. The men who drafted and ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, however, had witnessed an "insurrection [and] rebellion" to defend slavery. § 3. They wanted to ensure that those who had participated in that insurrection, and in possible future insurrections, could not return to prominent roles. Today, the majority goes beyond the necessities of this case to limit how Section 3 can bar an oathbreaking insurrectionist from becoming President. Although we agree that Colorado cannot enforce Section 3, we protest the majority's effort to use this case to define the limits of federal enforcement of that provision. Because we would decide only the *675 issue before us, we concur only in the judgment.

All Citations

601 U.S. 100, 144 S.Ct. 662, 218 L.Ed.2d 1, 2024 Daily Journal D.A.R. 1887, 30 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 53

Footnotes

1 The Elections Clause directs, in relevant part, that "[t]he Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof." Art. I, § 4, cl. 1. The Electors Clause similarly provides that "[e]ach State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors," who in turn elect the President. Art. II, § 1, cl. 2.

2 Shortly after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, for instance, Congress enacted a private bill to remove the Section 3 disability of Nelson Tift of Georgia, who had recently been elected to represent the State in Congress. See ch. 393, 15 Stat. 427. Tift took his seat in Congress immediately thereafter. See Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., 4499–4500 (1868). Congress similarly acted postelection to remove the disabilities of persons elected to state and local offices. See Cong. Globe, 40th Cong., 3d

Sess., 29–30, 120–121 (1868); ch. 5, 15 Stat. 435–436.

[3] We are aware of just one example of state enforcement against a would-be federal officer. In 1868, the Governor of Georgia refused to commission John Christy, who had won the most votes in a congressional election, because—in the Governor's view—Section 3 made Christy ineligible to serve. But the Governor's determination was not final; a committee of the House reviewed Christy's qualifications itself and recommended that he not be seated. The full House never acted on the matter, and Christy was never seated. See 1 A. Hinds, Precedents of the House of Representatives § 459, pp. 470–472 (1907).

65 N.Y.2d 344
Court of Appeals of New York.

UNDER 21, Catholic Home Bureau for Dependent Children, et al., Appellants,
v.
CITY OF NEW YORK et al., Respondents.
SALVATION ARMY, Appellant,
v.
Edward I. KOCH, as Mayor of the City of New York, et al., Respondents.
AGUDATH ISRAEL OF AMERICA, Appellant,
v.
CITY OF NEW YORK et al., Respondents.

June 28, 1985.

Synopsis
Three actions were brought challenging validity of mayor's executive order forbidding those who secure contracts with city from refusing to hire people simply on the basis of sexual orientation or affectional preference. Defendants appealed from so much of three orders and judgments of the New York County Supreme Court, Alvin F. Klein, J., as granted each of plaintiffs' motions for summary judgment. The Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Asch, J., 108 A.D.2d 250, 488 N.Y.S. 2d 669, modified judgments, and appeal was taken. The Court of Appeals, Wachtler, C.J., held that the mayor had no authority to initiate policy.

Order of appellate division modified.

Meyer, J., filed a dissenting opinion.

Attorneys and Law Firms

345 523 2 John P. Hale, New York City, and Patrick B. Silva, for appellants in the first above-entitled action.

346 Joseph Polizzotto, William J. Moss, Edward P. O'Keefe and William D. Smith, New York City, for appellant in the second above-entitled action.

347 David Zwiebel and Aaron Twerski, New York City, for appellant in the third above-entitled action.

Frederick A.O. Schwarz, Jr., Corp. Counsel, New York City (Alfred Weinstein, Dennis deLeon, Michael S. Adler and Paul Rephen, New York City, of counsel), for respondents in the first, second and third above-entitled actions.

348 Nathan Lewin, Washington, D.C., and Dennis Rapps, New York City, for the National Jewish Commission on Law and Public Affairs, amicus curiae. I. The practice and toleration of homosexuality is condemned by Jewish religious law.

349 David L. Benetar and Stanley Schair, New York City, for The New York Chamber of Commerce and Industry, amicus curiae.

Gregory K. Hiestand, Joy D. Oberman, Robert E. Williams, New York City, Douglas S. McDowell and Lorence L. Kessler for The Equal Employment Advisory Council, amicus curiae.

350 Robert Abrams, Atty. Gen., Albany (Robert Hermann, O. Peter Sherwood, Albany, Rosemarie Rhodes, Lawrence S.

Kahn and Debra L. Raskin, New York City, of counsel), for the State of New York, amicus curiae.

Thomas B. Stoddard and Madeline Kochen, New York City, for New York Civil Liberties Union, amicus curiae.

351 Robert L. Becker, Rosaria Esperon, New York City, Julius L. Chambers, Charlotte, N.C., Charles Steven Ralston, Ronald L. Ellis, David Seth Michaels, David Raff, Margaret Burnham, Stan Mark, Marsha Levick, New York City, Barbara Rochman, Sarah Wunsch, Abby Rubenfeld, Madeline Kochen, Thomas B. Stoddard and Douglas Kellner, New York City, for Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, Inc., and others, amici curiae.

352 Richard E. Feldman, New York City, for Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, Inc., amicus curiae.

353 OPINION OF THE COURT

WACHTLER, Chief Judge.

The question on this appeal is whether the Mayor of the City of New York has the authority to promulgate an Executive Order prohibiting employment discrimination by city contractors on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference." The Appellate Division held that the Mayor had this power. We disagree and hold that because of the separation of powers delineated in the City Charter, the Mayor has no authority to initiate such a policy.

524 I.

On April 25, 1980, the Mayor of the City of New York issued Executive Order No. 50 "to ensure compliance with the equal *3 employment opportunity requirements of City, State and Federal law in City contracting" (Executive Order No. 50 § 1). The Executive Order applies to virtually every contract with the city, and requires that those entering into such contracts agree to ensure "equal employment opportunity" in all of their employment decisions. "Equal employment opportunity," as defined in section 3(i) of the order, includes not discriminating on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference," terms which all parties agree refer to a person being homosexual or bisexual rather than heterosexual. The order provides that the Mayor's Bureau of Labor Services has the responsibility to implement, monitor compliance with, and enforce these equal employment requirements.

Pursuant to this grant of authority, the Bureau of Labor Services promulgated regulations, effective January 21, 1982, which require that specific language implementing Executive Order No. 50 be inserted into contracts with the city. In the required language, a contractor agrees, among other things, not to discriminate in any employment decision on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference" and to state that condition in all solicitations or advertisements for employees.

Agudath Israel and the Salvation Army, the plaintiffs in two of three actions consolidated on appeal, are not-for-profit religious and charitable corporations. Both have annual contracts with the city, pursuant to which they provide social services 354 such as day care facilities, counseling services, and senior citizen centers, and the city pays a portion of the costs of such services. The plaintiffs in the third action (the "Under 21" action) are not-for-profit corporations under the sponsorship of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of New York, and they too provide social service programs partially funded through annual contracts with the city.

The plaintiffs in all three actions object on religious grounds to signing a contract in which they would agree not to discriminate on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference," and have advised the city that they will not sign any contracts which contain such a condition. The city, in turn, has notified the plaintiffs that the contracts for the services they provide will not be renewed unless plaintiffs are in full compliance with Executive Order No. 50 and the Bureau of Labor Services' regulations promulgated thereunder, including the provision for insertion of the objected-to language into all the contracts.

Faced with the expiration of their contracts, plaintiffs brought three separate actions, each seeking a declaration that the portion of Executive Order No. 50 pertaining to "sexual orientation or affectional preference" is beyond the scope of the Mayor's authority, and thus void, and a permanent injunction against enforcement of this part of the order and the regulations implementing it.[1]

The plaintiffs in all three actions moved for summary judgment, and the motions were referred to the same Justice at Special Term. Special Term held that the challenged portion of Executive Order No. 50 was an impermissible usurpation of legislative 525 power by Mayor Koch, and, in three separate judgments, declared that portion unlawful and permanently enjoined the city and the Mayor from enforcing it.

355 4 The Appellate Division consolidated the three appeals by the defendants,[2] and in a split decision, disagreed with Special Term's conclusion that the Mayor had exceeded his authority insofar as Executive Order No. 50 related to "sexual orientation or affectional preference". Rejecting the separation of powers concerns expressed by Special Term and the dissenting Justice at the Appellate Division, the majority at the Appellate Division characterized those principles as "vestigial relics * * * relied upon for State court holdings in fewer and fewer desultory cases", and concluded that the Mayor "did no more than make express the policies and principles [of equal protection] already firmly embedded in our State and Federal Constitutions." (108 A.D.2d 250 at pp. 258–259, 488 N.Y.S.2d 669.) Upon "search of the record," the Appellate Division granted defendants summary judgment declaring Executive Order No. 50 and the regulations promulgated thereunder constitutional and valid.[3]

II.

The plaintiffs' contention that the Mayor lacked the authority to proscribe discrimination by city contractors on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference" is a facial attack on this portion of Executive Order No. 50, and our resolution of the case does not depend on the status of the plaintiffs as religious organizations. Nor do we decide today the extent to which New York City may regulate the employment practices of those with whom it does business. Rather, the sole issue we address is the extent of the authority in this area of the chief executive officer of the city, the Mayor, and specifically, whether the executive may forbid discrimination by city contractors on a ground not covered by any legislative enactment.

One of the fundamental principles of government underlying our Federal Constitution is the distribution of governmental power into three branches—the executive, legislative and judicial—to prevent too strong a concentration of authority in one person or body (see, Youngstown Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 72 S.Ct. 863, 96 L.Ed. 1153; id., at pp. 634, 635, 72 S.Ct. at pp. 869, 870 [Jackson, J., concurring]; 1 Story, Commentaries on the Constitution § 525 [5th ed.]). We have consistently recognized that this principle of separation of powers among the three branches is included by implication in the pattern of 356 government adopted by the State of New York (see, e.g., Matter of LaGuardia v. Smith, 288 N.Y. 1, 5–6, 41 N.E.2d 153; Matter of County of Oneida v. Berle, 49 N.Y.2d 515, 522, 427 N.Y.S.2d 407, 404 N.E.2d 133), and, contrary to the Appellate Division's characterization of the doctrine as a "vestigial relic," we have very recently unanimously reaffirmed its continuing vitality (see, Subcontractors Trade Assn. v. Koch, 62 N.Y.2d 422, 427, 477 N.Y.S.2d 120, 465 N.E.2d 840). While the doctrine of separation of powers does not require the maintenance of " 'three airtight departments of government' " (Nixon v. Administrator of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 443, 97 S.Ct. 2777, 2790, 53 L.Ed.2d 867; 1 Story, Commentaries on the Constitution § 525, supra), it does require that no one branch be allowed to arrogate unto itself powers residing entirely in another branch (Youngstown Co. v. Sawyer, supra; Matter of Nicholas v. Kahn, 47 N.Y.2d 24, 30–31, 416 N.Y.S.2d 565, 389 N.E.2d 1086).

Of course, the pattern of government established for New York City by the City Charter is not identical to that of the United States or the State of New York. Still, the City Charter does provide for distinct legislative and executive branches: the 526 City Council "shall be vested with the legislative power of the city, and shall be the local legislative body of the city" (New York City Charter, ch. 2, § 21), while the Mayor "shall be the chief executive officer 5 of the city" (id., ch. 1, § 3). Thus, our prior decisions have held that, no matter how well-intentioned his actions may be, the Mayor may not unlawfully infringe upon the legislative powers reserved to the City Council (see, Subcontractors Trade Assn. v. Koch, supra; Matter of Fullilove v. Beame, 48 N.Y.2d 376, 423 N.Y.S.2d 144, 398 N.E.2d 765; Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay, 39 N.Y.2d 641, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595).

The authority conferred upon the Mayor, as chief executive officer, does, of course, include the power to enforce and implement legislative enactments (Subcontractors Trade Assn. v. Koch, 62 N.Y.2d at p. 427, 477 N.Y.S.2d 120, 465 N.E.2d 840, supra). Indeed, if the City Council were to enact valid legislation proscribing discrimination by city contractors, or employers within the city generally, on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference," the Mayor would have the duty to enforce it. The City Council, however, has never enacted any such law despite the introduction of bills which would have done so. The New York City Human Rights Act, in defining the types of "unlawful discriminatory practices" which an employer may not engage in, contains no reference to "sexual orientation or affectional preference," or to any similar classifications (Administrative Code of City of New York § B1–7.0). Similarly, Administrative Code § 343–8.0, which restricts discriminatory employment practices by many city contractors, contains no such classification.

357 The relevant provisions of State law are closely akin to those of the city. The State Human Rights Law, which covers employment discrimination (Executive Law § 296), does not include among the protected classifications anything analogous to "sexual orientation or affectional preference," nor does Labor Law § 220–e, which mandates the inclusion of an antidiscrimination provision in most State and municipal contracts, encompass any such category. Finally, there is no Federal statute which the Mayor might be implementing. Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act (42 U.S.C. § 2000e), the employment discrimination provision of Federal civil rights legislation, does not include homosexuals or bisexuals among the protected classes of employees (see, e.g., DeSantis v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 608 F.2d 327; Blum v. Gulf Oil Corp., 597 F.2d 936).

The issue we face, therefore, is whether the Mayor, in including within the coverage of Executive Order No. 50 "sexual orientation or affectional preference," despite the fact there is no legislative enactment prohibiting employment discrimination on such a basis, acted within the scope of his authority as the chief executive officer of the city.

III.

Defendants contend that the Mayor's authority to promulgate the challenged portion of Executive Order No. 50 stems from two aspects of his functions as executive—the power to regulate the terms of city contracts, and the power or duty to prevent the city from engaging in or funding discriminatory conduct which violates the equal protection clauses of the Federal and State Constitutions. We address each of these arguments in turn.[4]

A.

Under section 8(a) of the City Charter, the Mayor has all of the residual powers of 527 the city. Thus, in Matter of Bauch v. City of New York, 21 N.Y.2d 599, 605, 289 N.Y.S.2d 951, 237 N.E.2d 211, we noted that the Mayor had the authority to enter into contracts 6 on the city's behalf and to determine the manner of transacting its business and affairs. Defendants contend that this power to regulate the terms of the 358 city contracts gives the Mayor the authority to forbid parties who contract with the city from discriminating on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference".

In Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay, 39 N.Y.2d 641, supra and Matter of Fullilove v. Beame, 48 N.Y.2d 376, 423 N.Y.S.2d 144, 398 N.E.2d 765, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595, supra, we held that attempts by the Mayor of New York City to mandate some type of affirmative action in employment decisions by city contractors were impermissible infringements upon the legislative power because they utilized a remedial device which, rather than implementing a legislative policy, enacted a new policy not embraced by the City Council. Defendants rely on language in Broidrick and Fullilove approving executive action which " 'only would enlarge the pool of persons eligible for employment based on discrimination-free merit selection' " (Matter of Fullilove v. Beame, 48 N.Y.2d, at p. 379, supra, 423 N.Y.S.2d 144, 398 N.E.2d 765; Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay, 39 N.Y.2d, at p. 649, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595, supra). This statement, however, was not intended to authorize the executive to enact his own views of what persons should be protected from employment discrimination without regard to the laws enacted by the Legislature. Rather, approval of enlarging the pool of employees was in reference to an executive implementing appropriate remedial relief to enforce a legislative policy.

Two other decisions from this court further explicate this distinction. In Rapp v. Carey, 44 N.Y.2d 157, 404 N.Y.S.2d 565, 375 N.E.2d 745, we invalidated a Governor's Executive Order requiring a broad range of State employees within the executive branch, including many not subject to removal by the Governor, to file financial disclosure statements and to abstain from various political and business activities not otherwise prohibited. We held that the order in question went beyond the powers of the Governor, including the power to implement legislation, and unlawfully "assume[d] the power of the Legislature to set State policy in an area of concededly increasing public concern" (id., 44 N.Y.2d, at p. 160, 404 N.Y.S.2d 565, 375 N.E.2d 745). Most recently, in Subcontractors Trade Assn. v. Koch (supra), we held that the Mayor of New York City did not have the authority to mandate that at least 10% of all construction contracts awarded by the city be given to "locally based enterprises," as such an order went beyond the Mayor's "function of implementing general Charter-conferred powers" (id., 62 N.Y.2d, at p. 429, 477 N.Y.S.2d 120, 465 N.E.2d 840). Of particular relevance here is our recognition in Subcontractors that "the general power to enter into contracts which is bestowed upon the executive branch of government ordinarily cannot serve as a basis for creating a remedial plan for which the executive never received a grant of legislative power" (id., at p. 428, 477 N.Y.S.2d 120, 465 N.E.2d 840).

359 Thus, as Special Term recognized, our prior cases hold that an executive may not usurp the legislative function by enacting social policies not adopted by the Legislature. Private employers in this State are free to make employment decisions on whatever basis they choose, as long as the basis is not prohibited by law (cf. O'Connor v. Eastman Kodak, 65 N.Y.2d 724, 492 N.Y.S.2d 9, 481 N.E.2d 549; Murphy v. American Home Prods. Corp., 58 N.Y.2d 293, 461 N.Y.S.2d 232, 448 N.E.2d 86). Congress, the State Legislature and the City Council have enacted laws restricting the bases upon which most private employers may discriminate. None of these legislative bodies, however, has chosen to include a person's "sexual orientation or affectional preference" among the proscribed bases, nor have they established any general requirement that employment decisions must be merit-based. An attempt by the 528 Mayor to broaden the class of persons protected from discrimination by private employers, or to require that all employment decisions be merit-based, however commendable, is an enactment of policy which *7 the City Charter leaves to the City Council.[5] Accordingly, the challenged portion of Executive Order No. 50 does not fall within the Mayor's Charter-conferred power to regulate the terms of city contracts.

B.

The second basis put forth by the defendants for upholding the validity of the portion of Executive Order No. 50 covering "sexual orientation or affectional preference" is that the Mayor is properly acting to ensure compliance with constitutional guarantees of equal protection. The Appellate Division majority accepted this argument, concluding that the Mayor has the constitutional obligation, stemming from the equal protection 360 clauses of the Federal and State Constitutions, to prevent all organizations contracting with the city from engaging in invidious discriminatory employment practices, which would include discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

Section 1 of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution provides in part that "No State shall * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."[6] This provision extends, of course, to subdivisions of a State, such as New York City (see, e.g., Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 89 S.Ct. 557, 21 L.Ed.2d 616). Plaintiffs contend, however, that the Mayor is attempting to "enforce" the equal protection requirements of the 14th Amendment in a manner which is reserved to Congress. Section 5 of the 14th Amendment states that "Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this [Amendment]." The significance of this section is that it gives to Congress some authority to effectively enlarge the substantive reach of 529 the equal protection clause by enacting laws prohibiting certain action even though such action would not otherwise be found by the judiciary to violate equal protection (see, 8 Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 86 S.Ct. 1717, 16 L.Ed.2d 828; United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 774, 86 S.Ct. 1170, 1186, 16 L.Ed.2d 239 [Brennan, J., concurring]; Tribe, American Constitutional Law, at 28–29, 265–267; cf. City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 100 S.Ct. 1548, 64 L.Ed.2d 119 [enforcement of 15th Amend.]).

Although the Mayor does have a responsibility to uphold the United States Constitution, and a duty to prevent actions by the city which would violate the 14th Amendment's requirement of equal protection, as interpreted by the judiciary, he does not have the power to expand the coverage of the equal protection clause. The Mayor, unlike Congress, has no authority to prohibit 361 discrimination merely because he feels that the prohibition furthers the goals of the 14th Amendment. His duty extends only to the prohibition of such discrimination if it in fact violates that provision. Accordingly, the Mayor's inclusion of "sexual orientation or affectional preference" in Executive Order No. 50 can be upheld under the 14th Amendment only if either discrimination on this basis by city contractors would violate the equal protection clause, or if the city would be violating the clause by contracting with those who so discriminate.

The prohibitions in the 14th Amendment are directed at the "State," and they " 'erect no shield against merely private conduct, however discriminatory or wrongful' " (Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1002, 102 S.Ct. 2777, 2784, 73 L.Ed.2d 534, quoting Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 13, 68 S.Ct. 836, 842, 92 L.Ed. 1161; see, Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 349, 95 S.Ct. 449, 452, 42 L.Ed.2d 477). In order for a court to conclude that there is "State action," thus making equal protection requirements applicable, the alleged discriminatory conduct of a private employer must be "fairly attributable to the State" (Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 937, 102 S.Ct. 2744, 2753, 73 L.Ed.2d 482; see, Matter of Wilson, 59 N.Y.2d 461, 476, 465 N.Y.S.2d 900, 452 N.E.2d 1228).

The Supreme Court has yet to formulate a single test which can be employed to determine whether there is the requisite degree of State involvement (see, Reitman v. Mulkey, 387 U.S. 369, 378, 87 S.Ct. 1627, 1632, 18 L.Ed.2d 830), and all the facts and circumstances of a particular case must be considered (Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth., 365 U.S. 715, 722, 81 S.Ct. 856, 860, 6 L.Ed.2d 45). It is clear, however, that the mere fact that a private entity contracts with the government (see, e.g., Blum v. Yaretsky, supra), is regulated by the government (see, e.g., Jackson v. Metropolitan Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 95 S.Ct. 449, supra), or performs a function also performed by the government (see, e.g., Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 102 S.Ct. 2764, 73 L.Ed.2d 418), is not enough by itself to treat it as a State actor. Rather, there must be some basis for finding that the State is "responsible" for the private conduct (Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S., at p. 1004, 102 S.Ct., at p. 2785, supra), either because it maintains such a close relationship with the private actor that it can be viewed as a joint participant in all decisions of the latter (see, Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth., 365 U.S. 715, 81 S.Ct. 856, supra), because it allows the private actor to perform a function traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the State (see, e.g., Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296, 86 S.Ct. 486, 15 L.Ed.2d 373), or because it requires or otherwise encourages the challenged conduct of the private actor (see, e.g., Peterson v. City of Greenville, 373 U.S. 244, 83 S.Ct. 1119, 10 L.Ed.2d 323).

There are no facts or circumstances pointed to by defendants or otherwise apparent which could make the city responsible for the employment decisions of the plaintiffs or of city contractors 362 generally. The Supreme Court's recent decision in Rendell-Baker v. Kohn (supra), virtually 530 compels the conclusion that their conduct is not attributable to the city and thus cannot be said to violate the 14th Amendment. In Rendell-Baker, the entity in question was a privately operated high school in Massachusetts 9 for maladjusted students. Virtually all of the school's students were referred to it by city school committees and the State, and pursuant to contracts with these governmental entities, the school received funding which paid for most of the costs of educating these students. In an action brought by a discharged employee against the school, the Supreme Court held that the school's personnel decisions were not State action, even though it received public funds, its business consisted almost exclusively of performing public contracts, and it performed a "public function," where the government did not influence or coerce those decisions.

Thus, Executive Order No. 50, in prohibiting discrimination by city contractors on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference," is not prohibiting conduct covered by the 14th Amendment. The defendants contend, however, that even if the employment decisions of organizations contracting with the city are not State action, the city itself would be in violation of the 14th Amendment if it contracts with an entity which discriminates on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference," and the Mayor, therefore, is fulfilling his duty to prevent this violation. This contention is superficially appealing, but cannot withstand closer analysis.

Neither this court nor the Supreme Court has ever held that the government may have no contacts with a private entity which discriminates or otherwise acts in a manner in which the government itself could not. Furthermore, while there is a distinction between seeking to hold a private actor responsible under the 14th Amendment for discriminatory conduct and seeking to enjoin governmental involvement with that actor (Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S., at pp. 1003–1004, 102 S.Ct., at pp. 2784–2785, supra; Note, State Action: Theories For Applying Constitutional Restrictions To Private Activity, 74 Colum.L.Rev. 656, 698–699), the considerations of State action applicable to the former are also relevant to the latter (Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S., at p. 1004, 102 S.Ct., at p. 2785, supra).

Defendants rely heavily on the Supreme Court's decision in Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 93 S.Ct. 2804, 37 L.Ed.2d 723, in which the court enjoined the State of Mississippi from lending textbooks to private schools with racially discriminatory admissions policies. The court concluded that, although the textbook lending program 363 had not been implemented in order to further racial segregation, as it applied to all private schools and had begun prior to the desegregation of the public schools, the State was granting "tangible financial aid [which] has a significant tendency to facilitate, reinforce, and support private discrimination" (id., 413 U.S., at p. 466, 93 S.Ct., at p. 2811).

There are several crucial distinctions between Norwood and this case. To begin, the Supreme Court found that the State's action in Norwood was effectively promoting the discrimination by the private actors (see, Gilmore v. City of Montgomery, 417 U.S. 556, 568–569, 94 S.Ct. 2416, 2423–2424, 41 L.Ed.2d 304). In contrast, there is no evidence that the city, by contracting for goods or services with a private organization, would be promoting any discriminatory acts by that organization (cf. Novack, Rotunda & Young, Constitutional Law, at 520 [2d ed]). Additionally, while the State in Norwood was gratuitously providing aid to the private entities, the city, in entering into contracts, is purchasing items it requires or fulfilling obligations it has, thus further negating any assertion that it is promoting the discriminatory acts.

Perhaps the most significant distinction between Norwood and this case is that the former involved governmental entanglement in racial discrimination. The Supreme Court has consistently recognized that the central purpose underlying the equal protection clause was to prevent governmental conduct discriminating on the 531 basis of race, and that any such discrimination is subject to the most exacting scrutiny (see, e.g., Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429, 104 S.Ct. 1879, 1881–1882, 80 L.Ed.2d 421; *10 Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 239, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 2047, 48 L.Ed.2d 597). Consequently, it has become apparent that where racial discrimination by a private actor is involved, a lesser degree of State involvement than would otherwise be required will support a finding of "State action" (see, Adickes v. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 190–191, 90 S.Ct. 1598, 1620–1621, 26 L.Ed.2d 142 [Brennan, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part]; Taylor v. Consolidated Edison Co., 552 F.2d 39, 42, cert. denied 434 U.S. 845, 98 S.Ct. 147, 54 L.Ed.2d 111; Note, State Action: Theories For Applying Constitutional Restrictions To Private Activity, 74 Colum.L.Rev. 656, 657–658, 661). More generally, government has been permitted fewer contacts with private actors engaged in racial discrimination than with those otherwise acting in a manner which the government itself could not (see, e.g., Granfield v. Catholic Univ., 530 F.2d 1035, 1046, n. 29, cert.denied 429 U.S. 821, 97 S.Ct. 68, 50 L.Ed.2d 81; compare, e.g., title VI of the Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000d [prohibiting racial discrimination in any activity or program receiving Federal financial assistance, without exception], with title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, 364 20 U.S.C. § 1681*et seq.* [prohibiting sex discrimination in any educational program or activity receiving this assistance, but with several exemptions]; Norwood v. Harrison, supra, with Board of Educ. v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236, 88 S.Ct. 1923, 20 L.Ed.2d 1060).

Courts have uniformly refused to apply the same level of scrutiny applied to racial classifications in determining equal protection challenges to classifications based on sexual orientation (see, e.g., Rich v. Secretary of Army, 735 F.2d 1220, 1229; Hatheway v. Secretary of Army, 641 F.2d 1376, 1382, cert. denied 454 U.S. 864, 102 S.Ct. 324, 70 L.Ed.2d 164; DeSantis v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 608 F.2d, at p. 332, supra). We need not decide now whether some level of "heightened scrutiny" would be applied to governmental discrimination based on sexual orientation (see, Hatheway v. Secretary of Army, 641 F.2d, at p. 1382, supra; Note, An Argument for the Application of Equal Protection Heightened Scrutiny to Classifications Based on Homosexuality, 57 S.Cal.L.Rev. 797, 810–834; Note, Challenging Sexual Preference Discrimination in Private Employment, 41 Ohio St.L.J. 501, 513–514). Rather, we conclude only that the equal protection clause does not ordinarily prevent the city from contracting with private employers who discriminate on this basis, as the existence of the contract would not, by itself, make the city "responsible" for the private employment decisions so as to invoke constitutional protections (see, Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S., at p. 1004, 102 S.Ct., at p. 2785, supra). Thus, we reject defendants' contention that the prohibition in Executive Order No. 50 against discrimination by city contractors on the basis of "sexual orientation or affectional preference" is necessary to prevent the city from aiding or engaging in a violation of the 14th Amendment.

As we have found that the Mayor lacked any authority to promulgate the challenged portion of Executive Order No. 50, we hold that this portion was an unlawful usurpation of the legislative power of the City Council. Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be modified by reinstating the orders and judgments at Special Term.

MEYER, Judge (dissenting).

In concluding that the Mayor of New York City is not empowered by Constitution, Federal or State, or statute to bar those contracting with the city from discriminating in employment on a basis unrelated to bona fide occupational qualification, the majority ignores the difference between hiring quotas affirmatively imposed and a negative ban on arbitrary discrimination, and drastically extends this court's prior decisions concerning the Mayor's power with respect to city 365 contracts (532 Subcontractors Trade Assn. v. Koch, 62 N.Y.2d 422, 477 N.Y.S.2d 120, 465 N.E.2d 840; Matter of Fullilove v. Beame, 48 N.Y.2d 376, 423 N.Y.S.2d 144, 398 N.E.2d 765; *11 Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay, 39 N.Y.2d 641, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595). I, therefore, respectfully dissent.

The conclusion that neither Constitution authorizes the Mayor to limit contracts with the city to entities that do not engage in arbitrary discrimination turns on the concept that the programs contracted for do not involve "State action." There are a number of problems with that conclusion, however. First, plaintiffs' challenge is to the facial validity of Executive Order No. 50 insofar as it affects all city contractors. Such contracts cover a broad range of mandated and discretionary services; as to the present plaintiffs alone, from counseling to senior citizen centers to foster care and adoption services. Foster care institutions of the same type as are involved here have, in fact, been found to be engaged in "State action" subject to the requirements of the Federal equal protection clause (Perez v. Sugarman, 499 F.2d 761), and in light of the total control over a child's life that the city delegates to such institutions (as I have more fully outlined in Torres v. Little Flower Children's Servs., 64 N.Y.2d 119, 130–132, 485 N.Y.S.2d 15, 474 N.E.2d 223), the question whether their action is "State action" is not governed by the Supreme Court's decision in Rendell-Baker v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 102 S.Ct. 2764, regarding a private day school, which the majority deems controlling.

Second, whether a different standard of State action should apply under the equal protection clause of the State Constitution (art I, § 11) than the test applied under the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution is not as simple as footnote 5 in the majority opinion would make it appear. While we held in 1949 that the same standard would apply (Dorsey v. Stuyvesant Town Corp., 299 N.Y. 512, 530–531, 87 N.E.2d 541, cert. denied 339 U.S. 981, 70 S.Ct. 1019, 94 L.Ed. 1385), we have not had occasion to consider the question since then[1] and it should be reexamined in light of the court's decision in Sharrock v. Dell Buick-Cadillac, 45 N.Y.2d 152, 408 N.Y.S.2d 39, 379 N.E.2d 1169.

We held in Sharrock that a lesser degree of State involvement was required to trigger the due process clause of the State Constitution (art I, § 6) than would be required under the 14th Amendment (45 N.Y.2d, at pp. 159–161, 408 N.Y.S.2d 39, 379 N.E.2d 1169). That holding was based in part on the absence of any reference to State action in the text of the State constitutional provision (id., at p. 160, 408 N.Y.S.2d 39, 379 N.E.2d 1169). There is a similar absence of any explicit State action requirement in the 366 State equal protection clause.[2] Furthermore, because a long line of authority holds that the protection of a due process clause contains within it the requirement of equal protection (Examining Bd. v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 601, 96 S.Ct. 2264, 2280, 49 L.Ed.2d 65; Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 638, n. 2, 95 S.Ct. 1225, 1228, n. 2, 43 L.Ed.2d 514; Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677, 680, n. 5, 93 S.Ct. 1764, 1767, n. 5, 36 L.Ed.2d 583; Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 641–642, 89 S.Ct. 1322, 1335–1336, 22 L.Ed.2d 600; Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163, 168, 84 S.Ct. 1187, 1190, 12 L.Ed.2d 218; Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 499, 74 S.Ct. 693, 694, 98 L.Ed. 884), it makes little sense to have differing standards for State action under the State equal protection clause and the State due 533 process clause. Yet, by accepting plaintiffs' facial challenge to Executive Order No. 50, the court rejects any attempt to *12 apply the State equal protection clause to particular city contracts.

If, however, it be accepted that neither constitutional provision is controlling, there remains the question whether the Mayor can adopt the policy that the city not contract with those who refuse to agree that they will not discriminate arbitrarily in employment decisions. As the court below makes clear, there can be no question that across-the-board discrimination against homosexuals, unrelated to any bona fide qualification for a particular position, is invidious and irrational. Nor is there any question that Executive Order No. 50 permits a contractor to discriminate as to any of the prohibited categories (race, creed, color, national origin, sex, age, handicap, marital status, sexual orientation or affectional preference) if it can be shown to be legitimately related to the requirement of a particular job. Thus, Executive Order No. 50, by barring discrimination against candidates meriting employment for reasons irrational because unrelated to qualification for employment, does no more than enforce merit selection.

In Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay, 39 N.Y.2d 641, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595, supra, we explicitly recognized the Mayor's right to require selection on the basis of merit. There we struck down an Executive Order mandating affirmative action but were careful to note that, "Insofar as programs do not mandate percentage employment formulas, but only would enlarge the pool of persons eligible for employment based on discrimination-free merit selection, they are permissible under existing law" (id., at p. 649, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595). Yet, the 367 majority now rejects that view and reaches the remarkable conclusion that the Mayor has no power to require city contractors to make employment decisions on the basis of merit and fitness for the job. In other words, the Mayor cannot, by removing barriers to employment unrelated to qualification or merit, ensure that the city obtains the best possible services for the money it spends, because that policy has not been authorized or endorsed by appropriate legislation.

In fact, the Mayor "is empowered to enter into contracts * * * and to determine the manner of transacting the city's business and affairs" (Matter of Bauch v. City of New York, 21 N.Y.2d 599, 605, 289 N.Y.S.2d 951, 237 N.E.2d 211). In exercising that power, the Mayor's obligation is to ensure that the city receive the greatest value for the lowest possible cost (see, e.g., Matter of Dairymen's League Coop. Assn. v. Murtagh, 274 App.Div. 591, 594–595, 84 N.Y.S.2d 744, affd. 299 N.Y. 634, 86 N.E.2d 509). Thus, in Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay, 39 N.Y.2d 641, 648, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595, supra, the court held that "cost minimization is a proper consideration in setting government procurement policy," thereby explicitly recognizing the validity of the social policy embodied in Executive Order No. 50.

The majority holds, however, that notwithstanding the recognition in Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay (supra), and Matter of Fullilove v. Beame, 48 N.Y.2d 376, 379, 423 N.Y.S.2d 144, 398 N.E.2d 765, supra, of the Mayor's power to require discrimination-free merit selection, he is permitted to ban particular kinds of discrimination by city contractors only if the State Legislature or City Council has either itself already done so or expressly authorized him to do so. But one searches in vain for any language in these cases, or in the other cases cited by the majority, that limits the Mayor's power in this manner. Rapp v. Carey, 44 N.Y.2d 157, 404 N.Y.S.2d 565, 375 N.E.2d 745, invalidated an Executive Order issued by the Governor because it was not only unauthorized by any statute or constitutional provision, but was actually inconsistent with existing legislation (id., at pp. 164–165, 404 N.Y.S.2d 565, 375 N.E.2d 745). And the defect in the Executive Order in Subcontractors Trade Assn. v. Koch, 62 N.Y.2d 422, 429, 477 N.Y.S.2d 120, 465 N.E.2d 840, supra, was that it imposed an affirmative, remedial plan which required that "a certain percentage *534 of city construction contracts * * * be allotted to a particular group or category of business enterprise". Here, no affirmative 13 action is mandated. There is only a ban on arbitrary discrimination, designed to implement the accepted social policy that the city should seek to get the most for its money.

Finally, in light of the majority's reliance on separation of powers cases involving the Federal Constitution, it should be noted that a number of Federal courts have upheld presidential 368 Executive Orders barring discrimination in Federally funded projects on the ground that "the federal government has a vital interest in assuring that the largest possible pool of qualified manpower be available for the accomplishment of its projects" (Contractors Assn. v. Secretary of Labor, 442 F.2d 159, 171, cert. denied 404 U.S. 854, 92 S.Ct. 98, 30 L.Ed.2d 95; accord, United States v. New Orleans Public Serv., 553 F.2d 459, 465, vacated on other grounds 436 U.S. 942, 98 S.Ct. 2841, 56 L.Ed.2d 783, adhered to 638 F.2d 899, cert. denied 454 U.S. 892, 102 S.Ct. 387, 70 L.Ed.2d 206; Farkas v. Texas Instrument, 375 F.2d 629, 632, n. 1). Those decisions were favorably commented on in Matter of Broidrick v. Lindsay, 39 N.Y.2d 641, 647–648, 385 N.Y.S.2d 265, 350 N.E.2d 595, supra, although they were distinguished on the ground that the Executive Order there in issue applied to the private projects of city contractors as well as their city-funded work and, thus, was intended to promote a social policy far beyond cost minimization in the expenditure of public funds. In the present case, Executive Order No. 50 applies only to contracts that are funded in whole or in part by government moneys appropriated or controlled by the city.[3] Accordingly, it is carefully tailored to the policy of obtaining the best possible work effort from city contractors through a ban on arbitrary employment discrimination and is permissible under the prior decisions of this court. By reversing in this case, the majority adopts a new separation of powers principle that is inconsistent with both its own prior decisions and Federal case law.

JASEN, SIMONS, KAYE, ALEXANDER and TITONE, JJ., concur with WACHTLER, C.J. MEYER, J., dissents and votes to affirm in a separate opinion.

Order modified, with costs to appellants, in accordance with the opinion herein and, as so modified, affirmed.

All Citations

65 N.Y.2d 344, 482 N.E.2d 1, 492 N.Y.S.2d 522, 37 Empl. Prac. Dec. P 35,477

Footnotes

1 The plaintiffs in the Under 21 action included in their complaint a similar facial challenge to all of Executive Order No. 50 as well as a challenge to all of Executive Order No. 50, as applied to religious or religiously sponsored corporations. We reject the argument that the Mayor may not enforce existing State and city laws prohibiting employment discrimination through the establishment of an additional "enforcement mechanism" (the Mayor's Bureau of Labor Services), and thus decline to hold all of Executive Order No. 50 invalid on its face.

As to the second additional challenge, we cannot on the record before us determine the extent to which 1st Amendment and 14th Amendment concerns would be implicated by enforcement of the various aspects of the order on the Under 21 plaintiffs, and we thus decline to issue an advisory opinion on whether the Mayor may regulate the employment practices of a religious corporation contracting with the city.

2 Plaintiffs in the Under 21 action cross-appealed from the judgment at Special Term insofar as it did not invalidate all of Executive Order No. 50 (see, n. 1, supra).

3 The Appellate Division order "modifies" the Special Term judgments as it affirms the judgment in the Under 21 action insofar as it did not invalidate all of Executive Order No. 50.

4 At Special Term, defendants asserted as a third basis for validating all of Executive Order No. 50 an alleged "ratification" through a resolution of the New York City Board of Estimate. Defendants have since abandoned any reliance on the Board of Estimate's actions in attempting to uphold the order, and none of the complaints in the actions before us seeks to invalidate any Board of Estimate resolutions. Thus, the issue of whether the Board of Estimate may require that all contracts submitted to it for approval must prohibit discrimination by the contractor on the ground of "sexual orientation or affectional preference" is not before us on this appeal.

5 We reject the dissent's argument that the challenged portion of Executive Order No. 50, by restricting non-merit-based discrimination, is permissible as an attempt by the Mayor "to ensure that the city receive the greatest value for the lowest possible cost" (dissenting opn., 65 N.Y.2d, at p. 367, 492 N.Y.S.2d at 533, 482 N.E.2d at 12). To begin, as the most apparent consequence of the enforcement of this part of the order would be a reduction in the number of entities willing to contract with the city, it is unclear how the city would economically benefit from such enforcement. If a city agency feels that the price of a particular contract is too high due to a contractor's employment policies, it is of course free to choose some other contractor. More significantly the dissent itself concedes that Executive Order No. 50 is an enactment of social policy, notwithstanding the economic arguments now set forth by defendants, and thus is akin to the remedial plan in Subcontractors which we unanimously held invalid. The Federal cases cited by the dissent in support of this argument (dissenting opn., at p. 368, 492 N.Y.S.2d at 534, 482 N.E.2d at 13) are distinguishable, as those courts were construing a specific grant of authority to the executive by Congress. Any dictum in those cases that the president has the authority to regulate the employment practices of government contractors even absent authorization by Congress was rejected by a more recent Federal case (see, Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Friedman, 639 F.2d 164, 167–172, n. 13).

6 We have held that the State constitutional equal protection clause (N.Y. Const., art. I, § 11) is no broader in coverage than the Federal provision (see, e.g., Matter of Esler v. Walters, 56 N.Y.2d 306, 313–314, 452 N.Y.S.2d 333, 437 N.E.2d 1090) and this equation with the Federal provision extends to the requirement of "State action" in order for the equal protection clause to be applicable (Dorsey v. Stuyvesant Town Corp., 299 N.Y. 512, 530–531, 87 N.E.2d 541, cert. denied 339 U.S. 981, 70 S.Ct. 1019, 94 L.Ed. 1385). In Dorsey, we recognized that the State provision approved at the Constitutional Convention of 1938 and adopted by the electorate that same year, was designed simply to " 'embod[y] in our Constitution the provisions of the Federal Constitution which are already binding upon our State and its agencies' " (id., at p. 530, 87 N.E.2d 541 [quoting from 2 Rev. Record of N.Y. State Constitutional Convention, 1938, at 1065]). The dissent's reliance on Sharrock v. Dell Buick-Cadillac, 45 N.Y.2d 152, 408 N.Y.S.2d 39, 379 N.E.2d 1169, is misplaced, as that case concerned the interpretation of the due process clause in the State Constitution (art. I, § 6), a provision enacted prior to, and containing language materially different from, its counterpart in the 14th Amendment, and thus readily supporting a broader interpretation than the Federal provision. Accordingly, we need only analyze the equal protection issue under the framework of the 14th Amendment.

1 Matter of Esler v. Walters, 56 N.Y.2d 306, 452 N.Y.S.2d 333, 437 N.E.2d 1090, cited by the majority, dealt with the substantive scope of the protection against discrimination provided by the State Constitution, not with what constitutes State action.

2 Article I, § 11, provides that, "No person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws of this state or any subdivision thereof." Similarly, article I, § 6, states that, "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law." In contrast, the 14th Amendment is explicitly phrased in terms of State action: "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

3 Despite claims by some of the plaintiffs that the Executive Order and its implementing regulations apply to all work, public or private, by city contractors, the scope of the coverage is explained by the following statement from the Director of the City Bureau of Labor Services: "It is true that section 50.20(A) of the Regulations makes the non-discrimination requirement applicable to '[a]11 contractors doing business with the City without regard to the dollar amount or source of funding.' However, the phrase 'without regard to the dollar amount or source of funding' was inserted not to expand the non-discrimination requirement so as to cover programs wholly unrelated to City contract work but rather to clarify that the non-discrimination requirement is fully applicable to programs that the City funds only in part as well as to programs that the City contracts for but does not fund (e.g., City contracts using federal funds). The reference in section 50.20(B) to '[c]ontractors whose contracts are funded in whole or in part by federal or state funds' likewise refers to contracts administered by and formally let by the City."

End of Document

8 A.D.3d 78
Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Department, New York.

In re Joanne WALLACE, Petitioner–Appellant,
v.
ENVIRONMENTAL CONTROL BOARD OF the CITY OF NEW YORK (Dept. of Consumer Affairs), Respondent–Respondent.

June 10, 2004.

Synopsis

Background: Salesperson brought petition to annul determination by Environmental Control Board that salesperson was vending records without license and that she was vending from table of more than eight feet in length. The Supreme Court, New York County, Ira Gammerman, J., granted judgment for Board. Salesperson appealed.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Appellate Division, held that:

argument improperly raised for first time on appeal could not be considered by appellate court, and substantial evidence supported decision of ALJ.

Affirmed.

Attorneys and Law Firms

*478 John Corcos Levy, New York, for appellant.

Michael A. Cardozo, Corporation Counsel, New York (Stacy Laine Matthews of counsel), for respondent.

BUCKLEY, P.J., LERNER, FRIEDMAN, MARLOW, SWEENY, JJ.

Opinion

78 Judgment, Supreme Court, New York County (Ira Gammerman, J.), entered March 17, 1999, which denied petitioner's application to annul respondent Environmental Control Board's determination that petitioner was guilty of vending records without a license in violation of Administrative Code of City of New York § 20–453, and of vending from a table more than eight feet in length in violation of Administrative Code § 20–465(b), unanimously affirmed, without costs.

Petitioner's argument that the determination is not supported by substantial evidence is improperly raised for the first time on appeal, and we decline to consider it. So too is her argument that she is entitled to a new hearing because the unavailability of the hearing transcripts makes review of her claim impossible. Indeed, in the latter regard, petitioner took the opposite position before the IAS court, arguing that it could decide her 79 article 78 notwithstanding respondent's loss of the tape recording of the hearing and resulting inability to produce transcripts thereof. This position was consistent with the absence of any claims of lack of substantial evidence. Rather, petitioner claimed that she was effectively prevented from challenging the issuing officer's credibility, and his testimony should therefore have been rejected as a matter of law, because he acknowledged that all pertinent facts were contained in his partner's memo book, and neither the partner nor his memo book were produced at the hearing. Meaningful review of that claim is allowed by the available record, namely, the ALJ's detailed decision summarizing the testimony and arguments of the parties, which petitioner does not challenge as inaccurate. The decision shows that the ALJ credited the issuing officer's testimony that petitioner was displaying records on a table approximately 12 feet long in a manner that showed the illustrated covers and the identities of the artists, indicating that the records were for sale and not, as petitioner claims, temporarily piled on the table while she was unloading books from her van. Petitioner, who was represented by counsel, had a full opportunity to cross-examine the officer and otherwise challenge his testimony based on an unaided recollection of personal observations, and respondent was under no legal obligation to produce any memo books. Nothing precluded petitioner *479 from requesting an adjournment to secure the attendance of the issuing officer's partner, or a subpoena for his memo book.

All Citations

8 A.D.3d 78, 778 N.Y.S.2d 477, 2004 N.Y. Slip Op. 04852

End of Document

102 S.Ct. 3187
Supreme Court of the United States

WASHINGTON, et al., Appellants
v.
SEATTLE SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1, et al.

No. 81–9.
|
Argued March 22, 1982.
|
Decided June 30, 1982.

Synopsis

School district sued State of Washington challenging the constitutionality of a statute, adopted through initiative, which prohibited school boards from requiring any student to attend a school other than the school geographically nearest or next nearest his place of residence, but which contained exceptions permitting school boards to assign students away from their neighborhood schools for virtually all purposes required by their educational policies except racial desegregation. The United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, 473 F.Supp. 996, declared the statute invalid. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 633 F.2d 1338,affirmed. State of Washington appealed. The Supreme Court, Justice Blackmun, held that the initiative violated the equal protection clause.

Affirmed.

Justice Powell filed a dissenting opinion in which Chief Justice Burger, Justice Rehnquist and Justice O'Connor, joined.

*3188 *457 Syllabus[*]

In 1978, appellee Seattle School District No. 1 (District) enacted the so-called Seattle Plan for desegregation of its schools. The plan makes extensive use of mandatory busing. Subsequently, a statewide initiative (Initiative 350) was drafted to terminate the use of mandatory busing for purposes of racial integration in the public schools of the State of Washington. The initiative prohibits school boards from requiring any student to attend a school other than the one geographically nearest or next nearest to his home. It sets out a number of broad exceptions to this requirement, however: a student may be assigned beyond his neighborhood school if he requires special educational programs, or if the nearest or next nearest school is overcrowded or unsafe, or if it lacks necessary physical facilities. These exceptions permit school boards to assign students away from their neighborhood schools for virtually all of the nonintegrative purposes required by their educational policies. After the initiative was passed at the November 1978 general election, the District, together with two other districts, brought suit against appellant State in Federal District Court, challenging the constitutionality of Initiative 350 under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The District Court held the initiative unconstitutional on the ground, inter alia, that it established an impermissible racial classification in violation of Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 89 S.Ct. 557, 21 L.Ed.2d 616, and Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp. 710 (WDNY), summarily aff'd, 402 U.S. 935, 91 S.Ct. 1618, 29 L.Ed.2d 105, "because it permits busing for non-racial reasons but forbids it for racial reasons." The court permanently enjoined implementation of the initiative's restrictions. The Court of Appeals affirmed.

Held : Initiative 350 violates the Equal Protection Clause. Pp. 3193–3204.

(a) When a State allocates governmental power nonneutrally, by explicitly using the racial nature of a decision to determine the decisionmaking process, its action "places special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process," Hunter

v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560, thereby "making it more difficult for certain racial and religious minorities [than for other members of the community] to achieve legislation that is in their interest." Id., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563. Such a structuring of the political 458 process is "no more permissible than [is] denying [members of a racial minority] the vote, on an equal basis with others." Id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560. Pp. 3193–3195.

(b) Initiative 350 must fall because it does "not attemp[t] to allocate governmental power on the basis of any general principle," Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563, but instead uses the racial nature of an issue to define the governmental decisionmaking structure, thus imposing substantial and unique burdens on racial minorities. The initiative worked a major reordering of the State's educational decisionmaking process. Before adoption of the initiative, the power to determine what programs would most appropriately fill a school district's educational needs—including programs involving student *3189 assignment and desegregation—was committed to the local board's discretion. After passage of Initiative 350, authority over all but one of these areas remained in the local board's hands. By placing power over desegregative busing at the state level, the initiative thus "differentiates between the treatment of problems involving racial matters and that afforded other problems in the same area." Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp., at 718. And Initiative 350 works something more than the "mere repeal" of a desegregation law by the political entity that created it. It burdens all future attempts to integrate Washington schools by lodging decisionmaking authority over the question at a new and remote level of government. This makes the enactment of racially beneficial legislation uniquely difficult, and therefore imposes direct and undeniable burdens on minority interests. Pp. 3195–3202.

(c) Contrary to appellants' suggestion, Hunter v. Erickson was not effectively overruled by Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597, and Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450. While Washington v. Davis and Arlington Heights considered classifications facially unrelated to race, Hunter —like this case—involved an attempt to use explicitly racial criteria to define the community's decisionmaking structure. In so doing, the legislation at issue there directly and invidiously curtailed "the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities." United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 152–153, n. 4, 58 S.Ct. 778, 783–784, n. 4, 82 L.Ed. 1234. Hunter 's principle—that meaningful and unjustified distinctions based on race are impermissible—is still vital. Pp. 3202–3204.

9th Cir., 633 F.2d 1338, affirmed.

Attorneys and Law Firms

459 Kenneth O. Eikenberry, Attorney General of Washington, argued the cause for appellants. With him on the briefs were Malachy R. Murphy, Deputy Attorney General, Thomas F. Carr, Senior Assistant Attorney General, and Timothy R. Malone, Assistant Attorney General. Solicitor General Lee, Assistant Attorney General Reynolds, Deputy Solicitor General Wallace, and Richard G. Wilkins filed a brief for the United States.

Michael W. Hoge argued the cause for appellees. With him on the brief for appellees Seattle School District No. 1 et al. were Camden M. Hall and David J. Burman. Phillip L. Burton, Frederick L. Noland, Thomas A. Lemly, and William H. Neukom filed a brief for appellees American Civil Liberties Union et al. Ladd Leavens filed a brief for appellees East Pasco Neighborhood Council et al.*

* Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance were filed by Henry M. Aronson for Grant L. Anderson et al.; by Palmer Smith for the League of Women Voters of Seattle et al.; by Jack Greenberg, James M. Nabritt III, and Bill Lann Lee for the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund; and by Judith A. Lonnquist for the Washington Education Association.

Briefs of amici curiae were filed by Gwendolyn H. Gregory, August W. Steinhilber, and Thomas A. Shannon for the National School Boards Association; and by William J. Bender for the Seattle Chapter Japanese American Citizens League.

Opinion

Justice BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are presented here with an extraordinary question: whether an elected local school board may use the Fourteenth Amendment to defend its program of busing for integration from attack by the State.

I

A

Seattle School District No. 1 (District), which is largely coterminous with the city of Seattle, Wash., is charged by state law with administering 112 schools and educating approximately 54,000 public school students. About 37% of these 460 children are of Negro, Asian, American Indian, or Hispanic ancestry. Because segregated housing patterns in Seattle have created racially imbalanced schools, the District historically has taken steps to alleviate the isolation of minority students; since 1963, it has permitted students to transfer from their neighborhood schools to help cure the District's racial imbalance.[1]

Despite these efforts, the District in 1977 came under increasing pressure to accelerate its program of desegregation.[2] In response, the District's Board of Directors (School Board) enacted a resolution defining "racial imbalance" as "the situation *3190 that exists when the combined minority student enrollment in a school exceeds the districtwide combined average by 20 percentage points, provided that the single minority enrollment ... of no school will exceed 50 percent of the student body." 473 F.Supp. 996, 1006 (WD Wash.1979). The District resolved to eliminate all such imbalance from the Seattle public schools by the beginning of the 1979–1980 academic year.[3]

461 In September 1977, the District implemented a "magnet" program, designed to alleviate racial isolation by enhancing educational offerings at certain schools, thereby encouraging voluntary student transfers. A "disproportionate amount of the overall movement" inspired by the program was undertaken by Negro students, however, ibid., and racial imbalance in the Seattle schools was found to have actually increased between the 1970–1971 and 1977–1978 academic years. The District therefore concluded that mandatory reassignment of students was necessary if racial isolation in its schools was to be eliminated. Accordingly, in March 1978, the School Board enacted the so-called "Seattle Plan" for desegregation. The plan, which makes extensive use of busing and mandatory reassignments, desegregates elementary schools by "pairing" and "triading" predominantly minority with predominantly white attendance areas, and by basing student assignments on attendance zones rather than on race. The racial makeup of secondary schools is moderated by "feeding" them from the desegregated elementary schools. App. 142–143. The District represents that the plan results in the reassignment of roughly equal numbers of white and minority students, and allows most students to spend roughly half of their academic careers attending a school near their homes. Brief for Appellee Seattle School District No. 1, p. 5.
The desegregation program, implemented in the 1978–1979 academic year, apparently was effective: the District Court found that the Seattle Plan "has substantially reduced the number of racially imbalanced schools in the district and has substantially reduced the percentage of minority students in those schools which remain racially imbalanced." 473 F.Supp., at 1007.

B

In late 1977, shortly before the Seattle Plan was formally adopted by the District, a number of Seattle residents who opposed the desegregation strategies being discussed by the School Board formed an organization called the Citizens for 462 Voluntary Integration Committee (CiVIC). This organization, which the District Court found "was formed because of its founders' opposition to The Seattle Plan," ibid., attempted to enjoin implementation of the Board's mandatory desegregation program through litigation in state court; when these efforts failed, CiVIC drafted a statewide initiative designed to terminate the use of mandatory busing for purposes of racial integration.[4] This proposal, known as Initiative 350, provided that "no school board ... shall directly or indirectly require *3191 any student to attend a school other than the school which is geographically nearest or next nearest the student's place of residence ... and which offers the course of study pursued by such student...." See Wash.Rev.Code § 28A.26.010 (1981).[5] The initiative then set out, however, a number of broad exceptions to this requirement: a student may be assigned beyond his neighborhood school if he "requires special education, care or guidance," or if "there are health or safety hazards, either natural or man made, or physical barriers or obstacles ... between the student's place of residence and the nearest or next nearest school," or if "the school nearest or next nearest to his place of residence is unfit or inadequate because of overcrowding, unsafe conditions or lack of physical facilities." See ibid. Initiative 350 also specifically proscribed use of seven enumerated methods of "indirec[t]" student assignment—among them the redefinition of attendance zones, the pairing of schools, and the use of 463 "feeder" schools—that are a part of the Seattle Plan. See § 28A.26.030. The initiative envisioned busing for racial purposes in only one circumstance: it did not purport to "prevent any court of competent jurisdiction from adjudicating constitutional issues relating to the public schools." See § 28A.26.060.

Its proponents placed Initiative 350 on the Washington ballot for the November 1978 general election. During the ensuing campaign, the District Court concluded, the leadership of CiVIC "acted legally and responsibly," and did not address "its appeals to the racial biases of the voters." 473 F.Supp., at 1009. At the same time, however, the court's findings demonstrate that the initiative was directed solely at desegregative busing in general, and at the Seattle Plan in particular. Thus, "[e]xcept for the assignment of students to effect racial balancing, the drafters of Initiative 350 attempted to preserve to school districts the maximum flexibility in the assignment of students," id., at 1008, and "[e]xcept for racially-balancing purposes" the initiative "permits local school districts to assign students other than to their nearest or next nearest schools for most, if not all, of the major reasons for which students are at present assigned to schools other than their nearest or next nearest schools." Id., at 1010.[6] In campaigning for the measure, CiVIC officials accurately represented that its passage would result in "no loss of school district flexibility other than in busing for desegregation purposes," id., at 1008, and it is evident that the campaign focused almost exclusively on the wisdom of "forced busing" for integration. See id., at 1009.

On November 8, 1978, two months after the Seattle Plan went into effect, Initiative 350 passed by a substantial margin, drawing almost 66% of the vote statewide. The initiative failed to attract majority support in two state legislative 464 districts, both in Seattle. In the city as a whole, however, the initiative passed with some 61% of the vote. Within the month, the District, together with the Tacoma and Pasco School Districts,[7] initiated this suit against the *3192 State in the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, challenging the constitutionality of Initiative 350 under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The United States and several community organizations intervened in support of the District;[8] CiVIC intervened on behalf of the defendants.

After a 9-day trial, the District Court made extensive and detailed findings of fact. The court determined that "[t]hose Seattle schools which are most crowded are located in those areas of the city where the preponderance of minority families live." Id., at 1001. Yet the court found that Initiative 350, if implemented, "will prevent the racial balancing of a significant number of Seattle schools and will cause the school system to become more racially imbalanced than it presently is," "will make it impossible for Tacoma schools to maintain their present racial balance," and will make "doubtful" the 465 prospects for integration of the Pasco schools. Id., at 1010; see id., at 1001, 1011. Except for desegregative busing, however, the court found that "almost all of the busing of students currently taking place in [Washington] is permitted by Initiative 350." Id., at 1010. And while the court found that "racial bias ... is a factor in the opposition to the 'busing' of students to obtain racial balance," id., at 1001, it also found that voters were moved to support Initiative 350 for "a number of reasons," so that "[i]t is impossible to ascertain all of those reasons [o]r to determine the relative impact of those reasons upon the electorate." Id., at 1010.

The District Court then held Initiative 350 unconstitutional for three independent reasons. The court first concluded that the initiative established an impermissible racial classification in violation of Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 89 S.Ct. 557, 21 L.Ed.2d 616 (1969), and Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp. 710 (WDNY 1970) (three-judge court), summarily aff'd, 402 U.S. 935, 91 S.Ct. 1618, 29 L.Ed.2d 105 (1971), "because it permits busing for non-racial reasons but forbids it for racial reasons." 473 F.Supp., at 1012. The court next held Initiative 350 invalid because "a racially discriminatory purpose was one of the factors which motivated the conception and adoption of the initiative." Id., at 1013.[9] Finally, the District Court reasoned that Initiative 350 was unconstitutionally overbroad, because in the absence of a 466 court order it barred even school boards that had engaged in de jure segregation from taking steps to foster integration.[10] Id., at 1016. The court permanently enjoined implementation of the initiative's restrictions.

On the merits, a divided panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed, relying entirely on the District Court's first rationale. *3193 633 F.2d 1338 (1980).[11] By subjecting desegregative student assignments to unique treatment, the Court of Appeals concluded, Initiative 350 "both creates a constitutionally-suspect racial classification and radically restructures the political process of Washington by allowing a state-wide majority to usurp traditional local authority over local school board educational policies." Id., at 1344. In doing so, the court continued, the initiative "remove[s] from local school boards their existing authority, and in large part their capability, to enact programs designed to desegregate the schools." Id., at 1346 (emphasis in original and footnote omitted). The court found such a result contrary to the principles of Hunter v. Erickson, supra, and Lee v. Nyquist, supra. The court acknowledged that the issue would be a different one had a successor school board attempted to rescind the Seattle Plan. Here, however, "a different governmental body—the state-wide electorate—rescinded a policy voluntarily enacted by locally elected school boards already subject to local political control." 633 F.2d, at 1346.[12]

467 The State and various state officers appealed to this Court. We noted probable jurisdiction to address an issue of significance to our Nation's system of education. 454 U.S. 890, 102 S.Ct. 384, 70 L.Ed.2d 204 (1981).

II

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees racial minorities the right to full participation in the political life of the community. It is beyond dispute, of course, that given racial or ethnic groups may not be denied the franchise, or precluded from entering into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner. See White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 37 L.Ed.2d 314 (1973); Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U.S. 536, 47 S.Ct. 446, 71 L.Ed. 759 (1927). But the Fourteenth Amendment also reaches "a political structure that treats all individuals as equals," Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55, 84, 100 S.Ct. 1490, 1509, 64 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980) (STEVENS, J., concurring in judgment), yet more subtly distorts governmental processes in such a way as to place special burdens on the ability of minority groups to achieve beneficial legislation.

This principle received its clearest expression in Hunter v. Erickson, supra, a case that involved attempts to overturn antidiscrimination legislation in Akron, Ohio. The Akron City Council, pursuant to its ordinary legislative processes, had enacted a fair housing ordinance. In response, the local citizenry, using an established referendum procedure, see 393 U.S., at 390, and n. 6; at id., 393–394, and n., 89 S.Ct., at 560, and n. 6; 562, and n. (Harlan, J., concurring), amended the city charter to provide that ordinances regulating real estate transactions " 'on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry must first be approved by a majority of the electors voting on the question at a regular or general election before said ordinance shall be 468 effective.' " Id., at 387, 89 S.Ct., at 558. This action "not only suspended the operation of the existing ordinance forbidding housing discrimination, but also required the approval of the electors before any future [fair housing] ordinance could take effect." Id., at 389–390, 89 S.Ct., at 559–560. In essence, the amendment changed the requirements for the adoption *3194 of one type of local legislation: to enact an ordinance barring housing discrimination on the basis of race or religion, proponents had to obtain the approval of the City Council and of a majority of the voters citywide. To enact an ordinance preventing housing discrimination on other grounds, or to enact any other type of housing ordinance, proponents needed the support of only the City Council.

In striking down the charter amendment, the Hunter Court recognized that, on its face, the provision "draws no distinctions among racial and religious groups." Id., at 390, 89 S.Ct., at 560. But it did differentiate "between those groups who sought the law's protection against racial ... discriminatio [n] in the sale and rental of real estate and those who sought to regulate real property transactions in the pursuit of other ends," ibid., thus "disadvantag[ing] those who would benefit from laws barring racial ... discriminatio[n] as against those who would bar other discriminations or who would otherwise regulate the real estate market in their favor." Id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560. In "reality," the burden imposed by such an arrangement necessarily "falls on the minority. The majority needs no protection against discrimination and if it did, a referendum might be bothersome but no more than that." Ibid. In effect, then, the charter amendment served as an "explicitly racial classification treating racial housing matters differently from other racial and housing matters." Id., at 389, 89 S.Ct., at 559. This made the amendment constitutionally suspect: "the State may no more disadvantage any particular group by making it more difficult to enact legislation in its behalf than it may dilute any person's vote or give any group a smaller representation than another of comparable size." Id., at 393, 89 S.Ct., at 562 (emphasis added).

469 Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp. 710 (WDNY 1970) (three-judge court), offers an application of the Hunter doctrine in a setting strikingly similar to the one now before us. That case involved the New York education system, which made use of both elected and appointed school boards and which conferred extensive authority on state education officials. In an effort to eliminate de facto segregation in New York's schools, those officials had directed the city of Buffalo—a municipality with an appointed school board—to implement an integration plan. While these developments were proceeding, however, the New York Legislature enacted a statute barring state education officials and appointed—though not elected—school boards from "assign[ing] or compell[ing] [students] to attend any school on account of race ... or for the purpose of achieving [racial] equality in attendance ... at any school." Id., at 712.[13]
Applying Hunter, the three-judge District Court invalidated the statute, noting that under the provision "[t]he Commissioner [of Education] and local appointed officials are prohibited from acting in [student assignment] matters only where racial criteria are involved." Id., at 719. In the court's view, the statute therefore "place[d] burdens on the implementation of educational policies designed to deal with race on the local level" by "treating educational matters involving racial criteria differently from other educational matters and making it more difficult to deal with racial imbalance in the public schools." Ibid. (emphasis in original). This drew an impermissible distinction "between the treatment of problems involving racial matters and that afforded other problems in the same area." Id., at 718. This Court affirmed the District Court's judgment without opinion. 402 U.S. 935, 91 S.Ct. 1618, 29 L.Ed.2d 105 (1971).

These cases yield a simple but central principle. As Justice Harlan noted while concurring in the Court's opinion in 470 Hunter, laws structuring political institutions or *3195 allocating political power according to "neutral principles"—such as the executive veto, or the typically burdensome requirements for amending state constitutions—are not subject to equal protection attack, though they may "make it more difficult for minorities to achieve favorable legislation." 393 U.S., at 394, 89 S.Ct., at 562. Because such laws make it more difficult for every group in the community to enact comparable laws, they "provid[e] a just framework within which the diverse political groups in our society may fairly compete." Id., at 393, 89 S.Ct., at 562. Thus, the political majority may generally restructure the political process to place obstacles in the path of everyone seeking to secure the benefits of governmental action. But a different analysis is required when the State allocates governmental power nonneutrally, by explicitly using the racial nature of a decision to determine the decisionmaking process. State action of this kind, the Court said, "places special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process," id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560 (emphasis added), thereby "making it more difficult for certain racial and religious minorities [than for other members of the community] to achieve legislation that is in their interest." Id., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563 (emphasis added) (Harlan, J., concurring). Such a structuring of the political process, the Court said, was "no more permissible than [is] denying [members of a racial minority] the vote, on an equal basis with others." Id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560.

III

We believe that the Court of Appeals properly focused on Hunter and Lee, for we find the principle of those cases dispositive of the issue here. In our view, Initiative 350 must fall because it does "not attemp[t] to allocate governmental power on the basis of any general principle." Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563 (Harlan, J., concurring). Instead, it uses the racial nature of an issue to define the governmental decisionmaking structure, and thus imposes substantial and unique burdens on racial minorities.

471 A

Noting that Initiative 350 nowhere mentions "race" or "integration," appellants suggest that the legislation has no racial overtones; they maintain that Hunter is inapposite because the initiative simply permits busing for certain enumerated purposes while neutrally forbidding it for all other reasons. We find it difficult to believe that appellants' analysis is seriously advanced, however, for despite its facial neutrality there is little doubt that the initiative was effectively drawn for racial purposes. Neither the initiative's sponsors, nor the District Court, nor the Court of Appeals had any difficulty perceiving the racial nature of the issue settled by Initiative 350. Thus, the District Court found that the text of the initiative was carefully tailored to interfere only with desegregative busing.[14] Proponents of the initiative candidly "represented that there would be no loss of school district flexibility other than in busing for desegregation purposes." 473 F.Supp., at 1008. And, as we have noted, Initiative 350 in fact allows school districts to bus their students "for most, if not all," of the nonintegrative purposes required by their educational policies. Id., at 1010. The Washington electorate surely was aware of this, for it was "assured" by CiVIC officials that " '99% of the school districts in the state' "—those that lacked mandatory integration programs—"would not be affected by the passage of 350." Id., at 1008–1009. It is beyond reasonable dispute, then, that the initiative was enacted " 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' its adverse effects upon" busing for integration. *3196 Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 279, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2296, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979).

Even accepting the view that Initiative 350 was enacted for such a purpose, the United States—which has changed its position during the course of this litigation, and now supports the State—maintains that busing for integration, unlike the 472 fair housing ordinance involved in Hunter, is not a peculiarly "racial" issue at all. Brief for United States 17, n. 18. Again, we are not persuaded. It undoubtedly is true, as the United States suggests, that the proponents of mandatory integration cannot be classified by race: Negroes and whites may be counted among both the supporters and the opponents of Initiative 350. And it should be equally clear that white as well as Negro children benefit from exposure to "ethnic and racial diversity in the classroom." Columbus Board of Education v. Penick, 443 U.S. 449, 486, 99 S.Ct. 2941, 2991, 61 L.Ed.2d 666 (1979) (POWELL, J., dissenting). See Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 783, 94 S.Ct. 3112, 3146, 41 L.Ed.2d 1069 (1974) (MARSHALL, J., dissenting).[15] But neither of these factors serves to distinguish Hunter, for we may fairly assume that members of the racial majority both favored and benefited from Akron's fair housing ordinance. Cf. Havens Realty Corp. v. Coleman, 455 U.S. 363, 376–377, and n. 17, 102 S.Ct. 1114, 1122–1123, and n. 17, 71 L.Ed.2d 214 (1982); Gladstone, Realtors v. Village of Bellwood, 441 U.S. 91, 111, 115, 99 S.Ct. 1601, 1614, 1615, 60 L.Ed. 66 (1979).

In any event, our cases suggest that desegregation of the public schools, like the Akron open housing ordinance, at bottom inures primarily to the benefit of the minority, and is designed for that purpose. Education has come to be "a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment." Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 493, 74 S.Ct. 686, 691, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954). When that environment is largely shaped by members of different racial and cultural groups, minority children can achieve their full 473 measure of success only if they learn to function in—and are fully accepted by—the larger community. Attending an ethnically diverse school may help accomplish this goal by preparing minority children "for citizenship in our pluralistic society," Estes v. Metropolitan Branches of Dallas NAACP, 444 U.S. 437, 451, 100 S.Ct. 716, 723, 62 L.Ed.2d 626 (1980) (POWELL, J., dissenting), while, we may hope, teaching members of the racial majority "to live in harmony and mutual respect" with children of minority heritage. Columbus Board of Education v. Penick, 443 U.S., at 485, n. 5, 99 S.Ct., at 2946, n. 5 (POWELL, J., dissenting). Lee v. Nyquist settles this point, for the Court there accepted the proposition that mandatory desegregation strategies present the type of racial issue implicated by the Hunter doctrine.[16]

*3197 It is undeniable that busing for integration—particularly when ordered by a federal court—now engenders considerably more controversy than does the sort of fair housing ordinance debated in Hunter. See 474 Estes v. Metropolitan Branches of Dallas NAACP, 444 U.S., at 448–451, 100 S.Ct., at 722–723 (POWELL, J., dissenting). But in the absence of a constitutional violation, the desirability and efficacy of school desegregation are matters to be resolved through the political process. For present purposes, it is enough that minorities may consider busing for integration to be "legislation that is in their interest." Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563 (Harlan, J., concurring). Given the racial focus of Initiative 350, this suffices to trigger application of the Hunter doctrine.

B

We are also satisfied that the practical effect of Initiative 350 is to work a reallocation of power of the kind condemned in Hunter. The initiative removes the authority to address a racial problem—and only a racial problem—from the existing decisionmaking body, in such a way as to burden minority interests. Those favoring the elimination of de facto school segregation now must seek relief from the state legislature, or from the statewide electorate. Yet authority over all other student assignment decisions, as well as over most other areas of educational policy, remains vested in the local school board. Indeed, by specifically exempting from Initiative 350's proscriptions most nonracial reasons for assigning students away from their neighborhood schools, the initiative expressly requires those championing school integration to surmount a considerably higher hurdle than persons seeking comparable legislative action. As in Hunter, then, the community's political mechanisms are modified to place effective decisionmaking authority over a racial issue at a different level of government.[17] In a very obvious *3198 sense, the initiative 475 thus "disadvantages those who would benefit from laws barring" de facto desegregation "as against those who ... would otherwise regulate" student assignment decisions; "the reality is that the law's impact falls on the minority." Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560.

The state appellants and the United States, in response to this line of analysis, argue that Initiative 350 has not worked any reallocation of power. They note that the State necessarily retains plenary authority over Washington's system of education, and therefore they suggest that the initiative 476 amounts to nothing more than an unexceptional example of a State's intervention in its own school system. In effect, they maintain that the State functions as a "super school board," Tr. of Oral Arg. 5, 17, which typically involves itself in all areas of educational policy. And, the argument continues, if the State is the body that usually makes decisions in this area, Initiative 350 worked a simple change in policy rather than a forbidden reallocation of power. Cf. Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education, 458 U.S. 527, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 73 L.Ed.2d 948.

This at first glance would seem to be a potent argument, for States traditionally have been accorded the widest latitude in ordering their internal governmental processes, see Holt Civic Club v. Tuscaloosa, 439 U.S. 60, 71, 99 S.Ct. 383, 390, 58 L.Ed.2d 292 (1978), and school boards, as creatures of the State, obviously must give effect to policies announced by the state legislature. But "insisting that a State may distribute legislative power as it desires ... furnish[es] no justification for a legislative structure which otherwise would violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor does the implementation of this change through popular referendum immunize it." Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 392, 89 S.Ct., at 561. The issue here, after all, is not whether Washington has the authority to intervene in the affairs of local school boards; it is, rather, whether the State has exercised that authority in a manner consistent with the Equal Protection Clause. As the Court noted in Hunter: "[T]hough Akron might have proceeded by majority vote ... on all its municipal legislation, it has instead chosen a more complex system. Having done so, the State may no more disadvantage any particular group by making it more difficult to enact legislation in its behalf than it may dilute any person's vote." Id., at 392–393, 89 S.Ct., at 561–562.[18] Washington also has chosen 477 to make use of a more complex governmental structure, and a close examination both of the Washington statutes and of the Court's decisions in related areas convinces us that Hunter is fully applicable here.

At the outset, it is irrelevant that the State might have vested all decisionmaking authority in itself, so long as the political structure it in fact erected imposes comparative burdens on minority interests; that much is settled by Hunter and by Lee.[19] And until the passage of Initiative 350, Washington law in fact had established the local school board, rather than the State, as the entity charged with making decisions of the type at issue here. Like all 50 States, see Brief for National School Boards Assn. *3199 as Amicus Curiae 11, 14–16, Washington of course is ultimately responsible for providing education within its borders, see Wash.Const., Art. IX; Wash.Rev.Code § 28A.02.010 (1981); ch. 28A.41 (establishing a uniform school financing system); Seattle School District No. 1 v. State, 90 Wash.2d 476, 585 P.2d 71 (1978), and it therefore has set certain procedural requirements and minimum educational standards to be met by each school. See, e.g., §§ 28A.01.010, 28A.01.020 (length of school day and year); ch. 28A.27 (mandatory attendance); ch. 28A.67 (teacher qualifications); ch. 28A.05 and §§ 28A.58.750–28A.58.754 (curriculum). But Washington has chosen to meet its educational responsibilities primarily through "state and local officials, boards, and committees," § 28A.02.020, and the responsibility to devise and tailor educational programs 478 to suit local needs has emphatically been vested in the local school boards.

Thus "each common school district board of directors" is made "accountable for the proper operation of [its] district to the local community and its electorate." § 28A.58.758(1). To this end, each school board is "vested with the final responsibility for the setting of policies ensuring quality in the content and extent of its educational program" (emphasis added). Ibid. School boards are given responsibility for, among many other things, "[e]stablish[ing] performance criteria" for personnel and programs, for assigning staff "according to board enumerated classroom and program needs," for setting requirements concerning hours of instruction, for establishing curriculum standards "relevant to the particular needs of district students or the unusual characteristics of the district," and for evaluating teaching materials. § 28A.58.758(2). School boards are generally directed to "develop a program identifying student learning objectives for their district [s]," § 28A.58.090; see also § 28A.58.092, to select instructional materials, § 28A.58.103, to stock libraries as they deem necessary, § 28A.58.104, and to initiate a variety of optional programs. See, e.g., §§ 28A.34.010, 28A.35.010, 28A.58.105. School boards, of course, are given broad corporate powers. §§ 28A.58.010, 28A.58.075, 28A.59.180. Significantly for present purposes, school boards are directed to determine which students should be bused to school and to provide those students with transportation. § 28A.24.055.

Indeed, the notion of school board responsibility for local educational programs is so firmly rooted that local boards are subject to disclosure and reporting provisions specifically designed to ensure the board's "accountability" to the people of the community for "the educational programs in the school distric[t]." § 28A.58.758(3). And, perhaps most relevant here, before the adoption of Initiative 350 the Washington Supreme Court had found it within the general discretion of 479 local school authorities to settle problems related to the denial of "equal educational opportunity."[20] Citizens Against Mandatory Bussing v. Palmason, 80 Wash.2d 445, 453, 495 P.2d 657, 663 (1972). It therefore had squarely held that a program of desegregative busing was a proper means of furthering the school board's responsibility to "administe[r] the schools in such a way as to provide a sound education for all children." Id., at 456, 495 P.2d, at 664.[21] See State ex rel. Citizens Against Mandatory Bussing v. Brooks, 80 Wash.2d 121, 492 P.2d 536 (1972); State ex rel. Lukens *3200 v. Spokane School District No. 81, 147 Wash. 467, 474, 266 P. 189, 191 (1928).[22]

Given this statutory structure, we have little difficulty concluding that Initiative 350 worked a major reordering of the State's educational decisionmaking process. Before adoption of the initiative, the power to determine what programs would most appropriately fill a school district's educational needs—including programs involving student assignment and desegregation—was firmly committed to the local board's 480 discretion. The question whether to provide an integrated learning environment rather than a system of neighborhood schools surely involved a decision of that sort. See Citizens Against Mandatory Bussing v. Palmason, 80 Wash.2d, at 459–460, 495 P.2d, at 666–667. After passage of Initiative 350, authority over all but one of those areas remained in the hands of the local board. By placing power over desegregative busing at the state level, then, Initiative 350 plainly "differentiates between the treatment of problems involving racial matters and that afforded other problems in the same area." Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp., at 718.[23] The District Court and the Court of Appeals similarly concluded that the initiative restructured the Washington political process, and we see no reason to challenge the determinations of courts familiar with local law. Cf. Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S., at 769, 94 S.Ct., at 3139 (WHITE, J., dissenting).

That we reach this conclusion should come as no surprise, for when faced with a similar educational scheme in 481 Milliken v. Bradley, supra,[24] the Court concluded that the actions of a local school board could not be attributed to the State that had created it. We there addressed the Michigan education system, which vests in the State constitutional responsibility for providing education: " 'The policy of [Michigan] has been to retain control of its school system, to be administered throughout the State under State laws by local State agencies ... to carry out the delegated functions given [them] by the legislature.' " Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S., at 794, 94 S.Ct., at 3151 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting), quoting School District of City of Lansing v. State Board of Education, 367 Mich. 591, 595, 116 N.W.2d 866, 868 (1962). See Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S., at 726, n. 5, 94 S.Ct., at 3118, n. 5. To fulfill this responsibility, the State of Michigan provided a substantial measure of school district funding, established standards for teacher certification, *3201 determined part of the curriculum, set a minimum school term, approved bus routes and textbooks, established disciplinary procedures, and under certain circumstances had the power even to remove local school board members. See id., at 795–796, 94 S.Ct., at 3151–3152 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting). See also id., at 726, n. 5, 727, 94 S.Ct., at 3118, n. 5, 3118 (describing state controls over education); id., at 768, and n. 4, 94 S.Ct., at 3139, and n. 4 (WHITE, J., dissenting) (same); id., at 794, 94 S.Ct., at 3151 (MARSHALL, J., dissenting) (same).

Yet the Court, noting that "[n]o single tradition in public education is more deeply rooted than local control over the operation of schools," concluded that the "Michigan educational structure ... in common with most States, provides for a large measure of local control." Id., at 741–742, 94 S.Ct., at 3125–3126. Relying on this analysis, the Court determined that a Michigan school board's assignment policies could not be attributed to the State, and therefore declined to permit interdistrict busing as a remedy for one school district's acts of unconstitutional 482 segregation. If local school boards operating under a similar statutory structure are considered separate entities for purposes of constitutional adjudication when they make segregative assignment decisions, it is difficult to see why a different analysis should apply when a local board's desegregative policy is at issue.

In any event, we believe that the question here is again settled by Lee. There, state control of the educational system was fully as complete as it now is in Washington. See generally N.Y.Educ.Law §§ 305, 306, 308–310 (McKinney 1969 and Supp.1981). The state statute under attack reallocated power over mandatory desegregation in two ways: it transferred authority from the State Commissioner of Education to local elected school boards, and it shifted authority from local appointed school boards to the state legislature.[25] When presented with this restructuring of the political process, the District Court declared that it could "conceive of no more compelling case for the application of the Hunter principle." 318 F.Supp., at 719. This Court of course affirmed the District Court's judgment. We see no relevant distinction between this case and Lee ; indeed, it is difficult to imagine a more precise parallel.[26]

483 C

To be sure, "the simple repeal or modification of desegregation or antidiscrimination laws, without more, never has been viewed as embodying a presumptively invalid racial classification." Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education, 458 U.S. 527, 539, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 3218, 73 L.Ed.2d 948. See Dayton Board of Education v. *3202 Brinkman, 443 U.S. 526, 531, n. 5, 99 S.Ct. 2971, 2976, n. 5, 61 L.Ed.2d 720 (1979); Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 390, n. 5, 89 S.Ct., at 560, n. 5. As Justice Harlan noted in Hunter, the voters of the polity may express their displeasure through an established legislative or referendum procedure when particular legislation "arouses passionate opposition." Id., at 395, 89 S.Ct., at 563 (concurring opinion). Had Akron's fair housing ordinance been defeated at a referendum, for example, "Negroes would undoubtedly [have lost] an important political battle, but they would not thereby [have been] denied equal protection." Id., at 394, 89 S.Ct., at 562.

Initiative 350, however, works something more than the "mere repeal" of a desegregation law by the political entity that created it. It burdens all future attempts to integrate Washington schools in districts throughout the State, by lodging decisionmaking authority over the question at a new and remote level of government. Indeed, the initiative, like the charter amendment at issue in Hunter, has its most pernicious effect on integration programs that do "not arouse extraordinary controversy." Id., at 396, 89 S.Ct., at 563 (emphasis in original). In such situations the initiative makes the enactment of racially beneficial legislation difficult, though the particular program involved might not have inspired opposition had it been promulgated through the usual legislative processes 484 used for comparable legislation.[27] This imposes direct and undeniable burdens on minority interests. "If a governmental institution is to be fair, one group cannot always be expected to win," id., at 394, 89 S.Ct., at 562; by the same token, one group cannot be subjected to a debilitating and often insurmountable disadvantage.

IV

In the end, appellants are reduced to suggesting that Hunter has been effectively overruled by more recent decisions of this Court. As they read it, Hunter applied a simple "disparate impact" analysis: it invalidated a facially neutral ordinance because of the law's adverse effects upon racial minorities. Appellants therefore contend that Hunter was swept away, along with the disparate-impact approach to equal protection, in Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S.Ct. 2040, 48 L.Ed.2d 597 (1976), and Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977). Cf. James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137, 91 S.Ct. 1331, 28 L.Ed.2d 678 (1971).

Appellants unquestionably are correct when they suggest that "purposeful discrimination is 'the condition that offends the Constitution,' " Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S., at 274, 99 S.Ct., at 2293, quoting Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1, 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 1276, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971), for the "central purpose of the Equal Protection Clause ... is the prevention of official conduct discriminating on the basis of race." Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S., at 239, 96 S.Ct., at 2047. Thus, when facially neutral legislation is subjected to 485 equal protection attack, an inquiry into intent is necessary to determine whether the legislation in some sense was designed to accord disparate treatment on the basis of racial considerations. Appellants' suggestion that this analysis somehow conflicts with Hunter, however, misapprehends the basis of the Hunter doctrine. We have not insisted on a particularized inquiry into motivation in all equal protection cases: "A racial classification, regardless of purported motivation, is presumptively *3203 invalid and can be upheld only upon an extraordinary justification." Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S., at 272, 99 S.Ct., at 2292. And legislation of the kind challenged in Hunter similarly falls into an inherently suspect category.[28]

There is one immediate and crucial difference between Hunter and the cases cited by appellants. While decisions such as Washington v. Davis and Arlington Heights considered classifications facially unrelated to race, the charter amendment at issue in Hunter dealt in explicitly racial terms with legislation designed to benefit minorities "as minorities," not legislation intended to benefit some larger group of underprivileged citizens among whom minorities were disproportionately represented. This does not mean, of course, that every attempt to address a racial issue gives rise to an impermissible racial classification. See Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education, 458 U.S. 527, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 73 L.Ed.2d 948. But when the political process or the decisionmaking mechanism used to address racially conscious legislation—and only such legislation—is singled out for peculiar and disadvantageous treatment, the governmental action plainly "rests on 'distinctions based on race.' "[29] 486 James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S., at 141, 91 S.Ct., at 1333, quoting Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560. And when the State's allocation of power places unusual burdens on the ability of racial groups to enact legislation specifically designed to overcome the "special condition" of prejudice, the governmental action seriously "curtail[s] the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities." United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 153, n. 4, 58 S.Ct. 778, 783–784, n. 4, 82 L.Ed. 1234 (1938). In a most direct sense, this implicates the judiciary's special role in safeguarding the interests of those groups that are "relegated to such a position of political powerlessness as to command extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process." San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 28, 93 S.Ct. 1278, 1296, 36 L.Ed.2d 16 (1973).[30]

Hunter recognized the considerations addressed above, and it therefore rested on a principle that has been vital for over a century—that "the core of the Fourteenth Amendment is the prevention of meaningful and unjustified official distinctions based on race." 393 U.S., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560. Just such distinctions infected the reallocation of decisionmaking authority considered in Hunter, for minorities are no less powerless with the vote than without it when a racial criterion is used to assign governmental power in such a way as to exclude particular racial groups "from effective participation in the political proces[s]." Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S., at 94, 100 S.Ct., at 1514 (WHITE, J., dissenting). Certainly, a state requirement that "desegregation or antidiscrimination laws," Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education, 458 U.S., at 539, 102 S.Ct., at 3218, and only such 487 laws, be passed by unanimous vote of the legislature would be constitutionally suspect. It would be equally questionable for a community to require that laws or ordinances "designed to ameliorate *3204 race relations or to protect racial minorities," ibid., be confirmed by popular vote of the electorate as a whole, while comparable legislation is exempted from a similar procedure. The amendment addressed in Hunter —and, as we have explained, the legislation at issue here—was less obviously pernicious than are these examples, but was no different in principle.

V

In reaching this conclusion, we do not undervalue the magnitude of the State's interest in its system of education. Washington could have reserved to state officials the right to make all decisions in the areas of education and student assignment. It has chosen, however, to use a more elaborate system; having done so, the State is obligated to operate that system within the confines of the Fourteenth Amendment. That, we believe, it has failed to do.[31]

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

488 Justice POWELL, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice REHNQUIST, and Justice O'CONNOR join, dissenting.

The people of the State of Washington, by a two-to-one vote, have adopted a neighborhood school policy. The policy is binding on local school districts but in no way affects the authority of state or federal courts to order school transportation to remedy violations of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor does the policy affect the power of local school districts to establish voluntary transfer programs for racial integration or for any other purpose.

In the absence of a constitutional violation, no decision of this Court compels a school district to adopt or maintain a mandatory busing program for racial integration.[1] Accordingly, the Court does not hold that the adoption of a neighborhood school policy by local school districts would be unconstitutional. Rather, it holds that the adoption of such a 489 policy at the state level—rather than at the local level—violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

*3205 I dissent from the Court's unprecedented intrusion into the structure of a state government. The School Districts in this case were under no federal constitutional obligation to adopt mandatory busing programs. The State of Washington, the governmental body ultimately responsible for the provision of public education, has determined that certain mandatory busing programs are detrimental to the education of its children. "[T]he Fourteenth Amendment leaves the States free to distribute the powers of government as they will between their legislative and judicial branches." Hughes v. Superior Court, 339 U.S. 460, 467, 70 S.Ct. 718, 722, 94 L.Ed. 985 (1950). In my view, that Amendment leaves the States equally free to decide matters of concern to the State at the state, rather than local, level of government.

I

At the November 1978 general election, the voters of the State adopted Initiative 350 by a two-to-one majority.[2] The Initiative sets forth a neighborhood school policy binding on local school districts. It establishes a general rule prohibiting school districts from "directly or indirectly requir [ing] any student to attend a school other than the school which is geographically nearest or next nearest the student's place of residence." Wash.Rev.Code § 28A.26.010 (1981). The rule may be avoided in individual instances only if the student requires special education; if there are health or safety hazards between the student's residence and the nearest or next 490 nearest school; or if the nearby schools are overcrowded, unsafe, or lacking in physical facilities. Ibid.

The Initiative includes two significant limitations upon the scope of its neighborhood school policy. It expressly provides that nothing in the Initiative shall "preclude the establishment of schools offering specialized or enriched educational programs which students may voluntarily choose to attend, or of any other voluntary option offered to students." § 28A.26.050. Moreover, and critical to this case, the authority of state and federal courts to order mandatory school assignments to remedy constitutional violations is left untouched by the Initiative: "This chapter shall not prevent any court of competent jurisdiction from adjudicating constitutional issues relating to the public schools." § 28A.26.060.[3]

This suit was filed in United States District Court shortly after the Initiative was enacted. The Seattle School District, joined by the Tacoma and Pasco School Districts[4] and certain individual plaintiffs, argued that the Initiative violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The District Court agreed, and, in a split decision, the Court of Appeals affirmed. Relying on Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S. 385, 89 S.Ct. 557, 21 L.Ed.2d 616 (1969), the Court of Appeals concluded that Initiative 350 "both creates a constitutionally-suspect racial classification and radically restructures the political 491 process of Washington by allowing a state-wide majority to usurp traditional local authority *3206 over local school board educational policies." 633 F.2d 1338, 1344 (CA9 1980).[5]

II

The principles that should guide us in reviewing the constitutionality of Initiative 350 are well established. To begin with, we have never held, or even intimated, that absent a federal constitutional violation, a State must choose to treat persons differently on the basis of race. In the absence of a federal constitutional violation requiring race-specific remedies, a policy of strict racial neutrality by a State would violate no federal constitutional principle. Cf. University of California Regents v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978).

In particular, a neighborhood school policy and a decision not to assign students on the basis of their race, does not offend the Fourteenth Amendment.[6] The Court has never 492 held that there is an affirmative duty to integrate the schools in the absence of a finding of unconstitutional segregation. See Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1, 24, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 1280, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971); Dayton Board of Education v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406, 417, 97 S.Ct. 2766, 2774, 53 L.Ed.2d 851 (1977). Certainly there is no constitutional duty to adopt mandatory busing in the absence of such a violation. Indeed, even where desegregation is ordered because of a constitutional violation, the Court has never held that racial balance itself is a constitutional requirement. Ibid. And even where there have been segregated schools, once desegregation has been accomplished no further constitutional duty exists upon school boards or States to maintain integration. See Pasadena City Board of Education v. Spangler, 427 U.S. 424, 96 S.Ct. 2697, 49 L.Ed.2d 599 (1976).

Moreover, it is a well-established principle that the States have "extraordinarily wide latitude ... in creating various types of political subdivisions and conferring authority upon them." *3207 Holt Civic Club v. Tuscaloosa, 439 U.S. 60, 71, 99 S.Ct. 383, 390, 58 L.Ed.2d 292 (1978).[7] The Constitution does not dictate to the States a 493 particular division of authority between legislature and judiciary or between state and local governing bodies. It does not define institutions of local government.

Thus, a State may choose to run its schools from the state legislature or through local school boards just as it may choose to address the matter of race relations at the state or local level. There is no constitutional requirement that the State establish or maintain local institutions of government or that it delegate particular powers to these bodies. The only relevant constitutional limitation on a State's freedom to order its political institutions is that it may not do so in a fashion designed to "plac[e] special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process." Hunter v. Erickson, 393 U.S., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560–61 (emphasis added).

In sum, in the absence of a prior constitutional violation, the States are under no constitutional duty to adopt integration programs in their schools, and certainly they are under no duty to establish a regime of mandatory busing. Nor does the Federal Constitution require that particular decisions concerning the schools or any other matter be made on the local as opposed to the state level. It does not require the States to establish local governmental bodies or to delegate unreviewable authority to them.

III

Application of these settled principles demonstrates the serious error of today's decision—an error that cuts deeply into the heretofore unquestioned right of a State to structure the decisionmaking authority of its government. In this case, by 494 Initiative 350, the State has adopted a policy of racial neutrality in student assignments. The policy in no way interferes with the power of state or federal courts to remedy constitutional violations. And if such a policy had been adopted by any of the School Districts in this litigation there could have been no question that the policy was constitutional.[8]

The issue here arises only because the Seattle School District—in the absence of a then-established state policy—chose to adopt race specific school assignments with extensive busing. It is not questioned that the District itself, at any time thereafter, could have changed its mind and canceled its integration program without violating the Federal Constitution. Yet this Court holds that neither the legislature nor the people of the State of Washington could alter what the District had decided.

The Court argues that the people of Washington by Initiative 350 created a racial classification, and yet must agree that identical action by the Seattle School District itself would have created no such classification. This is not an easy argument to answer because it seems to make no sense. School boards are the creation of supreme state authority, whether in a State Constitution or by legislative enactment. Until today's decision no one would have questioned the authority of a State to abolish school boards altogether, or to require that they conform to any lawful state policy. *3208 And in the State of Washington, a neighborhood school policy would have been lawful.

Under today's decision this heretofore undoubted supreme authority of a State's electorate is to be curtailed whenever a school board—or indeed any other state board or local instrumentality—adopts a race-specific program that arguably benefits racial minorities. Once such a program is adopted, 495 only the local or subordinate entity that approved it will have authority to change it. The Court offers no authority or relevant explanation for this extraordinary subordination of the ultimate sovereign power of a State to act with respect to racial matters by subordinate bodies. It is a strange notion—alien to our system—that local governmental bodies can forever preempt the ability of a State—the sovereign power—to address a matter of compelling concern to the State. The Constitution of the United States does not require such a bizarre result.

This is certainly not a case where a State—in moving to change a locally adopted policy—has established a racially discriminatory requirement. Initiative 350 does not impede enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment. If a Washington school district should be found to have established a segregated school system, Initiative 350 will place no barrier in the way of a remedial busing order. Nor does Initiative 350 authorize or approve segregation in any form or degree. It is neutral on its face, and racially neutral as public policy. Children of all races benefit from neighborhood schooling, just as children of all races benefit from exposure to " 'ethnic and racial diversity in the classroom.' " Ante, at 3196, quoting Columbus Board of Education v. Penick, 443 U.S. 449, 486, 99 S.Ct. 2941, 2991, 61 L.Ed.2d 666 (1979) (POWELL, J., dissenting).[9]

Finally, Initiative 350 places no "special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process," 496 Hunter v. Erickson, supra, 393 U.S., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560–61, such that interference with the State's distribution of authority is justified. Initiative 350 is simply a reflection of the State's political process at work. It does not alter that process in any respect. It does not require, for example, that all matters dealing with race—or with integration in the schools—must henceforth be submitted to a referendum of the people. Cf. Hunter v. Erickson, supra. The State has done no more than precisely what the Court has said that it should do: It has "resolved through the political process" the "desirability and efficacy of [mandatory] school desegregation" where there has been no unlawful segregation. Ante, at 3197.

The political process in Washington, as in other States, permits persons who are dissatisfied at a local level to appeal to the state legislature or the people of the State for redress. It permits the people of a State to pre-empt local policies, and to formulate new programs and regulations. Such a process is inherent in the continued sovereignty of the States. This is our system. Any time a State chooses to address a major issue some persons or groups may be disadvantaged. In a democratic system there are winners and losers. But there is no inherent unfairness in this and certainly no constitutional violation.[10]

*3209 IV

Nonetheless, the Court holds that Initiative 350 "imposes substantial and unique burdens on racial minorities" in the governmental process. See ante, at 3195. Its authority for 497 this holding is said to be Hunter v. Erickson, supra.[11] In Hunter the people of Akron passed a charter amendment that "not only suspended the operation of the existing ordinance forbidding housing discrimination, but also required the approval of the electors before any future [antidiscrimination] ordinance could take effect." 393 U.S., at 389–390, 89 S.Ct., at 559–60. Although the charter amendment was facially neutral, the Court found that it could be said to embody a racial classification: "[T]he reality is that the law's impact falls on the minority. The majority needs no protection against discrimination." Id., at 391, 89 S.Ct., at 560. By making it more difficult to pass legislation in favor of racial minorities, the amendment placed "special burdens on racial minorities within the governmental process." Ibid.

Nothing in Hunter supports the Court's extraordinary invasion into the State's distribution of authority. Even could it be assumed that Initiative 350 imposed a burden on racial minorities,[12] it simply does not place unique political obstacles in the way of racial minorities. In this case, unlike in 498 Hunter, the political system has not been redrawn or altered. The authority of the State over the public school system, acting through initiative or the legislature, is plenary. Thus, the State's political system is not altered when it adopts for the first time a policy, concededly within the area of its authority, for the regulation of local school districts. And certainly racial minorities are not uniquely or comparatively burdened by the State's adoption of a policy that would be lawful if adopted by any school district in the State.[13]

Hunter, therefore, is simply irrelevant. It is the Court that by its decision today *3210 disrupts the normal course of State government.[14] Under its unprecedented theory of a vested 499 constitutional right to local decisionmaking, the State apparently is now forever barred from addressing the perplexing problems of how best to educate fairly all children in a multi-racial society where, as in this case, the local school board has acted first.[15]

500 V

We are not asked to decide the wisdom of a state policy that limits the ability of local school districts to adopt—on their own volition—mandatory reassignments for racial balance. We must decide only whether the Federal Constitution permits the State to adopt such a policy. The School Districts in this case were under no federal constitutional obligation to adopt mandatory busing. Absent such an obligation, the State—exercising its sovereign authority over all subordinate agencies—should be free to reject this debatable restriction on liberty. But today's decision denies this right to a State. In this case, it deprives the State of Washington of all opportunity to address the unresolved questions resulting from extensive mandatory busing.[16] *3211 The Constitution does not dictate to the States at what level of government decisions 501 affecting the public schools must be taken. It certainly does not strip the States of their sovereignty. It therefore does not authorize today's intrusion into the State's internal structure.[17]

All Citations

458 U.S. 457, 102 S.Ct. 3187, 73 L.Ed.2d 896, 5 Ed. Law Rep. 58

Footnotes

[*] The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

[1] In 1971, the District implemented a program of mandatory reassignments to integrate certain of its middle schools. This prompted an attempt to recall four School Board members who had voted for the program. That attempt narrowly failed. See 473 F.Supp. 996, 1006 (WD Wash.1979).

[2] Several community organizations threatened legal action if the District did not initiate a more effective integration effort, while the Mayor of Seattle and a number of community leaders, by letter dated May 20, 1977, urged the District to adopt "a definition of racial isolation and measurable goals leading to the elimination of racial isolation in the Seattle Public Schools prior to a Court ordered and mandated desegregation remedy." App. 139.

[3] The District Court found that the actions of the School Board were prompted by its members' "desire to ward off threatened litigation, their desire to prevent the threatened loss of federal funds, their desire to relieve the black students of the disproportionate burden which they had borne in the voluntary efforts to balance the schools racially and their perception that racial balance in the schools promotes the attainment of equal educational opportunity and is beneficial in the preparation of all students for democratic citizenship regardless of their race." 473 F.Supp., at 1007.

[4] Washington's Constitution reserves to the people of the State "the power to propose bills, laws, and to enact or reject the same at the polls, independent of the legislature." Wash.Const., Art. II, § 1. Such initiatives are placed on the ballot upon the petition of 8% of the State's voters registered and voting for governor at the last preceding regular gubernatorial election. § 1a. If passed by the electorate, an initiative may not be repealed by the state legislature for two years, although it may be amended within two years by a vote of two-thirds of each house of the legislature. § 41. See generally Comment, Judicial Review of Laws Enacted by Popular Vote, 55 Wash.L.Rev. 175 (1979).

[5] The text of Initiative 350 is now codified as Wash.Rev.Code §§ 28A.26.010–28A.26.900 (1981).

[6] At the beginning of the 1978–1979 academic year, approximately 300,000 of the 769,040 students enrolled in Washington's public schools were bused to school. Ninety-five percent of these students were transported for reasons unrelated to race. 473 F.Supp., at 1002.

[7] Along with Seattle, Tacoma School District No. 10 and Pasco School District No. 1 are the only districts in the State of Washington with comprehensive integration programs, and therefore the three are the only districts affected by Initiative 350. See id., at 1009. Since 1965, Pasco has made use of school closures and a mandatory busing program to overcome the racial isolation caused by segregated housing patterns; if students attended the schools nearest their homes, three of Pasco's seven elementary schools would have a primarily white and three a primarily minority student body. Id., at 1002–1003. The Tacoma School District has made use of school closures, racially controlled enrollment at magnet schools, and voluntary transfers—though not mandatory busing—to enhance racial balance in its schools. Id., at 1003–1004.

[8] Several of the intervenor plaintiffs also alleged that the District had engaged in de jure segregation, and therefore was operating an unconstitutional dual school system. The District Court therefore bifurcated the litigation, first addressing the constitutionality of Initiative 350. Because of the court's conclusions on that question, the allegations of de jure segregation did not go to trial and have not been addressed by the District Court or by the Court of Appeals.

[9] The District Court acknowledged that it was impossible to determine whether the supporters of Initiative 350 "subjectively [had] a racially discriminatory intent or purpose," because "[a]s to that subjective intent the secret ballot raises an impenetrable barrier." Id., at 1014. The court looked instead to objective factors, noting that it "marked [a] departure from the norm ... for the autonomy of school boards to be restricted relative to the assignment of students," and that it marked a similar "departure from the procedural norm" for "an administrative decision of a subordinate local unit of government ... [to be] overridden in a statewide initiative." Id., at 1016. These factors, when coupled with the "racially disproportionate impact of the initiative," its "historical background," and "the sequence of events leading to its adoption," were found to demonstrate that a "racially discriminatory intent or purpose was at least one motivating factor in the adoption of the initiative." Ibid.

10 The District Court noted that school boards that had practiced de jure segregation are under an affirmative obligation to eliminate the effects of that practice. Ibid. See Columbus Board of Education v. Penick, 443 U.S. 449, 458–459, 99 S.Ct. 2941, 2947, 61 L.Ed.2d 666 (1979).

11 The Court of Appeals therefore did not address the District Court's alternative finding that Initiative 350 had been adopted for discriminatory reasons, or its conclusion that the initiative was overbroad. 633 F.2d, at 1342.

12 After the decision on the merits, the District Court had declined to award attorney's fees to the plaintiff School Districts because the Districts are state-funded entities. App. to Juris. Statement C–1. The Court of Appeals reversed on this issue, concluding that the District Court had abused its discretion in denying fees. The Court of Appeals determined that the School Districts fell within the language of the attorney's fees statutes, 42 U.S.C. § 1988 and 20 U.S.C. § 3205 (1976 ed., Supp.IV), see n. 31, infra, and it reasoned that "[a]s long as a publicly-funded organization advances important constitutional values, it is eligible for fees under the statutes." 633 F.2d, at 1348.

13 As does Initiative 350, the New York statute apparently permitted voluntary student transfers to achieve integration. See n. 16, infra.

14 The Court of Appeals accepted the District Court's characterization of the initiative, and even the dissenting judge in the Court of Appeals agreed that Initiative 350 addresses a "racial" problem. 633 F.2d, at 1353.

15 Appellants and the United States do not challenge the propriety of race-conscious student assignments for the purpose of achieving integration, even absent a finding of prior de jure segregation. We therefore do not specifically pass on that issue. See generally Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1, 16, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 1276, 28 L.Ed.2d 586 (1971); North Carolina State Board of Education v. Swann, 402 U.S. 43, 45, 91 S.Ct. 1284, 1286, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971). Cf. University of California Regents v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 300, n. 39, 312–314, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 2753, n. 39, 2759–2760, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978) (opinion of POWELL, J.).

16 The United States seeks to distinguish Lee by suggesting that the statute there at issue "clearly prohibited" all attempts to ameliorate racial imbalance in the schools, while Initiative 350 permits voluntary desegregation efforts. Brief for United States 25. Even assuming that this distinction would otherwise be of constitutional significance, its premise is not accurate. The legislation challenged in Lee did permit voluntary integration efforts, for it expressly exempted from its restrictions "the assignment of a pupil in the manner requested or authorized by his parents or guardian." 318 F.Supp., at 712. Thus, as the District Court in Lee noted, the statute "denie[d] appointed officials the power to implement non-voluntary programs for the improvement of racial balance." Id., at 715 (emphasis added). The difficulty in Lee —as in this case—stemmed from the Lee District Court's conclusion that a voluntary program would not serve to integrate the community's schools: "Voluntary plans for achieving racial balance ... have not had a significant impact on the problems of racial segregation in the Buffalo public schools; indeed it would appear that racial isolation is actually increasing." Ibid. Thus the statute challenged in Lee and Initiative 350 operated in precisely the same way to "deny ... student [s] the right to attend a fully integrated school." Brief for United States 25.

17 Justice POWELL finds Hunter completely irrelevant, dismissing it with the conclusory statement that "the political system [of Washington] has not been redrawn or altered." Post, at 3209 (emphasis in original). But the dissent entirely fails to address the relevance of Hunter to the reallocation of decisionmaking authority worked by Initiative 350. The evil condemned by the Hunter Court was not the particular political obstacle of mandatory referenda imposed by the Akron charter amendment; it was, rather, the comparative structural burden placed on the political achievement of minority interests. Thus, in Hunter, the procedures for enacting racial legislation were modified in such a way as to place effective control in the hands of the citywide electorate. Similarly here, the power to enact racial legislation has been reallocated. In each case, the effect of the challenged action was to redraw decisionmaking authority over racial matters—and only over racial matters—in such a way as to place comparative burdens on minorities. While Justice POWELL and the United States find it crucial that the proponents of integrated schools remain free to use Washington's initiative system to further their ends, that was true in Hunter as well: proponents of open housing were not barred from invoking Akron's initiative procedures to repeal the charter amendment, or to enact fair housing legislation of their own. It surely is an excessively formal exercise, then, to argue that the procedural revisions at issue in Hunter imposed special burdens on minorities, but that the selective allocation of decisionmaking authority worked by Initiative 350 does not erect comparable political obstacles. Indeed, Hunter would have been virtually identical to this case had the Akron charter amendment simply barred the City Council from passing any fair housing ordinance, as Initiative 350 forbids the use of virtually all mandatory desegregation strategies. Surely, however, Hunter would not have come out the other way had the charter amendment made no provision for the passage of fair housing legislation, instead of subjecting such legislation to ratification by referendum.

The United States also would note that Initiative 350's "modification of state policy [was] not the result of any unusual political procedure," Brief for United States 30, for initiatives and referenda are often used by the Washington electorate. But that observation hardly serves to distinguish this case from Hunter, since the fair housing charter amendment was added through the unexceptional use of Akron's initiative procedure. See 393 U.S., at 387, 89 S.Ct., at 558.

18 Despite the force with which it is written, then, Justice POWELL's essay on "the heretofore unquestioned right of a State to structure the decisionmaking authority of its government," post, at 3207 —as well as his observations on a State's right to repeal programs designed to eliminate de facto segregation—is largely beside the point. The State's power has not been questioned at any point during this litigation. The single narrow question before us is whether the State has exercised its power in such a way as to place special, and therefore impermissible, burdens on minority interests.

19 The Court noted in Hunter that Akron "might have proceeded by majority vote ... on all its municipal legislation," 393 U.S., at 392, 89 S.Ct., at 561; the charter amendment was invalidated because the citizens of Akron did not reserve all power to themselves, but rather distributed it in a nonneutral manner. In Lee, of course, the State had unquestioned authority to vest all power over education in state officials.

20 Indeed, even the State's efforts to help ensure equal opportunity in education and to encourage desegregation are cast in cooperative terms, and are designed to assist school districts in implementing programs of their choosing. See, e.g., Wash.Rev.Code §§ 28A.21.010(3), 28A.21.136(1) and (3) (1981); cf. § 28A.58.245(3).

21 The Washington Supreme Court noted: "[A]s long as the school board authorized or required students to attend schools geographically situated close to their homes, they had such a right. But the right existed only because it was given to them by the school authorities." 80 Wash.2d, at 452, 495 P.2d, at 662.

22 We also note that the State has not attempted to reserve to itself exclusive power to deal with racial issues generally. Municipalities in Washington have been given broad powers of self-government, see generally Wash.Const., Amdt. 40; Wash.Rev.Code §§ 35.22.020, 35.23.440, 35.27.370, 35.30.010 (1981); Wash.Rev.Code, Tit. 35A (Optional Municipal Code), and Washington courts specifically have held that municipalities have the power to enact antidiscrimination ordinances. See, e.g., Seattle Newspaper-Web Pressmen's Union Local No. 26 v. Seattle, 24 Wash.App. 462, 604 P.2d 170 (1979). Cf. 5 E. McQuillin, Law of Municipal Corporations § 19.23, p. 425 (3d rev. ed. 1981).

23 Throughout his dissent, Justice POWELL insists that the Court has created a "vested constitutional right to local decisionmaking," post, at 3210, that under our holding "the people of the State of Washington apparently are forever barred from developing a different policy on mandatory busing where a school district previously has adopted one of its own," post, at 3210, n. 14, and that today's decision somehow raises doubts about "the authority of a State to abolish school boards altogether." Post, at 3207. See also id., at 3208, and at 3210, n. 14. These statements evidence a basic misunderstanding of our decision. Our analysis vests no rights, and has nothing to do with whether school board action predates that taken by the State. Instead, what we find objectionable about Initiative 350 is the comparative burden it imposes on minority participation in the political process—that is, the racial nature of the way in which it structures the process of decisionmaking. It is evident, then, that the horribles paraded by the dissent, post, at 3210, n. 14—which have nothing to do with the ability of minorities to participate in the process of self-government—are entirely unrelated to this case. It is equally clear, as we have noted at several points in our opinion, that the State remains free to vest all decisionmaking power in state officials, or to remove authority from local school boards in a race-neutral manner.

24 One amicus observes that many States employ a similar educational structure. See Brief for National School Boards Assn. as Amicus Curiae 11, 14–16, App. 1a–10a.

25 When authority to initiate desegregation programs was removed from appointed school boards and from state education officials, the only body capable of exercising power over such programs was the state legislature.

26 The United States makes only one attempt to distinguish Lee in this regard: Lee is inapposite, the United States maintains, because the statute at issue there "blocked desegregation efforts even by 'a school district subject to a pre-existing order to eliminate segregation in its schools,' " and therefore—purportedly in contrast to Initiative 350—"interfere[d] with the efforts of individual school districts to eliminate de jure segregation." Brief for United States 25, quoting Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp., at 715. If by this statement the United States seeks to place the District Court's holding and this Court's affirmance in Lee on the ground that the New York statute interfered with Buffalo's attempts to eliminate de jure segregation, its submission is simply inaccurate. At the time of the Lee litigation, Buffalo had not been found guilty of practicing intentional segregation. See Arthur v. Nyquist, 573 F.2d 134, 137 (CA2 1978). As the United States notes, Buffalo was under a "pre-existing order to eliminate segregation in its schools"—but that order was issued by the New York Commissioner of Education, because he had found Buffalo's schools de facto segregated. Appeal of Dixon, 4 N.Y.Educ. Dept. Reports 115 (1965). See Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp., at 714–715. Lee did not concern de jure segregation; it is to be explained only as a straightforward application of the Hunter doctrine.

27 That phenomenon is graphically demonstrated by the circumstances of this litigation. The longstanding desegregation programs in Pasco and Tacoma, as well as the Seattle middle school integration plan, have functioned for years without creating undue controversy. Yet they have been swept away, along with the Seattle Plan, by Initiative 350. As a practical matter, it seems most unlikely that proponents of desegregative busing in smaller communities such as Tacoma or Pasco will be able to obtain the statewide support now needed to permit them to desegregate the schools in their communities.

28 The State does not suggest that Initiative 350 furthers the kind of compelling interest necessary to overcome the strict scrutiny applied to explicit racial classifications.

29 Thus we do not hold, as the dissent implies, post, at 3207, that the State's attempt to repeal a desegregation program creates a racial classification, while "identical action" by the Seattle School Board does not. It is the State's race-conscious restructuring of its decisionmaking process that is impermissible, not the simple repeal of the Seattle Plan.

30 We also note that singling out the political processes affecting racial issues for uniquely disadvantageous treatment inevitably raises dangers of impermissible motivation. When political institutions are more generally restructured, as JUSTICE BRENNAN has noted in another context, "[t]he very breadth of [the] scheme ... negates any suggestion" of improper purpose. Walz v. Tax Comm'n, 397 U.S. 664, 689, 90 S.Ct. 1409, 1422, 25 L.Ed.2d 697 (1970) (concurring opinion).

31 Appellants also challenge the Court of Appeals' award of attorney's fees to the School District plaintiffs, see n. 12, supra, arguing that state-funded entities are not eligible to receive such awards from the State. In our view, this contention is without merit. The Districts are plainly parties covered by the language of the fees statutes. See 42 U.S.C. § 1988 (1976 ed., Supp. IV) ("In any action ... to enforce a provision of sections 1981, 1982, 1983, 1985, and 1986 of this title ... the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of its costs") (emphasis added); 20 U.S.C. § 3205 (1976 ed., Supp. IV) ("Upon the entry of a final order by a court of the United States against a ... State ... for failure to comply with ... the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as [it] pertain[s] to elementary and secondary education, the court, in its discretion ... may allow the prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of its costs") (emphasis added). Nothing in the history of the statutes suggests that this language was meant to exclude state-funded entities. To the contrary, the Courts of Appeals have held with substantial unanimity that publicly funded legal services organizations may be awarded fees. See, e.g., Dennis v. Chang, 611 F.2d 1302 (CA9 1980); Holley v. Lavine, 605 F.2d 638 (CA2 1979), cert. denied sub nom. Blum v. Holley, 446 U.S. 913, 100 S.Ct. 1843, 64 L.Ed.2d 266 (1980); Lund v. Affleck, 587 F.2d 75 (CA1 1978). And when it enacted § 1988, Congress cited with approval a decision awarding fees to a state-funded organization. See H.R.Rep.No.94–1558, p. 8, n. 16 (1976) (citing Incarcerated Men of Allen County Jail v. Fair, 507 F.2d 281 (CA6 1974). In any event, the underlying congressional policies are served by awarding fees in cases such as the one before us: no matter what the source of their funds, school boards have limited budgets, and allowing them fees "encourage[s] compliance with and enforcement of the civil rights laws." Dennis v. Chang, 611 F.2d, at 1306. See id., at 1306–1307. While appellants suggest that it is incongruous for a State to pay attorney's fees to one of its school boards, it seems no less incongruous that a local board would feel the need to sue the State for a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. We see no reason to disturb the judgment of the Court of Appeals on this point.

1 Throughout this dissent, I use the term "mandatory busing" to refer to busing—or mandatory student reassignments—for the purpose of achieving racial integration.

2 The Initiative passed by almost 66% of the statewide vote. In Seattle the Initiative passed by over 61% of the vote. It failed in only two of Seattle's legislative districts—one predominantly black and one predominantly white.

3 Unlike the constitutional amendment at issue in Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles, 458 U.S. 527, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 73 L.Ed.2d 948, Initiative 350 places no limits on the state courts in their interpretation of the State Constitution. Thus, if mandatory school assignments were required by the State Constitution—although not by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution—Initiative 350 would not hinder a State from enforcing its Constitution.

4 Tacoma School District No. 10 and Pasco School District No. 1 are the only other school districts in Washington with extensive integration programs. Pasco has relied upon school closings and mandatory busing to achieve racial integration in its schools. Only minority children are bused under the Pasco plan. 473 F.Supp. 996, 1002 (WDWash.1979). In addition to school closings, the Tacoma integration plan relies upon voluntary techniques—magnet schools and voluntary transfers.

5 Judge Wright dissented. In his view Initiative 350 could not be said to embody a racial classification. The Initiative does not classify individuals on the basis of their race. It simply deals with a matter bearing on race relations. Moreover, no racial classification is created because the citizens of a State favor mandatory school reassignments for some purposes but not for reasons of race. The benefits and problems associated with busing for one reason—e.g., for racial integration—are not the same as for another—e.g., to avoid safety hazards. Finally, Judge Wright could not understand how the exercise of authority by the State could create a racial classification. The State had not intervened by altering the legislative process in a way that burdened racial minorities. Charged by the State Constitution with the responsibility for the provision of public education, the State had simply exercised its authority to run its own school system.

Judge Wright also addressed the District Court's alternative holdings that Initiative 350 is overbroad or that it was motivated by discriminatory intent. He found no basis for either conclusion. These alternative holdings were not addressed by the Court of Appeals majority. Nor are they relied upon by the Court today. Accordingly, they are not discussed in this dissent.

[6] See Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1, 28, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 1282, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971) ("Absent a constitutional violation there would be no basis for judicially ordering assignment of students on a racial basis. All things being equal, with no history of discrimination, it might well be desirable to assign pupils to schools nearest their homes").

Indeed, in the absence of a finding of segregation by the School District, mandatory busing on the basis of race raises constitutional difficulties of its own. Extensive pupil transportation may threaten liberty or privacy interests. See University of California Regents v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 300, n. 39, 98 S.Ct. 2733, 2753, n. 39, 57 L.Ed.2d 750 (1978) (opinion of POWELL, J.); Keyes v. School District No. 1, Denver, Colo., 413 U.S. 189, 240–250, 93 S.Ct. 2686, 2713–18, 37 L.Ed.2d 548 (1973) (POWELL, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). Moreover, when a State or school board assigns students on the basis of their race, it acts on the basis of a racial classification, and we have consistently held that "[a] racial classification, regardless of purported motivation, is presumptively invalid and can be upheld only upon an extraordinary justification." Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 272, 99 S.Ct. 2282, 2292, 60 L.Ed.2d 870 (1979).

[7] "[A]ccording to the institutions of this country, the sovereignty in every State resides in the people of the State, and ... they may alter and change their form of government at their own pleasure." Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 47, 12 L.Ed. 581 (1849). See Community Communications Co. v. Boulder, 455 U.S. 40, 53–54, 102 S.Ct. 835, 842, 70 L.Ed.2d 810 (1982); Sailors v. Board of Education, 387 U.S. 105, 109, 87 S.Ct. 1549, 1552, 18 L.Ed.2d 650 (1967) ("Save and unless the state, county, or municipal government runs afoul of a federally protected right, it has vast leeway in the management of its internal affairs"); United States v. Kagama, 118 U.S. 375, 379, 6 S.Ct. 1109, 1111, 30 L.Ed. 228 (1886) (under the Constitution, sovereign authority resides either with the States or the Federal Government, and "[t]here exist ... but these two").

[8] The Court consistently has held that "the Equal Protection Clause is not violated by the mere repeal of race-related legislation or policies that were not required by the Federal Constitution in the first place." Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education, 458 U.S., at 538, 102 S.Ct., at 3218.

[9] The policies in support of neighborhood schooling are various but all of them are racially neutral. The people of the State legitimately could decide that unlimited mandatory busing places too great a burden on the liberty and privacy interests of families and students of all races. It might decide that the reassignment of students to distant schools, on the basis of race, was too great a departure from the ideal of racial neutrality in state action. And, in light of the experience with mandatory busing in other cities, the State might conclude that such a program ultimately would lead to greater racial imbalance in the schools. See Estes v. Metropolitan Branches of Dallas NAACP, 444 U.S. 437, 451, 100 S.Ct. 716, 723, 62 L.Ed.2d 626 (1980) (POWELL, J., dissenting).

[10] Cf. James v. Valtierra, 402 U.S. 137, 142, 91 S.Ct. 1331, 1334, 28 L.Ed.2d 678 (1971) ("[O]f course a lawmaking procedure that 'disadvantages' a particular group does not always deny equal protection. Under any such holding, presumably a State would not be able to require referendums on any subject unless referendums were required on all, because they would always disadvantage some group. And this Court would be required to analyze governmental structures to determine whether a gubernatorial veto provision or a filibuster rule is likely to 'disadvantage' any of the diverse and shifting groups that make up the American people").

[11] The Court also relies at certain critical points in its discussion on the summary affirmance in Lee v. Nyquist, 318 F.Supp. 710 (WDNY 1970), summarily aff'd, 402 U.S. 935, 91 S.Ct. 1618, 29 L.Ed.2d 105 (1971). As we have often noted, however, summary affirmances by this Court are of little precedential force. See Metromedia, Inc. v. San Diego, 453 U.S. 490, 500, 101 S.Ct. 2882, 2888, 69 L.Ed.2d 800 (1981). A summary affirmance "is not to be read as an adoption of the reasoning supporting the judgment under review." Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 64, n. 13, 102 S.Ct. 2309, 2315, n. 13, 72 L.Ed.2d 672 (1982).

[12] It is far from clear that in the absence of a constitutional violation, mandatory busing necessarily benefits racial minorities or that it is even viewed with favor by racial minorities. See Crawford v. Los Angeles Board of Education, 458 U.S. 527, 545, n. 32, 102 S.Ct. 3211, 3222, n. 32, 73 L.Ed.2d 948. As the Court indicates, the busing question is complex and is best resolved by the political process. Ante, at 3197.

Moreover, it is significant that Initiative 350 places no limits on voluntary programs or on court-ordered reassignments. It permits school districts to order school closings for purposes of racial balance. § 28A.26.030. And it permits school districts to order a student to attend the "next nearest"—rather than nearest—school to promote racial integration.

13 The Court repeatedly states that the effect of Initiative 350 is "to redraw decisionmaking authority over racial matters—and only over racial matters —in such a way as to place comparative burdens on minorities." Ante, at 3197, n. 17 (emphasis added). But the decision by the State to exercise its authority over the schools and over racial matters in the schools does not place a comparative burden on racial minorities. In Hunter, as we have understood it, "fair housing legislation alone was subject to an automatic referendum requirement." Gordon v. Lance, 403 U.S. 1, 5, 91 S.Ct. 1889, 1891, 29 L.Ed.2d 273 (1971) (emphasis added). By contrast, Initiative 350 merely places mandatory busing among the much larger group of matters—covering race relations, administration of the schools, and a variety of other matters—addressed at the state level. See n. 15, infra. Racial minorities, if indeed they are burdened by Initiative 350, are not comparatively burdened. In this respect, they are in the same position as any other group of persons who are disadvantaged by regulations drawn at the state level.

14 The Court's decision intrudes deeply into normal state decisionmaking. Under its holding the people of the State of Washington apparently are forever barred from developing a different policy on mandatory busing where a school district previously has adopted one of its own. This principle would not seem limited to the question of mandatory busing. Thus, if the admissions committee of a state law school developed an affirmative-action plan that came under fire, the Court apparently would find it unconstitutional for any higher authority to intervene unless that authority traditionally dictated admissions policies. As a constitutional matter, the dean of the law school, the faculty of the university as a whole, the university president, the chancellor of the university system, and the board of regents might be powerless to intervene despite their greater authority under state law.

After today's decision it is unclear whether the State may set policy in any area of race relations where a local governmental body arguably has done "more" than the Fourteenth Amendment requires. If local employment or benefits are distributed on a racial basis to the benefit of racial minorities, the State apparently may not thereafter ever intervene. Indeed, under the Court's theory one must wonder whether—under the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment—even the Federal Government could assert its superior authority to regulate in these areas.

15 Even accepting the dubious notion that a State must demonstrate some past control over public schooling or race relations before now intervening in these matters, ante, at 3198, the Court's attempt to demonstrate that Initiative 350 represents a unique thrust by the State into these areas is unpersuasive. The Court's own discussion indicates the comprehensive character of the State's activity. The Common School Provisions of the State's Code of Laws are nearly 200 pages long, governing a broad variety of school matters. The State has taken seriously its constitutional obligation to provide public education. See Wash.Const., Art. IX, § 2; Seattle School District No. 1 v. State, 90 Wash.2d 476, 518, 585 P.2d 71, 95 (1978). In light of the wide range of regulation of the public schools by the State, it is wholly unclear what degree of prior concern or control by the State would satisfy the Court's new doctrine.

In addition to public school affairs generally, the State has taken a direct interest in ending racial discrimination in the schools and elsewhere. See Wash.Rev.Code § 49.60.010 et seq. (1981). Article IX, § 1, of the State Constitution specifically prohibits discrimination in public schools: "It is the paramount duty of the state to make ample provision for the education of all children residing within its borders without distinction or preference on account of race, color, caste, or sex." The State Supreme Court has not interpreted this section of the State Constitution to prohibit race-conscious school assignments in the absence of a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Cf. Citizens Against Mandatory Bussing v. Palmason, 80 Wash.2d 445, 495 P.2d 657 (1972). But until today's decision one would have thought that the state court could have rendered such a decision without violating the Federal Constitution.

16 Responding to this dissent, the Court denies that its opinion limits the authority of the people of the State of Washington and the legislature to control or regulate school boards. It further states that "the State remains free to vest all decisionmaking power in state officials, or to remove authority from local school boards in a race-neutral manner." Ante, at 3200, n. 23. These are puzzling statements that seem entirely at odds with much of the text of the Court's opinion. It will be surprising if officials of the State of Washington—with the one exception mentioned below—will have any clear idea as to what the State now lawfully may do.

The Court does say that "[i]t is the State's race-conscious restructuring of its decisionmaking process that is impermissible, not the simple repeal of the Seattle Plan." Ante, at 3203, n. 29. Apparently the Court is saying that, despite what else may be said in its opinion, the people of the State—or the state legislature—may repeal the Seattle Plan, even though neither the people nor the legislature validly may prescribe statewide standards. I perceive no logic in—and certainly no constitutional basis for—a distinction between repealing the Seattle Plan of mandatory busing and establishing a statewide policy to the same effect. The people of a State have far greater interest in the general problems associated with compelled busing for the purpose of integration than in the plan of a single school board.

17 As a former school board member for many years, I accept the privilege of a dissenting Justice to add a personal note. In my view, the local school board—responsible to the people of the district it serves—is the best qualified agency of a state government to make decisions affecting education within its district. As a policy matter, I would not favor reversal of the Seattle Board's decision to experiment with a reasonable mandatory busing program, despite my own doubts as to the educational or social merit of such a program. See Estes v. Metropolitan Branches of Dallas NAACP, 444 U.S., at 438–448, 100 S.Ct., at 716–722 (POWELL, J., dissenting). But this case does not present a question of educational policy or even the merits of busing for racial integration. The question is one of a State's sovereign authority to structure and regulate its own subordinate bodies.

142 S.Ct. 1245
Supreme Court of the United States.

WISCONSIN LEGISLATURE, et al.
v.
WISCONSIN ELECTIONS COMMISSION, et al.

No. 21A471
|
March 23, 2022

Synopsis

Background: Individual voters petitioned to Wisconsin Supreme Court for leave to commence original action for declaration that existing maps for state legislative districts were unconstitutional and for mandatory injunction as remedy. The Wisconsin Supreme Court granted the petition and permitted the legislature, the Governor, and several other parties to intervene. The Wisconsin Supreme Court, Rebecca Grassl Bradley, J., 399 Wis.2d 623, 967 N.W.2d 469, set out the basic process and criteria that it would use to guide its decision, and later invited parties to submit proposed maps. The Wisconsin Supreme Court, Brian Hagedorn, J., 2022 WL 621082, accepted Governor's proposed maps. Certiorari was granted on request by legislature and voters for emergency stay or certiorari review.

Holdings: The Supreme Court held that:

assuming that Governor was the mapmaker who was required to satisfy narrow tailoring element of strict scrutiny for equal protection violation, Governor failed to show strong basis in evidence for concluding that Voting Rights Act (VRA) required the addition of seventh majority-Black district for General Assembly;

assuming that Wisconsin Supreme Court was the mapmaker that was required to show narrow tailoring, it did not show strong basis in evidence for concluding that VRA required the addition of seventh majority-Black district; and Wisconsin Supreme Court improperly reduced, to single factor, the three Gingles preconditions for a VRA vote-dilution claim.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice Sotomayor filed a dissenting opinion, in which Justice Kagan joined.

Opinion

*1247 PER CURIAM.

399 Because of population shifts revealed by the 2020 decennial census, Wisconsin's State Assembly and Senate districts are no longer equally apportioned. The Wisconsin Legislature passed new maps to fix the problem, but the Governor vetoed them. At an impasse, the legislature and the Governor turned to the Wisconsin Supreme Court, which had already agreed to hear an original action brought by a group 400 of voters seeking to remedy the malapportionment. Rather than attempt to draw new maps itself, the court invited the parties and intervenors—including the legislature and the Governor—to propose maps that complied with the State Constitution, the Federal Constitution, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA), 79 Stat. 437, as amended, 52 U.S.C. § 10301 et seq., and that otherwise minimized changes from the current maps.

On March 3, the court issued a decision selecting the Assembly and Senate maps that the Governor had proposed. Johnson v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, 2022 WI 14, —— Wis. 2d ——, 971 N.W.2d 402. (Because the State Constitution requires three Assembly districts to be nested within each Senate district, the court analyzed and selected the maps as a unit. Id., ¶26.) The Governor's Assembly map intentionally created seven majority-black districts—one more than the current map.[1] The Governor argued that the addition of a seventh majority-black district was necessary for compliance with the VRA. In adopting the Governor's map, the court explained: "[W]e cannot say for certain on this record that seven majority-Black assembly districts are required by the VRA." Id., ¶47. It nevertheless concluded that the Governor's map complied with the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment *1248 because there were "good reasons" to think that the VRA "may" require the additional majority-black district. Id., ¶50.

The legislature and the voters who initiated the state-court proceeding now seek relief from that decision. They argue that the court selected race-based maps without sufficient 401 justification, in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. They ask this Court either to grant an emergency stay or to construe their application as a petition for certiorari and reverse the decision below.

We agree that the court committed legal error in its application of decisions of this Court regarding the relationship between the constitutional guarantee of equal protection and the VRA. We accordingly construe the application for stay presented to Justice BARRETT and by her referred to the Court as a petition for certiorari, grant the petition, reverse the imposition of the Governor's State Assembly and Senate maps, and remand to the Wisconsin Supreme Court for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. Summarily correcting the error gives the court sufficient time to adopt maps consistent with the timetable for Wisconsin's August 9th primary election.

* * *

Under the Equal Protection Clause, districting maps that sort voters on the basis of race " 'are by their very nature odious.' " Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 643, 113 S.Ct. 2816, 125 L.Ed.2d 511 (1993). Such laws "cannot be upheld unless they are narrowly tailored to achieving a compelling state interest." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 904, 115 S.Ct. 2475, 132 L.Ed.2d 762 (1995). We have assumed that complying with the VRA is a compelling interest. Cooper v. Harris, 581 U. S. ——, ——, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 1463–1464, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017). And we have held that if race is the predominant factor motivating the placement of voters in or out of a particular district, the State bears the burden of showing that the design of that district withstands strict scrutiny. Ibid. Thus, our precedents hold that a State can satisfy strict scrutiny if it proves that its race-based sorting of voters is narrowly tailored to comply with the VRA. Ibid.

A State violates § 2 of the VRA "if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of [a 402 minority group] in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice." 52 U.S.C. § 10301(b). We have construed § 2 to prohibit the distribution of minority voters into districts in a way that dilutes their voting power. See Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 46–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986). In Gingles, we provided a framework for demonstrating a violation of that sort. First, three "preconditions" must be shown: (1) The minority group must be sufficiently large and compact to constitute a majority in a reasonably configured district, (2) the minority group must be politically cohesive, and (3) a majority group must vote sufficiently as a bloc to enable it to usually defeat the minority group's preferred candidate. Id., at 50–51, 106 S.Ct. 2752.

If the preconditions are established, a court considers the totality of circumstances to determine "whether the political process is equally open to minority voters." Id., at 79, 106 S.Ct. 2752; see also Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 1011–1012, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994) (satisfying the Gingles preconditions is necessary but not sufficient to show a § 2 *1249 violation; "courts must also examine other evidence in the totality of circumstances"). We have identified as relevant to the totality analysis several factors enumerated in the Senate Report on the 1982 amendments to the VRA, as well as "whether the number of districts in which the minority group forms an effective majority is roughly proportional to its share of the population in the relevant area." League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 426, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006) (LULAC).

We said in Cooper that when a State invokes § 2 to justify race-based districting, "it must show (to meet the 'narrow tailoring' requirement) that it had 'a strong basis in evidence' for concluding that the statute required its action." 581 U. S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1464. The Wisconsin Supreme Court concluded that the Governor's intentional addition of a seventh majority-black district triggered the Equal Protection Clause and that Cooper's strict-scrutiny test must accordingly be satisfied. 403 Accepting those conclusions, we hold that the court erred in its efforts to apply Cooper's understanding of what the Equal Protection Clause requires.

It is not clear whether the court viewed the Governor or itself as the state mapmaker who must satisfy strict scrutiny, but the court's application of Cooper was flawed either way. If the former, the Governor failed to carry his burden. His main explanation for drawing the seventh majority-black district was that there is now a sufficiently large and compact population of black residents to fill it, Brief for Intervenor-Respondent Evers in Johnson v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, No. 2021AP1450–OA (Wis. Sup. Ct., Dec. 15, 2021), p. 14—apparently embracing just the sort of uncritical majority-minority district maximization that we have expressly rejected. De Grandy, 512 U.S. at 1017, 114 S.Ct. 2647 ("Failure to maximize cannot be the measure of § 2"). He provided almost no other evidence or analysis supporting his claim that the VRA required the seven majority-black districts that he drew. See 2022 WI 14, ¶¶90–91, 103–107 (Ziegler, C. J., dissenting). Strict scrutiny requires much more. See Abbott v. Perez, 585 U. S. ——, ——, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 2335, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018) ("[W]here we have accepted a State's 'good reasons' for using race in drawing district lines, the State made a strong showing of a pre-enactment analysis with justifiable conclusions"). If the Wisconsin Supreme Court was reviewing whether the Governor satisfied strict scrutiny, it erred by adopting his maps.

If, on the other hand, the court sought to shoulder strict scrutiny's burden itself, it fared little better. First, it misunderstood Cooper's inquiry. The court believed that it had to conclude only that the VRA might support race-based districting—not that the statute required it. See 2022 WI 14, ¶¶47, 50 ("[W]e cannot say for certain on this record that seven majority-Black assembly districts are required by the VRA," but "we see good reasons to conclude a seventh majority-Black assembly district 404 may be required" (emphasis added)). Our precedent instructs otherwise. Thus in Cooper we explained, for example, that "race-based districting is narrowly tailored ... if a State had 'good reasons' for thinking that the Act demanded such steps." 581 U. S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1969 (emphasis added). And we concluded that "experience gave the State no reason to think that the VRA required" it to move voters based on race. Id., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1970 (emphasis added). That principle grew out of the more general proposition that "the institution that makes the racial distinction must have had a 'strong basis in evidence' to conclude that remedial action was necessary, 'before *1250 it embarks on an affirmative-action program.' " Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 910, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996) (some emphasis added).

To be sure, we said in Cooper that States have " 'breathing room' " to make reasonable mistakes; we will not fault a State just because its "compliance measures ... may prove, in perfect hindsight, not to have been needed." 581 U. S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1464. But that "leeway" does not allow a State to adopt a racial gerrymander that the State does not, at the time of imposition, "judg[e] necessary under a proper interpretation of the VRA." Id., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1472.

Second, the court's analysis of Gingles' preconditions fell short of our standards. As we explained in Cooper, "[t]o have a strong basis in evidence to conclude that § 2 demands ... race-based steps, the State must carefully evaluate whether a plaintiff could establish the Gingles preconditions ... in a new district created without those measures." 581 U. S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1471. Rather than carefully evaluating evidence at the district level, the court improperly relied on generalizations to reach the conclusion that the preconditions were satisfied. See id., at ——, n. 5, 137 S.Ct., at 1471, n. 5 (a "generalized conclusion fails to meaningfully ... address the relevant local question" whether the preconditions would be satisfied as to each district).

The court's entire discussion of the first precondition was to say that "it is undisputed" and "the parties' submissions 405 demonstrate" that seven sufficiently large and compact majority-black districts could be drawn. 2022 WI 14, ¶43. Similarly, its discussion of the second precondition consisted of nothing but the statement that "[e]xperts from multiple parties analyzed voting trends and concluded political cohesion existed; no party disagreed." Id., ¶44. And while the court did cite one specific expert report for the third precondition—calculating, based on eight previous races, how often white voters in the Milwaukee area defeat the preferred candidate of black voters—it made virtually no effort to parse that data at the district level or respond to criticisms of the expert's analysis. Id., ¶45; see id., ¶¶108–111 (Ziegler, C. J., dissenting).[2]

Third, the court improperly reduced Gingles' totality-of-circumstances analysis to a single factor. The court acknowledged the Senate factors but concluded that they had no role to play in its analysis. 2022 WI 14, ¶46, and n. 28. Instead, it focused exclusively on proportionality. See id., ¶¶46–50. We rejected just that approach in De Grandy, explaining that "[n]o single statistic provides courts with a shortcut to determine whether a set of single-member districts unlawfully dilutes minority voting strength." 512 U.S. at 1020–1021, 114 S.Ct. 2647; see also id., at 1026, 114 S.Ct. 2647 (O'Connor, J., concurring) ("The Court ... makes clear that proportionality is never dispositive. Lack of proportionality can never by itself prove dilution, for courts must always carefully and searchingly review the totality of the circumstances").

406 The question that our VRA precedents ask and the court failed to answer is whether a race-neutral alternative that did not add a seventh majority-black district *1251 would deny black voters equal political opportunity. Answering that question requires an " ' "intensely local appraisal" ' of the challenged district." LULAC, 548 U.S. at 437, 126 S.Ct. 2594. When the Wisconsin Supreme Court endeavored to undertake a full strict-scrutiny analysis, it did not do so properly under our precedents, and its judgment cannot stand.

* * *

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin is reversed as to the selection of the Governor's State Assembly and Senate maps, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. On remand, the court is free to take additional evidence if it prefers to reconsider the Governor's maps rather than choose from among the other submissions. Any new analysis, however, must comply with our equal protection jurisprudence.

It is so ordered.

Justice SOTOMAYOR, with whom Justice KAGAN joins, dissenting.

The Court's action today is unprecedented. In an emergency posture, the Court summarily overturns a Wisconsin Supreme Court decision resolving a conflict over the State's redistricting, a decision rendered after a 5-month process involving all interested stakeholders. Despite the fact that summary reversals are generally reserved for decisions in violation of settled law, the Court today faults the State Supreme Court for its failure to comply with an obligation that, under existing precedent, is hazy at best.

When the Wisconsin Legislature and executive were unable to agree on reapportioned electoral maps following the 2020 census, the Wisconsin Supreme Court granted a voter petition to ensure that maps were in place before the 2022 elections. The court announced the criteria that it would 407 use to select maps (namely, that it would seek to minimize changes from the 2011 maps while accounting for population shifts) and permitted any party to intervene and submit maps for consideration. See Johnson v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, 2021 WI 87, ¶81, 399 Wis.2d 623, 671, 967 N.W.2d 469, 493.[1] The court ultimately rejected the State Assembly map submitted by the Wisconsin Legislature (applicants here) in favor of the map submitted by the Governor because it found the Governor's map "vastly superior" under its announced "least change" criteria. Johnson v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, 2022 WI 14, ¶¶26, 29, —— Wis. 2d ——, ——, ——, 971 N.W.2d 402, 411, 412.

The court proceeded to a preliminary analysis of whether the Equal Protection Clause or the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA) precluded it from adopting the Governor's map, which increased the number of majority-Black Assembly districts in Milwaukee from six to seven based on changes in population.[2] The court noted that the parties before it had all "appeared to assume the VRA requires at least some majority-Black districts in the Milwaukee area" and that there had been no dispute that the preconditions in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986) (for assessing whether race-conscious districting is required in order to avoid diluting minority voting power) were satisfied, aside from an undeveloped *1252 reference at oral argument. 2022 WI 14, ¶45. The court stressed, however, that no Equal Protection Clause or VRA claim was before it and that adjudicating such claims would require a fuller record and a closer assessment. It concluded that neither the Equal Protection Clause nor the VRA clearly foreclosed adopting the Governor's map in the first instance, id., ¶47, but left open the possibility that a "standard VRA 408 claim" could be "brought after the adoption of new districts," id., ¶41, n. 24.

Applicants now assert that the Wisconsin Supreme Court misapplied this Court's precedents in its preliminary assessment of whether the Governor's map violated the Equal Protection Clause. The Court agrees and summarily reverses. In doing so, however, the Court assumes the answers to multiple questions that our precedent leaves uncertain.

In its brief discussion of equal protection and the VRA, the Wisconsin Supreme Court presumed that the framework summarized in this Court's decision in Cooper v. Harris, 581 U. S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 1455, 197 L.Ed.2d 837 (2017), governed in this posture. The Court tacitly accepts that assumption. Ante, at 1248 – 1249. Cooper, however, arose in a starkly different posture. Cooper outlines the specific, burden-shifting procedure for adjudicating claims brought under the Equal Protection Clause "[w]hen a voter sues state officials for drawing ... race-based lines." 581 U. S., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1463. That framework requires that the plaintiff first "prove that race was the predominant factor motivating the legislature's decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district." Ibid. (internal quotation marks omitted). If the court finds that "racial considerations predominated over others," the burden then "shifts to the State to prove that its race-based sorting of voters" satisfies strict scrutiny. Ibid. The State can meet that burden by showing that "it had a strong basis in evidence" for concluding that the VRA required its actions, a standard that "gives States breathing room to adopt reasonable compliance measures that may prove, in perfect hindsight, not to have been needed." Id., at ——, 137 S.Ct., at 1464 (internal quotation marks omitted).[3] It is far from clear whether this burden-shifting framework should also apply in the unusual 409 circumstance where, as here, a state court is adopting a map in the first instance with no Equal Protection Clause claim before it.

Even accepting the assumption that this framework controls, it remains unclear how a court in the posture below should apply it. Again, the Wisconsin Supreme Court was selecting a map itself, not adjudicating a subsequent challenge in the manner that Cooper and other cases have addressed. The court accepted an original action to supervise the redistricting and, with the input of the parties, designed its own process for doing so: accepting proposed maps from litigants rather than "craft[ing its] own map" and determining to "choose the maps that best conform[ed] with [its] directives," even if those maps were "imperfect," rather than "modify[ing]" the lines they drew. 2022 WI 14, ¶¶4, 6. Although the Governor reported that he considered race in drawing his *1253 Assembly map, the Wisconsin Supreme Court selected the Governor's map because it scored best on a race-neutral "least change" metric. Id., ¶8. Our precedents offer no clear answers to the question whose motives should be analyzed in these circumstances (the four justices who selected the map based on the "least change" criteria, the Governor, or some combination) or how. The Court does not purport to answer this question.

The Court also faults the Wisconsin Supreme Court for failing to scrutinize each of the Gingles preconditions independently after the parties agreed that some majority-Black districts needed to be drawn in Milwaukee. Ante, at 1250 – 1251.[4] But courts generally are not mandated to investigate " 'undisputed' " and nonjurisdictional issues. Ante, at 1250 – 1251. 410 The Court points to no precedent requiring a court conducting a malapportionment analysis to embark on an independent inquiry into matters that the parties have conceded or not contested, like the Gingles preconditions here.

This Court's intervention today is not only extraordinary but also unnecessary. The Wisconsin Supreme Court rightly preserved the possibility that an appropriate plaintiff could bring an equal protection or VRA challenge in the proper forum. 2022 WI 14, ¶41, n. 24. I would allow that process to unfold, rather than further complicating these proceedings with legal confusion through a summary reversal. I respectfully dissent.

All Citations

595 U.S. 398, 142 S.Ct. 1245, 212 L.Ed.2d 251, 22 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 2962, 2022 Daily Journal D.A.R. 2855, 29 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 157

Footnotes

1 The Governor's map accomplished this addition by reducing the black voting-age population in the other six majority-black districts. The black voting-age populations in the Governor's seven districts all cluster between 50.1% and 51.4%, compared to the current six districts' range of 51% to 62%. See 2022 WI 14, ¶87 (Ziegler, C. J., dissenting).

2 That sole piece of cited record evidence came from an intervenor who argued that the Governor's map violated the VRA. See 2022

WI 14, ¶¶91, 112 (Ziegler, C. J., dissenting); Response Brief for Intervenor-Petitioner Black Leaders Organizing for Communities et al. in Johnson v. Wisconsin Elections Comm'n, No. 2021AP1450–OA (Wis. Sup. Ct., Dec. 30, 2021), pp. 7–20. The court did not acknowledge or respond to that argument.

1 Before this Court, applicants do not challenge this process.

2 The court found that the Black voting age population in the Milwaukee area had increased 5.5% since the last census, while the White voting age population had decreased 9.5%. 2022 WI 14, ¶48.

3 The other precedents on which the Court relies arose in analogous postures. See Abbott v. Perez, 585 U. S. ——, 138 S.Ct. 2305, 201 L.Ed.2d 714 (2018); League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry, 548 U.S. 399, 126 S.Ct. 2594, 165 L.Ed.2d 609 (2006); Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 116 S.Ct. 1894, 135 L.Ed.2d 207 (1996); Johnson v. De Grandy, 512 U.S. 997, 114 S.Ct. 2647, 129 L.Ed.2d 775 (1994); Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30, 106 S.Ct. 2752, 92 L.Ed.2d 25 (1986).

4 Applicants proposed a map with five majority-Black districts and a sixth with less than a majority. The court below noted concern that applicants' map might violate the VRA by "packing" minority voters into a "small number of districts to minimize their influence in the districts next door." 2022 WI 14, ¶49 (internal quotation marks omitted).

End of Document

6 S.Ct. 1064
Supreme Court of the United States

YICK WO
v.
HOPKINS, Sheriff, etc.[1] (In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of California.)
WO LEE
v.
SAME. (Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.)

Filed May 10, 1886.

Syllabus

1065 These two cases were argued as one, and depend upon precisely the same state of facts; the first coming here upon a writ of error to the supreme court of the state of California, the second on appeal from the circuit court of the United States for that district.

The plaintiff in error, Yick Wo, on August 24, 1885, petitioned the supreme court of California for the writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he was illegally deprived of his personal liberty by the defendant as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. The sheriff made return to the writ that he held the petitioner in custody by virtue of a sentence of the police judge's court No. 2 of the city and county of San Francisco, whereby he was found guilty of a violation of certain ordinances of the board of supervisors of that county, and adjudged to pay a fine of $10, and, in default of payment, be imprisoned in the county jail at the rate of one day for each dollar of fine until said fine should be satisfied; and a commitment in consequence of non-payment of said fine.

The ordinances for the violation of which he had been found guilty are set out as follows:

Order No. 1,569, passed May 26, 1880, prescribing the kind of buildings in which laundries may be located.

'The people of the city and county of San Francisco do ordain as follows:

'Section 1. It shall be unlawful, from and after the passage of this order, for any person or persons to establish, maintain, or carry on a laundry, within the corporate limits of the city and county of San Francisco, without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone.

'Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to erect, build, or maintain, or cause to be erected, built, or maintained, over or upon the roof of any building now erected, or which may hereafter be erected, within the limits of said city and county, any scaffolding, without first obtaining the written permission of the board of supervisors, which permit shall state fully for what purpose said scaffolding is to be erected and used, and such scaffolding shall not be used for any other purpose than that designated in such permit.

'Sec. 3. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this order shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.'

Order No. 1,587, passed July 28, 1880, the following section:

'Sec. 68. It shall be unlawful, from and after the passage of this order, for any person or persons to establish, maintain, or carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the city and county of San Francisco without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone'

The following facts are also admitted on the record: That petitioner is a native of China, and came to California in 1861, and is still a subject of the emperor of China; that he has been engaged in the laundry business in the same premises and building for 22 years last past; that he had a license from the board of fire-wardens, dated March 3, 1884, from which it appeared 'that the above-described premises have been inspected by the board of fire-wardens, and upon such inspection said board found all proper arrangements for carrying on the business; that the stoves, washing and drying apparatus, and the appliances for heating smoothing-irons, are in good condition, and that 1066 their use is not dangerous to the surrounding property from fire, and that all proper precautions have been taken to comply with the provisions of order No. 1,617, defining 'the fire limits of the city and county of San Francisco, and making regulations concerning the erection and use of buildings in said city and county,' and of order No. 1,670, 'prohibiting the kindling, maintenance, and use of open fires in houses;' that he had a certificate from the health officer that the same premises had been inspected by him, and that he found that they were properly and sufficiently drained, and that all proper arrangements for carrying on the business of a laundry, without injury to the sanitary condition of the neighborhood, had been complied with; that the city license of the petitioner was in force, and expired October 1, 1885; and that the petitioner applied to the board of supervisors, June 1, 1885, for consent of said board to maintain and carry on his laundry, but that said board, on July 1, 1885, refused said consent.' It is also admitted to be true, as alleged in the petition, that on February 24, 1880, 'there were about 320 laundries in the city and county of San Francisco, of which about 240 were owned and conducted by subjects of China, and of the whole number, viz., 320, about 310 were constructed of wood, the same material that constitutes ninetenths of the houses in the city of San Francisco. The capital thus invested by the subjects of China was not less than two hundred thousand dollars, and they paid annually for rent, license, taxes, gas, and water about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars.' It is alleged in the petition that 'your petitioner, and more than one hundred and fifty of his countrymen, have been arrested upon the charge of carrying on business without having such special consent, while those who are not subjects of China, and who ar conducting eighty odd laundries under similar conditions, are left unmolested, and free to enjoy the enhanced trade and profits arising from this hurtful and unfair discrimination. The business of your petitioners, and of those of his countrymen similarly situated, is greatly impaired, and in many cases practically ruined, by this system of oppression to one kind of men, and favoritism to all others.'

The statement therein contained as to the arrest, etc., is admitted to be true, with the qualification only that the 80-odd laundries referred to are in wooden buildings without scaffolds on the roofs. It is also admitted 'that petitioner and 200 of his countrymen similarly situated petitioned the board of supervisors for permission to continue their business in the various houses which they had been occupying and using for laundries for more than twenty years, and such petitions were denied, and all the petitions of those who were not Chinese, with one exception of Mrs. Mary Meagles, were granted.'

By section 11 of article 11 of the constitution of California it is provided that 'any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.' By section 74 of the act of April 19, 1856, usually known as the 'Consolidation Act,' the board of supervisors is empowered, among other things, 'to provide by regulation for the prevention and summary removal of nuisances to public health, the prevention of contagious diseases; * * * to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within any fixed limits where the streets shall have been established and graded; * * * to regulate the sale, storage, and use of gunpowder, or other explosive or combustible materials and substances, and make all needful regulations for protection against fire; to make such regulations concerning the erection and use of buildings as may be necessary for the safety of the inhabitants.'

The supreme court of California, in the opinion pronouncing the judgment in this case, said: 'The board of supervisors, under the several statutes conferring authority upon them, has the power to prohibit or regulate all occupations which are against good morals, contrary to public order and decency, or dangerous to the public safety. Clothes-washing is certainly not opposed 1067 to good morals, or subversive of public order or decency, but when conducted in given localities it may be highly dangerous to the public safety. Of this fact the supervisors are made the judges, and, having taken action in the premises, we do not find that they have prohibited the establishment of laundries, but they have, as they well might do, regulated the places at which they should be established, the character of the buildings in which they are to be maintained, etc. The process of washing is not prohibited by thus regulating the places at which and the surroundings by which it must be exercised. The order No. 1,569 and section 68 of order No. 1,587 are not in contravention of common right, or unjust, unequal, partial, or oppressive, in such sense as authorizes us in this proceeding to pronounce them invalid.' After answering the position taken in behalf of the petitioner, that the ordinances in question had been repealed, the court adds: 'We have not deemed it necessary to discuss the question in the light of supposed infringement of petitioner's rights under the constitution of the United States, for the reason that we think the principles upon which contention on that head can be based have in effect been set at rest by the cases of Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, S. C. 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, and Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, S. C. 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730.' The writ was accordingly discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

In the other case, the appellant, Wo Lee, petitioned for his discharge from an alleged illegal imprisonment, upon a state of facts, shown upon the record, precisely similar to that in the Case of Yick Wo. In disposing of the application, the learned Circuit Judge SAWYER, in his opinion, (26 Fed. Rep. 471,) after quoting the ordinance in question, proceeded at length as follows:

'Thus, in a territory some ten miles wide by fifteen or more miles long, much of it still occupied as mere farming and pasturage lands, and much of it unoccupied sand banks, in many places without a building within a quarter or half a mile of each other, including the isolated and almost wholly unoccupied Goat island, the right to carry on this, when properly guarded, harmless and necessary occupation, in a wooden building, is not made to depend upon any prescribed conditions giving a right to anybody complying with them, but upon the consent or arbitrary will of the board of supervisors. In three-fourths of the territory covered by the ordinance there is no more need of prohibiting or regulating laundries than if they were located in any portion of the farming regions of the state. Hitherto the regulation of laundries has been limited to the thickly-settled portions of the city. Why this unnecessary extension of the limits affected, if not designed to prevent the establishment of laundries, after a compulsory removal from their present locations, within practicable reach of the customers or their proprietors? And the uncontradicted petition shows that all Chinese applications are, in fact, denied, and those of Caucasians granted; thus, in fact, making the discriminations in the administration of the ordinance which its terms permit. The fact that the right to give consent is reserved in the ordinance shows that carrying on the laundry business in wooden buildings is not deemed of itself necessarily dangerous. It must be apparent to every well-informed mind that a fire, properly guarded, for laundry purposes, in a wooden building, is just as necessary, and no more dangerous, than a fire for cooking purposes or for warming a house. If the ordinance under consideration is valid, then the board of supervisors can pass a valid ordinance preventing the maintenance, in a wooden building, of a cooking-stove, heating apparatus, or a restaurant, within the boundaries of the city and county of San Francisco, without the consent of that body, arbitrarily given or withheld, as their prejudices or other motives may dictate. If it is competent for the board of supervisors to pass a valid ordinance prohibiting the inhabitants of San Francisco from following any ordinary, proper, and necessary calling within the limits of the city and county, except at its arbitrary and unregulated discretion and special *1068 consent,—and it can do so if this ordinance is valid,—then it seems to us that there has been a wide departure from the principles that have heretofore been supposed to guard and protect the rights, property, and liberties of the American people. And if, by an ordinance general in its terms and form, like the one in question, by reserving an arbitrary discretion in the enacting body to grant or deny permission to engage in a proper and necessary calling, a discrimination against any class can be made in its execution, thereby evading and in effect nullifying the provisions of the national constitution, then the insertion of provisions to guard the rights of every class and person in that instrument was a vain and futile act.

'The effect of the execution of this ordinance in the manner indicated in the record would seem to be necessarily to close up the many Chinese laundries now existing, or compel their owners to pull down their present buildings and reconstruct of brick or stone, or to drive them outside the city and county of San Francisco, to the adjoining counties, beyond the convenient reach of customers, either of which results would be little short of absolute confiscation of the large amount of property shown to be now, and to have been for a long time, invested in these occupations. If this would not be depriving such parties of their property without due process of law, it would be difficult to say what would effect that prohibited result. The necessary tendency, if not the specific purpose, of this ordinance, and of enforcing it in the manner indicated in the record, is to drive out of business all the numerous small laundries, especially those owned by Chinese, and give a monopoly of the business to the large institutions established and carried on by means of large associated Caucasian capital. If the facts appearing on the face of the ordinance, on the petition and return, and admitted in the case, and shown by the notorious public and municipal history of the times, indicate a purpose to drive out the Chinese laundrymen, and not merely to regulate the business for the public safety, does it not disclose a case of violation of the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the national constitution, and of the treaty between the United States and China, in more than one particular? * * * If this means prohibition of the occupation, and a destruction of the business and property, of the Chinese laundrymen in San Francisco,—as it seems to us this must be the effect of executing the ordinance,—and not merely the proper regulation of the business, then there is discrimination, and a violation of other highly important rights secured by the fourteenth amendment and the treaty. That it does mean prohibition, as to the Chinese, it seems to us must be apparent to every citizen of San Francisco who has been here long enough to be familiar with the course of an active and aggressive branch of public opinion and of public notorious events. Can a court be blind to what must be necessarily known to every intelligent person in the state? See Ah Kow v. Nunan, 5 Sawy. 560; Sparrow v. Strong, 3 Wall. 104; Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 42.'

But, in deference to the decision of the supreme court of California in the Case of Yick Wo, and contrary to his own opinion as thus expressed, the circuit judge discharged the writ and remanded the prisoner.

Attorneys and Law Firms

363 D. L. Smoot and Hall McAllister, for plaintiff in error and appellant.

H. G. Sieberst, for Hopkins, Sheriff, etc.

Opinion

365 MATTHEWS, J.

In the case of the petitioner, brought here by writ of error to the supreme court of California, our jurisdiction is limited to the question whether the plaintiff in error has been denied a right in violation of the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. The question whether his imprisonment is illegal, under the constitution and laws of the state, is not open to us. And although that question might have been considered 366 in the circuit court in the application made to it, and by this court on appeal from its order, yet judicial propriety is best consulted by accepting the judgment *1069 of the state court upon the points involved in that inquiry. That, however, does not preclude this court from putting upon the ordinances of the supervisors of the county and city of San Francisco an independent construction; for the determination of the question whether the proceedings under these ordinances, and in enforcement of them, are in conflict with the constitution and laws of the United States, necessarily involves the meaning of the ordinances, which, for that purpose, we are required to ascertain and adjudge.

We are consequently constrained, at the outset, to differ from the supreme court of California upon the real meaning of the ordinances in question. That court considered these ordinances as vesting in the board of supervisors a not unusual discretion in granting or withholding their assent to the use of wooden buildings as laundries, to be exercised in reference to the circumstances of each case, with a view to the protection of the public against the dangers of fire. We are not able to concur in that interpretation of the power conferred upon the supervisors. There is nothing in the ordinances which points to such a regulation of the business of keeping and conducting laundries. They seem intended to confer, and actually to confer, not a discretion to be exercised upon a consideration of the circumstances of each case, but a naked and arbitrary power to give or withhold consent, not only as to places, but as to persons; so that, if an applicant for such consent, being in every way a competent and qualified person, and having complied with every reasonable condition demanded by any public interest, should, failing to obtain the requisite consent of the supervisors to the prosecution of his business, apply for redress by the judicial process of mandamus to require the supervisors to consider and act upon his case, it would be a sufficient answer for them to say that the law had conferred upon them authority to withhold their assent, without reason and without responsibility. The power given to them is not confided to their discretion in the legal sense of that term, but is granted 367 to their mere will. It is purely arbitrary, and acknowledges neither guidance nor restraint.

This erroneous view of the ordinances in question led the supreme court of California into the further error of holding that they were justified by the decisions of this court in the cases of Barbier v. Connelly, 113 U. S. 27, S. C. 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, and Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, S. C. 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730. In both of these cases the ordinance involved was simply a prohibition to carry on the washing and ironing of clothes in public laundries and wash houses, within certain prescribed limits of the city and county of San Francisco, from 10 o'clock at night until 6 o'clock in the morning of the following day. This provision was held to be purely a police regulation, within the competency of any municipality possessed of the ordinary powers belonging to such bodies,—a necessary measure of precaution in a city composed largely of wooden buildings, like San Francisco, in the application of which there was no invidious discrimination against any one within the prescribed limits; all persons engaged in the same business being treated alike, and subject to the same restrictions, and entitled to the same privileges, under similar conditions. For these reasons that ordinance was adjudged not to be within the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, which, it was said in the first case cited, 'undoubtedly intended, not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty, or arbitrary spoliation of property, but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness, and acquire and enjoy property; that they should have like access to the courts of the country for the protection of their persons and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of any one, except as applied to the same *1070 pursuits by others under like circumstances; that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition; and that, in the administration of criminal justice, no different or higher punishment should be imposed upon 368 one than such as is prescribed to all for like offenses. * * * Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited; but legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if, within the sphere of its operation, it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment.'

The ordinance drawn in question in the present case is of a very different character. It does not prescribe a rule and conditions, for the regulation of the use of property for laundry purposes, to which all similarly situated may conform. It allows, without restriction, the use for such purposes of buildings of brick or stone; but, as to wooden buildings, constituting nearly all those in previous use, it divides the owners or occupiers into two classes, not having respect to their personal character and qualifications for the business, nor the situation and nature and adaptation of the buildings themselves, but merely by an arbitrary line, on one side of which are those who are permitted to pursue their industry by the mere will and consent of the supervisors, and on the other those from whom that consent is withheld, at their mere will and pleasure. And both classes are alike only in this: that they are tenants at will, under the supervisors, of their means of living. The ordinance, therefore, also differs from the not unusual case where discretion is lodged by law in public officers or bodies to grant or withhold licenses to keep taverns, or places for the sale of spirituous liquors, and the like, when one of the conditions is that the applicant shall be a fit person for the exercise of the privilege, because in such cases the fact of fitness is submitted to the judgment of the officer, and calls for the exercise of a discretion of a judicial nature.

The rights of the petitioners, as affected by the proceedings of which they complain, are not less because they are aliens and subjects of the emperor of China. By the third article of the treaty between this government and that of China, concluded November 17, 1880, (22 St. 827), it is stipulated: 'If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, 369 the government of the United States will exert all its powers to devise measures for their protection, and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty.' The fourteenth amendment to the constitution is not confined to the protection of citizens. It says: 'Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' These provisions are universal in their application, to all persons within the territorial jurisdiction, without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality; and the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws. It is accordingly enacted by section 1977 of the Revised Statutes that 'all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right, in every state and territory, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other.' The questions we have to consider and decide in these cases, therefore, are to be treated as involving the rights of every citizen of the United States equally with those of the strangers and aliens who now invoke the jurisdiction of the court.

It is contended on the part of the petitioners that the ordinances for violations of which they are severally sentenced to imprisonment are void on *1071 their face, as being within the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment, and, in the alternative, if not so, that they are void by reason of their administration, operating unequally, so as to punish in the present petitioners what is permitted to others as lawful, without any distinction of circumstances,—an unjust and illegal discrimination, it is claimed, which, though not made expressly by the ordinances, is made possible by them.

When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed 370 to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power. Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system, while sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts. And the law is the definition and limitation of power. It is, indeed, quite true that there must always be lodged somewhere, and in some person or body, the authority of final decision; and in many cases of mere administration, the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion, or by means of the suffrage. But the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possessions, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts bill of rights, the government of the commonwealth 'may be a government of laws and not of men.' For the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself.

There are many illustrations that might be given of this truth, which would make manifest that it was self-evident in the light of our system of jurisprudence. The case of the political franchise of voting is one. Though not regarded strictly as a natural right, but as a privilege merely conceded by society, according to its will, under certain conditions, nevertheless it is regarded as a fundamental political right, because preservative of all rights. In reference to that right, it was declared by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in Capen v. Foster, 12 Pick. 485, 488, in the words of Chief Justice SHAW, 'that in all 371 cases where the constitution has conferred a political right or privilege, and where the constitution has not particularly designated the manner in which that right is to be exercised, it is clearly within the just and constitutional limits of the legislative power to adopt any reasonable and uniform regulations, in regard to the time and mode of exercising that right, which are designed to secure and facilitate the exercise of such right in a prompt, orderly, and convenient manner;' nevertheless, 'such a construction would afford no warrant for such an exercise of legislative power as, under the pretense and color of regulating, should subvert or injuriously restrain, the right itself.' It has accordingly been held generally in the states that whether the particular provisions of an act of legislation establishing means for ascertaining the qualifications of those entitled to vote, and making previous registration in lists of such, a condition precedent to the exercise of the right, were or were not reasonable regulations, and accordingly valid or void, was always open to inquiry, as a judicial question. See Daggett v. Hudson, 3 N. E. Rep. 538, decided by the supreme court of Ohio, where many of the cases are collected; Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 666.

The same principle has been more freely extended to the quasi legislative acts of inferior municipal bodies, in respect to which it is an ancient jurisdiction of judicial tribunals to pronounce upon the reasonableness and consequent *1072 validity of their by-laws. In respect to these it was the doctrine that every by-law must be reasonable, not inconsistent with the charter of the corporation, nor with any statute of parliament, nor with the general principles of the common law of the land, particularly those having relation to the liberty of the subject, or the rights of private property. Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) § 319, and cases cited in notes. Accordingly, in the case of State v. Cincinnati Gas-light & Coke Co., 18 Ohio St. 262, 300, an ordinance of the city council purporting to fix the price to be charged for gas, under an authority of law giving discretionary power to do so, was held to be bad, if passed in bad faith, fixing an unreasonable price, for the fraudulent purpose of compelling 372 the gas company to submit to an unfair appraisement of their works. And a similar question, very pertinent to the one in the present cases, was decided by the court of appeals of Maryland in the case of City of Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217. In that case the defendant had erected and used a steam-engine, in the prosecution of his business as a carpenter and box-maker in the city of Baltimore, under a permit from the mayor and city council, which contained a condition that the engine was 'to be removed after six months' notice to that effect from the mayor.' After such notice, and refusal to conform to it, a suit was instituted to recover the penalty provided by the ordinance, to restrain the prosecution of which a bill in equity was filed. The court holding the opinion that 'there may be a case in which an ordinance, passed under grants of power like those we have cited, is so clearly unreasonable, so arbitrary, oppressive, or partial, as to raise the presumption that the legislature never intended to confer the power to pass it, and to justify the courts in interfering and setting it aside as a plain abuse of authority,' it proceeds to speak, with regard to the ordinance in question, in relation to the use of steam-engines, as follows: 'It does not profess to prescribe regulations for their construction, location, or use; nor require such precautions and safeguards to be provided by those who own and use them as are best calculated to render them less dangerous to life and property; nor does it restrain their use in box factories and other similar establishments within certain defined limits; not in any other way attempt to promote their safety and security without destroying their usefulness. But it commits to the unrestrained will of a single public officer the power to notify every person who now employs a steam-engine in the prosecution of any business in the city of Baltimore to cease to do so, and, by providing compulsory fines for every day's disobedience of such notice and order of removal, renders his power over the use of steam in that city practically absolute, so that he may prohibit its use altogether. But if he should not choose to do this, but only to act in particular cases, there is nothing in the ordinance to guide or control his action. It lays down no 373 rules by which its impartial execution can be secured, or partiality and oppression prevented. It is clear that giving and enforcing these notices may, and quite likely will, bring ruin to the business of those against whom they are directed, while others, from whom they are withheld, may be actually benefited by what is thus done to their neighbors; and, when we remember that this action of non-action may proceed from enmity or prejudice, from partisan zeal or animosity, from favoritism and other improper influences and motives easy of concealment, and difficult to be detected and exposed, it becomes unnecessary to suggest or comment upon the injustice capable of being wrought under cover of such a power, for that becomes apparent to every one who gives to the subject a moment's consideration. In fact, an ordinance which clothes a single individual with such power hardly falls within the domain of law, and we are constrained to pronounce it inoperative and void.' This conclusion, and the reasoning on which it is based, are deductions from the face of the ordinance, as to its necessary pendency and ultimate actual operation.

In the present cases, we are not obliged to reason from the probable to the *1073 actual, and pass upon the validity of the ordinances complained of, as tried merely by the opportunities which their terms afford, of unequal and unjust discrimination in their administration; for the cases present the ordinances in actual operation, and the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion that, whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the state itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the state of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petitioners, as to all other persons, by the broad and benign provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States. Though the law itself be fair on its face, and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal 374 hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the constitution. This principle of interpretation has been sanctioned by this court in Henderson v. Mayor of New York, 92 U. S. 259; Chy Luny v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275; Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U.S. 370; and Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703; S. C. 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730.

The present cases, as shown by the facts disclosed in the record, are within this class. It appears that both petitioners have complied with every requisite deemed by the law, or by the public officers charged with its administration, necessary for the protection of neighboring property from fire, or as a precaution against injury to the public health. No reason whatever, except the will of the supervisors, is assigned why they should not be permitted to carry on, in the accustomed manner, their harmless and useful occupation, on which they depend for a livelihood; and while this consent of the supervisors is withheld from them, and from 200 others who have also petitioned, all of whom happen to be Chinese subjects, 80 others, not Chinese subjects, are permitted to carry on the same business under similar conditions. The fact of this discrimination is admitted. No reason for it is shown, and the conclusion cannot be resisted that no reason for it exists except hostility to the race and nationality to which the petitioners belong, and which, in the eye of the law, is not justified. The discrimination is therefore illegal, and the public administration which enforces it is a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and a violation of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution. The imprisonment of the petitioners is therefore illegal, and they must be discharged. To this end the judgment of the supreme court of California in the Case of Yick Wo, and that of the circuit court of the United States for the district of California in the Case of Wo Lee, are severally reversed, and the cases remanded, each to the proper court, with directions to discharge the petitioners from custody and imprisonment.

All Citations

118 U.S. 356, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220

Footnotes

1 S. C. 9 Pac. Rep. 139.

485 F.2d 1297
United States Court of Appeals,
Fifth Circuit.

Charles F. ZIMMER, Plaintiff, Stewart Marshall, Intervenor-Appellant,
v.
John J. McKEITHEN et al., Defendants-Appellees.

No. 71-2649.
|
Sept. 12, 1973.

Synopsis
Action for reapportionment of school board and police juries in Louisiana Parish. The United States District Court for the Western District of Louisiana, Benjamin C. Dawkins, Jr., Chief Judge, ordered at-large elections, and plaintiffs appealed. The Court of Appeals, 467 F.2d 1381, affirmed. On rehearing en banc, the Court of Appeals, Gewin, Circuit Judge, held that although population is the proper measure of equality in apportionment, access to the political process and not population is the barometer of dilution of minority voting strength and that repudiation of at-large elections for police jury and school board would be justified in view of confluence of factors, including past racial discrimination, supporting contention that at-large electoral scheme would have worked a diminution of black voting strength, and that fact that three black candidates had been successful in immediately preceding election did not dictate finding that at-large scheme did not in fact dilute black vote.

Panel decision reversed; judgment of district court vacated and cause remanded.

Coleman, Circuit Judge, dissented in part and filed opinion in which Ingraham, Circuit Judge, joined.

Clark, Circuit Judge, dissented and filed opinion in which Dyer, Morgan and Roney, Circuit Judges, joined.

Attorneys and Law Firms

1300 Stanley A. Halpin, Jr., Debra A. Millenson, George M. Strickler, Jr., New Orleans, La., for intervenor-appellant.

Frank R. Parker, Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, George Peach Taylor, Jackson, Miss., David Tatel, Lawyers' Comm., for Civil Rights Under Law, Washington, D. C., for amicus curiae.

William J. Guste, Jr., Atty. Gen. of La., Baton Rouge, La., William B. Ragland, Jr., Lake Providence, La., for defendants-appellees.

Before JOHN R. BROWN, Chief Judge, and WISDOM, GEWIN, BELL, THORNBERRY, COLEMAN, GOLDBERG, AINSWORTH, GODBOLD, DYER, SIMPSON, MORGAN, CLARK, INGRAHAM and RONEY, Circuit Judges.

Opinion

GEWIN, Circuit Judge:

Aristotle has written:

If liberty and equality, as is thought by some, are chiefly to be founded in democracy, they will be best attained when all persons alike share in the government to the utmost.[1]

This case evokes a consideration of the extent to which the Constitution of the United States compels adherence to this principle. Specifically, we are called upon to determine under what circumstances an apportionment scheme operates to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population.[2] Appellant contends that the district court order, affirmed by a majority of a panel of this court, 467 F.2d 1381, requiring reapportionment for the school board and police juries in East Carroll Parish[3] under an at-large scheme of elections cannot pass muster under the aforementioned standard. Both the district court and a majority of a panel of this court held that an at-large scheme cannot work a dilution of black voting strength where blacks, though constituting a minority of registered voters, comprise a majority of the total population of the parish.[4] Upon rehearing en banc, this court finds the aforementioned conclusion infirm, and therefore we vacate and remand the district court's judgment.

I.

The panel opinion, recounting the facts which spawned this litigation and the protracted proceedings which it entailed, obviates the need for a full exposition of the present posture of this 1301 case. Consequently, we shall highlight only those facts particularly germane to our disposition.

East Carroll is a rural parish located in the extreme northeast corner of Louisiana. According to the 1970 census, it has a population of 12,884, of which 7,568, or 58.7% are black. Until recently, blacks in the parish, like all blacks in Louisiana, suffered from the maintenance of dual school systems, and the interposition of an interpretation test which preconditioned qualification for voting. Additionally, from 1922 to 1962, no black resident of the Parish had been permitted to register to vote. With the removal of state and locally imposed impediments to voting, and through the efforts of federal registrars, registration statistics in the parish changed dramatically. As of October 6, 1971, there were 3,342 whites and 777 blacks registered on the East Carroll rolls and an additional 2,122 federally registered black voters in the parish.[5] Concurrent with the increased registration of black voters, elections under the predecessor ward system produced two black members of the policy jury and one black school board member.

The change from ward to at-large elections challenged herein was produced by the entry in 1968 of a district court order in a suit where petitioners sought to insure fidelity to the one-man, onevote principle of Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S.Ct. 1362, 12 L.Ed.2d 506 (1964). Three years elapsed between the entry of this order and the renewal of proceedings precipitated by instructions issued by the district court that East Carroll submit a reapportionment plan in light of the 1970 census. Pursuant to these instructions, the Parish Police Jury resubmitted the 1968 at-large plan for approval. Subsequently, appellant Marshall was permitted to intervene on behalf of himself and all other similarly situated black voters in East Carroll, and challenge the propriety of the at-large plan as contravening the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution and Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.[6] After the hearing conducted on July 29, 1971, the district court found, inter alia, that since under the at-large plan, there was a zero population deviation, the at-large plan did not dilute the voting strength of the black population. Accordingly, the district court ordered that police jury and school board elections be conducted pursuant to an at-large scheme of voting under which the parish was divided into 7 wards. Under this scheme, 6 of the wards were to elect 1 representative to the police jury and school board, and 1 ward was to elect 3 representatives. Although candidates were required to reside in the ward from which they sought election, they were to be voted upon by registered voters in the entire county.

Marshall urged several grounds for reversal on appeal: first, that the district court was without power to order at-large elections because under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Attorney General of the United States had tendered an objection to the Louisiana Statutes which prescribed at-large elections for police juries and school boards;[7] second, that the district court 1302 applied an improper legal standard in evaluating dilution; and third, that the district court was clearly erroneous in finding that at-large elections do not dilute the voting strength of black voters in the parish. All three contentions were rejected by the panel.[8]

On rehearing, Marshall challenged the panel's disposition on all three grounds. Since we find his last two challenges meritorious, we need not consider his first contention concerning Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.[9]

II.

Before proceeding further, we feel it is important to emphasize the posture in which the issues are presented in the instant case. The panel understood Marshall to contend that the district court abused its discretion in adopting a plan that did not comport with Connor v. Johnson, 402 U.S. 690, 91 S.Ct. 1760, 29 L.Ed.2d 268 (1971). We do not understand Marshall to make this contention. Consequently, we need not consider whether, absent an allegation that an at-large scheme unconstitutionally dilutes the voting strength of a minority, the district court's approval of an atlarge scheme would amount to an abuse of discretion under Connor.

Marshall's contention here is that the judicially approved at-large plan is unconstitutional,[10] not merely indiscrete. Having identified Marshall's contention, we turn to a consideration of first, the proper standard for testing dilution, and second, whether the district court erred in finding that there was no dilution in the instant case.
We begin by noting that the concept of population in fair representation cases is not possessed of any talismanic quality. The Supreme Court recently affirmed this proposition in Gaffney v. Cummings, where it stated that "if it is the weight of a person's vote that matters, total population–even if stable and accurately taken–may not actually reflect that body of voters whose votes must be counted and weighed for purposes of reapportionment, because 'census persons' are not voters."[11] Indeed, 1303 Reynolds v. Sims, supra and its progeny[12] marked a departure from statistical niceties. Consequently, to rely upon population statistics, to the exclusion of all other factors, is to give these statistics greater sanctity than that which the law permits or requires.

More fundamentally, the application of the population measure to this case is premised upon a misunderstanding of the thrust of the dilution problem presented in this case. Inherent in the concept of fair representation are two propositions: first, that in apportionment schemes, one man's vote should equal another man's vote as nearly as practicable;[13] and second, that assuming substantial equality, the scheme must not operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial elements of the voting population. Both the Supreme Court and this court have long differentiated between these two propositions.[14] And although population is the proper measure of equality in apportionment, in Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 149-150, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L. Ed.2d 363 (1971) and White v. Regester, supra, 412 U.S. at 765, 93 S.Ct. at 2339, 37 L.Ed.2d at 324, the Supreme Court announced that access to the political process and not population was the barometer of dilution of minority voting strength.

The district court applied a per se rule that since blacks were a majority in East Carroll Parish, the at-large plan could not possibly submerge their vote. Since in White v. Regester, supra, the Supreme Court affirmed a district court's finding of dilution in Bexar County even though Mexican-Americans comprised a numerical majority of the population in that county, the per se rule applied by the district court below cannot withstand scrutiny. The panel also relied upon the fact that blacks in East Carroll comprised a majority of population in reaching its conclusion, but pointing to the size of the parish's population, it qualified the standard applied by the district court. We feel that this qualification, invoked to differentiate the instant case from Connor v. Johnson, 402 U.S. 690, 692, 91 S.Ct. 1760, 29 L.Ed.2d 268 (1971) where the Supreme Court announced a preference for single-member districts in "large" districts, is of no moment where, as here, a showing of dilution has been made. The legal standards announced by the Supreme Court in Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, and White v. Regester, supra in determining submergence admit of no distinction on the basis of size of population alone.

Concededly, in 1304 Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, 403 U.S. at 143-144, 91 S.Ct. 1858, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the aggregation of several districts into multi-member districts or an at-large scheme may enhance the potential for dilution when the population of such districts is large. But just as the magnitude of the districts did not obviate the need for petitioners to satisfy their burden of proof in Whitcomb, the minuteness of the population in the instant case cannot be invoked to pretermit further inquiry into the possibility of dilution in East Carroll Parish. The import attributed to population by the majority of the panel had this preclusive effect. However, we cannot sanction the view that minorities are to be exposed and subject to apportionment schemes otherwise constitutionally infirm because the equal protection clause can be watered down on the basis of population statistics alone.[15]

We also hold that the district court erred in finding that the at-large plan did not dilute the black vote in East Carroll. In Howard v. Adams County Board of Supervisors, supra, 453 F.2d at 457, this court stated that to establish the existence of a constitutionally impermissible redistricting plan, plaintiffs must maintain the burden of showing either first, a racially motivated gerrymander, or a plan drawn along racial lines, or second, that ". . . designedly or otherwise, a[n] . . . apportionment scheme, under the circumstances of a particular case, would operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population." In view of our holding that Marshall satisfied the burden with respect to the second standard, we need not entertain his contention that the departure from the firmly entrenched state policy against at-large voting in elections in police juries and school boards comes within the first standard.[16]

It is axiomatic that at-large and multi-member districting schemes are not per se unconstitutional.[17] Nevertheless, where the petitioner can demonstrate 1305 that "its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice," White v. Regester, supra, 412 U.S. at 766, 93 S.Ct. at 2339, 37 L.Ed.2d at 324, Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, 403 U.S. at 149-150, 91 S.Ct. 1858, such districting schemes are constitutionally infirm.

The Supreme Court has identified a panoply of factors, any number of which may contribute to the existence of dilution. Clearly, it is not enough to prove a mere disparity between the number of minority residents and the number of minority representatives.[18] Where it is apparent that a minority is afforded the opportunity to participate in the slating of candidates to represent its area, that the representatives slated and elected provide representation responsive to minority's needs, and that the use of a multimember districting scheme is rooted in a strong state policy divorced from the maintenance of racial discrimination, Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, would require a holding of no dilution. Whitcomb would not be controlling, however, where the state policy favoring multimember or at-large districting schemes is rooted in racial discrimination.[19] Conversely, where a minority can demonstrate a lack of access to the process of slating candidates,[20] the unresponsiveness of legislators to their particularized interests, a tenuous state policy underlying the preference for multi-member or at-large districting, or that the existence of past discrimination in general precludes the effective participation in the election system, a strong case is made. Such proof is enhanced by a showing of the existence of large districts, majority vote requirements, antisingle shot voting provisions and the lack of provision for at-large candidates running from particular geographical subdistricts.[21] The fact of dilution is established upon proof of the existence of an aggregate of these factors. The Supreme Court's recent pronouncement in White v. Regester, supra, demonstrates, however, that all these factors need not be proved in order to obtain relief.

In White, the Supreme Court sustained the district court's invalidation of a multi-member districting scheme for the election of representatives to the Texas House of Representatives from Dallas and Bexar Counties. The Court held that the following findings of fact made by the district court concerning Dallas County were sufficient to warrant the relief fashioned: first, that the blacks had suffered a history of official racial discrimination which touched their right to participate in democratic processes; second, that the Texas requirements for majority vote as a prerequisite to nomination in a primary, though not themselves improper, enhanced the opportunity for racial discrimination; and third, that black candidates had merely nominal success in the past in electing Representatives due to the indifference of the Democratic Party which controlled candidate-slating 1306 in Dallas County. White v. Regester, supra, 412 U.S. at 766-767, 93 S.Ct. at 2339-2340, 37 L.Ed.2d at 324-325. With respect to Bexar County, the district court made similar findings concerning the history of discrimination against Mexican-Americans and the unresponsiveness of the Bexar County legislative delegation to the interests of Mexican-Americans. The Supreme Court held that the district court's findings were sufficient to sustain the relief awarded in Bexar County. White v. Regester, supra, 412 U.S. at 767-769, 93 S.Ct. at 2340-2341, 37 L.Ed.2d at 325-326. While the instant case is not on all fours with White v. Regester, we hold that the record reveals facts sufficiently within its purview to warrant a repudiation of at-large elections in East Carroll Parish.

As in Dallas and Bexar Counties, minority residents in East Carroll Parish have suffered from a protracted history of racial discrimination which touched their ability to participate in the electoral process. Until 1957, they were compelled by a statute of statewide application to attend racially segregated schools until this court took action in Orleans Parish School Board v. Bush, 242 F.2d 156 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 354 U.S. 921, 77 S.Ct. 1380, 1 L.Ed.2d 1436 (1957). Less overt but equally invalid statewide schemes which fostered the maintenance of dual schools were operative until thwarted in 1960.[22] Until 1965, voters in East Carroll were subject to a state-required interpretation test in order to qualify to vote.[23] Finally, from 1922 to 1962, no black had been permitted to register to vote in the Parish.[24] Concededly, these impediments to participation in the electoral process have since been removed. The district court concluded that their removal vitiated the significance of the showing of past discrimination. This conclusion is untenable, however, precisely because the debilitating effects of these impediments do persist. Cf. Graves v. Barnes, 343 F. Supp. 704, 733 (W.D.Texas 1972), aff'd sub nom. White v. Regester, supra. Their persistence is manifested, in part, by the fact that although blacks in East Carroll comprise a majority of the population, they constitute a minority of registered voters.

Similarly, as in Dallas and Bexar Counties, the electoral device of a majority voting requirement is operative in East Carroll Parish.[25] This device has been severely criticized as tending to submerge a political or racial minority. Graves v. Barnes, supra at 725, aff'd sub nom. White v. Regester, supra. See also Evers v. State Board of Election Com'rs, 327 F.Supp. 640, 643 (S.D. Miss.1971). This criticism is appropriate in the instant case.

The only distinction between the instant case and White v. Regester, supra, is that here, there is no proof that representatives of police juries and school boards in East Carroll were particularly insensitive to the interests of minority residents. While this distinction is significant, it is not decisive.[26] 1307 We feel that this deficiency in proof is compensated for by an additional distinction between the circumstances in the instant case and White. In Dallas and Bexar Counties, there was a strong tradition of multi-member districting. In contrast, in East Carroll, the firmly entrenched state policy against at-large elections for police juries and school boards had persisted until as late as 1967. Moreover, although testimony elicited by the district court emphasized the fact that the problems confronting the police jury were parish-wide and hence could best be resolved by representatives sensitive to a parish-wide electorate, there is a dearth of evidence that would suggest that the police jury formerly elected by wards inadequately served parish-wide interests in the past. Indeed, we find it rather anomalous that appellees would contend that the parish is too small for there to be a dilution of minority votes under an at-large scheme, and yet too large for ward elected representatives to be responsive to parishwide interests.

Thus, on the basis of the evidence adduced on the record, we feel constrained to find that the district court erred in rejecting Marshall's contention that the at-large electoral scheme would work a diminution of the black voting strength in East Carroll Parish. The confluence of factors presented in the instant case bring it well within the Supreme Court's holding in White v. Regester, supra.

Although the aforementioned analysis suffices to sustain our disposition, we are inclined to respond to an additional argument tendered by appellee in support of the panel's ruling. While acknowledging that the instant facts might theoretically present a case of dilution, appellee argued that 1971 and 1972 elections under the at-large plan, with the attendant success of 3 black candidates, dictated a finding that the at-large scheme did not in fact dilute the black vote. The significance attached to success at the polls in the instant case is unavailing, however, for two reasons. First, these results were not before the district court when it rendered the opinion we are presently reviewing. It is axiomatic that an appellate court cannot take cognizance of matters not passed upon by the trial court. Second, we cannot endorse the view that the success of black candidates at the polls necessarily forecloses the possibility of dilution of the black vote. Such success might, on occasion, be attributable to the work of politicians, who, apprehending that the support of a black candidate would be politically expedient, campaign to insure his election. Or such success might be attributable to political support motivated by different considerations–namely that election of a black candidate will thwart successful challenges to electoral schemes on dilution grounds. In either situation, a candidate could be elected despite the relative political backwardness of black residents in the electoral district. Were we to hold that a minority candidate's success at the polls is conclusive proof of a minority group's access to the political process, we would merely be inviting attempts to circumvent the Constitution. This we choose not to do. Instead, we shall continue to require an independent consideration of the record.

III.

We conclude our analysis in this case by returning to the point at which we began when we noted that this is not a case wherein a district court reapportionment plan approving at-large elections is challenged merely as an abuse of discretion. Where such a challenge is registered, our starting point would be Connor v. Johnson, supra, in which the Supreme Court announced that single-member districts are preferable 1308 to large multi-member districts. This preference is not, however, an unyielding one. As the Supreme Court admonished in Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, 403 U.S. at 161, 91 S.Ct. at 1878, 29 L. Ed.2d 363, "[t]he remedial powers of an equity court must be adequate to the task, but they are not unlimited." Lest our decision today be misconstrued to narrowly circumscribe the discretion of a district court in fashioning a reapportionment plan itself free from constitutional infirmity, we would note that the preference for single-member districts may yield in two situations.

Where a district court determines that significant interests would be advanced by the use of multi-member districts and the use of single-member districts would jeopardize constitutional requirements, it can employ multi-member districts. See Mahan v. Howell, supra, 410 U.S. at 334-335, 93 S.Ct. 979, 35 L.Ed.2d 320. But these significant interests must not themselves be rooted in racial discrimination. Cf. Taylor v. McKeithen, supra, 407 U.S. at 194, 92 S.Ct. at 1982, 32 L. Ed.2d at 650 n. 3; White v. Weiser, 412 U.S. 783, 796, 93 S.Ct. 2348, 2355, 37 L. Ed.2d 335, 347 (1973).

The preference may also yield where a district court determines that multimember districts afford minorities a greater opportunity for participation in the political processes than do singlemember districts. In the process of making such a determination, a court need not be oblivious to the existence and location of minority voting strength.[27] While not required to formulate a plan that assures the success of a minority at the polls, a court may in its discretion opt for a multi-member plan which enhances the opportunity for participation in the political processes.

We acknowledge that the legal standards fashioned in this area of the law require federal courts to engage in a particularly exacting and hazardous inquiry in order to divine the proper remedial action to be taken. Justice Stewart presaged what we today acknowledge in his dissent in Sixty-Seventh Minnesota State Senate v. Beens, 406 U.S. 187, 204, 92 S.Ct. 1477, 1487, 32 L.Ed.2d 1, 14 (1972), when he noted that "the federal courts are often going to be faced with hard remedial problems" in reapportionment cases. Nevertheless, we are confident that federal courts can come to grips with such problems.

For the reasons set forth above, we reverse the decision of the panel of this court and vacate and remand the judgment 1309 of the district court for proceedings consistent with our disposition.

COLEMAN, Circuit Judge, with whom INGRAHAM, Circuit Judge, joins (dissenting in part):

On November 17, 1972, a majority of the Judges ordered this case reheard en banc, directing counsel to file through briefs on the issue of "dilution of the franchise of black voters" as raised in the District Court and considered by the panel decision.[1] Clearly, what the en banc court intended to do was to establish some standards as to what is required to "minimize or cancel out black voting strength",[2] particularly in the context of a sparsely settled governmental unit inhabited by less than 13,000 people.

With sincere deference, I fear that the intended objective has eluded the en banc opinion. Regretfully, it leaves me with no plainly discernible idea of what the District Courts are hereafter to do with this troublesome problem. Moreover, I must disagree with the effect of those portions of the opinion which I think I do understand.

The opinion appears to be anchored, in the main, on the recent decision of the Supreme Court in White v. Regester, dealing with conditions prevailing as to the multi-member legislative districts in Dallas and San Antonio. East Carroll Parish, Louisiana, however, is a "far cry" from either of these highly populated metropolitan areas. The Parish Seat, Lake Providence, has a population of 6,183. The remaining 450 square miles of typical rural delta terrain have 6,701 inhabitants, with an average population density of fifteen persons (not voters) per square mile. In East Carroll blacks are in a heavily preponderant majority, not in the minority as were the blacks and Mexican-Americans in Dallas and San Antonio. In White, the Supreme Court considering the totality of the circumstances, was not inclined to disturb the findings of the Three Judge District Court that certain conditions in the cities had led to invidious discrimination against the minority groups. In the instant appeal, the en banc majority holds a non-cancellation, non-minimization finding of the District Court to be clearly erroneous.

Let us now turn to the undisputed facts in the case presently before us.

In round figures, the Parish population is 59% black and 41% white; the voting registration is 54% white and 46% black. The record fails to reflect the number of eligible blacks who have chosen not to register.
With a spread of only eight percentage points between white and black registration, even in an election conducted solely on racial considerations a switch of less than five percent would reverse the expected outcome. Does such a thin line, even in a formerly segregated jurisdiction, amount as a matter of law to impermissible "minimization" or "cancellation" of black voting strength? I would respond in the negative, but the en banc opinion says "yes"; that any other view is clearly erroneous. Of course, divergencies of such size in constitutionally mandated population reapportionments at state and local levels do not call for per se invalidation, White v. Regester, supra.

One of the factors stressed in White v. Regester was that for nearly a hundred years only two minority representatives from Dallas County and only five Mexican-Americans from Bexar County had been elected to the Texas Legislature. I do not know how many had been candidates nor what qualifications they possessed, but in East Carroll the en banc opinion declines to consider the unchallenged fact that in the at-large elections in East Carroll Parish in 1971 and 1972 three black candidates were elected 1310 to office, including one who previously had been defeated when running in his own ward. The opinion holds that an appellate court cannot take cognizance of matters not passed upon by the trial court. It was all right for the Supreme Court to consider election results in Dallas and Bexar for the past one hundred years but when it comes to dismembering a little parish we must blind ourselves to facts asserted on oral argument and not in the least disputed. One rule for plaintiffs and the opposite for defendants. I might add that in the eight years I have served on this Court I have frequently seen it go outside the formal record in racially oriented cases for the reason that it would not blind itself to unchallenged facts.

Obviously, the election of three black candidates in at-large elections within two years after the adoption of the plan now under review, and at a time when black registration amounted to 46% and white registration came to 54%, pretty well explodes any notion that black voting strength has been cancelled or minimized. What the en banc opinion condemns as clearly erroneous turns out to be clearly right when put to the test of actual use at the ballot box rather than in the rarified atmosphere of the judicial chamber.

Additionally, in White v. Regester, the at-large candidates for the legislature were not required to live in a particular zone, so that it was possible for every legislator to be elected from outside the minority areas. Indeed, the Three Judge Texas District Court felt impelled to say, and the Supreme Court quoted it, that these legislators were "insufficiently responsive to Mexican-American interests".

In East Carroll Parish, however, the candidates were required to run from specifically designated areas.

I believe that White v. Regester was decided on the denial of access to the political process, not on cancellation or minimization of the minority vote. In any event, a decision rendered on the facts peculiar to that case and not shown to exist in East Carroll provides faint precedential support for the en banc decision now about to be rendered.

In East Carroll Parish the black people hold a predominant population majority–59% to 41%. It necessarily follows that the opinion of the Court in this case can only mean that in formerly "segregated" areas a black population majority is of no consequence in one man-one vote reapportionment cases unless it is also matched by a black registration majority when there is an effort to escape from the pocket borough method of electing county officials. The basic requirement, the fundamental goal, of population equality must yield to registration equality.

I submit that this is a serious distortion of the one man-one vote principle. It has to be premised on the idea that voters will always vote for candidates of their own race, an idea which has repeatedly failed the test of electoral experience, even in East Carroll Parish itself. It also overlooks the absolute certainty that with such a predominantly heavy population majority it is only a matter of time, and not too long at that, when there will be a black registration majority in East Carroll.

The en banc opinion is quite inconclusive as to what the District Court must do on remand. Apparently, however, no choice is left but to direct the division of the Parish into wards (districts). The Balkan must be fragmented into nine Balkans. After it had lost jurisdiction in this case, as set forth in the panel opinion, the District Court approved a redistricting plan submitted by the plaintiff-appellants by which three of the nine board members would be elected from one ward while the other six wards would be allowed to elect only one each. One ward would elect ⅓ of the Board while the other six would elect 1/9 each.

So far as ultimate power on the Board 1311 is concerned a vote in one ward would be worth exactly three times that of a vote in any other ward. To me that certainly smells of invidious discrimination and a complete distortion of the one man-one vote rule within a small county area.

The paramount consideration in this case is that in East Carroll Parish, Louisiana, the black race is a definite majority, not a minority.[3] Thus, the ultimate question is whether a 7% deficit in black registration cancels or minimizes the black voting strength of those who hold an 18% advantage in population. The en banc opinion says that it does, as a matter of law, and that the affirmative finding of the District Court to the contrary is clearly erroneous.

Hence, we direct a change in the election machinery of a small rural parish, where the black officials elected under the old malapportioned ward plan expressed, as the record shows, a preference for the at-large plan.

I would adhere to what the panel said originally:
"We are unable to see how at-large elections in this small parish could possibly discriminate against its black citizens. They have a commanding majority of the total population. This majority would participate in the election of not one but of every police juror and every school board member in the parish. Every elected official would thus be answerable to all black citizens of the entire parish. On a single-member district plan, if such can be devised, the voters would have a voice in the election of only one member on the police jury or the school board. It would, therefore, be just as easy to say, in the exercise of discretion, that a single district plan in this parish would more clearly dilute the voting power of the blacks than would one in which every voter, black and white, has the same identical voice in the selection of not one, but all members of the elective body. As a matter of fact, the District Judge so found."

To the extent indicated, I respectfully dissent.

CLARK, Circuit Judge, with whom DYER, LEWIS R. MORGAN and RONEY, Circuit Judges, join (dissenting):

The majority bases its reversal of the District Court order now on appeal on two grounds: first, the District Court improperly relied on population statistics alone in evaluating the effect of the plan ordered implemented in diluting the voting strength of black citizens and second, the District Court finding of no dilution was clearly erroneous. With deference, I differ as to both grounds. Of more fundamental importance is my disagreement with Part III of the majority opinion which creates a formula to test multimember district reapportionment plans for dilution of ethnic group voting strength. The tests laid down sweep too broadly and at least they are unnecessary in view of the clear exposition of the law in this field by the Supreme Court. For all of these reasons I respectfully dissent.

I.

White v. Regester announces the legal standard to be applied in this case as succinctly and cogently as it can be put. Omitting supportive citations, the Court stated:
Plainly, under our cases, multimember districts are not per se unconstitutional, nor are they necessarily unconstitutional when used in combination with single-member districts in other parts of the State.

But we have entertained claims that multimember districts are being used invidiously to cancel out or minimize the voting strength of racial groups. To sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly 1312 discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiffs' burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question–that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice.

The Supreme Court concluded that "on the totality of the circumstances" it would not overturn the findings of the District Court representing as they do a blend of history and an intensely local appraisal of the design and impact of the Bexar County multi-member district in the light of the past and present reality, political and otherwise.

The majority epitomizes the District Court's order as one which based its determination of nondilution solely on the fact that the requirement of at-large elections eliminated any population deviation between voting units. However, I read the order to have a broader foundation. At the hearing held to determine the effect of the 1970 census upon the District Court's previous 1968 order for at-large elections, six plans were submitted to the court by the governmental agencies involved and by the black intervenor. None of these plans provided for single-member districts throughout the parish. Rather, they provided for various combinations of single and multimember districts and for various forms of parish-at-large elections with geographical residency requirements for the candidates for various posts. The evidence adduced during this hearing delved into what dilution would be brought about by the intervenor's proposed plans as compared with the dilution that would result from a parish-at-large reapportionment plan. Both forms of plans were also compared to the population proportions which existed under the per-1968 single-member ward system.

The District Court's decree now on appeal provided in pertinent part:
. . . the court having considered all plans presented as well as all alternate plans proposed by the parties hereto, it has made the following finding of facts:

1. That according to the 1970 U.S. Census, East Carroll Parish has a total population of 12,884 persons of which number 7,568 are blacks and 5,306 are whites and other nationalities; that the black population of East Carroll Parish, Louisiana, comprises 58.7 percent of the total population.

2. That the plan of reapportionment offered by East Carroll Parish Police Jury and East Carroll Parish School Board is more satisfactory than other plans presented because it offers a zero deviation while all other plans considered did not.

3. That the plan of reapportionment offered by East Carroll Parish Police Jury and East Carroll Parish School Board does not dilute nor discriminate against the black population as the new voting unit from which officers of the jury and the board are to be elected is comprised of 58.7 percent blacks, or a substantial majority of blacks, while other plans considered diluted the black population of different areas within the parish significantly greater than the plan offered by the jury and school board.

4. That the plan recommended by East Carroll Parish Police Jury and East Carroll Parish School Board has actually been in effect in East Carroll Parish since December 2, 1968, and the plan has not proved discriminatory against blacks.

5. That the plan represents the wishes of both public bodies, having been endorsed by two of the three black public officials now serving on these public bodies.

6. That the plan of apportionment offered by East Carroll Parish Police 1313 Jury and East Carroll Parish School Board is a constitutionally acceptable plan and meets all of the requirements of the "one-man, one-vote" rule of law.
7. That the evidence adduced by intervenor failed to show that the plan offered by the two aforesaid public bodies would discriminate against blacks or in any manner dilute the black population.

I read this order as addressing two separate considerations. The first is compliance with the one-man-one-vote mandate of Reynolds v. Sims. The second is a factual consideration of whether parish-at-large elections, which obviously solve this problem completely, might have the effect of diluting the voting strength of black voters who, while holding a majority position in total population, comprise a slight minority of the registered voters in the entire parish. Findings 3, 4, 5 and 7 are expressly addressed to this second problem, and, when considered in the context of the hearing record in this case which directly dealt with the dilution of voter effectiveness on a racial basis, appear to me to go to the heart of the proper questions that should concern the trier of fact in such a case. Certainly they are not limited to population statistics alone.

There can be no serious quarrel with the abstract legal premise that bare population statistics cannot become a talisman for determining whether dilution of voting strength has occurred. However, this concession is no impediment to an insistence that the District Court and the prior panel opinion of this court were entitled and indeed required to consider the overall size of the population in this small rural parish in approving the apportionment plan involved. It is perfectly valid to compare the effect which an at-large voting plan would have on the strength of an ethnic group in East Carroll Parish with the result of any similar multimember district plan in a populous urban area such as those which have been involved in the previous Supreme Court cases to date. The opportunity for participation in a parish-at-large election among less than 13,000 people is greater than the opportunity to be a meaningful part of the elective process in a single-member district which numbers over 100,000 persons. Judge Dawkins also made a specific oral finding that the proposed plan was not racially motivated and did not have a racially deterrent effect in its operation. With all of these factors which were before the District Court and which obviously formed a part of its decisional process, I cannot agree that the District Court imposed a constitutionally infirm reapportionment plan which watered down voting rights on the basis of population statistics alone.

The almost gossamer distinction between weighing each man's vote equally and preventing the dilution of the overall voting strength of an identifiable racial element within the electorate can be an elusive concept at best. However, it is not one which in my view escaped either the attention of Judge Dawkins in his original opinion or the panel that initially heard this appeal. With full recognition that White v. Regester and the other precedents cited in footnote 2 of the en banc majority opinion discuss a panoply of factors which may help identify the existence of dilution, I find no rule requiring that every such factor must be tested for and found in every case in which a dilution issue may be raised. The common denominator which all precedents demand be weighed in reaching the required ad hoc fact adjudication is: has the plaintiff met the burden of demonstrating that members of the ethnic group in question have less opportunity than do other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice? Though not expressed in these terms, this is the rule Judge Dawkins applied in evaluating the design and impact of this plan.

1314 II.

I would be quick to agree that the en banc majority is correct when it states that dilution of voting strength is a question of fact. The difference between us arises because of my view that the record establishes the decision of the trial court in this case was not clearly erroneous. For example, Judge Coleman points out with emphasis in his dissent that the record in this case fails to reflect the number of eligible black citizens who have chosen not to register. How the majority opinion can conclude on such a record that the plaintiffs have demonstrated that past impediments to black voting still persist in this parish and that the persistence of such impediments is manifested in the disparity between black population and black voter registration is an enigma to me.[1] Until eligibility–based on age, residence, and freedom from other disqualifications established under federal law–is compared to nonregistration, this appears to be nothing more than a tenuous assumption. However, it is an assumption which is essential to the en banc court's fact reversal of the trial court as clearly erroneous.

The proof adduced in the District Court concerning the operation of the at-large election plan which governed the 1970 elections in this parish disclosed that a black candidate in the primary election for the Police Jury was defeated by only 9 votes. Another black candidate qualified for the second primary in which he ran third, 12 votes behind the second place white candidate. A third black candidate won in his contest against the incumbent president of the Police Jury, polling more votes than any candidate, not just for this post but in the entire election.

In the 1972 election which was held for only three of the nine school board posts, two blacks and one white candidate were elected. If the focus is upon "the design and impact" of at-large elections "in the light of past and present reality, political and otherwise," it is manifest that here there was no dilution of the black vote. But the majority sets its blinders so that it cannot see the present political reality because the election results were not before the District Court when it rendered its judgment.

While I unqualifiedly endorse the view that we cannot take cognizance of issues not raised or evidence that could have been but was not introduced in the court below, we are confronted with neither of these factors here. The 1972 election was held subsequent to the District Court's judgment of August 2, 1971. The result of the election is not disputed and was proffered to us on appeal. While the appellate process is going on, we can no more halt the political and electoral processes than we can stop the clock. We should not, however, turn either of them back when they are running properly. I see nothing novel or prejudicial about the consideration of current relevant undisputed matters brought to our attention on an appeal from an injunction decree. Indeed, our failure to do so is to shut our eyes to present political reality in East Carroll Parish and to do violence to the basic legal principle that injunction orders operate in futuro.

Finally, I am unable to agree with the majority that the 1972 election results should not be considered because of the purely speculative possibilities that the election of a black might serve the selfish political purposes of a white candidate, or that it would be better for a white to lose an election than to lose a law suit.

III.

White v. Regester charts a clear course for adjudicating attacks on plans 1315 involving multimember districts–which in logic of analysis are merely one form of at-large voting, differing only in the extent of the geographic area involved. I cannot help but conclude that part III of the en banc majority opinion is diametrically at variance with the simple direct rule laid down by the Supreme Court in that case. By today's decision this court creates a rule which would limit the use of multimember districts to those instances where proof can be adduced which demonstrates that a "greater opportunity for participation" in the political process would be afforded to whichever race may be in the minority than would be possible in single member districts, or for a showing that the use of at-large election districts "enhances the opportunity" for minority participation in the political process. Without regard to the fact that such proof might be well-nigh to impossible to make, the law's announced preference for single member districts in populous areas does not mean that multimember districts must overcome some stigma to survive. To require that any particular plan be demonstrated to operate so as to afford an advantage to any minority ethnic group at the polling place is not an exercise of color-blind color consciousness but a legal mandate for reverse discrimination. It is not merely a rule out of keeping with the latest law of the Supreme Court, but is a mistake of major dimensions that will place the courts squarely in the center of the "political thicket."

The trier of fact in this case did not utilize an erroneous legal principle but rather applied considerations well within the rule just announced in White v. Regester. The record demonstrates ample evidence to indicate that the findings of fact made by the District Court were not clearly erroneous. For these reasons I would affirm the District Court. Most certainly I would refrain from creating any new rule regarding the use of multimember districts which runs counter to the most recent pronouncement of the Supreme Court. Thus, I dissent.

All Citations

485 F.2d 1297

Footnotes

1 Aristotle, Politics, Book II.

2 White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 765, 93 S.Ct. 2332, 2339, 37 L.Ed.2d 314, 324 (1973); Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124, 143, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363 (1971); Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 439, 85 S. Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 401 (1965); Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 88, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 16 L.Ed.2d 376 (1966).

3 In the absence of special legislative authority for school boards to apportion, the apportionment and reapportionment of parish school boards is dependent upon such apportionment of the police jury in the parish. Consequently, this case does not require a distinction between the reapportionment scheme as it affects either body.

4 As shall be discussed infra, a majority of the panel refrained from announcing a per se rule. Rather, it qualified its application of the majority of population standards on the grounds proffered by appellees, namely the size of the parish.

5 These figures are based on the 1962 findings of the district court in the voter registration suit brought in the Parish, United States v. Manning, 205 F.Supp. 172 (W.D. La.1962), and on the State of Louisiana Board of Registration, Report of Registered Voters, month ending October 6, 1971. See Brief of Appellant at 3, Zimmer v. McKeithen, No. 71-2649 (5th Cir. filed Dec. 1, 1971); Brief of Appellee at 1, id. (5th Cir. filed March 28, 1972).

6 Although Marshall clearly raised the Voting Rights Act issue in his Complaint in Intervention, the district court in its order in 1971 did not rule on this issue. Since he preserved this contention on appeal, it was before a panel of this court.

7 Until 1968, Louisiana law prohibited atlarge elections for School Boards and Police Juries (the law required at least five wards from which the members of these bodies were to be elected). By Louisiana Acts of 1968 No. 445 Section 1 (amending La.R.S. 33:1221) and No. 561 (adding La.R.S. 17:71.1–17:71.6), Louisiana Law was amended to allow at-large elections (or elections from less than five wards) for School Boards and Police Juries.

On April 29, 1969, Acts 445 and 561 were submitted to the Attorney General of the United States pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c. On June 26, 1969, both Acts were rejected as having "the effect of discrimination against Negro voters on account of their race, and of denying to them an effective voice in the selection of Police Jury and School Board members." On September 10, 1969 this rejection was reaffirmed by the Attorney General of the United States, citing as a specific example of racial discrimination, the at-large scheme of elections in East Carroll Parish.

8 In all deference to the panel, we submit that they failed to give adequate consideration to Marshall's contention that the district court's finding of no dilution was clearly erroneous.

9 Marshall contended that the rule of Connor v. Johnson, 402 U.S. 690, 91 S.Ct. 1760, 29 L.Ed.2d 268 (1971) and Sheffield v. Itawamba County Board of Supervisors, 439 F.2d 35 (5th Cir. 1971) that court ordered plans resulting from equitable jurisdiction over adversary proceedings are not controlled by Section 5 is inapposite where such plans are adopted by a court in "sweetheart" lawsuits. Although there may be merit in his contention that the failure to qualify Connor and Sheffield may result in the circumvention of the Voting Rights Act, we would merely note that the dilution standard is a viable means of reconciling the disparate treatment of governmental body approved plans and court approved plans under Section 5. Furthermore, since Section 5, 42 U.S.C. § 1973c (1970), covers attempts to administer voting practices as well as attempts to enact them, see Roman, Section 5 Of The Voting Rights Act: The Formation of an Extraordinary Legal Remedy, 22 Am.U.L.Rev. 111, 124 (1972), the panel's decision that Connor and Sheffield govern is quite appropriate.

10 A similar contention was made in Gunderson v. Adams, 328 F.Supp. 584 (S.D.Fla. 1970) aff'd, 403 U.S. 913, 91 S.Ct. 2225, 29 L.Ed.2d 692 (1971) where a Florida plan, codifying a court ordered plan, was challenged and upheld.

11 Gaffney v. Cummings, 412 U.S. 735-746, 93 S.Ct. 2321, 2328, 37 L.Ed.2d 298, 308 (1973). Thus, census figures include aliens, nonresident military personnel, nonresident students, all of whom may be ineligible to vote. The Supreme Court and lower courts have approved apportionment based not on population but on voter registration statistics on several occasions, where such data produces a distribution of legislators not differing substantially from the use of a permissible population basis. See, e. g., Burns v. Richardson, supra, 384 U.S. at 93, 86 S.Ct. 1286; Ely v. Klahr, 403 U.S. 108, 91 S.Ct. 1803, 29 L.Ed.2d 352 (1971); Reynolds v.

Gallion ex rel. Attorney General of Alabama, 308 F.Supp. 803 (M.D.Ala.1969); Pate v. El Paso County, Texas, 337 F.Supp. 95 (W.D. Tex.) aff'd, 400 U.S. 806, 91 S.Ct. 55, 27 L. E.2d 38 (1970).

12 E. g., Gaffney v. Cummings, supra; White v. Regester, supra; Mahan v. Howell, 410 U.S. 315, 93 S.Ct. 979, 35 L.Ed.2d 320 (1973); Abate v. Mundt, 403 U.S. 182, 91 S.Ct. 1904, 29 L.Ed.2d 399 (1971); Swann v. Adams, 385 U.S. 440, 87 S.Ct. 569, 17 L. Ed.2d 501 (1967).

13 Reynolds v. Sims, supra, 377 U.S. at 577, 84 S.Ct., at 1389.

14 See Gaffney v. Cummings, supra, 412 U.S. at 751, 93 S.Ct. at 2330, 37 L.Ed.2d at 311; White v. Regester, supra, 412 U.S. at 765, 93 S.Ct. at 2339, 37 L.Ed.2d at 324; Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, 403 U.S. at 142, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363; Abate v. Mundt, supra, 403 U.S. at 184 n.2, 91 S.Ct. 1904; Burns v. Richardson, supra, 384 U.S. at 88-89, 86 S.Ct. 1286; Howard v. Adams County Board of Supervisors, 453 F.2d 455, 457 (5th Cir. 1972) cert. denied, 407 U.S. 925, 92 S.Ct. 2461, 32 L.Ed.2d 812 (1972). See also Troxler v. St. John the Baptist Parish Police Jury, 331 F.Supp. 222 (E.D.La.1971), appeal dismissed, 452 F.2d 1388 (5th Cir. 1972).

15 We acknowledge, however, that elections with respect to certain special governmental units of limited purpose are not subject to the fair representation mandates. See Associated Enterprises, Inc. v. Toltec Watershed Improvement District, 410 U.S. 743, 93 S.Ct. 1237, 35 L.Ed.2d 675 (1973); Salyer Land Company v. Tulare Lake Basin Water Storage District, 410 U.S. 719, 93 S.Ct. 1224, 35 L.Ed.2d 659 (1973).

16 Similar contentions have met with varying degrees of success. For cases upholding the claim that a reapportionment plan was racially discriminatory, see Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960); Smith v. Paris, 257 F.Supp. 901, 904 (M.D.Ala.) modified and aff'd, 386 F.2d 979 (5th Cir. 1967) on remand, United States v. Democratic Executive Committee of Barbour County, Alabama, 288 F.Supp. 943 (M.D.Ala.1968); Sims v. Baggett, 247 F.Supp. 96, 110 (M.D.Ala.1965). For cases in which such a claim was rejected, see Wright v. Rockefeller, 376 U.S. 52, 84 S.Ct. 603, 11 L.Ed.2d 512 (1964); Holt v. Richmond, 459 F.2d 1093 (4th Cir.)., cert. denied, 408 U.S. 931, 92 S.Ct. 2510, 33 L.Ed.2d 343 (1972).

Neither the language quoted from Howard v. Adams County Board of Supervisors, supra, nor the aforementioned cases should be read to hold that a reapportionment plan can be invalidated solely because of the racial motivations of those who fashioned it. In Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217, 224-225, 91 S.Ct. 1940, 29 L.Ed.2d 438 (1971), the Supreme Court stated that although its past decisions contain language which suggests that motive or purpose behind a law is relevant to its constitutionality, these decisions, including Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 347, 81 S.Ct. 125, 5 L.Ed.2d 110 (1960) focused on the actual effect of the legislation being challenged, and not the reason why the legislation was enacted.

17 White v. Regester, supra, 412 U.S. at 765, 93 S.Ct. at 2339, 37 L.Ed.2d at 324; Mahan v. Howell, supra, 410 U.S. at 335, 93 S.Ct. 979; Ferrell v. Hall, 339 F.Supp. 73 (W.D. Okl.) aff'd, 406 U.S. 939, 92 S.Ct. 2045, 32 L.Ed.2d 328, petition for rehearing denied, 408 U.S. 932, 92 S.Ct. 2489, 33 L.Ed.2d 344 (1972); Gunderson v. Adams, 328 F.Supp. 584 (S.D.Fla.1970); aff'd, 403 U.S. 913, 91 S.Ct. 2225, 29 L.Ed.2d 692 (1971); Dusch v. Davis, 387 U.S. 112, 87 S.Ct. 1554, 18 L.Ed. 2d 656 (1967); Kilgarlin v. Hill, 386 U.S. 120, 121, 87 S.Ct. 820, 17 L.Ed.2d 771 (1967); Burns v. Richardson, supra; Fortson v. Dorsey, supra; Lipscomb v. Jonsson 459 F.2d 335, 337 (5th Cir. 1972); Howard v. Adams County Board of Supervisors, supra, 453 F.2d at 457-458.

18 E. g., Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, at 149, 91 S.Ct. 1858; Lipscomb v. Johnson, supra, 459 F.2d at 337.

19 Taylor v. McKeithen, 407 U.S. 191, at 194, 92 S.Ct. 1980, at 1982, 32 L.Ed.2d 648, at 650, n. 3. See Parker, County Redistricting

in Mississippi: Case Studies in Racial Gerrymandering, 44 Miss.L.J. 391, 400 (1973).

20 The Supreme Court's focus in Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, 403 U.S. at 149-150, 91 S. Ct. 1858, on the access of minorities to slating procedures in Marion County, Indiana, makes clear that the standards we enunciate today are applicable whether it is a specific law or a custom or practice which causes the diminution of minority voting strength.

21 Compare Whitcomb v. Chavis, supra, 403 U.S. at 143-144, 91 S.Ct. 1858, 29 L.Ed.2d 363, with Graves v. Barnes, 343 F.Supp. 704, 725 (W.D.Tex.1972), aff'd sub nom. White v. Regester, supra. The existence and mode of operation of voting procedures which enhance dilution is outlined in Derfner, Racial Discrimination and the Right to Vote, 26 Vand.L.Rev. 523, 553-55 and accompanying notes (1973).

22 See, e. g., Bush v. Orleans Parish School Board, 188 F.Supp. 916, 920 (E.D.La.1960) (documenting additional circumventive artifices).

23 Louisiana v. United States, 380 U.S. 145, 85 S.Ct. 817, 13 L.Ed.2d 709 (1965).

24 United States v. Manning, supra.

25 La.Rev.Stat.Ann. art. 18, § 18:358 (1969). In addition, voters in East Carroll are subject to anti-single shot voting requirements, the effects of which though mitigated as to wards 1, 2, 4, 5, 6 and 7 under the district court's plan, are still egregious in ward 3 where 3 representatives to the police jury and school board are elected. See La.Rev. Stat.Ann. art. 18, § 18:351 (1969).

26 It may be that the absence on the record of any criticism of the responsiveness of the police jury and school board is attributable to an omission of proof. If so, our decision should not be interpreted as acquiescing to such omissions. However, it may be that the particular functions of the police jury, for example, do not easily lend themselves to unresponsive representation. The record establishes that the primary function of the juries is the drainage of rural farmlands, maintenance of rural roads, and the overseeing of a prison farm. Were we to hold that the absence of a claim of representation unresponsive to a minority's needs foreclosed constitutional attack, the voting strength of minorities could be freely diluted without fear of constitutional restraint. The absence of proof with respect to school boards could not be explained on such grounds.

27 The Supreme Court has never ruled on the question of the extent to which the board equitable powers of a federal court in fashioning reapportionment decrees are limited by the colorblind concept of Gomillion v. Lightfoot, supra and Wright v. Rockefeller, supra. See Taylor v. McKeithen, supra, 407 U.S. at 194, 92 S.Ct. at 1982, 32 L.Ed.2d at 650. Several courts have intimated that the colorblind concept is in fact a limitation. See Mann v. Davis, 245 F.Supp. 241, 245 (E.D.Va.) aff'd sub nom. Burnette v. Davis, 382 U.S. 42, 86 S.Ct. 181, 15 L.Ed.2d 35 (1965); Ferrell v. Hall, 339 F.Supp. 73, 83 (W.D.Okla.) aff'd, 406 U.S. 939, 92 S.Ct. 2045, 32 L.Ed.2d 328; rehearing denied, 408 U.S. 932, 92 S.Ct. 2489, 33 L.Ed.2d 344 (1972).

In discussing the remedial power of federal courts to fashion reapportionment decrees, the Court has cited Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Ed., 402 U.S. 1, 91 S.Ct. 1267, 28 L.Ed.2d 554 (1971), see, e. g., Taylor v. McKeithen, supra, 407 U.S. at 194, 92 S. Ct. at 1982, 32 L.Ed.2d at 650; Sixty-Seventh Minnesota State Senate v. Beens, infra, 406 U.S. at 201, 92 S.Ct. at 1486, 32 L.Ed.2d at 12 (Stewart, J., dissenting), thereby suggesting that such powers in fashioning reapportionment decrees are coterminous with those in fashioning desegregation decrees. Since Swann noted that it was permissible for a federal court to consider race in the latter situation, Swann, supra, 402 U.S. at 25, 91 S.Ct. 1267, it would also be permissible to consider race in the former situation.

Our decision in Howard v. Adams County Board of Supervisors, supra is not inconsistent with the view maintained herein. In Howard, we observed that the district court was correct in noting that the organization commissioned by the legislature to draw up reapportionment plans did not consider race in its plan. Howard, supra, 453 F.2d at 458. We did not intimate any view as to the propriety of considering race in such circumstances.

[1] The panel opinion in this case (Judge Gewin dissenting in part) is reported, 467 F.2d 1381.

[2] Burns v. Richardson, 384 U.S. 73, 86 S.Ct. 1286, 16 L.Ed.2d 376; Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 85 S.Ct. 498, 13 L.Ed.2d 401.

[3] The en banc opinion speaks of single-shot voting, run-off elections, and slating candidates, but these were not issues in the court below.

[1] For example, the 1970 census reflects that 49.6% of the black population of East Carroll Parish is under 18 years of age as compared to only 38.5% of the white population.

United States Code Annotated
Constitution of the United States
Annotated
Amendment XIV. Citizenship; Privileges and Immunities; Due Process; Equal Protection; Apportionment of Representation; Disqualification of Officers; Public Debt; Enforcement

U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. XIV

AMENDMENT XIV. CITIZENSHIP; PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES; DUE PROCESS; EQUAL PROTECTION; APPOINTMENT OF REPRESENTATION; DISQUALIFICATION OF OFFICERS; PUBLIC DEBT; ENFORCEMENT

Currentness

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Section 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Section 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Section 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

<Section 1 of this amendment is further displayed in separate documents according to subject matter,>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 1-Citizens>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 1-Privileges>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 1-Due Proc>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 1-Equal Protect>

<sections 2 to 5 of this amendment are displayed as separate documents,>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 2,>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 3,>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 4,>

<see USCA Const Amend. XIV, § 5,>

U.S.C.A. Const. Amend. XIV, USCA CONST Amend. XIV
Current through P.L. 118-107. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

United States Code Annotated
Title 52. Voting and Elections (Refs & Annos)
Subtitle I. Voting Rights
Chapter 103. Enforcement of Voting Rights

52 U.S.C.A. § 10301
Formerly cited as 42 USCA § 1973

§ 10301. Denial or abridgement of right to vote on account of race or color through voting qualifications or prerequisites; establishment of violation

Effective: September 1, 2014

Currentness

(a) No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 10303(f)(2) of this title, as provided in subsection (b).

(b) A violation of subsection (a) is established if, based on the totality of circumstances, it is shown that the political processes leading to nomination or election in the State or political subdivision are not equally open to participation by members of a class of citizens protected by subsection (a) in that its members have less opportunity than other members of the electorate to participate in the political process and to elect representatives of their choice. The extent to which members of a protected class have been elected to office in the State or political subdivision is one circumstance which may be considered: Provided, That nothing in this section establishes a right to have members of a protected class elected in numbers equal to their proportion in the population.

CREDIT(S)

(Pub.L. 89-110, Title I, § 2, Aug. 6, 1965, 79 Stat. 437; renumbered Title I, Pub.L. 91-285, § 2, June 22, 1970, 84 Stat. 314; amended Pub.L. 94-73, Title II, § 206, Aug. 6, 1975, 89 Stat. 402; Pub.L. 97-205, § 3, June 29, 1982, 96 Stat. 134.)

Notes of Decisions (1352)

52 U.S.C.A. § 10301, 52 USCA § 10301
Current through P.L. 118-107. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

West's Annotated California Codes
Elections Code (Refs & Annos)
Division 14. Election Day Procedures (Refs & Annos)
Chapter 1.5. Rights of Voters (Refs & Annos)

West's Ann.Cal.Elec.Code § 14026

§ 14026. Definitions

Effective: January 1, 2017

Currentness

As used in this chapter:

(a) "At-large method of election" means any of the following methods of electing members to the governing body of a political subdivision:

(1) One in which the voters of the entire jurisdiction elect the members to the governing body.

(2) One in which the candidates are required to reside within given areas of the jurisdiction and the voters of the entire jurisdiction elect the members to the governing body.

(3) One that combines at-large elections with district-based elections.

(b) "District-based elections" means a method of electing members to the governing body of a political subdivision in which the candidate must reside within an election district that is a divisible part of the political subdivision and is elected only by voters residing within that election district.

(c) "Political subdivision" means a geographic area of representation created for the provision of government services, including, but not limited to, a general law city, general law county, charter city, charter county, charter city and county, school district, community college district, or other district organized pursuant to state law.

(d) "Protected class" means a class of voters who are members of a race, color, or language minority group, as this class is referenced and defined in the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 (52 U.S.C. Sec. 10301 et seq.).

(e) “Racially polarized voting” means voting in which there is a difference, as defined in case law regarding enforcement of the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 (52 U.S.C. Sec. 10301 et seq.), in the choice of candidates or other electoral choices that are preferred by voters in a protected class, and in the choice of candidates and electoral choices that are preferred by voters in the rest of the electorate. The methodologies for estimating group voting behavior as approved in applicable federal cases to enforce the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965 (52 U.S.C. Sec. 10301 et seq.) to establish racially polarized voting may be used for purposes of this section to prove that elections are characterized by racially polarized voting.

Credits

(Added by Stats.2002, c. 129 (S.B.976), § 1. Amended by Stats.2015, c. 732 (A.B.1536), § 30, eff. Jan. 1, 2016; Stats.2015, c. 724 (A.B.277), § 2, eff. Jan. 1, 2016; Stats.2016, c. 86 (S.B.1171), § 121, eff. Jan. 1, 2017.)

Notes of Decisions (17)

West’s Ann. Cal. Elec. Code § 14026, CA ELEC § 14026
Current with urgency legislation through Ch. 1002 of 2024 Reg.Sess. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Civil Practice Law and Rules (Refs & Annos)
Chapter Eight. Of the Consolidated Laws
Article 32. Accelerated Judgment (Refs & Annos)
McKinney's CPLR Rule 3211

Rule 3211. Motion to dismiss

Effective: May 7, 2022

Currentness

(a) Motion to dismiss cause of action. A party may move for judgment dismissing one or more causes of action asserted against him on the ground that:

1. a defense is founded upon documentary evidence; or

2. the court has not jurisdiction of the subject matter of the cause of action; or

3. the party asserting the cause of action has not legal capacity to sue; or

4. there is another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action in a court of any state or the United States; the court need not dismiss upon this ground but may make such order as justice requires; or

5. the cause of action may not be maintained because of arbitration and award, collateral estoppel, discharge in bankruptcy, infancy or other disability of the moving party, payment, release, res judicata, statute of limitations, or statute of frauds; or

6. with respect to a counterclaim, it may not properly be interposed in the action; or

7. the pleading fails to state a cause of action; or

8. the court has not jurisdiction of the person of the defendant; or

9. the court has not jurisdiction in an action where service was made under section 314 or 315; or

10. the court should not proceed in the absence of a person who should be a party.

11. the party is immune from liability pursuant to section seven hundred twenty-a of the not-for-profit corporation law. Presumptive evidence of the status of the corporation, association, organization or trust under section 501(c)(3) of the internal revenue code may consist of production of a letter from the United States internal revenue service reciting such determination on a preliminary or final basis or production of an official publication of the internal revenue service listing the corporation, association, organization or trust as an organization described in such section, and presumptive evidence of uncompensated status of the defendant may consist of an affidavit of the chief financial officer of the corporation, association, organization or trust. On a motion by a defendant based upon this paragraph the court shall determine whether such defendant is entitled to the benefit of section seven hundred twenty-a of the not-for-profit corporation law or subdivision six of section 20.09 of the arts and cultural affairs law and, if it so finds, whether there is a reasonable probability that the specific conduct of such defendant alleged constitutes gross negligence or was intended to cause the resulting harm. If the court finds that the defendant is entitled to the benefits of that section and does not find reasonable probability of gross negligence or intentional harm, it shall dismiss the cause of action as to such defendant.

(b) Motion to dismiss defense. A party may move for judgment dismissing one or more defenses, on the ground that a defense is not stated or has no merit.

(c) Evidence permitted; immediate trial; motion treated as one for summary judgment. Upon the hearing of a motion made under subdivision (a) or (b), either party may submit any evidence that could properly be considered on a motion for summary judgment. Whether or not issue has been joined, the court, after adequate notice to the parties, may treat the motion as a motion for summary judgment. The court may, when appropriate for the expeditious disposition of the controversy, order immediate trial of the issues raised on the motion.

(d) Facts unavailable to opposing party. Should it appear from affidavits submitted in opposition to a motion made under subdivision (a) or (b) that facts essential to justify opposition may exist but cannot then be stated, the court may deny the motion, allowing the moving party to assert the objection in his responsive pleading, if any, or may order a continuance to permit further affidavits to be obtained or disclosure to be had and may make such other order as may be just.

(e) Number, time and waiver of objections; motion to plead over. At any time before service of the responsive pleading is required, a party may move on one or more of the grounds set forth in subdivision (a) of this rule, and no more than one such motion shall be permitted. Any objection or defense based upon a ground set forth in paragraphs one, three, four, five and six of subdivision (a) of this rule is waived unless raised either by such motion or in the responsive pleading. A motion based upon a ground specified in paragraph two, seven or ten of subdivision (a) of this rule may be made at any subsequent time or in a later pleading, if one is permitted; an objection that the summons and complaint, summons with notice, or notice of petition and petition was not properly served is waived if, having raised such an objection in a pleading, the objecting party does not move for judgment on that ground within sixty days after serving the pleading, unless the court extends the time upon the ground of undue hardship. The foregoing sentence shall not apply in any proceeding to collect a debt arising out of a consumer credit transaction where a consumer is a defendant or under subdivision one or two of section seven hundred eleven of the real property actions and proceedings law. The papers in opposition to a motion based on improper service shall contain a copy of the proof of service, whether or not previously filed. An objection based upon a ground specified in paragraph eight or nine of subdivision (a) of this rule is waived if a party moves on any of the grounds set forth in subdivision (a) of this rule without raising such objection or if, having made no objection under subdivision (a) of this rule, he or she does not raise such objection in the responsive pleading which, in any action to collect a debt arising out of a consumer credit transaction where a consumer is a defendant, includes any amended responsive pleading.

(f) Extension of time to plead. Service of a notice of motion under subdivision (a) or (b) before service of a pleading responsive to the cause of action or defense sought to be dismissed extends the time to serve the pleading until ten days after service of notice of entry of the order.

(g) Stay of proceedings and standards for motions to dismiss in certain cases involving public petition and participation. 1. A motion to dismiss based on paragraph seven of subdivision (a) of this section, in which the moving party has demonstrated that the action, claim, cross claim or counterclaim subject to the motion is an action involving public petition and participation as defined in paragraph (a) of subdivision one of section seventy-six-a of the civil rights law, shall be granted unless the party responding to the motion demonstrates that the cause of action has a substantial basis in law or is supported by a substantial argument for an extension, modification or reversal of existing law. The court shall grant preference in the hearing of such motion.

2. In making its determination on a motion to dismiss made pursuant to paragraph one of this subdivision, the court shall consider the pleadings, and supporting and opposing affidavits stating the facts upon which the action or defense is based. No determination made by the court on a motion to dismiss brought under this section, nor the fact of that determination, shall be admissible in evidence at any later stage of the case, or in any subsequent action, and no burden of proof or degree of proof otherwise applicable shall be affected by that determination in any later stage of the case or in any subsequent proceeding.

3. All discovery, pending hearings, and motions in the action shall be stayed upon the filing of a motion made pursuant to this section. The stay shall remain in effect until notice of entry of the order ruling on the motion. The court, on noticed motion and upon a showing by the nonmoving party, by affidavit or declaration under penalty of perjury that, for specified reasons, it cannot present facts essential to justify its opposition, may order that specified discovery be conducted notwithstanding this subdivision. Such discovery, if granted, shall be limited to the issues raised in the motion to dismiss.

4. For purposes of this section, “complaint” includes “cross-complaint” and “petition”, “plaintiff” includes “cross-complainant” and “petitioner”, and “defendant” includes “cross-defendant” and “respondent.”

(h) Standards for motions to dismiss in certain cases involving licensed architects, engineers, land surveyors or landscape architects. A motion to dismiss based on paragraph seven of subdivision (a) of this rule, in which the moving party has demonstrated that the action, claim, cross claim or counterclaim subject to the motion is an action in which a notice of claim must be served on a licensed architect, engineer, land surveyor or landscape architect pursuant to the provisions of subdivision one of section two hundred fourteen of this chapter, shall be granted unless the party responding to the motion demonstrates that a substantial basis in law exists to believe that the performance, conduct or omission complained of such licensed architect, engineer, land surveyor or landscape architect or such firm as set forth in the notice of claim was negligent and that such performance, conduct or omission was a proximate cause of personal injury, wrongful death or property damage complained of by the claimant or is supported by a substantial argument for an extension, modification or reversal of existing law. The court shall grant a preference in the hearing of such motion.

Credits

(L.1962, c. 308. Amended Jud.Conf.1964 Proposal No. 6; Jud.Conf.1965 Proposal Nos. 5, 6; L.1965, c. 773, § 9; Jud.Conf.1973 Proposal No. 4; L.1986, c. 220, § 12; L.1990, c. 904, § 26; L.1991, c. 656, § 4; L.1992, c. 767, § 4; L.1996, c. 501, § 1; L.1996, c. 682, § 2; L.1997, c. 518, § 2, eff. Sept. 3, 1997; L.2005, c. 616, § 1, eff. Jan. 1, 2006; L.2020, c. 250, § 3, eff. Nov. 10, 2020; L.2021, c. 593, § 8, eff. May 7, 2022.)

Editors' Notes

SUPPLEMENTARY PRACTICE COMMENTARIES

by Hon. Mark C. Dillon

2024

C3211:8 Sua Sponte Dismissals

Each year, these Supplemental Practice Commentaries discuss the extent to which trial courts improperly dismiss actions sua sponte. Each year, these commentaries discuss how the practice, when it occurs, violates due process. It is a problem that is noticed far more in the Second Department than elsewhere in the state, and more so in the area of residential mortgage foreclosure actions than in other areas of litigation.

A recent opinion rendered in the case of Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v St. Louis, __ A.D. __, 2024 WL _____ (2d Dep't. ___, __ 2024) (Opinion by Dillon, J.) addressed the issue in greater detail. The opinion provided statistics about sua sponte dismissals, demonstrating that the improper practice has not abated from year to year despite almost-universal reversals of trial courts engaging in the practice. The rate of appellate reversals of sua sponte dismissals has been particularly noticeable in the Second Department. The opinion discussed various constitutional and statutory reasons as to why sua sponte dismissals have no place in New York jurisprudence. Chief among them is the notion of due process, that parties be given notice and an opportunity to be heard on issues that affect tangible litigation rights, particularly those that are dispositive to the outcome of a case. Beyond that, CPLR 2211 requires that notice motions and orders to show cause be served upon parties to a litigation, that CPLR 2214 and 2215 reflect the timetable for the service of opposition papers to motions and cross-motions, and that CPLR 2214(a) requires the moving party to set forth the "relief demanded and the grounds therefor." A court's determination of a dispositive issue that has not been noticed or briefed falls outside of the plain directives of CPLR 2211, 2214 and 2215, which safeguard the due process rights of parties. The opinion in St. Louis also noted that general relief clauses in motions--that the court grant such other and further relief as it may deem just and proper--cannot be permissibly used to grant relief that is dispositive to an action, citing inter alia an earlier opinion of the court in Rosenblatt v St. George Health and Racquetball Assoc., LLC, 119 A.D.3d 45, 984 N.Y.S.2d 401 [2d Dep't. 2014] [Opinion by Leventhal. J.]). It remains to be seen whether the Second Department's issuance of a signed opinion on the issue will have more impact on trial courts going forward than its prior slip decisions on the subject.

Nevertheless, the law on sua sponte dismissals is that they not occur except where there are extraordinary circumstances warranting them (Anonymous v Anonymous, 217 A.D.3d 619, 192 N.Y.S.3d 115 [1st Dep't. 2023]; Bank of N.Y. Mellon v Stewart, 216 A.D.3d 720, 190 N.Y.S.3d 80 [2d Dep't. 2023]; Newrez, LLC v City of Middletown, 216 A.D.3d 657, 188 N.Y.S.3d 606 [2d Dep't. 2023]). Until now, almost no reported decision rendered by appellate courts in the State of New York, outside the scope of CPLR 3215(c) where it is uniquely permissible, has ever recognized the existence of extraordinary circumstances justifying dismissal. That is a remarkable track record. But the case of Morris v Zimmer, 227 A.D.3d 696, 211 N.Y.S.3d 414 (2d Dep't. 2024) appears to be an example of where extraordinary circumstances did exist to justify the sua sponte dismissal of a complaint. The action presents an unusual history, as the reader might suspect. In Morris, the plaintiffs failed to receive from their attorney certain funds that were to be paid to them in settlement of a prior matter. The attorney who failed to pay the settlement proceeds pleaded guilty in a criminal action, and the clients, as plaintiff, commenced an action in federal court for various related causes of action, and they ultimately received a judgment in their favor which was affirmed at the Second Circuit. While the federal action was pending, the plaintiffs sought to enter a state judgment by confession in New York County, as permitted by CPLR 3218, for the net amount owed by the former attorney. Thereafter, the plaintiffs commenced an action in the Supreme Court, Westchester County, asserting the same causes of action as had been asserted in the federal action, plus a fresh claim under Judiciary Law 487. The plaintiffs sought to consolidate their CPLR 3218 confessed judgment from New York County with their Westchester action, and thereafter moved for a CPLR 3215(c) default judgment against the attorney for having failed to appear and answer in the Westchester action. The default motion included a copy of the federal judgment. The attorney, as the defendant, moved for a CPLR 3211(a) dismissal of the state action but the dismissal motion was denied as untimely. Nevertheless, the court denied the plaintiff's default motion and dismissed the action, on the ground that "orderly procedure and judicial economy require that the action be dismissed" which was, in effect, a sua sponte dismissal. The basis for the dismissal, notwithstanding the untimeliness of the attorney's dismissal motion, was that the federal action, which had by then resolved, operated as res judicata on the state action involving the same parties, transactions, and subject matter, and overrode the attorney's default. Further, the plaintiff's assertion in state court of a claim under Judiciary Law 487 could have been litigated in the federal forum had it been earlier asserted, and therefore, was also barred. The dismissal on res judicata grounds was affirmed on appeal. In Morris, the circumstances leading to the complaint's dismissal were truly unusual and extraordinary, and not representative of the sua sponte dismissals that prompt the much higher volume of appellate reversals.

C3211:10 Defenses Based on "Documentary Evidence"

Letters, e-mails, and affidavits do not qualify as documentary evidence for purposes of CPLR 3211(a)(1) (Old Republic National Title Insurance Company v 1152 53 Management, LLC, 227 A.D.3d 824, 212 N.Y.S.3d 345 [2d Dep't. 2024] [certain letters insufficient in action for fraudulent conveyance]). Text messages also do not qualify (Nosegbe v Charles, 227 A.D.3d 1400, 211 N.Y.S.3d 832 [4th Dep't. 2024]). Examples of non-qualifying e-mails may be found in Goldin Real Estate, LLC v Shukla, 227 A.D.3d 674, 212 N.Y.S.3d 117 (2d Dep't. 2024) and Optical Communications Group, Inc. v Worms, 217 A.D.3d 458, 188 N.Y.S.3d 498 [1st Dep't. 2023]). Also not qualifying are letters and affidavits (7 Mansion, LLC v Calvano, 226 A.D.3d 730, 209 N.Y.S.3d 490 [2d Dep't. 2024]), though in that case other forms of documentary evidence including the terms and conditions of a contract utterly refuted the plaintiff's claim and warranted the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint.

C3211:11 Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

The Appellate Division, Third Department, affirmed the dismissal of an incarcerated inmate's action for damages brought in the Court of Claims for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The inmate sought a review of the denial of his inmate grievances, the conditions of his confinement, wrongful confinement, and discriminatory treatment. But the review of administrative determinations falls outside the scope of the Court of Claims' subject matter jurisdiction. The court held that the claims needed to be asserted as a special proceeding at the Supreme Court pursuant to CPLR Article 78 (Cumberland v State, 217 A.D.3d 1029, 190 N.Y.S.3d 499 [3d Dep't. 2023]). In the same case, the Third Department likewise held that the Court of Claims lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hear federal constitutional claims (Id., at 1031. See also Todd v State, 207 N.Y.S.3d 341 [Ct. of Claims 2023] [Chaudhry, J.] [as to Article 78s]; Piraino v State, 83 Misc.3d 489, 214 N.Y.S.3d 592 ([Ct. of Claims Sept. 14, 2023] [Chaudhry, J.] [as to Article 78s]).

The monetary jurisdictional limit of the New York City Civil Court was raised by constitutional amendment in 2021 from $25,000 to $50,000. Thereafter, in Honest Funding, LLC v Signature Hospitality Solutions LLC, 81 Misc.3d 897, 203 N.Y.S.3d 472 (Sup. Ct. Kings Co. 2023) (Maslow, J.), the plaintiff commenced a contract action against a guarantor in the Supreme Court for an amount of money that was less than $50,000. The defendant moved to dismiss the action under CPLR 3211(a)(2), arguing that the Supreme Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the amount of damages. The Supreme Court correctly disagreed. It noted that while the monetary jurisdictional limit of the Civil Court was in fact raised, nothing changed the Supreme Court's unlimited general jurisdiction to hear disputes of any amount. If the defendant is determined for the action to be litigated in the Civil Court, the remedy, if any, is a transfer of the existing action to Civil Court under CPLR 325. The Civil Court would have jurisdiction to hear the case, except to the extent that the plaintiff seeks use and occupancy against the guarantor (315 West 55th Owners Corp. v Rainbow Spa 23 Inc., 81 Misc.3d 1204[A], 199 N.Y.S.3d 441 [Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2023] [Lebovits, J.]).

Courts will look to the true nature of a claim to determine whether the claim fits within its subject matter jurisdiction. In Severini v Department of Environmental Protection, 80 Misc.3d 1214[A], 195 N.Y.S.3d 638 (Civ. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2023) (Marcus, J.), a pro se plaintiff commenced an action in the small claims part of Civil Court claiming that the New York City D.E.P. improperly prosecuted certain provisions of the city's Administrative Code. The defendant moved to dismiss the action, arguing that the substance of the action and the relief sought was in the nature of Article 78 mandamus or prohibition, which is outside the subject matter jurisdiction of the Civil Court's small claims part. The court agreed and dismissed the action, finding that only the Supreme Court is authorized to hear Article 78 proceedings. Similarly, the Court of Claims lacks subject matter jurisdiction over challenges to administrative determinations (Hudson Neurosurgery, PLLC v State, 81 Misc.3d 1238[A], 202 N.Y.S.3d 911 [Ct. of Claims 2023] [Marnin, J.]).

Court of Claims Act 8-b provides a right of action against the state for wrongful criminal convictions and imprisonments. The statute sets forth conditions that the claimant must meet in order to be eligible to maintain such an action. The purpose of the law is to provide recompense to individuals where it is determined after-the-fact that their convictions were truly wrongful on the ground of actual innocence, and that harm was suffered as a consequence. It does not apply to a run-of-the mill reversal of a conviction based on weight, insufficiency of the evidence, trial error, or as relevant in Nolan v State, 205 N.Y.S.3d 707 (Ct. of Claims 2023) (Vargas, J.), ineffectiveness of counsel. The reason is that those grounds for the vacatur of convictions do not necessarily establish the actual innocence of the accused.

C3211:14 "Other Action Pending"

A recent appellate decision underscores the operation of CPLR 3211(a)(4) dismissals for prior action pending. Such dismissals may occur where there is a prior action between the same parties arising out of the same dispute. The concept behind the statute is that courts not entertain duplicative actions. The case of Melis v Blake Stone LLC, 227 A.D.3d 882, 213 N.Y.S.3d 64 (2d Dep't. 2024) demonstrates the limits of what is duplicative. Two actions may be related, but not necessarily duplicative as to require the dismissal of the second on account of the first. In Melis, the plaintiff's property was the subject of a judgment of foreclosure and sale, and was sold to the defendant at a public auction. The plaintiff commenced a separate action for conversion and an accounting, alleging that during the time between the auction sale and the issuance of the referee's deed, the defendant took possession of the property and leased it to a third party. The defendant moved to dismiss the second action on the ground of prior action pending, which the Supreme Court denied and the Appellate Division affirmed. Courts have discretion in deciding matters involving prior action pending. Here, the initial foreclosure action was already concluded by the time the defendant's CPLR 3211(a)(4) dismissal motion was made in the second action, so there was not truly a prior action pending. Moreover, the two actions, while related to the same property, involved different forms of relief based upon different sets of facts.

Further as to the necessity that the prior action be actually pending is the case of Quinones v Z & B Trucking, Inc., 220 A.D.3d 901, 198 N.Y.S.3d 565 (2d Dep't. 2023). The dispute between the parties involved an automobile accident in 2018. The plaintiff commenced an action for damages in 2019 by the filing of initiatory papers, but there was never any service upon the defendant. In 2021, the same plaintiff commenced an action arising out of the same occurrence, for the same damages, against the same defendant. The defendant sought to dismiss the second action on the ground of prior action pending. The Second Department held that because the summons and complaint in the initial action was never served, that action was never "pending," and therefore, the dismissal of the second action was, at the Appellate Division, denied.

C3211:18 Affirmative Defenses Available on Subdivision (a)(5) Motion

Infancy

CPLR 214-g, enacted as part of the Crime Victims Act, provides a revival window for civil claims or causes of action alleging intentional or negligent acts or omissions that seek to recover damages for injuries suffered as a result of, inter alia, conduct which would constitute a sexual offense as defined in Article 130 of the Penal Law committed against a child less than eighteen years of age. In Schearer v Fitzgerald, 217 A.D.3d 980, 192 N.Y.S.3d 207 (2d Dep't. 2023), the defendant in the CVA action sought to dismiss the plaintiff's complaint on the ground that Penal Law 30.30 prohibits the revival of time-barred actions, and that the CVA violates federal and state guarantees to due process. The court held that revival statutes satisfy due process if enacted if a reasonable response to remedy an injustice. The plaintiff's infancy, at the time of the alleged offense, is not a bar to an action that falls within the scope of the CVA.

Release

The Appellate Division, Second Department, found a question of fact as to the enforceability of a release executed by an automobile accident motorist to an insurer. The plaintiff sued despite the release, and the insurer sought to have the action dismissed on the ground of the release. The action is Huang v Llerena-Salazar, 222 A.D.3d 1033, 203 N.Y.S.3d 341 (2d Dep't. 2023). The question of fact arose from the following factors discussed by the appellate court: "The plaintiff averred, among other things, that shortly after the accident, an insurance representative for the defendants called him 'repeatedly'; that he had difficulty understanding the defendants' representative due to a language barrier; that the defendants' representative, who had him sign the release to obtain money for medical bills, never explained that the document he signed was a release or had the legal effect of a release; and that the plaintiff was not represented by an attorney at the time he signed the release. Moreover, the plaintiff raised questions of fact as to whether there was mutual mistake as to the nature of the injuries sustained by plaintiff from the alleged accident" (Id., at 1034). The factual questions that were of concern to the appellate court inform us of the circumstances under which a release will not necessarily be given the force of law, in opposition to a CPLR 3211(a)(5) motion to dismiss. Similarly, a release was not given force and effect where there was a question of fact raised, in opposition to dismissal, about whether the release document had actually been signed by the defendant (Liu v Kirkwood, 222 A.D.3d 861, 199 N.Y.S.3d 705 [2d Dep't. 2023]).

A case in contrast is Prete v Tamares Development 1, LLC, 219 A.D.3d 1537, 197 N.Y.S.3d 529 (2d Dep't. 2023), where the court rejected the plaintiff's averment in opposition to the defendant's motion to dismiss that he did not know the English language as used in a signed release. The court held that the excuse, standing alone, is insufficient. In Prete, the plaintiff did not allege that the defendant misrepresented the content of the release, nor did he claim to have made any effort to have the document translated or explained to him.

A stipulation of discontinuance with prejudice has preclusive effect on a subsequent litigation (Busher v Barry, 223 A.D.3d 778, 203 N.Y.S.3d 392 [2d Dep't. 2024]). The same is true of a final judgment (Joseph v Bank of New York Mellon, 219 A.D.3d 596, 194 N.Y.S.3d 275 [2d Dep't. 2023]).

Statute of Limitations

Statutes of limitations defenses are typically addressed by defendants seeking to dismiss plaintiffs' direct claims. But on occasion, the limitations period may be relevant to the plaintiffs seeking the dismissal of defendants' counterclaims. For that, the CPLR 3211(a)(5) defense must be read in conjunction with CPLR 203(d), as the traditional rules are different. CPLR 203(d) provides that if a counterclaim is otherwise untimely under its applicable statute of limitations, it is nevertheless valid if the counterclaim would have been timely on the date that the plaintiff commenced the action. In other words, for timeliness purposes, the date of the counterclaim dates back to the plaintiff's initiatory filing. There is a catch, however. In instances where the counterclaim is subject to the savings provision of CPLR 203(d), the defendant's recovery on the counterclaim is capped at whatever amount sets-off the plaintiff's award against the defendant. The defendant can use the counterclaim as a set-off, but not for an affirmative recovery that exceeds the amount of whatever damages are awarded to the plaintiff. The intersection of CPLR 3211(a)(5) and CPLR 203(d) is not seen often, as the number of counterclaims asserted in New York practice is a modest portion of litigation, and of those, most counterclaims face no issue of timeliness. These circumstances were seen in Getzel Schiff & Pesce, LLP v Shtayner, __ A.D.3d __, __ N.Y.S.3d __ (2d Dep't. 2024), where the plaintiff commenced an action to recover unpaid accounting fees and the defendant counterclaimed for, inter alia, professional malpractice. The counterclaim was interposed nine days beyond the three-year limitations period for professional malpractice (CPLR 214[6]) and the Supreme Court dismissed the counterclaim as untimely under CPLR 3211(a)(5). The Appellate Division reversed in finding that by application of CPLR 203(d), the operative date of the counterclaim related back to the filing of the plaintiff's complaint, rendering the counterclaim timely, but only to the extent that any recovery would offset damages awarded to the plaintiff.

Statute of Limitations and Bankruptcy

An opinion by Justice Fran Connolly of the Appellate Division, Second Department, is a must-read for anyone examining the interplay between the statute of limitations and bankruptcy stays. The opinion is in the case of Bank of New York Mellon v DeMatteis, 222 A.D.3d 1, 199 N.Y.S.3d 79 (2d Dep't. 2023]). The Westlaw version is preceded by 32 headnotes. The action was one for residential mortgage foreclosure. As was typical of many foreclosure actions, at least before the enactment of the Foreclosure Abuse Protection Act (FAPA), the plaintiff's first action was discontinued and a second action was later commenced. The second action was commenced more than six years from the acceleration of the debt in the first action, which would normally have rendered it untimely (CPLR 213[4]). However, the statute of limitations for the second action was tolled by the combination of the covid-related Executive Orders of Gov. Andrew Cuomo in 2020 and the defendant's bankruptcy filing, which operated as a toll under 11 U.S.C. 362(a). The opinion in DeMatteis analyzed that the bankruptcy filing operated as a statutory prohibition to the commencement of the second action, as recognized by CPLR 204(a). The unusual twist in DeMatteis was whether the bankruptcy toll of 11 U.S.C. 362(a), which applies to "debtors," applied to the defendant as the holder of the defaulted note where, prior to the foreclosure actions, the property was deeded to a third party. The Second Department held that the bankruptcy stay applied in favor of the defendant note holder notwithstanding the conveyance of the deed, as the plaintiff was prohibited from commencing the second action while the stay was in effect. However, a different conclusion was reached as to the timeliness of the action against the party to whom the property had been deeded. The bankruptcy stay of the note holder did not extend to the party to whom the deed was conveyed, and who was never a "debtor" in any bankruptcy case. As a result, an action could have been commenced without any bankruptcy toll against the later title holder, so long as the original note holder was not named in any such action.

C3211:28 Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

These Supplemental Practice Commentaries have been following each year developments on what has become a very hot area of law, the circumstances under which a corporate defendant may be subject to the general jurisdiction of New York under CPLR 301. Last year's developments, discussed in the previous year's Supplemental Practice Commentaries, involved the impact of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Mallory v Norfolk Southern Railway Co., 600 U.S. 122, 143 S.Ct. 2028, 216 L.Ed.2d 815 (2023). There, these commentaries predicted that based on Justice Alito's concurrence in that case, the legal battlefield over whether compulsory consent statutes may provide a proper basis for the assertion of a state's general jurisdiction will shift to the commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution, but that some time will be required for that issue to work its way through the court system.

In the meantime, the New York State government has not been sitting on its hands. The legislature passed a new CPLR 301-a and an amendment to BCL 1301, to provide that a foreign corporation's application to do business in New York qualifies as consent to the assertion of general jurisdiction for all actions against the corporation, and a revocation of the corporation's registration would concomitantly revoke the state's general jurisdiction over it. The legislation was intended to nullify a holding by the Court of Appeals in Aybar v Aybar, 37 NY3d 274 (2021) whereby, under still-continuing law, a corporation is subject to New York's general jurisdiction only if it is incorporated within the New York or maintains its principle office within the state, or under exceptional circumstances (see also Daimler AG v Bauman, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S.Ct. 746, 187 L.Ed.2d 624 [2014] [Opinion by Ginsburg, J.]). None of the foregoing affects the assertion of specific jurisdiction over out-of-state entities under the longarm statute (CPLR 302).

Governor Hochul vetoed these new proposed statutory provisions in the waning days of December 2023, and the state's definition of general jurisdiction remains unchanged, at least for now. This was the second year in a row that Governor Hochul vetoed such legislation. Her rationale has been that the enactment of the proposed amended law would be bad for businesses, by discouraging them from filing certificates to do business in New York to avoid being widely subject to the state's general jurisdiction for lawsuits. It now remains to be seen whether the state legislature will attempt, for a third time, to pass a similar amendment to CPLR 301. Without any amendment to CPLR 301, the law in New York remains that general jurisdiction over corporations may only be asserted where the corporation is "at home," meaning that the corporation is incorporated in New York, or maintains its principle office within the state, or represents a truly exceptional case where the entity's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render it at home within the state (Daimler AG v Bauman, supra).

Absent any amendment to CPLR 301, the incumbent statute is what it is.

The "department test" for general jurisdiction, for imputing liability from a subsidiary to a corporate parent, was held to not be met where the parent company was not independently subject to the general jurisdiction of New York (KPP III CCP LLC v Douglas Development Corporation, 222 A.D.3d 408, 202 N.Y.S.3d 15 (1st Dep't. 2023]).

C3211:32 Absence of a Person Who Should be a Party

In Ashwood v Uber USA, LLC, 219 A.D.3d 1289, 195 N.Y.S.3d 762 (2d Dep't. 2023), an action was not dismissed due to the absence of a person who should be a party (CPLR 3211[10]). Rather, there were two actions involving the same plaintiff, the same accident, and common questions of fact and law. The two actions were joined for trial under CPLR 602(a), which remedied the absence of necessary parties in the action where the CPLR 3211(10) dismissal motion had been denied.

C3211:35 Standards on a CPLR 3211(b) Motion

On a CPLR 3211(b) motion to dismiss one or more affirmative defenses, the allegations in the answer must be viewed in the light most favorable to the defendant. The defendant is entitled to every favorable inference, and the pleading is to be liberally construed. This construct was seen in the landlord-tenant dispute of Soufer Family LLC v Sprague, 80 Misc.3d 130[A], 195 N.Y.S.3d 869 (App. Term, N.Y., 1st Dep't. 2023). There, the tenant's affirmative defense was worded inartfully, but adequately conveyed at least a right of succession. The landlord's CPLR 3211(b) motion did not address the issue of succession, and on that basis the motion was denied.

C3211:42 Converting CPLR 3211 Motion Into One for Summary Judgment

While the court may, upon adequate notice to the parties, convert a CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss to a CPLR 3212 motion for summary judgment, it may not do so if is demonstrated that summary judgment would be premature (Russo v Crisona, 219 A.D.3d 920, 195 N.Y.S.3d 729 [2d Dep't. 2023]).

C3211:51 Single-Motion Rule

The First Department has signaled that the single-motion rule is strictly enforced. In TRB Acquisitions LLC v Yedid, 225 A.D.3d 508, 207 N.Y.S.3d 76 (1st Dep't. 2024), which involved a SLAPP issue, the Appellate Division declined to reach the merits of the CPLR 3211 motion on appeal, as the motion was made in violation of the single-motion rule.

However, if the first CPLR 3211 dismissal motion is not resolved on its merits, a second dismissal motion does not violate the single-motion rule (Lane's Floor Coverings & Interiors, Inc. v DiLalla, 226 A.D.3d 593, 207 N.Y.S.3d 529 [1st Dep't. 2024]; Newlands Asset Holding Trust v Vasquez, 218 A.D.3d 786, 193 N.Y.S.3d 258 [2d Dep't. 2023] [initial motion denied for its improper service upon the plaintiff]).

C3211:53 Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraphs 1, 3, 5 or 6 of 3211(a)

The defense of lack of standing is generally deemed waived under CPLR 3211(e) if not affirmatively raised in an answer or a pre-answer motion to dismiss. There is an exception in residential mortgage foreclosure actions involving home loans, as set forth in RPAPL 1302-a enacted in 2019. That statute provides that the standing defense is not waived in those actions (Citibank, N.A. v Boyce, 226 A.D.3d 867, 211 N.Y.S.3d 104 [2024]; Deutsche Bank National Trust Company v Groder, 218 A.D.3d 542, 192 N.Y.S.3d 563 [2d Dep't. 2023]). Standing is waived, if not pleaded as an affirmative defense or raised in a CPLR 3211 motion, in actions involving other than residential mortgage foreclosure, outside the scope of RPAPL 1302-a (e.g. Perine Intern. Inc. v Bedford Clothiers, Inc., 143 A.D.3d 491, 40 N.Y.S.3d 27 [1st Dep't. 2016]).

C3211:69 Easier Standard for Dismissing "SLAPP" Suit

CPLR 3211(g), and for that matter CPLR 3212(h), provide that SLAPP actions be dismissed upon motion unless the responding party demonstrates that the cause of action has a "substantial basis in law or is supported by a substantial argument for an extension, modification or reversal of existing law." The First Department had an occasion to consider the meaning of the term "substantial basis" in Reeves v Associated Newspapers, Ltd., 228 A.D.3d 75, 210 N.Y.S.3d 25 (1st Dep't. 2024) (Opinion by Gonzalez, J.). Reeves involved a claim for damages arising out of alleged defamation and related torts. The court carefully examined legislative history and precedents, and concluded that "a substantial basis in law" under the SLAPP statutes means "such relevant proof as a reasonable mind may accept as adequate to support a conclusion or ultimate fact." According to the sponsor's memorandum for the enactment in 1996, it is less than a preponderance of the evidence standard (Id., at __). It is not measured by the standard of frivolousness (Id., at __). A substantial basis is "such relevant proof as a reasonable mind may accept as adequate to support a conclusion or ultimate fact," which happens to be the same definition of "substantial evidence" earlier articulated by the Court of Appeals in 300 Gramatan Ave. Associates v State Division of Human Rights, 45 NY.2d 176, 408 N.Y.S.2d 54, 379 N.E.2d 1183 (1978). It is a more exacting analysis than the liberal notice pleading standards applicable to ordinary CPLR 3211(a)(7) motions, as the consideration of "substantial evidence" would typically require the court to look beyond the pleadings. But by the same logic, a complaint that fails to state a cause of action under CPLR 3211(a)(7) at the get-go necessarily lacks a substantial basis in law under CPLR 3211(g) (Id., at __; 215 West 84th St Owner LLC v Bailey, 217 A.D.3d 488, 191 N.Y.S.3d 368 [1st Dep't. 2023]).

Justice Oing, while agreeing with the panel on the ultimate result in Reeves, wrote a separate concurrence about whether, inter alia, a CPLR 3211(a)(7) dismissal always means that the action lacks a substantial basis and is therefore subject to the other remedies of the SLAPP statutes. He noted that the trial court found the action was commenced under a cognizable legal theory and was not frivolous, even though the trial court ultimately dismissed the complaint on the ground that the alleged defamatory statements were protected by the fair report privilege. Therefore, Justice Oing concluded in concurrence, reliance upon the CPLR 3211(a)(7) dismissal as a basis for concluding the absence of "substantial evidence" was "misplaced," requiring a deeper consideration of whether the plaintiffs demonstrated a substantial basis in law for their claims.

The Reeves case involved the SLAPP statute in the context of CPLR 3211(g). The same term central to its analysis--"substantial basis in law"--appears in the language of CPLR 3212(h) governing summary judgment motions for SLAPP claims, and CPLR 3211(h) and 3212(i) for dismissal motions and summary judgment motions in cases involving licensed architects, engineers, land surveyors, and landscape architects. The Reeves analysis should be analogous and applicable to those statutes as well.

The retroactivity of the SLAPP amendments continues to be an issue of interest. As noted in these Supplemental Practice Commentaries from last year, the Court of Appeals addressed the retroactivity of the 2020 SLAPP amendments (Civil Rights Law 70-a and 76-a) in Gottwald v Sebert, 40 N.Y.3d 240, 197 N.Y.S.3d 694, 220 N.E.3d 621 (2023) (Garcia, J.). The Court of Appeals held that the 2020 SLAPP amendments were prospective, not retroactive. However, the same court also explained that the provisions allowing for an award of costs and attorney's fees in SLAPP actions that were "commenced or continued" without a substantial basis in law permits such assessments in favor of counterclaiming defendants, from the date of the effective date of the amendments (i.e. November 10, 2020) forward. In that sense, therefore, actions commenced prior to the 2020 SLAPP amendments received some statutory benefits in terms of potential costs and attorney's fees.

Recall that under CRL 76-a(1)(a), the amendments expanded SLAPP's remedial applicability to inter alia public communications regarding matters of public interest. A post-Gottwald twist on retroactivity arose in the case of VIP Pet Grooming Studio, Inc. v Sproul, 224 A.D.3d 78, 203 N.Y.S.3d 681 (2d Dep't. 2024) (Opinion by Dillon, J.). The case arose from the alleged negligence of a dog groomer which resulted in the death of a cocker spaniel named Ranger. The defendants, who were Ranger's owners, posted critical public comments about the plaintiff groomer on Yelp and Google. The plaintiff commenced a defamation action on November 2, 2020, eight days before the effective date of the SLAPP amendments. After the SLAPP amendments became effective, the defendants moved to dismiss the defamation action under CPLR 3211(a)(7) and 3211(g), the latter subdivision being SLAPP, and for a SLAPP award of costs and attorney's fees. The defendants argued that their social media postings fit within SLAPP's expanded definition of public petition and participation. However, the Second Department held that the postings were not within the scope of SLAPP at the time the plaintiff's action was commenced. It also held that the SLAPP amendments could not be applied to retroactively, as the defendants' dismissal motion was addressed to a complaint that preceded the effective date of the amendments. The complaint therefore needed to be judged by the definition of public petition and participation as was in effect at the time of the plaintiff's complaint was filed, which did not include public comments about broad matters of public interest (Id., at 89).

C3211:70 Greater Scrutiny of Complaint Where Defendant is Design Professional

The reader is referred to this year's Supplemental Practice Commentary C3211:69 for a discussion of the First Department's opinion in the case of Reeves v Associated Newspapers, Ltd., __ A.D.3d __, 210 N.Y.S.3d 25 (1st Dep't. 2024] [Opinion by Gonzalez, J.). The opinion addresses the meaning of the term "substantial basis in law" as used in CPLR 3211(g), 3211(h) (design professionals), 3212(h), and 3212(i).

2023

C3211:1 The Motion to Dismiss, Generally

Practitioners, beware of using Artificial Intelligence (AI) such as ChatGPT when preparing motion affidavits and memoranda of law. ChatGPT is a form of AI which became available to the public on November 30, 2022. "Chat" refers to its chat box functionality. The "GPT" stands for Generative Pre-Trained Transformer. The program has many functions, one of which is to compose letters and essays on topics selected by the user. Essays produced by ChatGPT are not based on dedicated search engines such as Westlaw, but are instead based on generally-available information which leaves room for error in the sophisticated and detail-orientated field of law.

This is just the opinion of your humble Practice Commentator, take it for whatever it is worth: Do not use ChatGPT for writing legal papers that will be served upon parties and filed with a court. Two attorneys learned that lesson the hard way in the case of Roberto Mata v Avianca, Inc. The plaintiff, Mata, commenced an action in the Supreme Court, New York County, seeking damages for personal injuries allegedly sustained as a result of having been struck by a metal serving cart during a 2019 airline flight bound for New York's JFK Airport. The action was removed to the federal District Court for the Southern District of New York, under Docket No. 22 CV 1461 (Castel, J.). The defendant, Avianca, Inc., later moved to dismiss the action under F.R.C.P 12(b)(6) (https://storage.courtlistener.com/recap/gov.uscourts.nysd.575368/gov.uscourts.nysd.575368.16.0.pdf), which was opposed by counsel representing the plaintiff. The opposition papers were composed by plaintiff's counsel using ChatGPT. Because of shortcomings with the ChatGPT program, the papers submitted in opposition to dismissal cited to several judicial decisions which did not, in fact, exist (https://www.documentcloud.org/documents/23826751-mata-v-avianca-airlines-affidavit-in-opposition-to-motion). The non-existent cases were accompanied by non-existent quotes from them and contained internal citations which also did not exist. Quick on the uptake, District Judge P. Kevin Castel directed that the plaintiff's attorneys show cause on June 8, 2023 as to why they should not be sanctioned for the submission (Order to Show Cause dated May 4, 2023, available at https://ecf.nysd.uscourts.gov/doc1/127133304220. See also Weiser, Benjamin, Here's What Happens When Your Lawyer Used ChatGPT, New York Times, May 27, 2023, available at https://www.nytimes.com/2023/05/27/nyregion/avianca-airline-lawsuit-chatgpt.html).

Lawyering is never one-size-fits all. No computer program such as ChatGPT can incorporate the years of experience that an attorney brings to a matter such as in the drafting of legal papers for filing. No computer program can substitute for human judgment, strategy, nuance, emphasis, and persuasiveness. No computer program can know, like a lawyer, what type of argument may best resonate with the particular judge assigned to the matter. And if composition programs such as ChatGPT do not directly focus upon proven legal research platforms like Westlaw, legal research and analysis is rightly suspect.

Some might argue that the problem which came to light in Mata was not one of burgeoning technology, but the failure by counsel to double-check ChatGPT's draft to assure that the final product submitted to the court was accurate and complete (Wilkins, Stephanie, "The Problem With the 'Bogus' ChatGPT Legal Brief? It's Not the Tech," NYLJ, June 2, 2023, available at https://www.law.com/legaltechnews/2023/06/02/the-problem-with-the-bogus-chatgpt-legal-brief-its-not-the-tech/). But that begs the question. If the technology produces flawed material, should any attorney use it in the first place rather than drafting the papers from scratch using our traditional schooled methods? Do not clients deserve the traditional effort?

On June 22, 2023, Judge Castel financially sanctioned the two attorneys and their law firm who had submitted the misleading opposition papers the sum of $5,000 (Opinion and Order dated June 22, 2023, p. 34, available at https://ecf.nysd.uscourts.gov/doc1/127133572604). The court noted that the attorneys failed in their gatekeeping function to assure the accuracy of their filings. Further, in a separate order, the District Court dismissed plaintiff Mata's personal injury action as untimely commenced (Opinion and Order dated June 22, 2023, available at https://ecf.nysd.uscourts.gov/doc1/127133572662).

Aside from the shortfalls of ChatGPT, ethics rules may be implicated as well. How is counsel to bill a client for the research and drafting of legal papers actually researched and drafted by an Artificial Intelligence, which a non-lawyer could obtain by using the same computer program? How can counsel sign an attorney certification that filed papers are not frivolous, as required by 22 NYCRR 130-1.1a(b) and Federal Rule 11(b), if counsel relies upon ChatGPT research and fails to carefully review the papers to assure that there are not inaccuracies and non-existent citations? May there be disciplinary concerns under the Rules 1.1(a) or 5.1(d) of the Rules of Professional Conduct (22 NYCRR 1200.1.1(a), 1200.5.1[d]), and under other potentially-applicable Rules? The answer to all of these questions may be problematic for any attorney caught in a ChatGPT snare. As General Colin Powell once said of the Pottery Barn rule in a different context, "You break it, you own it."

We do not have a crystal ball as whether and to what extent AI might become more accurate and reliable in the future. A law office is not a drive-thru business. For now, nothing beats legal writing the old fashioned way--knowing the facts, accumulating evidence, performing legal research, drafting papers discussing the facts and law, attaching relevant exhibits, being persuasive in submissions, and filing the papers in an appropriate manner that permits you to sleep well at night.

C3211:8 Sua Sponte Dismissals

These Supplemental Practice Commentaries take the annual pulse of the number of plaintiffs' complaints that are erroneously dismissed by trial courts sua sponte. Such dismissals are to occur sparingly and only when extraordinary circumstances exist to warrant such drastic relief. The bar is set high because sua sponte dismissals deprive aggrieved parties of due process notice and any opportunity to be heard on the question of whether the dismissal is appropriate.

This year's crop of appellate court reversals of sua sponte dismissals, from the absence of extraordinary circumstances for doing so, include Newrez, LLC v City of Middletown, 216 A.D.3d 657, 188 N.Y.S.3d 606 (2nd Dep't. 2023); U.S. Bank National Association v Bhagwandeen, 216 A.D.3d 700, 187 N.Y.S.3d 115 (Mem.) (2nd Dep't. 2023); U.S. Bank National Association v Turner, 215 A.D.3d 889, 188 N.Y.S.3d 536 (2nd Dep't. 2023); Deutsche Bank Trust Company Americas v Martinez, 214 A.D.3d 704, 185 N.Y.S.3d 232 (2nd Dep't. 2023); CRC Insurance Services, Inc. v Kullman, 211 A.D.3d 903, 180 N.Y.S.3d 589 (2nd Dep't. 2022); Melikov v 66 Overlook Terrace Corp., 211 A.D.3d 537, 181 N.Y.S.3d 35 (1st Dep't. 2022); Citimortgage, Inc. v Dedalto, 210 A.D.3d 628, 178 N.Y.S.3d 102 (2nd Dep't. 2022); U.S. Bank National Association v Stuart, 208 A.D.3d 824, 172 N.Y.S.3d 625 (2nd Dep't. 2022); Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v Cascarano, 208 A.D.3d 729, 174 N.Y.S.3d 394 (2nd Dep't. 2022).

Conversely, there is another side of the coin on this pesky topic. If a court dismisses an action sua sponte, it may, upon motion, likewise vacate its dismissal to cure its previous error of doing so (Bank of New York Mellon v Stewart, 216 A.D.3d 720, 190 N.Y.S.3d 80 [2nd Dep't. May 14, 2023]). In appropriate circumstances, a trial court will be reversed for failing to vacate an earlier sua sponte dismissal (Wohnberger v Lucani, 214 A.D.3d 615, 186 N.Y.S.3d 618 [1st Dep't. 2023]; Cooper v Broems, 214 A.D.3d 497, 186 N.Y.S.3d 159 [1st Dep't. 2023]; Bankunited v Kaur, 208 A.D.3d 622, 173 N.Y.S.3d 55 (2nd Dep't. 2022]).

C3211:10 Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence"

Decisional authority continues to develop on the extent to which letters, e-mails, and affidavits may qualify as documentary evidence for purposes of a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion. Affidavits prepared for the motion never qualify (J.D. v Archdiocese of New York, 214 A.D.3d 561, 183 N.Y.S.3d 851 [1st Dep't. 2023]; Davis v Henry, 212 A.D.3d 597, 181 N.Y.S.3d 606 [2nd Dep't. 2023]). For letters and electronically-generated information such as e-mails, the general rule is that such material does not qualify as documentary evidence for purposes of CPLR 3211(a)(1) (Xu v Van Zwienen, 212 A.D.3d 872, 183 N.Y.S.3d 475 [2nd Dep't. 2023] [letter inadmissible]; Bath & Twenty, LLC v Federal Savings Bank, 198 A.D.3d 855, 156 N.Y.S.3d 316 [2nd Dep't. 2021]). The reason for the general rule is that these forms of material are too easily manipulatable by a party to be allowed to affect a dismissal motion's outcome. Case law tends to view CPLR 3211(a)(1) documentary evidence as material that is more unassailable such as judicial records, as well as documents reflecting out-of-court transactions including mortgages, deeds, contracts, and other papers the contents of which are essentially undeniable (Xu v Van Zwienen, 212 A.D.3d at 874). For e-mails to have any chance of being admissible for a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion, they must fall into the category of material that is essentially undeniable. E-mails, for admissibility, must at least meet the high test of being unambiguous, authentic, and undeniable. How particular e-mails fare under that test will vary depending on the unique facts of each action. The parties' agreement in their papers that e-mails are authentic goes a long way toward meeting that test. Recently, in Matter of Estate of Eckert v Connelly, 217 A.D.3d 1151, 191 N.Y.S.3d 510 (3rd Dep't. June 15, 2023), the court addressed the question of whether the language of parties' e-mails constituted a binding stipulation of settlement. In Eckert, there was no issue between the parties as to the authenticity of their e e-mail exchanges, and as a result, the court determined the merits of the enforceability of the purported stipulation (finding in the end by a 3-2 majority that essential terms for the settlement and assent were lacking). Thus, even when authenticity is not an issue, the e-mail, once admitted, must be conclusive to the subject matter of the motion to be determinative of an outcome (e.g. Cohen v Getzel, 205 A.D.3d 532, 166 N.Y.S.3d 527 [1st Dep't. 2022]).

Nothing beats the decision of a Canadian court about whether a thumbs-up emoji qualifies as a binding signature for an electronic contract, finding that under section 18(1)(b) of its controlling Electronic Information and Documents Act, an emoji is the equivalent of a signature because it is an "icon" permissible under the language of the Act (South West Terminal v Achter Land & Cattle, 2023 SKKB 116 [Swift Current, Canada 2023]). Thanks goes to David Paul Horowitz and Katryna L. Kristoferson for bringing that interesting Canadian case to the attention of the bar in a published article (Horowitz, David Paul and Kristoferson, Katryna L. " 'It Is Hereby ...' Can Emails Create a Binding Stipulation?" NYLJ July 17, 2023, available at https://www.law.com/newyorklawjournal/2023/07/17/it-is-hereby-can-emails-create-a-binding-stipulation/). New York practitioners should of course not rely on that Canadian case as legal authority, as we are subject to the terms and expectations of the General Obligations Law, and specifically GOL 5-701, for determining whether a document qualifies as an enforceable signed writing. A New York court held that a "thumbs-up" emoji was insufficient to convey a party's intent to be bound, where only minutes beforehand the same party had categorically asserted that he would never sign any document (Lightstone Re LLC v Zinntex LLC, 2022 WL 3757585 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2022). In a general sense, might a "thumbs-up" reflect a party's happiness with an offer without going so far as to reflect an intent to be bound by it? Attorneys should advise clients against using the thumbs-up emoji when executing legal contracts and stipulations, and while at it, advise clients against using the happy face, the hand clap, the fireworks, the celebratory balloons, the check mark, the A-OK sign, and the red heart! Parties agreeing to the terms of a contract are better off simply placing an electronic signature at the designated signature location of the e-document. Doing so avoids ambiguities, problems, misunderstandings, and perhaps litigation. For deeper analysis, an entire law review article has been written about whether emojis should may qualify as signed writings under New York's statute of frauds, GOL 5-701 (Berliner, Moshe. "When a Picture s Not Worth a Thousand Words: Why Emojis Should Not Satisfy the Statute of Frauds' Writing Requirement," 41 Cardozo L. Rev. 2161 (June 2020).

E-mails may sometimes be used to establish claims or defenses in actions involving the statute of frauds (CPLR 3211[a][5]). There is further discussion of this topic specific to the statute of frauds within this year's Supplemental Practice Commentary C3211:18.

C3211:11 Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

The state constitution was amended by public referendum on November 2, 2021, raising the jurisdiction of the Civil Court within the City of New York from $25,000 to $50,000. The previous amendment, which raised the Civil Court's monetary jurisdiction from $10,000 to $25,000, occurred in 1983. The primary purpose of the constitutional amendment was to adjust the Civil Court's jurisdiction for almost four decades of price inflation. The new $50,000 limit applies not only to actions for money damages, but to actions for replevin, the foreclosure of mechanics' liens, partitions, contract rescissions, and real property foreclosures, so long as the value of the subject matter fits within the new $50,000 cap. The subject matter jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is not affected by the constitutional amendment in any way, and Supreme Court therefore remains the go-to court for disputes which exceed $50,000 in value.

The increase in the Civil Court's jurisdiction presents pros and cons. The benefit of the increase is its stated purpose, of adjusting the court's subject matter jurisdiction to account for inflation. A burden of the increase is that it may add to the size of the Civil Court dockets in counties within the City of New York which are already overworked and backlogged. For disputes that are less than $50,000 in value, nothing prevents plaintiffs from commencing their actions in the Supreme Court, but doing so risks the court's discretionary removal of those actions to Civil Court under CPLR 325(d) and 22 NYCRR 202.13(a), even sua sponte (Leighton v Lowenberg, 215 A.D.3d 474, 185 N.Y.S.3d 683 [1st Dep't. 2023] [post-amendment removal from Supreme Court to Civil Court]). If an action is removed to a court of more limited jurisdiction without the parties' consent, which "higher" courts have the authority to order, the verdict or judgment is not limited to the monetary jurisdiction of the lower court and may instead be of an amount within the jurisdiction of the court where the action was originally filed (CPLR 325[d]; Delaine v Finger Lakes Fire & Cas. Co., 23 A.D.3d 1143, 806 N.Y.S.2d 320 [4th Dep't. 2005]). It is only when an action's removal to a court of more limited jurisdiction is on the parties' consent that the parties become bound to the monetary jurisdictional limit of the lower court (CPLR 325[c] [subject to a counterclaim-related exception]; Hoboken Wood Flooring Corp. v Fischoff, 10 Misc.3d 1065[A], 814 N.Y.S.2d 561 [Sup. Ct. Nassau Co. 2005]).

Pivoting to another topic, there must be a valid marriage for the Supreme Court to have the subject matter jurisdiction for granting a divorce. While that concept seems straight-forward, an interesting twist occurred in Bernstein v Benchemoun, 216 A.D.3d 893, 188 N.Y.S.3d 669 (2nd Dep't. May 23, 2023). The parties in Bernstein were New York residents. The plaintiff "wife" sought a divorce based upon a Florida marriage. The defendant "husband" moved for inter alia the dismissal of the action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, claiming that the marriage in Florida was not valid absent there being a valid marriage license issued from there permitting it to be solemnized. Indeed, Florida law does not recognize the validity marriages without a license, whereas in New York marriages are valid without a license so long as they are solemnized. The defendant's dismissal motion was referred to a court attorney referee (Szochet, Ct. Att. Ref.) to determine the matter. After a fact-finding hearing, the referee determined that the Florida marriage was not valid under Florida law as it was performed without a license from that state. The plaintiff's alternative argument, that the parties' marriage was validly solemnized by a rabbi in New York under a procedure in the Jewish faith known as a ketubah, was likewise found by the referee to be invalid as the rabbi who purportedly executed the ketubah denied actually solemnizing the marriage. Absent a valid marriage for the court's subject matter jurisdiction, the plaintiff's divorce action was dismissed, and the dismissal was affirmed on appeal.

Matrimonial actions are not the only subject area where there has been recent activity in the case law on subject matter jurisdiction. In 2019, New York changed its statute of limitations for cases that may be brought by victims of various forms of sexual abuse. CPLR 208 was amended to provide, in new subparagraph (b), that for minors victimized by certain sex offenses defined by the Penal Law, actions may be commenced for damages from physical, psychological, or other injuries or conditions during a defined two and one half revival period, for victim plaintiffs that have not reached the age of 55 (CPLR 214-g). Naturally, actions have been commenced against various defendants for damages arising from alleged sexual abuse incidents dating back many years, even many decades. In actions brought against state agencies in the Court of Claims, where Court of Claims Act 11(b) requires the claimant to allege particular details as a condition to the waiver of sovereign immunity including, inter alia, "the time when" the claim arose (Kolnacki v State, 8 N.Y.3d 277, 832 N.Y.S.2d 481, 864 N.E.2d 611 [2007]), claimants are not necessarily in a position so many years after the fact to accurately specify exact dates when the alleged sexual abuse occurred. The Crime Victims Act (CVA), of which CPLR 208 is a part, creates a tension between the inability of some claimants to specify abuse dates versus the subject matter jurisdictional requirement that specificity be provided. As a general matter, a claimant's failure in the Court of Claims to particularize a claim, as to prevent the state from investigating it and ascertaining the existence and extent of liability, may result in the dismissal of the action (D.G. v State of New York, 214 A.D.3d 713, 185 N.Y.S.3d 245 [2nd Dep't. 2023]). However, courts have recognized under the new CVA some flexibility reflecting the reality that certain claimants may be unable to specify dates of abuse, and whose actions should not necessarily be dismissed as a result. Courts have held that as to the dates of alleged abuse under the CVA, absolute exactitude is not required so long as the particulars of the claim are sufficiently detailed to enable the state to conduct an investigation of the claim (e.g. Wagner v State of New York, 214 A.D.3d 930, 187 N.Y.S.3d 61 [2nd Dep't. 2023]; Meyer v State of New York, 213 A.D.3d 753, 183 N.Y.S.3d 521 [2nd Dep't. 2023]). The theory of these cases, which is sound, is that if the claimant provides a general time frame, a place, perhaps name of a perpetrator, the overall quantum of detail is sufficient to permit the investigation contemplated by Court of Claims Act 11(b), and such actions should not be dismissed for the absence of subject matter jurisdiction.

C3211:14 "Other Action Pending"

CPLR 3211(a)(4), which permits the dismissal of an action because there is a prior action pending between the same parties for the same dispute, received some exercise in Quinones v Z & B Trucking Inc., __ A.D.3d __, 196 N.Y.S.3d 162 (Mem.) (2nd Dep't. 2023). The two related actions at issue were for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff as a result of a two-vehicle automobile accident. Action #1 was commenced by the filing of initiatory papers in 2019 but process was never served upon the defendants who owned and operated one of the vehicles. Action #2 was e-filed by the same plaintiff against the same defendants in 2021 for the same underlying occurrence, but on this occasion process was effected upon the defendants. The two actions were assigned to different justices in Queens County. The defendants moved to dismiss the second action under CPLR 3211(a)(4) arguing that there was a prior action from 2019 that was pending. At the same general time, the defendants served a motion to dismiss the first of the two actions on the ground that service of process had not been accomplished within the 120-day timeframe required by CPLR 306-b. The practicing bar might view these facts as potentially inequitable if both actions were to be dismissed and the plaintiff left without any pending case. Yet, because the two actions were assigned to two different judges, the dismissal of both actions is what happened--the first action was dismissed on September 14, 2021 for the failure to serve process, and the second action was dismissed three days later on the ground of prior action pending. Of course, RJI forms are supposed to identify the relatedness of actions so these types of inconsistencies can be avoided. One day before the dismissal of the second action, the plaintiff provided the court with a copy of the order dismissing the first action, which the court acknowledged receiving, but which was not later listed in the order of dismissal as among the papers considered. The plaintiff's motion to renew and reargue the dismissal of the second action was denied, and the denial of reargument is of course not appealable (though the denial of renewal is subject to appeal). Appeals were taken inter alia from both the order dismissing the second action for prior action pending, and the order denying its renewal on the ground that the earlier dismissal of the first action negated the existence of any prior action pending. The Second Department held that it was error for the court in the second action to find that there was a prior action pending, as the absence of any service of process in that matter meant that no prior action was actually "pending." That determination rendered academic any error that arguably existed by the court's denial of renewal. Had renewal been reached on appeal, it is likely and predictable that the Appellate Division would have reversed, as the first action had clearly been dismissed by court order prior to the dismissal of the second action for prior action pending, so that on that additional basis, there was no longer any pending prior action.

C3211:18 Affirmative Defenses Available on Subdivision (a)(5) Motion

Statute of Limitations

Governor Andrew Cuomo issued a series of Executive Orders that affected court deadlines as a means of dealing with the covid-19 virus and the disruptions and shutdowns related to it. The governor's authority to do so derived from Executive Law 29-a(1) and (2) in dealing with disaster emergencies. Executive Law 29-a(1) permits a governor by executive order to temporarily suspend specific provisions of statutes, local laws, or ordinances, or the rules or regulations of state agencies, during disaster emergencies. Executive Law 29-a(2)(d) permits the governor in such instances to alter or modify the requirements of statutes, local laws, ordinances, rules or regulations. Under that authority, the governor issued on March 20, 2020 Executive Order ("EO") 202.8 (9 NYCRR 8.202.8) directing that any time limit for the commencement, filing, or service of any legal action, notice, motion, or other process or proceeding, be tolled until April 19, 2020. Nine additional Executive Orders were issued extending the deadline extensions ultimately to November 3, 2020, a total of 228 days (EO Nos. 202.14, 202.28, 202.38, 202.48, 202.55, 202.55.1, 202.60, 202.67, 202.72, found at 9 NYCRR 8.202.14, 9 NYCRR 8.202.28, 9 NYCRR 8.202.38, 9 NYCRR 8.202.48, 9 NYCRR 8.202.55, 9 NYCRR 8.202.55.1, 9 NYCRR 8.202.60, 9 NYCRR 8.202.67, and 9 NYCRR 8.202.72). Without doubt, the Executive Orders extended, among other things, statutes of limitations.

A question naturally arose as to whether these covid-related time extensions represented a "suspension" or a "toll" of the statute of limitations. There is a difference in the nomenclature that could have a practical effect upon the timeliness of actions. A "suspension" of a statute of limitations merely extends the limitations period to the end-date of the suspension, so that limitations periods expiring in the interim do not expire during that defined time. With a suspension, a statute of limitations expiring on a date after the suspension is lifted is unaffected, meaning that the plaintiff must commence an anticipated action or proceeding within the standard limitations period. By contrast, a "toll" stops the statute of limitations clock from ticking for so long as the toll is in effect. When the toll period ceases, the amount of the tolled time is added to the end of the standard limitations period, thereby expanding the time for timely commencing an action or proceeding to a date beyond the original end-date of the statute of limitations. Tolls may therefore more helpful and generous to plaintiffs than suspensions. Executive Law 29-a(1) clearly provides the governor with authority to temporarily "suspend" statutory provisions. Yet, the Executive Orders issued by Governor Cuomo expressly used the language of a "toll."

The Appellate Division in the Second Department squarely addressed the question of whether the covid-related Executive Orders at issue operated as suspensions or tolls to the statutes of limitations. It held in Brash v Richards, 195 A.D.3d 582, 149 N.Y.S.3d 560 (2nd Dep't. 2021) that the Executive Orders were tolls. The court acknowledged that the governor only has authority to toll statutory deadlines where the underlying authority of the Executive Law permits it. It found the tolling authority to exist by virtue of the language of Executive Law 29-a(2)(d), which confers upon the governor the authority to "provide for the alteration or modification of the requirements of such statute, local law, ordinance, order, rule or regulation suspended, and may include other terms and conditions (emphasis added)." The operative words for the Appellate Division were "alteration" and "modification," broad enough to envision the tolling of limitations periods (Brash v Richards, 195 A.D.3d at 585). The same reasoning has since been adopted by other judicial departments (Murphy v Harris, 210 A.D.3d 410, 411, 177 N.Y.S.3d 559 [1st Dep't. 2022]; Roach v Cornell University, 207 A.D.3d 931, 933, 172 N.Y.S.3d 215 [3rd Dep't. 2022]).

The covid tolls will be mathematically applied just like any lawful toll such as those for a defendant's absence from the state (CPLR 207), infancy (CPLR 208), insanity (CPLR 208), war (CPLR 209), the death of a party (CPLR 210), military service (Military Law 308), and bankruptcy (11 U.S.C. 362[a]). By logical extension, arguably, all causes of action that accrued in New York prior to Governor Cuomo's initial Executive Order on March 20, 2020 may be filed months or years into the future, enjoying a 228-day toll to their limitations deadlines depending on the applicable math.

The courts are beginning to see the effects of the covid tolls in litigations where the toll has enabled facially untimely actions to be timely, and thereby enable plaintiffs to survive CPLR 3211(a)(5) dismissal motions. But the arithmetic must actually work for the plaintiff to avoid such dismissals. In Lastella v St. Joseph's Hospital, 219 A.D.3d 1421, 196 N.Y.S.3d 162 [2nd Dep't. 2023], an administrator's action for medical malpractice and wrongful death was dismissed based on the last date the decedent was a patient at the defendant hospital as to the medical malpractice, and the date that the decedent died as to the wrongful death. The respective statutes of limitations had expired as to both causes of action by the time of the action's commencement-two and a half years for the alleged medical malpractice (CPLR 214-a) and two years for the alleged wrongful death (EPTL 5-4.1). The plaintiff argued that Governor Cuomo's 228-day covid tolls were excludable from the computations. However, even excluding those days, both causes of action were still untimely in the relation to the date the action was commenced, requiring that the entire action be dismissed for untimeliness (Lastella v St. Joseph's Hospital, 219 A.D.3d at 1421).

The Statute of Limitations and Standing

The plaintiff's lack of standing is a basis for the dismissal of a complaint under CPLR 3211(a)(5). The Foreclosure Abuse Prevention Act (L.2022 ch. 821) known in shorthand as FAPA, which was signed into law by Governor Hochul on December 30, 2022, affects limitations-related and standing-related dismissal motions under CPLR 3211(a)(5).

The FAPA legislation contains a number of inter-related homeowner-friendly provisions. Prior to the enactment of FAPA, if a residential mortgage foreclosure action was commenced with an acceleration of the balance due on the unpaid note, the action could be discontinued under CPLR 3217 and, according to the Court of Appeals, the discontinuance had the automatic effect of rescinding the debt acceleration. The lender could then commence a second action at a later date within the six-year statute of limitations measured from the discontinuance of the earlier action (CPLR 213[4]), and with a new acceleration of the outstanding debt on the note (Freedom Mortgage Corporation v Engel, 37 N.Y.3d 1, 146 N.Y.S.3d 542, 169 N.E.2d 912 [2021]; Bank of New York Mellon v Shurko, 209 A.D.3d 951, 177 N.Y.S.3d 593 [2nd Dep't. 2022]). Further, a later action could be commenced after six years from the discontinuance of the earlier one, along with a debt acceleration, so long as the plaintiff in that earlier action lacked standing to commence it and accelerate the debt (Hawthorne v New Century Mortgage Corp., 207 A.D.3d 528, 169 N.Y.S.3d 814 [2nd Dep't. 2022] [action under RPAPL 1504(1)]; Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v Rutty, 206 A.D.3d 862, 171 N.Y.S.3d 117 [2nd Dep't. 2022]). In those second actions, the lender argued the seemingly-counterintuitive position that the plaintiff-lender in the earlier action lacked standing which, if proven, rendered the debt acceleration in that earlier action null and void. The only limitation upon the lender in the later action was that missed payments toward the note could only be sought for the six-year limitations period preceding the commencement of the later action, plus the accelerated note balance. The accelerated note balance is usually the prayer for relief that represents the big money of these actions, and is typically more important than the value of missed monthly payments. But FAPA changed the dynamic.

FAPA amended CPLR 213 to add two new subdivisions denominated in the statute as subdivisions (4)(a) and (4)(b), which changes much of the foregoing. Under CPLR 213(4)(a), as amended, the lender in a second action is estopped from claiming that the plaintiff-lender in an earlier action against the mortgagor lacked standing to commence the action and accelerate the loan (MTGLQ Investors, L.P. v Singh, 216 A.D.3d 1087, 190 N.Y.S.3d 415 [2nd Dep't. 2023]). As a result, even if the plaintiff in the first action can be shown to have lacked standing, it does not matter as the plaintiff-lender in the second action, with standing, is statutorily barred from claiming that there had been an unenforceable earlier acceleration. CPLR 213(4)(a) contains one important exception: If the earlier mortgage foreclosure action was dismissed by the court for the lack of standing, then the plaintiff-lender in the second action may argue the invalidity of the initial acceleration, as to allow the acceleration in the later action. The court's dismissal of an earlier action for the lack of standing could be by an order granting dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(5) or by summary judgment under CPLR 3212. But absent a judicial dismissal for lack of standing in the earlier action, the estoppel imposed against the lender by CPLR 213(4)(a) controls (SYCP, LLC v Evans, 217 A.D.3d 707, 191 N.Y.S.3d 433 [2nd Dep't. 2023]; Bank of N.Y. Mellon v Stewart, 216 A.D.3d 720, 190 N.Y.S.3d 80 [2nd Dep't. 2023]; GMAT Legal Title Trust 2014-1 v Kator, 213 A.D.3d 915, 184 N.Y.S.3d 805 [2nd Dep't. 2023]).

Under CPLR 213(4)(b), as amended, the same concept, described above, is applied to actions under RPAPL 1504(1) seeking to cancel and discharge mortgages.

What we are left with, insofar as standing is concerned, is the greater ability for homeowner defendants in the later of multiple actions to move to dismiss those actions for untimeliness under CPLR 3211(a)(5).

The provision of FAPA that restricts parties' rights to challenge standing in a prior related action, in order to seek recovery on a re-accelerated debt in a later action, is limited to residential mortgage foreclosure actions subject to CPLR 213(4). Other actions to collect upon defaulted notes are unaffected by the FAPA legislation, and as to those, the Court of Appeals decision in Freedom Mortgage Corporation v Engel, discussed above, remains good law.

The reader is referred to this year's Supplemental Practice Commentary C3217:5, which discusses the FAPA amendment to CPLR 3217 and its effect on discontinuances and the statute of limitations in residential mortgage foreclosure actions.

Statute of Limitations and CPLR 214-a

The state legislature enacted "Lavern's Law," which amended CPLR 214-a effective on January 18, 2018 (L.2018 ch. 1 sec. 6). The amendment added a discovery toll to the statute of limitations for medical malpractice claims arising out of a defendant's failure to diagnose cancer or a malignant tumor. The statute of limitations remained the same--two and a half years-but it did not begin to run until when the plaintiff knew or should have known that the defendant's alleged act or omission caused injury, subject to a seven-year cap measured from the alleged negligent act or omission. However, the revival period of the statutory amendment also was limited by its terms to medical malpractice claims that arose within two and a half years prior to its January 18, 2018 effective date, and not before. In Ford v Lee, 203 A.D.3d 456, 164 N.Y.S.3d 592 (1st Dep't. 2022), the defendant moved to dismiss the plaintiff's complaint for an alleged failure to diagnose cancer as the cause of action had accrued on May 16, 2014, earlier in time than the revival period defined by the statute. The First Department agreed, and the plaintiff's dismissal motion, which had been denied by the Supreme Court, was granted on appeal.

Statute of Limitations and the Crime Victims Act

The Crime Victims Act (CVA) embodied by CPLR 214-g, originally effective February 14, 2019, revived otherwise time-barred claims by plaintiffs who were victimized as minors by certain defined acts of sexual offenses committed by defendants. It must be read in conjunction with the CVA-related tolling provisions for infancy as set forth in CPLR 208(b), as also amended in 2019. The CVA is primarily a civil remedy, not a criminal one. It allows for the filing of formerly time-barred actions by individuals who were under the age of 18 at the time of certain sex offenses, for a two and a half revival period measured from the effective date of the statute, so long as the plaintiff is not 55 years old or older at the time of commencement. CPLR 208(b) otherwise extends the civil statute of limitations for actions arising from underage sex offenses to victims' 55th birthdays. CPLR 214-g was further amended effective August 30, 2020. The CVA was challenged on due process grounds. The statute was found to not violate due process, and on that basis, the denial of the defendant's motion to dismiss for a violation of the statute of limitations was affirmed on appeal (Schearer v Fitzgerald, 217 A.D.3d 980, 192 N.Y.S.3d 207 [2nd Dep't. June 28, 2023]). Case not dismissed.

The CVA has also been challenged on constitutional grounds, both on its face and as applied to particular defendants. The Third Department rejected the dismissal of an action on those constitutional challenges in Matarazzo v Charlee Family Care, Inc., 218 A.D.3d 941, 192 N.Y.S.3d 755 (3rd Dep't. 2023).

Statute of Limitations and Bankruptcy

A bankruptcy proceeding stays the running of the statute of limitations on an accrued claim that may potentially be asserted against the bankrupt party. In Deutsche Bank National Trust Company v Lubonty, 208 A.D.3d 142, 171 N.Y.S.3d 556 (2nd Dep't. 2022), the defendant moved for a CPLR 3211 dismissal of the second of two residential mortgage foreclosure actions on the ground of untimeliness. The defendant argued that the second action was commenced more than six years from the discontinuance by the plaintiff of the first action and was therefore untimely under CPLR 213(4). While the defendant was correct on that math, he was not correct on the law. The defendant had been under the protection of a bankruptcy court for part of the time between the two cases, which operated as a toll of the statute of limitations under 11 U.S.C. 362(a) and CPLR 204(a). The toll stayed and extended the time for commencing the plaintiff's second action long enough that the action, though commenced more than six calendar years from the discontinuance of the first action, was nevertheless timely (Deutsche Bank National Trust Company v Lubonty, 208 A.D.3d at 150). Case not dismissed.

Infancy

Plaintiffs in a two-vehicle automobile accident commenced an action for damages. One plaintiff was an infant who sued in her own name rather than through a parent or guardian, and the second plaintiff was the infant's mother. The defendants moved to dismiss the action of the daughter based on the infancy defense of CPLR 3211(a)(5). The plaintiffs cross-moved under CPLR 3025(b) for leave to amend their complaint to name the infant's mother as the plaintiff on behalf of her daughter. The Supreme Court, Bronx County, granted the dismissal motion and denied the cross-motion. The First Department reversed, finding that the court should have exercised its discretion to deny dismissal in favor of granting the plaintiff-mother's cross-motion to correct the problem (Veloz v Jiddou, 212 A.D.3d 549, 182 N.Y.S.3d 85 [1st Dep't. 2023]). The case could have alternatively been viewed as one involving the infant's lack of capacity to act as the plaintiff in the action under CPLR 3211(a)(3), though that was apparently not a defense raised by the parties or discussed in the reported decision. In any event, the failure of the initial complaint to name a proper party plaintiff was rectified. Case not dismissed.

Release

Sjogren v Board of Trustees of Dutchess Community Coll., 216 A.D.3d 836, 189 N.Y.S.3d 237 (2nd Dep't. 2023) involved a student at a college that mandated certain gym activities. The plaintiff had some physical limitations, but she signed a release discharging the defendant college "from all liability for any claim of injury" to the student's person, whether harm was "caused by the negligence of the releasees or otherwise." The release further provided that it was "intended to be broad and inclusive in keeping with state laws." The plaintiff claimed that she was injured during one of her mandated gym activities and commenced an action against the defendant college for damages. The defendant of course moved to dismiss the action under CPLR 3211(a)(5) based on the language of the release. The Second Department noted that a release constitutes a complete bar to an action on a claim which is the subject of the release. Releases are interpreted under the principles of contract law. The Second Department held that the sweeping language of the release at issue here evinced an intention of the parties that it be all-encompassing. The release included language that the plaintiff was aware of and agreed to any risks associated with her gym activities (Sjogren v Board of Trustees of Dutchess Community Coll., 216 A.D.3d at 239). Case dismissed.

A similar result was reached in the Fourth Department involving the operator of a snowmobile who was involved in an accident. The plaintiff had signed a broad general release, clearly and unambiguously releasing the defendant from any claims for bodily injury of any kind. The Fourth Department found it enforceable, and on that basis, dismissed the plaintiff's complaint on appeal (Putnam v Kibler, 210 A.D.3d 1458, 178 N.Y.S.3d 851 [4th Dep't. 2022]).

Statute of Frauds

These Practice Commentaries have monitored developing case law addressing when and whether e-mail and other material obtained from social media may qualify as "documentary evidence" for the dismissal of an action under CPLR 3211(a)(1) (CPLR Practice Commentaries and Supplemental Practice Commentaries C3211:10). Distilled to its essence, e-mails may qualify as documentary evidence under CPLR 3211 when they are essentially unambiguous, undeniable and authentic, and for a dismissal motion to be granted upon them, conclusive.

Similar issues have arisen in the context of dismissal motions arguing non-compliance with the statute of frauds under CPLR 3211(a)(5). E-mails were found to be insufficient to establish a party's compliance with the statute of frauds where they were not subscribed in an electronic signature block by the party to be charged as to form a binding contract (Preston v Nichols, 216 A.D.3d 1398, 189 N.Y.S.3d 837 [4th Dep't. May 5, 2023] [texts and e-mails]).

Practitioners are referred to an analytical decision and order of Supreme Court Justice Aaron D. Maslow, which surveys appellate cases that address when e-mail has been, and has not been, admissible in determining motions under CPLR 3211(a)(1) (590 Myrtle LLC v Silverman-Shaw Inc., 78 Misc.3d 1218[A], 185 N.Y.S.3d 655 [Sup. Ct. Kings Co. 2023] [portions of the motions were converted to summary judgment per CPLR 3211[c]). In 590 Myrtle Avenue, e-mail exchanges between counsel during negotiation of a $9.5 million real estate transaction were found to be admissible on the ground that they were unambiguous, authentic, and undeniable (590 Myrtle LLC v Silverman-Shaw Inc., 78 Misc.3d at 1218[A] *8). Indeed, the authenticity of the e-mails were not in question by the parties to the CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion which, it seems, makes it much easier for a court to find that prong of admissibility to be met. In the end, the court determined that the merits of the proffered e-mails established inter alia a lack of a meeting of the minds for there to be an enforceable contract between the parties.

C3211:21 Failure to State a Cause a Cause of Action, Generally

CPLR 3211(a)(7) allows for the dismissal of complaints that fail to state a cause of action on which the relief sought can be granted. The term "cause of action" has no discrete definition in the general definitional section of CPLR 105. It is readily understood as relating to allegations of fact and the invocation of law providing grounds for some form of monetary or equitable relief from another party. Causes of action do not lie for procedural devices that are merely collateral to them such as joinder, consolidation, and severance, and should not be styled as such. Relief collateral to causes of action may instead be pursued by means of a separate application to the court, brought under its own enabling statute.

The same concept is true of claims for punitive damages. Punitive damages are not a cognizable free-standing cause of action in New York and should not be pleaded as such (Rocanova v Equitable Life Assur. Socy. of U.S., 83 N.Y.603, 616, 612 N.Y.S.2d 339, 634 N.E.2d 940 [1997]). Punitive damages are instead a prayer for relief to be set forth in an ad damnum clause, which relate back to the stated causes of action from which damage awards are derived (Trigo v Miller, 60 Misc.3d 456, 75 N.Y.S.3d 847 [Sup. Ct. Nassau Co. 2018]).

C3211:28 Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

Service of Process

CPLR 308(2) and (4) require the filing of affidavits of service. Affidavits of service are likewise important in helping establish the proper service of process when other forms of service are used as well. Attorneys should be diligent in overseeing the work of process servers not just in connection with the timing and methods of service, but also, the accuracy of the affidavits of service prepared after the fact. The failure of a party to produce accurate affidavits of service can be fatal to the service itself, particularly when the timing or method is challenged by the defendant. An example is seen in HSBC Bank, National Association v Rini, 202 A.D.3d 945, 162 N.Y.S.3d 471 (2nd Dep't. 2023). In Rini, the defendant moved to dismiss the plaintiff's complaint for the alleged improper "suitable age and discretion" process under CPLR 308(2). The defendant produced in support of the motion the process server's affidavit which reflected an execution of the affidavit one day prior to the necessary mailing of a copy of the summons and complaint. In response to the motion, the plaintiff filed two amended affidavits of service, the first confirming the mailing date of the summons and complaint, and the second changing that date to three days earlier. The Supreme Court deemed the second amended affidavit as correcting the confusion on dates and denied the defendant's motion to dismiss. The Second Department reversed on the ground that the process server's inconsistent and competing affidavits raised credibility issues which required a Traverse hearing to determine the validity of the service of process. The court noted that while affidavits of service may be corrected under CPLR 305(c) in the exercise of judicial discretion where a substantial right of a party is not prejudiced, the alleged erroneous mailing date reflected by the first and second affidavits of service affected a substantial right of the defendant to proper CPLR notice of the action. Of course, the problem faced by the plaintiff could have been avoided if counsel had more carefully checked the content of the original affidavit of service against the calendar incongruity apparent on its face.

General Jurisdiction

Courts continue to address issues of general jurisdiction in light of the U.S. Supreme Court's groundbreaking opinion in Daimler AG v Bauman, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S.Ct. 746, 187 L.Ed.2d 624 (2014) Opinion by Ginsburg, J.). As readers of these Practice Commentaries know, the U.S. Supreme Court clarified in Daimler that for general jurisdiction to attach against a corporate party, the entity must be "at home" in the state, meaning that it 1) be incorporated within the state, or 2) maintain its principle office within the state, or 3) qualify as a "truly exceptional case" where the entity's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home within the state. In New York, general jurisdiction is recognized by CPLR 301.

The first two prongs for general jurisdiction defined by Daimler are objective and straight-forward, easily determined by reference to public documentation. Every corporation will have a publicly-filed document identifying its state of incorporation and principal office address. The third potential prong for general jurisdiction is more amorphous as it depends upon arguable factors that will vary from case to case, such as operations being "so substantial" within a state or being of "such nature." A number of recent reported cases have found the circumstances to not qualify as "truly exceptional" under Daimler. These include, as examples, Machado v Hershey Entertainment and Resorts Company, 2023 WL 1967531 (E.D.N.Y. 2023) (not exceptional where defendant engages in inter alia extensive television and internet advertising in New York and solicitation of business) and Starostenko v UBS AG (A Swiss Bank), 2023 WL 34947 (S.D.N.Y. 2023) (not exceptional where defendant is one of the largest broker-dealers in the world with subsidiaries in New York).

The Machado and Starostenko cases, and other reported jurisdiction-related cases that may be found on Westlaw across the country, discuss one case from 1952 which is held out an example of where exceptional circumstances may exist for the assertion of general jurisdiction--Perkins v Benquet Consol. Min. Co., 342 U.S. 437, 72, S.Ct. 413, 96 L.Ed. 485 (1952). Perkins involved a defendant corporation that shut down the entirety of its mining operations in the Philippines because of World War II and relocated its operations to Ohio. The U.S. Supreme Court held in Perkins that the defendant was amenable to the general jurisdiction of Ohio because Ohio had become its principal, albeit perhaps temporary, place of business. The definition of a "truly exceptional case" for general jurisdiction is nosebleed high.

Of note from our state court where truly exceptional circumstances were analyzed for the possible assertion of general jurisdiction is Jiang v Z & D Tour, Inc., 75 Misc.3d 583, 169 N.Y.S.3d 460 (Sup. Ct. Richmond Co. 2022). The plaintiff was injured on a passenger bus operated by the defendant during a roll-over accident while the bus was travelling in Pennsylvania. The defendant, J & D Tour, Inc. (Z & D), was a New Jersey corporation whose buses traveled to many locations throughout the country. Although Z & D was not incorporated in New York and did not maintain its principal office here, it maintained a brick-and-mortar office in New York for the sale of tickets, its buses stopped in front of its office to take on and discharge passengers, the defendant's name appeared on a bus stop sign posted in New York, and the defendant had applied to the New York City Department of Transportation and lobbied the local community board for permission to post its signage. The Court held that those circumstances failed to qualify as truly exceptional under Daimler. The Supreme Court's analysis in Jiang appears to be correct, as the factors that the plaintiff relied upon for arguing in favor of general jurisdiction were simply run-of-the-mill endeavors by an out-of-state entity to transact business in New York, and were limited in and of themselves. The Supreme Court held in Jiang that the defendant was amendable to the specific longarm jurisdiction of New York under CPLR 302(a)(1), from its transaction of business in New York and the relatedness of its transaction to the plaintiff's claim (Jiang v Z & D Tours, Inc., 75 Misc.3d at 590). Jiang underscores that even where general jurisdiction is lacking against a defendant under CPLR 301, that same defendant may be amenable to longarm jurisdiction under at least one of the statutory bases set forth in CPLR 302(a).

On June 27, 2023, the U.S. Supreme Court released its 5-4 decision in the case of Mallory v Norfolk Southern Railway Co., 600 U.S. 122, 143 S.Ct. 2028, 216 L.Ed.2d 815 (2023). The majority opinion was written by Justice Gorsuch and the dissent by Justice Barrett. It is yet another significant development in the evolving law on the assertion of general jurisdiction. It is the latest of four major developments on the subject of general jurisdiction.

The first of four major developments was the U.S. Supreme Court's 2014 decision in Daimler AG v Bauman, supra. As already noted, in Daimler, the Supreme Court clarified that states may assert general jurisdiction (as distinguished from specific jurisdiction) over an out-of-state corporation only when the entity is "at home" in the forum state. The court identified three circumstances when a corporation is "at home" in a state--the first being the corporation's state of incorporation, the second being the state where the corporation maintains its principal office, and the third being the "truly exceptional case" where the entity's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home in the state. Daimler was a restrictive interpretation of federal due process in this area.

The second major development on general jurisdiction, at least in New York State, was the question of whether a corporation's registration to do business within the state confers general jurisdiction over the entity. The issue worked its way through the state courts and came to a head in a 5-2 opinion of the Court of Appeals in Aybar v Aybar, 37 N.Y.3d 274, 156 N.Y.S.3d 104, 177 N.E.3d 1257 (2021). Aybar held that a corporation's registration to do business in New York did not confer the state's general jurisdiction over the out-of-state entity, as it instead merely provided for the corporation's consent to service of process within the state. Service of process upon the corporation, by whatever means, still requires an underlying basis for New York's jurisdiction, and corporate registration in New York did not, in and of itself, establish general jurisdiction. Notably, Aybar was decided based upon New York's due process precedents and was not reliant upon Daimler. Plaintiffs seeking to commence actions against foreign corporations, without the availability of general jurisdiction, need under Aybar to look to a specific jurisdictional basis under New York's longarm statute (CPLR 302), which in some instances is trickier.

A third recent development has been the New York legislature's response to Aybar. The legislature did not like the holding, not one bit. Both houses of the state legislature passed a bill to legislatively nullify Aybar (A7769, S7253) by creating proposed CPLR 301-a and amending BCL 1301(e). The amendments provide that a foreign corporation's registration to do business in New York will constitute the corporation's consent the general jurisdiction of New York's courts, absent a withdrawal by the corporation of its registration. That legislation, however, was vetoed by Governor Hochul on December 31, 2021 on the ground that in her view, the proposed legislation would deter foreign corporations from coming to New York to do business. The state legislature was not deterred by the veto. In 2023, both houses of the legislature passed a bill once again to enact a new statute denominated as CPLR 301-a and by amending BCL 1301(e) (A7351, S7476), to provide that a foreign corporation's registration to do business in New York confers New York's general jurisdiction over the entity. Like its proposed legislative predecessor, the corporation could avoid general jurisdiction by withdrawing its New York registration. As of this writing in the summer of 2023, the amendatory bill has not yet been submitted to Governor Hochul for signature. The fate of the bill should be known by the time this Supplemental Practice Commentary is distributed in hard copy at approximately the New Year.

The fourth major development on general jurisdiction is the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Mallory v Norfolk Southern Railway Co., supra. The plaintiff in Mallory brought a cancer-related personal injury action against the defendant, Norfolk Southern Railway Co. (Norfolk Southern) in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. The plaintiff resided in Virginia at the time the action was commenced. His exposure to carcinogens while in the former employ of Norfolk Southern was in both Virginia and Ohio. Norfolk Southern's state of incorporation and principal office were in Virginia. The corporation's only jural connection to Pennsylvania was its registration there to do business. And business it did--maintaining within the commonwealth 5,000 Pennsylvanian employees, 2,400 miles of Pennsylvania rail, eleven rail yards there, the largest locomotive shop in North America, and other Pennsylvanian activities (Mallory v Norfolk Southern Railway Co., at *10). Pennsylvania is a "compulsory consent" state, meaning that any entity wishing to do business in the state is required to register there and required by that registration to consent to the general jurisdiction of the state (15 Pa. Cons. Stat. Ann. 411[a], 5301[a][2][i]). Naturally, considerations of due process are implicated.

In Mallory, the five-justice majority at the U.S. Supreme Court (Gorsuch, J.) upheld the assertion of general jurisdiction on the basis of the railway's consent to it, whether compulsory or otherwise. In doing so, the majority relied primarily on precedent which the court found to be squarely on point both factually and legally, the case of Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co. of Philadelphia v Gold Issue Min. & Mill. Co., 243 U.S. 93, 37 S.Ct. 344, 61 L.Ed. 610 (1917) (Holmes, J.). The Gorsuch majority was unwilling to ignore the court's own century-old precedent. The four-justice dissent (Barrett, J.) disagreed, concluding that the Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co. case from 1917 was implicitly overruled by the Supreme Court's due process analysis in International Shoe Co. v State of Wash., Office of Unemployment Compensation and Placement, 326 U.S. 310, 66 S.Ct. 154, 90 L.Ed. 95 (1945), and by Daimler's more recent pronouncement in 2014 that general jurisdiction may only be asserted when a corporation is "at home" in the state by its incorporation there, its principal office there, or in the "truly exceptional case" (Mallory v Norfolk Southern Railway Co., at *26). The dissent concluded that since Norfolk Southern did not meet the Daimler tests for the assertion of general jurisdiction by Pennsylvania, general jurisdiction was lacking. Both the majority and the dissent made creditable points.

In his concurrence with the majority in Mallory, Justice Alito made an observation that is potentially significant. He questioned whether the assertion of general jurisdiction through a compulsory consent statute is constitutional under the commerce clause. He stated there was a "good prospect" that Pennsylvania's compulsory consent statute places an undue burden on interstate commerce by requiring corporations to defend themselves in the commonwealth in potentially all of its transactions, whether those transactions are related to Pennsylvania or not. He expressed a concern that businesses might elect to avoid entering new markets as a means of insulating themselves from remote litigations. Justice Alito also noted that the commerce clause, though raised in the parties' papers in the state court proceedings, was not addressed by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court and was therefore not before the U.S. Supreme Court to consider on the merits. But he invited Norfolk Southern to raise the issue upon Mallory's remand to the Pennsylvania court (Mallory v Norfolk Southern Railway Co., at *14).

Some observations flow from Mallory that impacts us in New York:

Justice Gorsuch was not on the U.S. Supreme Court in 2014 when the Daimler case was decided, so he had a free hand to write the majority opinion in Mallory without particular constraint. Mallory's finding of general jurisdiction based on compulsory consent provides an end-run around Daimler for any state that has, or enacts, a sufficient compulsory consent statute. The *Daimler*r Bastille has been partially stormed. However, of equal importance is what the compulsory consent statute must actually say to qualify under Mallory for general jurisdiction.

Justice Alito's concurrence in Mallory that compulsory consent statutes may violate the commerce clause of the constitution is a red flare fired into the sky that will affect the focus of our still-evolving re-definition of general jurisdiction. The legal battlefield will now shift to the commerce clause. The true constitutional limitations to general jurisdiction shall continue to be litigation fodder for a handful of additional years.

The Pennsylvania statute at issue in Mallory requires certain paperwork guarantees, and the corporate entity must continuously maintain a registration office as a condition of its certificate to do business and for accepting the benefits and burdens of its presence in that commonwealth. The recent proposed amendments to enact in New York CPLR 301-a and amend BCL 1301(e) (A7351, S7476) which have been passed by the state legislature but as of this writing not yet sent to Governor Hochul, do not mimic the level of compulsory conditions as seen in the Pennsylvania statute. Therefore, arguably, an open question will still fester as to whether the amendatory language, if signed into law, is "enough" under Mallory to assert general jurisdiction absent additional language to bring it more in line with Pennsylvania's statute. That may of course be an argument of the out-of-state corporations going forward, commerce clause aside. If, arguendo, the proposed legislative amendments to CPLR 301-a and BCL 1301(e) are signed into law by the governor, they will be subject to the same commerce clause challenge identified by Justice Alito in his Mallory concurrence. We in New York may still be debating and watching developments on general jurisdiction in year 2028 as Mallory does not quite settle the full array of issues, which is unsatisfying. Justice Barrett may be correct in her assessment that the states may now enact broad compulsory consent statutes full of language and conditions, which will have the effect over time of gutting the restrictiveness of Daimler. But if she is correct on that, so be it. Chips fall where they may. But it will all be subject to future courts' interpretations of whether it passes muster under the commerce clause.

Where does Mallory leave Aybar? Aybar was decided as a matter of state due process law and analysis, and it should therefore be unaffected by Mallory. The prediction here is that if Aybar ever goes away, if at all, it will be by means of New York State legislative nullification.

Mallory deserves one final observation. As already noted, Daimler recognized three separate bases for general jurisdiction for an entity to be "at home"--the state of incorporation, the state of the principal office, and the "truly exceptional case" where an entity's operations within a state are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home there. That third prong is deserving of further federal appellate definition and refinement, going forward. If Norfolk Southern's contacts with Pennsylvania in Mallory were so very extensive as described by Justice Gorsuch in his majority opinion (5,000 Pennsylvanian employees, 2,400 miles of Pennsylvanian rail, eleven rail yards, and the largest locomotive shop there in North America), then Mallory might have been a case for considering the third prong of Daimler had it been argued and addressed. But instead Mallory's sole focus was the different question of whether a compulsory consent statute permits the assertion of general jurisdiction. The majority and dissent seemed to talk past one another--Justice Barrett's dissent (along with three colleagues) hinged on Daimler, Daimler, Daimler, whereas Justice Gorsuch's reasoning focused almost exclusively on the Pennsylvania Fire case and only mentioned Daimler incidentally a couple of times during a discussion of International Shoe. The division behind their closed doors was probably palpable. The third prong of Daimler might have potentially brought the members of the court together for one side of the case or the other had that issue been part of the briefing, but the true and separate issue was compulsory consent where the divide occurred.

There is a bottom line that we can draw from Mallory: Beyond the three prongs of Daimler for general jurisdiction, there now appears to be a fourth, under Mallory, based on compulsory consent. Daimler + Mallory = All current available general jurisdiction grounds. General jurisdiction should be determined, under federal analyses, under what might now be called the Daimler-Mallory tests. If more states enact compulsory consent statutes for general jurisdiction, Mallory may overpower Daimler in the bigger future scheme. But again, word to the wise, it will all be subject to potential future developments involving the commerce clause.

C3211:42 Converting CPLR 3211 Motion Into One for Summary Judgment

A court may not properly advise the parties that it will treat a CPLR 3211 motion as one for summary judgment, and then do so, if summary judgment would itself be premature (Russo v Crisona, 219 A.D.3d 920, 195

N.Y.S.3d 729 [2nd Dep't. 2023] [summary judgment premature where discovery was required]).

C3211:69 Easier Standard for Dismissing "SLAPP" Suit

The SLAPP statute has generated some new activity in the courts, particularly as a consequence of the state legislature's amendment of CPLR 3211(g) which became effective on November 10, 2020. The CPLR amendment was made in conjunction with related amendments to Civil Rights Law 70-a and 76-a. CRL 70-a(1)(a), as amended, provides, inter alia, that costs and attorneys' fees "shall" be awarded to defendants who successfully obtain CPLR 3211(g) dismissals of SLAPP actions. CRL 70-a(1)(b) and (c) further provide for the discretionary award of compensatory and punitive damages upon plaintiffs who are shown to have commenced SLAPP actions for the purpose of harassing, intimidating, punishing, or maliciously inhibiting the free exercise of free speech, petition, or association rights. The amendments to CPLR 3211(g) directed that the court's determination of a defendant's dismissal motion under CPLR 3211 does not affect the burden of proof in the continuing action or in a subsequent action; that the making of a CPLR 3211 dismissal motion automatically stays discovery, hearings, or other motions absent the court specifically permitting limited discovery on targeted issues; and that the SLAPP provisions of CPLR 3211(g) apply to all forms of parties and pleadings (CPLR 3211[g][2], [3], [4]).

What of the 2020 amendments' retroactivity? Case law on the subject was split and evolving, ultimately leading to a decision by the state Court of Appeals that should put the issue to rest.

The Appellate Divisions in the First and Fourth Departments addressed the issue in both Gottwald v Sebert, 203 A.D.3d 488, 165 N.Y.S.3d 38 (1st Dep't. 2022) and Trinh v Nguyen, 211 A.D.3d 1623, 180 N.Y.S.3d 735 [4th Dep't. 2022]). In Gottwald, the First Department noted that the original SLAPP statute had been enacted almost thirty years before the amendments, and that the amendments were enacted to address shortfalls perceived in the statute's original language. The court noted the absence of any actual retroactivity language in the SLAPP amendments and therefore applied the well-worn presumption that the amendments were prospective only as measured from their effective date (Gottwald v Sebert, 203 A.D.3d at 488). Gottwald was followed by the First Department, though without much discussion, in Cisneros v Cook, 209 A.D.3d 519, 175 N.Y.S.3d 214 (Mem.) [1st Dep't. 2022) and Robbins v 315 West 103 Enterprises LLC, 204 A.D.3d 551, 164 N.Y.S.3d 823 [1st Dep't. 2022]).

Trinh, from the Fourth Department, was a case of alleged defamation and defamation per se that fell within the provisions of the SLAPP statute, and which was commenced prior to the 2020 amendments of the law. The interesting twist to Trinh was that the 2020 amendment to the cost and attorney fee provisions of CRL 70-a(1)(a) had become effective by the time the defendant's CPLR 3211(g) dismissal motion was made. The Supreme Court, Erie County, applied the cost and attorney fee provisions retroactively in favor of the successful moving defendant. But the Fourth Department held otherwise, noting that the 2020 statutory amendments contained no provision that its language was to be applied retroactively; that statutes are presumed to be prospective; and that as directly relevant here, a retroactive application of the amendments would impair the rights of the plaintiff in the form that existed when the action was initially filed, increase his liability for past conduct, and impose new duties with respect to transactions already completed (Trinh v Nguyen, 211 A.D.3d at 1624-25).

Readers of these Supplemental Practice Commentaries are warned that contrary decisions have been rendered from two federal district courts. Those courts determined that the 2020 SLAPP enactments were "remedial" based on certain material contained in the Bill Jacket for the amendments to CRL 70-a, and became effective immediately. Hence, said those courts, retroactive application best implemented the intent of the state legislature (Coleman v Grand, 523 F.Supp.3d 244, 258-59 [E.D.N.Y. 2021]; Palin v New York Times Company, 510 F.Supp.3d 21 [S.D.N.Y. 2020]). As of this writing, an appeal of Coleman is pending at the Second Circuit under Case Number 21-800, so the fate of Coleman's reasoning, at least in the federal context, is uncertain, though it should be affected by further analysis discussed below involving the state Court of Appeals. Respectfully, the Fourth Department was correct to note, contrary to the analyses of the judges in the Eastern and Southern Districts of New York, that the "remedial" nature of a statutory amendment, which is generally at play with many amendments, is not a basis, in and of itself, for ignoring the long-standing legal presumption that new enactments be prospective particularly where there is no expressed provision that a new law be given retroactive effect. All statutory amendments are, at some level, remedial. Had the state legislature intended for its amendments to CRL 70-a and related law to be retroactive to the pre-commencement date of an action's commencement, it could have said so without any need for the federal courts to read its mind.

Of course, guidance from the New York State Court of Appeals would be most welcome on the issue, particularly given the split of reasoning between the federal district courts on the one hand and the state appellate divisions on the other. But like manna from Heaven, the Gottwald case of the First Department, discussed above, was granted leave to the state Court of Appeals, and the Court of Appeals determined the issue of retroactivity in a decision rendered June 13, 2023 (Gottwald v Sebert, __ N.Y.3d __, 186 N.Y.S.3d 611, 207 N.E.3d 577 [2023]).

Much of the Court of Appeals' analysis in Gottwald involves whether the plaintiff was a public figure and whether the defendant enjoyed a privilege defense under the defamation law, which is not particularly relevant here. As to retroactivity, the majority opinion written by Judge Garcia concluded that the SLAPP amendments were prospective only. The specific amendment regarding costs and attorney's fees was made applicable to actions "commenced or continued without a substantial basis in fact and law and could not be supported by a substantial argument for the extension, modification or reversal of existing law," citing to CRL 70-a(1)(a), which is prospective language (Gottwald v Sebert, 2023 WL 3959051 *6 [emphasis added]). Therefore, there is no retroactivity to the cost and attorney's fees language for the period of time between an action's commencement and the effective date of the SLAPP amendments. But, said the court, the statutory amendment regarding costs and attorney's fees was also expressly made applicable to actions commenced "or continued" without a substantial basis fact or law. As a consequence, costs and attorney's fees shall be assessed in favor of successful counterclaiming defendants in SLAPP actions as computed from the effective date of the SLAPP amendments, forward. The bottom line, therefore, is that the issue of costs and attorney's fees straddle the November 10, 2020 effective date of the SLAPP amendments, as not being awardable in actions existing prior to that date but awardable for specific costs and attorney's fees incurred in any actions "continuing" from that effective date. Thus, according to the Court of Appeals, the First Department's view of retroactivity under Gottwald (and by extension the Fourth Department's view under Trinh) was partially correct and partially incorrect, based on the need to straddle the effective date of the SLAPP amendments.

Practitioners should draw two lessons from Gottwald v Sebert. The first is that plaintiffs seeking to "continue" actions beyond November 10, 2020 should soberly assess the merits of their claims and the strength, if at all, of the defendants' SLAPP counterclaims. An award of costs and attorney's fees on the counterclaim may be a consequence of any erroneous assessment of those merits, covering the post-amendment timeframe. The same is of course true for plaintiffs who may "commence" an action after SLAPP's 2020 amendments, where all costs and attorney's fees are fair game. Second, there should now be a turnaround in the federal courts on how they view the issue of retroactivity. The Court of Appeals decision in Gottwald v Sebert is a matter of substantive law which federal courts must apply. The expectation here is that the Eastern and Southern District holdings in Coleman v Grand and Palin v New York Times Company, respectively, which retroactively computed SLAPP costs and attorney's fees from their date of pre-amendment commencements, will not be followed by the federal district or circuit courts in the future.

Of further recent interest for readers on the subject of SLAPP is the case of Trump v Trump, 79 Misc.3d 866, 189 N.Y.S.3d 430 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2023). The action involved a claim by former President Donald J. Trump against his niece, Mary Trump, the New York Times, and certain named reporters of the New York Times, arising from the newspaper's publication in 2018 of information obtained from Mary Trump about her uncle's taxes. The information at issue was subject to a 2001 settlement and confidentiality agreement between, inter alia, Donald J. Trump and Mary Trump, as reached in connection with an earlier family Surrogate's Court proceeding. Mary Trump allegedly provided tax information to a reporter at the New York Times in violation of her confidentiality agreement which the Times then published to its readers. Plaintiff Trump alleged causes of action against the New York Times for tortious interference with contract by inducing Mary Trump to violate the terms of the confidentiality agreement, aiding and abetting the tortious interference with contract, unjust enrichment, and negligent supervision. Notably, plaintiff Trump did not take issue with the contents of the Times' 2018 article, nor was there a cause of action asserted for defamation. The New York Times defendants moved to dismiss the action under CPLR 3211(g), arguing that the action against those defendants was in the nature of a "public petition and participation" SLAPP action under the expanded, amended version of the law. In opposition, plaintiff Trump argued that SLAPP actions were limited to claims of defamation and that no such cause of action was part of the case. The Supreme Court disagreed with plaintiff Trump, applied SLAPP to the various alleged causes of action, dismissed the case under CPLR 3211(g), and invoked the provisions of CRL 76-a(1)(a) in awarding costs and attorney's fees to the New York Times defendants. Noteworthy here is that Trump v Trump was commenced on September 21, 2021, after the 2020 amendments to both CPLR 3211(g) and CRL 70-a. Therefore, the retroactivity of cost and attorney fee provisions was not a relevant issue for the court to analyze and address, as costs and attorney's fees were required to be given.

A final case of note is the uniquely-named matter of Balliet v with prejudice of the other Kottamasu, 76 Misc.3d 906, 175 N.Y.S.3d 678 (Civ. Ct. Kings Co. 2022). The plaintiff and defendant were roommates. The plaintiff commenced an action for defamation against the defendant, for statements allegedly made by the defendant that the plaintiff had been sexually flirtatious with the defendant's significant other. The plaintiff moved to discontinue the action, and the defendant sought in response an award of attorney's fees and costs as required under the SLAPP statute (CRL 70-a[1][a]). The issue before the Civil Court was whether an action of this type fell within the scope of SLAPP. The court held that it did not. The court, while noting that the amendatory language of CRL 70-a, CRL 76-a, and CPLR 3211(g) and (h) broadened the matters that are to be of public interest or concern, the communication in Balliet was nevertheless of a private nature outside the intendment of SLAPP. Attorney's fees and costs, otherwise awardable under SLAPP, were therefore denied to the defendant, and appropriately so.

2022

C3211:6 Specifying the Ground of the Motion

While the language of CPLR 3211(a) is silent about the need for a moving party to specify the ground for a dismissal motion, CPLR 2214(a) fills the gap by requiring that the ground be specified. The specific ground for a CPLR 3211 motion should be set forth in the notice of motion in a way that is plain for the trial court, the opposing parties, and perhaps the appellate court, to see. If a party makes a motion to dismiss on one or more of the eleven specified grounds available under CPLR 3211(a), the moving party should just plainly say so.

The foregoing brings us to the case of Grocery Leasing Corp. v P & C Merrick Realty Co., 197 A.D.3d 628, 153 N.Y.S.3d 82 (2nd Dep't. 2021). In that matter, the defendant made a motion that was unclear about whether it was styled as one for CPLR 3211 dismissal or for CPLR 3212 summary judgment. The notice of motion appeared to be for a CPLR 3211 dismissal, but the supporting papers spoke in terms of CPLR 3212 summary judgment. The deficiency was raised by the plaintiff in opposition. In reply papers, the defendant clarified that the motion was in the nature of a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion to dismiss for the plaintiff's failure to state a cause of action on which the relief sought could be granted. The Supreme Court granted the motion to dismiss but the dismissal was reversed by the Second Department. The reason for the appellate reversal was that since the nature and evidentiary standard for the defendant's motion was not truly revealed until the defendant's reply papers, and there was no sur-reply, the plaintiff was deprived of an opportunity to oppose the actual grounds on which the defendant's motion was made and granted. All of the foregoing confusion could have been avoided had the defendant's initial motion papers been properly drafted to make clear in both the notice of motion and in the supporting papers that the basis for the motion was an alleged failure to state a cause of action. If the complaint actually failed to state a viable cause of action, its dismissal would have been indicated, and the ultimate result would have been a different and happier one for the defendant. Lawyering matters.

C3211:8 Sua Sponte Dismissals

As part of an annual observational exercise, trial courts continue to sometimes dismiss residential mortgage foreclosure complaints sua sponte, when the defendant is in default, only to see the orders reversed or modified on appeal (U.S. Bank National Association v Green, 205 A.D.3d 755, 165 N.Y.S.3d 712 [2nd Dep't. 2022]; Deutsche Bank National Trust Company v Dicerbo, 204 A.D.3d 884, 164 N.Y.S.3d 829 [2nd Dep't. 2022]; Bayview Loan Servicing, LLC v Taddeo, 199 A.D.3d 749, 157 N.Y.S.3d 82 [2nd Dep't. 2021]; U.S. Bank National Association v Salgado, 192 A.D.3d 1181, 141 N.Y.S.3d 337 [2nd Dep't. 2021]. See also Binder v Tolou Realty Associates, Inc., 205 A.D.3d 870, 166 N.Y.S.3d 551 [2nd Dep't. 2022] [alleged breach of lease]). The issue continues to be one that plagues only the Second Department. A court's authority to dismiss a plaintiff's complaint sua sponte must be exercised sparingly and only under extraordinary circumstances. Errors in the exercise of that limited authority continue to be made by trial courts.

C3211:10 Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence"

Case law continues to develop the circumstances under which electronically-generated information may or may not qualify as "documentary evidence" within the purview of CPLR 3211(a)(1).

Evidence, including e-mails, must be essentially undeniable and authentic to qualify as "documentary evidence" under CPLR 3211(a)(1) (Shah v Mitra, 171 A.D.3d 971, 98 N.Y.S.3d 197 [2nd Dep't. 2019]). Letters, e-mails, and affidavits are not "documentary evidence" (Bath & Twenty, LLC v Federal Savings Bank, 198 A.D.3d 855, 156 N.Y.S.3d 316 [2nd Dep't. 2021]), at least as a general rule. If letters or e-mails are found to be essentially undeniable and authentic, then their contents may be examined to determine whether they utterly refute a plaintiff's claim.

E-mails continue to be reflected in cases on an ever-increasing basis, as more and more business is conducted using that form of communication. In Cohen v Getzel, 205 A.D.3d 532, 166 N.Y.S.3d 527 (1st Dep't. 2022), the plaintiff taxpayer sought damages against the defendant accountant for certain IRS tax penalties and interest, imposed as a result of errors on a 2016 tax return. Apparently, the net amount of the plaintiff's recoverable damages were credited to the plaintiff against fees that were otherwise owed to the defendant, as evidenced by an uncontested e-mail from the defendant to the plaintiff. The court accepted the e-mail as evidence in support of the defendant's motion to dismiss, on the ground that the plaintiff incurred no recoverable damages, finding it a "proper case" for evidentially allowing the uncontested e-mail. Presumably, the e-mail at issue was deemed to be authentic and disposed of the plaintiff's claim. Similarly, in Ostojic v Life Medical Technologies, Inc., 201 A.D.3d 522, 162 N.Y.S.3d 27 [1st Dep't. 2022]), where the issue was whether the parties had reached a meeting of the minds on a federal case settlement and whether there was a breach of that contract, the state court relied upon e-mails and letters sent by the parties to the federal court in concluding that the material terms of a settlement had been reached there. Observationally, the authenticity of the e-mails and letters was aided by the fact that they were generated in real-time and addressed to a court, were directly related to the subject matter, and were uncontested.

An e-mail, while authentic, was found to be inconclusive in Vergara v Mission Capital Advisors, LLC, 200

A.D.3d 484, 155 N.Y.S.3d 68 (1st Dep't. 2021). In Vergara, the parties disputed the amount of commissions that were owed by the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant moved to dismiss the plaintiff's complaint, arguing in part that a prior e-mailed spreadsheet by the plaintiff conclusively established that no additional commissions were owed. The court was unpersuaded, as there was no evidence that the plaintiff's calculations in the particular e-mail and spreadsheet were accurate, or more accurate than the plaintiff's later calculations showing that higher commissions were owed. The same was true in Whitestone Construction Corp. v F.J. Sciame Construction Co. Inc., 194 A.D.3d 532, 149 N.Y.S.3d 21 (1st Dep't. 2021), where the contents of certain chain logs and e-mails did not reflect facts that were undeniable. In other words, while the e-mail was authentic, its content did not utterly refute the plaintiff's claim for damages.

C3211:11 Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Two of the various conditions for the state's waiver of sovereign immunity is that actions be commenced against the state only in the Court of Claims, and that a notice of claim be filed and served upon the attorney general's office within 90 days of certain claims' accrual (CCA 10). Under CCA 10(2), if a claim is sought to be made by a decedent's executor or administrator, the 90-day notice period runs from the date of the executor's or administrator's appointment. If no timely notice is filed as directed by the statute, the Court of Claims has no subject matter jurisdiction to entertain the action in the first instance (Kolnacki v State of New York, 8 N.Y.3d 277, 832 N.Y.S.3d 481, 864 N.E.2d 611 [2007]). The statutory requirements conditioning claims are strictly construed and applied (Lichtenstein v State, 93 N.Y.2d 911, 690 N.Y.S.2d 851, 712 N.E.2d 1218 [1999]; Dreger v New York State Thruway Authority, 81 N.Y.2d 721, 593 N.Y.S.2d 758, 609 N.E.2d 111 [1992]).

Philip v State of New York, 75 Misc.3d 1205(A), 166 N.Y.S.3d 838 (Ct. Cl. 2022) is among the many recent cases that addressed the effect of covid upon time-sensitive deadlines. The claimant, as an administrator, missed the 90-day notice deadline of CCA 10(2) measured from his appointment, but relied upon governor Andrew Cuomo's pandemic-related executive orders which collectively tolled time limitations by 228 days (Executive Order Nos. 202.8, 202.14, 202.28, 202.38, 202.48, 202.55, 202.55.1, 202.60, 202.67, 202.72, 202.79). The Court of Claims applied the toll in concluding that the notice required by CCA 10(2) was filed and served upon the state timely. The strict construction and application of CCA 10, and its importance to subject matter jurisdiction, yields to law that recognizes tolling.

C3211:14 "Other Action Pending"

When an action is subject to dismissal on the ground that there is a prior action pending between the parties (CPLR 3211[a][4]), the result of the dismissal motion in the second of the two actions is not necessarily just a binary choice between granting it or denying it.

Illustrating the foregoing point is the recent decision in Zanani v Sutton Apartments Corporation, 193 A.D.3d 536, 146 N.Y.S.3d 257 [1st Dep't. 2021]). The plaintiff owned shares and occupied space at a cooperative apartment. The defendant cooperative commenced a holdover proceeding in Housing Court, which was the first of the two actions involving the parties. The defendant obtained a judgment of possession in the Housing Court, which the plaintiff appealed to the Appellate Term. While the appeal was pending, the plaintiff commenced the second of the parties' two actions, this one in Supreme Court, New York County, for a declaratory judgment resolving how much money was owed to the defendant. On motion, the Supreme Court dismissed the declaratory judgment action on the ground that there was a prior action pending. However, after the pre-answer dismissal of the second action, the Appellate Term reversed the judgment of possession that had been awarded to the defendant by the Housing Court. On the separate appeal of the dismissal of the second action, the First Department held that since an appeal was pending at the Appellate Term when the CPLR 3211(a)(4) dismissal motion was made, the Supreme Court might have been better advised to stay the second action pending a determination of the appeal before the Appellate Term, and then depending on the appellate result, decide the prior action pending motion accordingly. In the appeal of the second matter, the First Department exercised its discretion in noting that that the Housing Court action was no longer pending at any level, and in the exercise of its discretion, reversed the Supreme Court's order of dismissal and denied the motion to dismiss the declaratory judgment action.

Actions are still "pending" even when on appeal. How the court handling the second of two actions, when the first is on appeal, allows for some flexibility in terms of how to best handle the procedural posture of the cases. Indeed, the Zanani case illustrates the importance of the language in CPLR 3211(a)(4) that "the court need not dismiss on this ground but may make such order as justice requires," which provides for results other than merely granting or denying the motions.

C3211:18 Affirmative Defenses Available on Subdivision (a) Motion

One of the frequently-seen defenses underlying CPLR 3211 dismissal motions in litigation is that of collateral estoppel and res judicata. Collateral estoppel has a preclusive effect on the re-litigation of a singular, identical issue, decided in a prior proceeding. Res judicata precludes the re-litigation of the entirety of an identical claim, which is broader. The party asserting the collateral estoppel or res judicata defense has the burden of establishing the duplicative identity of the already-decided issue/claim. When that burden is met, the opposing party may avoid collateral estoppel or res judicata by meeting its own burden, that the party lacked a full and fair opportunity to be heard at the prior proceeding (Matter of Dunn, 24 N.Y.3d 699, 3 N.Y.S.3d 751, 27 N.E.3d 465 [2015]).

The related doctrines of collateral estoppel and res judicata are usually seen in connection with matters that may have been determined at prior state or federal court proceedings. But what of administrative determinations? Do these doctrines apply to administrative law determinations rendered after evidentiary proceedings, such as those seen from the worker's compensation board, state or county agencies, and administrative review panels, but without the imprimatur of courts of law? The answer, as is heard often enough in the legal profession, is that it depends.

Instructive is the recent case of Lennon v 56th and Park (NY) Owner Corp., LLC, 199 A.D.3d 64, 153 N.Y.S.3d 535 [2nd Dep't. 2021] [signed opinion by Dillon, J.]). The plaintiff in Lennon claimed that he sustained personal injuries at a worksite during the course of employment, when a hoist elevator on which he was riding with other workers allegedly made multiple sudden rises and drops. The plaintiff filed a worker's compensation claim for knee injuries, which resulted in the conduct of an evidentiary hearing before an administrative law judge ("ALJ"). At the hearing, the plaintiff could not recall the names of any other workers on the elevator at the time of the occurrence. The general superintendent of the scaffold contractor at the site testified that safety devices which were in place would have prevented the incident from occurring in the mechanical manner described by the plaintiff, and that any such incident would have prompted a shutdown and evaluation of the equipment which did not occur. A medical administrator investigated the date in question and concluded that nothing out of the ordinary had occurred. The plaintiff was represented at the worker's compensation hearing by counsel who cross-examined witnesses and made closing arguments. The ALJ concluded that the hoist elevator did not malfunction in the manner described by the plaintiff, and described the plaintiff's "claim to be, at best, an afterthought." The worker's compensation board reviewed and affirmed the ALJ's findings and conclusions, and the payment of worker's compensation benefits were denied.

The plaintiff in Lennon nevertheless commenced a personal injury action against various entities alleging common law negligence and violations of Labor Law sections 200, 240(1), and 241(6). One of the issues addressed by the Second Department was whether the findings and conclusions of the ALJ, as affirmed by the worker's compensation board, operated as collateral estoppel against the plaintiff's personal injury and Labor Law claims, and particularly, whether the underlying accident had happened at all. The court examined a range of collateral estoppel cases and determined that factors unique to each action determine whether the result of a prior administrative proceeding qualifies for collateral estoppel. In some instances, a mere overlap of the subject matter of two proceedings does not mean that one collaterally estops the other, if the nature of the litigated conduct or their chronology differ between them (e.g. Auqui v Seven Thirty One Ltd. Partnership, 22 N.Y.3d 246, 980 N.Y.S.3d 345, 3 N.E.3d 682 [2013]; Melendez v McCrowell, 139 A.D.3d 1018, 32 N.Y.S.3d 604 [2nd Dep't. 2016]). After all, negligence actions may sometimes involve subject matter that is broader than that addressed at an administrative proceeding, and collateral estoppel should not apply in such instances. Yet, there are other actions where a prior factual finding or legal conclusion is so central, elemental, or pivotal to the core viability of the later action in court, that collateral estoppel should be applied (Roserie v Alexander's Kings Plaza, LLC, 171 A.D.3d 822, 97 N.Y.S.3d 174 [2nd Dep't. 2019]; Emanuel v MMI Mech., Inc., 131 A.D.3d 1002, 16 N.Y.S.3d 285 [2nd Dep't. 2015]). In Lennon, the finding of the ALJ that the plaintiff's accident did not occur, or did not occur as described, was fatal to the plaintiff's ability to establish the common law negligence and Labor Law claims which were asserted. In other words, without an injury-producing occurrence, the court need not reach the remaining issues of the case, warranting its dismissal.

Collateral estoppel and res judicata are affirmative defenses set forth in CPLR 3211(a)(5). Defenses in that subdivision are waived unless raised in a pre-answer motion to dismiss or as an affirmative defense in the defendant's answer (CPLR 3211[e]). Here, Lennon is further instructive regarding its discussion of leave to amend pleadings under CPLR 3025(b), which was successfully accomplished by the defendants, and which allowed the collateral estoppel defense to then be presented via summary judgment.

C3211:28 Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

Developments continue to unfold in New York and elsewhere as fallout from the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Daimler AG v Bauman, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S.Ct. 746, 187 L.Ed.2d 624 (2014). In Daimler, the Supreme Court re-examined the topic of general jurisdiction in relation to corporate entities, as distinguished from specific jurisdiction seen in state longarm statutes, and narrowed the concept of general jurisdiction to only where the entity is "at home" within the state. The U.S. Supreme Court identified three circumstances where a corporation may be at home within a state. The first is the corporation's state of incorporation. The second is the state where the corporation maintains its principal office. The third, which is more amorphous than the first two, is the "truly exceptional case," where the entity's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home in the state. The absence of personal jurisdiction over a corporate party, either by general jurisdiction or longarm jurisdiction, provides a basis for the dismissal of such actions under CPLR 3211(a)(8).

New York's general jurisdiction is set forth in CPLR 301. Longarm jurisdiction is as defined in CPLR 302 and its various subdivisions. CPLR 301 reads very simply, that "[a] court may exercise such jurisdiction over persons, property, or status as might have been exercised heretofore." The Daimler case affects CPLR 301 only, as it leaves untouched the various bases for longarm jurisdiction under CPLR 302(a). As predicted in prior Practice Commentaries and elsewhere, the significant effect of Daimler would generate a new wave of case law in state and federal courts around the nation, applying, interpreting, and developing its broader impact and meaning.

Among the questions created by Daimler's wake is whether a corporation's registration with a state Department of State for authority to do business, and the related designation of an agent for the receipt of service of process within the state, is a sufficient predicate for the assertion of general jurisdiction. The issue, in other words, is whether the registration and designation operates as a consent to the general jurisdiction of the state.

The hot case to watch in New York on this particular issue was Aybar v Aybar, 37 N.Y.3d 274, 156 N.Y.S.3d 504, 177 N.E.2d 1257 (2021), which was discussed at length in 2021 Supplemental Practice Commentary C3211:28. The Court of Appeals held by a 5-2 margin that a corporation's registration to do business in New York does not confer the state's general jurisdiction over the entity, and instead is a consent for the service of process only. The result of Aybar is that in New York, plaintiff attorneys have a more difficult time obtaining jurisdiction over out-of-state entities. The easy path of satisfying CPLR 301, by an entity's mere registration and designation of an agent for receiving service of process, is no longer available. Instead, plaintiffs must have another independent basis for the assertion of general jurisdiction under CPLR 301, or jump through the more complicated, costly, and uncertain hoops of longarm jurisdiction under CPLR 302(a).

Of course, law is not a two-dimensional concept consisting of courts only. Law is a three-dimensional concept that involves the whole of state government, meaning the legislature, the executive, and the courts. Attorneys disappointed by Aybar spoke with state legislators and found sympathetic ears in Albany. Both the New York State Assembly and Senate passed bills in 2021 to enact a new CPLR 301-a and BCL 1301(e), with concomitant amendments to related statutes (A7769, S7253). The proposed enactments provided that a foreign corporation's registration to do business within New York operated as a consent to the general jurisdiction of New York courts. The proposed legislation extended the consent-to-jurisdiction to foreign associations, foreign limited partnerships, and foreign limited liability partnerships as well. The proposed statute included a proviso that if the foreign entity were to withdraw its registration to do business in New York, the entity's consent to New York jurisdiction would likewise cease upon that event. Under the proposed enactments, foreign corporations registered to do business in New York would automatically be subject to the general jurisdiction of New York courts, thereby nullifying the contrary holding of the Court of Appeals in Aybar. The bill went to governor Kathy Hochul for signature. On December 31, 2021, governor Hochul vetoed the enactment of the proposed legislation, explaining in her veto message that in her opinion, the proposed legislation would discourage out-of-state corporations from coming to New York to do business here, because they would be more easily amenable to suits. Aybar therefore remains good law and the issue might now be quieted, at least for the time being.

In any event, these Practice Commentaries have been annually monitoring decisional developments on general jurisdiction in light of Daimler, and now also, Aybar. The law is developing on whether and under what circumstances general jurisdiction may be obtained when there is (or might be) an "alter ego" relationship between a corporate parent and a subsidiary, so as to reach a non-New York target defendant. In New York State procedure, CPLR 3102(c) permits a party to engage is pre-action discovery, by court order, if necessary to frame a complaint or, as relevant here, determine a jurisdictional basis for commencing an action against a defendant. There is no corresponding provision in the federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In Lensky v Yollari, 2021 WL 4311319 (S.D.N.Y. 2021), app. pend. Lensky v Turkish Airlines (2nd Cir. Case No. 21-2567), the plaintiffs commenced an action against defendants Turk Hava Yallari AO (THY) and Turkish Airlines (TA). THY is a state-sponsored Turkish airline and TA is its subsidiary with offices in New York City. THY filed a motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' amended complaint pursuant to Federal Rule 12(b)(2) on the ground that it was not subject to New York's general or specific jurisdiction. The plaintiffs sought to defeat the motion by alleging that TA, which was subject to jurisdiction, was merely an alter ego of THY, and sought to engage in jurisdictional discovery on that issue. However, the plaintiffs, who noted the fact-intensive nature of an alter ego inquiry, failed to define what evidence they would seek in order to establish jurisdiction, and on that basis, the amended complaint was dismissed as to THY. The lesson for practitioners, whether in pre-action discovery under CPLR 3102(c), or in framed-issue discovery in state litigations, or in jurisdictional discovery in federal courts, is to be as specific as possible in defining the nature and scope of discovery materials relevant to jurisdictional considerations during the earliest stage of litigation.

While much of the focus from Daimler has been on whether entities are subject to the general jurisdiction of a state, Daimler has impacted the discussion of general jurisdiction as to individuals as well. Prior to Daimler, individuals were subject to New York's general jurisdiction by being a domiciliary or mere resident of the state upon being served with process here. The First Department went so far as to apply CPLR 301 general jurisdiction to out-of-state individuals doing business in New York and extending that jurisdiction to other causes arising outside of New York (ABKCO Industries, Inc. v Lennon, 52 A.D.2d 435, 384 N.Y.S.2d 781 [1st Dep't. 1976]). Daimler has changed that. Whereas Daimler defined corporations "at home" in a state by being incorporated or maintaining a principal office within the state, the concept for individuals most akin to that is the individual's domicile, rather than mere residency or other non-domicile contacts (IMAX Corp. v The Essel Group, 154 A.D.3d 464, 62 N.Y.S.3d 107 [1st Dep't. 2017]; Magdalena v Lins, 123 A.D.3d 600, 999 N.Y.S.2d 44 [1st Dep't. 2014]). An individual may only have one domicile. Absent being domiciled in New York, an individual's mere ownership of residential property in New York is insufficient for the establishment of general jurisdiction under CPLR 301 (Chen v Guo Lu, 144 A.D.3d 735, 41 N.Y.S.3d 517 [2nd Dep't. 2016]). In other words, for individuals, the test for being "at home" in New York is domicile rather than some other form of "presence." Moreover, for general jurisdiction over an individual in the course of business, it must be shown that the person's activities within New York were undertaken on an individualized basis rather than on behalf of a corporate entity (IMAC Corp. v The Essel Group, supra).

If a non-domiciliary is passing through New York and personally served with process under CPLR 308, as if "tagged" in the state, may CPLR 301 general jurisdiction be recognized? No, says the Supreme Court, Kings County, in Ford v Bhatoe, 58 Misc.3d 1201(A), 92 N.Y.S.3d 703 [Sup. Ct. Kings County 2017]).

Switching gears to a different jurisdictional issue, there is an appellate decision that reflects the interplay between CPLR 3211(a)(8) and General Business Law (GBL) 13. The latter statute provides that service of process may not be effected upon any individual on a Saturday, where the process server knows that the defendant observes that day of the week as a holy time. Our Jewish brothers and sisters are the primary beneficiaries of GBL 13, when postured as defendants in actions. In Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v Gross, 202 A.D.3d 882, 162 N.Y.S.3d 444 (2nd Dep't. 2022), nail and mail service (CPLR 308[4]) was effected at the Orthodox Jewish defendants' residence on a Saturday, and the impropriety of service was raised as a defense in their answer. However, the motion to dismiss the action for improper service was not made until after the 60-day timeframe for contesting service measured from the answer and affirmative defense, as dictated by CPLR 3211(e). The defendants did not assert any undue hardship that prevented them from making a timely dismissal motion. The Second Department held that the failure of a timely motion, without an excusable hardship, required the denial of dismissal, on the ground of a waiver occasioned by the untimeliness of the motion. The defendants may have had a viable ground for dismissing the complaint on the ground of improper service, but failed to make their motion within the required timeframe. The CPLR can lead a horse to water, but can't make it drink. Practitioners must take the 60-day deadline for contesting service of process under CPLR 3211(a)(8) and CPLR 3211(e) seriously, absent the ability to argue and demonstrate an undue hardship in doing so.

C3211:37 Motion to Dismiss Defense May Lead to "Searching the Record"

CPLR 3211 dismissal motions are unlike motions for summary judgment under CPLR 3212. There are several differences between the two statutes, one of which is that on summary judgment a court may search the record, assess the sufficiency of the parties' evidence, and on that basis grant judgment in favor of one party or another. In contrast, the CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss merely examines the adequacy of the pleadings which are assumed true (CPLR 3212[b]; Spearance v Snyder, 73 Misc.3d 769, 156 N.Y.S.3d 809 [Sup. Ct. Onondaga County 2021], citing Davis v Boeheim, 24 N.Y.3d 262, 998 N.Y.S.2d 131, 22 N.E.3d 999 [2014]).

There is only one means by which a court may appropriately search the record upon a CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss. That is if a dismissal motion is converted into one for a summary judgment under the procedures set forth in CPLR 3211(c) (Sitt v Sitt, 200 A.D.3d 440, 154 N.Y.S.3d 768 [1st Dep't. 2021]). Once converted, searching the record in an appropriate instance becomes fair game. The circumstances and procedures for converting dismissal motions into summary judgment motions are discussed in Practice Commentary C3211:42 and its corresponding Supplemental Practice Commentaries.

C3211:42 Converting CPLR 3211 Motion Into One for Summary Judgment

CPLR 3212(a) spells out a general rule that a party may move for summary judgment in any action, but not until after issue has been joined. The provision of CPLR 3211(c) that courts may, upon adequate notice to the parties, treat a pre-answer dismissal motion as one for summary judgment, is therefore an exception to the general rule. Summary judgment determinations are not front-loaded in litigation except 1) when sought in lieu of a complaint under CPLR 3213, or 2) when a CPLR 3211 dismissal motion is treated upon notice as a motion for summary judgment.

There are three ways that a CPLR 3211 dismissal motion can properly be treated and decided as a motion for summary judgment. The first is when the parties jointly request that the motion be treated as one for summary judgment. The second is when the parties, through their conduct in prosecuting or defending the motion, lay bare their respective proofs as to deliberately chart a summary judgment course. The third is when the court gives adequate notice to the parties of its intention to treat the dismissal motion as a summary judgment motion, as authorized by CPLR 3211(c) (Hendrickson v Philbor Motors, Inc., 102 A.D.3d 251, 955 N.Y.S.2d 384 [2nd Dep't. 2012] [signed opinion by Dillon, J.]). In all such instances, the court has the final say as to whether the motion warrants summary judgment treatment. Absent one of those three described circumstances, the rule against premature summary judgment motions is adhered to strictly (City of Rochester v Chiarella, 65 N.Y.2d 92, 490 N.Y.S.2d 174, 479 N.E.2d 810 [1985]).

When a court chooses at its own initiative to treat a dismissal motion as one for summary judgment, the notice that courts are required to give to the parties presupposes that the motion papers have been read prior to or after the return date, with the parties offered an opportunity to thereafter make submissions or supplemental submissions addressing summary judgment standards and evidence. The transition of a motion from dismissal to summary judgment should not be handled by the court in a way that catches any party flat-footed. Due process and an opportunity for parties to be heard matters.

Whether a CPLR 3211 dismissal motion should be treated as a summary judgment motion is a determination that cannot be unilaterally forced upon a court and an adversary party by means of a premature summary judgment motion prior to the joinder of issue (SHG Resources, LLC v SYTR Real Estate Holdings LLC, 201 A.D.3d 610, 162 N.Y.S.3d 325 [1st Dep't. 2022]). If a summary judgment motion is made prior to the joinder of issue, without the parties stipulating to its treatment as summary judgment, and without the dismissal motion otherwise qualifying for summary judgment under CPLR 3211(c), it will be denied (Id.). The same is true if a defendant makes a pre-answer CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss and the defendant responds with a cross-motion for summary judgment. The cross-motion will be denied absent one of the exceptions qualifying it for summary judgment treatment (New York Bus Operators Compensation Trust v American Home Assurance Co., 71 Misc.3d 630, 144 N.Y.S.3d 820 (Sup. Ct. Suffolk County 2021).

C3211:43 Notice of the Conversion

While CPLR 3211(c) statutorily requires that courts provide the parties with notice if it intends to treat a dismissal motion as one for summary judgment, formal notice is excused by decisional authority if the dispositive issue is strictly a matter of law that is argued by the parties (Mihlovan v Grozavu, 72 N.Y.2d 506, 534 N.Y.S.2d 656, 531 N.E.2d 288 [1985]). Due process concerns are satisfied if the issue of law has already been addressed by the parties. That said, if there is no notice to the parties of the motion's conversion to summary judgment, and if the action does not involve purely legal issues that have been briefed, a conversion by the trial court is improper (Balay v Manhattan 140 LLC, 204 A.D.3d 491, 167 N.Y.S.3d 62 [1st Dep't. 2022]; Davis v Augoustopoulos, 198 A.D.3d 528, 156 N.Y.S.3d 168 [1st Dep't. 2021]).

C3211:51 Single-Motion Rule

If a defendant moves to dismiss a plaintiff's complaint, and the plaintiff thereafter amends the complaint to assert new factual allegations, is a motion to dismiss barred as to the amended complaint under the single motion rule? No. So says the Supreme Court, New York County, in People v National Rifle Association, 74 Misc.3d 998, 165 N.Y.S.3d 234 [Sup. Ct. New York County 2022]). There, the People of the State of New York, by its Attorney General, brought a suit against the NRA and various individual defendants, and certain of the named defendants including the NRA made motions to dismiss the causes of action on various grounds. The action was stayed by a bankruptcy filing of the NRA, which was ultimately dismissed by the federal bankruptcy court. Thereafter, the People amended the complaint to add 90 additional factual allegations detailing the defendants' wrongdoing that allegedly occurred during the 12 months since the commencement of the action, and certain defendants including the NRA then moved to dismiss causes of action reflected by the amended complaint. The Supreme Court mentioned, though in a footnote, that the single motion rule did not prohibit the defendants from filing a CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss as against the amended complaint, citing as authority Barbarito v Zahavi, 107 A.D.3d 416, 968 N.Y.S.2d 422 (1st Dep't. 2013). The result makes sense. If the single motion rule were to be interpreted as prohibiting defendants from seeking the dismissal of amended complaints, the defendants would be unable to ever challenge under CPLR 3211 new non-corresponding allegations of an amended complaint compared with the original complaint.

C3211:67 Motion Automatically Extends Responding Time

In the event a motion to dismiss is denied, the defendant's time to answer the plaintiff's surviving complaint is extended by 10 days after service of the court's order with notice of entry (CPLR 3211[f]). Therefore, no answer is due from the defendant while the motion is pending, plus the 10 days from the order's entry. The same is of course true in reverse, if a plaintiff makes a CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss the defendant's counterclaim and the motion is denied. Under that circumstance, the time for a Reply to the counterclaim is extended for 10 days, as set forth by CPLR 3211(f).

The Second Department addressed an unusual but significant issue in DLJ Mtge. Capital, Inc. v Christie, 202 A.D.3d 913, 162 N.Y.S.3d 464 [2nd Dep't. 2022]), involving the interplay between CPLR 3211(f) and CPLR 306-b. In Christie, the plaintiff sought summary judgment and an order of reference in a mortgage foreclosure action, on default. The defendants cross-moved under CPLR 3211(a)(8) for inter alia the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint based on the failure of proper service of process. The court directed a Traverse hearing and, at its conclusion, granted the cross-motion by finding that process was not properly served, and therefore denied the plaintiff's motion for an order of reference. Within approximately a month, the plaintiff "re-served" process upon the defendants, and thereafter moved for leave to deem the re-service effective nunc pro tunc. The defendants not only opposed the motion, but cross-moved to dismiss the complaint pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(5) and (a)(8) for untimeliness under the statute of limitations and lack of proper service of process. The court granted the CPLR 306-b motion and denied the defendants' cross-motion. Several months elapsed before the defendants served an answer, which the plaintiff treated as untimely. The court's order recognizing the re-service nunc pro tunc did not address the time within which the defendants were to serve an answer. However, CPLR 3211(f) says that upon denial of a CPLR 3211 dismissal motion, the defendants have 10 days within which to answer the complaint. Thus, the nunc pro tunc treatment of re-service did not place the defendants into an "automatic default," as CPLR 3211(f) provides such defendants with 10 days to serve an answer measured from the order's notice of entry. Observationally, because the defendants made a cross-motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211, they subjected themselves to the provision of CPLR 3211(f) that if their motion was denied, they would have 10 days in which to answer the plaintiff's complaint. The appeal was ultimately decided on other procedural issues unrelated to CPLR 3211(f), but the other issues do not detract from the court's analysis of the 10-day rule of CPLR 3211(f).

C3211:69 Easier Standard for Dismissing "SLAPP" Suit

Law regarding the Strategic Lawsuit Against Public Participation ("SLAPP") was fairly quiet from 1992 when it was enacted into CPLR 3211(g) (L.1992, ch. 767, sec. 4) until 2020, when it was amended (L.2020, ch. 250, sec. 3). SLAPP suits, as the reader knows, involve litigation commenced by property owners, real estate developers, and others seeking public approvals for projects. The suits are brought against members of the public who, through public participation, oppose the project. Causes of action are asserted under various theories such as defamation, prima facie tort, and tortious interference with contractual relations. The concern behind the law is that the suits are motivated to intimate the public from speaking out against proposed projects. CPLR 3211(g), and parallel provisions of CPLR 3212(h), were enacted to provide protections to members of the public from such suits. The 1992 law enabled defendants to move for the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint, as well as cross-claims and counterclaims, by merely establishing that the claim qualifies as a SLAPP suit. The 1992 law provided that the dismissal "shall be granted" unless the party opposing the motion establishes that the cause(s) of action has (or have) a substantial basis in law, or is/are supported by a substantial argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law. A primary significance of CPLR 3211(g) is that the statute, in effect, flips the burden of proof from the moving party to demonstrate a dispositive legal defense to an action, to the opposing party to demonstrate that the action has merit. The law accomplished it purpose of making it more difficult for plaintiffs to prosecute SLAPP suits beyond the pleading stage.

As noted in the Supplemental Practice Commentaries for 2021, the recent amendment to CPLR 3211(g), which became effective on November 10, 2020, divided SLAPP analysis into four subdivisions. The first subdivision retained the language from the earlier statute about the working and burdens of motions to dismiss, as described above (CPLR 3211[g][1]). The second requires that the pleadings be attached to the moving papers for examination by the court, along with supporting and opposing affidavits. What is "new" about this requirement is its direction that any factual determination by the court is not admissible later in the action or in a subsequent action, and has no effect upon the burden of proof required in the continuing or subsequent action. The third change of the 2020 amendment is the direction in CPLR 3211(g)(3) that while the dismissal motion is pending, all discovery, hearings, or other motions are stayed, pending a determination of the dismissal motion. If the court, upon reviewing the papers, determines that limited discovery is needed for properly deciding the dismissal motion, it may order specified discovery. The mechanism is akin to that which exists in CPLR 3212(d), where the court may order a continuance of a summary judgment motion pending targeted discovery for facts essential to justify opposition to the motion. Finally, the 2020 amendment added CPLR 3211(g)(4), which explains that the overall provisions of the statute apply to all forms of pleadings and all potential posturing of parties.

The 2020 amendments were accompanied by a parallel amendment to Civil Rights Law (CRL) 76-a, which defines SLAPP actions and the meaning of "public petition and participation." The amendment to CRL 76-a (L.2020, ch. 250, sec. 1) added language to include claims based upon "any communication in a place open to the public or a public forum in connection with an issue of public interest" (CRL 76-a[1][a][1]). That amendment has been described as "broaden[ing] the scope of the law and afford[ing] greater protections to citizens facing litigation arising from their public petition and participation" (Marble Assets, LLC v Rachmanov, 192 A.D.3d 998, 146 N.Y.S.3d 147 [2nd Dep't. 2021]). The amendatory language applying SLAPP to "any communication ... in a public forum" extends the statute beyond just property owners and developers, to a far wider range of law suits intended to intimidate or punish public comments.

These amendments have had an additional year to bake into the CPLR and for cases to address the amendatory language. A continuing issue is what conduct by the public constitutes matters of "public petition and participation" (CPLR 3211[g]; Civil Rights law 76-a). Clearly, the statute has been easily applied to suits commenced against members of the public by property owners and developers seeking municipal approvals for projects. But what about public commentary about more private matters? Some late breaking guidance on that question is provided by Aristocrat Plastic Surgery, P.C. v Silva, 206 A.D.3d 26, 169 N.Y.S.3d 272 (1st Dep't. 2022). There, the defendant underwent a procedure from a plastic surgeon who practiced medicine through the plaintiff, a professional corporation. The defendant was dissatisfied with her results, and posted a negative review on two websites which provide public commentaries about various businesses. The plaintiff, believing it had been defamed, commenced an action against the defendant for defamation, intentional interference with prospective contractual relations, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and prima facie tort. The defendant moved to dismiss the action as a SLAPP suit, and also sought an award of damages under CRL 76-a and attorney's fees. The First Department was called upon to interpret the recent amendment to CRL 76-a, whereby SLAPP protections were extended to claims based upon "any communication in a place open to the public or a public forum in connection with an issue of public interest" (Civil Rights law 76-a[1][a][1]). The court held that the defendant's posts concerning the plastic surgery performed upon her qualified as an exercise of her constitutional right of free speech and a comment on a matter of legitimate public concern and public interest--that is, medical treatment rendered by a physician's professional corporation and the physician performing surgery under its auspices. In other words, even though the plastic surgery was performed as a private matter, the defendant's right to express her opinion about the plastic surgeon's quality was of sufficient public interest as to fall within the expanded language of SLAPP.

It remains to be seen how wide the barn door has been thrown open to law suits that may not arguably qualify for SLAPP protections. Predictably, this issue will receive attention in future supplemental practice commentaries.

2021

C3211:5 Grounds for Dismissal

A party moving for a CPLR 3211 dismissal may argue more than one ground in the papers, directed at the same cause or causes of action. Perhaps best illustrating the point is Monaco v Van Meerendonk, 190 A.D.3d 968, 136 N.Y.S.3d 790 (2nd Dep't. 2021). In Monaco, the plaintiff's cause of action for fraud was dismissed by the court because it was not adequately pleaded, and was time-barred under the applicable statute of limitations, and was precluded by the res judicata doctrine, and was barred by a prior settlement and release. In other words, the meat was turned over on the grill multiple times to assure that the result was well done. Different grounds also may be argued as to different causes of action.

C3211:8 Sua Sponte Dismissals

Our decisional law continues to be plagued with reported appellate cases where trial judges are reversed for dismissing complaints sua sponte, on grounds not raised by the defendant in the underlying CPLR 3211 moving papers. It is an ongoing, annual problem as the trial judges doing so are either refusing to get the precedential message, or are not listening to it. The problem continues to be centered in the Second Department and almost exclusively in the field of residential mortgage foreclosure actions. The Appellate Division has consistently and repeatedly held that the court's power to dismiss a complaint sua sponte is to be used sparingly, and only when extraordinary circumstances exist to warrant dismissal (e.g. Deutsche Bank Natl. Trust Co. v Winslow, 180 A.D.3d 1000, 120 N.Y.S.3d 81 [2nd Dep't. 2020]; JP Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. v Laszlo, 169 A.D.3d 885, 94 N.Y.S.3d 343 [2nd Dep't. 2019]; OneWest Bank, FSB v Fernandez, 112 A.D.3d 681, 976 N.Y.S.2d 405 [2nd Dep't. 2013]; HSBC Bank USA, N.A. v Taher, 104 A.D.3d 815, 962 N.Y.S.2d 301 [2nd Dep't. 2013]; U.S. Bank, N.A. v Emmanuel, 83 A.D.3d 1047, 921 N.Y.S.3d 320 [2nd Dep't. 2011]). There has been no equivocation of that rule on the part of the Appellate Division. Nor does the rule engender ambiguity. The reason that sua sponte dismissals should occur sparingly, and only where there are extraordinary circumstances for doing so, is that a sua sponte dismissal of a complaint deprives the plaintiff of basic due process to which that party is entitled-notice, and an opportunity to be heard. Courts should be the last forum where due process rights are violated, yet, for reasons unique to residential mortgage foreclosure actions, the violations repeat, then repeat some more, and repeat again. The discussion of the subject in this section of the Practice Commentaries has become an annual event.

Examples of this practice during the year prior to this writing include as follows:

U.S. Bank N.A. v Salgado, 192 A.D.3d 1181, 141 N.Y.S.3d 337 (2nd Dep't. 2021) (sua sponte dismissal of compliant by Supreme Court, Queens County [Latin, J.] for plaintiff's violation of a status conference order, reversed on appeal).

Bank of N.Y. v Ramirez, 186 A.D.3d 1472, 131 N.Y.S.3d 104 (2nd Dep't. 2020) (sua sponte dismissal of a complaint by Supreme Court, Queens County [Grays, J.], and an order of the same court denying its vacatur [Velasquez, J.] relative to an order of reference, reversed in the absence of any extraordinary circumstances).

Lehman Bros. Bank v Hickson, 186 A.D.3d 1348, 129 N.Y.S.3d 2 (2nd Dep't. 2020) (order of the Supreme Court, Kings County [Baynes, J.] modified on appeal to delete therefrom the branch that sua sponte dismissed the plaintiff's complaint on a personal jurisdiction ground not raised by any party).

The established track record suggests that these sua sponte dismissals almost never survive appeal.

C3211:10 Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence"

Motions to dismiss on the basis of documentary evidence raise, by definition, two primary considerations for attorneys and courts. One consideration is what type of documents qualify under the statute. The second consideration is the legal standard that must be applied for determining whether qualifying documentary evidence warrants, or fails to warrant, the dismissal of all or part of a plaintiff's complaint. The same discussion applies to motions that may be interposed to dismiss counterclaims, third party complaints, cross-claims (CPLR 3211[a]), and affirmative defenses set forth in parties' answers (CPLR 3211[b]). For ease of reference, this discussion presumes that dismissal is sought of a plaintiff's complaint on the basis of documentary evidence.

The legal standard that courts must apply in determining motions under CPLR 3211(a)(1) is the easier of the two considerations, because the standard is straight-forward. For dismissal, the proffered documents must "utterly refute" the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint, "conclusively establishing a defense as a matter of law" (Himmelstein, McConnell, Gribben, Donoghue & Joseph, LLP v Matthew Bender & Co., Inc., 34 N.Y.3d 908, 115 N.Y.S.3d 782, 139 N.E.3d 406 [2021]; Shephard v Friedlander, 195 A.D.3d 1191, 151 N.Y.S.3d 184 [3rd Dep't. 2021]; Hart 230, Inc. v PennyMac Corp., 194 A.D.3d 789, 149 N.Y.S.3d 134 [2nd Dep't. 2021]). Note the extremism of the burden of proof-that the documentary evidence not only refute the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, but "utterly" do so, and that defense not only be established as a matter of law, but that it "conclusively" do so. There is no room for daylight. Wiggle room is not countenanced. Close calls are not enough. Gray areas have no place within the ambit of CPLR 3211(a)(1). The document that is proffered must clearly say what it says and mean what it means. Courts will not grant motions brought under CPLR 3211(a)(1) on account of documentary evidence, and dismiss a plaintiff's complaint in lieu of an answer, unless the basis for doing so is clear, unambiguous, and absolute.

Which brings the discussion to the type of documents that may qualify under the statute. Many documents do not qualify for CPLR 3211(a)(1) consideration. Others, of course, do.

E-mails continue to be an evolving area of law where some qualify as CPLR 3211(a)(1) documentary evidence, and some do not. As a general rule, letters, e-mails, and affidavits prepared for the CPLR 3211 motion are not documentary evidence contemplated by the statute (Shah v Mitra, 171 A.D.3d 971, 98 N.Y.S.3d 197 [2nd Dep't. 2019]). Those forms of material are too easily manipulated for the purpose that the moving party seeks to achieve. The standard that appears to be evolving is that for e-mails to be treated as documentary evidence under CPLR 3211(a)(1), their content must be "essentially undeniable" and quintessentially authentic at the time of their creation. (Id.) If the content does not undeniably refute the plaintiff's contentions, it will not suffice for the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint (Whitestone Constr. Corp. v F.J. Sciame Constr. Co., Inc., 194 A.D.3d 532, 149 N.Y.S.3d 21 [1st Dep't. 2021]).

Facebook postings are even more problematic for defendants moving for CPLR 3211(a)(1) dismissals. Unlike e-mails, which are business-like, Facebook postings are almost-exclusively social. In W & G Wines LLC v Golden Chariot Holdings LLC, 46 Misc.3d 1202(A), 7 N.Y.S.3d 245 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 2014), the court held that printouts of the plaintiff's Facebook postings were subject to interpretations, and their reliability had not been established.

C3211:11 Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

Motions to dismiss for a court's lack of subject matter jurisdiction is recognized in CPLR 3211(a)(2).

Subject matter jurisdiction has been described as the power of the court to adjudge a general question involved in a matter, and is not dependent on the facts that may appear in a particular case arising, or claimed to have arisen, under the general question (Thrasher v United States Liab. Ins. Co., 19 N.Y.2d 159, 278 N.Y.S.2d 793, 225 N.E.2d 503 [1967]; 21st Century Pharmacy v American Intl. Group, 195 A.D.3d 776, 145 N.Y.S. 3d 810 [2nd Dep't. 2021]). Even for courts of general jurisdiction, such as the state Supreme Court, there are forms of disputes that cannot be heard where subject matter jurisdiction is lacking. An example of matters that the Supreme Court cannot hear are those where the State of New York is sued and which may only be heard in the Court of Claims. Another example are matters that are within the exclusive province of the federal courts, such as bankruptcy, suits against the United States, and federal tax matters. Also, state courts lack subject matter jurisdiction over issues that have been legislatively preempted by federal law (Klingsberg v Council of School Supervisors and Administrators--Local 1, 181 A.D.3d 949, 122 N.Y.S.3d 335 [2nd Dep't. 2020] [preemption of the parties' dispute by the Federal Labor Management Relations Act]). The "lower courts" in New York State at the village, town, city, county, and district level have no subject matter jurisdiction to hear matters that exceed the authorized monetary limits of those respective courts. Specialized courts, such as Family Courts and Surrogate Courts, also lack subject jurisdiction to hear matters outside of their defined ambits.

Subject matter jurisdiction must inherently exist with a court for it to hear and resolve a matter on the merits. Parties may not confer subject matter jurisdiction upon a court that otherwise lacks it, not by consent or otherwise (Matter of Metropolitan Transp. Auth., 32 A.D.3d 943, 823 N.Y.S.3d 88 [2nd Dep't. 2006]). Relatedly, the absence of a court's subject matter jurisdiction is a defense that is not waived by a party's failure to raise it at any particular time in a litigation, as it may instead be raised at any time (Financial Indus. Regulatory Auth., Inc. v Fiero, 10 N.Y.3d 12, 853 N.Y.S.2d 267, 882 N.E.2d 879 [2008]). Indeed, the issue is one area that may be raised by the court at its own initiative, sua sponte (Id.), since it is so fundamental. The lack of subject matter jurisdiction is understandably not listed as among the various defenses of CPLR 3211(e) that are waived if not raised as an affirmative defense or in a pre-answer motion to dismiss. If a court determines that it does not have the jurisdiction to hear the subject matter of an action, the action must be dismissed. Period, end of story. If a court renders a judgment in a matter where subject matter jurisdiction was lacking, the judgment is void as a matter of law (Manhattan Telecom. Corp. v H & A Locksmith, Inc., 21 N.Y.3d 200, 969 N.Y.S.2d 424, 991 N.E.2d 198 [2013]; Caffrey v North Arrow Abstract & Settlement Servs., Inc., 160 A.D.3d 121, 73 N.Y.S.3d 70 [2nd Dep't. 2018]).

In actions against the State of New York, a claimant must file a claim within 90 days from the accrual of a cause of action (CCA 10, 11), akin to notices of claims that must be served upon other municipal entities under General Municipal Law 50-e and 50-i. The failure of a claimant to satisfy that aspect of the Court of Claims Act divests the Court of Claims of subject matter jurisdiction to hear the action (Criscuola v State of New York, 188 A.D.3d 645, 134 N.Y.S.3d 67 [2nd Dep't. 2020]). Likewise, Court of Claims Act 11(b) requires that claims against the state be verified in the same manner as a complaint in the Supreme Court. The absence of a proper verification on claims against the state is a jurisdictional defect that divests the Court of Claims of subject matter jurisdiction over the matter (Flowers v State of New York, 175 A.D.3d 1724, 109 N.Y.S.3d 508 [3rd Dep't. 2019]).

Religious disputes sometimes spill into the state court system. Some are justiciable, some are not. Courts lack subject matter jurisdiction over issues that involve the interpretation of religious doctrine or which involve particular doctrinal beliefs (Matter of Congregation Yetev Lev D'Satmar, Inc. v Kahana, 9 N.Y.3d 282, 849 N.Y.S.3d 463, 879 N.E.2d 1282 [2007]; Russian Orthodox Convent Novo-Diveevo, Inc. v Sukharevskaya, 166 A.D.3d 1036, 91 N.Y.S.3d 101 [2nd Dep't. 2018]). The reason is that the state courts must avoid becoming entangled in essentially religious controversies or intervening on behalf of groups espousing particular doctrines or beliefs. Conversely, courts possess subject matter jurisdiction over parties who happen to be involved in religious organizations or controversies, where the dispute is capable of resolution by the application of neutral principles of law without reference to religious principles (Id. See also Jones v Wolf, 443 U.S. 595, 99 S.Ct. 3020, 61 L.Ed.2d 775 [1979]). When the issue is raised, courts must part the Red Sea, so to speak, between deciding issues that can be resolved by application of neutral civil law, versus those that are so intertwined with religious doctrines or principles that subject matter jurisdiction is lacking.

In Laguerre v Maurice, 192 A.D.3d 44, 138 N.Y.S.3d 123 (2nd Dep't. 2020), the plaintiff sued the defendant for defamation, and the defendant moved to dismiss the action under CPLR 3211(a)(2) for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The defendant argued that the alleged statement--that the plaintiff was a homosexual who viewed gay pornography from a church computer, was intertwined with religious doctrine, and therefore, not justiciable in a civil court. The Supreme Court and the Second Department disagreed, finding that the statement's defamatory content, if any, could be resolved without reference to religious principles, doctrines, or practices. Thus, disputes that happen to involve religious persons or organizations, such as not only defamation, but the interpretation of by-laws or the enforcement of contracts, are within the subject matter of the courts. Disputes that are inextricably intertwined with religious doctrine, or which go to the judgment and discretion of church elders, are not.

Attorneys commencing litigations should therefore be careful of subject matter jurisdiction, as it must be a difficult conversation to later explain to a client why the action was brought in the wrong court.

C3211:14 "Other Action Pending," Generally

While CPLR 3211(a)(4) vests the court with authority to dismiss an action if there is already another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action, a dismissal of the second action is never mandatory. The statute qualifies the authority of the court, that it "need not dismiss upon this ground but may make such order as justice requires." In other words, the trial court has discretion to fashion a remedy that best suits the circumstances of the parties and the case.

An example of the statute's flexibility was recently seen in U.S. Bank N.A. v Karnaby, 190 A.D.3d 1005, 136

N.Y.S.3d 886 (2nd Dep't. 2021). The plaintiff commenced two actions against the same defendant, the first in 2010 and the second at a later time. The defendant moved to dismiss the second of the two actions. The 2010 action was in the process of being discontinued, and was in fact discontinued while the motion to dismiss was pending in the second action. The Supreme Court's denial of the dismissal motion was affirmed on appeal. Yes, the two actions overlapped in terms of the parties, the subject matter of the litigation, and time. But as a practical matter, there was no need for the court to dismiss the second action under CPLR 3211(a)(4) if the first action was in the process of being discontinued while the dismissal motion was pending and was in fact discontinued by the time the motion was decided.

The circumstances addressed by CPLR 3211(a)(4) may be a little more compelling in the context of two duplicitous residential mortgage foreclosure litigations. The reason is that under RPAPL 1301(3), an action to recover upon a mortgaged debt prohibits the commencement of a second such action. The purpose of the statute is to protect the mortgagor of the expense and annoyance of two separate actions at the same time with reference to the same debt (Central Trust Co. v Dann, 85 N.Y.2d 767, 628 N.Y.S.2d 259, 651 N.E.2d 1278 [1995]; U.S. Bank v Stern, 189 A.D.3d 1313, 134 N.Y.S.3d 272 [2nd Dep't. 2020]). The statute allows an exception, that a second action may be commenced if permission is obtained from the court where the first action is already pending. In 21st Mtge. Corp. v Ahmed, 173 A.D.3d 951, 105 N.Y.S.3d 467 (2nd Dep't. 2019), the plaintiff commenced two actions against the same defendant homeowner over the same debt, one in 2007 and one in 2015. Leave of court was not sought prior to the commencement of the second action. A stipulation discontinuing the 2007 action had been executed but had not been filed prior to the commencement of the 2015 action. The stipulation of discontinuance was filed after the commencement of the 2015 action but before the defendant in that action moved to dismiss it on the ground of prior action pending. The court denied dismissal of the 2015 action, noting that while under the circumstances leave of court should have been sought and obtained before the commencement of the second action, there was no prejudice to the defendant and no substantive violation of RPAPL 1301(3).

Indeed, dismissal of the second action need not be ordered even where the first action has not been discontinued or been in the process of a discontinuance. In Bank of N.Y. Mellon v Porfert, 187 A.D.3d 1110, 134 N.Y.S.3d 57 (2nd Dep't. 2020), two duplicative foreclosure actions were commenced against the same defendant in 2006 and 2014, respectively. There was no activity in the 2006 action since its commencement. The Second Department, in affirming the Supreme Court, held that judicial discretion permitted the denial of the defendant's motion to dismiss the second action under CPLR 3211(a)(4), presumably because of the moribund nature of the earlier of the two actions.

By contrast, where the prior action is not discontinued or in the process of discontinuing, and is not otherwise moribund as in Porfert, the dismissal of the second action is warranted (HSBC Bank USA, N.A. v Pena, 187 A.D.3d 724, 130 N.Y.S.3d 354 [2nd Dep't. 2020]).

In comparing two actions under CPLR 3211(a)(4), it is not necessary that the precise legal theories presented in the first action also be presented in the second, as long as the relief is the same or substantially the same (Board of Mgrs. of the 1835 E. 14th St. Condominium v Singer, 186 A.D.3d 1477, 132 N.Y.S.3d 25 [2nd Dep't. 2020]).

C3211:18 Affirmative Defenses Available on Subdivision (a) Motion

CPLR 3211(a)(5) is a grab bag of different forms of affirmative defenses that have been batched together in a single subdivision of the statute. Each has its own elements which, when established by a moving defendant, may result in the dismissal of the plaintiffs' complaints.

CPLR 3211 may be used against not only complaints, but also cross-claims, counterclaims, and third party complaints. Relatedly, CPLR 3211(b) permits a plaintiff to move for the dismissal of one or more defenses, on the ground that the stated defense has no merit. Therefore, while CPLR 3211 is typically seen in the context of dismissal motions made against plaintiffs' complaints, the applicability of the statute is actually broader. A recent example of a motion by a defendant to dismiss the cross-claims of a co-defendant is Jaber v Elayyan, 191 A.D.3d 964, 142 N.Y.S.3d 601 (2nd Dep't. 2021).

Arbitration and Award

The CPLR 3211(a)(5) defense of arbitration and award is easily applied when the same dispute between the parties has already been resolved by an earlier arbitration, and where the arbitration has been or is subject to confirmation by the courts under CPLR Article 75. However, if an action is commenced before an agreed-upon arbitration has begun or concluded, the circumstances are more murky. A signed opinion by Justice Linda Christopher, Wilson v PBM, LLC, 193 A.D.3d 22, 140 N.Y.S.3d 276 (2nd Dep't. 2021), addressed the issue. She and the Second Department noted that a mere agreement to arbitrate a dispute is not a CPLR 3211(a)(5) defense to an action and may therefore not provide a basis for a motion to dismiss (citing Allied Bldg. Inspectors Intl. Union of Operating Engrs., Local Union No. 211, AFL-CIO v Office of Labor Relations of City of N.Y., 45 N.Y.2d 735, 408 N.Y.S.2d 476, 380 N.E.2d 303 [1978]). In Wilson, the Supreme Court had granted a motion to compel arbitration, and under those circumstances, the Second Department held that rather than dismiss the plaintiff's complaint, the action should instead have been stayed pending the arbitration. See also Matter of County of Nassau v Detectives Assn., Inc. of Police Dept. of Nassau County, 188 A.D.3d 1049, 137 N.Y.S.3d 77 (2nd Dep't. 2021).

Collateral Estoppel

Prior Practice Commentaries have focused largely on the circumstances where summary judgment determinations either do or do not have collateral estoppel effect on later actions. The same is true for the related topic of res judicata, which is also ground for the dismissal of actions under CPLR 3211(a)(5).

A recent decision, Matter of BZ Chiropractic, P.C. v Allstate Ins. Co., 197 A.D.3d 144, 154 N.Y.S.3d 46 [2nd Dep't. 2021]) [signed opinion by Dillon, J.]), addressed whether a court's advisory opinion--which is very rare and to be typically avoided by the courts--is subject to either doctrine. In BZ Chiropractic, the Appellate Term for the 2nd, 11th and 13th Judicial Districts addressed an issue of whether certain interest should have been tolled on an insurance-related judgment, and if so, whether a satisfaction should have been entered on the judgment. The Appellate Term determined that no toll of interest was indicated, but then gratuitously stated that the non-tolled interest be computed at the 9% rate of CPLR 5004 rather than at the more specific 2% per month compounded rate of Insurance Law 5106(a). In determining a later motion brought to clarify its holding, the Appellate Term described its language about the rate of interest as "advisory" only and not on the merits. An aggrieved party commenced a hybrid turnover proceeding/declaratory judgment action related to the same dispute for various forms of relief, including a declaration that it was entitled to the higher rate of interest on the judgment as authorized by Insurance Law 5106(a). At issue in the Supreme Court, and on appeal, was whether the Appellate Term's advisory language that the parties' judgment was subject to 9% interest under CPLR 5004 collaterally estopped the plaintiff/petitioner from arguing the same issue anew at the Supreme Court on the merits. The Second Department held that the Appellate Term's advisory opinion, and for that matter dicta from the courts, are by nature not determinations of contested issues rendered on the merits after a full and fair opportunity to be heard. Therefore, when an advisory opinion is rendered, however rare, the doctrine of collateral estoppel does not bar consideration of the same issue on the merits in a later court proceeding. Further, the Second Department held that since Insurance Law 5106(a) was the more specific interest statute applicable to the dispute, it trumped the general provision of CPLR 5004, and required that the interest be computed at the higher rate of 2% per month, compounded.

C3211:28 Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

The law nationally and in New York continues to mold itself around the U.S. Supreme Court's groundbreaking opinion in Daimler AG v Bauman, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S. Ct. 746, 187 L.Ed.2d 624 (2014). In Daimler, general jurisdiction over corporate entities has been narrowly defined to entities "at home" in a state, meaning 1) the state of the entity's incorporation, or 2) the state where the entity maintains its principal place of business, or 3) in truly exceptional cases, where the entity's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home in the state. New York's general jurisdiction statute is CPLR 301. The absence of personal jurisdiction over a party, including a corporate entity not subject to New York's general or longarm jurisdiction, is a basis for the dismissal of an action under CPLR 3211(a)(8).

The First Department adhered to Daimler in its holding rendered in Okoroafor v Emirates Airlines, 195 A.D.3d 540, 145 N.Y.S.3d 807 (1st Dep't. 2021). There, the defendant, Emirates Airlines, was headquartered and maintained its principal office in Dubai, UAE. It also maintained an office in New York County, but that office was not the airline's "principal" one. On that basis, the First Department held that the defendant was not amenable to the general jurisdiction of New York State and dismissed the plaintiff's complaint.

The Second Department saw its own share of the action on general jurisdiction in Aybar v Aybar, 169 A.D.3d 137, 93 N.Y.S.3d 159 (2nd Dep't. 2019) (signed opinion by Braithwaite-Nelson, J.), which has been followed with interest and discussed in the 2019 and 2020 CPLR Practice Commentaries, C3211:28. The Second Department held in Aybar that a corporation's mere registration with the Secretary of State designating it as an agent for the service of process, in connection with obtaining authority to do business within the state, does not constitute consent to the general jurisdiction of New York under CPLR 301, as it is instead a mere convenience to be used for service when jurisdiction may already independently exist.

The Aybar case has been closely followed because leave to appeal was granted by the Court of Appeals, which then put its own imprint on the issue in a 5-2 determination rendered on October 7, 2021 (Aybar v Aybar, ___ N.Y.3d ___, ___ N.Y.S.3d ___, ___ N.E.3d ___, 2021 WL 4596367, 2021 N.Y. Slip Op. 05393) (Singas, J.). The majority of the Court of Appeals affirmed what had been found by the Second Department; namely, that a foreign corporation's compliance with the relevant statutory provisions for registering with the Secretary of State for authority to do business in New York, and the concomitant designation of the Secretary of State as an agent of the corporation for the service of process, is consent to service of process only. It does not establish New York's general jurisdiction over the foreign corporation in and of itself. Interestingly, the Court of Appeals specifically based its conclusion on an analysis of New York precedents, without reaching whether any consent to general jurisdiction by registration would comport with federal due process under Daimler. Yet, it appears that the conclusion of the Court of Appeals in Aybar is consistent with Daimler's directive that that general jurisdiction is cognizable only where a corporate entity is "at home" in a state, defined as being incorporated in the state or maintaining its principal place of business there, or there being other truly exceptional and rare circumstances that do not appear applicable here. Thus, for New York, the issue is now put to rest, that a corporation's registration to do business in New York, standing alone, is not enough to trigger general jurisdiction under CPLR 301. Practitioners seeking to commence actions in New York against foreign corporations with principal offices elsewhere must therefore look away from the ease and convenience of CPLR 301, were it applicable, and instead look to the more complicated longarm provisions of CPLR 302 for obtaining jurisdiction over the entity. CPLR 301 will still remain available for the assertion of general jurisdiction for entities incorporated in New York or which maintain their principal place of business in New York.

General jurisdiction based upon Daimler's third jurisdictional prong, that a corporate entity's operations be so substantial in a state as to represent an exceptional circumstance basis for recognizing general jurisdiction, was found to be lacking in Lowy v Chalkable, LLC, 186 A.D.3d 590, 129 N.Y.S.3d 517 (2nd Dep't. 2020).

Daimler left unanswered the question of whether, under an "alter ego test," a parent corporation may be subject to the general jurisdiction of a state based upon the conduct of its subsidiary entity. Cases still remain elusive on this issue. Cases which have come close to addressing this issue have found that the quantum of proof for finding dominion and control by the principal over the subsidiary was lacking, and that the secondary issue of whether an "alter ego" relationship was sufficient to impute general jurisdiction to the principal, if at all, did not then need to be reached (e.g. Branson v Alliance Coal, LLC, No. 4:19-CV-00155-JHM, 2021 WL 1031002 [W.D. Kent. Mar. 17, 2020] [but also permitting some discovery on the issue]; Zia Agricultural Consulting, LLC v Tyson Foods, Inc., No. 1:20-CV-445-KWR-JHR, 2021 WL 245686 [D. N.M. Jan. 25, 2021]; Rivera v Invitation Homes, Inc., No. 18-cv-03158-JSW, 2020 WL 8910882 [N.D. Cal. Oct. 29, 2020]). We should expect that the federal courts, where so many cases are based upon the diversity of the parties' citizenship, will be the forums most likely to encounter and address these still-unresolved issues.

General jurisdiction under CPLR 301 should not be confused with longarm jurisdiction under CPLR 302(a)(1) through (4). A defendant not amenable to the general jurisdiction of New York under CPLR 301 may still be independently subject to New York jurisdiction under the longarm statute of CPLR 302.

C3211:29 Jurisdictional Basis Depending on Complaint

There are varied bases for the assertion of longarm jurisdiction over non-domiciliary defendants under CPLR 302, each dependent upon the nature of the defendant's contacts with New York State, or with the defendant, or with the tort or contract at issue in the plaintiff's complaint, or with real property that is the subject of an action.

Subdivision (a)(1) speaks to defendants who transact business in New York State, or who contract anywhere to supply goods or services to New York. Longarm jurisdiction under this subdivision may exist for cases sounding in either tort or contract, but at a minimum must involve the provision of goods within the state. The "transaction" of business in New York refers to a purposeful activity here, even if irregular, where the defendant avails itself of the privileges and protections of New York law. The CPLR 302(a)(1) jurisdictional inquiry is twofold: under the first prong, the defendant must have conducted sufficient activities to have transacted business in the state, and under the second prong, the claims must arise from the transactions (Skutnik v Messina, 178 A.D.3d 744, 113 N.Y.S.3d 195 [2nd Dep't. 2019]). "Purposeful activities" are those with which a defendant, through volitional acts, avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum state, thus invoking the benefits and protections of its laws (Fischbarg v Doucet, 9 N.Y.3d 375, 849 N.Y.S.2d 501, 880 N.E.2d 22 [2007]). The requirement of purposeful activities is not met by a single phone call to New York requesting the shipment of goods (Parke-Bernet Galleries v Franklyn, 26 N.Y.2d 13, 308 N.Y.S.2d 337, 256 N.E.2d 506 [1970], citing M. Katz & Son Billiard Prods. Inc. v Correale & Sons, 20 N.Y.2d 903, 285 N.Y.S.2d 871, 232 N.E.2d 864 [1967]), the transitory presence of a corporate official in New York (McKee Elec. Co. v Rauland-Borg Corp., 20 N.Y.2d 377, 283 N.Y.S.2d 34, 229 N.E.2d 604 [1967]), or communications from an out-of-state physician serving as a consultant to a New York physician (Etra v. Matta, 61 N.Y.2d 455, 474 N.Y.S.2d 687, 463 N.E.2d 3 [1984]). The nature and quality of the contacts are what are important for determining whether a defendant's activities are sufficiently purposeful with New York as to amount to the transaction of business within the state. The defendant need not personally ever be in New York, as the inquiry is whether the defendant's activities related to New York were purposeful and there is a substantial relationship between the transaction and the cause of action asserted by the plaintiff (Paterno v Laser Spine Inst., 24 N.Y.3d 370, 998 N.Y.S.2d 720, 23 N.E.2d 988 [2014]; Glazer v Socata, S.A.S., 170 A.D.3d 1685, 96 N.Y.S.3d 791 [4th Dep't. 2019]; Robert M. Schneider, M.D., P.C. v Licciardi, 65 Misc.3d 254, 108 N.Y.S.3d 720 [Sup. Ct. Greene County 2019]).

Subdivision (a)(2) speaks to defendants who allegedly commit a tort within New York, except for defamation. The tortious conduct may be negligent or intentional. This general longarm basis makes sense. If an out-of-state defendant commits a civil battery at a tavern within New York and, in so doing, injures a New York plaintiff during the altercation, New York has an obvious interest in exercising jurisdiction over the parties and the related cause of action. The same can be said of out-of-state defendants who may engage in other forms of tortious conduct within the state borders of New York. For this longarm subdivision to apply, the defendant must be physically within the state of New York at the time the tort is committed (Feathers v McLucas, 15 N.Y.2d 443, 261 N.Y.S.2d 8, 209 N.E.2d 68 [1965]). CPLR 302(a)(2) looks to the non-domiciliary defendant's conduct that is physically within the state as its basis for jurisdiction, as distinguished from conduct elsewhere that may merely have a residual effect in New York.

Subdivision (a)(3) was added to the statute in 1966, after the original version of the 1962 statute had been enacted, to extend longarm jurisdiction to out-of-state defendants who commit torts outside of the state and where the resultant injury is caused to persons or property within the state, except for defamation. The reason for the addition of this subdivision was to close a perceived loophole in the law. The original 1962 version of the longarm statute did not contain any specific provision applicable to strict products' liability claims where a product is defectively designed, manufactured, or sold from outside of New York, and where the effect of the product defect causes injury within New York. The Court of Appeals held so in Feathers that non-residents could not be subjected to New York jurisdiction for tortious conduct committed out-of-state under the then-existing language of CPLR 302. Feathers involved a Florida defendant that negligently loaded propane gas for delivery in Vermont, which ignited in New York while en route to the beautiful Green Mountains. The state legislature responded to Feathers in 1966 by adding CPLR 302(a)(3) to the statutory scheme, expressly and logically extending the longarm concept to out-of-state defendants whose out-of-state conduct causes harm within New York.

CPLR 302(a)(3) contains qualifiers, however. For longarm to apply, even where the foregoing factual underpinnings are in place, the out-of-state defendant must also regularly do or solicit business in New York, or engage in any other persistent course of conduct in New York, or derive substantial revenue from interstate or international commerce, or expects or reasonably should expect its acts to have consequences in New York while also deriving substantial revenue from interstate or international commerce. For persons trained in the law, CPLR 302(a)(3) is a veritable gold mine of debatable legal nomenclature which uniquely impacts the cases from one to the next-the meaning of words like "regularly," "solicits," "persistent," "substantial," and "expects consequences." Each is briefly discussed below:

Does or Solicits Business: While the "transaction" of business under CPLR 302(a)(1) involves a defendant availing itself of the benefits and protections of New York law, regularly "doing business" or "soliciting business" under the language of CPLR 302[a][3][i]) is broader. It connotes a non-domiciliary defendant's presence in New York that is not merely casual or occasional, but which represents a fair measure of permanence and continuity here (AirTran, N.Y., LLC v Midwest Air Group, Inc., 46 A.D.3d 208, 844 N.Y.S.2d 233 [1st Dep't. 2007]). An entity doing business in New York can be sued in the state, whether the subject of the lawsuit relates to a particular aspect of the business or not.

Persistent Course of Conduct: Persistence regards the ongoing nature of the defendant's activities in New York. A long-term lease in New York, or a series of business transactions within the state, may qualify under CPLR 302(a)(1)(i) (Williams v Beemiller Inc., 33 N.Y.3d 523, 106 N.Y.S.3d 237, 130 N.E.3d 833 [2019] [Feinman, J., concurrence]).

Derives Substantial Revenue: The concept of deriving "substantial" revenue from New York is a relative term based upon the uniqueness of each individual defendant. A large national corporation might derive only a small percentage of its sales from New York, but because of the entity's "bigness," even a small percentage of overall revenue amounts to a substantial sum of money. Conversely, a small non-domiciliary company, with limited revenue, may derive a substantial percentage of its revenue from New York and thereby be found to derive substantial revenue from the state (Id.). The examination of "substantial revenue" under CPLR 302(a)(3)(ii) is therefore not only sui generis, but also, both quantitative and qualitative in nature.

The Expectation of Consequences. The statutory prong of CPLR 302(a)(3)(ii) that the defendant may alternatively be subject to longarm jurisdiction when it expects or should reasonably expect its act to have consequences in New York, speaks to foreseeability. The defendant need not foresee the specific injury-producing event in New York. Instead, the statute speaks to foreseeability in a more general sense, such as that the out-of-state manufacture or sale of a product which turns out to be defective would be used in New York and cause injury there (Darrow v Hetronic Deutschland, 119 A.D.3d 1142, 990 N.Y.S.2d 150 [3rd Dep't. 2014]).

CPLR 302(a)(4) is a straight-forward basis for longarm jurisdiction, and not one that generates much decisional law. It establishes longarm jurisdiction against non-domiciliary defendants who own, use, or possess real property situated within the state of New York. The lawsuit, incidentally, must relate to that same property within New York (Zeidan v Scott's Dev. Co., 173 A.D.3d 1639, 103 N.Y.S.3d 707 [4th Dep't. 2019]).

Different longarm prongs may overlap with others. Conceivably, a defendant may be subject to more than one basis of longarm at the same time. The plaintiff need only have one such basis to obtain a jurisdictional predicate against the out-of-state defendant. Put another way, a plaintiff seeking to defeat a CPLR 3211(a)(8) motion to dismiss, based on the lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant, need only provide prima facie evidence tending to establish one of the four statutory longarm bases to succeed in defeating the motion.

A statute related to the longarm is VTL 253. For out-of-state motorists, VTL 253 deems the New York Secretary of State as the agent for service of process upon non-domiciliary defendants whose vehicular operation is the subject of a suit in New York. The statute directs that service be effected upon the office of the Secretary of State personally or by mail, plus service by certified mail, return receipt requested, to the defendant at his or her out-of-state address, and then by regular mail if acceptance of the certified mailing is refused at its destination address (VTL 253[2]). The statute also provides other mechanisms for effecting service upon the out-of-state defendant.

For matrimonial actions, CPLR 302(b) allows for New York jurisdiction over a non-domiciliary if New York was the matrimonial domicile before the parties' estrangement, or if the defendant abandoned the marriage from New York, or if the cause of action accrued under New York law such as by a New York separation agreement or a New York prenuptial agreement (Levy v Levy, 185 A.D.2d 15, 592 N.Y.S.2d 480 [3rd Dep't. 1993]; Klette v Klette, 167 A.D.2d 197, 561 N.Y.S. 2d 580 [1st Dep't. 1990]).

The plaintiff need not allege a longarm jurisdictional basis in the complaint. The lack of a jurisdictional basis is an affirmative defense to be pleaded in an answer (CPLR 3211[a][8]). However, where the jurisdictional predicate is contested, the ultimate burden of proving a basis of jurisdiction, whether it be general or longarm or otherwise, rests with the plaintiff. In opposing a CPLR 3211(a)(8) motion to dismiss, the plaintiff need only make a prima facie showing that jurisdiction exists (Skutnik v Messina, 178 A.D.3d 744, 113 N.Y.S.3d 195 [2nd Dep't. 2019]; Hopstein v Cohen, 143 A.D.3d 859, 40 N.Y.S.3d 436 [2nd Dep't. 2016]). Parties moving to dismiss actions based upon an alleged lack of longarm jurisdiction, and those defending against such motions, must look closely at the particulars of the relevant subdivisions of CPLR 302(a), and key their arguments into the presence or absence of qualifying facts and criteria.

C3211:32 Absence of a Person Who Should be a Party

CPLR 1001 and 1003 afford the courts with wide latitude in the addition or deletion of parties. The absence of a necessary party may therefore be raised at any stage in the proceedings by any party, or by the court on its own motion (Migliore v Manzo, 28 A.D.3d 620, 813 N.Y.S.2d 762 [2nd Dep't. 2006]).

C3211:55 Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraphs 8 or 9 of 3211(a)

A defendant with a basis for seeking the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint on the ground that personal jurisdiction is lacking (CPLR 3211[a][8]) cannot sit on the right. CPLR 3211(e) requires that the right to seek such a dismissal is waived under either of three procedural circumstances. One is where the defendant unsuccessfully moves to dismiss the complaint under any grounds set forth in CPLR 3211(a) but does not raise the lack of personal jurisdiction as one of those grounds. The second circumstance is where the defendant serves an answer to the complaint which does not contain the lack of personal jurisdiction as an affirmative defense. The third circumstance is where the lack of personal jurisdiction is raised in the answer as an affirmative defense but the defendant does not move to dismiss on that basis within 60 days of the answer's service. In other words, the issue of personal jurisdiction has a fixed shelf life, and must be raised by the defendant early in the course a litigation.

Much of foregoing presumes that the defendant has, in fact, appeared and answered the plaintiff's complaint. The mere filing of a notice of appearance by counsel, without an answer raising a jurisdictional objection and without a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(8), has the same effect of waiving the defense (U.S. Rof III Legal Tit. Trust 2015-1 v John, 189 A.D.3d 1645, 140 N.Y.S.3d 59 [2nd Dept. 2020]). An interesting twist occurred in the notice of appearance case of Federal Nat. Mortg. Assoc. v Beckford, 196 A.D.3d 546, 147 N.Y.S.3d 466 [2nd Dep't. 2021]), where a defendant sought to vacate a default judgment on the ground that inter alia she had never been properly served with process. There, the defendant denied that an attorney was ever authorized to appear for her in the action prior to the default, and was supported by an affirmation of the attorney that his name on a document earlier submitted to the court had been the product of an unfortunate scrivener's error. The Supreme Court denied the defendant's vacatur motion on the ground that the proffered jurisdictional defense had been waived. The Second Department disagreed and remitted the matter for a Traverse hearing, finding from the documentation that the attorney's purported appearance was unauthorized and therefore failed to trigger a waiver of the defendant's affirmative defense that personal jurisdiction was never obtained over her.

C3211:69 Easier Standard for Dismissing "SLAPP" Suit

"SLAPP" is an acronym for the "strategic lawsuit against public participation." It involves suits commenced by property owners, real estate developers, or others who seek public approval for proposed projects, such as those needing a permit, a variance, municipal approvals, or licenses. Persons who oppose the project by means of public petition and participation have been known to be sued for doing so, upon a variety of legal theories such as defamation, prima facie tort, and tortious interference with contractual relations, i.e., the SLAPP suit. The public policy concern is that SLAPP suits could potentially be designed and initiated to stifle public opposition to what is proposed, which is contrary to the importance society places upon the right to free-expression. The legislature, seeking to protect the public's right to petition and participation, had enacted in 1992 subdivision (g) to CPLR 3211, which is specific to SLAPP suits (L.1992, ch. 767, sec. 4). By that amendment, defendants may move for the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint, cross-claim, or counterclaim by merely establishing that the claim qualifies as a SLAPP suit as defined by Civil Rights Law 76-a(1)(a). Such a dismissal motion "shall be granted" unless the opposing party demonstrates that the cause of action has a substantial basis in law or is supported by a substantial argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law (CPLR 3211[g]). Clearly, the statute is written to make it difficult, though still possible in creditable cases, for plaintiffs to litigate

SLAPP suits beyond the pleading stage. But gone for SLAPP suits is the concept embodied by CPLR 3026, applicable to other actions generally, that pleadings be "liberally construed."

CPLR 3211(g) was amended effective November 10, 2020. The amendments break CPLR 3211(g) into four subdivisions, with the new material contained in CPLR 3211(g)(2) through (4).

CPLR 3211(g)(2) states that the court shall examine the pleadings and the supporting and opposing affidavits of the parties in determining subdivision (g) dismissal motions. While that language might appear at first glance to add little to our jurisprudence, the only other statute that has specifically addressed attaching a copy of the pleadings to the moving papers, until now, was CPLR 3212(b) for summary judgment. CPLR 3211(g)(2) further states that the fact a determination was made on the motion, and the content of the determination itself, is not admissible later in the action, or in any subsequent action. In other words, the CPLR 3211(g) determination is "evidence" of nothing. The legislature also clarifies in subdivision (g)(2), as if to underscore the foregoing point, that the motion determination does not affect the burden of proof in the continuing action or in any subsequent action. That latter directive is well-taken, as CPLR 3211(g) reverses the burden of proof that normally lies with the moving party, to the party opposing dismissal, requiring the proponent of the SLAPP claim to establish its "substantial" legal basis in order to survive the claim's dismissal. As the recent amendment to CPLR 3211(g)(2) makes clear, that altered burden of proof does not carry beyond the dismissal motion itself and its determination.

CPLR 3211(g)(3) directs that once a dismissal motion is made in a SLAPP case, all discovery, hearings, or other motions are stayed, pending determination of the dismissal motion. Typically, since CPLR 3211 dismissal motions are made early in a litigation and in lieu of an answer, actions will not have progressed to discovery, hearings, or motions in any event. The amendment to (g)(3) removes all doubt, and under all relevant circumstances including those where, for whatever reason, a dismissal motion is made later in a litigation. Wisely, the state legislature realized that there may be occasions where the party opposing dismissal needs some measure of discovery in order to present facts essential to justify its opposition. After all, the burden of proof has effectively been flipped to the SLAPP party, and it would be unjust to expect a party with that burden to be simultaneously prohibited from obtaining any discovery that might be reasonably necessary for opposing the dismissal motion. Subdivision (g)(3) therefore provides a Solomonic solution, permitting the court, upon receipt of a motion made on notice, to order specified discovery limited to the issues raised by the motion to dismiss. While the statute does not expressly say so, it impliedly requires that under such circumstances, the court will hold the CPLR 3211(g) dismissal motion in abeyance pending the parties' conduct of the specified discovery. In that regard, the treatment is similar to that expressly permitted for summary judgment motions in CPLR 3212(d), where, inter alia, considerations of summary judgment may be subject to a "continuance" to permit discovery of facts essential to justify opposition to the motion.

CPLR 3211(g)(4) has been added to the statute to prevent any ambiguity from arising over what is subject to the overall provisions of subdivision (g); namely, it applies to complaints, cross-complaints, petitions, plaintiffs, cross-complainants, petitioners, defendants, cross-defendants, and respondents.

C3211:70 Greater Scrutiny of Complaint Where Defendant is Design Professional

CPLR 3211(h) is not seen very often, as the number of actions that might implicate it are limited. When an appellate division addresses subdivision (h) of CPLR 3211, it is worth noting.

Subdivision (h) was enacted in 1996 as a special aid to licensed architects, engineers, land surveyors or landscape architects who are sued in the courts of the state. To understand the statute, one must first read CPLR 214-d. CPLR 214-d(1) provides that when a person seeks damages for personal injuries, wrongful death, or injury to property against a licensed architect, engineer, land surveyor or landscape architect or their business entities, based upon the acts or omissions of their professional performance more than 10 years before the claim, such defendant is entitled to a written notice of claim. The notice of claim is to be served at least 90 days before the commencement of the action, including a description of the performance, the acts or omissions complained of on information and belief, and shall include a request for general and special damages. A copy of the notice of claim and proof of its service is to be filed with the court within 30 days from the commencement of the action to which they apply. Compliance with the procedural requirements of CPLR 214-d is a condition precedent to any lawsuit against the licensed architects, engineers, land surveyors, and landscape architects. In fact, compliance with the condition precedent must be affirmatively pleaded in the complaint and proven when CPLR 214-d is applicable (Kretschmann v Board of Educ. of Corning Painted Post School Dist., 294 A.D.2d 39, 744 N.Y.S.2d 106 [4th Dep't. 2002]; Dorst v Eggers Partnership, 265 A.D.2d 294, 696 N.Y.S.2d 478 [2nd Dep't. 2002]).

That all said, CPLR 3211(h) provides that for actions subject to CPLR 214-d(1), the moving defendant's CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss, brought under (a)(7) of the statute, "shall be granted unless the party responding to the motion demonstrates that a substantial basis in law exists to believe that the performance, conduct, or omission was a proximate cause" of the damages claimed "or is supported by a substantial argument for an extension, modification, or reversal of existing law." In essence, CPLR 3211(h) flips the burden of proof, which is normally on the movant, to the party opposing the motion to establish proximate cause between the negligent acts or omissions on the one hand and the personal injury, wrongful death, or property damage claimed on the other, or to articulate early in the litigation a "substantial" argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law. The statute's treatment of the dismissal motion is similar to the changed burden imposed by CPLR 3211(g) for dismissal motions in SLAPP suits. The statute does not affect any statute of limitations. CPLR 3211(h) must be viewed in tandem with CPLR 3211(g), which accomplishes the same inversion of the burden of proof for dismissal motions in SLAPP suits, and CPLR 3212(i), which likewise inverts the burden of proof for qualifying actions involving licensed architects, engineers, land surveyors, and landscape architects in the context of summary judgment.

In addition to the various protections afforded to the qualifying professionals and entities named in CPLR 214-d and CPLR 3211(h), the latter statute confers upon those professionals the additional benefit that their dismissal motions shall be given a preference. These protections, collectively, reflect a public policy goal of the state legislature that for acts or omissions of qualifying professionals from more than 10 years before, only the most credible of those actions be permitted to survive beyond the stage of a motion to dismiss in lieu of an answer.

The operation of CPLR 3211(h) is seen in Golby v N & P Engrs. & Land Surveyor, PLLC, 185 A.D.3d 792, 128 N.Y.S.3d 34 (2nd Dep't. 2020). Golby is a tragic case. The plaintiff's decedent, who was in a wheelchair, rolled off a pier into the water and died the next day as a result of the occurrence. A defendant had been an engineer involved in the design of pier renovations performed in the mid-1990s. The plaintiff alleged that the pier was defectively designed in the area where boats were not moored, by not placing protective pedestrian railings there. The defendant moved to dismiss the action in lieu of an answer, and the Supreme Court and Second Department applied the heightened standard of CPLR 3211(h). In opposition to the dismissal motion, the plaintiff presented a transcript of the defendant's representative, which was taken as part of pre-action discovery, that railings are used on pedestrian piers to prevent persons from falling into the water. The Second Department, affirming the Supreme Court, found that under the heightened evidentiary standard, the plaintiff raised a material question of fact proximately linking the defendant's failure to recommend use of a pedestrian railing to the decedent's injuries and death.

The official texts of CPLR 3211(h) and 3212(i) each contain a typographical error. The statutes incorporate by reference, in long form, CPLR 214(1). In fact, the legislature intended to incorporate CPLR 214-d(1), which is the only way that CPLR 3211(h) and 3212(i) make any sense. CPLR 214(1) involves the statute of limitations in actions brought against sheriffs, constables, or other officers for the non-payment of money collected upon an execution and has nothing to do with the actual subject matter here.

2020

C3211:5 Grounds for Dismissal

The dismissal of actions under CPLR 3211 may occur when there is a specified ground for doing so under one of the enumerated grounds of subdivision (a)(1) through (11) of the statute. CPLR 3211 does not include a "catch-all" provision for the dismissal of actions for non-enumerated grounds. While complaints may be stricken or dismissed for other reasons set forth in the CPLR, such as the dismissal of complaints for willful and contumacious discovery non-compliance under CPLR 3126 or summary judgment under CPLR 3212, the grounds for dismissal under CPLR 3211 are exclusive and restricted. The point is illustrated by whether an action may be dismissed by a plaintiff's non-compliance with the Certificate of Merit requirement of CPLR 3012-a applicable to medical, dental, and podiatric malpractice actions.

For actions sounding in medical, dental, or podiatric malpractice, complaints shall be accompanied by a certificate executed by the plaintiff's attorney declaring that the attorney has reviewed the facts of the case and has consulted with at least one licensed physician, dentist, or podiatrist who the attorney believes to be knowledgeable about the relevant issues of the action, and that as a result of such review and consultation, the attorney has concluded that the action has a reasonable basis. The purpose of the requirement is to discourage frivolous litigations that raise the insurance premiums charged to physicians and thereby help control health care costs within the state. While there are certain exceptions to when the certificate of merit be filed such as those based upon time constraints, the unavailability of medical or hospital records, the plaintiff's reliance solely upon a theory of res ipsa loquitor, and actions commenced by plaintiffs pro se (CPLR 3012-a[2], [3]), the bulk of medical malpractice actions require the filing of certificate and the bar honors the statutory requirement for it.

What if the plaintiff's attorney in a medical malpractice action erroneously believes that the action does not require a certificate of merit and does not file one? What are the remedies of the statute if there is a failure of compliance? Notably, CPLR 3012-a does not contain any language whatsoever about how courts are to deal with non-compliance.

These issues were extensively discussed in Rabinovich v. Maimonides Medical Center, 179 A.D.3d 88, 113 N.Y.S.3d 198 (2d Dep't. 2019) (opinion by Dillon, J.). The first of two primary issues in the case was whether the plaintiff's action raised issues of medical malpractice, which would require a certificate of merit, or ordinary negligence, which would not. The plaintiff claimed damages for personal injuries sustained as a result of the negligent performance of a blood draw at a blood donation center in Brooklyn, resulting in the plaintiff experiencing an adverse reaction, the loss of consciousness, and a fall down. The defendant moved to dismiss the action for non-compliance with CPLR 3012-a. In opposition, the plaintiff argued that the gravamen of the action was ordinary negligence as the plaintiff's blood had not been drawn by a physician, but by a phlebotomist. On that issue, the appellate opinion surveyed decisional authorities that addressed the dividing line between medical malpractice and ordinary negligence, noting that the former exists when the task performed by the professional bears a substantial relationship to the rendition of medical treatment. In Rabinovich, the plaintiff's complaint and bill of particulars described the defendant's negligence in detailed medical terms, including failing to screen for health problems, failing to monitor the plaintiff's physical conditions and hemoglobin levels, and failing to keep the plaintiff at the donation site for a proper interval of observation. The court concluded that these allegations involved medical judgments beyond the knowledge of ordinary persons that style the action as one for medical malpractice. Indeed, the court noted that actions have been recognized as involving medical malpractice against non-physicians including phlebotomists, nurses, emergency medical technicians, and x-ray technicians. A CPLR 3012-a certificate of merit was therefore required of plaintiff's counsel given the particular nature of the case.

Remedially, the Rabinovich opinion noted that CPLR 3012-a does not contain any language for non-compliance with the statute. There was no reason in Rabinovich for the court to believe that the failure to provide a certificate of merit was motivated by anything other than a good faith but erroneous assessment by plaintiff's counsel that none was required. The Second Department therefore declined to dismiss the action, and instead provided the plaintiff's attorney with a 60-day window to comply with CPLR 3012-a measured from service upon him of a copy of the appellate order.

CPLR 3012-a performs a ministerial function of reducing the commencement of medical malpractice actions that lack sufficient merit. The statute does not regard the ultimate substantive merits of actions, and hence, non-compliance with the statute does not implicate the dismissal provisions of CPLR 3211 or the summary judgment provisions of CPLR 3212. Rabinovich should not be read to suggest that courts are without authority to enforce CPLR 3012-a. Non-compliance should be dealt with in the first instance ministerially, or by court order, and failing that, perhaps with monetary sanctions against the recalcitrant attorney under 22 N.Y.C.R.R. 130-1.1.

C3211:8 Sua Sponte Dismissals

Trial judges continue, from time to time, dismissing plaintiffs' complaints on sua sponte grounds. The occasional practice continues despite the fact that there has been a long and consistent line of cases, developed over many years, routinely reversing trial judges who do so. The reason that a court's sua sponte dismissal is problematic is that a dismissal, which is dispositive, is ordered without the plaintiff being given the due process of notice and an opportunity to be heard. Sua sponte dismissal, however many or few there are in a given year, typically occur when a defendant moves to dismiss a plaintiff's complaint under CPLR 3211 under stated grounds, which the plaintiff may or may not oppose. The court, unable or unwilling to grant dismissal on a noticed ground, then does so on another ground not raised in the moving papers.

The law governing these circumstances is clear: a court's power to dismiss a complaint sua sponte is to be used sparingly and only when extraordinary circumstances exist to warrant dismissal (Deutsche Bank National Trust Company v Winslow, 180 A.D.3d 1000, 120 N.Y.S.3d 81 [2d Dep't. 2020]). Extraordinary circumstances virtually never exist. Reversals of sua sponte dismissals include where the court's dismissal is for the plaintiff's lack of prosecution despite having made a motion for an order of reference (Deutsche Bank National Trust Company v Winslow, 180 A.D.3d at 1002), the plaintiff's failure to comply with foreclosure-related administrative orders (J.P. Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. v Laszlo, 169 A.D.3d 885, 94 N.Y.S.3d 343 [2d Dep't. 2019]; LaSalle Bank National Association v Lopez, 168 A.D.3d 697, 91 N.Y.S.3d 259 [2d Dep't. 2019]), the alleged failure of the plaintiff to comply with RPAPL 1303 (HSBC Bank USA, N.A. v Lopez, 178 A.D.3d 679, 111 N.Y.S.3d 223 [2d Dept. 2019]), and the plaintiff's alleged lack of standing (Consumer Solutions, LLC v Charles, 137 A.D.3d 952, 27 N.Y.S.3d 216 [2d Dep't. 2016]). The reader may note that improper sua sponte dismissals arise almost exclusively in the Second Department, and within that department almost exclusively in the realm of residential mortgage foreclosure actions, which have in recent years become a significant portion of civil actions filed in certain counties of New York City and its suburbs, and on appeal.

Practitioners may, if they be so advised, move to reargue sua sponte dismissals that arise from noticed motions, or appeal them to an appellate court, as the odds of reversing the determination, particularly on appeal, are statistically very, very good.

C3211:10 Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence"

The Practice Commentaries for 2020 noted that while e-mails are not generally material that qualifies as "documentary evidence" for CPLR 3211(a)(1) purposes, decisional authorities were increasingly recognizing circumstances where e-mails can qualify under the statute for potential dismissals. As noted then, e-mails may be properly considered by courts determining CPLR 3211(a)(1) motions when the e-mails themselves are central to a party's cause of action, such as whether statements in an e-mail are a non-defamatory opinion as a matter of law (International Pub. Concepts, LLC v Locatelli, 46 Misc.3d 1213[A], 9 N.Y.S.3d 593 [Sup. Ct., New York County 2015]), or where e-mails establish the absence of a gross disregard of the truth in defense of a defamation action (Stone v Bloomberg, L.P., 163 A.D.3d 1028, 83 N.Y.S.3d 78 [2d Dept. 2018]), or when an e-mail chain between parties may or may not establish a meeting of the minds between parties about the material terms of an alleged extended contact (Kolchins v Evolution Markets, Inc. 31 N.Y.3d 100, 73 N.Y.S.3d 519, 96 N.E.3d 784 [2018]).

Since publication of the last Practice Commentaries, further decisional authority has been rendered suggestive of a continuing and growing flexibility by courts to consider e-mail as a proper basis for potential CPLR 3211(a)(1) dismissals. In an action involving legal malpractice, the First Department considered the content of e-mails exchanged between the plaintiff/clients and the defendant/attorneys, and other materials, in determining that the clients understood the terms of business transactions they had entered into, as well as alternative options. The e-mails were found by the Supreme Court, New York County, and by the First Department, as conclusively establishing the absence of legal malpractice by the attorneys as a matter of law (Binn v Muchnick, Golieb & Golieb, P.C., 180 A.D.3d 598, 121 N.Y.S.3d 13 [1st Dep't. 2020]).

In Flink v Smith, 66 Misc.3d 1229[A], 125 N.Y.S.3d 529 (Sup. Ct., Albany County 2020), the court likewise held that e-mails exchanged between parties in a breach of contract action were properly admissible in deciding a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion, on the ground that the e-mails were "unambiguous and of uncontested authenticity." Notably, the court's reliance upon an "unambiguous and of uncontested authenticity" standard was derived from the First Department's determination in Kolchins v Evolution Markets, Inc., 128 A.D.3d 47, 8 N.Y.S.3d 1 (1st Dep't. 2015) which, as the reader knows, was later affirmed in 2018 by the Court of Appeals. Yet, in Flink, the e-mails that were proffered by the moving party, once considered by the court, were found to insufficiently set forth a basis for the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint under CPLR 3211(a)(1).

The legal standard that e-mails be unambiguous and authentic, to be considered by courts in deciding whether to grant CPLR 3211(a)(1) motions, appears to be a reasonable, responsible, and prudent evidentiary standard. The Second Department employed the same concept, using very similar language in S & J Service Center, Inc. v Commerce Commercial Group Inc., 178 A.D.3d 977, 112 N.Y.S.3d 584 (2d Dep't. 2019). In that breach of contract matter, the Second Department determined that e-mails proffered by the defendant in support of a CPLR 3211(a)(1) dismissal did not qualify as documentary evidence, as the e-mails "were not essentially undeniable." The Second Department recognized a general legal standard that qualifying e-mails be "unambiguous, authentic, and undeniable" (S & J Service Center, Inc. v Commerce Commercial Group Inc., 178 A.D.3d at 978, citing Grenada Condominium III Ass'n v Palomino, 78 A.D.3d 996, 913 N.Y.S.2d 668 [2d Dep't. 2010]. See also, Seaman v Schulte, Roth & Zabel LLP, 176 A.D.3d 538, 111 N.Y.S.3d 266 [1st Dep't. 2019]).

What this developing case law should tell practitioners is that counsel preparing dismissal motions should not only provide e-mails that help establish the grounds for the motion, but also address the lack of ambiguity, authenticity, and undeniability of the e-mails themselves, so that they may be considered on their merits. Conversely, for plaintiff attorneys opposing CPLR 3211(a)(1) dismissal motions, the argument should be made, where appropriate, that the proffered e-mails are ambiguous, or arguably inauthentic, or deniable. Less clear, for now, is whether the same legal standards will be applied to alleged communications made on more casual forms of social media such as Twitter and Instagram, but expect case law to develop as to those platforms in the years ahead.

C3211:11 Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction

The Supreme Court, which is a court of general and unlimited jurisdiction, is not, in fact, unlimited. Matters that are exclusive to the state Court of Claims, or to the federal courts, are the categories of matters that should not be brought in the Supreme Court.

Recent examples of cases involving the absence of subject matter jurisdiction include those where a cause of action is pre-empted by federal law (Klingsberg v Council of School Supervisors and Administrators-Local 1, 181 A.D.3d 949, 122 N.Y.S.3d 335 [2d Dep't. 2020]), non-judiciable internal church disputes based on religious rather than secular principles (Eltingville Lutheran Church v Rimbo, 174 A.D.3d 856, 108 N.Y.S.3d 39 [2d Dep't. 2019]), the absence of a timely notice of claim as required for actions in the state Court of Claims (Jones v State, 171 A.D.3d 1362, 98 N.Y.S.3d 366 [3d Dep't. 2019]), and the failure by the plaintiff to exhaust administrative remedies (City of New York Human Resources Administration v Hewitt, 120 N.Y.S.3d 571 [App. Term, New York 2020]; IKON Business Group, Inc. v Police Athletic League, Inc., 65 Misc.3d 1226[A], 119 N.Y.S.3d 700 [Sup. Ct. New York County 2019]).

C3211:12 Plaintiff's Lack of Capacity

As noted in the 2020 Practice Commentaries and other legal literature, the language of CPLR 3211(a)(3), which authorizes the dismissal of actions for plaintiffs' lack of capacity, has been interpreted as also applying to plaintiffs' lack of standing even though the term "standing" is absent from the statute itself. New York State's legislature enacted a significant amendment to the Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law (RPAPL) regarding the defense of standing, effective December 23, 2019. The amendment at issue here, RPAPL 1302-a (2019 NY Sess. Laws, c. 739, sec. 1), involves only residential mortgage foreclosure actions involving defaulted home loans.

Until December 23, 2019, standing in residential mortgage foreclosure actions was a defense waived by the defendant homeowner if not asserted as a basis for dismissal in either a pre-answer motion to dismiss or as an affirmative defense in the defendant's answer. This principal was concretized in Wells Fargo Bank Minn., N.A. v Mastropaolo, 42 A.D.3d 239, 837 N.Y.S.3d 247 (2d Dept. 2007), and followed by courts in countless foreclosure actions in the years that followed.

However, RPAPL 1302-a has nullified a significant body of case law that had, until now, been recognized throughout the State on New York on the issue of standing. The amendment adds to the RPAPL an entirely new section, 1302-a (2019 NY Sess. Laws, c. 739, sec. 1). The new RPAPL 1302-a provides that in qualifying foreclosure actions, a defendant's failure to raise standing as a defense in a responsive pleading or motion to dismiss does not constitute a waiver.

The purpose of the law is to help assure that standing issues be resolved on their merits, so that only lenders who own a loan by direct lending, purchase, or assignment are permitted to collect upon the mortgaged debt (NY Sponsor's Memorandum, 2019 S.B. 5160 [April 14, 2019]).

The statutory enactment that the standing defense is not waived was placed by the state legislature specifically in the RPAPL, and not in the CPLR that governs all actions generally. RPAPL 1302-a is expressly limited to residential mortgage foreclosure actions. The amendment therefore creates an odd legal dichotomy, that the failure to raise standing as an affirmative defense does constitute a waiver in qualifying residential mortgage foreclosure actions, but the same defense continues to be waived in all other litigations outside the scope of RPAPL 1302-a. The procedural rules of standing will therefore vary from now on, depending on the nature of the litigation at issue.

If a foreclosure defendant files a motion to dismiss on grounds other than standing, and is unsuccessful, a logical construction of the new statute is that the defendant may then include standing as an affirmative defense in the answer that follows. This is true because the language of RPAPL 1302-a is notwithstanding any of the provisions of CPLR 3211(e).

RPAPL 1302-a does not apply to all mortgage foreclosure actions, but only those involving a "home loan" as that term is defined by RPAPL 1304(6). Commercial and other secured loans are outside the scope of the statute's standing-related protections. The incumbent version of RPAPL 1304(6) was scheduled to sunset on January 14, 2020, and a newer definition of "home loan" was to become effective from January 14, 2020, forward. However, the new definition that was scheduled to take effect was itself repealed (L. 2019, c. 55, part VV), as a result of which the incumbent definition contained within RPAPL 1304(6) remains in effect.

RPAPL 1304(6)(a)(1) and (2) define home loans as those involving natural persons in family dwellings and condominiums within the state, occupied or intended to be occupied by the borrower(s) in whole or in part as a personal residence, inclusive of reverse mortgages. Actions involving any other forms of loans are outside the scope of the new standing-related homeowner protection afforded by RPAPL 1302-a.

RPAPL 1302-a became effective on the date it was signed, which was December 23, 2019. It applies not only to residential foreclosure actions that will be filed in the future, but also to actions already pending in the courts as of its effective date.

Limiting language in the newly-enacted RPAPL 1302-a provides that the standing defense is waived if the action has already resulted in a foreclosure sale, except when the judgment was rendered on the default of the defendant. Defendants who have lost their cases on the merits, after a full and fair opportunity to be heard, may not seek to now litigate standing for the first time, if a judgment of foreclosure and sale has already been rendered. The provision of RPAPL 1302-a allowing for standing to be raised and contested by defaulted homeowners, even after a foreclosure judgment has been rendered and the property has been sold, might prove the law of unintended consequences. The obvious purpose of the provision is to assist homeowners, but as noted by Melissa Clement in the March 2020 issue of the Albany Bar Association's Bar News, potential buyers may be less inclined to purchase real property at foreclosure sales if there is uncertainty over whether the sale might be set aside in the future for the bank's lack of previously-unlitigated standing. Such uncertainty may have the effect of depressing foreclosure sale prices, generate fewer funds for homeowners to apply toward deficiency judgments, and dissuade lenders from financing the purchase of distressed properties (Clement, Melissa, "The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly: RPAPL 1302-a and Residential Foreclosure Proceedings" 25, Bar News [March 2020]). In other words, the portion of the new statute that allows for a standing defense to be raised after the property has been foreclosed upon may cause unintended harm to the homeowners that the law is intended to protect.

While the issue of a plaintiff's lack of capacity is often presented to courts in the context of whether the individual is subject to a disqualifying disability such as infancy or mental illness, capacity may also be an issue as to the plaintiff's corporate form and legal ability to bring an action in a New York forum. The latter was an issue in Montvale Surgical Center, LLC v State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 66 Misc.3d 1215[A], 120 N.Y.S.3d 720 (Dist. Ct. Suffolk County 2020). The plaintiff assignee in Montvale Surgical Center was a New Jersey limited liability company that commenced an action to recover No Fault benefits paid for medical and surgical services provided to the assignor. The defendant No Fault insurer sought to dismiss the action on the ground of lack of capacity to sue, as the plaintiff had never registered with the New York Department of State to authorize its conduct of business in New York pursuant to BCL 1312(a). Indeed, there was no question between the parties that the plaintiff was a New Jersey entity with no BCL registration at the Department of State. The District Court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss, finding that under the circumstances of the action, the plaintiff's litigation efforts in New York were incidental to its business, rather than systematic, as a result of which no BCL registration was required of it. In the alternative, the court also noted that the absence of a registration with the Department of State, if required, was not a jurisdictional defect, but a curable one at any time prior to the resolution of the action (Montvale Surgical Center, LLC v State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 66 Misc.3d 1215[A], at *3).

Capacity may also involve the legal authorization of an administrator to bring an action on behalf of an estate, as in Rodriguez v River Valley Care Center, Inc., 175 A.D.3d 432, 108 N.Y.S.3d 126 (1st Dep't. 2019). Rodriguez involved causes of action for damages arising from alleged medical malpractice, and for wrongful death. The first of two actions was commenced by the named plaintiff as a "proposed administrator," which was dismissed for lack of capacity since no letters of administration had been issued. Facing a ticking clock on certain statutes of limitations, the same named plaintiff commenced a second action as the estate's "voluntary administrator," again without the benefit of letters of administration at the time of commencement, and the defendants once again moved to dismiss the action for lack of capacity. However, while the dismissal motion was pending in the second action, the Surrogate's Court issued the plaintiff his long-awaited letters of administration, on a date that was within six months from the dismissal of the first action. The First Department, reviewing the matter on appeal, held that while the plaintiff lacked capacity when commencing his actions, the defect was cured by his ultimate receipt of letters of administration and by timely application of the six-month savings provision of CPLR 205(a).

Capacity, and more precisely standing, also arises in the context of cases where a plaintiff has filed for the protection of a bankruptcy court. Upon the filing of a Chapter 7 or 11 bankruptcy petition, all property that the debtor owns, including the civil cause of action, vests in the bankruptcy estate (11 U.S.C. 541[a][1]; Keegan v Moriarty-Morris, 153 A.D.3d 683, 59 N.Y.S.3d 779 [2d Dep't. 2017]). The plaintiff's cause of action becomes an asset of the bankruptcy court which is to be disclosed as such on the appropriate bankruptcy schedules. The failure to disclose the cause of action on the bankruptcy schedule of assets deprives the plaintiff of the legal capacity to sue on the claim (Keegan v Moriarty-Morris, 153 A.D.3d at 684). Upon filing for bankruptcy and the disclosure of the cause of action as a bankruptcy asset, the party that has standing to prosecute the civil action is not the plaintiff who was allegedly caused damages, but the appointed bankruptcy trustee, and the commencement of an action by the plaintiff-debtor can be dismissed under CPLR 3211 (Burbacki v Abrams, Fensterman, Fensterman, Eisman, Formato, Ferrara, & Wolf, LLP, 172 A.D.3d 1300, 99 N.Y.S.3d 671 [2d Dep't. 2019]).

An action commenced by a plaintiff in bankruptcy will typically be dismissed for the absence of standing, whether the cause of action is disclosed on the bankruptcy schedule of assets or not. Since standing and capacity-related dismissals are not on the merits, the bankruptcy trustee may commence a new civil action for the debtor so long as the statute of limitations has not expired in the meantime. However, plaintiffs and their trustees have the benefit of the six-month grace provision of CPLR 205(a), and the timeliness of a second action will not be a problem so long as the trustee commences it within the six-month window measured from service of the order dismissing the first action (Goodman v Skanska USA Civil, Inc., 169 A.D.3d 1010, 95 N.Y.S.3d 243 [2d Dep't. 2019]) with notice of its entry.

C3211:15 Same Parties, Same Causes of Action

CPLR 3211(a)(4) permits the dismissal of a plaintiff's complaint if there is already another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action in New York, or another state, or in a federal court. The dismissal of an action is a discretionary determination of the trial court, addressed in connection with the "second" of the two actions or proceedings.

The statute is most frequently applied when the same party is the plaintiff in two separate actions. But there are variations to that general concept. A dismissal for "prior action pending" may be obtained to dismiss a defendant's counterclaim in an action, if the counterclaiming defendant has asserted in an already-pending action a cause of action for the same relief based on the same facts between the same parties (744 E. 215 LLC v Simmonds, 65 Misc.3d 1234[A], 119 N.Y.S.3d 828 [Civ. Ct. City of New York 2019]).

C3211:18 Affirmative Defenses Available on Subdivision (a) Motion

CPLR 3211(a)(5) contains a veritable grab bag of grounds on which defendants may move to dismiss complaints.

Infancy of Other Disability of the Moving Party

The infancy or other disability of a defendant is a basis for seeking dismissal of a plaintiff's complaint under CPLR 3211(a)(5), but mere proof of a minor's age or of other disability is not necessarily enough for the defendant to actually win the motion. More is required per the holding in US Bank National Association for Deutsche Bank, Alt-A Securities Mortgage Loan Trust Series 2007-2 v McGown, 60 Misc.3d 808, 80 N.Y.S.3d 643 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 2018). In that action, the plaintiff's predecessor in interest had loaned money in 2007 to the defendant, James McGown (McGown) in exchange for an $816,000 promissory note and mortgage upon the property. Later that year, McGown transferred title to the property to his minor child, A.M., pursuant to the Uniform Transfer to Minors Act (UTMA). The deed and recording documents did not reveal the relationship between McGown and A.M., the UTMA, or that A.M. was a minor. Upon the loan's default, the plaintiff commenced an action against McGown and A.M., and process was served upon both at their home by means of suitable age and discretion method of CPLR 308(2). No answer was served and an order of reference was granted. A.M., by her mother and natural guardian, moved to vacate the default and dismiss the action on the ground that A.M. was a minor under the age of 14. Although a birth certificate evidenced A.M.'s age, the Supreme Court denied dismissal of the action. The court held that for the plaintiff to be subject to the special service provisions for minors set forth in CPLR 309, the plaintiff must have actual or constructive notice that the party to be served is, in fact, a minor. The Supreme Court further held that the defendant, as moving party, bore the initial burden of proving actual constructive notice that A.M. was a minor, which was not accomplished where the deed transfer made no mention of A.M.'s age, did not mention the UTMA, and where service was effected upon an adult of suitable age and discretion. The court noted that under the UTMA, McGown was required to identify A.M. as a minor, and that his failure to do so secreted A.M.'s age from the bank.

Release

As a general rule, the existence of a valid release constitutes a complete bar to an action on a claim that is the subject of the release (Centro Empresarial Cempresa S.A. v America Movil, S.A.B. de C.V., 17 N.Y.3d 269, 929 N.Y.S.2d 3, 952 N.E.2d 995 [2011]). A release is a contract and its construction is governed by contract law. When a defendant moving to dismiss an action under CPLR 3211(a)(5) produces a copy of a signed release from the plaintiff's claim, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show, under well-established contract principles, that the release was a product of fraud, coercion, duress, mutual mistake, or other conduct sufficient to void it (Cames v Craig, 181 A.D.3d 851, 119 N.Y.S.3d 888 [2d Dep't. 2020]). A plaintiff's failure to controvert a facially valid and relevant release will result in the dismissal of the cause of action.

Statute of Limitations

The determination of motions to dismiss for alleged untimeliness under CPLR 3211(a)(5) is similar to the procedures used for determining summary judgment motions for alleged untimeliness under CPLR 3212. The party moving for a CPLR 3211(a)(5) dismissal has the initial burden of establishing prima facie that the plaintiff's time to sue had expired (Horowitz v Foster, 180 A.D.3d 783, 120 N.Y.S.3d 49 [2d Dep't. 2020]). Such proof can be typically established by reference to the date of accrual typically ascertainable from the plaintiff's complaint, the date of commencement ascertainable from the filing date reflected on the summons or in the e-filing system, and a mathematical overlay of the controlling statute of limitations. If the moving defendant fails to meet the prima facie burden of proof, the dismissal motion will be denied (Horowitz v Foster, 180 A.D.3d at 784), at least as to its statute of limitations grounds. Where a complaint alleges more than one cause of action, the defendant should take care to apply the same exercise to each separate cause of action within the scope of the motion, as different causes of action may have different dates of accrual or be subject to different limitations periods. If the moving defendant meets the prima facie burden of proof, the plaintiff then undertakes the burden of raising a question of fact that the action is timely, such as by there being a later date of accrual, the existence of a limitations toll or extension, or a revival of a limitations period (e.g., U.S. Bank National Association v Vitolo, 182 A.D.3d 627, 120 N.Y.S.3d 791 [2d Dep't. 2020]; Mello v Long Island Vitreo-Retinal Consultant, P.C., 172 A.D.3d 849, 99 N.Y.S.3d 414 [2d Dep't. 2019]).

Statute of Frauds

One of the CPLR 3211(a)(5) grounds for dismissal is that the plaintiff's cause of action may not be maintained on account of the statute of frauds. The determination of these motions may sometime depend on which statute of frauds provision in the General Obligations Law is controlling of the action. This parsing of the statute of frauds was recently seen in Korman v Corbett, 183 A.D.3d 608, 123 N.Y.S.3d 192 (2d Dep't. 2020). The plaintiff sought specific performance of an alleged oral agreement with a decedent, where the plaintiff cared for the decedent prior to her death in exchange for the plaintiff being given an option to buy the residence from her estate for $1.2 million. The decedent's estate moved to dismiss certain causes of action under CPLR 3211(a)(5) on the ground that the alleged agreement, which was never memorialized in writing, was unenforceable under the statute of frauds. At issue at the trial level, and on appeal, was whether the causes of action were governed by G.O.L. 5-701, which requires agreements involving the purchase of real property be in writing and contains no language authorizing courts to grant specific performance, and G.O.L. 5-703, which more specifically enables courts to award specific performance of real property agreements where there is evidence of partial performance. As between the two statutes, the Appellate Division held that G.O.L. 5-703 was the statute more specific to the plaintiff's factual and legal claims, and on that basis, held that the dismissal of the relevant causes of action was not appropriate.

C3211:28 Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

Last year's Practice Commentary for CPLR 3211(a)(8) reviewed the significant legal developments arising from the U.S. Supreme Court's decision on general jurisdiction in Daimler AG v Bauman, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S. Ct. 746 (2014). The Supreme Court clarified the law on general jurisdiction, by requiring that corporations be "at home" in a state to be subject to its general jurisdiction and be sued for any claim there. A corporation is "at home" in a state where 1) it is incorporated, or 2) maintains its principal place of business, or 3) in truly exceptional circumstances, where the corporation's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home in the state. Daimler does not affect the states' exercise of specific jurisdiction, such as longarm jurisdiction recognized in New York under CPLR 302. While Daimler does not extend general jurisdiction liability between parent corporations and subsidiaries under an "agency" theory, which the Supreme Court directly addressed, it left unresolved the question of whether general jurisdiction can be extended between a parent corporation and a subsidiary under the parallel "alter ego" theory, which was not addressed. Last year's Practice Commentary predicted that future federal and state cases will be needed to definitively address whether general jurisdiction may be asserted between corporate parents and subsidiaries on an "alter ego" basis, and to flesh out the true meaning of Daimler's third basis for the assertion of general jurisdiction regarding truly exceptional cases where a corporation's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the entity "at home" in the state.

New York's general jurisdiction statute is CPLR 301. Decisions are slowly trickling in on issues related to that statute post-Daimler.

In one reported decision, a complaint was dismissed under CPLR 3211(a)(8) where a corporate president established in an affidavit that the defendant principal office was in New Jersey rather than New York, thereby depriving the plaintiff of general jurisdiction (Robins v Procure Treatment Centers, Inc., 179 A.D.3d 412, 116 N.Y.S.3d 35 [1st Dep't. 2020]).

On the issue of whether an "alter ego" relationship between a corporate parent and subsidiary permits the assertion of general jurisdiction, where a party is not incorporated in the state and does not maintain a principal office here, an early canary in a coal mine may be RP Business Marketing, Inc. v Timlin Industries, Inc., 67 Misc.3d 1205(A), 2020 WL 1856604 (Sup. Ct. New York County 2020) (Barrok, J.). The defendant, Timlin Industries, Inc. (Timlin), was in the telemarketing business and was sued by RP Business Marketing, Inc. (RPB) for allegedly breaching the exclusivity provisions of an agreement and by the improper sharing of proprietary information. Contractually, RPB and Timlin had agreed that any disputes between them would be governed by the law of the state of New York, and that any litigation between them would be venued in a state or federal court within New York. The party that Timlin allegedly worked with in breach of the contractual exclusivity provision was SM Consulting, LLC (SMC), which was also named as a defendant in the action, but which was not incorporated in New York and did not maintain its principal office within the state. SMC moved to dismiss the plaintiff's action against it on the ground that it was not subject to the general jurisdiction of the New York courts. The court focused on evidence about whether SMC was so dominated and controlled by Timlin as to be an alter ego or Timlin. Although the court held that SMC was subject to New York's longarm jurisdiction under CPLR 302, which rendered questions of general jurisdiction academic, it alternatively held that SMC was also subject to the general jurisdiction of New York courts as an alter ego of Timlin. Traditionally, New York has recognized a principal's domination and control over a subsidiary as an "alter ego" basis for the assertion of general jurisdiction. New York has avoided the nomenclature of "alter ego" in favor of what it instead calls the "department test" focused on whether the parent corporation's domination of control of a subsidiary is so extensive that the subsidiary is rendered a mere department of the parent. The court's recognition of an alter ego (department) basis for general jurisdiction addressed an issue that the U.S. Supreme Court did not address in Daimler, that an alter ego basis may be properly used for asserting general jurisdiction, but may arguably be called into question by Daimler. RP Business will not be the last word on the subject, as significant federal and, likely, appellate determinations in New York, should be expected.

The establishment of Daimler's third basis for general jurisdiction, based on exceptional circumstances, will not be easy for plaintiffs to meet. One reason is that the U.S. Supreme Court limited this basis to circumstances that are not just exceptional, but "truly exceptional." The Supreme Court further limited the basis to circumstances where the corporate defendant's operations within the state are "so substantial and of such nature" as to render the entity at home in the state. The bar is raised high. It was not met in Aybar v Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, 175 A.D.3d 1373, 106 N.Y.S.3d 361 (2d Dep't. 2019).

Complaints and answers may be properly examined to determine whether the plaintiff has a basis for general jurisdiction in New York. In Gibson v Air & Liquid Systems Corporation, 173 A.D.3d 519, 103 N.Y.S.3d 391 (1st Dep't. 2019), the plaintiff's complaint alleged that the defendant was a corporation duly organized in the state of New York, which the defendant did not deny in its answer. The First Department concluded that the allegation of incorporation was admitted and binding upon the defendant, notwithstanding the fact that the answer had been prepared prior to the U.S. Supreme Court's determination in Daimler. General jurisdiction therefore existed based on an admission in the pleadings.

On the issue of whether general jurisdiction can be asserted against a parent corporation through the New York presence of a subsidiary, practitioners should be aware of Sabol v Bayer Healthcare Pharm., Inc., 439 F.Supp.3d 131 (2020) (Marrero, J.). A metal called gadolinium is used as a contrast agent for persons undergoing MRIs, and is supposed to be eliminated from the body through the kidneys. The plaintiff, who underwent 23 MRIs, alleged that she was caused physical injuries because the contrast agent was retained in her body, and sought damages under theories of negligence and strict products' liability for the defendants' failure to warn. The defendants included General Electric Healthcare (GEHC), which manufactured and distributed some of the gadolinium-based contrast agents. GEHC moved to dismiss the plaintiff's amended complaint on the ground, inter alia, that it was neither headquartered nor incorporated in New York. The plaintiff argued that GEHC was amenable to the court's general jurisdiction as it was a wholly-owned subsidiary of co-defendant General Electric Company (GE), a New York corporation. The court noted, as this Practice Commentary did last year, that it is unusual for a party to seek to extend jurisdiction over a subsidiary through its parent, rather than vice versa. The Southern District found that general jurisdiction was lacking over GEHC for two reasons. The first was that under Daimler, an agency theory between the parent and subsidiary was expressly rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court for the assertion of general jurisdiction through one entity to another. Second, as to the "alter ego" basis for extending general jurisdiction from one related entity to another, as discussed in Ranza v Nike, Inc., 793 F.3d 1059 (9th Cir. 2015), the court stopped short of accepting "alter ego" as a jurisdictional path. Instead, the court said that if general jurisdiction could be imputed to a subsidiary under an alter ego analysis, the plaintiff would need to assert more than just the parent-subsidiary relationship between the parties. Indeed, in this instance, there appears from the court's decision to be no evidence from the plaintiff meeting New York's long-standing "department" test for establishing the parent's domination and control over its subsidiary, including the most important element of the parent's 100% stock ownership of the subsidiary.

Thus, for plaintiff practitioners, the message from Sabel v Bayer Healthcare Pharm., Inc. is that New York courts have not yet adopted Ranza's alter ego basis for the imputation of general jurisdiction, and may or may not do so. If the day comes when it does so, the parent-subsidiary relationship, in and of itself, will not be sufficient for the assertion of general jurisdiction, and the plaintiffs should be prepared to meet the four-part "department test" for the assertion of such jurisdiction; namely, 100% stock ownership by the parent of the subsidiary, the financial dependency of the subsidiary upon the parent, the parent's influence on the composition of the subsidiary's board, and the parent's control over the marketing and operational responsibilities of the subsidiary (Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v Beech Aircraft Corp., 751 F.2d 117 [2nd Cir. 1984]; Varga v McGraw Hill Financial Inc., 2015 WL 4627748 [Sup. Ct. New York County 2015]).

In Homeward Residential, Inc v Thompson Hine, LLP, 172 A.D.3d 459, 100 N.Y.S.3d 233 (1st Dep't. 2019), the defendant was a limited liability partnership formed in Ohio with a principal office in that state. When the defendant moved to dismiss the action for lack of general jurisdiction, the plaintiff argued that the defendant should be estopped from asserting the defense that general jurisdiction was lacking, as the defendant had allegedly misrepresented that it maintained its principal place of business in New York upon which the plaintiff relied in commencing the action in New York. The Supreme Court, New York County, and the Appellate Division in the First Department, were unimpressed with the plaintiff's argument, as the plaintiff's reliance upon the defendant's alleged representations for venue-selection purposes was found to not be reasonable.

Discovery is of course permissible between parties to help determine whether a defendant is, or is not, subject to New York's general jurisdiction. To be entitled to jurisdictional discovery, the plaintiff must merely make an initial showing that is a "sufficient start," establishing facts that may exist for the exercise of personal jurisdiction (Best v Guthrie Medical Group, P.C., 175 A.D.3d 1048, 107 N.Y.S.3d 258 [4th Dep't. 2019]). Conversely, the absence of any initial showing, such as would contradict the defendant's readily-available evidence of non-New York incorporation and principal office location, does not provide a basis for fishing-expedition discovery on personal jurisdiction (Qudsi v Larios, 173 A.D.3d 920, 103 N.Y.S.3d 920 [2d Dep't. 2019]).

The pre-action discovery procedures of CPLR 3102(c) are generally available for acquiring material that is relevant to the potential assertion of general jurisdiction against a party in New York. Pre-action discovery, when sought, is requested by a petition in a special proceeding. In Matter of Legal Aid Society of Suffolk County to Compel Production of Documents From Indeed, Inc. Prior to Commencement of Action, 66 Misc.3d 1212(A), 120 N.Y.S.3d 720 (Sup. Ct. Suffolk County) (St. George, J.), the target entity, Indeed, Inc. (Indeed), was a Delaware corporation with a principal office located in Texas. Under Daimler, therefore, there would be no basis for general jurisdiction over Indeed, unless the circumstances were truly exceptional in maintaining operations in New York that were so substantial and of such nature as to render the entity at home in New York. While Indeed had registered to do business in New York, the court correctly noted that registration is not sufficient under Daimler to support the assertion of general jurisdiction over an entity, particularly as New York's registration statutes do not require the foreign corporation to consent to the general jurisdiction of the New York courts (BCL 1301, 1304[a]). No basis was stated in the pre-action discovery petition for the assertion of longarm jurisdiction over Indeed. As a consequence, the Supreme Court, Suffolk County, denied the petition for pre-action discovery from Indeed, as the petitioner failed to provide any basis for jurisdiction. A similar result was reached in Kline v Facebook, Inc. and Google, Inc., 62 Misc.3d 1207(A), 112 N.Y.S.3d 875 (Sup. Ct. New York County) (Freed, J.), where the petitioner seeking pre-action discovery failed to establish that the respondents, who were not incorporated in New York and did not maintain their principal offices here, was nevertheless potentially subject to New York's general jurisdiction.

C3211:32 Absence of a Person Who Should be a Party

Actions may be dismissed under CPLR 3211(a)(10) when the court should not proceed in the absence of a necessary party. The language of CPLR 3211(a)(10) is a little misleading, because the plaintiff's mere failure to name a necessary party does not automatically mean that the action will be dismissed. A party is defined as "necessary" when his or her presence is needed for complete relief to be accorded between persons who are parties to the action or who might be inequitably affected by a judgment in the action (CPLR 1001[a]).

The first issue, therefore, is whether a party is necessary. By nature and definition, the issue arises under CPLR 3211(a)(10) only where a potentially affected party is not named in the caption of the action, as the party's presence in the action would obviate consideration of a dismissal on this statutory ground.

The second issue that a court must address in determining CPLR 3211(a)(10) dismissal motions is whether the absent party is amenable to the personal jurisdiction of the court. If so, the court is not to dismiss the action in a kneejerk fashion, but instead, shall order the necessary party "summoned" (CPLR 1001[b]; Deutsche Bank National Trust Company v Bandalos, 173 A.D.3d 1136, 105 N.Y.S.3d 489 [2d Dep't. 2019]). If the summoned party enters the case, the problem of the party's absence is resolved, and no continuing legal basis exists for the dismissal of the action.

A third issue arises if the necessary party is not amenable to jurisdiction in response to the second or refuses to voluntarily appear. The court still does not automatically dismiss the action, but must engage in a balancing of five statutory factors set forth in CPLR 1001(b). These factors include the availability of other remedies in the event of a non-joinder, the prejudice that might accrue from non-joinder to the defendant or the party not joined, whether and by whom prejudice might be avoided in the future, the feasibility of a protective provision by order of the court or in the judgment, and whether an effective judgment may be rendered in the absence of the person not joined. No one factor is determinative (Red Hook/Gowanus Chamber of Commerce v New York City Bd. of Standards and Appeals, 5 N.Y.3d 452, 805 N.Y.S.2d 525, 839 N.E.2d 878 [2005]), and granting a dismissal of the action will only occur if, upon a balancing of the delineated factors, it is reached as a last resort (JP Morgan Chase, National Association v Salvage, 171 A.D.3d 438, 98 N.Y.S.3d 6 [1st Dep't. 2019]). CPLR 3211(a)(10) motions therefore tend to be complicated, and do not lend themselves to easy resolution such as a black-and-white determination of a mathematical statute of limitations dismissal, or dismissals based upon uncontroverted documentary evidence, payment, release, arbitration and award, res judicata, and other potential grounds.

There is authority that the absence of a necessary party may be raised for the first time on appeal (City of New York v Long Island Airports Limousine Service Corp., 48 N.Y.2d 469, 423 N.Y.S.2d 651, 399 N.E.2d 538 [1979]). If so, the appellate court has no authority to order that an additional party be added to an action, and by extension cannot dismiss an action on that basis, but must instead remit the question to the trial court for an initial determination of whether the matter should proceed in the absence of the party (Velez v New York State, Department of Corrections and Community Supervision, 163 A.D.3d 1210, 80 N.Y.S.3d 719 [3d Dep't. 2018]).

C3211:53 Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraph 1, 3, 4, 5, or 6 of 3211(a)

Last year's Practice Commentary for C3211:53 discussed a significant case from the Second Department regarding the waiver of affirmative defenses, U.S. Bank National Association v Nelson, 169 A.D.3d 110, 93 N.Y.S.3d 138 (2d Dept. 2019). Nelson is a residential mortgage foreclosure action where the plaintiff included in its complaint an allegation that it had standing to seek a judgment of foreclosure, even though standing is not an element of the cause of action that need to be pleaded. The defendant's answer responded to the allegation by denying knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief ("DKI"), but did not plead the lack of standing as a separate affirmative defense. The issue on appeal was whether a defendant's denial ("D") or DKI could be construed as an implicit and cognizable assertion of the standing defense, which could be raised, and not be waived, at the time of a lager dispositive motion. The Second Department held in a 3-1 decision that the standing defense is waived unless raised as a separate affirmative defense in the defendant's answer. The reasoning is the difference between CPLR 3018, which draws a clear statutory distinction between denials, which places the burden of proof upon plaintiffs, from affirmative defenses, which raise a new defensive matter which the defendant is obligated to prove. Any conflation of the two concepts can cause surprise and confusion at trial, which CPLR 3018 is designed to avoid.

As noted on C3211:12, the state legislature enacted RPAPL 1302-a, effective December 23, 2019, which provides that in residential mortgage foreclosure actions only, standing is not waived by the defendant's failure to raise it as an affirmative defense in the answer. The enactment of RPAPL 1302-a therefore renders academic the portion of Nelson that addressed whether a standing defense may be implicitly recognized by a defendant's denial or DKI of related allegations or whether a separate affirmative defense is required to preserve the defense. However, Nelson's general holding that defendants must actually plead standing as an affirmative defense in order to preserve it remains relevant and good law as to all actions---tort, contract, or otherwise---that do not involve residential mortgage foreclosures under RPAPL 1302-a. Therefore, per Nelson, if a defendant in any action outside of RPAPL 1302-a has a good faith basis to challenge the plaintiff's standing in the answer, the defendant should follow the well-known colloquial maxim: use it or lose it.

2019

C3211:10. Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence"

CPLR 3211(a)(1) permits dismissal of an action where "a defense is founded upon documentary evidence." While the language seems straight-forward, the operative inquiry is what specific types of documentation qualify as "documentary evidence" under the statute. A motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(1) may be granted only where the documentary evidence utterly refutes the plaintiff's factual allegations, conclusively establishing a defense as a matter of law (Goshen v Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York, 98 N.Y.2d 314, 746 N.Y.S.2d 858 [2002]).

Sequentially, a proffered document must first be of the type that qualifies under the statute, and if so, the court then determines whether its contents provide a defense warranting the dismissal of the action as a matter of law. Decisional authorities have not examined the issue in terms of a two-step sequence, but that is, in effect, the steps that courts must take. Documents that have traditionally qualified for evidentiary consideration under CPLR 3211(a)(1) are those which are 1) unambiguous, 2) of undeniable authenticity, and 3) reflect content that is essentially undeniable (Koziatek v SJB Dev. Inc., 172 A.D.3d 1486, 99 N.Y.S.3d 480 [3d Dep't. 2019]; VXI Lux Holdco S.A.R.L. v SIC Holdings, Inc., LLC, 171 A.D.3d 189, 98 N.Y.S.3d 1 [1st Dep't. 2019]; Mehrhof v Monroe-Woodbury Central School District, 168 A.D.3d 713, 91 N.Y.S.3d 503 [2d Dep't. 2019]). Documents that have been found to qualify as documentary evidence have included judicial records, mortgages, deeds, contracts, and other papers the contents of which meet the requirements of being essentially unambiguous, authentic, and undeniable (Magee-Boyle v Reliastar Life Ins. Co. of New York, 173 A.D.3d 1157, 105 N.Y.S.3d 90 [2d Dep't. June 26, 2019]). In a recent case, a copy of an insurance policy was found to be documentary evidence permitting the dismissal of the plaintiff's cause of action for breach of contract, where the defendant insurer had denied the plaintiff coverage for a claimed loss under the policy's terms (Calhoun v Midrox Ins. Co., 165 A.D.3d 1450, 86 N.Y.S.3d 769 [3d Dep't. 2018]).

Conversely, documents that tend to be self-serving or prepared for litigation do not qualify as documentary evidence for 3211(a)(1) dismissals, such as letters, affidavits, e-mails (Magee-Boyle, 173 A.D.3d 1157, 105 N.Y.S.3d 90; Phoenix Grantor Tr. v Exclusive Hosp., LLC, 172 A.D.3d 923, 101 N.Y.S.3d 175 [2d Dep't. 2019]; First Choice Plumbing Corp. v Miller Law Offices, PLLC, 164 A.D.3d 756, 84 N.Y.S.3d 171 [2d Dep't. 2018]; Phillips v Taco Bell Corp., 152 A.D.3d 806, 60 N.Y.S.3d 67 [2d Dep't. 2017]) and text messages (Kalaj v 21 Fountain Place, LLC, 169 A.D.3d 657, 94 N.Y.S.3d 106 [2d Dep't. 2019]).

The use of e-mails has been a source of vigorous argument and continuing controversy on the question of whether they are the type of document that may be considered by courts within the intended scope of CPLR 3211(a)(1). Courts often grapple with legal issues that arise from ever-changing technology, oftentimes one step behind. There are a fair number of cases where e-mails have not found traction as appropriate documentary evidence. E-mails were recently found to not be documentary evidence within the scope of CPLR 3211(a)(1) in Members of DeKalb Avenue Condominium Association v Klein (172 A.D.3d 1196, 102 N.Y.S.3d 207 [2d Dep't. 2019]) and in First Choice Plumbing Corp. (164 A.D.3d 756, 84 N.Y.S.3d 171 [2d Dep't. 2018]).

Nevertheless, the propriety and use of e-mails as documentary evidence in support of a CPLR 3211(a)(1) dismissal motion has been evolving, and is seen with some increasing flexibility. In Kolchins v Evolution Markets, Inc., 31 N.Y.3d 100, 73 N.Y.S.3d 519 (2018), the Court of Appeals had occasion to consider whether e-mails exchanged between an employer and employee evidenced the existence of an employment contract. The plaintiff employee and defendant employer had entered into two separate three-year employment agreements that ended in 2009 and 2012, respectively. As the end of the second agreement approached, the defendant sent an e-mail to the plaintiff stating inter alia that the essential terms of its offer were the same as those of the parties' existing contract; the plaintiff responded by sending e-mail accepting the offer; and the defendant replied by e-mail with congratulations. When the terms of a written contract document could not later be agreed upon, the plaintiff was notified that his employment had ceased at the conclusion of the second contract in 2012. The plaintiff commenced an action for breach of contract, arguing that the e-mail exchanges between the parties evidenced the existence and terms of a third contract which incorporated by reference the terms of the second contract. The defendant moved to dismiss, arguing that the e-mails did not evidence the parties' mutual assent to material contract terms, and that indefiniteness rendered any purported contract invalid as a matter of law. The Court of Appeals ultimately determined that the e-mails failed to conclusively establish the absence of material terms or indefiniteness, as would be required to permit dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint. The Court of Appeals found that the e-mails permitted competing inferences about whether a new and enforceable contract had been reached, rendering a CPLR 3211(a)(1) dismissal inappropriate (see also Tozzi v Mack, 169 A.D.3d 547, 92 N.Y.S.3d 648 [1st Dep't. 2019]).

How, then, may Kolchins be reconciled with Members of DeKalb Avenue Condominium Association, First Choice Plumbing Corp., and many other reported cases that have disavowed the appropriateness of e-mails as documentary evidence for purposes of CPLR 3211(a)(1) dismissals? The answer appears to lie in the fact that in Kolchins, the e-mails that were exchanged by the parties bilaterally suggested an offer and an acceptance of a contract, or at least failed to refute that an offer and acceptance had occurred beyond mere preliminary and non-binding communications. The fact that the e-mails were exchanged, and the nature and authenticity of their contents, were not contested by the parties. E-mails in other conceivable actions sent by a party unilaterally, or which fail to authentically establish an offer and acceptance of the material and enforceable contractual terms, would likely fail to qualify as documentary evidence under Kolchins for 3211(a)(1) dismissals.

Of course, if the e-mails are themselves central to a cause of action or defense, they should qualify as documentary evidence for CPLR 3211(a)(1) purposes. For instance, in an action of alleged defamation, a news media outlet was able to establish that its reporting did not represent a gross disregard for the truth, by providing inter alia an e-mail chain between its reporters and police regarding the investigation that was reported upon (Stone v Bloomberg, L.P., 163 A.D.3d 1028, 83 N.Y.S.3d 78 [2d Dep't. 2018]). Another example is where the e-mails are central to the cause of action, such as alleged defamation contained in the e-mail itself, and the e-mail is proffered as evidence to establish that the statements constituted non-actionable opinion warranting dismissal of the cause of action under CPLR 3211(a)(7) (International Pub. Concepts, LLC v Locatelli, 46 Misc.3d 1213[A], 9 N.Y.S.3d 593 [Sup. Ct., New York County 2015]). The appropriateness of letters, e-mails, or texts as documentary evidence therefore depends in many instances upon the nature and circumstances of the action or its available defenses.

C3211:12. Plaintiff's Lack of Capacity

The concepts of "capacity" and "standing" have been described as difficult to distinguish and as "twins" (David D. Siegel and Patrick M. Connors, N.Y. Practice § 136 at 349 [6th ed.]). Nevertheless, the two concepts are distinct. Both fall within the scope of CPLR 3211(a)(3), permitting the dismissal of actions on either ground by means of a pre-answer motion (David D. Siegel, Practice Commentaries, McKinney's Cons. Laws of N.Y., Book 7B, CPLR C3211:13 [2011]). The difference between the concepts is that "capacity" regards the ability of a plaintiff to competently bring an action in a civil court, without being afflicted by a disqualifying disability such as infancy or mental illness (Community Bd. 7 of Borough of Manhattan v Schaffer, 84 N.Y.2d 148, 615 N.Y.S.2d 644 [1994]; HSBC Bank USA Nat. Ass'n v Roumiantseva, 39 Misc.3d 1239[A], 975 N.Y.S.2d 709 [Sup. Ct., Kings County 2013]). In contrast, "standing" involves whether a plaintiff with capacity to litigate has a sufficiently cognizable stake in the outcome of the action or proceeding as cast the dispute in a form traditionally capable of judicial resolution (Community Bd. 7 of Borough of Manhattan, 84 N.Y.2d 148, 615 N.Y.S.2d 644). Defense attorneys wishing to dismiss an action for lack of standing may do so under CPLR 3211(a)(3), even though the word "standing" is missing from the grounds specifically listed in the subdivision.

The defense of lack of capacity under CPLR 3211(a)(3), if asserted as an affirmative defense in a defendant's answer, is not waived by the defendant's participation in the defense of the action (Gulledge v Jefferson County, 172 A.D.3d 1666, 101 N.Y.S.3d 493 [3d Dep't. 2019]).

C3211:15. Same Parties, Same Cause of Action

An action may be dismissed under CPLR 3211(a)(4) if there is already another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action in a court of any state or the United States. The purpose of CPLR 3211(a)(4) is to prevent a party from being harassed or burdened by having to defend against multiple law suits from the same plaintiff (LaBuda v LaBuda, 175 A.D.3d 39, 105 N.Y.S.3d 585, [3d Dep't. July 3, 2019]).

Dismissal is always discretionary, as the statute specifically provides that the court "may" dismiss the action, not "shall." In exercising that discretion, courts may examine the circumstances under which the second action is brought. In LaBuda, a second action was commenced by a substituted attorney to merely add new claims ahead of an expiring statute of limitations, though with 20/20 hindsight the attorney might have more easily sought leave to amend the original complaint. The Appellate Division, Third Department, was satisfied that the second action was commenced for credible, non-harassment purposes, reasoning that a joinder or consolidation of the two actions could be the more appropriate remedy for fostering judicial economy under the circumstances of that case.

The cases seen under this subdivision of the CPLR tend to involve whether two actions truly involve 1) the same parties, 2) the same causes of action, and 3) the same requested relief. The mere relatedness of causes of action or parties is not sufficient to justify CPLR 3211(a)(4) dismissals. The CPLR contemplates something more.

A complete identity of the parties is not necessary for a dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(4) so long as there is a "substantial" identity of parties, which generally requires that there be at least one plaintiff and one defendant common to both actions (Jaber v Elayyan, 168 A.D.3d 693, 93 N.Y.S.3d 315 [2d Dep't. 2019]).

Similarly, for CPLR 3211(a)(4) remedies to apply, the precise legal theories and prayers for relief presented in both actions need not be precisely identical, so long as they are at least "substantially the same" (Id.).

An example of causes of action being related, but not quite similar enough for CPLR 3211(a)(4), is Spicer v Spicer, 162 A.D.3d 886, 80 N.Y.S.3d 328 (2d Dep't. 2018). Spicer involved a mother and a father who were already divorced. An action was commenced in the Supreme Court, Nassau County, where the parties executed an agreement modifying their custody arrangement, and the agreement was awaiting a So Ordered signature of the assigned justice. As that was pending, the mother commenced a proceeding in the Family Court, Nassau County, seeking to hold the father in contempt for allegedly violating the terms of the modification agreement. While the court attorney referee was found on appeal to have erred in dismissing the Family Court petition for failing to state a cause of action, a related issue on appeal was whether the Family Court should have dismissed its proceeding on the ground that a prior action between the same parties was pending at the Supreme Court. As to that issue, the Second Department held that while the parties were identical in both proceedings, the relief sought by them in each forum was very different--one involved a modification of custody, and the other involved alleged contempt and its related remedies. Spicer makes clear that a mere connection between the parties and the relief sought in the two forums is not enough, as CPLR 3211(a)(4) speaks more to avoiding an actual duplication of causes in different courts.

If a prior action is pending, but abandoned, dismissal of the second action is not warranted (MLB Sub I, LLC v Grimes, 170 A.D.3d 992, 96 N.Y.S.3d 594 [2d Dep't. 2019]). In MLB Sub I, the plaintiff had moved to discontinue its first action against the defendant, commenced the second action three weeks later, and the Supreme Court granted the discontinuance of the first action six weeks after that. The Supreme Court and Appellate Division, Second Department, held that the defendant was not entitled to a dismissal of the second action, as the first action had effectively been abandoned by the time the defendant's CPLR 3211(a)(4) motion to dismiss was made.

RPAPL 1301(3) prohibits the commencement of a mortgage foreclosure action if a prior action for the same relief is active, absent leave of court (U.S. Bank Tr., N.A. v Humphrey, 173 A.D.3d 811, 103 N.Y.S.3d 98 [2d Dep't. June 5, 2019]; Deutsche Bank Nat. Tr. Co. v Fandetta, 60 Misc.3d 1220[A] [Sup. Ct., Suffolk County 2018]).

Actions should not be dismissed on the ground of prior action pending by courts acting sua sponte (DLJ Mortg. Capital v Mahadeo, 166 A.D.3d 512, 89 N.Y.S.3d 26 [1st Dep't. 2018]).

C3211:18. Affirmative Defenses Available on Subdivision (a) Motions

Statute of Limitations

One of the staple grounds asserted in support of motions to dismiss is the statute of limitations, which is among the grab bag of grounds set forth in CPLR 3211(a)(5). A signed opinion of Justice Robert Miller of the Appellate Division, Second Department, resolved at the appellate level an issue of first impression that had divided several trial-level courts. In Bank of New York Mellon v Dieudonne, 171 A.D.3d 34, 96 N.Y.S.3d 354 (2d Dep't. 2019), a lender commenced a residential mortgage foreclosure action against a homeowner who allegedly defaulted in the payment of the installment loan obligation. The note underlying the mortgage contained language in Paragraph 22 setting forth conditions that needed to be satisfied for the lender to accelerate the full balance due on the note. Separately, Paragraph 19 of the note provided that upon default, the homeowner had the right to reinstate the note and mortgage by paying all monies due up to the time of, inter alia, the final judgment. The balance of the Dieudonne loan debt was duly accelerated by the lender in June of 2010 but the action was not commenced until October of 2016, beyond the six year statute of limitations of CPLR 213(2). The homeowner moved to dismiss the action pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(5) and CPLR 213(2). In opposition, the lender argued, with reliance upon certain trial-level decisional authority, that because the homeowner possessed the right to reinstate the loan and mortgage under the conditions defined in Paragraph 19 of the note, the statute of limitations did not begin to run until the homeowner's reinstatement rights were extinguished. In effect, the lender argued that the statute of limitations had not even begun to run, as the homeowner's contractual right to reinstatement continued until the time of the entry of final judgment which had not yet occurred.

The Second Department held in Dieudonne that the lender's action was untimely and dismissed the complaint. It reasoned that Paragraphs 19 and 22 of the note were independent of one another, and that the lender's right to accelerate the outstanding loan debt expressly preceded the exercise or extinguishment of the homeowner's reinstatement rights. The court's holding makes sense. If the lender's legal argument were taken to its logical conclusion, a homeowner's right to reinstatement until the time of the final judgment, or until some other contractually-defined deadline late in the foreclosure process, would essentially nullify any statute of limitations from applying to residential mortgage foreclosure actions, and provide quite a boon to the banks. The lender's legal argument that the statute of limitations had not begun to run despite the acceleration of the full outstanding loan debt, while clever, fell short of earning a congratulatory cigar.

By virtue of Dieudonne, the following reported trial-level decisions, which had agreed with the same or similar bank arguments, are no longer good law and should not be followed: U.S. Bank Nat'l Ass'n v Nail, 2018 NY Slip Op. 32897(U), 2018 WL 6172080 (Sup. Ct., Westchester County 2018); Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v Fetonti, 2018 NY Slip Op. 30193(U), 2018 WL 823782 (Sup. Ct., Westchester County 2018); HSBC Bank, USA, NA v Margineanu, 61 Misc.3d 973, 86 N.Y.S.3d 694 (Sup. Ct., Suffolk County 2018); U.S. Bank Trust, N.A. v Monsalve, 2017 NY Slip Op. 32764(U), 2017 WL 6994224 (Sup. Ct., Queens County 2017); and Nationstar Mortgage, LLC v MacPherson, 56 Misc.3d 339, 54 N.Y.S.3d 825 (Sup. Ct., Suffolk County 2017).

Res Judicata

The well-worn definition of res judicata is that it prohibits re-litigation of a matter when an earlier action disposed of the same transaction or series of transactions, involving the same parties, and there was a full and fair opportunity for the parties to be heard in the prior forum (Paramount Pictures Corp. v Allianz Risk Transfer AG, 31 N.Y.3d 64, 73 N.Y.S.3d 472 [2018]; Wilson v Dantas, 29 N.Y.3d 1051, 58 N.Y.S.3d 286 [2017]; O'Brien v City of Syracuse, 54 N.Y.2d 353, 445 N.Y.S.2d 687 [1981]).

An instructive case about res judicata and the identity of parties is Aponte v Estate of Aponte, 172 A.D.3d 970, 101 N.Y.S.3d 132 (2d Dep't. 2019). In Aponte, the plaintiff sought the appointment of an administrator for his son's estate, claiming that he had retained an attorney to commence an action against the estate to recover monies allegedly owed to him as a result of business dealings. The Surrogate's Court, Queens County, appointed the son's wife as the estate's administratrix, who filed a final account with the Surrogate's Court that the plaintiff did not oppose in that forum. Approximately one month after the Surrogate's Court issued a final decree settling the final account for the estate, the plaintiff commenced an action in Supreme Court for various forms of relief against the son's estate, the son's wife, and a corporate entity allegedly owned by the wife, in connection with the business dealings between them. The issue for the Supreme Court, and on appeal, was whether the Supreme Court action was barred by the doctrine of res judicata. The Second Department applied a pragmatic test analyzing how the facts of the two proceedings were related in time, space, origin, and motivation, whether the facts formed "a convenient trial unit," and whether treating the facts as a unit "conform[ed] to the parties' expectations or business understanding" (Aponte, 172 A.D.3d at 972, 101 N.Y.S.3d at 133). The Second Department concluded that causes of action for damages and for a constructive trust in connection with the business should have been dismissed on the ground of res judicata under CPLR 3211(a)(5), as those claims could have and should have been asserted against the estate in the Surrogate's Court proceeding. Indeed, the Second Department specifically held that res judicata applies with equal force to judicially-settled accounting decrees. However, the Second Department also held that as to causes of action in the Supreme Court against the son's wife, res judicata did not apply or warrant dismissal, since her appearance in the Surrogate's Court proceeding was in an administratrix capacity whereas her appearance in the Supreme Court action was in an individual capacity. The corporate entity was not a party to the Surrogate's Court proceeding at all, and therefore was also not entitled to a dismissal of the Supreme Court action against it on account of res judicata. The case demonstrates how courts may parse individual parties, and individual causes of action, in determining which, if any, should be dismissed from an action on the ground of res judicata.

A stipulation of discontinuance with prejudice, without a reservation of right or limitation of the claim disposed by it, is entitled to res judicata effect (Wells Fargo Bank Nat'l Ass'n v Enbar, 173 A.D.3d 938, 104 N.Y.S.3d 183, 2019 WL 2439783 [2d Dep't. June 12, 2019]).

The res judicata defense applies to arbitration awards (Piller v Princeton Realty Assoc., LLC, 173 A.D.3d 1298, 104 N.Y.S.3d 344, 2019 WL 2375424 [3d Dep't. June 6, 2019] [signed opinion by Mulvey, J.]). If a party fails to comply with a confirmed arbitration award, the remedy is an enforcement or contempt application in the action or proceeding which confirmed the arbitration award (CPLR 7502[a][iii]), as a separate later action is subject to dismissal on the ground of res judicata (Id.).

Release

While the existence of a release is a basis for the dismissal of a plaintiff's complaint under CPLR 3211(a)(5), the dismissal motion should be denied where the release is a product of fraud or duress in its procurement (Paulino v Braun, 60 Misc.3d 1201[A] [Sup. Ct., Bronx County 2018]). A release is a species of contract, and as such, is governed by the principles of contract law in its execution, interpretation, and enforcement. In Paulino, the defendant seeking dismissal met his initial burden of proof by submitting an authenticated copy of a release executed by the plaintiff, a copy of a $6,000 check forwarded to the plaintiff, and an affidavit of the defendant's insurance adjustor that the release and payment pertained to the same automobile accident that became the subject of the plaintiff's complaint. But in opposition, the defendant raised questions of fact about whether the release was signed under circumstances of unfairness and overreaching, which were described. Thus, while the existence of a release is a defense permitting the dismissal of actions, the release itself must be a product of proper attainment.

C3211:21. Failure to State a Cause of Action, Generally

Where the plaintiff is a contractor asserting a cause of action against a consumer, and the contractor is required by state or local law to be licensed, the complaint must allege that the plaintiff was duly licensed at the time that services were provided, and shall identify the license's name, number, and the of governmental agency of its issuance (CPLR 3015[e]). If a complaint fails to reflect such information, the defendant may move for dismissal of the complaint under CPLR 3211(a)(7) for its failure to state a cause of action (CPLR 3015[e]). The policy behind CPLR 3015(e) is to protect consumers. Additionally, if a contract between an unlicensed contractor and a consumer is illegal by virtue of the contractor's failure to obtain a license, the courts cannot provide the contractor with relief for the consumer's non-payment. The contractor's unlicensed status forecloses a recovery for both money damages and in quantum meruit (Holistic Homes, LLC v Greenfield, 138 A.D.3d 689, 27 N.Y.S.3d 892 [2d Dep't. 2016]).

Certainly, unlicensed contractors have been caught unaware of this pleading requirement, and have suffered the dismissal of their actions as a result of non-compliance with licensing laws (Kristeel, Inc. v Seaview Development Corp., 165 A.D.3d 1243, 87 N.Y.S.3d 600 [2d Dep't. 2018]). A new twist occurred in Rusin v Design-Apart USA, Ltd., 173 A.D.3d 1231, 104 N.Y.S.3d 675 (2d Dep't. 2019). In Rusin, it was the consumer, rather than the unlicensed contractor, who commenced an action for breach of contract, seeking as damages the return of monies previously paid to the contractor. What is good for the goose is good for the gander. The court held on appeal that when a consumer obtains a benefit of services from an unlicensed contractor, as here, a recoupment of monies already paid is not permitted. As stated by the Appellate Division, "The parties, in these circumstances, should be left as they are" (Rusin v Design-Apart USA, Ltd., 173 A.D.3d at 1231, citing Segrete v Zimmerman, 67 A.D.2d 999, 413 N.Y.S.3d 732 [2d Dep't. 1979]).

C3211:28. Lack of Personal Jurisdiction

General Jurisdiction Under CPLR 301

The U.S. Supreme Court caused a moderate earthquake in 2014 with the opinion it rendered in Daimler AG v Bauman, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S. Ct. 746 (2014) regarding the issue of all-purpose general jurisdiction against corporate defendants. Professor Patrick M. Connors of Albany Law School was one of the earliest observers out of the gate to recognize the procedural significance of Daimler to New York practice (Patrick M. Connors, Impact of Supreme Court Decisions on New York Practice, NYLJ, June 18, 2014). The shockwaves of Daimler are being felt nationwide generally, and in New York specifically, and it is predicted here that a few years of litigation will be required to fine-tune secondary issues that arise from the case.

Daimler involved several Argentinian plaintiffs who sued a corporate defendant, Daimler AG ("Daimler") in federal court in California, seeking damages for the alleged criminal actions committed in Argentina by a Daimler subsidiary. Daimler is a German entity headquartered in Stuttgart, Germany. The plaintiffs sought to assert general jurisdiction over Daimler in California based upon the presence there of yet another Daimler subsidiary that distributed automobiles in California and elsewhere. The difference between "general jurisdiction" and "specific jurisdiction" is that with the former, a forum state may hear any and all claims against the entity, because the entity's affiliations with the state are so continuous and systematic as to render it essentially "at home" there (Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S.A. v. Brown, 564 U.S. 915, 131 S.Ct. 2846 [2011]). However, in Goodyear, the Supreme Court stopped short of defining how and under what circumstances a corporate entity is considered "at home" in a state, keeping its tradition of not deciding questions beyond what is immediately before it. By contrast, "specific jurisdiction" depends on an identifiable affiliation between the state and the underlying controversy, principally activity or an occurrence that takes place in the forum state, or having effect in the forum state, and is therefore subject to the state's regulation (Id.).

The issue of whether Daimler was subject to the general jurisdiction of California courts made its way to the U.S. Supreme Court. The majority opinion, written by Justice Ginsburg, held that even assuming the California subsidiary's activities were jurisdictionally imputable to Daimler, Daimler was still not subject to the general jurisdiction of the California courts. The reason is that the Supreme Court re-defined--or perhaps we should say "clarified"--the definition of general jurisdiction over corporate entities. Previously, such jurisdiction derived in New York and elsewhere from a corporation's permanence and continuity within a state (Tauza v Susquehanna Coal Co., 220 N.Y. 259 [1917]), the so called "doing business" test (Frummer v. Hilton Hotels Intl. (19 N.Y.2d 533, 281 N.Y.S.2d 41 [1967]). The Supreme Court in Daimler gave a much narrower focus to general jurisdiction, holding, as it did in Goodyear, that such jurisdiction applies only when the corporate entity is "at home" in the state. However, for the first time, the Supreme Court defined a corporation as being "at home" only in a state 1) where it is incorporated, or 2) where it maintains its principal place of business, or 3) in truly exceptional cases, where the corporation's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home in the state. Otherwise, the corporation is not "at home" in a state, and is not subject to that state's general jurisdiction.

The effect of Daimler was to obliterate New York's "doing business" test with both barrels, wiping out New York's construct for general jurisdiction that has been utilized for several decades. One of the biggest casualties of New York case law was Frummer v. Hilton Hotels International, not to mention its progeny.

The first two definitions of being "at home" in a state, based upon the places of the entity's incorporation and principal office, are clear-cut, objective, and documented. Like pregnancy, it exists or it does not with no ground for argument in between. The "third" definition of being "at home" is what may require further litigation to clarify, to determine more precisely the meaning and permutations of having operations so substantial and of such nature as to be tantamount to the corporation being at home in a state, even though its incorporation and principal office lies elsewhere. The language of the U.S. Supreme Court that this third basis for general jurisdiction is "exceptional" suggests that the plaintiffs, rather than the defendants, will face the uphill climb in convincing courts that general jurisdiction be applied on a case-by-case basis to out-of-state corporations.

Daimler represented such a jurisdictional departure from what had previously been understood that the U.S. Supreme Court felt the need to reaffirm its holding three years later in BNSF Ry. Co. v Tyrrell, __ U.S. __, 137 S. Ct. 1549 (2017).

A plaintiff who is unable to obtain general jurisdiction over a foreign corporation is not necessarily out of luck in maintaining an action in New York, or forced to travel to another jurisdiction where the corporate defendant is at home. General jurisdiction, which is embodied in CPLR 301, is distinctly different from specific jurisdiction which is embodied in CPLR 302. New York's longarm statute, CPLR 302(a), may independently provide a basis for the assertion of specific jurisdiction, especially where the causes of action in the complaint relate to the foreign corporation's New York activities (Qudsi v Larios, 173 A.D.3d 920, 103 N.Y.S.3d 492, 2019 NY Slip Op. 04742 [2d Dep't. June 12, 2019]). These may include, for example, breach of contract actions involving the supply of goods or services to New York, or cases involving the foreign defendant's alleged commission of a tortious act within New York, or product liability cases involving acts outside New York which have an effect within New York (CPLR 302[a][1], [2], [3]).

May the liability of a subsidiary at home in a state where the action is pending be jurisdictionally imputed to a corporate parent not at home in the state? Justice Ginsburg's opinion in Daimler shuts down the question, holding that the corporate parent must itself be at home in the state to be subject to its general jurisdiction, if the basis for extending jurisdiction over the out-of-state parent is merely an "agency" relationship between the corporate parties. Justice Ginsburg's majority opinion in Daimler did not address whether jurisdiction over a subsidiary at home in the state may be extended to an out-of-state parent under an "alter ego" relationship between the corporate parties. The difference between corporate "agency" and corporate "alter ego," and the significance of the two theories to the extension of general jurisdiction, is discussed below.

And what of the converse? May an entity incorporated in New York or maintaining a principal office here be held vicariously liable for the acts of its non-New York subsidiary, perhaps through a piercing of the corporate veil? May the contacts of a parent company incorporated or headquartered in New York be extended to a foreign subsidiary for the assertion of general jurisdiction over that subsidiary? There, the questions become more dicey.

So far, there is no reported case in New York that directly addresses the question of whether an "at home" parent corporation may be held liable for the acts of a foreign subsidiary not "at home" in the forum state. One case of potential guidance, from the West Coast, is Ranza v Nike, Inc., 793 F.3d 1059 (9th Cir. 2015). Ranza involved a plaintiff's claim for age and sex discrimination allegedly committed against her by her employer, Nike European Operations Netherlands, B.V. (NEON) in Hilversum, Netherlands. NEON's parent company is Nike, Inc. (Nike), which is headquartered and "at home" in Oregon. The plaintiff commenced her action in the federal District Court, District of Oregon. The Ninth Circuit determined that NEON was not incorporated or headquartered in Oregon, and that its contacts with Oregon were not so extraordinary, continuous, and systematic as to render it essentially at home in the forum state. NEON's contacts with Oregon might have been sufficient for the assertion of specific jurisdiction if there had been some connection between the conduct complained of and NEON's contacts with Oregon, but there was no such connection and specific jurisdiction was not an issue in the action. The Ninth Circuit then considered whether Nike's contacts with Oregon could be imputed to its subsidiary, NEON. It determined that a mere parent-subsidiary relationship, standing alone, is insufficient to permit the imputation, because corporate separateness insulates a parent corporation from the liabilities of its subsidiary absent circumstances permitting a piercing of the corporate veil. Prior to Daimler, federal courts had allowed the corporate veil to be pierced for jurisdictional purposes under either of two tests, the "agency test" and the "alter ego test". The "agency test" requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that there were tasks so important to the parent corporation that if the subsidiary did not perform them, the parent corporation's own officials would undertake them. The "alter ego test" looks to whether the parent and subsidiary are not truly separate entities, if the parent dominates and controls the subsidiary's internal affairs or daily operations. More specifically, the alter ego test examines whether there is such unity of interest and ownership that the separate personalities of two corporate entities no longer exist, and if so, whether the failure to disregard their separate identities would result in fraud or injustice (e.g. Williams v Yamaha Motor Co. Ltd, 851 F.3d 1015 [9th Cir. 2017]). According to the Ninth Circuit, Daimler invalidated the agency test but left intact the alter ego test. Under the facts of Ranza, the Ninth Circuit determined that the plaintiff failed to provide evidence that Nike and NEON did not observe their separate corporate formalities, and on that basis, general jurisdiction was not permissible under the alter ego test. The holding in Ranza assuredly suggests that had the alter ego test been satisfied by the plaintiff, Nike's contacts with Oregon, where it was "at home," would have permitted the extension of general jurisdiction over NEON, its foreign subsidiary.

The reasoning of Ranza was followed at the federal District Court level in Maple Leaf Adventures Corporation v Jet Tern Marine Co. Ltd., 15-CV-02504-AJB-BGS, 2016 WL 3063956 (S.D. Cal. 2016). There, the court found that the plaintiff failed to establish that a foreign parent corporation was an alter ego of its California subsidiary, but granted the plaintiff the alternative relief of conducting jurisdictional discovery so the issue could be revisited later.

Notably, the entity at home in California in Maple Leaf Adventures Corporation was the subsidiary, while the entity at home in Oregon in Ranza was the corporate parent. Should it matter to general jurisdiction, for imputation purposes, whether the "at home" entity is the parent or the subsidiary? That question was addressed by the Ninth Circuit in Ranza, acknowledging that it is more typical for the subsidiary to be the "at home" entity, with the plaintiff's efforts to extend general jurisdiction directed at the foreign parent corporation. That said, the Ninth Circuit held that where the alter ego test is satisfied for the imputation of general jurisdiction, it does not matter whether the corporate parent or the subsidiary is the "at home" party or which entity is foreign. Its analysis was supported by a federal District Court case and by a law review article that analyzed why it should not matter which of the related entities was at home and which was not (In re Chocolate Confectionary Antitrust Litig., 674 F.Supp.2d 580, 599 n. 25 [M.D. Pa. 2009]; Lea Brilmayer and Kathleen Paisley, Personal Jurisdiction and Substantive Legal Relations: Corporations, Conspiracies, and Agency, 74 Calif. L. Rev. 1, 13-15 [1986]). Notwithstanding the analysis in Ranza, it actually seems that if two entities are to be treated as one under an alter ego theory, it makes more sense that the "home" of the dominated entity definitionally be the state where the parent is incorporated or maintains its headquarters, as would have been the case in Ranza had alter ego evidence been established. If that were to be the case, then general jurisdiction may be extended by a forum state to a foreign subsidiary.

What should make Ranza particularly compelling to New York practitioners is that our state recognizes its own alter ego test, though New York courts refer to it as a "department test" with slightly different definitional nomenclature. New York's "department test," roughly similar to the "alter ego test" recognized in Oregon, California, and elsewhere, examines whether a parent corporation's control over the foreign subsidiary's operations is so complete that the subsidiary is, in fact, merely a "department" of the parent (Delagi v. Volkswagenwerk A.G. of Wolfsburg, Germany, 29 N.Y.2d 426, 328 N.Y.S.2d 653 [1972]; Pub. Adm'r of Cnty. of N.Y. v. Royal Bank of Can., 19 N.Y.2d 127, 278 N.Y.S.2d 378 [1967]; Benefits by Design Corp. v Contractor Management Servs., LLC, 75 A.D.3d 826, 905 N.Y.S.2d 340 [3d Dep't. 2010] [signed opinion by Garry, J.]; Varga v McGraw Hill Financial Inc., 2015 WL 4627748 [Sup. Ct., New York County 2015]; Transasia Commodities Ltd. v Newlead JMEG, LLC, 45 Misc.3d 1217[A] [Sup. Ct., New York County 2014]). New York courts consider four factors when assessing whether a mere "department" relationship exists between a parent and a subsidiary; namely: (1) an identical ownership interest, (2) the financial dependency of the subsidiary upon the parent, (3) the parent's influence on the composition of the board and operations of the subsidiary, and (4) the parent's control over the marketing and operational responsibilities of the subsidiary (Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 751 F.2d 117 [2d Cir. 1984]; Varga, at 2015 WL 4627748). The first of the four factors is regarded as essential, while the remaining three factors are merely important (Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft, 751 F.2d at 120-22). The first factor, that there be identical ownership between the corporate parent and the subsidiary, requires the parent to own 100% of the subsidiary, or nearly so (Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft, 751 F.2d at 120 [wholly-owned subsidiary established the common ownership factor]; OneBeacon Am. Ins. Co. v Newmont Mining Corp., 82 A.D.3d 554, 918 N.Y.S.2d 470 [1st Dep't. 2011] [general jurisdiction inapplicable as corporate parent owned only 51% of its subsidiary]). From that standpoint, New York's "department test" may be somewhat more detailed and sophisticated than the "alter ego test" that focuses primarily upon the corporate parent's domination and control if its subsidiary.

If the alter ego test survives future U.S. Supreme Court review for the assertion of general jurisdiction over a foreign entity, then New York's decisional authorities regarding its department test should probably remain viable as well. If, on the other hand, the U.S. Supreme Court determines in the future that the alter ego test is no longer applicable to the assertion of general jurisdiction over a foreign entity, then a portion of New York's jurisprudence may be overruled. Thus, the true parameters of general jurisdiction, extending or not extending through an "at home" entity to related foreign entities, will not be fully known until the U.S. Supreme Court takes up this issue in a future appeal. Only a reader of tea leaves might predict whether the Supreme Court will decide if, in addition to a vicarious relationship between the two entities, a New York entity and a related foreign entity must each be at home for general jurisdiction to attach to them, or whether proof of an alter ego relationship between them may suffice to extend general jurisdiction over the foreign entity.

As Ranza demonstrates, if a general jurisdictional extension is permissible against a foreign subsidiary and/or parent, the plaintiffs will need to provide evidence sufficient to satisfy the alter ego test, and general jurisdiction will not be sustained if that test is not satisfied. The same would be true of New York's "department test."

What if a corporation is registered to do business in a state for service of process and has designated the Secretary of State as its agent for service of process (BCL 1301, 1312[a]), but is incorporated in and maintains its principal office elsewhere? Is registration equivalent to an incorporation or principal office for general jurisdictional purposes? A signed opinion of Justice Valerie Brathwaite-Nelson of the Appellate Division, Second Department, holds that a mere corporate registration allowing for service of process upon a designated agent within the state is not a consent to the general jurisdiction of that state, but is instead merely a convenience to be utilized when jurisdiction exists (Aybar v Aybar, 169 A.D.3d 137, 93 N.Y.S.3d 159 [2d Dep't. 2019]. See also Amelius v Grand Imperial LLC, 57 Misc.3d 835, 64 N.Y.S.3d 855 [Sup. Ct., New York County 2017]). It appears that state and federal courts throughout the nation agree with the same reasoning (Brown v Lockheed Martin Corp., 814 F.3d 619 [2d Cir. 2016]; Gorton v Air & Liquid Sys. Corp., 303 F.Supp.3d 270 [M.D. Pa. 2018]; Gulf Coast Bank v Designed Conveyor Sys., LLC, No. 16-412-JJB-RLB, 2017 WL 120645 [M.D. La. 2017]; Perez v Air and Liquid Sys. Corp., No. 3:16-CV-00842-NJR-DGW, 2016 WL 7049153 [S.D. Ill. 2016]; Genuine Parts Co. v Cepec, 137 A.3d 123 [Del. 2016]; DeLeon v BNSF Ry Co. 426 P.3d 1 [Mont. 2018]; State ex rel. Norfolk S. Ry. Co. v Dolan, 512 S.W.3d 41 [Mo. 2017]; Segregated Account of Ambac Assurance Corp. v Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 898 N.W.2d 70 [Wis. 2017]. But see Bailen v Air & Liquid Sys. Corp., 2014 NY Slip Op. 32079(U), 2014 WL 3885949 [Sup. Ct., New York County 2014]). The holding in Aybar makes sense, as the mere doing of business within a state is not enough under Daimler to render a corporation "at home" in the state, unless in a given action the third definition in Daimler applies--that it be a truly exceptional case where the corporation's operations are so substantial and of such nature as to render the corporation at home in the state.

A contractual forum selection clause naming New York as the forum for litigation is enforceable notwithstanding Daimler, as the forum selection clause represents the formal consent of the defendant to the personal jurisdiction of New York courts (Zucker v Waldman, 46 Misc.3d 1214[A], 9 N.Y.S.3d 596 [Sup. Ct., Kings County 2015]; Putnam Leasing Co., Inc. v Pappas, 46 Misc.3d 195 [Dist. Ct., Nassau County 2014]).

Daimler's restriction of general jurisdiction to states where a corporate defendant is at home does not extend to proceedings to recognize or enforce a foreign judgment against a foreign entity. In doing so, the court is merely performing a ministerial function in according recognition to a foreign judgment of unquestioned finality (AlbaniaBEG Ambient Sh.p.k. v Enel S.p.A., 160 A.D.3d 93, 73 N.Y.S.3d 1 [1st Dep't. 2018]).

The state that may be most affected by Daimler is Delaware, the one state out of 50 where many national corporations tend to incorporate, regardless of their principal office locations. Suits may always be maintained against corporate entities in their state of incorporation, which may increase the volume of suits filed against corporate defendants in Delaware now that Daimler has restricted the meaning of general jurisdiction.

The absence of general jurisdiction is an affirmative defense to actions, within the grounds contemplated by CPLR 3211(a)(8) (Time Equities, Inc. v Naeringsbygg 1 Norge III AS, 50 Misc.3d 1221[A], 36 N.Y.S.3d 50 [Sup. Ct., New York County 2016]). That basis for dismissal is therefore subject to a strict 60-day deadline for the filing of a dismissal motion, measured from the service of the defendant's answer with its affirmative defense that personal jurisdiction is lacking. Thus, if a defendant is not subject to general or specific jurisdiction of the New York courts, the party should not sit on its right but instead file a motion to dismiss within the limited time constraints of CPLR 3211(e).

The plaintiff bears the ultimate burden of establishing personal jurisdiction over the defendant, via general jurisdiction or otherwise. Since time-sensitive dismissal motions are made early in litigations, a plaintiff, in opposing a jurisdiction-based dismissal motion, may not yet be possessed of complete information for establishing the existence of general jurisdiction over the defendant. This is particularly true if the basis for general jurisdiction is the defendant having operations in the forum state so substantial and of such nature as to be tantamount to the corporation being "at home" there, or if the jurisdictional basis requires evidence of an alter ego (i.e. "department") relationship between the related domestic and foreign entities. When that is the case, the plaintiff opposing the dismissal motion may, in addition to providing the court with whatever opposition evidence is available, alternatively request discovery on the jurisdictional issue. To successfully oppose a CPLR 3211(a)(8) motion to dismiss on the ground that discovery on the issue of personal jurisdiction is necessary, the plaintiff not need make a prima facie showing of jurisdiction, but rather, must only set forth "a sufficient start, and [show its] position not to be frivolous"(Marist College v. Brady, 84 A.D.3d 1322, 1323, 924 N.Y.S.2d 529, 531 [2d Dep't. 2011], quoting Petersen v. Spartan Indus., 33 N.Y.2d 463, 467, 354 N.Y.S.2d 905, 908 [1974]. See Archer-Vail v LHV Precast Inc., 168 A.D.3d 1257, 92 N.Y.S.3d 434 [3d Dep't. 2019]).

Indeed, CPLR 3211(d) provides that if facts essential to justify opposition to a motion to dismiss exist, but cannot then be stated, the court may deny the motion so that the defendant may assert the affirmative defense in a responsive pleading if that pleading has not yet been served, with leave to renew the motion upon the completion of discovery (Qudsi v Larios, 173 A.D.3d 920, 103 N.Y.S.3d 492 [2d Dep't. June 12, 2019]), or alternatively, hold the dismissal motion in abeyance to permit discovery about the jurisdictional issue (Fernandez v DaimlerChrysler, A.G., 143 A.D.3d 765, 40 N.Y.S.3d 128 [2d Dep't. 2016]). The plaintiff's opposition to dismissal on general jurisdiction grounds cannot be based upon mere speculation, conjecture, surmise, wishful-thinking, fortune telling, or unsupported allegations to justify a denial of the motion with leave to renew, or to justify a continuance of the motion pending discovery. The plaintiff must instead tender at least some tangible evidence or basis which refutes the defendant's argument that general jurisdiction is lacking (Robins v Procure Treatment Centers, Inc., 157 A.D.3d 606, 70 N.Y.S.3d 457 [1st Dep't. 2018]). Plaintiffs have been denied disclosure, and had their actions dismissed, where they failed to make credible non-frivolous showings that facts may exist to support the exercise of personal jurisdiction (Glazer v Socata, S.A.S., 170 A.D.3d 1685, 96 N.Y.S.3d 791 [4th Dep't. 2019]; Abad v Lorenzo, 163 A.D.3d 903, 82 N.Y.S.3d 486 [2d Dep't. 2018]).

Prohibited Service on the Religious Sabbath

General Business Law 11 prohibits service of process on Sundays, and relatedly, General Business Law 13 prohibits service on Saturdays as to any persons who observe that day as a holy time. The Sunday prohibition, which was enacted in 1965 (L. 1965, c. 1031, sec. 45), is consistent with local "blue laws" that existed at that time where businesses were closed for rest on the Lord's Day. The Saturday prohibition, which is protective of Jewish defendants, goes so far as to render a violation of the statute by a process server a misdemeanor. In any event, service of process in violation of GBL 11 or 13 renders the service void (Foster v. Piasecki, 259 A.D.2d 804, 686 N.Y.S.2d 184 [3d Dep't. 1999] [Sunday service]; JP Morgan Chase Bank, Nat'l Ass'n. v Lilker, 153 AD3d 1243, 61 N.Y.S.3d 578 [2d Dep't. 2017] [Saturday service upon an observant]), and subjects the plaintiff to a dismissal of the complaint for failing to obtain personal jurisdiction over the defendant.

For a defendant that observes Saturdays as a holy time, dismissal of the complaint for improper service is only warranted where 1) the defendant is not merely Jewish, but observes Saturday as a no-work holy time, and 2) the timing of service is motivated by malice. Malice speaks to the state of mind of the process server, or perhaps by imputation to that of the plaintiff's attorney (Hirsch v. Ben Zvi, 184 Misc.2d 946, 712 N.Y.S.2d 238 [Civ. Ct., Kings County 2000]). Dismissals will be denied if the defendant fails to establish that he or she is, in fact, observant (e.g., Chase Manhattan Bank, N.A. v Powell, 111 Misc.2d 1011, 445 N.Y.S.2d 928 [Sup. Ct., Nassau County 1981]), or where the necessary element of malice is not shown (e.g., Matter of Kushner, 200 AD2d 1; 613 N.Y.S.3d 363 [1st Dept. 1994]). Malice can be demonstrated by the drawing of a reasonable inference from the circumstances, or from actual knowledge that the defendant is religiously observant on Saturdays (Hirsch v. Ben Zvi, 184 Misc.2d at 948, 712 N.Y.S.2d at 238).

These issues arose in Hudson City Savings Bank, FSB v Schoenfeld, 172 A.D.3d 692, 99 N.Y.S.3d 389 [2d Dep't. 2019]). Few details of the service of process were discussed in the published decision. However, in Schoenfeld, a Jewish defendant was served with process on Sukkot, which did not fall that year on a Saturday or Sunday. The defendant moved to dismiss the action on the ground that, inter alia, the service of process on Sukkot violated GBL 13. The Appellate Division, Second Department agreed with the Supreme Court that on the record before it, a dismissal of the complaint for improper service was not warranted under CPLR 3211(a)(8) or GBL 13. The Second Department determined that since the contested service did not occur on a Saturday, there was no actual violation of GBL 13, and in any event, the defendant failed to establish that the timing of service was motivated by a malicious intent.

The plain language of GBL 13 does not protect Jewish defendants from being served with process on any holy days, except for when they occur on Saturdays, or in the case of everyone, Sundays under GBL 11. Thus, service on Passover or Yom Kippur is not statutorily prohibited upon a Jewish defendant unless the holy day happens to fall on a Saturday (GBL 13) or a Sunday (GBL 11). Similarly, service of process upon a Christian defendant is permissible on various non-Sunday holy days, but is never allowed on Easter because that holy day always falls by definition on a Sunday (GBL 13).

One may question whether the statutory dichotomy between weekly holy days and annual holy days makes sense, as the public policy for not permitting service of process on Sundays, or on Saturdays for those who are observant then, is no less compelling than for major annual holy days that receive as much or more sincere religious attention. Conversely, were GBL 11 and 13 interpreted to apply to non-weekend holy days, or if the statutes were amended by the legislature to say so, would process be off limits upon observant Jewish defendants during all eight days of Chanukah? Or the entire 30-day month of Ramadan for defendants observant of the Muslim faith? The issue of extending the prohibition of service to non-Saturday or non-Sunday religious holy days would necessarily raise difficulties for the secular legislature in defining which holy days of each religion is significant enough to warrant protections against the service of process on those days, and which secondary holy days would not qualify for that protection. One can imagine the problems inherent in drawing such Christian, Jewish, Muslim, and other religious denominational lines. The current language of GBL 11 and 13 sets forth lines that are bright. The Second Department's holding in Schoenfeld therefore appears to be correct to the extent it is based upon the plain and unambiguous language of GBL 13.

That said, there is no excuse for process servers to effect process on Sundays in violation of GBL 11, and in virtually all instances, they know better. The statute applies in favor of all defendants and the prohibition is clear-cut. Service on Saturdays is arguably more dicey, particularly if the plaintiff or process server knows or has reason to know that the defendant is Jewish, but does not know the depth of the defendant's religiosity. If a Jewish defendant is located for service of process at a work place on a Saturday, the service should survive jurisdictional challenge as a defendant engaged in employment should be unable to simultaneously claim the religious observance protection of GBL 13. If a Jewish defendant is found elsewhere, and the extent of religiosity is not known, the process server might be advised to speak to the defendant about the process before effecting it, or alternatively, be even better advised to effect process on another day that avoids the complications and pitfalls of GBL 13.

C3211:53. Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraph 1, 3, 4, 5, or 6 of 3211(a)

Since the time Moses parted the Red Sea, or at least since 1962, CPLR 3211 has identified certain affirmative defenses which, if not raised in the defendant's answer or in a pre-answer motion to dismiss, are waived by the defendant. CPLR 3018(b) also provides that defendants must plead affirmative defenses of matters which, if not pleaded, would likely surprise the plaintiff. If a defendant merely denies an allegation in a complaint which requires the plaintiff to then prove the matter, may a court deem the denial the equivalent of an "affirmative defense," even though no separate affirmative defense is actually pleaded in the answer? There have been conflicting appellate decisions on this issue, but recently, the Second Department rendered an extensive analytical opinion that answers the question with a definitive "No."

This pleading issue came to a head in the context of a residential mortgage foreclosure appeal, though it could have appeared as easily in other types of civil litigations. There have been foreclosure actions where plaintiff lenders asserted allegations in their complaints to establish their standing to commence the foreclosure actions against the defaulted homeowners and their collateralized properties. In certain of those appeals, defendant homeowners had served answers either denying the standing-related allegations outright ("D") or denying information sufficient to form a belief ("DKI"), but without separately interposing an affirmative defense that the lenders lacked standing. If a mere "D" or "DKI" of allegations were to qualify as an implicit and cognizable affirmative defense that standing is lacking, the plaintiff lenders would be required to prove those allegations as part of their prima facie burden when moving for summary judgment. Otherwise, not. The adequacy of moving papers hung in the balance at the trial courts and on appeal. The reader can substitute allegations about standing with those about the statute of limitations, or the statute of frauds, or other legal mainstays, and the query raised here is the same.

The significance of the issue, particularly for defendants, is that several defenses are waived under CPLR 3211(e) unless set forth as an affirmative defense in the responsive pleading or as a ground for a pre-answer dismissal motion. These waivable defenses include many of the staples relied upon by defense attorneys including, among others, the plaintiff's lack of capacity to sue, standing, collateral estoppel, res judicata, the statute of limitations, and the statute of frauds.

A 3-1 holding was rendered by the Appellate Division, Second Department in U.S. Bank National Association v Nelson, 169 A.D.3d 110, 93 N.Y.S.3d 138 (2d Dep't. 2019) (signed opinion by Mastro, J.), which now definitively holds that affirmative defenses are not cognizable by a defendant's mere denial or "DKI" of allegations contained in the complaint. Instead, for affirmative defenses to be cognizable and preserved, they must specifically be set forth in the answer as such. The reason is found in CPLR 3018, which draws a distinction between denials, which place at issue proofs that the plaintiff must provide at trial, from affirmative defenses, which raise new defensive matter beyond the elements that plaintiffs must affirmatively plead in a complaint and then prove. Without separately pleaded affirmative defenses, plaintiffs could be surprised by defenses raised later, which CPLR 3018(b) expressly seeks to avoid.

Moreover, though not mentioned in the Nelson opinion, a clearly-defined separation between complaint allegations on the one hand, and affirmative defense allegations on the other, properly directs the parties' respective burdens of proof to their own allegations. Since standing is not an element that plaintiffs must plead and prove, and is instead purely in the nature of a defense, the denial or "DKI" of allegations that incidentally implicated standing failed in Nelson to qualify as an "affirmative defense." One appellate justice dissented, arguing that mere denials, and "DKIs" that are to be treated for pleading purposes as denials under CPLR 3018(a), raise affirmative defenses by putting plaintiffs to their burden of proving the matters actually asserted in the complaint.

To argue that a mere "D" in response to an allegation qualifies as an affirmative defense is problematic, and if adopted would wreak havoc upon practitioners and courts. While CPLR 3014 provides that pleadings shall consist of plain and concise statements containing as far as practicable a single allegation, it is not unusual for practitioners to craft pleadings that contain multiple fragmented allegations within a single paragraph. The defendant answering the complaint may provide a fragmented response in the answer, or may deny the entirety of a complaint paragraph even if only one specific allegation within the paragraph is deniable. Where a multi-allegation paragraph is answered with a blanket "D," the plaintiff does not necessarily know which one or more fragments of the complaint paragraph prompted the denial of the entire paragraph. In some of those circumstances, it would be impossible for the plaintiff or the court to know what, if any, affirmative defense is supposedly and implicitly invoked by the defendant's responsive denial of the paragraph in the complaint. Complicating matters further are answers consisting of a "general denial," where the defendant denies in a single sentence all of the allegations in a plaintiff's complaint. While general denials tend to be seen in response to shorter, simpler complaints, the omnibus denial makes it likely difficult or impossible for the plaintiff's attorney or the court to discern what affirmative defense(s) the general denial is intended to convey by implication. Thus, the best practice for lawyers, litigants, and courts, is to follow the well-reasoned logic of Nelson by requiring defendants who are vested of defenses to plead them as affirmative defenses in their answers, especially where the failure to do so results in a waiver of those defenses (CPLR 3211[e]).

Even more problematic is the argument that a mere "DKI" is sufficient to implicitly raise an affirmative defense against the complaint paragraph that it is responds to, without more. The reason is that if a defendant responds to an allegation using a "DKI," the defendant is saying in good faith that he or she does not know whether to admit or deny the allegation. If the defendant does not know whether to admit or deny because sufficient information is lacking, how can it simultaneously be said that the defendant knows enough to assert an affirmative defense against that same allegation? The two concepts are irreconcilable with each other, and untenable considering that many answers are verified by a party or counsel (CPLR 3020[b]) and all answers contain good faith attorney and pro se certifications as required by the Rules of the Chief Administrator (22 NYCRR 130-1.1-a). Thus, while CPLR 3018(a) provides that a "DKI" "shall have the effect of a denial," that statutory provision should be interpreted as meaning that "D" and "DKI" are treated the same only in regard to issues of proof at trial, and not be used as a substitute for the separate requirement of CPLR 3018(b) that affirmative defenses be expressly pleaded at the outset of the litigation. Once again, the Nelson opinion provides sage guidance that avoids the confusion that would result if a mere "D" or "DKI" were to be allowed by courts to constitute affirmative defenses, without actually pleading the defenses as such.

The Nelson case, while postured as one for summary judgment and an order of reference, says more about the assertion of affirmative defenses under CPLR 3211(a) than it says about CPLR 3212.

Based on the majority holding in Nelson, the following Second Department cases which held to the contrary are no longer good law and should not be followed in that department: Bank of America, N.A. v. Barton, 149 A.D.3d 676, 50 N.Y.S.3d 546 (2d Dep't. 2017), Nationstar Mortgage, LLC v. Wong, 132 A.D.3d 825, 18 N.Y.S.3d 669 (2d Dep't. 2015), Bank of America, N.A. v. Paulsen, 125 A.D.3d 909, 6 N.Y.S.3d 68 (2d Dep't. 2015), and U.S. Bank National Association v. Faruque, 120 A.D.3d 575, 991 N.Y.S.2d 630 (2d Dep't. 2014). If factual or legal defenses exist for defendants, counsel should robustly assert them as affirmative defenses in the answers, or in CPLR 3211 motions to dismiss, and fulfill the true purpose of CPLR 3018(a) as intended by the state legislature, which is to prevent surprise to adversary parties.

SUPPLEMENTARY PRACTICE COMMENTARIES

by John R. Higgitt

2018

C3211:6. Specifying the Ground of the Motion.

CPLR 2214, an important motion-requirement statute of general applicability, Commentary C3211:3, directs a movant to specify in the notice of motion, among other things, the grounds for the motion. CPLR 2214(a). "Grounds" means the legal reasons why the relief sought in the motion is warranted. In the CPLR 3211(a) context, identifying the specific paragraphs of subdivision (a) (e.g., CPLR 3211(a)(3), 3211(a)(7)), or stating the specific grounds (e.g., lack of capacity, failure to state a cause of action), should satisfy CPLR 2214(a). See Commentary 3211:6 (main vol.).

Violations of CPLR 2214(a) are not uncommon. The failure of a movant to specify in the notice of motion the grounds for the relief sought can be--but is not necessarily--fatal to the motion. If the grounds for the motion are clearly expressed in the papers supporting the motion, such as an affirmation in support or memorandum of law, and the party opposing the motion has not been prejudiced by the CPLR 2214(a) violation, the court may overlook the procedural misstep. See Commentary 3211:6 (main vol.). In determining whether to overlook a CPLR 2214(a) violation, a court will also consider whether the notice of motion contains a broadly-worded "wherefore" clause, i.e., a provision stating that, in addition to the specific relief sought, the movant requests "such other, further, or different relief as th[e] court may deem just and proper." See Commentary, C2214:5, at 114-115 (main vol.); see also Kreamer v. Town of Oxford, 96 A.D.3d 1130, 946 N.Y.S.2d 284 (3d Dep't 2012); Llano v. Leading Insurance Services, Inc., 45 Misc.3d 131(A), 3 N.Y.S.3d 285 (table), 2014 W.L. 6638365 (App. Term, 1st Dep't 2014).

That a court may consider a ground that is not apparent from the face of a notice of motion doesn't mean that it will do so. See Abizadeh v. Abizadeh, 159 A.D.3d 856, 72 N.Y.S.3d 566 (2d Dep't 2018) ("Supreme Court providently exercised its discretion in denying the plaintiff's cross motion on the ground that the plaintiff's notice of cross motion was deficient. The plaintiff's notice of cross motion failed to sufficiently specify the relief sought, against whom it was sought, and the grounds therefor. Although the plaintiff's supporting papers supplied the missing information, a court is not required to comb through a litigant's papers to find information that is required to be set forth in the notice of motion") (internal citations omitted). Whether a court will overlook the movant's failure to specify the grounds for the motion is a matter of discretion. See CPLR 3211:6 (main vol.).

C3211:10. Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence."

A Plaintiff Can Respond to "Documentary Evidence" With Other Evidence ("Documentary" or Not) in an Effort to Defeat a CPLR 3211(a)(1) Motion.

In the main volume, we observe that, "[i]n opposing a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion, a plaintiff is free to submit evidence demonstrating that the defendant's [documentary] evidence does not conclusively resolve the action." Commentary C3211:10, at 27. In Matter of Koegel, 160 A.D.3d 11, 70 N.Y.S.3d 540 (2018, Austin, J.), the Second Department highlighted the virtue of opposing a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion with evidence. There, the party confronted with a "documentary evidence" motion beat it back by tendering some of her proof. The party against whom the motion was made submitted affidavits that suggested that, notwithstanding the movant's "documentary evidence," the challenged pleading may be meritorious. Thus, Matter of Koegel highlights additionally that, although a defendant is required to submit "documentary evidence" in support of a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion, a plaintiff opposing such a motion "is free to submit [any] evidence demonstrating that the defendant's evidence does not conclusively resolve the action (or challenged causes of action)." Commentary C3211:10, at 27 (main vol.).

Court Reviews the Ways in Which Documentary Evidence May be Used to Dismiss Defamation Claims.

Defamation--libel or slander, depending on the manner in which the offensive comments were communicated--is a complex tort. Many defamation actions involve the intersection of federal constitutional and state tort law. Defamation law is beyond the scope of these Commentaries. Cf. 2A P.J.I.2d 3:23, et seq. In Greenberg v. Spitzer, 155 A.D.3d 27, 62 N.Y.S.3d 372 (2d Dep't 2017), the court, in an opinion by Justice Chambers, reviews various uses of "documentary evidence" for a defamation defendant seeking dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(1).

C3211:12. Plaintiff's Lack of Capacity.

Court of Appeals Reviews the Issue of Whether a "Public Benefit Corporation" has the Capacity to Challenge the Constitutionality of a State Statute.

"Municipalities and other local governmental corporate entities and their officers [generally] lack capacity to mount constitutional challenges to acts of the State and State legislation." City of New York v. State of New York, 86 N.Y.2d 286, 289, 631 N.Y.S.2d 553, 655 N.E.2d 649 (1995, Levine, J.). That's to say that municipalities and other local governmental entities and their officers usually don't have the power to attack in court the constitutionality of state policy and state laws. See Commentary C3211:12 (main vol.). Does this rule apply to a "public benefit corporation"?

First of all, what is a public benefit corporation? It's one of three types of "public corporations," the other two being "municipal corporations" and "district corporations." See General Construction Law § 65(b). The public benefit corporation is "organized to construct or operate a public improvement wholly or partly within the [S]tate, the profits from which inure to the benefit of this or other states, or to the people thereof." General Construction Law § 66(4). These entities fund public works projects while insulating the State from direct, long-term debt. Schulz v. State of New York, 84 N.Y.2d 231, 244, 616, N.Y.S.2d 343, 639 N.E.2d 1440 (1994, Kaye, C.J.). Although created by the State, the public benefit corporation is independent of the sovereign.

Can a public benefit corporation, which bears some of the marks of a state entity and some of the marks of a private one, assert in court that a state statute is unconstitutional? Phrased differently, is the rule preventing municipalities and other public entities from leveling constitutional challenges against state policies and state laws applicable to public benefit corporations?

The Court of Appeals considered the subject in Matter of World Trade Center Lower Manhattan Disaster Site Litigation, 30 N.Y.3d 377, 67 N.Y.S.3d 547, 89 N.E.3d 1227 (2017). In an opinion by Judge Feinman, the Court concludes that "public benefit corporations have no greater stature to challenge the constitutionality of state statutes than do municipal corporations or other local governmental entities." 30 N.Y.3d at 393, 67 N.Y.S.3d at 558, 89 N.E.3d at 1238 (rejecting the argument that a court must engage in a "particularized inquiry" to determine whether a public benefit corporation should be treated like a municipal corporation).

Above, we noted the general rule that municipalities and other local governmental entities and their officers lack the capacity to challenge the constitutionality of state action. However, a state-created or sanctioned entity does have capacity to make such challenges if the Legislature expressly authorizes that entity to do so; that's "a question of legislative intent and substantive state law." 30 N.Y.3d at 384, 67 N.Y.S.3d at 551, 89 N.E.3d at 1231. Additionally, "special circumstances" occasionally permit a public entity to bring a constitutional challenge. 30 N.Y.3d at 386-387, 67 N.Y.S.3d at 553, 89 N.E.3d at 1233. The special circumstances exceptions are ad hoc and narrow. 30 N.Y.3d at 387, 67 N.Y.S.3d at 553, 89 N.E.3d at 1234. Therefore, a public benefit corporation, like a municipality, may rebut the presumption that it lacks capacity to challenge the constitutionality of a state action by demonstrating that the public benefit corporation was expressly authorized to bring that challenge or that special circumstances warrant a dispensation from the general rule.

C3211:15. Same Parties, Same Cause of Action.

An Open Question as to Whether the Plaintiff Could Get Full Relief in a Federal Action Precludes Dismissal Under CPLR 3211(a)(4) of a Similar New York State Court Action.

CPLR 3211(a)(4) provides a remedy for a defendant to a New York action "where there is another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action in a court of any state or the United States." To disturb an action under that paragraph, the action in which the 3211 relief is sought and the other action must involve the same parties and the same cause of action. Commentary C3211:15 (main vol.). Two actions involve the same parties and the same cause of action where the following elements of the actions are substantially similar: (1) the parties; (2) the causes of action; and (3) the relief sought. Id.

The court in Rothschild v. Braselmann, 157 A.D.3d 1027, 69 N.Y.S.3d 375 (3d Dep't 2018, Pritzker, J.), identified a unique concern that may be present when the other action pending is in federal court.

The plaintiff in Rothschild was an inmate at New York State correctional facilities. During his incarceration, the plaintiff suffered serious urological problems that led to hospitalization for septic shock. The plaintiff initiated three actions in three different courts seeking redress for injuries stemming from his medical ordeal. First, the plaintiff commenced a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action in federal court, alleging that, in violation of the federal constitution's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment, he received inadequate medical care. Second, the plaintiff filed a claim in the New York State Court of Claims, alleging negligence and medical malpractice by doctors who treated him and their employees. Third, the plaintiff commenced an action in Supreme Court; the claims of negligence and malpractice in the Supreme Court action were similar to the claims lodged in the Court of Claims action.

As is relevant here, two of the medical doctor defendants who provided contractual medical services to the inmate-plaintiff sought dismissal of the Supreme Court action as against them on the basis that the federal court and Court of Claims actions related to the same parties and same cause of action as the Supreme Court action. (We'll refer to these physicians as "the moving defendants.") Supreme Court granted that relief.

The Third Department reinstated the Supreme Court complaint as against the moving defendants. With respect to the federal action, the Third Department provided the following analysis: the federal court had subject matter jurisdiction over the plaintiff's action by virtue of his federal law claim (§ 1983); the federal law claim provided a predicate for the federal court to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the plaintiff's state law negligence and medical malpractice claims; stringent proof is required to prevail on a § 1983 claim and, therefore, the plaintiff's federal law claim might ultimately be dismissed by the federal court; in the event the federal court dismissed the federal law claim, that court could--but would not be required to--retain jurisdiction over the related state law claims; because the Appellate Division could not ascertain whether the federal court would retain jurisdiction over the state law claims and, relatedly, whether the federal court would ultimately adjudicate those claims on their merits, the plaintiff might be unable to obtain full relief in the federal action. 157 A.D.3d at 1028-1029, 69 N.Y.S.3d at 379. Thus, the Third Department declined to find that the federal court and Supreme Court actions involved the same parties for the same cause of action. 157 A.D.3d at 1029, 69 N.Y.S.3d at 379 ("Because it is impossible to speculate whether the federal court would dismiss or retain jurisdiction in this situation, the federal action cannot be said to be duplicative, as plaintiff may be unable to obtain full relief therein.").

Regarding the relationship between the Supreme Court and Court of Claims actions, the Third Department noted that the legal theories in the actions were nearly identical, and that both actions arose out of the same set of facts. However, there was a chance that the plaintiff could prevail in the Court of Claims action, but be left with a judgment that was wholly or partially unenforceable.

It's a possibility that exists by virtue of the relevant state-actor indemnification statutes: Correction Law § 24-a and Public Officers Law § 17. Under those provisions, a physician who provided medical care to an inmate at the request of the State Department of Correction is entitled to indemnification and a defense from the State, unless it's determined that the physician engaged in intentional wrongdoing.

If the Court of Claims determined--in that court, the judge serves as the finder of fact (see Court of Claims Act § 12(3))--that one or both of the moving defendants engaged in intentional wrongdoing, the plaintiff's recovery in that action might be diminished. That's because a plaintiff in a Court of Claims action can recover damages from the State, but not individuals. Thus, if the State doesn't owe statutory indemnity to a state actor for his or her conduct, the plaintiff will not be compensated in the context of the Court of Claims action for the fault of the state actor.

Given the factual allegations and theories of liability in the Court of Claims action, a determination that the moving defendants engaged in intentional wrongdoing was "unlikely." But the potential was there; the State neither conceded nor admitted in any of its Court of Claims submissions that the State was bound to indemnify the moving defendants. Therefore, dismissal of the Supreme Court action under CPLR 3211(a)(4) and the concomitant elimination of a forum in which the plaintiff could seek redress directly from the moving defendants was not warranted. Instead, the Third Department stayed the Supreme Court action pending the outcome of the Court of Claims action, a result that "effectively preserve[d] any rights of recovery that [the] plaintiff ha[d] available, prevent[ed] disparate outcomes and limit[ed] duplicative and costly litigation." 157 A.D.3d at 1030, 69 N.Y.S.3d at 379; see Commentary C3211:17 (main vol.).

C3211:21. Failure to State a Cause of Action, Generally.

A Court Reviewing a CPLR 3211(a)(7) Motion Must Focus on the Allegations in the Complaint.

CPLR 3211(a)(7)--the failure-to-state-a-cause-of-action dismissal ground--is the workhorse of subdivision (a). No other paragraph gets more exercise. That's because it allows for dismissal where the plaintiff fails to plead a cognizable claim or where the defendant submits evidence rebutting the plaintiff's factual allegations. See Commentary C3211:21 (2018 Pocket Part "CPLR 3211(a)(7): the Most Versatile of the Dismissal Grounds" entry).

Regardless of which type of CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion is made against a complaint, a plaintiff is aided by three rules of decision: (1) give the complaint a liberal construction, (2) accept the allegations as true, and (3) provide the plaintiff with the benefit of every possible favorable inference. Commentary C3211:21 (main vol.).

In Nomura Home Equity Loan, Inc., Series 2006-FM2 v. Nomura Credit & Capital, Inc., 30 N.Y.3d 572, 69 N.Y.S.3d 520, 92 N.E.3d 743 (Stein, J., 2017), the Court of Appeals highlighted important caveats to those rules of decision: the court must focus on the allegations in the complaint, and avoid reading into the complaint assertions or theories that are contrary to those that were expressly pleaded by the plaintiff. See Connaughton v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., 29 N.Y.3d 137, 53 N.Y.S.3d 598, 75 N.E.3d 1159 (Rivera, J., 2017) ("We may not read into [the plaintiff's] allegations a claim for cognizable damages, which he did not actually incur, under the guise of liberally construing the complaint."). The application of these caveats proved critical in Nomura.

The majority in Nomura applied the familiar rules of decision to the allegations and claims asserted by the plaintiff, and concluded that the complaint could not survive the defendants' CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion. The majority declined to construe the complaint as asserting a theory that was not expressed in the complaint and was contrary to plaintiff's allegations.

CPLR 3211(a)(7): the Most Versatile of the Dismissal Grounds.

Most of the grounds in CPLR 3211(a) are narrow, allowing for dismissal under specific circumstances. Paragraph 1 provides for dismissal based on "documentary evidence"; paragraph 2 provides for dismissal based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction; paragraph 3 provides dismissal for lack of capacity or standing; paragraph 4 provides remedies where there is another action pending relating to the same matter; paragraph 5 provides dismissal for certain enumerated affirmative defenses; paragraph 6 provides for dismissal for a non-interposable counterclaim; paragraph 8 provides for dismissal for want of personal jurisdiction; paragraph 9 provides for dismissal for want of rem or in rem jurisdiction; paragraph 10 provides remedies for failure to join an important individual or entity as a party; and paragraph 11 provides for dismissal in favor of certain uncompensated officials of not-for-profit organizations. Paragraph 7, however, is a broad dismissal ground.

That's because under CPLR 3211(a)(7), the failure-to-state-a-cause-of-action tool, dismissal can eventuate for either a pleading defect or because an allegation material to a facially-sufficient complaint has been bested by evidence. See Lubonty v. U.S. Bank National Association, 159 A.D.3d 962, 74 N.Y.S.3d 279 (2d Dep't 2018) ("By showing [with evidence] that a material fact as claimed by the plaintiff was not a fact at all, [the defendant] established its entitlement to dismissal of the action pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(7)").

Let's count the number of situations in which a paragraph 7 motion can generate the dismissal of a complaint (or a particular aspect of it):

1. Where the complaint does not identify a cause of action cognizable at law, e.g., civil conspiracy, educational malpractice.

2. Where the complaint identifies a cognizable cause of action, but fails to plead all of the material elements of it. See Commentaries C3013:3, C3013:15A (main vol.).

3. Where the complaint identifies a cognizable cause of action and pleads all of the material elements of it, but fails to set forth "[s]tatements ... sufficiently particular to give the court and parties notice of the transactions, occurrences, or series of transactions intended to be proved." CPLR 3013; see Mid-Hudson Valley Federal Credit Union v. Quartararo, 31 N.Y.3d 1090, 78 N.Y.S.3d 703, 103 N.E.3d 774 (2018); Commentaries C3013:2, C3013:15A (main vol.). Concrete factual allegations must be asserted in the complaint supporting or tending to support the elements of the cognizable cause of action. See Sager v. City of Buffalo, 151 A.D.3d 1908, 58 N.Y.S.3d 796 (4th Dep't 2017). Allegations consisting of bare legal conclusions will not suffice. See Connaughton v. Chipotle Mexican Grill, Inc., 29 N.Y.3d 137, 53 N.Y.S.3d 598, 75 N.E.3d 1159 (2017); Mid-Hudson Valley Federal Credit Union v. Quartararo, 155 A.D.3d 1218, 64 N.Y.S.3d 389, aff'd 31 N.Y.3d 1090, 78 N.Y.S.3d 703, 103 N.E.3d 774.

4. Where the complaint identifies a cognizable cause of action, pleads all of the material elements of it, and contains sufficient factual allegations supporting those elements, but the defendant submits evidence convincingly refuting a material allegation in the complaint. See Lubonty v. U.S. Bank National Association, supra. Just how powerful must defendant's evidence be to warrant dismissal? The courts aren't in agreement on this important question. See Commentary C3211:23 (main vol.)

5. Where the complaint identifies a cognizable cause of action, pleads all of the material elements of it, and contains sufficient factual allegations supporting those elements, but the plaintiff's submissions in opposition to the motion to dismiss convincingly refute a material allegation in the complaint. See M & B Joint Venture, Inc. v. Laurus Master Fund, Ltd., 12 N.Y.3d 798, 879 N.Y.S.2d 812, 907 N.E.2d 690 (2009) ("Because plaintiff's own evidentiary submissions 'conclusively establish that it has no cause of action,' dismissal of the complaint as to [certain defendants] is appropriate," quoting Rovello v. Orofino Realty Co., 40 N.Y.2d 633, 636, 389 N.Y.S.2d 314, 357 N.E.2d 970 [1976]) (internal brackets omitted).

An additional feature of CPLR 3211(a)(7): it can be raised either pre-or post-answer. CPLR 3211(e). Therefore, there are four different classes of CPLR (a)(7) motions: (1) a pre-answer motion unsupported by evidence, (2) a pre-answer motion supported by evidence, (3) a post-answer motion unsupported by evidence, and (4) a post-answer motion supported by evidence. Commentary C3211:26 (main vol.).

C3211:28. Lack of Personal Jurisdiction.

CPLR 3211(a)(8) Can be Used to Seek Dismissal of an Action on the Ground of Improper Joinder.

CPLR 3211(a)(8) allows a defendant to seek dismissal of a complaint on the basis that the court lacks personal jurisdiction over her. When employing this dismissal ground, the defendant is asserting that, under the circumstances of the case, the court does not have the power to render a judgment binding on her. Commentary C3211:28 (main vol.). The defendant can use paragraph 8 to raise any defect relating to personal jurisdiction. Id. Such defects include the absence of any basis upon which the court may exercise its jurisdiction over the defendant (i.e., the court lacks general or specific jurisdiction over the defendant), the failure of the plaintiff to effect proper service on the defendant, and the failure of the plaintiff to commence properly the action. See id.

Another defect touching on the court's personal jurisdiction over a defendant is the improper joinder of that party. "Improper joinder" refers to the situation where a plaintiff fails to comply with CPLR article 10 when attempting to add an individual or entity as a party--usually a defendant--to the action.

A plaintiff's failure to obtain leave of court to add the new party is an issue that arises in this context. CPLR 1003, part of the CPLR article 10 club, provides that "[p]arties may be added at any stage of the action by leave of court or by stipulation of all parties who have appeared, or once without leave of court within twenty days after service of the original summons or at any time before the period for responding to that summons expires or within twenty days after service of a pleading responding to it."

The Second Department summarized the improper joinder/personal jurisdiction subject this way:

"[t]he failure to obtain leave required under CPLR 1003 create[s] the opportunity for a defendant to claim that the court lacks personal jurisdiction over it because the summons and complaint served were nullities. The purported defect in joinder thus requires a prompt motion to dismiss [under CPLR 3211(a)] or preservation by way of defense in the answer, lest it be deemed waived (CPLR 3211, subd. [e])." McDaniel v. Clarkstown Central District No. 1, 83 A.D.2d 624, 441 N.Y.S.2d 532 (1981); see Public Administrator of Kings County v. McBride, 15 A.D.3d 558, 791 N.Y.S.2d 570 (2d Dep't 2005); see also Yonker v. AMOL Motorcycles, Inc., 161 A.D.2d 638, 555 N.Y.S.2d 416 (2d Dep't 1990); Warner v. Kain, 52 Misc. 3d 1209(A), 41 N.Y.S.3d 722 (table), 2016 W.L. 3884726 (Sup. Ct., St. Lawrence County 2016, Muller, J.).

There is no shortage of examples of instances in which a defendant has waived an improper-joinder argument. See Zheng v. American Friends of the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar, Inc., 67 A.D.3d 639, 889 N.Y.S.2d 55 (2d Dep't 2009); Santopolo v. Turner Construction Co., 181 A.D.2d 429, 580 N.Y.S.2d 755 (1st Dep't 1992); Gross v. BFH Co., Inc., 151 A.D.2d 452, 542 N.Y.S.2d 241 (2d Dep't 1989); Gavigan v. Gavigan, 123 A.D.2d 823, 507 N.Y.S.2d 439 (2d Dep't 1986); Wolfsohn v. Seabreeze Estate LLC, 28 Misc. 3d 1239(A), 958 N.Y.S.2d 311 (table), 2010 W.L. 3700276 (Sup. Ct., Queens County 2010, McDonald, J.); Moses v. City of New York, 18 Misc. 3d 1113(A), 856 N.Y.S.2d 499 (table), 2008 W.L. 89661 (Sup. Ct., Kings County 2008, Battaglia, J.).

In Martin v. Witkowski, 158 A.D.3d 131, 68 N.Y.S.3d 603 (2017, NeMoyer, J.), the Fourth Department had occasion to make the point that a defendant seeking to interpose the defense of improper joinder must, under the pains of waiver, raise it in a timely CPLR 3211(a)(8) motion to dismiss, see Commentaries C3211:48, 55, or an answer to the amended complaint. (An amended complaint should be the title of the pleading adding a party to an action. See Commentaries C1003:2 [main vol.], C3025:3A [main vol.]; Siegel & Connors, New York Practice §§ 49, 65 [6th ed.].)

The court dealt with the improper-joinder subject in the context of a dispute as to who, as between a father and son of the same name, constituted the defendant in the action. The plaintiff had commenced the action against a single defendant, employing the shared name of the father and son without including a suffix (i.e., Sr. or Jr.). Because of the absence of a suffix following the defendant's name in the caption of the action, issues arose as to which gentleman was the actual defendant in the action and whether service of process was effected on the actual defendant. To identify the actual defendant and address the various procedural issues manifested by the plaintiff's failure to supply a suffix to the defendant's name, the Martin court reviewed thoroughly the way the law distinguishes between a father and son sharing the same name and, relatedly, the consequences of the presence or absence of "Sr." or "Jr." with the name of a party.

C3211:34. Motion to Dismiss Defense, Generally.

Motion to Dismiss a Defense Under CPLR 3211(b) Can be Made at Any Time and is Not Subject to Brill v. City of New York.

CPLR 3211(b) provides for the motion to dismiss a defense. The typical beneficiary of subdivision (b) is the plaintiff, but any party who has asserted an affirmative claim (e.g., counterclaim, cross claim) can invoke that subdivision to challenge a defense lodged against the claim. See Commentary C3211:34 (main vol.). (We'll assume here that it's the plaintiff that wants to employ CPLR 3211[b].) The plaintiff can seek dismissal of a defense on the ground that it has not been stated or that it has no merit. CPLR 3211(b) therefore sanctions both facial-sufficiency and merits-based challenges to a defense. Commentary C3211:36 (main vol.). One of paragraph (b)'s greatest virtues (in the eyes of the party invoking it) is that it may be made at any time. Commentary C3211:34 (main vol.).

That virtue was displayed in Zarnoch v. Luckina, 148 A.D.3d 1615, 50 N.Y.S.3d 709 (4th Dep't 2017). The plaintiff commenced an action to recover damages for injuries he sustained when was working on a construction project. The plaintiff, who was employed by the project's general contractor, brought the action against a subcontractor. The subcontractor obtained leave to amend its answer to assert as an affirmative defense that the plaintiff was its "special employee." (If the plaintiff was the subcontractor's special employee, the plaintiff could be barred, under the exclusivity provisions of the Workers' Compensation Law, from maintaining a tort action against the subcontractor. See 1B N.Y. P.J.I.3d 2:218 [2018].) The plaintiff sought dismissal of the special-employee affirmative defense under CPLR 3211(b) or summary judgment dismissing that defense. The motion court denied the plaintiff's motion on the basis that it was an untimely summary judgment motion. Apparently the plaintiff's motion in Zarnoch was made after the deadline for summary judgment motions and no satisfactory explanation was offered for the untimely motion. See Brill v. City of New York, 2 N.Y.3d 648, 781 N.Y.S.2d 261, 814 N.E.2d 431 (2004).

On appeal, however, the Fourth Department determined that the motion court erred in denying as untimely the plaintiff's motion to dismiss the special-employment affirmative defense because, "[t]o the extent that the ... motion sought relief pursuant to CPLR 3211(b), [the motion] was not subject to the time limit for summary judgment motions under CPLR 3212(a)." (The plaintiff won the procedural battle but lost the substantive war; the motion was denied because he failed to show that the affirmative defense was without merit as a matter of law. See Commentaries C3211:35, 36.)

C3211:43. Notice of the Conversion.

The Charting-a-Summary-Judgment-Course Exception to the Notice Requirement Only Applies Where the Parties Signal Unequivocally That They Are Laying Bare Their Proof.

CPLR 3211(c) allows a court to convert a motion to dismiss into one for summary judgment, provided the court gives the parties notice of its intention to do so and an opportunity to submit additional papers. See Commentary C3211:43 (main vol.). The notice requirement is important; it gives the parties, who are otherwise operating under the assumption that the motion is subject to the rules of decision and res judicata and collateral estoppel principles applicable to a CPLR 3211 motion, a chance to assemble a summary judgment record. See Nonnon v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d 825, 842 N.Y.S.2d 756, 874 N.E.2d 720 (2007).

The notice requirement has the following exceptions: (1) where conversion is requested by all parties; (2) where the motion raises a pure question of law that was addressed by the parties; and (3) where the parties deliberately chart a summary judgment course. See Commentary C3211:43 (main vol.). Exception number three receives the most attention, and was the subject of a decision by the Appellate Term, Second Department, in Pesce v. Leimsider, 59 Misc.3d 23, 72 N.Y.S.3d 760 (2018).

In Pesce, plaintiffs commenced a property damage case against defendants, one of whom sought dismissal relief under CPLR 3211(a)(7) (failure to state a cause of action). The motion court acknowledged that a motion to dismiss was before it, and converted it to a summary judgment motion without notice. The court did so because, in its estimation, the parties had charted a summary judgment course (exception number three). Upon converting the motion, the court granted summary judgment to the movant.

The Appellate Term disagreed with the motion court's conversion of the motion without notice to the parties, stating that they neither laid bare their proof nor " 'were ... put on notice of their obligation to make a complete record and to come forward with any evidence that could possibly be considered.' " 59 Misc.3d at 26-27, 72 N.Y.S.3d at ___, quoting Nonnon v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d at 827, 842 N.Y.S.2d at 758, 874 N.E.2d at 722. Had notice been provided, the plaintiffs could have asked for material discovery or sought to obtain evidence in admissible form to oppose the motion. Therefore, the defendant's CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion should have been adjudicated as such. (Because the parties to the appeal briefed the merits of the CPLR 3211 motion, the Appellate Term reviewed whether the defendant was entitled to relief under that statute and concluded that he was not.)

C3211:53. Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraph 1, 3, 4, 5, or 6 of 3211(a).

Raising a Ground in a Pre-Answer Motion to Dismiss May Preserve the Ground Even if the Motion is Denied and the Ground is Not Included in the Subsequent Answer.

To preserve an objection under paragraph 1 (documentary evidence), 3 (capacity), 4 (other action pending), 5 (affirmative defenses) or the rarely-exercised 6 (non-interposable counterclaim), a defendant must do one of the following: raise the objection in a timely CPLR 3211(a) motion or assert it in an answer. See CPLR 3211(e). If the defendant wants to interpose one of these objections but doesn't do so by pre-answer motion or in the answer, the objection is waived. See C3211:53. (main vol.). (The waiver is presumptive; the court may allow the defendant to amend her answer to include an otherwise waived defense. See C3211:58 [main vol.].)

Here are some common waiver scenarios:

• A defendant raises a given 1/3/4/5/6 objection in a pre-answer motion and the court grants the motion, leading to dismissal of the complaint (or challenged portion of it).

• A defendant raises the 1/3/4/5/6 objection in her answer and subsequently seeks dismissal based on the objection by way of a summary judgment motion or at trial.

• The defendant doesn't raise the 1/3/4/5/6 objection in a pre-answer motion or in the answer, and the objection is therefore waived--unless the court allows for an amendment of the answer to include the previously omitted objection.

How about this: a given 1/3/4/5/6 objection is lodged in a CPLR 3211(a) motion, the motion is denied, and the defendant wants to pursue the objection again at a later juncture, after the disclosure process has flushed out the facts. Must the defendant in this situation raise the objection in her answer to preserve it? The Second Department looked at this issue in Outlook Clothing Corp. v. Schneider, 153 A.D.3d 717, 60 N.Y.S.3d 302 (2017).

The plaintiffs in Outlook Clothing commenced an action against two defendants. As against defendant A, the plaintiffs asserted a cause of action for breach of fiduciary duty (A had been an officer and shareholder of one of the plaintiff-corporations, and after resigning as an officer and selling his shares in the corporation, A entered into a lease for commercial space previously occupied by the corporation, which had been evicted from the leasehold.) The defendants made a pre-answer motion under CPLR 3211(a)(5) to dismiss the cause of action asserted against A, claiming that the cause of action was barred by a release given by the corporation to A. Supreme Court denied the motion as "premature," and the defendants (including A) interposed an answer, which didn't include the affirmative defense of release. (Following the denial of the pre-answer CPLR 3211[a] motion, the defendants had 20 days to answer the complaint. See Commentary C3211:67.) The defendants subsequently sought summary judgment dismissing, among other things, the cause of action asserted against A. Their argument: the release barred the cause of action. Supreme Court granted A summary judgment, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The plaintiffs contended that A waived the affirmative defense of release because it was not pleaded in the answer. Rejecting that contention, the Second Department wrote that:

"As with the other defenses and objections listed in CPLR 3211(a)(5), the affirmative defense of release is waived unless it is raised in a pre-answer motion to dismiss or in a responsive pleading. Here, the defendants avoided waiving the affirmative defense of release by raising it in their pre-answer motion to dismiss, and they were thereafter entitled to seek summary judgment based on that defense despite its absence from the answer." 153 A.D.3d at 718, 60 N.Y.S.3d at 304. Internal citations omitted.

What's more, the appellate court affirmed the granting of summary judgment to A.

Query whether Outlook Clothing will apply to the other paragraphs of subdivision a (i.e., 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11)? Note that objections under paragraph 8 are the most susceptible to waiver, see Commentary C3211:55, while objections under paragraphs 2, 7 and 10 are least likely to be waived (an objection under paragraph 2--lack of subject matter jurisdiction--can't be waived). See Commentary C3211:54.

2017

C3211:5. Grounds of Dismissal.

Dismissal Grounds Outside of CPLR 3211(a).

In the main volume, we note that "CPLR 3211(a) is the central dismissal device, but it is not the only one," Commentary C3211:5, at 19 (main vol.), and list the following sources of dismissal that reside outside of subdivision (a): CPLR 327 (forum non conveniens), CPLR 3012(b) (failure to serve complaint), CPLR 3215(c) (failure to take default judgment proceedings timely), CPLR 3126(3) (recalcitrance in disclosure proceedings), and CPLR 3216 (failure to comply with 90-day notice to prosecute action).

Recent decisions bring to mind two other non-CPLR 3211(a) dismissal grounds.

Rosenblatt v. Doe, 54 Misc.3d 145(A), 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 50289(U), 2017 W.L. 923496 (App. Term, 2d Dep't 2017), touched on CPLR 1021, which allows for the dismissal of an action (or part of it) in which the substitution of a party is required but the motion for substitution is not made within a reasonable time after the event necessitating the substitution, e.g., the death of a plaintiff. What constitutes a reasonable time in a given case is dictated by the particular circumstances of the case. It's a sui generis question. The court should consider various factors, including the length of time between the substitution-necessitating event and the application for substitution, the extent of prejudice to the other parties, the reasonableness of the excuse (if any) proffered for the delay, and the potential merits of the plaintiff's claim. Commentary C1021:2 (main vol.); see Alejandro v. North Tarrytown Realty Assoc., 129 A.D.3d 749, 10 N.Y.S.3d 616 (2d Dep't 2015).

In Rosenblatt, the plaintiff commenced a personal injury action. He subsequently passed away. There was a lengthy delay in securing the appointment of the administrator of the decedent's estate, then another delay in seeking substitution for the decedent-plaintiff. The motion court permitted the substitution, thereby allowing the action to go forward. The Appellate Term, Second Department, affirmed the order allowing the substitution, finding that the motion court did not abuse its discretion in granting the motion, stressing that the defendant failed to show that she would be prejudiced by the substitution.

A dissenting Justice concluded that the action-sustaining substitution should have been denied because of the delays underlying the substitution, the substitute plaintiff's failure to demonstrate a reasonable excuse for those delays, the absence of an affidavit of merit, and the potential prejudice to the defendant stemming from the delays. 54 Misc.3d 145(A), at *2, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 50289(U), at *2, 2017 W.L. 923496, at *1 (Weston, J.). The dissenting Justice would've dismissed the complaint, sua sponte, upon the denial of the motion to substitute.

A couple of observations regarding dismissal under CPLR 1021.

First, the question of whether dismissal is warranted under that statute can arise in a few different ways. A party may move for dismissal; a party may cross-move to dismiss in response to a motion to substitute a party; or a court might dismiss sua sponte.

Where a proposed substitute plaintiff moves for substitution, the defendant opposes the motion but does not formally cross-move to dismiss the action, and the court concludes that the movant did not seek substitution within a reasonable time of the substitution-necessitating event, sua sponte dismissal by the court might seem appropriate. After all, the finding that substitution was not sought within a reasonable time can serve to bar a substitution, and without a proper plaintiff how can the action go forward? However strong the allure of a sua sponte dismissal may be in a particular case, the court (and the defendant, who would benefit from the dismissal) must be cognizant of the dim view the appellate courts have of sua sponte dismissals. See Commentary C3211:8 (main vol.). An additional impediment to a sua sponte dismissal in the context of CPLR 1021: the last sentence of the statute ("whether or not it occurs before or after final judgment, if the event requiring substitution is the death of a party, and timely substitution has not been made[,] the court before proceeding further, shall, on such notice as it may in its discretion direct, order the persons interested in the decedent's estate to show cause why the action ... should not be dismissed") (emphasis added).

Second, as we noted above, the issue of what constitutes a reasonable amount of time within which to seek substitution is case-specific and determined by consideration of several factors. One of those factors is the length of delay between the occurrence of the substitution-necessitating event and the point at which substitution is sought (or a defendant seeks dismissal for want of compliance with CPLR 1021). See Commentary C1021:2. Some delay is typically associated in identifying and securing a proper substitute for the affected party (e.g., getting letters testamentary to administer a party-decedent's estate). The proposed plaintiff should show that she exercised diligence in seeking substitution, specify any bureaucratic or court delay that accounts for the delay in seeking substitution, and corroborate any such bureaucratic or court delay with appropriate documentation. For her part, the defendant should note the extent of delay and demonstrate how she has been prejudiced by it.

Dismissal for want of compliance with CPLR 3012-a was addressed by the Third Department in Calcagno v. Orthopedic Assoc. of Dutchess County, PC, 148 A.D.3d 1279, 48 N.Y.S.3d 832 (2017, Garry, J.). That statute applies in medical malpractice actions, requiring a plaintiff in such an action to submit with the summons and complaint a certificate of merit from counsel declaring that he or she has consulted with at least one physician who (1) is knowledgeable regarding the relevant issues in the action, (2) has reviewed the facts, and (3) has concluded that a reasonable basis exists for the commencement of the action. See CPLR 3012-a(a). (The certificate-of-merit requirement also applies in dental and podiatrical malpractice actions.)

Some courts, such as the panel in Kolb v. Strogh (158 A.D.2d 15, 558 N.Y.S.2d 549 [2d Dep't 1990, Bracken, J.]) and the court in Dye v. Leve (181 A.D.2d 89, 586 N.Y.S.2d 69 [4th Dep't 1992]), have concluded that dismissal as a sanction for a plaintiff's failure to comply with the certificate-of-merit requirement is not permissible. (Although dismissal is permissible if a court issues an order directing a plaintiff to file an adequate certificate of merit but the party fails to do so. See Kolb v. Strogh, supra; Dye v. Leve, supra; see also Monzon v. Chiaramonte, 140 A.D.3d 1126, 35 N.Y.S.3d 371 [2d Dep't 2016] [court conditionally granted defendant's motion to dismiss complaint unless plaintiff filed and served sufficient CPLR 3012-a(a)(1) certificate of merit within 30 days after notice of entry of order].)

Other courts permit dismissal if a plaintiff seeks but is denied an extension of time within which to file a CPLR 3012-a certificate of merit. A plaintiff's application for such an extension is governed by CPLR 2004, which allows a court to extend most procedural deadlines, provided the party seeking the extension demonstrates "good cause." See Commentary to CPLR 2004; see also Higgitt, Requests to Extend Deadlines and the Reach of the CPLR, Oct. 2, 2013 N.Y.L.J. If a plaintiff seeks a CPLR 2004 extension of the time within which to file a certificate of merit and the court denies the extension, a defendant's motion to dismiss for want of compliance with CPLR 3012-a may be granted. Calcagno v. Orthopedic Assoc. of Dutchess County, PC, supra. Dismissal is particularly appropriate in that situation if plaintiff's counsel, in opposing a defendant's motion to dismiss, is unable to make the CPLR 3012-a declaration that a reasonable basis exists for the commencement of the action. Horn v. Boyle, 260 A.D.2d 76, 79, 699 N.Y.S.2d 572, 575 (3d Dep't 1999, Carpinello, J.).

Calcagno highlights the need for plaintiff's counsel to take seriously the CPLR 3012-a certificate-of-merit requirement. If an application for an extension of time to comply with CPLR 3012-a is required, attention to CPLR 2004's good cause element is demanded, as is attention to the quality of the papers supporting the application. Of course, timely compliance with CPLR 3012-a--a sufficient certificate of merit accompanying the summons and complaint--prevents any litigation on the matter.

C3211:8. Sua Sponte Dismissal.

Appellate Division Decisions Show the Frailty of Sua Sponte Dismissals.

A sua sponte dismissal occurs when a court, without the prompting of a motion by a party, discards a complaint or some other affirmative claim (e.g., a counterclaim). The Appellate Division has shown little tolerance of sua sponte dismissals. Absent statutory or regulatory authority for a sua sponte dismissal (e.g., CPLR 3215[c], CPLR 3404, 22 NYCRR 202.27), a court's power to dismiss sua sponte should be exercised "sparingly and only when extraordinary circumstances exist to warrant" that ultimate relief. First United Mortgage Banking, Corp. v. Lawani, 147 A.D.3d 912, 48 N.Y.S.3d 190 (2d Dep't 2016); Citimortgage Inc v. Lottridge, 143 A.D.3d 1093, 40 N.Y.S.3d 573 (3d Dep't 2016, Peters, P.J.). Examples of "extraordinary circumstances" are few. See Commentary C3211:8 (main vol.). The limited power of a court to dismiss sua sponte is constrained further by due process. Even if extraordinary circumstances exist, sua sponte dismissal cannot occur unless the plaintiff had notice that dismissal could eventuate and an opportunity to be heard before the court renders the dismissal. See Citimortgage, Inc. v. Lottridge, supra; see also First United Mortgage Banking Corp. v. Lawani, supra.

First United Mortgage Banking Corp. and Citimortgage, Inc. evince the Appellate Division's understandable hostility toward sua sponte dismissals and provide a couple of lessons relating to them.

First United Mortgage Banking Corp. discourages trial courts from straying from the factual record adduced by the parties in deciding motions (save for matter that is subject to proper judicial notice, see Bench Book for Trial Judges--New York § 7:3 [2015-2016 ed.]). In First United Mortgage Banking Corp., the plaintiff in a residential mortgage foreclosure action made a motion against the defendants for a default judgment and an order of reference. That motion was not opposed. The motion "court conducted an independent Internet investigation of certain records and digital tax maps purportedly maintained by, among others, the New York City Department of Finance. Based upon the court's research ... [it] concluded that certain discrepancies warranted [sua sponte] dismissal of the action." 147 A.D.3d at 913, 48 N.Y.S.3d at 190. The Second Department reversed the order of dismissal and remitted the matter to Supreme Court for a determination of the plaintiff's motion (sans information obtained from the Internet). The appellate court found that extraordinary circumstances were not present and, therefore, sua sponte dismissal was not warranted. Additionally, the court "caution[ed] that dismissal based almost entirely upon an independent Internet investigation, especially one conducted without providing notice of and an opportunity to be heard by any party, is improper and should not be repeated." Id.; see HSBC Bank USA, NA v. Taher, 104 A.D.3d 815, 962 N.Y.S.2d 301 (2d Dep't 2013); see also Hon. David B. Saxe, "Toxic" Judicial Research, 87 N.Y. St. B.J. 36 (Sept. 2015).

In Citimorgtage, Inc., the plaintiff commenced but did not diligently prosecute a residential mortgage foreclosure action. Among other transgressions, the plaintiff allowed the action to "languish" for two years. Supreme Court attempted to spur the plaintiff to pursue the case: the court directed the plaintiff to make an application for a default judgment by a date certain. The plaintiff failed to follow the directive and the court, sua sponte, dismissed the complaint under CPLR 3215(c), which provides that "[i]f the plaintiff fails to take proceedings for the entry of judgment within one year after the default, the court shall not enter judgment but shall dismiss the complaint as abandoned ... unless sufficient cause is shown why the complaint should not be dismissed."

The Third Department reversed an order denying the plaintiff's motion to vacate the sua sponte dismissal order and granted the motion, thereby restoring the complaint. Dismissal was not warranted under CPLR 3215(c) because the plaintiff did take proceedings for the entry of judgment within one year of the defendants' default. The plaintiff sought (and was granted) an order of reference within the one year period, such "proceedings" manifested an intent not to abandon the action, and the action therefore could not be dismissed for the reason identified by Supreme Court. See Commentary C3215:12.

And the dismissal could not be sustained as a proper exercise of the court's power to dismiss sua sponte. "[W]hile plaintiff's conduct [in delaying prosecution of the action and violating a directive of the court] was certainly worthy of criticism," the record did not support a finding of a pattern of willful noncompliance with court-ordered deadlines, conduct that could provide extraordinary circumstances justifying a sua sponte dismissal. 143 A.D.3d at 1095, 40 N.Y.S.3d at 575; see Commentary C3211:8 at 22-23 (main vol.). That a plaintiff's conduct "frustrates our justice system," standing alone, is not sufficient to constitute extraordinary circumstances. 143 A.D.3d at 576, 40 N.Y.S.3d at 1095. Additionally, sua sponte dismissal was not appropriate because the record did not indicate that the plaintiff was on notice that dismissal might occur.

Two important observations relating to sua sponte dismissals. First, "courts do not possess the power to dismiss an action [in the pre-note of issue phase] for general delay where [the] plaintiff has not been served with a [CPLR 3216(b)] demand." Chase v. Scavuzzo, 87 N.Y.2d 228, 233, 638 N.Y.S.2d 587, 590, 661 N.Y.2d 1368, 1371 (1995, G.B. Smith, J.); see Commentary C3216:4A, Cumulative Supplementary Pamphlet, 2017 entry. Second, our "courts ... are empowered to grant the sanction of dismissal only when it has been authorized either by the [L]egislature or by court rules consistent with existing legislation." Tewari v. Tsoutsouras, 75 N.Y.2d 1, 7, 550 N.Y.S.2d 572, 574, 549 N.E.2d 1143, 1145 (1989, Alexander, J.). Thus, a dismissal ought to be tethered to an identifiable legal basis--a statute, a regulation, a case law principle. Mere frustration with the lack of progress of a case, while understandable and worthy of criticism, shouldn't result in the ultimate penalty of dismissal.

C3211:10. Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence."

Can an E-Mail Constitute Documentary Evidence Under CPLR 3211(a)(1)?

A defendant may seek dismissal of a complaint (or part of it) based on a defense "founded upon documentary evidence." Whether a particular document constitutes documentary evidence under CPLR 3211(a)(1) has been the subject of a lot of litigation. Rarely does the defendant succeed in persuading the court that her evidence is "documentary." That's because the test for determining whether a paper qualifies as "documentary evidence" is quite stringent; the paper must be unambiguous, of undeniable authenticity, and its contents must be essentially undeniable. Commentary C3211:10, at 25 (main vol.).

In the main volume, we note that an e-mail may (emphasize "may") constitute "documentary evidence"; it's a question that seems to have divided the First and Second Departments. See id. The First Department has stated that "[e]-mails can suffice as documentary evidence for purposes of CPLR 3211(a)(1)" (provided, of course, the subject e-mail satisfies the three-element test noted above). Calpo-Rivera v. Sirioka, 144 A.D.3d 568, 568, 42 N.Y.S.3d 19, 20 (1st Dep't 2016). The Second Department has signaled that an e-mail cannot be "documentary" in character. See 25-01 Newkirk Avenue., LLC v. Everest National Ins. Co., 127 A.D.3d 850, 851, 7 N.Y.S.3d 325, 326 (2d Dep't 2015) ("letters, e-mails, and affidavits fail to meet the requirements for documentary evidence").

A recent article provides a thorough review of this inter-Department conflict and explores whether an e-mail can constitute documentary evidence under CPLR 3211(a)(1). See Bruce H. Lederman, Role of Emails in CPLR 3211(a)(1) Motions, vol. 22, no. 1 NYLitigator, N.Y.S.B.A., at 18-22 (Spring 2017).

C3211:12. Plaintiff's Lack of Capacity.

A Plaintiff Who has Attained the Age of Majority is Presumed Competent and a Defendant has the Burden of Demonstrating Otherwise.

Those are the take-away points from Vasilatos v. Dzamba, 148 A.D.3d 1275, 49 N.Y.S.3d 194 (3d Dep't 2017, Lynch, J.). There, the defendants moved to dismiss the complaint of the plaintiff, who claimed that, as an infant, she was exposed to and poisoned by lead particles at the defendants' respective properties. The defendants argued, among other things, that the plaintiff lacked legal capacity (i.e., the power) to bring the lawsuit. See Commentary C3211:12 (main vol.). The defendants relied on the complaint--verified by plaintiff's counsel--that contained an allegation that, as a result of the lead poisoning, the plaintiff had been "under a disability pursuant to CPLR 208 since infancy, which never ceased, and [the plaintiff] continues to be insane, deprived of an overall ability to function in society, of unsound mind and/or unable to protect her legal rights." Apparently the defendants offered nothing else to support their assertion that the plaintiff lacked the legal capacity to bring the action. Noting that a plaintiff's competence to commence an action is presumed, that a defendant seeking dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(3) bears the burden of demonstrating that a plaintiff was not legally competent, and that the plaintiff in Vasilatos had not been judicially declared incompetent, the Court determined that "plaintiff's acknowledged cognitive and mental defects[, standing alone,] did not prevent her from commencing th[e] action in her own name." 148 A.D.3d at 1276, 49 N.Y.S.3d at 196.

Court Reviews Considerations Relevant to Whether Governmental Entity Created by a Legislative Enactment has Capacity to Sue.

"Capacity" concerns a plaintiff's power to appear before and bring an action in court. Commentary C3211:12, at 29 (main vol.). "Governmental entities created by legislative enactment ... present capacity problems." Community Board 7 of Borough of Manhattan v. Schaffer, 84 N.Y.2d 148, 155, 615 N.Y.S.2d 644, 647, 639 N.E.2d 1, 4 (1994, Titone, J.). The Fourth Department reviews those problems in Matter of Citizen Review Board of the City of Syracuse v. Syracuse Police Department, 150 A.D.3d 121, 125-126, 51 N.Y.S.3d 708, 711-712 (2017, Curran, J.), and offers factors that can be employed to ascertain whether a given legislatively-created governmental entity has the capacity to commence an action. (Hint: The answer typically lies in legislation creating and governing the entity. See Excess Line Ass'n of New York v. Waldorf &. Associates, 30 N.Y.3d 119, 65 N.Y.S.3d 85, 87 N.E.3d 117 (Oct. 19, 2017), 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 07301.) The Court provides guidance too on the question of whether a legislatively-created governmental entity has standing to bring an action. Capacity and standing are discreet issues; the former is concerned with whether, in the eyes of the law, the plaintiff has the power to bring a case, and the latter asks whether the plaintiff has a sufficient stake in the outcome of the litigation. See Commentary C3211:13 (main vol.).

Filing for Bankruptcy Does Not Necessarily Strip a Plaintiff of Standing to Sue; the Character of Bankruptcy Protection--Chapter 7, 11 or 13--is Determinative.

Generally, "[t]he failure of a plaintiff to disclose a cause of action as an asset in a prior bankruptcy proceeding, the existence of which the plaintiff knew or should have known existed at the time, deprive[s] the plaintiff of the [standing] to sue subsequently on that cause of action." Whelan v. Longo, 23 A.D.3d 459, 460, 808 N.Y.S.2d 95, 96 (2d Dep't 2005). But the chapter of the debtor/plaintiff's bankruptcy proceeding determines whether the general rule applies.

Chapter 7 and 11 debtors lose standing to maintain civil suits. That which is lost by the chapter 7 or 11 bankruptcy proceeding debtor is found by her bankruptcy trustee; the chapter 7 or 11 bankruptcy trustee has standing to bring or maintain an action for the benefit of the bankruptcy estate. Collins v. Suraci, 110 A.D.3d 1214, 973 N.Y.S.2d 828 (3d Dep't 2013, Egan, Jr., J.). A debtor in a chapter 13 bankruptcy proceeding, however, does not lose standing to bring a civil suit. See Nicke v. Schwartzapfel Partners, P.C., 148 A.D.3d 1168, 51 N.Y.S.3d 121 (2d Dep't 2017). Why do chapter 13 debtors retain standing while chapter 7 and 11 debtors lose it? Because "in a chapter 13 proceeding, 'the creditors' recovery is drawn from the debtor's earnings, not from the assets of the bankruptcy estate; hence, it is only the chapter 13 debtor who stands to gain or lose from efforts to pursue a cause of action that is an asset of the bankruptcy estate.' " Collins v. Suraci, 110 A.D.3d at 1215, n, 973 N.Y.S.3d at 830, n, quoting Olick v. Parker & Parsley Petroleum Co., 145 F.3d 513, 516 (2d Cir. 1998).

Some courts have indicated that the failure of a plaintiff to disclose a cause of action as an asset in a prior bankruptcy proceeding affects the plaintiff's "capacity" to sue subsequently on that cause of action. As mentioned above, capacity and standing are separate (albeit allied) concepts. See Commentary C3211:13 (main vol.). Capacity concerns a party's legal power to bring an action, asking whether the plaintiff is the proper bearer of the lawsuit. Commentary C3211:12 (main vol.). Standing concerns itself with whether the plaintiff suffered an injury or other harm as a result of the defendant's alleged conduct or inaction, i.e., whether the plaintiff has a sufficiently cognizable stake in the outcome of the litigation. Commentary C3211:13.

As the language from the Collins decision suggests, the bankruptcy issue we are discussing here seems to concern standing. In the chapter 7 and 11 contexts, the debtor's "property," including any cause of action the debtor had, vests in the debtor's bankruptcy estate. Because a cause of action that had been the property of the debtor becomes the property of the bankruptcy estate, it is the estate that has a cognizable stake in the outcome of any litigation relating to the cause of action. Thus, the bankruptcy estate, acting through a bankruptcy trustee, has standing to pursue such a cause of action. In the chapter 13 context, it is the debtor "who stands to gain or lose" from the cause of action. Collins v. Suraci, 110 A.D.3d at 1215, n, 973 N.Y.S.3d at 830, n. Bankruptcy therefore affects which individual or entity has a direct stake in the outcome of a litigation.

C3211:14. "Other Action Pending," Generally.

The Importance of Service of a Complaint in Both the Present and the Prior Actions.

CPLR 3211(a)(4) authorizes (but does not require) dismissal of an action on the ground that there is another action pending in any court within the United States. Dismissal of the present action, i.e., the New York action in which the CPLR 3211(a)(4) motion is made, is only appropriate if the present action and the other action involve the same parties and the same cause of action. Commentaries C3211:14, 15 (main vol.). The present action and the other action involve the same parties and the same cause of action if the following elements of the two actions are substantially similar: (1) the parties; (2) the cause of action; and (3) the relief sought. Commentary C3211:15; see Cellino & Barnes, P.C. v. Law Office of Christopher J. Cassar, P.C., 140 A.D.3d 1732, 35 N.Y.S.3d 606 (4th Dep't 2016).

To ascertain whether two actions are substantially similar, a court should compare the allegations in the pleadings of the respective actions. See Security Title & Guaranty Co. v. Wolfe, 56 A.D.2d 745, 392 N.Y.S.2d 30 (3d Dep't 1977); see also Siegel, New York Practice § 262 (Connors 5th ed.). Therefore, service of a complaint (or other appropriate pleading, i.e., a petition) in both the present action and the other action is typically necessary before the present action can be dismissed under CPLR 3211(a)(4). See Wharton v. Wharton, 244 A.D.2d 404, 664 N.Y.S.2d 73 (2d Dep't 1997); Graev v. Graev, 219 A.D.2d 535, 631 N.Y.S.2d 685 (1st Dep't 1995); Sotirakis v. United Services Auto Ass'n, 100 A.D.2d 931, 474 N.Y.S.2d 843 (2d Dep't 1984); John J. Canpagna, Inc. v. Dune Alpin Farm Associates, 81 A.D.2d 633, 438 N.Y.S.2d 132 (2d Dept. 1981); Siegel, New York Practice § 262; see also Security Title & Guaranty Co. v. Wolfe, supra. Use of information outside of the pleadings to compare the actions has not been permitted. Louis R. Shapiro, Inc. v. Milspenes Corp., 20 A.D.2d 857, 857, 248 N.Y.S.2d 85, 87 (1st Dep't 1964) ("it is not permissible to show by parol proof what an action is for") (internal quotation mark omitted).

If there is another action pending in any court within the United States that involves the same parties and the same cause of action as the present action, the court must consult the first-in-time rule, which provides that generally the action that was commenced first will be the one that is allowed to proceed. Commentaries C3211:14, 15. The general rule favoring the action that was commenced first is not ironclad; the presence of special circumstances permits a court to depart from the first-in-time rule and favor the later-commenced action. Commentary C3211:16.

In Quatro Consulting Group, LLC v. Buffalo Hotel Supply Co., Inc., 55 Misc.3d 615, 49 N.Y.S.3d 252 (Sup. Ct., Monroe County 2017, Rosenbaum, J.), the court seemed to question the prudence of the principle that service of the complaints in both actions is required before a CPLR 3211(a)(4) motion to dismiss the present action will lie.

The parties to the Quatro Consulting Group, LLC, action had entered into an agreement under which B provided consulting services to A. B sent a demand for payment to A, claiming that B was owed money for services rendered to A. A responded by commencing a declaratory judgment and damages action against B in Supreme Court, Erie County, by electronically-filing a summons with notice on November 22, 2016. The summons with notice allowed A to commence its action without filing and serving a complaint. (The complaint would come later, upon B's demand. See Siegel, New York Practice §§ 60, 231.) Approximately one week later, B commenced a breach of contract action against A in Supreme Court, Monroe County, by filing a summons and complaint with the Monroe County Clerk's Office.

In the context of its Monroe County action, B moved to consolidate that action with A's Erie County action. A then moved (also within the context of the Monroe County action) to dismiss the Monroe County action under CPLR 3211(a)(4).

Supreme Court, Monroe County, granted A's motion to dismiss the Monroe County action. The court reasoned that, under CPLR 304, A's Erie County action was commenced on November 22, 2016, approximately one week before B commenced its Monroe County action, and that, under the first-in-time rule, A's action should get priority. The court rejected B's argument, premised on case law such as Wharton and Graev, that A's action did not constitute a "prior action pending" because it was commenced by summons with notice. Stressing the plain language of CPLR 304, the court observed that an action is commenced by the filing of a summons and complaint or summons with notice, and, therefore, A's summons-with-notice initiated action, which was commenced before B's action, was first-in-time.

Is there any tension between the case law concluding that service of a complaint in both the present action and the other action is necessary before a CPLR 3211(a)(4) motion will lie, and the Quatro Consulting Group, LLC court's reasoning? Maybe, maybe not.

The court seemed to question the prudence of the principle that service of the complaints in both actions is a precondition to a CPLR 3211(a)(4) motion to dismiss the present action. But the reason for that principle is to allow the court, based on a comparison of the allegations in the complaints, to ascertain whether both actions involve the same parties and the same cause of action. That inquiry apparently wasn't necessary in Quatro Consulting Group, LLC. Rather, the court seemed to operate on the premise that the two actions were substantially similar, and the court focused on the order in which the actions were commenced for the purpose of applying the first-in-time rule.

Perhaps the parties in Quatro Consulting Group, LLC, expressly or implicitly acknowledged that the actions involved the same parties and the same cause of action. Or perhaps it was obvious to the court from the submissions on the competing motions that the actions were substantially similar. (Although resort to information outside of the pleadings to compare the actions is generally not permitted. Louis R. Shapiro, Inc v. Milspenes Corp., supra.)

In any event, the court apparently did not need to resolve the issue of whether the two actions were substantially similar--the issue on which the principle requiring service of the complaints in both actions bears. The court's comments regarding that principle came in the context of the court's analysis of the separate and distinct issue of which action was commenced first for the purpose of applying the first-in-time rule. Therefore, the tension between the service-of-the-complaints principle and the Quatro Consulting Group, LLC decision may not be all that tense.

A final note on Quatro Consulting Group, LLC. Recall that A commenced a declaratory judgment action against B in response to B's demand for payment. Was A, which used a summons with notice to commence the action, in a hurry to get into court before B?

This matter is important because the first-in-time rule, which generally favors the action that was commenced first, yields where special circumstances are present. One factor in the special circumstances calculus: whether the prior action was filed preemptively after the plaintiff in that action learned that the opposing party intended to commence a case. Commentary C3211:16. That the prior action was brought in the form of a declaratory judgment action may serve as a strong signal that it was commenced preemptively. Id. That the prior action was commenced by the expedient of a mere summons with notice-instead of a summons and complaint-might be another signal of a preemptive filing. If the first action was filed preemptively, special circumstances are likely present and the later-commenced action is given priority, as the law seeks to discourage a race to the courthouse, an exercise that is not compatible with responsible litigation. Id.

C3211:21. Failure to State a Cause of Action, Generally.

Court Reviews the Special Principles Applicable to a Motion to Dismiss a Declaratory Judgment Action.

"An action for a declaratory judgment is one that seeks to have the court establish and promulgate the rights of the parties on a particular subject matter." Commentary C3001:1, at 257-258 (main vol.). The declaratory judgment plaintiff seeks no relief that can be enforced through the enforcement mechanisms in CPLR article 52 or by the court's contempt powers, Siegel, New York Practice § 436 (Connors 5th ed.); the plaintiff will be satisfied with a judicial declaration of the rights of the parties. Commentary C3001:1. The utility of a declaratory judgment action is that it may "serve some practical end in quieting or stabilizing an uncertain or disputed jural relation either as to present or prospective obligations." James v. Alderton Dock Yards, 256 N.Y. 298, 305, 176 N.E.401, 404 (1931, Crane, J.).

When a defendant in a declaratory judgment action seeks to dismiss it under CPLR 3211(a)(7)--the failure-to-state-a-cause-of-action provision--the ordinary rules of decision apply. See Commentary C3211:21, at 47 (main vol.) ("the pleadings must be given a liberal construction, the allegations accepted as true, and the plaintiff accorded every possible favorable inference"); see also Connaughton v. Chipolte Mexican Grill, Inc., 29 N.Y.3d 137, 53 N.Y.S.3d 598, 75 N.E.3d 1159 (2017, Rivera, J.). Some additional special rules apply that reflect the unique nature of the declaratory judgment action.

Guthart v. Nassau County, 55 Misc.3d 827, 52 N.Y.S.3d 821 (Sup. Ct., Nassau County 2017, Palmieri, J.), contains a recitation of those special rules. Here they are:

• A pre-answer CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion to dismiss a declaratory judgment action presents only the issue of whether a cause of action for declaratory relief is set forth, not the question of whether the plaintiff is entitled to a favorable declaration

• Where a cause of action is sufficient to invoke the court's power to render a declaratory judgment, the motion to dismiss should generally be denied

• A court may reach the merits of a well-pleaded cause of action for declaratory judgment on a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion if no questions of fact are presented by the parties' controversy

• If the controversy presents no questions of fact, the CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion may be treated as a motion for a declaration in the defendant's favor

See also Professor Connors' treatment of the North Oyster Bay Baymen's Association decision in Commentary C3001:22, Pocket Part, 2016 entry.

C3211:28. Lack of Personal Jurisdiction.

Fundamental Rules of Decision Applicable to Several CPLR 3211(a) Grounds Apply to Lack-of-Personal-Jurisdiction Motion.

Afford the complaint a liberal construction. Accept the facts alleged in the complaint as true. Accord the plaintiff the benefit of every possible favorable inference. Those commandments apply to motions made on several CPLR 3211(a) grounds, such as dismissal founded on documentary evidence (paragraph 1), dismissal founded on an affirmative defense (paragraph 5), and dismissal for failure to state a cause of action (paragraph 7). (They essentially apply as well to a motion to dismiss an affirmative defense [CPLR 3211(b)].) Compliments of the Court of Appeals' decision in Rushaid v. Picket & Cie, 28 N.Y.3d 316, 45 N.Y.S.3d 276, 68 N.E.3d 1 (2016, Rivera, J.), they apply too when the motion to dismiss is based on paragraph 8, want of personal jurisdiction.

In Rushaid, the issue was whether the New York court had personal jurisdiction over the defendants under the transacts-any-business aspect of New York's long arm jurisdiction statute. See CPLR 302(a)(1); Siegel New York Practice § 86 (Connors 5th ed.). In evaluating whether the court has personal jurisdiction over a defendant under CPLR 302(a)(1), the court asks whether (1) the defendant conducted sufficient activities to have transacted business in New York, and (2) the plaintiff's claims arise from the transactions. Rushaid, 28 N.Y.3d at 323, 45 N.Y.S.3d at 282, 68 N.E.3d at 7. In the course of concluding that the New York courts had personal jurisdiction over the defendants under CPLR 302(a)(1), the Court of Appeals applied to the complaint the pleader-friendly principles associated with other CPLR 3211(a) grounds.

Note that it matters not whether a plaintiff can ultimately prove the factual allegations on which the court is relying to impose personal jurisdiction over a defendant. The inquiry is whether the pleadings set forth facts establishing a basis on which to impose personal jurisdiction over the defendant. See Licci v. Lebanese Canadian Bank, 20 N.Y.3d 327, 340, 960 N.Y.S.2d 695, 703, 984 N.E.2d 893, 901 (2012, Read, J.).

C3211:58. Initially Raising Objection in Amended Pleading.

Defendant's Motion for Leave to Amend Answer to Include Statute of Limitations Defense That had Been Waived Under CPLR 3211(e) is Denied Based on Delay in Seeking Leave and Prejudice to Plaintiff.

CPLR 3211(e) directs that most subdivision (a) dismissal grounds must be raised in an answer or made the subject of a timely motion to dismiss. See Commentaries C3211:53, 55. This direction is backed by subdivision (e)'s waiver provision: a non-exempted ground is generally waived if neither interposed in the answer nor raised in a CPLR 3211(a) motion to dismiss. We say "generally" because the waiver is presumptive not absolute.

Defenses seemingly waived under subdivision (e) may be interposed by way of an amended answer. Sometimes the amendment can be made as of right under CPLR 3025(a). Owing to the narrow window afforded for an amendment as of right, the amendment is usually sought by leave of court under CPLR 3025(b). See generally Commentary C3211:58. The amendment by leave is to be "freely" given. CPLR 3025(b). Leave to amend an answer to include an otherwise waived subdivision (a) ground should be granted unless the plaintiff would be prejudiced from the delay in seeking leave, or the proposed amendment is palpably insufficient or patently devoid of merit. That said, the court, in exercising its CPLR 3025(b) discretion, should consider how long the defendant was aware of the facts upon which its motion for leave is predicated and whether the defendant has a reasonable excuse for its delay. The liberality with which leave is to be afforded dissipates where the motion for leave is made long after the filing of the trial-ready signifying documents, the note of issue and certificate of readiness. In considering such a belated motion, judicial discretion in allowing amendments should be circumspect.

In a pair of similarly captioned but separate decisions, the Second Department reviews these important amendment-by-leave principles and highlights the danger to the defendant of waiting to seek leave until the action is in the post-note-of-counsel phase. Civil Service Employees Association v. County of Nassau, 144 A.D.3d 1075, 43 N.Y.S.3d 390 (2d Dep't 2016); Civil Service Employees Association v. County of Nassau, 144 A.D.3d 1077, 44 N.Y.S.3d 50 (2d Dep't 2016). In each of the actions the defendant sought leave to amend its answer (1) approximately six years after service of the initial answer, (2) after discovery had been completed, and (3) after the note of issue and certificate of readiness had been filed. Additionally, in each of the actions the facts underlying the defendant's proposed statute of limitations defense were known to the defendant at the time the initial answer was interposed, and the defendant offered no excuse for its lengthy delay in seeking leave to amend. In light of the circumstances, the plaintiff in each action suffered significant prejudice as a result of the defendant's delay, and the Appellate Division concluded that leave to amend the answers must be denied.

PRACTICE COMMENTARIES

By John R. Higgitt

In General

C3211:1. The Motion to Dismiss, Generally.

CPLR 3211 is the principal dismissal motion in New York civil practice. The motion is available to any party against whom a cause of action has been asserted; it can be used to challenge defenses as well. The availability of the motion to a party in a given situation depends on the party's negotiation of the requirements of CPLR 3211.

Here is a snapshot of CPLR 3211:

• Subdivision (a) lists the grounds on which a motion to dismiss a cause of action may be made.

• Subdivision (b) provides the motion to dismiss a defense.

• Subdivision (c) concerns the evidence permitted on a CPLR 3211 motion, the conversion of a dismissal motion into one for summary judgment, see CPLR 3212, and the availability of an immediate trial of issues related to a CPLR 3211 motion.

• Subdivision (d) offers a remedy to a party opposing a motion to dismiss who needs time to gather evidence.

• Subdivision (e), an unwieldy provision, contains significant rules regarding the time for making a CPLR 3211(a) motion and the waiver of certain subdivision (a) grounds, and provides the "single motion rule."

• Subdivision (f) extends a CPLR 3211 movant's time to serve a responsive pleading.

• Subdivisions (g) and (h) prescribe special standards on CPLR 3211(a)(7) motions relating to actions involving public petition and participation ("SLAPP" suits) and certain actions involving licensed architects, engineers, land surveyors, and landscape architects.

CPLR 3211 is a purely mechanical device, a procedural statute through and through. It authorizes a party to seek dismissal of a cause of action on certain grounds (or a defense on any ground) and sets forth the manner in which the party may do so. CPLR 3211 therefore provides a means by which a party may present its arguments for dismissal to the court. Whether dismissal is warranted in a given situation will depend on law (substantive, procedural or both) that comes from outside CPLR 3211's borders.

An important note: these commentaries focus on contemporary matters, with reference to the history of a provision or the history underlying a particular issue reserved for those instances in which historical context will aid the reader in understanding the law in its current state.

C3211:2. Considerations for the Potential CPLR 3211(a) Movant.

A defendant served with a summons and complaint (or some other form of initiatory papers) can make a pre-answer motion to dismiss the complaint (or parts of it). (As we discuss below, Commentary C3211:4, any party against whom an affirmative claim is asserted can make a CPLR 3211[a] motion.) Alternatively, the defendant can interpose a timely answer that contains CPLR 3211(a) grounds and seek relief on the pleaded grounds at some later time, e.g., on summary judgment. Whether a defendant should make a pre-answer CPLR 3211(a) motion is a case-specific inquiry driven by the contents of the complaint, the information and evidence available to the defendant, the litigation goals of the defendant, and the resources of the defendant. Here are some basic considerations for the defendant pondering whether to make a CPLR 3211(a) motion:

• What potential grounds exist for the motion?

• Will one or more of those grounds terminate the entire action?

• Will some or all of the causes of action be resolved conclusively by the potential grounds for dismissal, i.e., can the potential grounds serve as an absolute bar to a future action, or can the potential objections be remedied and allow for a new action?

• How strong are the arguments in support of the potential grounds?

• What expense would be incurred by the defendant in making the motion and is the defendant willing to incur it?

For an additional discussion of the matters that defense counsel should review when determining whether to make a CPLR 3211(a) motion, see Robert L. Haig, Commercial Litigation in New York State Courts, § 8:25 (4th ed.).

C3211:3. General Motion Considerations.

CPLR 3211 is just one motion in the expansive universe of New York civil procedure. CPLR 3211 has of course its own unique requirements, which will be reviewed below. But a CPLR 3211 motion is subject to all of the basic rules of motion practice, and a party's failure to abide by those rules can have significant consequences: for a CPLR 3211 movant, the loss of the right to have the motion potentially determined on its merits (and, therefore, additional litigation that the movant could have potentially avoided); for the party opposing the motion, the loss of the opportunity to put before the court arguments, evidence or both that might persuade the court to deny the motion. We highlight some important general rules of motion practice that sometimes cause trouble for the parties on a CPLR 3211 motion. The particulars of these general rules are covered in more detail by Professor Connors in both his Practice Commentaries and book, initially crafted by the late Professor David D. Siegel, New York Practice. Reference to those resources is recommended.

Important General Rules of Motion Practice:

• A notice of motion must "specify the time and place of the hearing of the motion, the supporting papers upon which the motion is based, the relief demanded and the grounds therefore." CPLR 2214(a); see Commentary C2214:3; Siegel, New York Practice § 246 (Connors 5th ed.); see also Commentary C3211:6.

• A motion must be served so as to comply with the notice requirements of CPLR 2214(b), and a cross motion must be served so as to comply with the notice requirements of CPLR 2215. See Commentaries C2214:6-21, C2215:1A-1C; Siegel, New York Practice §§ 247, 249.

• The parties must furnish the court with all papers necessary to the court's consideration of the motion. CPLR 2214(c); Commentaries C2214:22-23; Siegel, New York Practice § 246. A component of this requirement is that the CPLR 3211 movant submit a copy of the pleading challenged on the motion. See Commentary C3211:41.

• In an e-filed action, the parties must provide the court with "working copies" of the documents that were e-filed in connection with the motion (if required to do so by the court). See 22 NYCRR 202.5-b(d)(4); 22 NYCRR 202.5-bb(a)(1); Commentary C2214:23 (2014 entry), Siegel, New York Practice § 246.

Subdivision (a)

C3211:4. Parties Who May Use Subdivision (a).

Any party against whom an affirmative claim is interposed may utilize CPLR 3211(a)'s dismissal grounds to seek dismissal of a claim. CPLR 3211(a) is most commonly employed by defendants to seek dismissal of complaints (or parts of them), and the defendant-moving-against-the-complaint is the example we will use in these Commentaries (unless context calls for a different example). But others can invoke subdivision (a)--a plaintiff against whom a counterclaim has been interposed, see Hyman v. Schwartz, 127 A.D.3d 1281, 6 N.Y.S.3d 732 (3d Dep't 2015), a defendant against whom a co-defendant has asserted a cross claim, see Darby Group Companies, Inc. v. Wulforst Acquisition, LLC, 130 A.D.3d 866, 14 N.Y.S.3d 143 (2d Dep't 2015), and a third-party defendant against whom a third-party complaint has been served, see Front, Inc. v. Khalil, 24 N.Y.3d 713, 4 N.Y.S.3d 581, 28 N.E.3d 15 (2015). A non-party cannot move to dismiss under 3211(a) for the simple and obvious reason that no affirmative claim can be asserted against a non-party. See U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Patterson, 102 A.D.3d 858, 959 N.Y.S.2d 216 (2d Dep't 2013).

The motion to dismiss a defense is covered by subdivision (b). See Commentaries C3211:34-39.

If a defendant (or other party against whom an affirmative claim is interposed) purports to seek dismissal of a complaint (or part of it) under CPLR 3211(b), the court can disregard the mislabeling and treat the motion as made under CPLR 3211(a), provided the specific subdivision (a) grounds upon which the defendant is relying are clear from the moving papers and the plaintiff is not prejudiced by the mislabeling. See CPLR 2001; Commentary C3211:6; see also D'Agostino v. Harding, 217 A.D.2d 835, 629 N.Y.S.2d 524 (3d Dep't 1995).

C3211:5. Grounds for Dismissal.

A motion to dismiss a complaint (or part of it) under CPLR 3211(a) must be founded on a ground provided by that subdivision. The Legislature provided this dismissal device and that body determines which grounds can serve as predicates for dismissal. So, the CPLR 3211(a) movant must find one or more grounds from the list on which to rest its motion. The good news for that party: the list is long and, thanks to the generous interpretation given to it by many courts, the motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action, CPLR 3211(a)(7), is a broad ground. See Commentary C3211:23; see also Commentary C3211:13 (lack of capacity ground includes lack of standing).

CPLR 3211(a) is the central dismissal device, but it is not the only one. A motion to dismiss based on a plaintiff's failure to serve a complaint in an action started with a summons with notice lies under CPLR 3012(b); a motion to dismiss based on a plaintiff's failure to take timely proceedings for the entry of default judgment is in CPLR 3215(c); a motion to dismiss based on a plaintiff's failure to satisfy its obligations in the disclosure process is in CPLR 3126(3); a motion to dismiss based on a plaintiff's failure to comply with a duly served 90-day demand is authorized by CPLR 3216; a motion to dismiss under the doctrine of forum non-conveniens comes from CPLR 327. When a dismissal motion is predicated on CPLR 3211(a) grounds, the motion must comply with the various requirements of CPLR 3211; when the dismissal motion is based on a device other than subdivision (a), the motion is subject to the requirements of the particular statute or court rule giving life to it.

C3211:6. Specifying the Ground of the Motion.

Must the CPLR 3211(a) movant specify the grounds for the motion? CPLR 3211 does not answer that question. But CPLR 2214(a), one of those important motion rules of general applicability, see Commentary C3211:3, offers guidance on the point. It requires that a notice of motion specify, among other things, the grounds for the motion. That requirement can be satisfied by stating the grounds in the notice of motion, e.g., lack of personal jurisdiction, statute of limitations, failure to state a cause of action. See, e.g., Blauman-Spindler v. Blauman, 68 A.D.3d 1105, 1106, 892 N.Y.S.2d 143, 144 (2d Dep't 2009) ("there is no requirement that a movant identify a specific statute or rule in the notice of motion"). Alternatively, the movant could identify the specific paragraphs of subdivision (a) on which the motion is based, e.g., CPLR 3211(a)(8), 3211(a)(5), 3211(a)(7). See Commentary C2214:3.

Note that specification of the grounds should appear in the notice of motion. If they don't, but are clearly laid out elsewhere, such as in an affirmation in support of the motion, the court can overlook the movant's failure to comply with CPLR 2214(a), provided the non-moving party was not prejudiced. See Matter of LiMandri, 171 A.D.2d 747, 567 N.Y.S.2d 303 (2d Dep't 1991). So, too, can the court disregard a non-prejudicial mislabeling of a ground--for instance, styling a motion as one to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action when it is in reality one to dismiss under the statute of limitations. See Siegel, New York Practice § 258 (Connors 5th ed.). The key is prejudice (or lack thereof): if the party opposing the motion is hindered in the preparation of its opposition papers, the court should not overlook or disregard the movant's failure to comply with CPLR 2214(a). Also, the court should not treat the motion as made under a ground that is neither specified in the notice of motion nor addressed in the movant's papers supporting the motion. See Matter of Tognino, 87 A.D.3d 1153, 930 N.Y.S.2d 46 (2d Dep't 2011); see also Bowen v. Nassau County, 135 A.D.3d 800, 24 N.Y.S.3d 143 (2d Dep't 2016). That a court can overlook a movant's failure to comply with CPLR 2214(a) does not mean that it will; it is a discretionary call for the judge. See, e.g., Pace v. Perk, 81 A.D.2d 444, 440 N.Y.S.2d 710 (2d Dep't 1981).

C3211:7. Subdivision (a) Grounds Available by Motion or Answer.

As noted above, see Commentary C3211:2, a party can (but is not required to) raise subdivision (a) grounds in a pre-answer CPLR 3211 motion. The motion is optional, with the other option being to raise the grounds in an answer and seek relief on them later. See CPLR 3211(e). As our overview of each of the paragraphs of subdivision (a) will disclose, most grounds must be raised in a pre-answer CPLR 3211 motion or an answer, some grounds can be raised at any time, and a couple grounds must be raised in a pre-answer motion or taken by answer and moved on with dispatch. While a defendant is free to raise some by motion and others by answer, a defendant is permitted only one CPLR 3211 motion, see Commentary C3211:51, and waiver provisions are associated with most of the subdivision (a) grounds. See Commentaries C3211:53-55. Discussions of the "single motion rule" (CPLR 3211[e]) and the nuances of the various waiver provisions are deferred to later in the Commentaries.

C3211:8. Sua Sponte Dismissals.

CPLR 3211(a) provides a lengthy (but not quite exhaustive) list of dismissal grounds. See Commentaries C3211:5. Most of these grounds require or at least contemplate a motion by a party invoking one or more of them. Does the law permit a court to dismiss a complaint sua sponte; that is, on its own accord without the prompting of a party? "Yes, but rarely." That is the answer to glean from the recent case law on the subject, which has been receiving some attention in the realm of residential mortgage foreclosure litigation.

In that unique world, the question often arises whether a plaintiff has standing to maintain an action. See Commentary C3211:13. This is an outgrowth of the prevalence of the assignment (or other manner of transfer) of notes and mortgages from the original lenders to other banks, financial institutions and financial service companies. Such assignments and transfers were fueled by the rise of the secondary mortgage market. Because of both the volume of these transactions and that a note and the mortgage related to it may be held by separate entities, nailing down the entity that has standing to commence a particular residential mortgage foreclosure action can pose a challenge.

Some trial courts, frustrated by failures of residential mortgage foreclosure plaintiffs to demonstrate standing, have taken to dismissing complaints sua sponte. The Appellate Division has not indulged these dismissals, reversing them and stressing that a court's power to dismiss a complaint sua sponte should be exercised "sparingly and only when extraordinary circumstances exist to warrant dismissal." E.g., U.S. Bank Nat. Ass'n v. Ahmed, 137 A.D.3d 1106, 29 N.Y.S.3d 33 (2d Dep't 2016); U.S. Bank Nat. Ass'n v. Flowers, 128 A.D.3d 951, 11 N.Y.S.3d 186 (2d Dep't 2015); Citimortgage, Inc. v. Chow Ming Tung, 126 A.D.3d 841, 7 N.Y.S.3d 147 (2d Dep't 2015); see Deutsche Bank Nat. Trust Co. v. Meah, 120 A.D.3d 465, 991 N.Y.S.2d 92 (2d Dep't 2014). In New York Practice, standing generally does not relate to a court's subject matter jurisdiction over an action; it is an affirmative defense that must be raised by a defendant or it is waived. See Wells Fargo Bank Minnesota, N.A. v. Mastropaolo, 42 A.D.3d 239, 837 N.Y.S.2d 247 (2d Dep't 2007); see also Commentary C3211:13. Because standing is an affirmative defense that a defendant can waive, a plaintiff's failure to demonstrate its standing to maintain a residential mortgage foreclosure action does not present extraordinary circumstances warranting a sua sponte dismissal.

With all of the dismissal grounds authorized by CPLR 3211(a) and elsewhere, why would a court get involved in the sua-sponte-dismissal business? Maybe the court perceives a conclusive affirmative defense to an action but the defendant failed to raise or waived it. Maybe the court believes that a plaintiff is wasting the court's time with a baseless suit. See Hurd v. Hurd, 66 A.D.3d 1492, 885 N.Y.S.2d 655 (4th Dep't 2009); Myung Chun v. North American Mortgage Co., 285 A.D.2d 42, 729 N.Y.S.2d 716 (1st Dep't 2001). Or maybe the court is offended at the conduct of a plaintiff. In light of the case law, it is unlikely that either of the first two scenarios provide sufficient cause for a court to dismiss sua sponte. The third scenario, however, might. The Court in Chun suggested that "egregious" conduct by a plaintiff that "flout[ed] the integrity of th[e Court]" could allow for a sua sponte dismissal. Cf. CDR Creances, S.A.S. v. Cohen, 23 N.Y.3d 307, 991 N.Y.S.2d 519, 15 N.E.3d 274 (2014) (finding that court has "inherent power" to address conduct meant to undermine truth-seeking function of judicial system and place in question integrity of courts and justice system [i.e., "fraud on the court"]); Commentary C3126:12, 2014 Supplementary Practice Commentaries; Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Pabon, 138 A.D.3d 1217, 31 N.Y.S.3d 221 (3d Dep't 2016) (sua sponte dismissal inappropriate; record neither supported Supreme Court's finding that affidavit on which plaintiff relied was perjured nor showed fraud by plaintiff).

The Second Department has suggested that "a pattern of willful noncompliance with court-ordered deadlines" may also provide for extraordinary circumstances justifying such a dismissal. U.S. Bank Nat. Ass'n v. Polanco, 126 A.D.3d 883, 7 N.Y.S.3d 156 (2d Dep't 2015); see Williams v. North Shore LIJ Health System, 119 A.D.3d 935, 990 N.Y.S.2d 260 (2d Dep't 2014) (affirming Supreme Court's order dismissing complaint sua sponte based on plaintiff's failure to comply with multiple directives to file a bill of particulars setting forth alleged negligence of each of over 100 defendants in medical malpractice action); cf. Citimortgage, Inc. v. Petragnani, 137 A.D.3d 1688, 27 N.Y.S.3d 780 (4th Dep't 2016) (missing single court-ordered deadline by one week did not warrant sua sponte dismissal).

But given the paucity of examples of sua sponte dismissals that have been upheld, it is hard for a judge to dismiss a complaint sua sponte with much confidence. Should a statute or other authority expressly authorize a court to dismiss sua sponte, the court can have at it, but instances in which a court is so authorized are few. See 22 NYCRR 202.27 (authorizing a trial court to dismiss based on a plaintiff's failure to appear for or be ready to proceed at any duly scheduled court appearance); see also Grant v. Rattoballi, 57 A.D.3d 272, 869 N.Y.S.2d 53 (1st Dep't 2008); see generally Tirado v. Miller, 75 A.D.3d 153, 160, 901 N.Y.S.2d 358, 363-364 (2d Dep't 2010) ("there are circumstances when courts may act sua sponte and others when courts may not do so. The telltale sign of the difference, for many but not all circumstances, is the enabling language of the relevant statutory provision pursuant to which the court acts").

Putting aside the circumstances under which a court might be able to dismiss a complaint in the absence of a motion by a party, due process concerns abound when a court acts sua sponte, particularly when it acts to terminate a proceeding. In Chun v. North American Mortgage Co., supra, the Court highlighted the due process territory on which a sua sponte dismissal intrudes, observing that the plaintiff is deprived of the venerable due process duo of notice and an opportunity to be heard. Thus, a court considering, sua sponte, the ultimate relief of dismissal should gauge whether the plaintiff had any prior notice that dismissal could occur, and whether the plaintiff might have anything to offer by way of legal argument or evidence that could persuade the court not to dismiss the action. On the notice score, a prior court order, correspondence from the court, or on-the-record statements made by the court during an appearance might suffice. If the court finds that the plaintiff lacked notice, that the plaintiff could present arguments or factual submissions that may persuade the court not to dismiss the action, or both, the court should consider notifying the parties that it is contemplating dismissal and inviting submissions by the parties. See Bank of New York v. Castillo, 120 A.D.3d 598, 991 N.Y.S.2d 446 (2d Dep't 2014) (when a court exercises the power to grant relief sua sponte, it must afford the parties a reasonable opportunity to be heard); see also U.S. Bank, N.A. v. McCrory, 137 A.D.3d 1517, 29 N.Y.S.3d 594 (3d Dep't 2016); cf. Cadichon v. Facelle, 18 N.Y.3d 230, 938 N.Y.S.2d 232, 961 N.E.2d 623 (2011) (discussing the process a court should afford the parties before dismissing a complaint under CPLR 3216 on the court's own motion).

C3211:9. CPLR 3211(a) Motion Contrasted With Summary Judgment.

Usually, a CPLR 3211(a) motion must be made before a defendant's answering time expires. It is therefore thought of as the pre-answer dismissal device. A summary judgment motion cannot be made until issue has been joined; that is to say until a responsive pleading, such as an answer, has been served. Thus, summary judgment is the post-answer dismissal device.

A motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a) must be predicated on one or more grounds enumerated in that subdivision, see Commentary C3211:5, while summary judgment may be sought on any basis (including a CPLR 3211[a] ground) that resolves part or all of the case. See Siegel, New York Practice § 278 (Connors 5th ed.).

An order granting a CPLR 3211(a) motion is not a disposition on the merits of the action (unless the motion was properly converted to a summary judgment motion). Rather, it is res judicata of whatever was determined. Siegel, New York Practice § 276. The res judicata effect of a granted CPLR 3211(a) motion is explored below. See Commentaries C3211:62-65. Conversely, an order granting summary judgment is usually entitled to full res judicata treatment. See Commentary C3212:21; Siegel, New York Practice § 287.

The phenomenon known as "searching the record," the power of a court to review the motion record before it and, if warranted, grant judgment to a non-moving party even in the absence of a request to do so, is available to a court adjudicating a summary judgment motion. See CPLR 3212(b); Commentary C3212:23. "Searching the record" is not permissible on a CPLR 3211(a) motion. Torrance Construction, Inc. v. Jaques, 127 A.D.3d 1261, 8 N.Y.S.3d 441 (3d Dep't 2015); cf Commentary C3211:42.

Paragraph 1

C3211:10. Defense Based on "Documentary Evidence."

CPLR 3211(a)(1) allows a defendant to seek dismissal of a complaint (or part of it) based on a defense "founded upon documentary evidence." The ground did not exist prior to the enactment of the CPLR. It was included as a backup provision, providing a dismissal mechanism in situations where a defendant has a document that defeats a cause of action but the defendant is unable to point to one of the more specific grounds listed in subdivision (a). 221 Siegel's Practice Review 2, Second Department Shows Futility of Relying Exclusively on "Documentary Evidence" Standard of CPLR 3211(a)(1) When What Party Really Wants is Summary Judgment (May 2010); see Fontanetta v. John Doe 1, 73 A.D.3d 78, 84, 898 N.Y.S.2d 569, 574 (2d Dep't 2010) ("According to th[e] [1957 First Preliminary Report of the Advisory Committee on Practice and Procedure], the purpose of CPLR 3211(a)(5) was to cover the most common affirmative defenses founded upon documentary evidence, specifically, estoppel, arbitration and award, and discharge in bankruptcy, whereas section 3211(a)(1) was enacted to 'cover all others that may arise as for example, a written modification or any defense based on the terms of a written contract' ") (citing 1957 NY Legis. Doc. no. 6[b] at 85).

A motion pursuant to CPLR 3211(a)(1) must be made within the defendant's time to respond to the complaint or raised in an answer, otherwise it is waived.

CPLR 3211 does not define the phrase "documentary evidence," but its ordinary meaning suggests that anything reduced to paper could qualify. "Documentary evidence" actually encompasses precious few documents, making CPLR 3211(a)(1) a decidedly narrow ground on which to seek dismissal. See Higgitt, CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (a)(7) Dismissal Motions--Pitfalls and Pointers, 83 New York State Bar Journal 32 (Nov./Dec. 2011). A paper qualifies as "documentary evidence" if--and only if--it satisfies the following criteria: (1) it is unambiguous; (2) it is of undeniable authenticity; and (3) its contents are essentially undeniable. See Fontanetta v. John Doe 1, supra. Most motion submissions cannot satisfy this standard. See, e.g., Eisner v. Cusumano Construction, Inc., 132 A.D.3d 940, 18 N.Y.S.3d 683 (2d Dep't 2015) (affidavits and text messages); JP Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. v. Balliraj, 113 A.D.3d 821, 979 N.Y.S.2d 533 (2d Dep't 2014) (deposition testimony); Mason v. First Central National Life Ins. Co. of N.Y., 86 A.D.3d 854, 927 N.Y.S.2d 694 (3d Dep't 2011) (medical records); Integrated Construction Services, Inc., v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., 82 A.D.3d 1160, 920 N.Y.S.2d 166 (2d Dep't 2011) (letters). Notably, an affidavit cannot constitute "documentary evidence" because its contents can be controverted by other evidence--such as another affidavit. See, e.g., J.A. Lee Electric, Inc. v. City of New York, 119 A.D.3d 652, 990 N.Y.S.2d 223 (2d Dep't 2014); Flowers v. 73rd Townhouse, LLC, 99 A.D.3d 431, 951 N.Y.S.2d 393 (1st Dep't 2012); Lopes v. Bain, 82 A.D.3d 1553, 920 N.Y.S.2d 792 (3d Dep't 2011); cf. Reiss v. Deutsche Bank National Trust Co., ___ Misc. 3d ___, ___ N.Y.S.3d ___, 2016 WL 4431025 (Sup. Ct., Westchester County 2016) (affidavit prepared by plaintiffs in connection with their application for loan modification could constitute "documentary evidence"; affidavit reflected out-of-court transaction). (However, an affidavit may have an important role to play on a CPLR 3211[a][1] motion, see below).

What type of evidence can attain the rank of "documentary"? Judicial records and documents reflecting out-of-court transactions, e.g., notes, mortgages, deeds and contracts, may. Fontanetta v. John Doe 1, supra; see Siegel, New York Practice § 259 (Connors 5th ed.); see also Sunset Café, Inc. v. Mett's Surf & Sports Corp., 103 A.D.3d 707, 959 N.Y.S.2d 700 (2d Dep't 2013) (lease); Nisari v. Ramjohn, 85 A.D.3d 987, 927 N.Y.S.2d 358 (2d Dep't 2011) (insurance policy); Cochard-Robinson v. Concepcion, 60 A.D.3d 800, 875 N.Y.S.2d 224 (2d Dep't 2009) (contract); Crepin v. Fogarty, 59 A.D.3d 837, 874 N.Y.S.2d 278 (3d Dep't 2009) (deed); 150 Broadway N.Y. Assoc, L.P. v. Bodner, 14 A.D.3d 1, 784 N.Y.S.2d 63 (1st Dep't 2004) (contract). So too can e-mails, maybe. Compare Mendoza v. Akerman Senterfitt, LLP, 128 A.D.3d 480, 10 N.Y.S.3d 18 (1st Dep't 2015); Kolchins v. Evolution Markets, Inc., 128 A.D.3d 47, 8 N.Y.S.3d 1 (1st Dep't 2015); Art and Fashion Group Corp. v. Cyclops Production, Inc., 120 A.D.3d 436, 992 N.Y.S.2d 7 (1st Dep't 2014); and Amsterdam Hospitality Group, LLC v. Marshall-Alan Associates, Inc., 120 A.D.3d 431, 992 N.Y.S.2d 2 (1st Dep't 2015) with JBGR, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 128 A.D.3d 900, 11 N.Y.S.3d 83 (2d Dep't 2015); 25-01 Newkirk Ave., LLC v. Everest National Insurance Co., 127 A.D.3d 850, 7 N.Y.S.3d 325 (2d Dep't 2015); Zellner v. Odyl, LLC, 117 A.D.3d 1040, 986 N.Y.S.2d 592 (2d Dep't 2014).

If the evidence on which the defendant relies is not "documentary" the motion must be denied. Fontanetta v. John Doe 1, supra.

Above, we went on record that an affidavit prepared in connection with litigation cannot constitute "documentary evidence." Does that mean that an affidavit can play no role on a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion? We think there is room, albeit limited, for the affidavit. One of the criteria a paper must satisfy before it gets stamped "documentary" is that it be undeniably authentic. Therefore, unless the plaintiff stipulates to or otherwise acknowledges the authenticity of a document, a defendant proffering it on a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion should be able to tender evidence showing the document to be authentic. An affidavit (or, where appropriate, an affirmation [see CPLR 2106]) should be permissible for the important (but limited) purpose of authenticating the "documentary evidence." Hefter v. Elderserve Health, Inc., 134 A.D.3d 673, 22 N.Y.S.3d 454 (2d Dep't 2015); Muhlhahn v. Goldman, 93 A.D.3d 418, 939 N.Y.S.2d 420 (1st Dep't 2012); see VIT Acupuncture P.C. v. State Farm Automobile Ins. Co., 28 Misc.3d 1230(A), 958 N.Y.S.2d 64 (table), 2010 WL 3463735 (Civil Court of City New York, Kings County 2010). The affidavit would not serve as the "documentary evidence" on which the CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion is premised, but rather would demonstrate that the purported "documentary evidence" qualifies as such.

Assuming the movant has adduced "documentary evidence" in support of its CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion, what must that evidence show to warrant dismissal? Relief is appropriate where the evidence conclusively refutes the plaintiff's allegations or conclusively establishes a defense to the action. See Spoleta Construction, LLC v. Aspen Ins. UK Ltd., 27 N.Y.3d 933, 30 N.Y.S.3d 598, 50 N.E.3d 222 (2016); Goshen v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 98 N.Y.2d 314, 746 N.Y.S.2d 858, 774 N.E.2d 1190 (2002). In gauging whether the defendant's evidence accomplishes that feat, the familiar pro-pleader rules of decision must be applied: the complaint is to be afforded a liberal construction, the facts as alleged in the complaint accepted as true, and the plaintiff accorded the benefit of every favorable inference. Leon v. Martinez, 84 N.Y.2d 83, 87-88, 614 N.Y.S.2d 972, 974, 638 N.E.2d 511, 513 (1994).

In opposing a CPLR 3211(a)(1) motion, a plaintiff is free to submit evidence demonstrating that the defendant's evidence does not conclusively resolve the action (or challenged causes of action). Moreover, a plaintiff can invoke CPLR 3211(d) to forestall a decision on the merits of the motion if the plaintiff needs time to gather evidentiary materials necessary to frame its opposition. Under subdivision (d), a court can deny a subdivision (a) motion or adjourn it to allow the plaintiff an opportunity to procure affidavits or pursue disclosure. See Commentaries C3211:46-47.

A couple of miscellaneous matters. A valid forum selection clause dictating that an action be brought in a forum other than New York does not deprive a New York court of subject matter jurisdiction over the matter. See CPLR 3211(a)(2). Rather, a defendant to a New York action who believes that a forum selection clause requires the dispute to be litigated in the courts of another jurisdiction should raise the issue by motion under CPLR 3211(a)(1). Why is this the proper procedural path? Because a contractual forum selection clause may constitute "documentary evidence." Lischinskaya v. Carnival Corp., 56 A.D.3d 116, 865 N.Y.S.2d 334 (2d Dep't 2008); see Lowenbraun v. McKeon, 98 A.D.3d 655, 950 N.Y.S.2d 381 (2d Dep't 2012). An agreement to arbitrate a dispute is not a defense to an action brought on that dispute; the proper remedy for the party seeking arbitration is to move to compel it. Allied Building Inspectors International Union of Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 211, ALF-CIO v. Office of Labor Relations of the City of New York, 45 N.Y.2d 735, 738, 408 N.Y.S.2d 476, 478-479, 380 N.E.2d 303, 305 (1978). Thus, an agreement to arbitrate cannot be the basis for a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(1). Curran v. Estate of Curran, 87 A.D.3d 607, 928 N.Y.S.2d 463 (2d Dep't 2011).

As to the interplay between CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (a)(7) (failure to state a cause of action), see Higgitt, CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (a)(7) Dismissal Motions--Pitfalls and Pointers, 83 New York State Bar Journal 32, 34-35 (Nov./Dec. 2011). In closing, a thought for the careful practioner. Only an attorney both familiar with the limited utility of CPLR 3211(a)(1) and armed with the right evidence should rely solely on the "documentary" evidence ground. The wise move for the attorney who wants to invoke paragraph 1 is to raise paragraph 7 too.

Paragraph 2

C3211:11. Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction.

Subject matter jurisdiction is a question of competence: does a court have the competence to entertain a given action? Lacks v. Lacks, 41 N.Y.2d 71, 390 N.Y.S.2d 875, 359 N.E.2d 384 (1976). That competence comes from the New York State Constitution and statutes; the constitution, a statute or both can provide a court with the authorization to hear and decide a particular type of controversy. A court may have broad subject matter jurisdiction--the New York State Supreme Court (Thrasher v. U.S. Liability Ins. Co., 19 N.Y.2d 159, 278 N.Y.S.2d 793, 225 N.E.2d 503 [1967])--or very narrow jurisdiction--a local "Justice Court" (see Siegel, New York Practice § 22 [Connors 5th ed.]). A court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over an action if "the matter before the court [i]s not the kind of matter on which the court ha[s the] power to rule." Manhattan Telecommunications Corp. v. H & A Locksmith, Inc., 21 N.Y.3d 200, 203, 969 N.Y.S.2d 424, 426, 991 N.E.2d 198, 200 (2013).

CPLR 3211(a)(2) provides the means by which a party can seek dismissal of an action for want of subject matter jurisdiction. So fundamental is this particular objection that it can be raised any time, CPLR 3211(e); Commentary C3211:49, and cannot be waived. Lacks v. Lacks, 41 N.Y.2d at 75, 390 N.Y.S.2d at 878, 359 N.E.2d at 387. If the court concludes that it does not have subject matter jurisdiction over a case, it can dismiss the action on its own initiative. Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Co., 112 N.Y. 315, 19 N.E. 625 (1889).

Our State Supreme Court has almost limitless subject matter jurisdiction, the significant limitations being where the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over a matter and where the Court of Claims has exclusive jurisdiction. Siegel, New York Practice § 12. There are some other limitations that occasionally cause the issue of subject matter jurisdiction to arise. See Hafif v. Rabbinical Council of Syrian & Near Eastern Jewish Communities in America, 140 A.D.3d 1017, 34 N.Y.S.3d 160 (2d Dep't 2016) (courts lack subject matter jurisdiction over certain religious disputes); Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Chukchansi Economic Development Auth., 118 A.D.3d 550, 988 N.Y.S.2d 160 (1st Dep't 2014) (courts lack subject matter jurisdiction over the internal affairs of Indian tribes); Hunt Construction Group, Inc. v. Oneida Indian Nation, 53 A.D.3d 1048, 862 N.Y.S.2d 423 (4th Dep't 2008) (courts generally lack subject matter jurisdiction over damages suits against Indian tribes). Therefore, issues relating to subject matter jurisdiction are most likely to arise in New York's lower trial courts, e.g., New York City Civil Court, city courts outside of New York City, County Courts, etc. See Higgitt, A Nullity or Not?--The Status of a Default Judgment Entered Absent Compliance with CPLR 3215(f), 73 Alb. L. Rev. 807, 824, n.75 (2010).

A plaintiff's lack of "standing" does not affect a New York State court's subject matter jurisdiction over the action; the issue of standing is treated on par with the issue of capacity. See Commentary C3211:13.

An enforceable forum selection clause does not deprive a New York Court of subject matter jurisdiction over an action brought here in contravention of the clause. Lischinskaya v. Carnival Corp., 56 A.D.3d 116, 865 N.Y.S.2d 334 (2d Dep't 2008). A defendant looking to enforce a forum selection clause should employ CPLR 3211(a)(1). See Commentary C3211:10.

Paragraph 3

C3211:12. Plaintiff's Lack of Capacity.

"Capacity" concerns a plaintiff's power to appear before and bring an action in court. Community Board 7 of Borough of Manhattan v. Schaffer, 84 N.Y.2d 148, 155, 615 N.Y.S.2d 644, 647, 639 N.E.2d 1, 4 (1994). "Legal capacity to sue, or lack thereof, often depends purely on the [plaintiff's] status, such as that of an infant, an adjudicated incompetent, a trustee, certain governmental entities or ... a business corporation." Security Pacific Nat. Bank v. Evans, 31 A.D.3d 278, 279, 820 N.Y.S.2d 2, 3 (1st Dep't 2006). The inquiry here is not whether the plaintiff suffered an injury or was otherwise harmed by the defendant's alleged conduct or inaction--that gets into a plaintiff's "standing," which is a separate question (see below)--but rather whether the law recognizes the plaintiff as the proper bearer of the lawsuit.

Some situations where the capacity question may rear its head: where the plaintiff is an artificial entity (such as a corporation or an unincorporated association), Community Board 7 of Borough of Manhattan v. Schaffer, supra; where the plaintiff is a governmental entity created by a legislative enactment, id.; see Excess Line Ass'n of New York (ELANY) v. Waldorf & Associates, 130 A.D.3d 563, 13 N.Y.S.3d 464 (2d Dep't 2015); where the plaintiff is a municipality seeking to contest a State decision that affects the municipality in its governmental capacity or as a representative of its inhabitants, Matter of Town of Verona v. Cuomo, 136 A.D.3d 36, 22 N.Y.S.3d 241 (3d Dep't 2015); where the plaintiff filed for bankruptcy but failed to list its cause of action as an asset, Whelan v. Longo, 23 A.D.3d 459, 808 N.Y.S.2d 95 (2d Dep't 2005); George Strokes Elec. and Plumbing Inc. v. Dye, 240 A.D.2d 919, 659 N.Y.S.2d 129 (3d Dep't 1997); see Collins v. Suraci, 110 A.D.3d 1214, 973 N.Y.S.2d 828 (3d Dep't 2013); and where the plaintiff is an infant purporting to sue on his or her own behalf. Siegel, New York Practice § 261 (Connors 5th ed.).

Plaintiff's lack of capacity may be raised in a pre-answer motion or asserted in an answer; if neither step is taken, the defense is waived. CPLR 3211(e).

Capacity to sue--the right to come into court--and possession of a cause of action--the right to relief--are distinct concepts. Rainbow Hospitality Management, Inc. v. Mesch Engineering, P.C., 270 A.D.2d 906, 907, 705 N.Y.S.2d 765, 766 (4th Dep't 2000); see Edwards v. Siegel, Kelleher & Khan, 26 A.D.3d 789, 811 N.Y.S.2d 828 (4th Dep't 2006). But the line between the two can sometimes be blurry. See Community Board 7 or Borough of Manhattan v. Schaffer, 84 N.Y.2d at 155, 615 N.Y.S.2d at 647, 639 N.E.2d at 4 (1994); Siegel, New York Practice § 261. In Rainbow Hospitality Management, plaintiff sued defendants for damages. Defendants moved, during trial (see CPLR 4401), to dismiss the complaint, arguing that plaintiff had no right to relief because plaintiff did not exist when the conduct giving rise to the action occurred and sustained no injury as a result of that conduct. The Fourth Department rejected plaintiff's assertion that defendants' argument was premised on lack of capacity and therefore waived because defendants did not raise that ground in a pre-answer motion or in their answers, concluding instead that defendants' argument touched on the legal sufficiency of the complaint. Rainbow Hospitality Management, Inc. v. Mesch Engineering, P.C., 270 A.D.2d at 907, 705 N.Y.S.2d at 766.

Why is the distinction between the two grounds so important? Because, as Rainbow Hospitality Management illustrates, an objection under CPLR 3211(a)(7) (failure to state a cause of action) can be raised any time in the litigation, while an objection under CPLR 3211(a)(3) (lack of capacity) must be raised in a pre-answer motion or in an answer otherwise it is waived. CPLR 3211(e). Fortunately, the practitioner faced with one of these close calls need not spend much time analyzing which paragraph actually applies; both grounds can be raised in the pre-answer motion or the answer.

Note that paragraph 3 deals only with the lack of capacity of the plaintiff. If the defendant's capacity is called into question because the defendant is an infant or operating under a disability, paragraph 5 is the ground for the motion. See Commentary C3211:18.

C3211:13. Lack of "Standing" as Going to "Capacity."

As discussed above, CPLR 3211(a)(3) provides that a defendant can seek dismissal of the complaint on the ground that the plaintiff lacks the "capacity," i.e., the power, to appear before the court. That provision does not expressly allow for dismissal based on a plaintiff's lack of "standing." A plaintiff lacks standing if it does not have a sufficiently cognizable stake in the outcome of the litigation. Community Board 7 of the Borough of Manhattan v. Schaffer, 84 N.Y.2d 148, 615 N.Y.S.2d 644, 639 N.E.2d 1 (1996). While capacity and standing are conceptually different, Silver v. Pataki, 96 N.Y.2d 532, 730 N.Y.S.2d 482, 755 N.E.2d 842 (2001), they are treated as synonyms for the purposes of applying paragraph 3. Wells Fargo Bank Minnesota, N.A. v. Mastropaolo, 42 A.D.3d 239, 837 N.Y.S.2d 247 (2d Dep't 2007). Therefore, a defendant can challenge a plaintiff's standing by moving to dismiss pre-answer or raising lack of standing in the answer. Id. Dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(2) for want of subject matter jurisdiction does not lie for lack of standing. See id.; Commentary 3211:11.

The practice in federal court is different. There, standing relates to a court's subject matter jurisdiction. See Siegel, New York Practice § 611 (Connors 5th ed.).

If a plaintiff has standing at the time the action was commenced but transfers its interest in the subject matter of the suit to another while the action is pending, the plaintiff does not necessarily lose standing. CPLR 1018 provides that, "[u]pon the transfer of an interest, the action may be continued by or against the original parties unless the court directs the persons [or entities] to whom the interest is transferred to be substituted or joined in the action." See Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Hudson, 98 A.D.3d 576, 949 N.Y.S.2d 703 (2d Dep't 2012).

Historically, standing has not been a source of significant litigation in New York State courts. But the proliferation of contested residential mortgage foreclosure actions has created a wellspring of appellate case law addressing standing. Why is standing such a hot topic in this area? The volume of transfers of notes and mortgages, the complexity of many mortgage-related transactions, and the sheer number of foreclosure actions, among other factors, have created an environment conducive to questions on standing. Some clarity on the standing issue in the mortgage foreclosure realm was provided by the Court of Appeals in Aurora Loan Services, LLC v. Taylor, 25 N.Y.3d 355, 12 N.Y.S.3d 612, 34 N.E.3d 363 (2015) (holding that the note, not the mortgage, is the instrument that conveys standing to a plaintiff).

Paragraph 4

C3211:14. "Other Action Pending," Generally.

CPLR 3211(a)(4) authorizes dismissal of an action on the ground that there is another one pending involving the same subject matter. Paragraph 4's purpose is to prevent the consequences of duplicative litigation (e.g., conflicting judgments, the parties bearing the expense of litigating multiple, similar lawsuits). Note that paragraph 4 authorizes but does not require dismissal of an action that is similar to another; the provision cautions that a "court need not dismiss upon th[e] ground [that a similar action is pending] but may make such order as justice requires." Thus, a court confronted with a motion to dismiss the action before it in favor of another pending action has discretion to fashion relief appropriate under the circumstances. See Commentary 3211:17.

Paragraph 4 is available where "there is another action pending between the same parties for the same cause of action in a court of any state or the United States." If the other action is pending in a foreign country, the defendant's remedy would be to seek a stay of the New York action under CPLR 2201, see Commentary 2201:10, or move to dismiss the New York action under the doctrine of forum non conveniens. See CPLR 327.

A summons and complaint (or an equivalent initiatory paper, such as a petition) must have been served in the other action, otherwise it is not "another action" within the meaning of CPLR 3211(a)(4). Wharton v. Wharton, 244 A.D.2d 404, 664 N.Y.S.2d 73 (2d Dep't 1997); see John J. Campagna, Inc. v. Dune Alpin Farm Assoc., 81 A.D.2d 633, 438 N.Y.S.2d 132 (2d Dep't 1981). Where, for example, the prior action was commenced using a summons with notice, CPLR 305(b), and the complaint has not been served, a paragraph 4 motion does not lie. Wharton v. Wharton, supra. And dismissal under paragraph 4 generally is not appropriate unless the complaint has been served in the present action. Siegel, New York Practice § 262 (Connors 5th ed.). Why is service of pleadings in both actions so important? Because it is the pleadings that allow the court to gauge whether the actions involve the same parties and the same cause of action. Id.

If there is "another action" pending in a New York, federal or sister state court, the next question becomes whether that action and the present action (i.e. the New York action in which the paragraph 4 motion was made) involve the same parties and the same cause of action. See Commentary 3211:15. If the other action and the present action do involve the same parties and the same cause of action, an important issue is which action was commenced first. See Commentary 3211:16. There is a solid, but rebuttable, presumption that the action that was commenced first will be the one that will be allowed to proceed. Assuming the other action and the present action are sufficiently similar, the court has a range of options. See Commentary 3211:17.

CPLR 3211(a)(4) must be raised in a pre-answer motion or asserted in the answer. CPLR 3211(e). The court should not dismiss an action sua sponte under paragraph 4. Frederick v. Meighan, 75 A.D.3d 528, 905 N.Y.S.2d 635 (2d Dep't 2010).

There is no federal statutory analog to CPLR 3211(a)(4). Where dismissal is sought in federal court of a federal action in deference to an action pending in state court, guidance must be sought from the case law. See Bank of America v. Sharim, Inc., 2010 WL 5072118 (S.D.N.Y. 2010); see also C. Wright, A. Miller & E. Cooper, et al., 17A Fed. Prac. & Proc. Juris. § 4247 (3d ed.).

3211:15. Same Parties, Same Cause of Action.

As mentioned above, paragraph 4 seeks to prevent unnecessary duplicative litigation. If the other action and the present one are not sufficiently similar, there is no need to interfere with either one. Therefore, the court must determine whether the other action and the present one involve the same parties for the same cause of action.

Initially, it is important to stress that the other action and the present one need not be identical; substantial similarity will do. The inquiry is whether the following elements of the actions are substantially similar: (1) the parties; (2) the causes of action; and (3) the relief.

With respect to the parties, there must be substantial identity. Scottsdale Ins. Co. v. Indemnity Ins. Corp. RRG, 110 A.D.3d 783, 974 N.Y.S.2d 476 (2d Dep't 2013); White Light Productions, Inc. v. On the Scenes Productions, Inc., 231 A.D.2d 90, 660 N.Y.S.2d 568 (1st Dep't 1997); see Credit-Based Asset Servicing and Securitization, LLC v. Grimmer, 299 A.D.2d 887, 750 N.Y.S.2d 673 (4th Dep't 2002); K.S. Finance Corp. v. Grand Palace Hotel at the Park, 272 A.D.2d 204, 709 N.Y.S.2d 512 (1st Dep't 2000). The presence of additional parties in one of the actions does not preclude a finding that the other action and the present one are substantially similar. White Lights Productions, Inc. v. On the Scene Productions, Inc., supra.

Despite the absence of one common defendant in the actions, there still may be substantial identity of the parties. If, for instance, the plaintiff, in separate actions, seeks the same damages for the same alleged injuries relating to the same wrongs from close corporate affiliates. Syncora Guarantee Inc. v. J.P. Morgan Securities, LLC, 110 A.D.3d 87, 970 N.Y.S.2d 526 (1st Dep't 2013).

The causes of action in the other action and the causes of action in the present one are substantially similar if they arise out of the same wrong or series of wrongs. Rinzler v. Rinzler, 97 A.D.3d 215, 947 N.Y.S.2d 844 (3d Dep't 2012); White Light Productions, Inc., v. On the Scene Productions, Inc., supra. This is the critical element. Syncora Guarantee Inc. v. J.P. Morgan Securities, LLC, supra; Scottsdale Insurance Co. v. Indemnity Insurance Corp. RRG, supra. When reviewing the causes of action in a case, it is important to account for any counterclaims, cross claims, etc., that may have been interposed, as they count for the purpose of determining whether the causes of action in the two actions are substantially similar. See Packes v. Cendent Mortgage Corp., 19 A.D.3d 386, 796 N.Y.S.2d 135 (2d Dep't 2005).

The relief sought in the other action and the present one must be the same or substantially the same. White Light Productions, Inc. v. On the Scene Productions, Inc., supra. That is not the case if the relief sought in one action is antagonistic or inconsistent with that sought in the other, or the purposes of the actions are entirely different. Id., see Marcus Dairy, Inc. v. Jacene Realty Corp., 193 A.D.2d 653, 597 N.Y.S.2d 465 (2d Dep't 1993).

If the parties, the causes of action, and the relief sought in the other action are substantially similar to those elements of the present action, it is on to consider which action was commenced first.

C3211:16. First-In-Time Rule.

Where there are two pending actions involving the same parties and the same causes of action, the court in which the first action was commenced is the one that ought to adjudicate the dispute. City Trade & Industries, Ltd. v. New Central Jute Mills Co., 25 N.Y.2d 49, 302 N.Y.S.2d 557, 250 N.E.2d 52 (1969). This is the "first-in-time" rule.

In most jurisdictions, an action is commenced when the initiatory papers are filed with the appropriate clerk. Most courts in New York have such a commencement-by-filing protocol, see Commentary C304:1, and the federal courts look to the filing dates in determining which action came first. See White Light Productions, Inc. v. On the Scene Productions, Inc., 231 A.D.2d 90, 96, 660 N.Y.S.2d 568 (1st Dep't 1997). The filing dates of the respective actions are therefore usually the information that will be used to establish priority between the actions. In the event the other action is pending in a sister state's court, check the law of that state to confirm that it too is a commencement-by-filing jurisdiction.

That an action was commenced first does not mean that it must be the one that is allowed to proceed. The presence of special circumstances permits a court to depart from the first-in-time rule. The following factors have been identified in the case law that may inform the court's discretionary determination of whether special circumstances exist.

One, whether the prior action was filed preemptively after the plaintiff in that action learned that the opposing party intended to commence a case. L-3 Communications Corp v. SafeNet, Inc., 45 A.D.3d 1, 841 N.Y.S.2d 82 (1st Dep't 2007). The law seeks to discourage a race to the courthouse, as such an exercise creates "disincentives to responsible litigation by discouraging settlements due to fear of a preemptive strike and by providing a tactical advantage to defendants seeking a more favorable forum for litigation." Id., 45 A.D.3d at 8, 841 N.Y.S.2d at 88. That the prior action was brought in the form of a declaratory judgment action may serve as a strong signal that it was commenced preemptively. Id., 45 A.D.3d at 8-9, 841 N.Y.S.2d at 88-89; see White Lights Productions, Inc. v. On the Scene Productions, Inc., supra. That the first action was filed preemptively weighs heavily against application of the first-in-time rule and strongly in favor of finding special circumstances. L-3 Communications Corp. v. Safenet, Inc., 45 A.D.3d at 9, 841 N.Y.S.2d at 89.

Two, whether the competing actions were commenced reasonably close in time. Flintkote Co. v. American Mutual Liability Ins. Co., 103 A.D.2d 501, 505, 480 N.Y.S.2d 742, 745 (2d Dep't 1984), aff'd for reasons stated 67 N.Y.2d 857, 501 N.Y.S.2d 662, 492 N.E.2d 790 (1986); L-3 Communications Corp., v. Safenet, Inc., 45 A.D.3d at 9, 841 N.Y.S.2d at 89. The closer in time the actions were commenced, the greater the likelihood the first-in-time rule will not be honored if other factors militate in favor of deferring to the subsequently-commenced action.

Three, whether New York has a significant nexus to the dispute. L-3 Communications Corp. v. Safenet, Inc., 45 A.D.3d at 9, 841 N.Y.S.2d at 89; see Fox Television Stations, Inc. v. Rainbow Broadcasting Limited Partnership, 45 A.D.3d 399, 846 N.Y.S.2d 40 (1st Dep't 2007). The inquiry on this factor "is similar to that undertaken in applying the doctrine of forum non conveniens--whether the litigation and the parties have sufficient contact with [New York] to justify the burdens imposed on our judicial system." Flintkote Co. v. American Mutual Liability Ins., Co., 103 A.D.2d at 506, 480 N.Y.2d at 745-746, aff'd for reasons stated, supra. A New York-centric dispute suggests the New York court should keep the case; a case with tenuous New York connections should probably be dealt with by the other court. AIG Financial Products Corp. v. Penncara Energy, LLC, 83 A.D.3d 495, 922 N.Y.S.2d 288 (1st Dep't 2011).

Four, whether one action is further along compared to the other, and, relatedly, whether one party has been more diligent in prosecuting the action it commenced.

Five, whether one action is more comprehensive than the other. AIG Financial Products Corp. v. Penncara Energy, LLC, supra.

After considering these factors and any other material facts in the case, the court can ascertain whether the action that was filed first should keep its priority or whether the later-filed action should take top billing.

Where the other pending action involves the same parties and the same causes of action, and has priority over the present action, the court must decided whether to dismiss the present action or afford some other form of relief.

C3211:17. Remedies.

A court has broad discretion in considering whether to dismiss an action under CPLR 3211(a)(4). Whitney v. Whitney, 57 N.Y.2d 731, 454 N.Y.S.2d 977, 440 N.E.2d 1324 (1982). While dismissal of the present action is a potential disposition, the court is invited to make "such order as justice requires." The remedies available in a given case depend on whether the other action is in the same or a different court.

Other Action in Other Court

When the other action and the present action are pending in the same court, e.g., New York State Supreme Court, the court hearing the present action can direct a disposition of (or otherwise directly affect) the other action. Where, however, the other action is pending in a federal or sister state court, the court in the present action must tread carefully; directly affecting the other action is rarely appropriate. As the court in Matter of NYSE Euronext Shareholders/ICE Litigation, put it: "No judge in one jurisdiction, having found it appropriate to retain a case, has the ability to direct a judge in another jurisdiction, who has found it appropriate to do the same, to dismiss or stay his or her case." 39 Misc.3d 619, 626, 965 N.Y.S.2d 278, 283 (Sup. Ct., New York County 2013).

Several remedies have been recognized in the situation where the other action is pending in a federal or sister state court.

• Stay of the present action (the New York action). This is a common disposition, largely because it is the safest course of action. The court in the New York action stays the action; the other action proceeds. The stay remedy has been used where the other action would resolve issues critical in the New York action, ultimately streamlining the New York litigation, 342 West 30th Street Corp., v. Bradbury, 30 Misc.3d 132(A), 958 N.Y.S.2d 649 (table), 2011 WL 135257 (App Term, 1st Dep't 2011); see AIG Financial Products Corp. v. Penncara Energy, LLC, 83 A.D.3d 495, 922 N.Y.S.2d 288 (1st Dep't 2011); the court in the New York action was concerned that the parties could not be afforded full relief in the other action, Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Pena, 51 Misc.3d 541, 24 N.Y.S.3d 865 (Sup. Ct., Kings County 2016); see SafeCard Services, Inc. v. American Express Travel Related Services Co., Inc., 203 A.D.2d 65, 65-66, 610 N.Y.S.2d 23, 23 (1st Dep't 1994) ("[o]ne alternative [measure] available to a court faced with a [paragraph 4] motion ... where it appears that the other action may be resolved in a manner which would not bar further proceedings in New York is to stay the New York action pending resolution of the other action"); and the court in the New York action found that the New York action should serve as a back-up to the other action. Allowing a stayed New York action to serve as a back-up is appropriate, among other situations, where the defendant, who seeks dismissal of the New York action on the ground that another action is pending, has signaled that it will seek dismissal of the other action for some reasons unrelated to the merits of the dispute, e.g., that the other action is time-barred, that the court in the other action lacks personal jurisdiction over the defendant. See Safeguard Services, Inc. v. American Express Travel Related Services, Co., supra; Siegel, New York Practice § 262 (Connors 5th ed.). The stayed back-up action results in the New York court retaining jurisdiction and lending aid to the parties "if some unforeseen difficulty should arise in connection with the other action." Flintkote Co. v. American Mutual Liability, Inc. Co., 103 A.D.2d 501, 507-508, 480 N.Y.S.2d 742, 746 (2d Dep't 1984), aff'd for reasons stated 67 N.Y.2d 857, 501 N.Y.S.2d 662, 492 N.E.2d 790 (1986).

• Coordination of litigation in different jurisdictions. If the court in the New York action determines that the action should proceed and the court in the other action determines that its action too should go forward, all is not lost. The two courts can coordinate the litigations, which "streamlines disclosure, minimizes conflicting rulings, and avoids burdensome and repetitive deposition appearances." Robert L. Haig, Commercial Litigation in New York State Court § 16:2 (4th ed.). A thoughtful discussion of this option can be found in Matter of NYSE Euronext Shareholders/ICE Litigation, supra. See also Commercial Litigation in New York State Courts §§ 16:1-16:2, 16:10-16:21.

• Dismissal of New York action.

• Enjoining a party from maintaining the other action. This is the nuclear option; it is rarely done as it directly interferences with the workings of another jurisdiction's courts. Examples are few. Jay Franco and Sons Inc. v. G Studios, LLC, 34 A.D.3d 297, 825 N.Y.S.2d 20 (1st Dep't 2006), is one. Certain Underwriters at Lloyds, London v. Millennium Holdings, LLC, 52 A.D.3d 295, 861 N.Y.S.2d 3 (1st Dep't 2008), is another. Only exceptional circumstances should lead a New York court to use this remedy. See 180 Siegel's Practice Review 3 (Dec. 2006), Court Grants P Injunction to Stop D from Prosecuting Action in Sister State (reviewing unusual facts underlying Jay Franco decision).

Other Action Pending in New York State Court

Where the other action is pending in a New York State court, the present court's options increase. If the actions are pending in the same court, say Supreme Court (our common example), and the actions involve identical parties, the court in the present action can directly affect the other action.

A common resolution (and a particularly effective one) is to order the two actions consolidated, which results in the merger of the separate actions into one. That action will have a single caption, will result in one verdict or decision, and will conclude in one judgment. Commentary C602:2. Consolidation is generally appropriate where two actions share common material questions of law or fact and no party would be prejudiced by the union of the actions. See CPLR 602(a). Having already concluded that the other action and the present action have the same parties and involve the same cause of action, see Commentary C3211:15, that general standard will likely be satisfied. See Gutman v. Klein, 26 A.D.3d 464, 811 N.Y.S.2d 413 (2d Dep't 2006).

Consolidation under the main consolidation statute, CPLR 602, ordinarily requires a motion by a party. Because of the phraseology of paragraph 4, the court has the power to order a consolidation on a CPLR 3211(a)(4) motion even if no party has asked for it. See John J. Campagna, Inc. v. Dune Alpin Farm Assoc., 81 A.D.2d 633, 438 N.Y.S.2d 132 (2d Dep't 1981).

When consolidation is to be the result in an instance when one action is pending in Supreme Court and the other action is pending in a different New York court, it would have to be coupled with a removal under CPLR 602(b). The removal could be made only from a lower court to a higher one--only the Supreme and County Courts have removal powers under CPLR 602(b)--and it would have to be shown that all of the parties to both actions have been notified. See Commentary C602:4.

An issue of the venue of the motion might be raised, although venue should not be a problem if all of the parties to both actions are the same. Assume that X is a party to the other action but not to the instant one. X can reasonably contend that even if she is notified, she may not be compelled to respond to a motion in a court to whose action she is not a party. And if she is a party to a Supreme Court action in county A but the motion is made in the action in the Supreme Court of county B, X can urge that CPLR 2212(a) protects her from the motion. The Court of Appeals has indicated that as long as notice of the consolidation application is given to all parties to all actions, consolidation can be made. See Kent Development Co. Inc. v. Liccione, 37 N.Y.2d 899, 340 N.E.2d 740, 378 N.Y.S.2d 377 (1975). The unfairness of directing a consolidation of actions without notifying all of the parties to all of them and giving them a chance to be heard is what has to be guarded against, indicates the Court in Kent Development Co. If some of the parties to the other action are not also parties to the present one, the court can direct one of the parties before it to give notice--to the as yet unnotified parties to the other action--that the court here is considering a consolidation, and that it is holding off decision until X date to afford all a hearing. That would give them a chance to address the matter, and the notice requirement should be satisfied with that. On that notice, every party can be heard on all of the issues that arise on a consolidation motion.

If the motion is granted, the questions arise of which county shall be the venue of the consolidated action and what the sequence shall be of the parties' rights to open and close to the jury. On those matters, see Siegel, New York Practice § 128 (Connors 5th ed.); Commentary C602:3.

When removal from a lower court to a higher one under CPLR 602(b) is directed, it is apparently sufficient that the motion in the higher court includes notice to all of the parties to the lower court suit even though one or more of the parties may not be parties to the higher court action. This must be so, or a removal under CPLR 602(b) would be defeated in every instance in which one of the parties in the lower court is not also a party in the higher one, a result inconsistent with the purpose of CPLR 602(b) and practice under it.

It would also be possible, of course, for the court in county X to condition consolidation on the approval of the court in the other county, county Y. And again, the party among the several parties to the X action who is also a party in Y (and who seeks the consolidation) could be directed to make a motion in Y for the conditioned approval, and on that motion all those parties in Y who are not also parties in X can be given due notice and should have no objections to motion venue under CPLR 2212(a).

The word "consolidation" used throughout this discussion should be deemed to embrace "joint trial" as an alternative. Both are authorized under CPLR 602(a) and should therefore be alternatives for the court to use under CPLR 3211(a)(4). For the technical differences between consolidation and joint trial, see Siegel, New York Practice § 127. And if the power to consolidate or jointly try, otherwise conferred by CPLR 602(a), is within the court's arsenal under CPLR 3211(a)(4), then so must be the removal power authorized by CPLR 602(b).

When related, unconsolidated actions are pending in the New York State courts in more than one judicial district, "coordination" of the litigation in those actions may be appropriate. See 22 NYCRR 202.69.

Paragraph 5

C3211:18. Affirmative Defenses Available on Subdivision (a) Motion.

Paragraph 5 contains a grab bag of objections all of which are classified as "affirmative defenses" by CPLR 3018(b). Most of the affirmative defenses listed in CPLR 3018(b) can support a CPLR 3211(a)(5) motion, but not all. See Commentary C3211:19.

The affirmative defenses available under paragraph 5 are as follows:

- arbitration and award;
- collateral estoppel;
- discharge in bankruptcy;
- infancy or other disability of the moving party;

- payment;
- release;
- res judicata;
- statute of limitations; and,
- statute of frauds.

A defendant who wishes to assert one or more of these affirmative defenses must raise the desired defenses in a pre-answer motion or the answer. CPLR 3211(e); see Wan Li Situ v. MTA Bus Co., 130 A.D.3d 807, 14 N.Y.S.3d 89 (2d Dep't 2015). The failure to take either of those steps can lead to a waiver, but, as we discuss in a later section, the defendant can avoid the waiver by moving to amend the answer. See C3211:58.

Generally speaking, in order to establish that dismissal under a given paragraph 5 affirmative defense is warranted, the defendant must show that, as a matter of law, the defense on which it is relying bars the plaintiff's action (or the challenged portion of it). What specifically a defendant must show to discharge that burden will depend on the particular affirmative defense invoked.

The party opposing the motion (usually a plaintiff) is aided by the rules of decision applicable to a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(5). Those rules require a court to "accept the facts as alleged in the complaint as true, accord plaintiff the benefit of every possible favorable inference, and determine only whether the facts as alleged fit within any cognizable legal theory." Faison v. Lewis, 25 N.Y.3d 220, 224, 10 N.Y.S.3d 185, 187, 32 N.E.3d 400, 402 (2015). These same rules apply to most other subdivision (a) grounds, most notably paragraphs 1 and 7. See Commentaries C3211:10, C3211:21. Faison highlights how important those rules are in practice.

In Faison, A and B inherited real property as tenants in common. By a quit claim deed, B conveyed her interest to C. C subsequently recorded a purported corrective deed, dated December 11, 2000, that included both A and B as grantors, thus conveying the entire fee to C. C then borrowed money from a bank, providing the bank with a mortgage encumbering the property. In August 2010, plaintiff, the administrator of A's estate, brought an action against, among other defendants, B, C and the bank to declare the "corrected" deed and the mortgage null and void. Plaintiff's theory: A's signature on the "corrected" deed was forged, making that deed and the mortgage void. For their part, B and C asserted that the "corrected" deed was valid. The bank moved to dismiss the complaint as against it under CPLR 3211(a)(5), arguing that the action was barred by the statute of limitations applicable to fraud actions. See CPLR 213(8).

The trial court granted the motion, and, as is relevant to our discussion, the Second Department affirmed.

The Court of Appeals reversed. It stated that a forged deed is void ab initio--a legal nullity at its inception--as is any encumbrance on the property based on the forged instrument. Because a forged deed and any encumbrance based on it are legal nullities, the Court concluded that "a claim against a forged deed is not subject to a statute of limitations defense." Faison v. Lewis, 25 N.Y.3d at 226, 10 N.Y.S.3d at 189, 32 N.E.3d at 404. Thus, plaintiff's suit survived the bank's CPLR 3211(a)(5) motion to dismiss. The Court indulged the assumption that the deed was forged because it applied those pro-pleader rules listed above (i.e., accept the plaintiff's version of the facts as true, accord the plaintiff the benefit of favorable inferences). That B and C asserted that the "corrected" deed was valid was of no moment at this procedural juncture.

Whether a particular defense has been established is dependent on the facts of the case and the law underlying the defense. Those are matters beyond these Commentaries but certain procedural points relevant to individual grounds should be highlighted.

The defense of arbitration and award is available only where a dispute has proceeded to arbitration and an award determining the dispute has been made. See Langemyr v. Campbell, 23 A.D.2d 371, 261 N.Y.S.2d 500 (2d Dep't 1965). Not just any old award will do; "an arbitration award may not serve as the foundation of the defense ... unless that award is subject to confirmation pursuant to CPLR article 75." Marracino v. Alexander, 73 A.D.3d 22, 23, 897 N.Y.S.2d 555, 556 (4th Dep't 2010). The requirement is not that the award actually be confirmed, a process permitted by CPLR 7510, but rather that the award be "subject to confirmation." Whether an award is capable or incapable of confirmation is a question for the statutes in CPLR article 75 and the case law interpreting them. See Commentaries to CPLR 7510 and 7511.

If a defendant is sued in court on a claim it believes is arbitrable and wants the matter sent to arbitration, defendant's remedy is a motion to compel arbitration under CPLR 7503. Siegel, New York Practice § 263 (Connors 5th ed.).

The doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel can apply to arbitration awards. See Siegel New York Practice § 456. Thus, where an arbitration award is at issue, there may be some overlap between the arbitration and award ground in paragraph 5, and the res judicata and collateral estoppel grounds. Any concern on counsel's part regarding the identity of the proper ground can be allayed by raising them all.

Collateral estoppel--issue preclusion--is a popular paragraph 5 ground. The doctrine is based on the notion that its not fair to permit a party to relitigate an issue decided against the party, and its purpose is to reduce litigation and conserve scarce court resources. Kaufman v. Eli Lilly and Co., 65 N.Y.2d 449, 455, 492 N.Y.S.2d 584, 588, 482 N.E.2d 63, 67 (1985). On a CPLR 3211(a)(5) motion grounded on collateral estoppel, the movant must establish that the identical issue was necessarily decided in the prior action and that the previously decided issue is determinative in the present action. Mahler v. Campagna, 60 A.D.3d 1009, 876 N.Y.S.2d 143 (2d Dep't 2009). If the movant satisfies that burden, the plaintiff must demonstrate the absence of a full and fair opportunity to contest the prior determination. Id. Any doubts regarding the preclusive effect of a prior ruling or determination should be resolved in favor of the party against whom the estoppel would operate, Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. United States Fidelity and Guaranty Co., 11 A.D.3d 300, 784 N.Y.S.2d 25 (1st Dep't 2004).

The "infancy or other disability" ground relates to the defendant's disability. It is a lack-of-capacity type defense; the defendant does not have the capacity, i.e., the power, to be a party to the lawsuit. Where the claim is that the plaintiff lacks the capacity to bring suit because of infancy or some other disability, the proper dismissal ground is paragraph 3. See Commentary 3211:12.

With respect to the release ground, a release is a species of contract and therefore governed by the principles of law applicable to contracts. Aetna Casualty and Surety Co. v. Jackowe, 96 A.D.2d 37, 468 N.Y.S.2d 153 (2d Dep't 1983). Critical questions regarding the formation, construction and enforceability of a release can be answered only by reference to those principles. For a thorough overview of contract law, generally, and the law related to releases, specifically, see 2B N.Y. P.J.I.2d 4:1 (2017).

Res judicata--claim preclusion--dictates that "once a claim is brought to a final conclusion, all other claims arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions are barred, even if based upon different theories or if seeking a different remedy." O'Brien v. City of Syracuse, 54 N.Y.2d 353, 357, 445 N.Y.S.2d 687, 688, 429 N.E.2d 1158, 1159 (1981). The doctrine of res judicata is designed to ensure finality, reduce litigation and promote judicial economy. Xiao Yang Chen v. Fischer, 6 N.Y.3d 94, 810 N.Y.S.2d 96, 843 N.E.2d 723 (2005). A party seeking dismissal on the res judicata ground must demonstrate the existence of a prior judgment on the merits. Miller Manufacturing Co. v. Zeiler, 45 N.Y.2d 956, 411 N.Y.S.2d 558, 383 N.E.2d 1152 (1978).

Where the defendant moves to dismiss on the ground that the action is time-barred, the defendant must make a prima facie showing that the period within which to commence a timely lawsuit has expired. If the defendant makes that showing, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to raise a question of fact as to whether the action was actually commenced within the applicable statute of limitations, the statute of limitations has been tolled, or an exception to the limitations period is applicable. Quinn v. McCabe, Collins, McGeough & Fowler, LLP, 138 A.D.3d 1085, 30 N.Y.S.3d 288 (2d Dep't 2016); see Hoosac Valley Farmers Exchange v. AG Assets, Inc., 168 A.D.2d 822, 563 N.Y.S.2d 954 (3d Dep't 1990).

The last ground listed in paragraph 5 is the statute of frauds. The statute requires that certain agreements be reduced to a writing that reflects the particulars of the transaction, e.g., identifies the parties, states the essential terms of the agreement, and is signed by the party to be charged. Durso v. Baisch, 34 A.D.3d 646, 830 N.Y.S.2d 327 (2d Dep't 2007). The Pattern Jury Instructions, civil, contains a lengthy review of the statute of frauds. 2B N.Y. P.J.I.2d 4:1(VI)(D) (2017).

C3211:19. Comparison of Affirmative Defenses of CPLR 3018(b) with Dismissal Grounds of CPLR 3211(a)(5).

CPLR 3018(b) defines "affirmative defense" and lists the main defenses. All of the listed defenses are contained in paragraph 5 except for three: the culpable conduct of the plaintiff under CPLR article 14-A, facts showing illegality, and fraud. The affirmative defenses listed in paragraph 5 can be raised by pre-answer motion or in the answer; the three omitted defenses lack the pre-answer motion option. Or do they?

CPLR 3211(a)(7), which allows for dismissal based on the plaintiff's failure to state a cause of action, can be employed to direct the defense of illegality at the complaint, at least where the illegality appears on the face of the complaint. National Recovery Systems v. Mazzei, 123 Misc.2d 780, 475 N.Y.S.2d 208 (Sup. Ct., Suffolk County 1984); see McCall v. Frampton, 99 Misc.2d 159, 415 N.Y.S.2d 752 (Sup. Ct., Westchester County 1979). Given the manner in which CPLR 3211(a)(7) has been interpreted by many courts, a defendant wishing to challenge a cause of action on the ground of illegality may be able to submit evidence in support of its paragraph 7 motion and obtain dismissal even where the face of the complaint is unblemished by illegality. See Commentaries C3211:23. CPLR 3211(a)(7) is available too as a means for a defendant to seek dismissal of a cause of action on the affirmative defense of fraud, provided the fraud can be summarily established on the pre-answer motion. See Commentary C3018:20; see also Siegel, New York Practice § 263 (Connors 5th ed.). Given the elements of fraud and the heightened burden of the proof on a claim of it, see 2A N.Y. P.J.I.2d 3:20 (2017), resolution of an affirmative defense of fraud at the pre-answer stage of an action should be a rare event.

That leaves the defense of the plaintiff's culpable conduct. Can that defense be packaged as a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion? Probably not.

That affirmative defense is based on the "culpable conduct [of the plaintiff] claimed in diminution of damages as set forth in [CPLR article 14-A]." CPLR 3018(b). CPLR article 14-A is our comparative fault law; it abrogated the common law doctrine of contributory fault that barred a plaintiff from recovering damages if she was responsible to any degree for her injuries. Commentary C1411:1. Under CPLR 1411, the statute providing the comparative fault principle, "the culpable conduct attributable to the [plaintiff], including contributory negligence or assumption of risk, shall not bar recovery, but the amount of damages otherwise recoverable shall be diminished in the proportion which the culpable conduct attributable to the [plaintiff] bears to the culpable conduct which caused the damages." When triggered, the statute calls for an apportionment of fault between the plaintiff and the defendant. See 1A N.Y. P.J.I.3d 2:36; 1B N.Y. P.J.I.3d 2:275. Dismissal based on a plaintiff's comparative fault is therefore not authorized under CPLR 3211(a)(7) or any other procedural device (e.g., summary judgment).

CPLR article 14-A notwithstanding, there are situations in which a plaintiff's conduct may bar her recovery. The lists is short: where a tort plaintiff's conduct is the sole proximate cause of her injuries; where a plaintiff's injuries are the direct result of the commission of serious criminal or illegal conduct; where a tort plaintiff is precluded from recovering by virtue of the doctrine of primary assumption of risk; and where a plaintiff expressly assumed the risk of the injuries for which she is suing. Commentaries C1411:3. The first three situations are not good candidates for CPLR 3211(a) treatment. Application of the legal principles barring recovery in those situations is dependent upon the facts of the particular case and the fact-sensitive question of foreseeability. The last situation, however, may provide occasion for a CPLR 3211(a) dismissal. Where the defendant wants to seek dismissal based on the plaintiff's express assumption of risk, the defendant could invoke paragraph 1 (if the assumption of risk was acknowledged in a document), 5 (on the basis of the affirmative defense of release), and 7 (failure to state a cause of action). Notice we did not choose one ground, but all that reasonably may apply.

Paragraph 6

C3211:20. Non-Interposable Counterclaim.

CPLR 3019(a) provides that "[a] counterclaim may be any cause of action in favor of one or more defendants or a person whom a defendant represents against one or more plaintiffs, a person whom a plaintiff represents or a plaintiff and other persons alleged to be liable." The law therefore allows a defendant to assert any cause of action it has against the plaintiff; the counterclaim need not bear any relation to the plaintiff's cause of action.

As an affirmative claim, a counterclaim can be challenged by a plaintiff on any relevant ground listed in subdivision (a). See Commentary C3211:4. Paragraph 6 provides one more dismissal tool to a plaintiff who is subject to a counterclaim. Under paragraph 6, the plaintiff may seek dismissal of the counterclaim on the basis that it may not be interposed in the action. A motion under this paragraph must be raised in a pre-answer motion or taken by answer, otherwise it is waived.

What is the meaning of this counterclaim-may-not-properly-be-interposed ground? Didn't we say above that a defendant may assert as a counterclaim any cause of action it has against a plaintiff? The defendant can do so, provided the counterclaim is against the plaintiff in the capacity in which she sued the defendant. That is to say, "[w]hen a plaintiff sues in a particular capacity, that is generally the only capacity in which the plaintiff can be counterclaimed by the defendant." Commentary C3019:3, at 393 (main volume). This is the pre-CPLR "capacity" rule and, CPLR 3019(a)'s broad language notwithstanding, it lives today and is given force by CPLR 3211(a)(6). See Commentary C3019:3; Siegel, New York Practice § 264 (Connors 5th ed.); see also Ehrlich v. American Moninger Greenhouse Manufacturing Corp., 26 N.Y.2d 255, 309 N.Y.S.2d 341, 257 N.E.2d 890 (1970).

Under the "capacity" rule, a paragraph 6 dismissal would seem to be appropriate in the following scenarios:

- The plaintiff is the executor of a decedent's estate and brought suit in that capacity, and the defendant asserted a counterclaim against the plaintiff in her personal capacity.

• The plaintiff is a trustee and brought suit in that capacity, and the defendant asserted a counterclaim against the plaintiff in her personal capacity.

• The plaintiff, who happens to be the guardian of another's person and property, sued the defendant in plaintiff's personal capacity, and the defendant asserted a counterclaim against the plaintiff as guardian.

CPLR 3211(a)(6) has also been employed where a defendant interposed a counterclaim in violation of a provision of a contract between the parties that barred counterclaims. New York Merchants Protective Co. v. Raia, 5 Misc.3d 1011(A), 798 N.Y.S.2d 711 (table), 2004 WL 2532294 (Dist. Ct., Nassau County 2004).

Dismissal in New York Merchants Protective Co. may have been appropriate too under CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (7). If the plaintiff has any doubt regarding which ground to use to challenge a counterclaim, she should raise paragraph 6 and any other plausible grounds.

Note that "there is no authority under the CPLR to dismiss an otherwise valid counterclaim merely because it is not convenient to have it present in the case. Such authority did exist under prior law, but the worst that can befall such a counterclaim under the CPLR is a severance, sending it off as a separate action." Siegel, New York Practice § 264 (internal footnote omitted).

Paragraph 7

C3211:21. Failure to State a Cause of Action, Generally.

Paragraph 7 is one of the most commonly used dismissal grounds under CPLR 3211(a) and one of the most important procedural statutes in litigation. CPLR 3211(a)(7) provides that a defendant may seek judgment dismissing the complaint on the ground that it fails to state a cause of action. The defendant is free to attack the entire complaint or target one or more of the specific causes of action. The motion for failure to state a cause of action is no stranger in New York practice; it is an incarnation of the common law demurrer with a modern name and, as discussed below, a bit more potency. See Commentary C3211:23.

There are certain fundamental rules of decision associated with the CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion. These rules (applicable to most CPLR 3211 motions) should be reviewed--if not already committed to memory--before a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action is made or opposed. Here they are: the pleadings must be given a liberal construction, the allegations accepted as true, and the plaintiff accorded every possible favorable inference. Chanko v. Am. Broad. Companies Inc., 27 N.Y.3d 46, 52, 29 N.Y.S.3d 879, 883, 49 N.E.3d 1171, 1175 (2016).

The party opposing a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion may want to request an opportunity to gather evidence before the court determines the motion, see Commentary C3211:46, a chance to replead, see Commentary C3211:60, or both.

For the edification of federal practitioners, CPLR 3211(a)(7) is analogous to the dismissal ground contained in Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The federal terminology is "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." The most apparent difference is the federal use of the word "claim" vis-a-vis the New York phrase "cause of action." Although it is sometimes asserted that there is a difference between the two phrases, see, e.g., Garcia v. Hilton Hotels Intern., 97 F.Supp. 5 (D.C. Puerto Rico 1951), it is difficult at best to devise an explanation of what the difference is. For practical purposes, federal practitioners will run into few pitfalls if they apply their understanding of the federal "claim" to the New York phraseology of "cause of action". And vice versa. (Note, however, that in the wake of Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009) and Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), a federal pleading is subject to greater scrutiny on a rule 12(b)(6) motion than a New York State court pleading encounters on a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion. See Robert L. Haig, Commercial Litigation in New York State Courts, § 12.28 [4th ed.]).

CPLR 3211(a)(7) poses a number of questions. These will be treated seriatim.

Allegations Sufficient for Pleading in Supreme Court May Not Suffice for Court of Claims Pleading

In a major decision on pleadings in the Court of Claims, Lepkowski v. State, 1 N.Y.3d 201, 770 N.Y.S.2d 696, 802 N.E.2d 1094 (2003), the Court of Appeals gave a strict construction to the pleading requirements of § 11(b) of the Court of Claims Act.

It does not take much to satisfy as a pleading in the Supreme Court. In a deliberate endeavor to escape the rigidities of common law pleadings, the CPLR long ago relaxed things. See CPLR 3013 and 3014.

Sections 8, 10, and 11 of the Court of Claims Act are a different world, made much more demanding because of the State's sovereign immunity and the need for the State to waive that immunity before suit may be brought against it. The State has long since waived the immunity, in § 8 of the act, but, stressed the Court of Appeals in Lepkowski, with the proviso that "the claimant complies with the limitations" imposed by, among other things, §§ 10 and 11 of the act. See the general discussion of the requirements for pleadings in the Commentaries following CPLR 3013 and 3014, and the more specific discussion of Court of Claims pleadings in Commentary C3013:15A; see also Kolnacki v. State, 8 N.Y.3d 277, 832 N.Y.S.2d 481, 864 N.E.2d 611 (2007).

C3211:22. Does Paragraph 7 Replace Common Law Demurrer?

Under the common law demurrer, the defendant conceded the truth of every factual allegation made by the plaintiff but contended that, even so, the complaint stated no cause of action cognizable under the law. The defendant could not submit evidence to contest the plaintiff's factual allegations. (A remedy in some instances was to answer and then move for summary judgment under the predecessor of CPLR 3212, an alternative still available under the CPLR.) Thus, the function of the demurrer was narrow: test the facial sufficiency of a pleading.

Like the common law demurrer, a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion can be used to test the facial sufficiency of a pleading. Thus, the paragraph 7 motion is useful in disposing of actions in which the plaintiff has not stated a claim cognizable at law, and actions in which the plaintiff has identified a cognizable cause of action but failed to assert a material allegation necessary to support the cause of action. See Basis Yield Alpha Fund (Master) v. Goldman Sachs Group, Inc., 115 A.D.3d 128, 980 N.Y.S.2d 21 (1st Dep't 2014).

A plaintiff confronted with a motion addressed to the adequacy of her pleading has the option to submit an affidavit or other evidence in opposition to the motion to augment the allegations in the pleading or otherwise rehabilitate it. Rovello v. Orofino Realty Co., 40 N.Y.2d 633, 389 N.Y.S.2d 314, 357 N.E.2d 970 (1976). The plaintiff should avail herself of that opportunity, especially if she perceives any weaknesses within the four corners of her pleading.

Where a defendant has challenged the facial sufficiency of a complaint, the court's inquiry is limited to determining whether, applying the familiar rules of decision applicable to CPLR 3211(a) motions (see Commentary C3211:21), the allegations and any evidence submitted by the plaintiff have stated a claim cognizable at law. "In the context of CPLR 3211(a)(7), the word 'stated' means pleaded: Do the allegations, liberally construed and viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, plead a cognizable claim?" Higgitt, CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (a)(7) Dismissal Motions--Pitfalls and Pointers, 83 New York State Bar Journal 32, 33 (Nov./Dec. 2011) (internal footnote omitted). Whenever the plaintiff's allegations and evidence, taken as true, do state a cause of action, it is plain that a paragraph 7 motion unsupported by affidavits or other extrinsic proof will fail.

When the CPLR 3211(a)(7) movant omits affidavits and other proof and limits her challenge to the facial allegations of the pleading, she must be aware of the great liberalization that pleadings have undergone under the CPLR. Technicality has been largely removed. If from the four corners of the pleading, regardless of its form and draftsmanship, factual allegations can be discerned which, taken together, manifest any claim cognizable under the law, the pleading does state a cause of action and the motion will fail. These conclusions derive from a study of the Advisory Committee's intentions, which were implemented by the courts. See Foley v. D'Agostino, 21 A.D.2d 60, 248 N.Y.S.2d 121 (1st Dep't 1964). The practitioner would do well to note this before attempting to defeat a cause of action under paragraph 7 on the basis that it is deficient on its face. Even if the theory it purports to be based on is wrong, the existence of any other theory that would qualify the allegations as a "cause of action" will suffice to defeat the motion.

C3211:23. Attacking a Claim Valid on Its Face.

As discussed above, one function of CPLR 3211(a)(7) is to permit a defendant to seek dismissal of a complaint on the ground that it does not state--that is, plead--a cause of action. But is that its only function? Can a defendant use evidence on a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion to attack a well-pleaded cause of action and obtain dismissal based on that evidence?

After many decades on the civil procedure scene, one would think that the role of this critical litigation device would be well-defined. But it is not. Here is the relevant history, as traced in a prior treatment of the subject. See Higgitt, High Court Signals a Potential Change in Practice With CPLR 3211(a)(7), Aug. 5, 2013 N.Y.L.J. at 4.

CPLR 3211(a)(7) was part of the original CPLR, which became effective on September 1, 1963. Paragraph 7's language has remained the same over the years: "A party may move for judgment dismissing one or more causes of action asserted against him [or her] on the ground that: … the pleading fails to state a cause of action".

The Court of Appeals' first major decision on CPLR 3211(a)(7) came in Rovello v. Orofino Realty Co., 40 N.Y.2d 633, 389 N.Y.S.2d 314, 357 N.E.2d 970 (1976). While stressing that the principal function of an (a)(7) motion is to ascertain whether a complaint states, i.e., pleads, a cognizable cause of action, the Court observed that "affidavits submitted by the defendant [on a (a)(7) motion] will seldom if ever warrant [dismissal] unless ... the affidavits establish conclusively that plaintiff has no cause of action" (id. at 636 [emphasis added]). Although the Rovello Court noted that "defendants' affidavits present[ed] a seemingly strong defense," it concluded that the subject complaint did state a cause of action and directed that the motion to dismiss be denied. Rovello, though, opened the door--albeit only in narrow circumstances--for dismissals under CPLR 3211(a)(7) based on evidence.

The Court's next pronouncement on the subject came approximately one year later in Guggenheimer v. Ginzberg (43 N.Y.2d 268, 401 N.Y.S.2d 182, 372 N.E.2d 17 [1977]). The Guggenheimer Court stated that:

[w]hen evidentiary material is considered, the criterion is whether the proponent of the pleading has a cause of action, not whether he [or she] has stated one, and, unless it has been shown that a material fact as claimed by the pleader to be one is not a fact at all and unless it can be said that no significant dispute exists regarding it ... dismissal should not eventuate (id. at 275, 401 N.Y.S.2d at 185, 372 N.E.2d at 20-21).

The Court found that the essential facts in the complaint before it were not "negated beyond substantial question by the affidavits submitted ... so that it might be ruled that the pleader does not have the causes of action" (id.). The "establish[es] conclusively" test articulated in Rovello just 14 months prior was not mentioned. Guggenheimer's "no significant dispute/negate beyond substantial question" test appears broader than Rovello's "establish[es] conclusively" test, permitting a defendant to obtain dismissal with convincing--but not conclusive--evidence. See also Godfrey v. Spano, 13 N.Y.3d 358, 892 N.Y.S.2d 272, 920 N.E.2d 328 (2009) and Lawrence v. Graubard Miller, 11 N.Y.3d 588, 873 N.Y.S.2d 517, 901 N.E.2d 1268 (2008), both of which appear to endorse the Rovello standard.

In light of the mixed signals sent by Rovello and Guggenheimer, the Appellate Division has grappled with the appropriate standard to apply on a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion that is supported by evidence. Some courts have said the only question on a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action is whether the complaint pleads a cause of action. See, e.g., Henbest & Morrisey Inc. v. W.H. Ins. Agency Inc., 259 A.D.2d 829, 686 N.Y.S.2d 207 (3d Dep't 1999). Other courts have said that a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion serves a broader function: to challenge a complaint that states a cause of action with evidence undercutting the plaintiff's allegations. Phrased differently, dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(7) may be appropriate when, on the facts adduced by the defendant, the plaintiff does not have a cause of action. But courts of this view are divided into two camps: one asks whether the defendant's evidence conclusively establishes that the plaintiff does not, in fact, have a cause of action (the Rovello standard), the other asks whether the defendant's evidence negates beyond substantial question an essential fact on which the plaintiff's action rests (the Guggenheimer standard).

In 2013, the Court of Appeals decided Miglino v. Bally Total Fitness of Greater New York, Inc., 20 N.Y.3d 342, 961 N.Y.S.2d 364, 985 N.E.2d 128 (2013), an opinion that had the potential to end this long-running debate. In relevant part, the Court considered whether a health club was entitled to dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(7) of a common law negligence cause of action asserted by the estate of a club patron who died after experiencing cardiac arrest on the club's premises. The gist of that cause of action was that the health club breached its duty of care to persons struck down by cardiac arrest while on the club's premises by failing to employ or properly employ life-saving measures to the decedent. The health club moved to dismiss that cause of action under CPLR 3211(a)(7). In support of that motion, the health club submitted the affidavit of an employee who rendered aid to the decedent. The employee described his training and the actions he and other club personnel took to assist the decedent. The motion was denied by the trial court and the Second Department affirmed.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the Appellate Division's order, writing, in pertinent part, that:

"Bally has moved to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(7), which limits us to an examination of the pleadings to determine whether they state a cause of action. Further, we must accept facts alleged as true and interpret them in the light most favorable to plaintiff; and, as Supreme Court observed, plaintiff may not be penalized for failure to make an evidentiary showing in support of a complaint that states a claim on its face....

"Here, the complaint asserts that Bally did not 'employ or properly employ life-saving measures regarding [the decedent]' after he collapsed. Bally's motion is supported by affidavits that contradict this claim, by purporting to show that the minimal steps adequate to fulfill a health club's limited duty to a patron apparently suffering a coronary incident--i.e., calling 911, administering CPR and/or relying on medical professionals who are voluntarily furnishing emergency care--were, in fact, undertaken. But, as noted before, this matter comes to us on a motion to dismiss, not a motion for summary judgment. As a result, the case is not currently in a posture to be resolved as a matter of law on the basis of the parties' affidavits, and [the plaintiff] has at least pleaded a viable cause of action at common law." 20 N.Y.3d at 351, 961 N.Y.S.2d at 370, 985 N.E.2d at 134 (internal citation omitted).

One view is that Miglino did not change the law under CPLR 3211(a)(7), and a defendant is still free to submit evidence in support of a motion to dismiss in an effort to establish that, on the facts, the plaintiff does not have a cause of action. Another view of Miglino is that the Court of Appeals no longer permits a defendant to obtain dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(7) based on evidence the defendant submits in support of the motion. The reasoning for the second view is as follows: the defendant in Miglino sought dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(7) and relied on evidence; the Court of Appeals acknowledged that the defendant submitted evidence, but stressed that the only inquiry at the CPLR 3211 stage was whether the complaint states a cause of action; the Court affirmed the denial of the motion to dismiss because the plaintiff "at least pleaded a viable cause of action"; therefore, the Court must have concluded that dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(7) based on a defendant's evidence is not permitted. See Higgitt, High Court Signals a Potential Change in Practice With CPLR 3211(a)(7), supra; see also Connors, Courts Reconsider Rule Permitting Use of Affidavits on CPLR 3211(a)(7) Motion, N.Y.L.J., Jan. 20, 2015 at 3 (reviewing CPLR 3211[a][7], Rovello, and Miglino, and concluding that "the courts should not permit consideration of defendant's factual affidavits on a CPLR 3211[a][7] preanswer motion to dismiss unless the court elects to treat the motion as one for summary judgment under CPLR 3211[c].").

A construction of paragraph 7 that limits its role to a pleading motion is consistent with the legislative history of the CPLR (Higgitt, CPLR 3211[a][7]: Demurrer or Merits-Testing Device?, 73 Alb.L.Rev. 99 at 102), and the plain language of that paragraph ("the pleading fails to state a cause of action"). That construction also prevents paragraph 7 from becoming a "super" ground for dismissal that crowds-out the others. (The "documentary evidence" ground in CPLR 3211[a][1] has little to no role to play if the movant can rely on evidence to support her motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. Higgitt, CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (a)(7) Dismissal Motions--Pitfalls and Pointers, 83 New York State Bar Journal 32 at 34, n.30.) We note too that while CPLR 3211(a)(7) authorizes dismissal of a cause of action for failure to state a cause of action, subdivision (b) allows for dismissal of a defense if it is not stated or has no merit. The Legislature seemed to make a deliberate determination to allow for a merits-based dismissal in one situation (subdivision [b]) but not in the other ([a][7]). And, absent conversion of a CPLR 3211(a) motion into one for summary judgment (see subdivision [c]), shouldn't the parties be allowed to assume that the focus of the court's inquiry is on the sufficiency of the pleading and not on the merits? See Four Seasons Hotels v. Vinnik, 127 A.D.2d 310, 515 N.Y.S.2d 1 (1st Dep't 1987).

But we digress, for all four Departments have concluded that Miglino did not change the law, with the Fourth Department expressly considering--and rejecting--the contention "that Miglino fundamentally changed the parameters of CPLR 3211(a)(7) and effectively barred the consideration of any evidentiary submissions outside of the four corners of the complaint." Liberty Affordable Housing, Inc. v. Maple Court Apartments, 125 A.D.3d 85, 88, 998 N.Y.S.2d 543, 545 (2015); see, e.g., Clarke v. Laidlaw Transit, Inc., 125 A.D.3d 920, 5 N.Y.S.3d 138 (2d Dep't 2015); Marston v. General Electric Co., 121 A.D.3d 1457, 995 N.Y.S.2d 646 (3d Dep't 2014); Basis Yield Alpha Fund (Master) v. Goldman Sachs Group, Inc., 115 A.D.3d 128, 980 N.Y.S.2d 21 (1st Dep't 2014). The Liberty Affordable Housing Court reasoned that "Miglino is properly understood as a straightforward application of Rovello's long-standing framework"; the cause of action for common law negligence in Miglino was not in a posture to be resolved by the health club's evidence because that evidence was insufficiently conclusive, not because it was categorically inadmissible. 125 A.D.3d at 91, 998 N.Y.S.2d at 547.

C3211:24. Result in Multi-Claim Case.

When the complaint states several causes of action, the movant must address a CPLR 3211(a) motion to the specific cause of action objected to. This is as true of paragraph 7 as it is of any other ground. If all of the alleged causes of action are defective, and the movant can show as much, the motion can of course succeed against them all. If less than all are defective, however, the movant should single out the defective ones and address the motion to them.

Note that "a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action will be denied in its entirety where the complaint asserts several causes of action, at least one of which is legally sufficient and where the motion is aimed at the pleading as a whole without particularizing the specific causes of action sought to be dismissed." Long Island Diagnostic Imaging, P.C. v. Stony Brook Diagnostic Associates, 215 A.D.2d 450, 452, 626 N.Y.S.2d 828, 829 (2d Dep't 1995); see Great Northern Associates, Inc. v. Continental Casualty Co., 192 A.D.2d 976, 596 N.Y.S.2d 938, 940 (3d Dep't 1993). But when "a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action particularizes each of the claims in the complaint, even though it is nominally addressed to the complaint as a whole, the court should treat that motion as applying to each individual cause of action alleged." Gamiel v. Curtis & Riess-Curtis, P.C., 16 A.D.3d 140, 141, 791 N.Y.S.2d 78, 79 (1st Dep't 2005). This allows the court to sustain the good causes of action and dismiss the bad ones, narrowing the issues in the case and streamlining the litigation.

When only a single cause of action is stated, the opening language of CPLR 3211(a) might suggest that the motion is available only as against the entire claim and not merely to a part of it. The motion is available as to any severable part of a single claim, however, whether it relates only to the relief clause or to some part of the theory or theories sued on.

C3211:25. Demanding Wrong Relief Inconsequential.

As long as the allegations taken from the complaint as a whole manifest that the plaintiff has a cause of action on which some kind of relief may be granted, it is of no moment on a paragraph 7 motion that the wrong relief was asked for. See O'Reilly v. Cahill, 50 Misc.2d 629, 271 N.Y.S.2d 29 (Sup. Ct., New York County 1966), rev'd on other grounds 28 A.D.2d 527, 280 N.Y.S.2d 338 (1st Dep't 1967). The remedy of the plaintiff who has a claim but has asked for relief unresponsive to it is to move under CPLR 3025(b) for leave to amend the relief clause. If the time for amending as of course, i.e., without leave of court, is still open under CPLR 3025(a), the plaintiff may amend without the need of a motion.

C3211:26. Time to Make Paragraph 7 Motion.

Paragraph 7 is one of the three CPLR 3211(a) paragraphs (the other two being paragraphs 2 and 10) that will support a CPLR 3211 dismissal motion made at any time. (See Commentary C3211:49.) For that reason, and because a movant is allowed to submit evidence in support of her motion, there are four different classes of CPLR (a)(7) motions: (1) a pre-answer motion unsupported by evidence, (2) a pre-answer motion supported by evidence, (3) a post-answer motion unsupported by evidence, and (4) a post-answer motion supported by evidence. The courts have applied the same rules of decision to an (a)(7) motion regardless of whether it was made pre-or post-answer. See Hendrickson v. Philbor Motors, Inc., 102 A.D.3d 251, 955 N.Y.S.2d 384 (2d Dep't 2012); see also Chenago Contracting, Inc. v. Hughes Associates, Landscape Architects PLLC, 128 A.D.3d 1150, 8 N.Y.S.3d 724 (3d Dep't 2015).

As a matter of practice, of course, it is advisable for the movant who depends on paragraph 7 to make the motion before answering for the simple reason that if it prevails there will be no need to answer. If the answer has already been served when the motion is made, however, the answer is among the papers that the court can consider on the motion. See Hamilton Printing Co. v. Ernest Payne Corp., 26 A.D.2d 876, 273 N.Y.S.2d 929 (3d Dep't 1966).

When the motion is made after answer and is based not on the face of the pleading but on extrinsic proof, the movant would often do better to move for summary judgment under CPLR 3212. A disposition under that provision will ordinarily carry the full effect of res judicata, while a CPLR 3211(a)(7) disposition may or may not. (See Commentary C3211:63.)

The practitioner who without good reason postpones a paragraph 7 motion may be courting unnecessary trouble. Technically, the movant can make the motion even as late as when the trial opens, but the suspicions of the trial judge are bound to be aroused. Why has a motion that could have put an early end to the litigation been delayed until the trial, with all parties put to the burden of pretrial preparation in the interim? Although the motion still lies at that time and would have to be entertained, the delay may, perhaps only unconsciously, influence the trial judge's disposition of it. The movant should have ready--whether called upon to use them or not--good reasons for the delay, such as that the proof needed for the motion became available only recently.

C3211:27. Paragraph 7 as Catch-All Ground.

In the comparison made between what CPLR 3018(b) labels as affirmative defenses on the one hand and what CPLR 3211(a) affords as grounds for a motion to dismiss on the other, it is pointed out that paragraph 7 can sometimes be used to make available as a motion ground an affirmative defense not explicitly contained in the CPLR 3211(a) list. See Commentary C3211:19. "Illegality" is a prime example. The movant who can show the defect to be something that affects the merits of the cause of action, as illegality would, can make the defect a basis for a motion to dismiss under paragraph 7.

It has also been shown that paragraph 7 may overlap (supersede may, in some instances, be a better word) other paragraphs of CPLR 3211(a), in which case the objection can be based on both the other paragraph and paragraph 7 together. See, e.g., Commentaries C3211:12 and 18. Paragraph 7 would not be superfluous in such an instance, for the reason that a motion under paragraph 7 may be made at any time, CPLR 3211(e), while the grounds in most of the other paragraphs must be exploited by a motion before the answer is served. Additionally, all types of evidence are permitted on a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. These benefits may prove helpful in a given case-at least in the eyes of the movant.

As to the interplay between CPLR 3211(a)(7) and (a)(1) (dismissal based on "documentary evidence"), see Higgitt, CPLR 3211(a)(1) and (a)(7) Dismissal Motions--Pitfalls and Pointers, 83 New York State Bar Journal 32, 34-35 (Nov./Dec. 2011).

Paragraph 8

C3211:28. Lack of Personal Jurisdiction.

Subject matter jurisdiction, covered above (see Commentary C3211:11), asks whether a particular court has the authority to hear and resolve a particular type of action. Personal jurisdiction asks whether the court, under the particular facts of the case, has the power to render a judgment binding on the defendant herself. Personal jurisdiction is one of three forms of jurisdiction over persons, property and status, the other two being in rem and quasi in rem (more on these two forms of jurisdiction below). See Commentary C301:1. Personal (or in personam) jurisdiction over a defendant allows the court to adjudicate the defendant's liability or obligation to the plaintiff, and adjudge that the defendant is personally liable or responsible for the relief awarded in the action. Id.

Personal jurisdiction has three elements: (1) a basis for the exercise of jurisdiction over the defendant (i.e., general jurisdiction over the defendant or specific [a/k/a long arm] jurisdiction over her); (2) notice to the defendant of the action; and (3) proper commencement of the action. See Siegel, New York Practice §§ 58, 63 (Connors 5th ed.). All must be present for a court to obtain personal jurisdiction over a defendant. (Although a defendant may waive an objection to a defect relating to personal jurisdiction.).

CPLR 3211(a)(8) is the device that allows a defendant to seek dismissal of an action on the ground that the court lacks personal jurisdiction over her. She can use paragraph 8 to raise any defect relating to personal jurisdiction. The defendant may claim that no basis exists to call her before a New York court--that is to say, the defendant is not subject to the jurisdiction of the New York courts, generally, and is not subject to their jurisdiction for the purposes of the particular action in which she was named a defendant. See Commentaries C301:2-10; C302:1-15; Siegel, New York Practice §§ 66, 80-89. The defendant may assert that she was not served with the initiatory papers, that they were served defectively, or that they were served in an unauthorized manner. The defendant may complain that the action was not properly commenced.

Because of the waiver provisions of subdivision (e), a defendant must carefully consider when and how to raise defenses related to lack of personal jurisdiction. See Commentary C3211:55.

Paragraph 8 should not be confused with paragraph 9, which addresses those two other forms of jurisdiction over persons, property and status: in rem and quasi in rem. Any uncertainty on the part of the defendant regarding the category of jurisdiction on which the plaintiff is relying should be resolved by invoking both paragraphs and leaving it to the court to determine which category ultimately applies. See Commentary C3211:31.

Under paragraph 8, where the defendant duly raises a lack of personal jurisdiction defense, the plaintiff bears the burden of proof on the issue of whether such jurisdiction exists. Shore Pharmaceutical Providers, Inc. v. Oakwood Care Center, Inc., 65 A.D.3d 623, 885 N.Y.S.2d 88 (2d Dep't 2009).

The plaintiff may need discovery on jurisdiction-related issues, particularly regarding whether a basis exists for the New York court to impose its jurisdiction on the defendant. Questions on this front sometimes arise when a plaintiff claims that a defendant is amenable to suit in New York under our longarm jurisdiction statute (CPLR 302). The plaintiff can request that the court afford her an opportunity to conduct jurisdictional discovery before determining the motion to dismiss. See Commentary C3211:46.

C3211:29. Jurisdictional Basis Depending on Complaint.

Certain unique problems can arise in a case when the summons was served without an accompanying complaint, which is permissible under CPLR 305(b) and 3012, and the defendant moves to dismiss under paragraph 8 before the complaint is served. If service was purportedly made within New York and the defect relates to the mechanics of service, the motion should lie immediately and can be disposed of promptly. (In that instance the motion would be to dismiss "the action," since one cannot move to dismiss a non-existent complaint.) But when the summons is served outside the State and the defendant contends not that the method of service was defective, but rather that the court lacks a basis for extraterritorial jurisdiction, it may be impossible for the court to determine the question until the complaint is served.

If the extraterritorial jurisdictional basis relied on is the fact that the defendant is a New York domiciliary, see CPLR 313, affidavits should be adequate to determine the domiciliary status and the paragraph 8 motion should lie before service of the complaint. But if the basis is longarm jurisdiction under CPLR 302, the issue of whether the basis exists depends on geographical factors connected with the cause of action, and the cause of action cannot be seen until the complaint is served. For this reason, the motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction in such a case should await service of the complaint. Fraley v. Desilu Productions, Inc., 23 A.D.2d 79, 258 N.Y.S.2d 294 (1st Dep't 1965) (denying motion to dismiss made before service of complaint, without prejudice to renewal after service).

The moral is that a defendant served outside New York with a summons but not the complaint ought to limit her next step to demanding a copy of the complaint. Nothing is lost by so doing: a defendant who demands a complaint after being served with the summons has 20 days after the complaint is finally served in which to answer or move against it. See CPLR 3012(b).

Paragraph 9

C3211:30. Lack of Rem Jurisdiction.

In rem and quasi in rem jurisdiction are predicated on the presence of property (or some other res) in the State. The plaintiff in an action founded on in rem jurisdiction is asserting an interest in a particular thing. Majique Fashions, Ltd. v. Warwick & Co., Ltd., 67 A.D.2d 321, 326, 414 N.Y.S.2d 916, 919 (1st Dep't 1979) ("In rem jurisdiction ... involves an action in which a plaintiff is after a particular thing, rather than seeking a general money judgment, that is, [s]he wants possession of the particular item of property, or to establish h[er] ownership or other interest in it, or to exclude the defendant from an interest in it."). The plaintiff in a quasi in rem action wants a money judgment but cannot get personal jurisdiction over the defendant. So, the plaintiff looks to the defendant's in-State property. By employing the provisional remedy of attachment, the plaintiff can pursue her cause of action against the defendant and, if the plaintiff prevails in the action, the attached property will be applied toward the judgment. Commentary C314:4. The utility of quasi in rem jurisdiction is not what it once was, but that form of rem jurisdiction is still available under the right set of circumstances. See Banco Ambrosiano, S.P.A. v. Artoc Bank & Trust Limited, 62 N.Y.2d 65, 476 N.Y.S.2d 64, 464 N.E.2d 432 (1984).

Paragraph 9 affords a ground for dismissal when service has been made under CPLR 314 or 315, the provisions governing in rem and quasi in rem actions. Whenever it is clear that the plaintiff is not claiming personal jurisdiction, but is bringing the action solely on a rem foundation, and the defendant can show that even rem jurisdiction does not exist--whether for lack of service or the fact that the res is not in New York or for any other reason that divests rem jurisdiction--the defendant's weapon is the motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(9).

Reliance on paragraph 9 exclusively is usually possible only when the plaintiff is not even making an argument that there is personal jurisdiction--when personal jurisdiction, in other words, is not in the picture at all--and when the defendant believes she can also show that not even the claimed rem jurisdiction exists. In any other situation it may be inappropriate for the defendant to rely solely on paragraph 9. If the defendant has any doubt whatever about the category of jurisdiction plaintiff claims to exist and defendant can show the absence of either category of jurisdiction, or of both, she had best caption the motion under both paragraphs 8 and 9 and let the court decide whether any jurisdiction exists and, if so, which kind it is. See Commentary C3211:31.

C3211:31. Confusion as to Kind of Jurisdiction Asserted.

When the defendant knows precisely what category of jurisdiction the plaintiff claims, and the defendant contends that the claimed basis does not exist, the defendant can caption the motion under either paragraph 8 or paragraph 9, whichever is applicable. The defendant can do this, in any event, when it is clear that the basis the plaintiff claims is the only possible one and that the existence of the unclaimed one is not even remotely possible. In any other instance, the defendant may face a dilemma. If the defendant has any doubt whatever about the kind of jurisdiction the plaintiff is asserting, the defendant should caption the motion to dismiss under both paragraphs 8 and 9 and ask the court to determine clearly which, if any, jurisdictional ground exists.

If the defendant claims neither basis exists, she would clearly invoke both grounds and move to dismiss the case entirely. See Kalman v. Neuman, 80 A.D.2d 116, 438 N.Y.S.2d 109 (2d Dep't 1981). If the defendant admits that one exists but contends that the other does not, she would move to dismiss on the ground describing the latter.

If the jurisdiction is only in rem, the defendant may be able to withdraw from the litigation without personam consequences. If it is only quasi in rem, the defendant may be able to stay on and defend without personam consequences. (For the distinctions between these categories of rem jurisdiction, see Siegel, New York Practice § 101 [Connors 5th ed.]) All these conclusions derive from CPLR 320(c). See Commentary C3211:39. What they manifest for our present purpose is that the defendant must be certain that the order disposing of the jurisdictional motion states specifically what kind of jurisdiction exists, if any does. See Siegel, New York Practice § 267. The defendant will have to depend on that determination to govern her future participation in the case.

Paragraph 10

C3211:32. Absence of a Person Who Should be A Party.

Paragraph 10 allows for dismissal of an action when the court determines that it "should not proceed in the absence of a person who should be a party." The statute does not talk about the absence of an "indispensable party"; that was the phrase used prior to the CPLR. The old "indispensable party" doctrine could be harsh. Under it, if an unjoined and unjoinable person was "indispensable," the action would be dismissed. See generally Carruthers v. Jack Waite Mining Co., 306 N.Y. 136, 116 N.E.2d 286 (1953); Siegel, New York Practices § 131 (Connors 5th ed.). Paragraph 10 distances itself from the old law, abandoning both the words "indispensable party" and the principle that the absence of a person important in the scheme of the action must result in dismissal. See Red Hook/Gowanus Chamber of Commerce v. New York City Board of Standards and Appeals, 5 N.Y.3d 452, 805 N.Y.S.2d 525, 839 N.E.2d 878 (2005). Indeed, under the CPLR, dismissal for failure to join a necessary party is the last resort. Siegel, New York Practice § 133.

CPLR 3211(a)(10) can only be understood and applied if read in conjunction with CPLR article 10. Of particular significance is CPLR 1001. Subdivision (a) of that statute instructs that "[p]ersons who ought to be parties if complete relief is to be accorded between the persons who are parties to the action or who might be inequitably affected by a judgment in the action shall be made plaintiffs or defendants." (To avoid the now taboo concept of the "indispensable party," we'll call the important non-party the "necessary party"). Subdivision (b) tells us what is to happen if a necessary party has not been included in the caption. The easy part: if the necessary party is subject to the court's jurisdiction, the court must direct that the necessary party be joined as a party. Dime Savings Bank of N.Y. v. Johneas, 172 A.D.2d 1082, 569 N.Y.S2d 260 (4th Dep't 1991). If the necessary party cannot be joined and will not voluntarily appear in the action, the court must engage in a balancing of numerous factors to ascertain whether justice requires that the action proceed without her.

These are the CPLR 1001(b) factors:

"1. Whether the plaintiff has another effective remedy in case the action is dismissed on account of the nonjoinder;

"2. The prejudice which may accrue from the nonjoinder to the defendant or to the person not joined;

"3. Whether and by whom prejudice might have been avoided or may in the future be avoided;

"4. The feasibility of a protective provision by order of the court or in the judgment; and

"5. Whether an effective judgment may be rendered in the absence of the person who is not joined."

No one factor is determinative and each of them must be considered by the court. Swezey v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 19 N.Y.3d 543, 950 N.Y.S.2d 293, 973 N.E.2d 703 (2012); Red Hook/Gowaus Chamber of Commerce v. New York City Board of Standards and Appeals, supra. Also, the court can consider that dismissal is the last resort, and that the purposes of the dismissal remedy are to prevent multiple, inconsistent judgments relating to the same controversy, and to protect the non-party from embarrassment from a judgment purporting to bind her rights or interests. See Saratoga County Chamber of Commerce v. Pataki, 100 N.Y.2d 801, 766 N.Y.S.2d 654, 798 N.E.2d 1047 (2003).

The framework of the analysis of a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(10) is as follows:

Initially, inquiry must be made into whether the non-party is a necessary one under CPLR 1001(a). If she isn't, the motion can be denied; if she is, the court must consider whether the non-party is subject to the court's jurisdiction. If she is, the court can order her joinder; if not, the court must consider and weigh the five factors listed in CPLR 1001(b) to ascertain whether justice requires that the action proceed without the non-party.

The path to dismissal is difficult, just the way the drafters of the CPLR intended it. See Siegel, New York Practice § 133.

A fine example of the consideration and balancing of the factors can be viewed in L-3 Communications Corp. v. Safenet, Inc., 45 A.D.3d 1, 841 N.Y.S.2d 82 (1st Dep't 2007).

What if it is not clear to the court whether the necessary party is subject to the court's jurisdiction? The court can deny the paragraph 10 motion without prejudice and grant the plaintiff leave to join the necessary party within a certain period of time. Williams v. Somers, 91 A.D.2d 545, 457 N.Y.S.2d 19 (1st Dep't 1982). If the plaintiff is unable to do so, she should move to be excused from joining the necessary party under CPLR 1001(b), and that motion should be supported by an affidavit demonstrating why the necessary party isn't subject to the court's jurisdiction. Id. The without-prejudice dismissal of the CPLR 3211(a)(10) motion would permit the defendant to make another motion to dismiss under that ground if the plaintiff fails to comply with the prior order.

As to the timing of a paragraph 10 motion, it is a member of that exclusive club of subdivision (a) grounds (along with paragraphs 2 and 7) that can be made at any time. CPLR 3211(e); City of New York v. Long Island Airports Limousine Service Corp., 48 N.Y.2d 469, 475, 423 N.Y.S.2d 651, 654, 399 N.E.2d 538, 541 (1979) ("[a] court may always consider whether there has been a failure to join a necessary party"). Does that mean that a defendant's delay in making a CPLR 3211(a)(10) motion must go without consequence? Maybe the delay, if sufficiently lengthy, will be considered by the court in the course of its review and balancing of the CPLR 1001(b) factors, particularly with respect to factor number three. Commentary C1001:2. But delay, no matter its length, will not result in a waiver of the defendant's right to make the paragraph 10 motion. D.M.I. Painting, Inc. v. Eastern Long Island Hospital, 74 A.D.2d 838, 839, 425 N.Y.S.2d 633, 635 (2d Dep't 1980) ("failure of the [defendant] to move until the eve of trial is deplorable but does not constitute a waiver").

CPLR 3211(a)(10) does not expressly allow for conditions to be imposed in connection with a dismissal for failure to join a necessary party. But CPLR 1001(b)'s factor four makes plain that reasonable conditions are authorized. See Siegel, New York Practice § 268. For some examples of appropriate conditions, see id. at § 133.

Paragraph 11

C3211:33. Dismissal in Favor of Uncompensated Official of Not-for-Profit Organization.

CPLR 3211(a)(11) provides a narrow class of individuals with a very special, very specific dismissal device. That ground applies to directors, officers and trustees who serve without compensation in not-for-profit entities. Under Not-For-Profit Corporation Law (N-PCL) § 720-a, an uncompensated director, officer or trustee enjoys qualified immunity from most lawsuits; the immunity is stripped only if the conduct of the individual constituted gross negligence or was intended to cause harm. Paragraph 11's aim is to reduce protracted litigation against certain persons engaged in non-paid charitable activities. Rabushka v. Marks, 229 A.D.2d 899, 646 N.Y.S.2d 392 (3d Dep't 1996). How does it do that? By providing an expedited procedure, a mini-summary judgment of sorts, for the testing of the defendant's claim of immunity under N-PCL § 720-a. Krackeler Scientific, Inc. v. Ordway Research Institute, Inc., 97 A.D.3d 1083, 949 N.Y.S.2d 286 (3d Dep't 2012). Here's how CPLR 3211(a)(11) works.

First, the court must ascertain whether the defendant moving for relief under paragraph 11 is entitled to the qualified immunity provided by N-PCL § 720-a. Kamchi v. Weissman, 125 A.D.3d 142, 1 N.Y.S.3d 169 (2d Dep't 2014). That statute is explicit: the uncompensated director, officer or trustee must serve an entity described in § 501(c)(3) of the United States Internal Revenue Code (26 U.S.C. 501[c][3]). See Bernbach v. Bonnie Briar Country Club, 144 A.D.2d 610, 534 N.Y.S.2d 695 (2d Dep't 1988). CPLR 3211(a)(11) facilitates the defendant's proof by accepting as presumptive evidence of the entity's 26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3) status certain Internal Revenue Service letters and publications. The affidavit of the chief financial officer of the entity attesting to the defendant's status as an uncompensated director, officer or trustee of the entity is presumptive evidence of such status. CPLR 3211(a)(11). Those presumptions can be rebutted by the plaintiff.

If the defendant's evidence on the motion establishes, prima facie, both that the entity with which the defendant is affiliated is a not-for-profit organization under 26 U.S.C. 501(c)(3), and that the defendant is an uncompensated director, officer or trustee thereof, the court must next consider whether there is a "reasonable probability" that the defendant's alleged conduct constituted gross negligence or intentional harm. If there is no such "reasonable probability" the action must be dismissed.

The burden of proof on the "reasonable probability" element would appear to rest on the plaintiff. Rabushka v. Marks, supra; see Brown v. Albany Citizens Council on Alcoholism, Inc., 199 A.D.2d 904, 605 N.Y.S.2d 577 (3d Dep't 1993). Thus, once the defendant makes a prima facie showing of entitlement to the qualified immunity of N-PCL § 720-a, the ball moves to the plaintiff's court to "come forward with evidentiary proof showing a fair likelihood that ... she will be able to prove that the defendant was grossly negligent or intended to cause the resulting harm." Rabushka, 229 A.D.2d at 900, 646 N.Y.S.2d at 395. A plaintiff in that position cannot rely on the favorable rules of decision applicable to most other CPLR 3211(a) grounds, and the plaintiff is compelled to lay bare her proof that the defendant's conduct was grossly negligent or intended to cause harm. Kamchi v. Weissman, 125 A.D.3d at 161, 1 N.Y.S.3d at 184; Krackeler Scientific, Inc. v. Ordway Research Institute, Inc., 97 A.D.3d at 1084, 949 N.Y.S.2d at 287.

A plaintiff must submit evidence in admissible form showing a fair likelihood that she will be able to prove that defendant was grossly negligent or intended to cause harm. A detailed affidavit by one with personal knowledge of the relevant facts may do the trick. Rabushka v. Marks, supra; Brown v. Albany Citizens Council on Alcoholism, Inc., supra. A detailed pleading verified by one with familiarly with the facts may also suffice. Cf. Krackeler Scientific, Inc v. Ordway Research Institute, Inc., supra. The key is detailed factual averments by a knowledgeable witness or equivalent evidence. See Kamchi v. Weissman, 125 A.D.3d at 161-162, 1 N.Y.S.3d at 184 ("given the nature of the specific allegations as well as certain undisputed circumstances ... we conclude that there is a reasonable probability that the plaintiffs can establish that the defendants' actions constituted gross negligence or were intended to cause the resulting harm.").

In light of the unique purpose of CPLR 3211(a)(11) and the treatment it has received from the courts, it would appear that CPLR 3211(d), which allows a party opposing a CPLR 3211(a) or (b) motion to seek to forestall a decision on the motion for the purpose of gathering evidence, has limited, if any application on a paragraph 11 motion.

CPLR 3211(a)(11) sets up a summary judgment-like procedure relating to the immunity issue. Therefore, the court need not convert the paragraph 11 motion into one for summary judgment (see CPLR 3211[c]), provided the court confines its summary judgment-type review to the question of the defendant's immunity.

Interestingly, neither CPLR 3211(a)(11) nor CPLR 3211(e) indicate whether a motion under paragraph 11 must be made before service of an answer. Does that mean that it can be made at any time (like a motion under paragraph 2, 7 or 10)? The Third Department has considered the question and concluded that a CPLR 3211(a)(11) motion must be made before service of the answer. Woodford v. Benedict Community Health Center, 176 A.D.2d 1115, 575 N.Y.S.2d 415 (3d Dep't 1991). The court observed, however, that a defendant who fails to make a pre-answer motion to dismiss under paragraph 11 can move for summary judgment on that ground, provided it was raised in the answer. Id.

The unique dismissal ground provided by paragraph 11 is available to individuals entitled to qualified immunity under N-PCL § 720-a, as well as individuals entitled to qualified immunity under Arts and Cultural Affairs Law § 20.09.

Subdivision (b)

C3211:34. Motion to Dismiss Defense, Generally.

Subdivision (a) addresses a motion to dismiss an affirmative claim--a cause of action, a counterclaim, a cross claim, etc. Subdivision (b) provides a device to the pleader of an affirmative claim to seek dismissal of a defense interposed against the claim.

The mission of subdivision (b) is captured in one simple sentence: "A party may move for judgment dismissing one or more defenses, on the ground that a defense is not stated or has no merit." Any matter in a pleading that manifests a "defense" can be the target of a subdivision (b) motion. While a defendant seeking to dismiss a cause of action must find a specific subdivision (a) ground on which to rest the motion, see Commentary C3211:5, a plaintiff using subdivision (b) can raise any cognizable ground against a defense. Thus, the plaintiff can rely on any basis in law or fact that warrants dismissal of a defense. Another important feature of a subdivision (b) motion: it can be made at any time. See Commentary C3211:48.

CPLR 3211(e) allows the defense of failure to state a cause of action to be made the subject of a pre-answer motion, asserted in an answer or raised at some later time. If a defendant avails itself of option number two and interposes the CPLR 3211(a)(7) defense in its answer, can the plaintiff move to dismiss that defense under subdivision (b)? No, because such a motion would amount to an attempt by the plaintiff to test the sufficiency of her own claim. Butler v. Catinella, 58 A.D.3d 145, 150, 868 N.Y.S.2d 101, 105 (2d Dep't 2008). The CPLR 3211(a)(7) defense is therefore impervious to a CPLR 3211(b) challenge. Id.; see Riland v. Frederick S. Todman & Co., 56 A.D.2d 350, 393 N.Y.S.2d 4 (1st Dep't 1977).

C3211:35. Standards on a CPLR 3211(b) Motion.

A plaintiff seeking dismissal of a defense has the burden of demonstrating that the defense is without merit as a matter of law. When faced with a CPLR 3211(b) motion, a court must liberally construe the pleadings in favor of the defendant and afford the defendant the benefit of every reasonable inference. Bank of New York v. Penalver, 125 A.D.3d 796, 1 N.Y.S.3d 825 (2d Dep't 2015); see 534 E. 11th Street Housing Development Fund Corp. v. Hendrick, 90 A.D.3d 541, 935 N.Y.S.2d 23 (1st Dep't 2011). Any doubt as to the availability of the defense or as to whether it should be dismissed should be resolved in favor of the defendant. See Nahrebeski v. Molnar, 286 A.D.2d 891, 730 N.Y.S.2d 646 (4th Dep't 2001); see 534 E. 11th Street Housing Development Corp. v. Hendrick, 90 A.D.3d at 542, 935 N.Y.S.2d at 24 ("A defense should not be stricken where there are questions of fact requiring trial."). The standards applicable to a CPLR 3211(b) motion to dismiss a defense are therefore akin to the rules of decision applicable to motions to dismiss a cause of action under CPLR 3211(a)(1), (5) and (7). See Commentaries C3211:10, 18, and 21.

C3211:36. Motion Not Limited to Defense Defective on its Face.

Subdivision (b) may be used to seek dismissal of a defense that is defective on its face. Such a legal-sufficiency-of-the-pleading challenge would not require the plaintiff to submit evidence in support of the motion. CPLR 3211(b) is also available to lodge a merits-based attack against a defense. The plaintiff is free to submit evidence of any kind (as long as it is in admissible form), see Commentary C3211:40, to undercut any facts on which the defense is founded. If the plaintiff's evidence demonstrates that the defense is without merit as a matter of law, see Commentary C3211:35, and the defendant does not submit any evidence rehabilitating the defense, dismissal is appropriate. See Leonard v. Leonard, 31 A.D.2d 620, 296 N.Y.S.2d 375 (1st Dep't 1968). (The defendant may avoid dismissal if she needs time to gather evidence, see Commentary C3211:46).

CPLR 3211(b) and 3211(a)(7) are analogous, each allowing for both a facial sufficiency and a merits-based challenge to a pleading. See Commentary C3211:23. CPLR 3211(b) explicitly authorizes dismissal of a defense on either basis ("A party may move for judgment dismissing one or more defenses, on the ground that a defense is not stated or has no merit."). CPLR 3211(a)(7), on the other hand, appears at first blush to support only a facial sufficiency dismissal. Judicial construction of (a)(7), however, has expanded the role of that dismissal ground. See Commentary C3211:23.

C3211:37. Motion to Dismiss Defense May Lead to "Searching the Record."

"Searching the record" is a process whereby the court, called on by a moving party to grant that party relief on a cause of action, looks at the motion record to ascertain whether some other party is entitled to judgment on that claim. It is a familiar concept in summary judgment practice, where searching the record is expressly authorized. See CPLR 3212(b) ("[i]f it shall appear that any party other than the moving party is entitled to a summary judgment, the court may grant such judgment without the necessity of a cross-motion."). The power to search the record is not conferred directly by CPLR 3211(b), but is available by implication. CPLR 3211(c) permits a court, on notice to the parties, to convert a CPLR 3211 motion into one for summary judgment. See Commentary C3211:42. Upon a CPLR 3211 motion's conversion to one for summary judgment, the option to search the record provided by CPLR 3212(b) becomes available to the court. (We say "option" because the determination of whether to search the record is a discretionary one. See Raine v. Gleason, 194 A.D.2d 395, 598 N.Y.S.2d 504 [1st Dep't 1993]).

A plaintiff considering whether to move under subdivision (b) must therefore think long and hard before doing so. The CPLR 3211(b) motion, made with the expectation that it will lead to a paring down of the answer and the elimination of a defense to the plaintiff's action, allows the court, in its discretion, to consider whether the defense being challenged by the plaintiff actually warrants dismissal of the complaint.

Note that a court's power to search the record is confined to those claims, defenses and issues that are the subject of the underlying motion. Dunham v. Hilco Construction Co., Inc., 89 N.Y.2d 425, 429-430, 654 N.Y.S.2d 335, 337, 676 N.E.2d 1178, 1180 (1996); Commentary C3212:23; see Mann v. Rusk, 14 A.D.3d 909, 788 N.Y.S.2d 686 (3d Dep't 2005). For that reason, a motion to dismiss a counterclaim under CPLR 3211(a) does not search the record and allow a court to dismiss a defense. Key Bank of Northern New York, N.A. v. Lake Placid Co., 103 A.D.2d 19, 28, 479 N.Y.S.2d 862, 869 (3d Dep't 1984); see Croce v. Alicakos, 45 A.D.2d 970, 359 N.Y.S.2d 581 (2d Dep't 1974).

C3211:38. Move to Dismiss Jurisdictional Defense Promptly.

As is more fully developed in the discussion of subdivision (e), see Commentary C3211:52, a subdivision (a) dismissal ground need not be taken by motion. The defendant can instead use the ground as a defense in the answer. As to most of the subdivision (a) grounds, the defendant's use of the ground as a defense rather than on a motion to dismiss will not contain any special dangers for the plaintiff. If the ground, for example, is that the cause of action is barred by res judicata or release, etc., the impact of the defendant's tactic is only to postpone a determination of the issue to the trial or, perhaps, to a later motion for summary judgment. In these instances, where the determination will effectively bar the plaintiff from beginning the action again, at least in a New York court, it is of relatively less moment to the plaintiff that the determination is made later rather than sooner.

In some instances, however, a postponement of an adjudication of the defense's validity can have serious consequences for the plaintiff. This is the case when the defendant's objection is that the court lacks in personam (CPLR 3211[a][8]) or rem (CPLR 3211[a][9]) jurisdiction. See Commentaries C3211:28 and 30. It concerns the statute of limitations.

CPLR 205(a) permits a plaintiff whose cause of action has been dismissed on some threshold ground--without reaching the merits--to begin a new action on the same claim within six months after the dismissal, notwithstanding that the original period of limitations applicable to the claim has already expired. There are some important exceptions in CPLR 205(a), however, one of which is a dismissal for lack of personal jurisdiction over the defendant. See Siegel, New York Practice § 52 (Connors 5th ed.). This means that if a dismissal for lack of personal jurisdiction is postponed until after the original statute of limitations has expired, the dismissed plaintiff will find herself barred by the statute of limitations and without the six months that CPLR 205(a) might otherwise offer for a new action.

When the defendant takes the jurisdictional objection by way of defense in the answer rather than by motion, time is running and with it the date on which the statute of limitations will expire draws near. One remedy of the plaintiff is to move promptly to dismiss the jurisdictional defense under CPLR 3211(b), which will bring it to early adjudication. The plaintiff must also recognize, however, that the court on such a motion has the power to deny it without passing on its merits (see Commentary C3211:47), thus deferring the issue until the main trial. The plaintiff should spare no reasonable effort in pointing out to the court the limitations consequences that may attend such a postponement, urging the court to decide the motion on its merits rather than exercise its discretion to defer it.

A plaintiff may also take the precautionary step--and often prefers to if the jurisdictional defense has any chance whatever of succeeding--of commencing the same action all over again, this time being more careful to assure that jurisdictional requirements have been satisfied. If the alleged jurisdictional defect relates to service of the process or the manner in which the action was commenced, see Commentary C3211:28, the plaintiff can initiate the new action in the same court, taking care this time to ensure that all i's are dotted and t's crossed. Should the jurisdictional issue arise because there is a question as to whether there is a Constitutionally sufficient basis upon which to subject the defendant to the New York court's jurisdiction, see, id., the plaintiff should consider bringing a back-up action in a forum that has basis jurisdiction over the defendant.

If an issue of fact exists and prevents the summary determination of a motion to dismiss the jurisdictional defense, the moving plaintiff should remind the court of its power to order immediate trial of the issue. See Commentary C3211:44.

C3211:39. Peculiarities in "Rem" Cases Caused by Operation of CPLR 320(c)(2).

When the plaintiff sues only on an in rem (as opposed to a quasi in rem) foundation, the consequences of the defendant's appearance in the action are governed by the difficult provisions of CPLR 320(c)(2). The plaintiff may have to follow a convoluted course to preserve her rights under CPLR 3211(b).

CPLR 320(c)(2) provides that where the in rem defendant "proceeds with the defense after asserting the [in rem jurisdictional] objection," she forfeits all further objection and submits to the in personam jurisdiction of the court. There should be no difficulty when the defendant moves to dismiss on the in rem jurisdictional ground, i.e., under CPLR 3211(a)(9). If she prevails on the motion, the case is dismissed. If she does not prevail on it, she has a clear opportunity to withdraw from the litigation, leaving behind only an "in rem default," which assures that no resulting judgment can operate against her in personam. This is an advantage that CPLR 320(c)(2) gives her.

The difficulty arises when the defendant does not use the in rem jurisdictional objection under CPLR 3211(a)(9) on a motion to dismiss, but rather incorporates it as a defense in the answer, which the defendant may do under CPLR 3211(e). In that instance both sides are going to have difficulty in determining what constitutes "proceeding with the defense" sufficient to submit the defendant to personal jurisdiction under the language of CPLR 320(c)(2). Take an example:

There is no in personam jurisdiction in the case. There is only in rem jurisdiction. Assume that the defendant answers with defenses under both categories of jurisdiction. The plaintiff can move under 3211(b) to strike out the objection to in rem jurisdiction, which motion--because in rem jurisdiction does exist (and so the court finds)--would be granted. The plaintiff would not succeed, however, in getting the defense to in personam jurisdiction stricken, because there was no in personam jurisdiction to start with, meaning that the defense is a good one. And by merely including a defense of lack of personal jurisdiction in the answer--in this situation in which there was in rem jurisdiction at the outset--the defendant does not, under CPLR 320(c)(2), thereby submit to personal jurisdiction. Under CPLR 320(c)(2), the defendant does not waive the objection to personal jurisdiction unless she proceeds with the defense of the action "after asserting the objection to jurisdiction."

If, therefore, the plaintiff promptly moves to strike out the defendant's defense of lack of personal jurisdiction just as soon as the defendant serves the answer containing it, the court will have to deny the motion.

But suppose that the defendant, after the sustaining of the rem jurisdiction, goes forward and defends the action on the merits. Under the terms of CPLR 320(c)(2), the defendant thereby submits to the personam jurisdiction of the court. Continuing to defend on the merits after the sustaining of rem jurisdiction constitutes a submission to personam jurisdiction even though there was none to begin with. Hence the plaintiff can now move to strike out the in personam jurisdictional defense, a defense that was sustained earlier. Whenever a defense of lack of personal jurisdiction is contained in the original answer in an in rem case, thus presenting the possibility that the defendant will go forward on the merits (after answering) and thereby submit to personal jurisdiction, the plaintiff can move to strike out the defense whenever--at that post-answer time--the defendant does go forward.

In regard to what constitutes proceeding "with the defense" after asserting a jurisdictional objection, especially where the defense is asserted in the answer rather than used on a motion to dismiss, the courts have maintained a rather consistent silence. Since the very service of an answer containing the defense is an "assertion" of it, one can argue that anything the defendant does in the action after serving the answer submits her to personal jurisdiction. That would be an unfair result, but if the defendant experiences any difficulty with it she can blame herself for not using the motion procedure of CPLR 3211(a), which would have afforded her an early adjudication of the defense and enabled her to decide intelligently under CPLR 320(c)(2) whether or not to proceed in the action. The courts obviously do not like this aspect of CPLR 320, whose dictates become confused when the alternative of pleading the defense in the answer is used, as allowed by CPLR 3211(e)

It has been held that a demand for a bill of particulars served along with the answer is not a going forward under CPLR 320(c)(2) such as will forfeit an objection to personal jurisdiction. Solarino v. Noble, 55 Misc.2d 429, 286 N.Y.S.2d 71 (Sup. Ct., New York County 1967). The best advice to the defendant, to whom the potential consequences of these confusing requirements are greater than they are to the plaintiff, is to use the 3211(a) (8 and 9) motion rather than the answer to make the jurisdictional objections.

The occasions for the kind of problem noted above were reduced by a 1969 amendment of CPLR 320(c). In the quasi in rem case in which jurisdiction is based solely on an attachment of the defendant's property, the amendment allows the defendant to defend in full without in personam consequences. See CPLR 320(c)(1). Thus, the problems under discussion should arise today only when the jurisdiction is in rem rather than quasi in rem, i.e., where CPLR 320(c)(2) governs. In rem examples would be foreclosure of a mortgage on local real property, replevin of a local chattel, or a matrimonial action, etc., in which there is initially no personal jurisdiction of the defendant.

Purely "in rem" jurisdiction is a casualty of the CPLR's 1963 adoption. The expansion of the bases for extraterritorial personal jurisdiction adopted under the longarm statute, CPLR 302, supplies personal jurisdiction in most of the situations that would previously have had only rem jurisdiction to rely on. Hence the infrequent need to attend to these in rem complications today.

Subdivision (c)

C3211:40. Evidence Permitted on CPLR 3211 Motion.

The first sentence of CPLR 3211(c) provides that, "[u]pon the hearing of a motion made under subdivision (a) or (b), either party may submit any evidence that could properly be considered on a motion for summary judgment." Therefore, any evidence in admissible form may be submitted in support of or opposition to a CPLR 3211(a) or (b) motion. See Commentary C3212:15. That means the affidavit is available. So too are deposition transcripts, all types and forms of records, and admissions. You name it, if it is in admissible form, it is welcome on the CPLR 3211 motion.

There is, however, one situation in which the type of evidence available to the CPLR 3211(a) movant is limited (and drastically at that). That is where the defendant moves to dismiss a cause of action under the "documentary evidence" ground. CPLR 3211(a)(1). As discussed above, see Commentary C3211:10, a defendant relying on that ground must tender a paper with certain characteristics; the document must be unambiguous and of undeniable authenticity, and its contents must be essentially undeniable. Most evidence cannot satisfy those criteria. That is why it is recommended that the CPLR 3211(a) movant invoke the documentary evidence ground along with one or more other potentially relevant grounds (such as failure to state cause of action [CPLR 3211(a)(7)]).

A CPLR 3211(a)(7) movant can rely on any evidence in support of her motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action. That principle finds significant case law support. But there is some authority to the contrary that would prevent a defendant from obtaining dismissal of a well-pleaded complaint under paragraph 7 based on evidence. See Commentary C3211:23.

Regardless of whether the evidence submitted in support of a CPLR 3211 motion can or does support dismissal, the evidence can serve a very valuable function: it can help the court to ascertain whether to convert the CPLR 3211 motion into one for summary judgment. See Commentary C3211:42.

C3211:41. Evidence required on CPLR 3211 Motion--Pleadings.

CPLR 3212(b) requires the summary judgment movant to submit with her motion a complete set of the pleadings in the action. See Commentary C3212:15. There is no similar requirement in CPLR 3211 for motions to dismiss. But, by virtue of the application of CPLR 2214(c), which requires the moving party to furnish to the court all papers necessary for the court's consideration of a motion, the CPLR 3211 movant must submit a copy of the pleading that is being attacked. See Alizio v. Perpignano, 225 A.D.2d 723, 640 N.Y.S.2d 191 (2d Dep't 1996); Siegel, New York Practice §§ 246, 257 (Connors 5th ed.). To be safe, the movant should submit all of the pleadings interposed in the action (assuming there is more than one pleading at the time the motion is made, which will be the case, among other situations, with any post-answer subdivision [a] motion and any subdivision [b] motion). A court may, in its discretion, overlook the movant's failure to submit a pleading--where, for instance, the court obtains it from another source (Asinoff v. Asinoff, 39 Misc.3d 1207[A], 2013 WL 1406215 [Sup. Ct., Kings County 2013])--or permit the movant to submit it belatedly. See CPLR 2001 ("At any stage of an action ... the court may permit a mistake, omission, defect or irregularity ... to be corrected ..., or, if a substantial right of a party is not prejudiced, the mistake, omission, defect or irregularity shall be disregarded."). But why test a court's tolerance for sloppy practice? Submit the pleading (or pleadings if there's more than one) and keep the court's attention on the merits of the motion.

We tip our cap to Professor Connors, who has brought to the fore this potential trap for the unwary CPLR 3211 movant. See Siegel, New York Practice §§ 246, 257.

C3211:42. Converting CPLR 3211 Motion into One for Summary Judgment.

Normally, summary judgment is not available until after issue has been joined. See CPLR 3212(a). The second sentence of CPLR 3211(c), however, provides that, "[w]hether or not issue has been joined, the court, after adequate notice to the parties, may treat the [subdivision (a) or (b)] motion as a motion for summary judgment." This conversion from a motion to dismiss to a motion for summary judgment will entitle any order granting accelerated-judgment to res judicata treatment. See Commentary C3211:64. Also, it enables the court to "search the record," CPLR 3212(b), and grant relief to a non-moving party. See Commentary C3211:37.

Any subdivision (a) or (b) motion has the potential to trigger a subdivision (c) conversion; the court's power to treat a motion to dismiss as one for summary judgment does not depend on the CPLR 3211 ground on which the motion was made. The usual suspect, though, responsible for triggering a conversion is CPLR 3211(a)(7). Paragraph 5 of subdivision (a), which provides for dismissal based on certain enumerated affirmative defenses, see Commentary C3211:18, and subdivision (b), the dismissal-of-defenses provision, see Commentary C3211:34, are in on the action too.

Why do these types of CPLR 3211 motions generate a disproportionate number of subdivision (c) conversions? Because they are the ones most likely to produce a factual record that resembles the one developed on an outright, post-joinder of issue motion for summary judgment. It is a developed factual record that suggests to the court that there are no material issues of fact in the matter, which, in turn, may lead to the court to convert the motion. See Born to Build LLC v. Saleh, 36 Misc.3d 590, 950 N.Y.S.2d 236 (Sup. Ct., Nassau County 2012). After all, if the record is complete (or could be made so upon the conversion), the action can be put to rest expeditiously, sparing the parties needless expense, providing finality to them sooner rather than later, and allowing the court to concentrate its efforts on other matters.

Conversion does not lie to "resurrect" an untimely motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a) or to otherwise "cover" for an attorney's mistake that led to the waiver of a defendant's right to invoke a subdivision (a) ground. Born to Build LLC v. Saleh, 36 Misc.3d at 593, 950 N.Y.S.2d at 238. (New members of the Bar, as well as experienced practitioners who have developed bad habits in motion practice, should read the Born to Build decision; it serves as a stark reminder of the importance of minding good procedure). A CPLR 3211(a) movant must therefore identify the grounds in that subdivision that may apply to the action and, if they are subject to waiver, duly raise them in either a pre-answer motion to dismiss or the answer.

C3211:43. Notice of the Conversion.

The court determines whether conversion is to occur, although the parties are free to ask or encourage the court to convert the motion. The court must provide the parties with adequate notice of its intention to invoke subdivision (c). The point of this requirement is to provide the parties with an opportunity to make an appropriate record before the court decides the motion. Mihlovan v. Grozavu, 72 N.Y.2d 506, 534 N.Y.S.2d 656, 531 N.E.2d 288 (1988). The notice of conversion must clearly and unambiguously alert the parties that the court intends to treat the motion as one for summary judgment. See 20 Pine Street Homeowners Assoc. v. 20 Pine Street LLC, 109 A.D.3d 733, 971 N.Y.S.2d 289 (1st Dep't 2013). This is important. The parties cannot be made to guess whether they are facing a merits-based summary judgment determination.

Notice of the conversion must come from the court when the action is in the pre-joinder-of-issue phase. But what if a post-answer CPLR 3211(a) motion invokes a ground that, under CPLR 3211(e), should have been raised by pre-answer motion or in the answer? Such a motion would be, in effect, one for summary judgment because no post-answer CPLR 3211(a) motion lies on a ground that may be waived. The list of grounds that may be waived is long--paragraphs 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, and 11. Must the court give notice of its intention to "convert" the motion in that instance or can it disregard the mislabeling of the motion and just treat it as a summary judgment motion? The Court of Appeals' decision in Rich v. Lefkovits, 56 N.Y.2d 276, 452 N.Y.S.2d 1, 437 N.E.2d 260 (1982), suggests that the court should give the notice.

In Rich, the CPLR 3211(a) motion was based on paragraph 8, lack of personal jurisdiction (a ground subject to waiver), and the motion was made long after the joinder of issue. The trial court considered the motion under CPLR 3211 and granted it. The First Department affirmed. The Court of Appeals reversed the order of the Appellate Division and remanded the matter to the trial court to provide the parties with notice of a CPLR 3211(c) conversion. The Court found that the trial court erred in not converting the motion into one for summary judgment because that was the only procedural device available under the circumstances, the defendant having waived the right to make a CPLR 3211(a) motion by not moving pre-answer. See Commentary C3211:55. The Court stated that "[r]equiring that a motion addressed to lack of personal jurisdiction made after answer pleading that lack as an affirmative defense be made by motion specifying that it is made under CPLR 3212 or, if made under 3211, that the parties be given notice that the court will consider it as a 3212 motion[,] reduces the possibility of gamesmanship, while at the same time permitting the court to deal with the issue in the most efficient manner ..." 56 N.Y.2d at 282, 452 N.Y.S.2d at 4-5, 437 N.E.2d at 263-264. The Court observed that, based on the record before it, it could not be said that the plaintiff was not prejudiced by the failure of the trial court to convert the motion. The motion should have been one for summary judgment, conversion was therefore required, and had conversion occurred the plaintiff would have been provided with notice and the opportunity to lay bare his proof on the jurisdictional issue raised on the motion.

In light of Rich, if a party mislabels what ought to be a CPLR 3212 motion as one pursuant to CPLR 3211(a), the court should notify the parties that the motion will be converted, invite submissions and convert the motion. See JP Morgan Chase Bank v. Johnson, 129 A.D.3d 914, 10 N.Y.S.3d 446 (2d Dep't 2015). Where, however, the mislabeling has not caused prejudice to the non-moving party (maybe because the motion papers made it clear that what the defendant was really seeking was summary judgment), courts have overlooked the mistake and treated the motion as one for summary judgment without giving the non-moving parties any additional notice. See Schultz v. Estate of Sloan, 20 A.D.3d 520, 799 N.Y.S.2d 246 (2d Dep't 2005); Hertz Corp. v. Luken, 126 A.D.2d 446, 510 N.Y.S.2d 590 (1st Dep't 1987); see also Guzov v. Manor Lodge Holding Corp., 13 A.D.3d 482, 787 N.Y.S.2d 84 (2d Dep't 2004).

There are three exceptions to the requirement that the court give notice to the parties of its intention to convert a CPLR 3211(a) or (b) motion into one for summary judgment. If one of the exceptions is applicable, the court can simply treat the CPLR 3211 motion as one for summary judgment and the absence of notice of a subdivision (c) conversion will be overlooked. The exceptions are as follows: (1) where subdivision (c) treatment is requested by all of the parties; (2) where the motion raises a pure question of law addressed by all of the parties; and (3) where the parties, by laying bare their respective proofs, deliberately chart a summary judgment course. Hendrickson v. Philbor Motors, Inc., 102 A.D.3d 251, 955 N.Y.S.2d 1 (2d Dep't 2012); see Mihlovan v. Grozavu, 72 N.Y.2d 506, 534 N.Y.S.2d 656, 531 N.E.2d 288 (1988); see also Richard A. Hellander, M.D., P.C. v. Metlife Auto & Home Ins. Co., 48 Misc. 3d 59, 15 N.Y.S.3d 537 (App. Term, 2d Dep't 2015) (charting summary judgment course). If the procedural posture of the case is equivocal and a party does not appreciate the need to submit all of her evidence and arguments in connection with the motion, the third exception will not apply. See generally Nonnon v. City of New York, 9 N.Y.3d 825, 842 N.Y.S.2d 756, 874 N.E.2d 720 (2007).

In the event that the trial court treats the CPLR 3211 motion as one for summary judgment without giving the parties clear notice of its intention to do so (and none of the exceptions to the notice requirement applies), an appellate court will apply the standards applicable to a motion to dismiss. Jones v. Rochdale Village, Inc., 96 A.D.3d 1014, 948 N.Y.S.2d 80 (2d Dep't 2012); Sta-Brite Services, Inc. v. Sutton, 17 A.D.3d 570, 794 N.Y.S.2d 70 (2d Dep't 2005).

One last note on conversion. A motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action (CPLR 3211[a][7]) can be made at any time. See Commentary 3211:49. The movant employing a paragraph 7 motion can seek dismissal of a complaint on the basis that it is facially deficient or on the basis that the cause of action stated is resolved conclusively by evidence. See Commentary C3211:23. Evidence submitted on the CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion might suggest to the court that summary judgment treatment is appropriate. See Commentary C3211:42.

A CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion made long after the joinder of issue and supported by evidence is a particularly attractive candidate for conversion to summary judgment.

When a CPLR 3211(c) conversion takes place, the motion to dismiss becomes one for summary judgment. A summary judgment motion (unlike a CPLR 3211[a][7] motion) must be made within a certain period of time. (CPLR 3212[a] provides, in relevant part, that "the court may set a date after which no [summary judgment] motion may be made, such date being no earlier than thirty days after the filing of the note of issue. If no such date is set by the court, such motion shall be made no later than one hundred twenty days after the filing of the note of issue, except with leave of court on good cause shown.")

The Court of Appeals has made plain that summary judgment motion deadlines must be taken seriously: if a summary judgment motion is untimely, the motion must be denied unless the movant provides a satisfactory explanation for the untimeliness. Brill v. City of New York, 2 N.Y.3d 648, 652, 781 N.Y.S.2d 261, 264, 814 N.E. 2d 431, 434 (2004). Neither the merits of the motion nor the absence of prejudice to the non-moving party is relevant in ascertaining whether good cause exists to consider a late motion. Id.; see Commentary C3212:12.

Thus, when a conversion is effected on a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion that was made after the deadline for summary judgment motions, the movant must demonstrate "good cause"--a satisfactory explanation for the untimely summary judgment motion--otherwise the motion should be denied. See Neil v. New York City Housing Auth., 15 Misc.3d 1115(A), 2007 WL 1005525, at *6 (Sup. Ct., Kings County 2007); Connors, CPLR 3212(a)'s Timing Requirement for Summary Judgment Motions, 71 Brook. L. Rev. 1529, 1577--1578 (Summer 2006). If the timeliness provision of CPLR 3212(a) did not apply to a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion converted to one for summary judgment under CPLR 3211(c), parties would be encouraged to turn to paragraph 7 where the deadline for making a summary judgment motion has passed and the Brill holding would be undermined significantly. See Neil v. New York City Housing Auth., 15 Misc.3d 1115(A), 2007 WL 1005525, at *6, Connors, CPLR 3212(a)'s Timing Requirement for Summary Judgment Motions, supra, at 1577-1578.

C3211:44. Immediate Trial of Issue of Fact.

The last sentence of subdivision (c) states that "[t]he court may, when appropriate for the expeditious disposition of the controversy, order immediate trial of the issues raised on the motion." "The motion" is one made under subdivision (a) or (b). The power to direct a hearing in connection with a CPLR 3211 motion would exist if the last sentence was omitted: CPLR 2218 allows a court to direct a hearing to resolve a fact issue on a motion.

With one notable exception treated below, immediate trials in aid of the determination of CPLR 3211 motions are not common. They are reserved for situations in which the resolution of a disputed issue of fact can resolve the entire case or a significant part of it. That is the effect of the "when appropriate for the expeditious disposition of the controversy" clause. If an action or most of it can be resolved early in the life of the case after an immediate trial, the parties may be spared significant expenses and burdens associated with prolonged litigation.

The immediate trial has particular utility on a motion to dismiss for want of personal jurisdiction under CPLR 3211(a)(8) because that dismissal ground must be raised on a pre-answer motion to dismiss or in an answer, see Commentary C3211:55, and it has the potential to resolve the action. Furthermore, the plaintiff may have a strong incentive to get an early determination of the personal jurisdiction question. If the statute of limitations is still alive on the plaintiff's claim, a new action can be commenced and the alleged defect depriving the court of personal jurisdiction may be cured. The plaintiff will want to know if she must avail herself of that option. (We suggest that the new action be brought anyway as backup. See Commentary C3211:38). The synergy of the plaintiff's need (and, sometimes, strong desire) to raise the personal jurisdiction issue in the infancy of the action and the ability of a personal jurisdiction defect to bring an action to an end, makes issues of fact on motions to dismiss for want of personal jurisdiction great candidates for subdivision (c) immediate trial treatment.

Personal jurisdiction comprises three elements: a basis for the exercise of jurisdiction over the defendant, notice to the defendant of the action, and proper commencement of the action. See Commentary C3211:28. An immediate trial can be used to consider factual questions related to any one of those elements. See, e.g., Vandermark v. Jotomo Corp., 42 A.D.3d 931, 839 N.Y.S.2d 670 (4th Dep't 2007) (immediate trial directed on issue of whether defendant's creation and maintenance of web site constituted transaction of business under CPLR 302[a][1] sufficient to confer longarm jurisdiction over that defendant). It is the notice element, though, that generates the most immediate trials. The issue on the notice score is whether the defendant was served properly with the initiatory papers. So common are "trials" on the issue of proper service that they have developed their own name in civil procedure idiom: the traverse hearing.

The subdivision (c) immediate trial has also proven itself useful in addressing fact questions related to whether an action was time-barred, see Bronx-Lebanon Hospital Center v. Daines, 101 A.D.3d 1431, 956 N.Y.S.2d 660 (3d Dep't 2012); Ryan v. Borg, 88 A.D.2d 637, 450 N.Y.S.2d 767 (2d Dep't 1982); Back O'Beyond, Inc. v. Telephonic Enterprises, Inc., 76 A.D.2d 897, 429 N.Y.S.2d 250 (2d Dep't 1980); whether an action-barring release was procured through fraud or duress, see Anger v. Ford Motor Co., Dealer Dev., 80 A.D.2d 736, 437 N.Y.S.2d 165 (4th Dep't 1981); Purta v. Cisz, 42 A.D.2d 594, 344 N.Y.S.2d 737 (2d Dep't 1973); and whether a tort plaintiff was an employee of the defendant at the time of the accident giving rise to the action (a finding that would trigger the exclusivity provisions of the Workers' Compensation Law). See Duboff v. Board of Higher Ed. of City of New York, 34 A.D.2d 824, 312 N.Y.S.2d 726 (2d Dep't 1970).

What is meant by an "immediate" trial? The word "immediate" indicates that the subdivision (c) trial should be given a preference. See Siegel, New York Practice § 271 (Connors 5th ed.). Just how potent the preference proves to be is a matter for the judge taking into account the other matters on her calendar. Id.

Who should decide the issue presented on a subdivision (c) immediate trial, the judge or a jury? That subject is addressed below in Commentary C3211:45.

C3211:45. Jury Trial of Motion Issue?

In allowing the immediate trial of an issue of fact arising on a CPLR 3211 motion, CPLR 3211(c) does not say whether the trial must be by jury. Here CPLR 2218 might be turned to for guidance, but it, too, has little to offer: it directs trial by jury if the issue is "triable of right" by jury, thus begging the question.

This issue turns on three things:

(1) whether the case is one in which the merits would be triable of right by jury;

(2) whether a jury has been demanded; and

(3) the nature of the ground on which the motion is based.

If no part of the action itself--such as where it is one in equity for an injunction--would be triable by jury, no issue of fact being tried on a CPLR 3211 motion in the case need be tried by jury.

If the case is triable by jury--such as an ordinary money action--and trial by jury has been duly demanded or the time in which to demand it is still open (see CPLR 4102), item (2) on the above list is satisfied, leaving only item (3) to be negotiated.

If the ground of the motion is such that resolution of the fact issue in favor of the movant will dismiss the case and preclude suit from being brought upon the cause again in New York, a jury trial will be required if either side insists on it. See CPLR 2218. Grounds that fall under this category would be release, res judicata, payment, statute of limitations, etc. If the grant of the motion dismissing the case would not prevent suit from being brought again, jury trial of the issue of fact would not be required. Examples of these grounds would be lack of jurisdiction (personal, rem, or subject matter), temporary disability of a party, other action pending (CPLR 3211[a][4]), failure to join a party, etc.

Even on these latter grounds, however, a situation can arise in which a trial by jury should be granted. If it appears that a dismissal for lack of personal jurisdiction, for example, will take place at a time that would prevent the plaintiff from suing anew because of the statute of limitations, see Commentary C3211:38 above, the impact of the dismissal would be permanently to oust the plaintiff from the New York courts and the issue of fact on the jurisdictional motion should therefore be tried by jury.

In Cerrato v. Thurcon Constr. Corp., 92 A.D.2d 89, 459 N.Y.S.2d 765 (1983), the First Department so held, but not without dissent. The court divided 3-2 on the issue, the dissent writing that the mode of trial should not depend on the stage at which an issue is raised, but rather on the nature of the issue itself. In essence the dissent says that whether there is a right to reach the merits is an issue for the court rather than a jury to determine.

The Second Department appeared to be of a different view on an analogous issue in Yannon v. RCA Corp., 131 A.D.2d 843, 517 N.Y.S.2d 205 (1987). The issue in Yannon was whether the action was timely. It was if the plaintiff was insane, because the insanity would have meant that the statute of limitations was tolled under CPLR 208; but the case would have been dead if the plaintiff was sane. The immediate issue, then, was the sanity. Even though the whole case depended on it, the court held that the issue is triable by the court, not by a jury. (It then went on to hold that the plaintiff did suffer from the disability, that there was a toll under CPLR 208, and that the action was therefore timely.)

Subdivision (d)

C3211:46. Resisting Party's Need of More Evidence.

When a motion is made under CPLR 3211, it is generally assumed that the moving party has already amassed all of the evidence needed to support the motion. But it may be that the opposing party has not yet done so, or has tried but been unable to. Subdivision (d) covers that situation.

CPLR 3211(d) provides that "[s]hould it appear from affidavits submitted in opposition to a motion made under subdivision (a) or (b) that facts essential to justify opposition may exist but cannot then be stated, the court may deny the motion, allowing the moving party to assert the objection in his [or her] responsive pleading, if any, or may order a continuance to permit further affidavits to be obtained or disclosure to be had and may make such other order as may be just." Thus, the burden on the opposing party is to convince the court in the opposing affidavits that facts "may exist" that would defeat the motion; mere hope that discovery will yield helpful information will not forestall a determination of the CPLR 3211 motion. See Cracolici v. Shah, 127 A.D.3d 413, 4 N.Y.S.3d 506 (1st Dep't 2015). The opposing party need not convince the court that facts essential to oppose the motion actually exist because that obviously cannot be known until further investigation is had. The party seeking the benefit of subdivision (d) should specify the facts that need to be developed and explain why those facts are material to the opposition. See Warshaw Burnstein Cohen Schlesinger & Kuh, LLP v. Longmire, 106 A.D.3d 536, 965 N.Y.S.2d 458 (1st Dep't 2013). The court should also be shown the sources through which the opposing party believes the needed evidence can be secured. While not expressly required by the statute, the opposing party should, of course, make a specific request for subdivision (d) relief. See SNS Bank, N.V. v. Citibank, N.A., 7 A.D.3d 352, 777 N.Y.S.2d 62 (1st Dep't 2004).

If the evidence can be secured simply by getting additional affidavits, the opposing party should explain why those affidavits were not gotten in time to resist the motion. If that is reasonably explained and it is just a matter of giving the opposing party more time in which to get them, the motion can be adjourned for the requisite time.

It may also happen, of course, that the affidavit will not be available because the witness who knows the facts will not volunteer them or because the needed facts are in the knowledge of an adverse party. Here the deposition procedure may suffice, and the court has explicit power under subdivision (d) to adjourn or continue the motion so as to afford the opposing party an opportunity to seek a deposition or use any other disclosure device against the person or party who holds a possible key to the facts.

Another alternative for the court in such a situation is merely to deny the motion and allow the moving party to put the objection into its pleading, thereby in effect deferring the issue until the trial or, perhaps, the making of a motion for summary judgment under CPLR 3212 (which would be made after the opposing party has had a sufficient time to amass other evidence). This is the subject of Commentary C3211:47.

Another situation is where the movant herself holds the key to the facts. See Cantor v. Levine, 115 A.D.2d 453, 495 N.Y.S.2d 690 (2d Dep't 1985). It may be unfair to grant the CPLR 3211 motion in a situation in which the opposing party must depend entirely on the moving party's testimony to support her own position. If that's the case, the opposing party should advise the court that the nature of the case requires her to depend on cross-examination of the movant at the trial. An illustration of this would be the situation in which the plaintiff is a personal representative suing for the wrongful death of a decedent and where the death resulted from an accident which only the defendant (the movant) survived. If the defendant is the only one who can testify to what occurred at the scene, the plaintiff should have a chance to cross-examine the movant in front of the fact-trier. An early dismissal motion by the defendant in those circumstances, such as under CPLR 3211(a)(7), would not ordinarily be granted.

Plaintiff's Need of Jurisdictional Evidence in "Longarm" Case

A conceptual difficulty frequently arises when the plaintiff relies on the "longarm" statute (CPLR 302) for extraterritorial jurisdiction against the defendant, who moves to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction contending that CPLR 302 is not applicable. Whether the statute applies depends on whether the New York contacts required by CPLR 302 are present in the particular case. Since the court's jurisdiction over the defendant turns on that issue, a potential cart-before-the-horse argument arises. Its most sensitive appearance is when the longarm defendant moves to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(8) and the plaintiff in responding papers claims the need of disclosure under CPLR 3211(d).

The defendant's position at that moment is that the plaintiff must at least establish a prima facie basis for jurisdiction under CPLR 302 before the court can put the defendant to the burden of making disclosure, even if the disclosure is sought only as to the jurisdictional facts. That is, the defendant argues that the court does not even have the jurisdiction to order the disclosure unless and until the plaintiff factually, through affidavits or otherwise, establishes at least a prima facie set of facts invoking the longarm statute.

In Peterson v. Spartan Industries, 33 N.Y.2d 463, 354 N.Y.S.2d 905, 310 N.E.2d 513 (1974), the Court of Appeals held that the plaintiff in that situation does not have to make a prima facie showing of jurisdiction. The plaintiff "need only demonstrate that facts 'may exist' whereby to defeat the [dismissal] motion. It need not be demonstrated that they do exist. This obviously must await discovery." 33 N.Y.2d at 466, 354 N.Y.S.2d at 908, 310 N.E.2d at 515.

The Court said that to impose on the plaintiff the burden of establishing prima facie jurisdiction "may impose undue obstacles ... particularly ... under the 'long arm' statute." 33 N.Y.2d at 467, 354 N.Y.S.2d at 908, 310 N.E.2d at 515. The plaintiff in the Peterson case did show some local contacts on the part of the defendant. The Court found that with these "the plaintiffs have made a sufficient start, and shown their position not to be frivolous" on the question of jurisdiction.

With the "sufficient start" inquiry, the Court appeared to be pronouncing a kind of good faith test. Unless the court can be convinced, from what facts have been shown, that the plaintiff is guilty of bad faith in arguing that longarm jurisdiction exists, the plaintiff will get the benefit of the doubt and the defendant will be required to furnish further information that may reflect on jurisdiction. See West Mountain Corp. v. Seasons of Leisure International, Inc., 82 A.D.2d 931, 440 N.Y.S.2d 729 (3d Dep't 1981).

Where the court determines that jurisdictional discovery will be permitted, it should deny the motion to dismiss without prejudice to renewal of the motion upon the completion of the jurisdictional discovery. Goel v. Ramachandran, 111 A.D.3d 783, 975 N.Y.S.2d 428 (2d Dep't 2013). Alternatively, the court could order a continuance of the motion, providing an opportunity for the discovery, then decide the motion. See Jacobson v. Princess Hotels International, Inc., 101 A.D.2d 757, 475 N.Y.S.2d 846 (1st Dep't 1984).

C3211:47. Denying Motion with Leave to Plead the Objection.

An alternative course for the court to follow in a situation in which the opposing party does not yet have the evidence needed to resist a CPLR 3211 motion is to deny it with leave to the movant to plead it in the responsive pleading, if any. Where the defendant has moved to dismiss a cause of action under CPLR 3211(a), the denial would be without prejudice to the defendant to plead the objection as a defense in the answer. If the plaintiff has moved to dismiss a defense under CPLR 3211(b), and the defense is contained in an answer that requires no responsive pleading (see CPLR 3011), the denial would merely have to specify that it is not on the merits of the motion or that it is without prejudice to the movant to litigate the issue at the trial, or by subsequent motion under CPLR 3212 (summary judgment), etc.

If the issue raised on a CPLR 3211 motion, whether made under subdivision (a) or (b), can be resolved on the paper proof submitted on the motion, it of course should be. If its resolution depends on a fact of which the opposing party must still secure evidence and the evidence can be secured by pretrial methods, as discussed in Commentary C3211:46, the remedy is an adjournment or continuance to enable the opposing party to get affidavits or to use the disclosure devices.

If an issue of fact connected with the motion cannot be resolved by paper proof already appearing in the motion papers or available for addition to them by an adjournment or continuance, a hearing may be necessary. The court may order that it take place promptly. See Commentary C3211:44.

With all of these alternatives available to the court, it would seem that a denial of the motion without passing on its merits, thereby leaving the matter for resolution by later summary judgment motion under CPLR 3212 or at the trial, should be used only where the nature of the particular case makes it especially appropriate. If the ground of the CPLR 3211 motion is such that an early resolution of the fact issue can result in a dismissal of the case or a final judgment in favor of either side, the issue is one that should not ordinarily be deferred until the trial.

If the issue arising on the motion is inextricably intertwined with the basic merits of the case itself, on the other hand, a strong argument appears for deferring its resolution to the trial proper. In such an instance an early trial of the issue under the court's power to direct immediate trial pursuant to subdivision (c) of CPLR 3211 can in effect become an early trial of the entire case, i.e., a back-door preference. That was not the purpose of subdivision (c), which may be said to contemplate an instance in which the fact issue arising on the motion is relatively sharp, can be isolated from the action's main issues, and can on a narrow point dispose of the whole case. See Commentary C3211:44.

Even where the issue is intertwined with the merits of the entire claim, strong countervailing reasons can appear to justify an immediate trial of the motion's fact issue. An example of this is where the plaintiff bases jurisdiction on the longarm statute (CPLR 302), the defendant pleads as a defense lack of jurisdiction, and the plaintiff moves to dismiss the defense under CPLR 3211(b). Even if resolution of the issue will not itself dispose of the case on the merits, as in the example where it relates only to jurisdiction, but the deferment of it until the trial can itself result in a disposition which will prevent the merits from ever being reached, the issue should not be deferred. An example would be where the statute of limitations expires in the interim so that a later dismissal for lack of jurisdiction will disable the plaintiff from suing anew. The issue in that situation should be ordered to immediate trial under CPLR 3211(c). See Commentaries C3211:38 and C3211:44.

Subdivision (e)

C3211:48. Time for Making CPLR 3211 Motion.

CPLR 3211(e) requires that a motion to dismiss a cause of action under CPLR 3211(a) be made before service of the responsive pleading "is required." The responsive pleading includes not just the answer to the complaint, but also an answer to a cross-claim, a reply to a counterclaim, an answer to a third-party claim, etc., depending on what pleading contains the cause of action being attacked. But for purposes of discussion we will assume the common situation in which the attacked cause of action is in the complaint and the motion to dismiss it is made by the defendant.

When the defendant must respond to a cause of action contained in the complaint that accompanied a summons, the responding time is 20 or 30 days, depending on the place and method of service. If the defendant is responding to a cause of action contained in a subsequent pleading, the responding time is a straight 20 days. These are the rules spelled out by the interplay of CPLR 320 and 3012. (The subsequent complaint can be an amended or supplemental one, or even the original one if the plaintiff has started the action with a CPLR 305[b] notice instead of a complaint and the complaint is served only after the defendant has served a demand for it.)

These periods, which dictate how long the defendant has to respond, therefore dictate as well how long she has to move to dismiss under CPLR 3211 in lieu of pleading.

It is generally contemplated, and it is surely the better practice, that the movant make the CPLR 3211 motion before pleading. If disposed to move pre-answer, the defendant should therefore move to dismiss before serving an answer. See Wahrhaftig v. Space Design Group, Inc., 29 A.D.2d 699, 700, 286 N.Y.S.2d 442, 443 (3d Dep't 1968) (as a result of defendants' "failure to proceed by motion before service of the responsive pleading they must be deemed to have elected to proceed solely by means of the affirmative defense pleaded in the amended answer.") (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Incorporated Village of Laurel Hollow v. Laverne, Inc., 43 Misc.2d 248, 250 N.Y.S.2d 951 (Sup. Ct., Nassau County 1964), mod'd 24 A.D.2d 615, 262 N.Y.S.2d 622 (2d Dep't 1965).

A defendant who has carelessly interposed an answer containing as a defense a ground on which she now wants to move to dismiss under CPLR 3211 can of course move under CPLR 3212 instead, and perhaps should do that. A ground that would have supported a CPLR 3211 motion before the service of the answer will ordinarily support a summary judgment motion after the service of the answer. See Commentary C3212:20.

If a motion is based on CPLR 3211 but is made after the service of the answer, the court can treat the motion as one for summary judgment, a power expressly conferred on it by CPLR 3211(c). See Commentary C3211:42. That would avoid the barrier otherwise presented by subdivision (e), and allow the court to get to the issues raised on the motion.

The time limit under discussion does not apply to all CPLR 3211 motions. There are three exceptions, as discussed in Commentary C3211:49.

C3211:49. Time Limitation Inapplicable to Certain Grounds.

If the motion is to dismiss a defense under subdivision (b), there is no time limit on it. The time limitations of CPLR 3211(e) operate only on the motion to dismiss a cause of action under subdivision (a). And there are three grounds even under CPLR 3211(a) that are excepted from the time requirement. A motion predicated on paragraph 2, 7, or 10 of subdivision (a) may be made at any time--the objections of lack of subject matter jurisdiction, failure to state a cause of action, and failure to join a necessary party--and may be made notwithstanding the service of an answer and even though the objection was not even included in the answer as a defense. See Commentary C3211:54.

C3211:50. Effect of Extensions of Responding Time.

Since the time in which to make a motion under CPLR 3211(a) is keyed by CPLR 3211(e) to the responding time, it will generally be true that anything that extends the responding time will also extend the time in which to move under CPLR 3211(a). A motion by the defendant to correct the complaint under CPLR 3024 will constitute such an extension, for example. See CPLR 3024(c). The CPLR 3211 motion itself has this effect under CPLR 3211(f). See Commentary C3211:67.

If the plaintiff amends the complaint, whether as of course under CPLR 3025(a) or by leave of court under CPLR 3025(b), the answering time and hence the responding time will run anew as to the amended complaint. See CPLR 3025(d). The same is true of a supplemental complaint under those provisions, and the same conclusions reached as to the complaint will of course govern as to a cause of action contained in other pleadings, such as a cross-claim or counterclaim in an amended answer.

If a stipulation is made extending the time to respond, a frequent occurrence in practice, it should automatically extend the time in which to move under CPLR 3211(a). See Bob v. Cohen, 105 A.D.3d 530, 967 N.Y.S.2d 690 (1st Dep't 2013); see also Rich v. Lefkovits, 56 N.Y.2d 276, 280-281, 452 N.Y.S.2d 1, 3, 437 N.E.2d 260, 262 (1982). The stipulation can be more restrictive, however: it can provide that the extension is given only with respect to pleading and that it does not extend the time to move under CPLR 3211. A stipulation negating an extension of time to move should ordinarily be upheld. The would-be movant who has a CPLR 3211(a) objection, which could otherwise have been taken on a CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss, is not undone by this: she can serve a responsive pleading including the objection as a defense and then use a summary judgment motion under CPLR 3212 based on it.

The court clearly has power to extend the time to answer. See CPLR 3012(d). But the courts are perhaps not as free with an extension of time for a motion. In Smith v. Pach, 30 A.D.2d 707, 292 N.Y.S.2d 333 (2d Dep't 1968), the court extended the time to answer but specifically refused to permit a motion within the extended time, holding that "[g]ood cause for an extension of time to move was not shown." Perhaps the reason for this is that a refusal to extend the pleading time will result in a default judgment against the would-be pleader, while a refusal to allow more time to make a CPLR 3211 motion will not (as long as the defendant does serve a timely answer, of course).

Nothing discussed here should be confused with CPLR 3211(f), which automatically extends the time to serve a responsive pleading when the would-be responder moves to dismiss under CPLR 3211 as a first step in lieu of serving an answer, and the motion is denied. See Commentary C3211:67.

Defendant's Waiver of Defense as Quid Pro Quo for Extension of Time to Answer

It is always a wise thing for the plaintiff, when asked for an extension of the answering time by the defendant, to inquire into whether the defendant is planning to interpose a jurisdictional objection. Indeed, it may be tactically indispensable to do so if the case was brought with only a short time left on the statute of limitations, for the reason that if the case should be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction after the statute has expired, CPLR 205(a) will not offer the case its six months for a new action and the case will be dead. When the plaintiff discerns that the defendant has such an objection, and its resolution may occur too late for the plaintiff to start over, the plaintiff should try to get from the defendant, as a quid pro quo for the time extension, a waiver of jurisdictional objections. See on this subject the three-part series in the New York State Law Digest on the various ingredients that go into this tactical occasion (New York State Law Digest Nos. 274-6, entitled "The Urgency of Timing the Adjudication of Jurisdictional Objections").

A defendant who has agreed to the stipulation should check it out very carefully when it is reduced to writing to make sure that only jurisdictional objections are waived. A defendant who stipulated to waive "all affirmative defenses" found that she even waived the defense of the statute of limitations. See Stefaniw v. Cerrone, 130 A.D.2d 483, 515 N.Y.S.2d 66 (2d Dep't 1987).

The Stefaniw situation was more unusual still, because it was the defendant who drafted the stipulation, honoring the plaintiff's request that the defendant waive all affirmative defenses. The defendant apparently overlooked what a big bag that is. It would not be amiss, of course, for the plaintiff to insist also on a waiver of a statute of limitations defense, too. But the defendant's offer of such a waiver, if there is any possible merit at all to the limitations defense (which might put a permanent end to the plaintiff's case), and for the quid pro quo of nothing more than a little more time to answer, is a quid that goes far beyond the quo. (Or is it a quo that goes far beyond the quid?) An all-around bad contract, anyway. Waiving "all" affirmative defenses is worse still, when one considers just what that takes in.

The major affirmative defenses are listed in CPLR 3018(b). A simple scanning of that provision reveals how many substantive rights a defendant may give up with a waiver of "all" defenses. Does the defendant intend to waive, for example, defenses such as res judicata or fraud, or, indeed, the fact that the defendant has already paid the obligation? (Payment and release are also on the list.) And in a personal injury case even comparative fault on the plaintiff's part is officially an affirmative defense. Stefaniw wasn't a personal injury case, but if it was, would it have been the defendant's intention to waive so casually the defense of the plaintiff's comparative fault?

A defendant who stipulates to waive "all affirmative defenses" might just as generously offer the plaintiff summary judgment instead. A defendant who offers the plaintiff summary judgment will be surprised by how generous the plaintiff will be with an extension of the defendant's time to answer.

C3211:51. Single-Motion Rule.

There shall be but one motion to dismiss under subdivision (a). (There is no limitation stated on the number of motions that can be made to dismiss defenses under CPLR 3211[b]). And if there are several causes of action stated, this provision means that the movant must gather together all of her subdivision (a) objections, or such of them as she wants to take by motion, for use on that single CPLR 3211 opportunity. This requirement has both procedural and administrative missions. It is designed to protect the pleader from being harassed by repeated CPLR 3211(a) motions and to spare the court's motion calendars the burden of a CPLR 3211 motion more than once in the same case.

It would appear that a second CPLR 3211 motion would be allowable if based on the want of subject matter jurisdiction under paragraph 2 of CPLR 3211(a), for the simple reason that this objection is an unwaivable one and can be raised at any time. And for CPLR 3211 purposes, the objections of paragraphs 7 (failure to state a cause of action) and 10 (failure to join a party) are in the same category as paragraph 2. See subdivision (e) of CPLR 3211. Subdivision (e) specifies that a motion on a ground specified in paragraph 2, 7, or 10 of subdivision (a) may be made at any time. Because of this common treatment of the three paragraphs, it might be thought that a second motion under CPLR 3211 could also be made if based on paragraph 7 or 10 of CPLR 3211(a). It was at one time so held, e.g., Higby Enterprises, Inc. v. City of Utica, 54 Misc.2d 405, 282 N.Y.S.2d 583 (Sup. Ct., Oneida County 1967), aff'd 30 A.D.2d 1052, 295 N.Y.S.2d 428 (4th Dep't 1968), but the Court of Appeals held otherwise in McLearn v. Cowen & Co., 60 N.Y.2d 686, 468 N.Y.S.2d 461, 455 N.E.2d 1256 (1983).

It should be stressed, however, that omitting the paragraph 7 ground (failure to state a cause of action) from the initial CPLR 3211 motion will not waive it; subdivision (e) allows the paragraph 7 motion to be made at any time. It is just a matter of determining what mechanical device to use for the paragraph 7 objection when the CPLR 3211 motion has been used up. The device should be the summary judgment motion of CPLR 3212. The best counsel to the defendant, of course, is to join, in any CPLR 3211 motion made on any ground, a paragraph 7 objection as well, if the defendant has one.

When the CPLR 3211 motion is made prematurely and is denied for that reason--as where it is made to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction under CPLR 3211(a)(8) after the service of a summons without a complaint and the court cannot determine the motion until the complaint is served--the motion can be denied without prejudice to its renewal. See Fraley v. Desilu Productions, Inc., 23 A.D.2d 79, 258 N.Y.S.2d 294 (1st Dep't 1965). Because the court seemed unsure in Fraley about whether the CPLR 3211 motion in that situation could be duplicated, it took the precaution of suggesting that what the defendant might do in the alternative is wait for the complaint, serve an answer, and then move for summary judgment under CPLR 3212, using the same objection (lack of jurisdiction) to ground it. Of course the objection would have had to be preserved by being included as a defense in the answer.

If the first CPLR 3211 motion made by a defendant is addressed to the complaint, a second one afterwards made against a cross-claim in a co-defendant's answer is permissible. The indication is that it will not be barred by the single-motion rule, whose purpose, which is to protect the pleader from repeated motions, is not undermined when the pleadings are those of different parties. Nassau Roofing & Sheet Metal Co. Inc., v. Celotex Corp., 74 A.D.2d 679, 424 N.Y.S.2d 786 (3d Dep't 1980).

May a defendant, who made a CPLR 3211(a) motion against the initial complaint, move against an amended complaint on a CPLR 3211(a) ground, or did the prior motion against the earlier complaint "use up" the single motion? A second motion should lie, provided the claims that the defendant wishes to challenge were not set forth in the prior complaint. See Kocourek v. Booz Allen Hamilton, Inc., 114 A.D.3d 567, 981 N.Y.S.2d 392 (1st Dep't 2014); cf. Swift v. New York Medical College, 48 A.D.3d 671, 850 N.Y.S.2d 906 (2d Dep't 2008) (service of amended complaint containing no new causes of action, but merely restating and renumbering certain causes of action, did not provide defendant with basis for circumventing single motion rule). The test is whether the defendant, on the prior CPLR 3211(a) motion, had the opportunity to address the claims she wishes to attack on the subsequent motion. Barbarito v. Zahavi, 107 A.D.3d 416, 968 N.Y.S.2d 422 (1st Dep't 2013). If she did, the new motion should be barred by the single motion rule; if she didn't the new motion is permitted.

When the omitted objection is to personal or rem jurisdiction, based on paragraph 8 or 9 of subdivision (a), different considerations may arise, discussed in Commentary C3211:55.

The general rule that only one CPLR 3211(a) motion may be allowed to a defendant does not bar a later made motion to dismiss on the ground of forum non conveniens under CPLR 327. Harp v. Malyn, 166 A.D.2d 848, 563 N.Y.S.2d 181 (3d Dep't 1990); see F G II, Inc. v. Saks Inc., 46 A.D.3d 305, 847 N.Y.S.2d 185 (1st Dep't 2007).

If the defendant makes a CPLR 3211 motion, and the plaintiff alleges new facts in her answering papers, the defendant may, without violating the single-motion rule, include in reply papers additional dismissal grounds not covered in the defendant's initial motion. In that context it is all deemed part of a single motion. Held v. Kaufman, 91 N.Y.2d 425, 694 N.E.2d 430, 671 N.Y.S.2d 429 (1998).

C3211:52. Pleading Objection Instead of Moving on It.

As to all of the grounds listed in subdivision (a), CPLR 3211(e) gives the responding party an option. She can either move to dismiss on the stated ground or grounds, or instead plead them as defenses in her answer. This is true of all of the subdivision (a) grounds, without exception, and as long as the party uses all of her available grounds in the one form or the other, i.e., either uses them all to ground a CPLR 3211 motion or uses them all as defenses in the answer, she will not be held to waive any of them. It is where she divides them up and elects to take some of the objections by motion while saving others to use in the answer (if the motion is denied) that the risk of a waiver arises.

The treatment of waiver should be separately addressed to three distinct groups of objections contained on the subdivision (a) list: those contained in

a. paragraphs 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6;

b. paragraphs 2, 7, and 10; and

c. paragraphs 8 and 9.

The ensuing Commentaries treat these three categories separately. But an admonition to the practitioner at this point is warranted: the real trouble centers about the jurisdictional objections contained in paragraphs 8 and 9 of CPLR 3211(a). It is in regard to those objections that a "dividing-up" of objections for use partly by motion and partly by answer contains the waiver prospect.

While the defendant most commonly directs her jurisdictional objections against the plaintiff, the defendant must also pay some attention to the specific modes of preserving a jurisdictional objection against co-defendants who have cross-claimed. In Bides v. Abraham & Strauss Division of Federated Dept. Stores, Inc., 33 A.D.2d 569, 305 N.Y.S.2d 336 (2d Dep't 1969), the danger to a co-defendant who has been cross-claimed against, in failing to make an independent objection (regarding the cross-claim) to the court's jurisdiction, resulted in a forfeiture of the objection although, ironically, the objection was successful against the plaintiff's main claim. The whole problem arose because the defendant who objected to jurisdiction took the objection as a defense in the answer rather than moving to dismiss based on it.

The plaintiff sued A and B. A pleaded lack of jurisdiction in the answer and, the matter thereby being deferred to the trial, A prevailed on it at the trial and plaintiff's claim against A was thereupon dismissed. But defendant B had cross-claimed A, and in A's answer to the cross-claim A did not assert or repeat the jurisdictional objection. As against B, therefore, A was held to have waived the jurisdictional objection.

A bizarre result. Since the jurisdiction the plaintiff originally secures against defendants is also generally assumed to constitute the jurisdictional foundation on which a cross-claim also rests, A's doing in the Bides case does not seem unreasonable. The court apparently chose to regard A's appearance, without repeating the jurisdictional objection against B, as superseding the original jurisdiction--the jurisdiction acquired by the plaintiff against A initially.

It was not unreasonable for A to do what was done in Bides. Since CPLR 3211(e) permits any defendant to take a jurisdictional objection by way of motion or answer, and a motion to dismiss successfully made against the plaintiff would presumably dismiss B's cross-claim as well, A should have been able to assume that the later disposition of a jurisdictional objection taken by way of answer would have the same effect.

Reasonable assumption or not, A is yet another litigant whose case has sounded a warning note for others. The warning is that any objection to personal jurisdiction that a given defendant, X, may have had is best be asserted independently as against each person in the litigation who has made a claim against X. On facts like those of Bides, A should, in the answer to the cross-claim, allege as a defense that the lack of jurisdiction A claims as against the plaintiff is claimed also against B. That should preserve the objection if taken by way of answer instead of by way of motion.

Note that only a properly pleaded defense will preserve a defendant's right to seek relief on it at some later point in the litigation, i.e., on summary judgment or at trial. If the purported defense is not pleaded with sufficient particularity, a court may conclude that it has been waived.

In Scholastic Inc. v. Pace Plumbing Corp., 129 A.D.3d 75, 8 N.Y.S.3d 143 (1st Dep't 2015), the defendant attempted to raise the statute of limitations defense in its answer. Overly embracing the maxim that brevity is a virtue, the defendant pleaded that defense, along with 15 others, in "a boilerplate, catchall paragraph"; in that same paragraph the defendant reserved the right to plead any other potential affirmative defense. After some disclosure, the defendant moved for summary judgment on several grounds, including that the action was time-barred. In opposition to the statute of limitations ground, the plaintiff argued that the defense was waived because it had not been adequately pleaded. The trial court agreed.

The First Department also agreed, finding that the "[d]efendant failed to properly plead the statute of limitations, because its inclusion of the defense within a laundry list of predominantly inapplicable defenses did not provide [the] plaintiff with the requisite notice." Id. at 79; 8 N.Y.S.3d at 146. The Court concluded that the plaintiff was prejudiced by the defendant's failure to properly plead the statute of limitations defense: the plaintiff was induced by the contents of the answer to forego disclosure relevant to the statute of limitations issue, disclosure that may have yielded evidence to use to oppose the motion.

What was the consequence of the defendant's failure to properly plead the defense? Although the Court could have treated the defense as waived, see CPLR 3211(e); Commentary C3211:53, it declined to so because, under the circumstances, that punishment would not fit the defendant's offense. "Instead, the prejudice c[ould] be cured by allowing [the] defendant to amend its pleading and then allowing [the] plaintiff to conduct disc[losure] on the statute of limitations issue." 129 A.D.3d at 81, 8 N.Y.S.3d at 148 (internal citation omitted).

For a thorough treatment of Scholastic, including useful tips for a defendant regarding the pleading of affirmative defenses, see Connors, Back to Basics: Careful Pleading Under CPLR Article 30, N.Y.L.J., May 18, 2015.

C3211:53. Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraphs 1, 3, 4, 5, or 6 of 3211(a).

The only time a defendant, will waive an objection under paragraphs 1, 3, 4, 5, or 6 of CPLR 3211(a) is where the defendant raises it neither by motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211 nor as a defense in the answer. If the defendant raises it in the one form or the other, it is preserved. See, e.g., Wan Li Situ v. MTA Bus Company, 103 A.D.3d 807, 14 N.Y.S.3d 89 (2d Dep't 2015). And the defendant can divide these objections up, taking some by motion and saving others for use as pleaded defenses if the motion fails. See, e.g., Kinberg v. Schwartzapfel, Novick, Truhowsky, Marcus, PC, 136 A.D.3d 431, 24 N.Y.S.3d 614 (1st Dep't 2016); Hertz Corp. v. Luken, 126 A.D.2d 446, 510 N.Y.S.2d 590 (1st Dep't 1987).

If the defendant omits to take any of these objections in either form, the defendant waives it, although the defendant may seek to assert it in an amended pleading, a subject discussed in Commentary C3211:58.

C3211:54. Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraphs 2, 7, or 10 of 3211(a).

The objections contained in paragraphs 2, 7, and 10 of CPLR 3211(a) are the least likely to be waived by careless pretrial procedure. Any or all of the three objections can be taken either by CPLR 3211 motion or by way of defense in the responsive pleading. And they can be divided, one or more used on a CPLR 3211 motion and the rest saved for use in the pleading if the motion fails. If taken by neither a CPLR 3211 motion nor by way of defense in the responsive pleading, they are still not necessarily waived. Paragraphs 2, 7 and 10 can be raised at any time and made the subject of a summary judgment motion or invoked at trial. See Commentary C3211:49.

C3211:55. Waiving Objection Contained in Paragraphs 8 or 9 of 3211(a).

This is one of the busiest of the CPLR 3211(e) categories. It covers a lot of ground. Division is made into subcaptions to facilitate treatment.

In General

The objections to lack of personal (paragraph 8) or rem (paragraph 9) jurisdiction under CPLR 3211(a) are singled out for special treatment by CPLR 3211(e).

If the defendant has available either of these objections she may take them by motion under CPLR 3211 before answering or by way of defense in the answer. It is no longer required that the defendant make the jurisdictional objection by motion in a special appearance, as was required by § 237-a of the old Civil Practice Act (superseded by the CPLR in 1963). The special appearance has been abolished and it now suffices for the defendant to object to personal or rem jurisdiction either by motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211 or in the answer.

But if the defendant does have either of these objections available, she is not to waste the court's or the plaintiff's time on any CPLR 3211 motion on any ground at all unless on that motion she joins the jurisdictional ground. See Competello v. Giordano, 51 N.Y.2d 904, 434 N.Y.S.2d 976, 415 N.E.2d (1980). If the defendant makes no CPLR 3211 motion on any ground, she may then safely include the jurisdictional defense in the answer without fear that she has waived it. (The objection of improper service faces a separate time limit after assertion in the answer, however, as will be noted in a separate caption below.) But if she makes any CPLR 3211 motion, regardless of ground, she must include the jurisdictional objection in the motion or she waives it. She may not, if the CPLR 3211 motion made on other grounds is denied, then turn around and serve an answer containing the jurisdictional objection. Montcalm Publishing Corp. v. Pustorino, 125 A.D.2d 188, 508 N.Y.S.2d 455 (1st Dep't 1986) ("A defendant may not, upon denial of the motion under CPLR 3211 which omits a jurisdictional defense, serve an answer containing the jurisdictional defense.").

Of course, as with the objections contained in paragraphs 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6, the omission to make the paragraph 8 or 9 objection either by motion or answer will waive it. See Commentary C3211:53 above, and also Commentary C3211:58, regarding amendment of the answer to add the objection.

Motion Without Jurisdictional Objection Waives It Even If Motion Aborts

The making of a CPLR 3211(a) motion without including the personal jurisdiction objection will destroy the objection immediately. Addesso v. Shemtob, 70 N.Y.2d 689, 518 N.Y.S.2d 793, 512 N.E.2d 314 (1987); see Competello v. Giordano, supra; cf. Gliklad v. Cherney, 97 A.D.3d 401, 948 N.Y.S.2d 48 (1st Dep't 2012). In Addesso, the defendant moved under CPLR 3211(a)(7) to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim. The plaintiff amended the complaint while the motion was pending and apparently stated the claim right. The defendant then served an answer to the amended complaint and in it included the jurisdictional objection not previously raised. It was held to be too late. The Court said the objection was waived by the making of the motion against the original complaint without including the jurisdictional objection. (See the discussion of Addesso case in the lead note in New York State Law Digest No. 335.)

If no motion is made, and an answer is then served without including the jurisdictional objection, it was held in Solarino v. Noble, 55 Misc.2d 429, 286 N.Y.S.2d 71 (1967), that an amendment of the answer made as of course under CPLR 3025(a) can include the objection as a matter of right and avoid the waiver. The Court of Appeals agreed with the Solarino court's assessment. Iacovangelo v. Shepherd, 5 N.Y.3d 184, 185, 800 N.Y.S.3d 116, 116, 833 N.E.2d 259, 259 (2005) ("[A] defendant who omits from an answer a defense based on lack of personal jurisdiction has not waived the defense if the defendant corrects the omission before the time to amend the answer without leave of court has expired."). This point is pursued further in Commentary C3211:58.

Jurisdictional Defense Not Waived by Defending on Merits

CPLR 3211(e) clearly permits the defendant either of two modes in which to interpose an objection to personal jurisdiction: as a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(8) or as a defense in the answer. If the answer method is used, the defendant must obviously be permitted to put every other defense she has into that answer, including her denials. By using the answer method, in other words, the defendant is signaling that she is willing to wait until some later point--perhaps the trial itself--for resolution of the issue, and that's the defendant's right under CPLR 3211. See Calloway v. National Services Industries, Inc., 93 A.D.2d 734, 461 N.Y.S.2d 280 (1st Dep't), aff'd 60 N.Y.2d 906, 470 N.Y.S.2d 583, 458 N.E.2d 1260 (1983). (The right is qualified when the jurisdictional objection is addressed to improper service, as noted in a separate Commentary below.) Meanwhile, the defendant must also be allowed to prepare for the trial in respect of the merits.

Remember that the matter of when the jurisdictional objection should be determined is not lodged exclusively in the defendant's hands. If the defendant uses the answer method, the plaintiff has in CPLR 3211(b)--the motion to strike a defense--a tool for bringing the matter to an early adjudication.

Motion for Judgment May Eclipse and Thus Forfeit Jurisdictional Defense Asserted in Answer

If the case is not disposed of before trial, and reaches the trial stage, it is fair enough to conclude that the jurisdictional defense can be adjudicated at that time, having been duly preserved all the while in the answer. (An exception is the jurisdictional defense based on improper service, which has a 60-day time restriction under CPLR 3211[e], for which see the Commentary below.) But suppose that the case goes to judgment on the merits before then; that one of the parties moves for summary judgment on the merits during the pretrial stage, for example, and that the motion is granted.

If the defendant is the successful movant, she will gladly forfeit the jurisdictional defense that she interposed. But assume that the plaintiff is the successful movant. If the defendant has not been able to defeat the summary judgment motion, and has also failed to inject the jurisdictional objection into the motion, the defendant will likely be held to have forfeited the objection despite its inclusion in the original answer. (See the lead note in Issue 33 of Siegel's Practice Review, also treating the differences between New York and federal practice on the issue of how long a jurisdictional objection asserted by way of defense in the answer may be allowed to survive in the action.)

Jurisdictional Defense Based on Improper Service Must Be Brought to Adjudication by Defendant Within 60 Days

Zeroing in on only one category of objection to personal jurisdiction--the objection of improper service--an amendment of CPLR 3211(e) that took effect in 1997 requires a relatively prompt adjudication of the objection even when taken by answer. Within 60 days after serving the answer containing the objection, the defendant must "move for judgment on that ground."

Since the service of an answer cuts off the defendant's right to make a CPLR 3211 motion (except on certain grounds not relevant here), the defendant's application for adjudication of the defense apparently contemplates a motion for summary judgment.

If the defendant fails to make the motion within the allotted 60 days, the objection is waived and the court's personal jurisdiction assumed. Wiebusch v. Bethany Memorial Reform Church, 9 A.D.3d 315, 781 N.Y.S.2d 6 (1st Dep't 2004), highlights just how seriously the 60-day rule is taken by the courts. In Wiebusch, the defendant made the motion to dismiss for want of proper service beyond the 60 days. The court held that it could deny the motion on its own initiative; that the plaintiff need not move to strike the defense nor even oppose the defendant's motion by citing the tardiness issue. It's still a good idea for the plaintiff to take either step. It isn't every court that's going to notice and dispose of the defect on its own motion. See generally Misicki v. Caradonna, 12 N.Y.3d 511, 519, 882 N.Y.S.2d 375, 381, 909 N.E.2d 1213, 1218 (2009) (courts "are not in the business of blindsiding litigants, who expect [courts] to decide their appeals on rationales advanced by the parties, not arguments their adversaries never made").

Note that only the specific ground of improper service is involved here. Other objections that go to personal jurisdiction--like want of a jurisdictional basis for extraterritorial service, defective contents of the summons, failure to include either a complaint or default notice with the summons, etc.--are defects of personal jurisdiction but are not among those that have to be made the basis for a dismissal motion within 60 days after being pleaded. They can be postponed of adjudication until much later, when the statute of limitations has expired and when a dismissal of the action can indeed be fatal because CPLR 205(a) does not offer its six months for a new action when the earlier one was dismissed for lack of personal jurisdiction. (Unless, of course, the plaintiff presses the defendant's lack of personal jurisdiction affirmative defense by way of a CPLR 3211[b] motion.)

When the defendant makes a motion to bring the improper service defense to adjudication, and the plaintiff opposes it, the plaintiff must include in the opposing papers a copy of proof of service, even if proof of service has already been filed in the case.

Generally, the tenant in a summary proceeding is not subject to this 60-day time limit. The assertion of a jurisdictional objection in an answer in the summary proceeding thus remains valid despite the expiration of the 60 days. This is the accomplishment of CPLR 3211(e)'s citation of subdivisions 1 and 2 of RPAPL 711, which cover the most numerous of the summary proceedings: those based on holding over after the expiration of the lease term and those based on the nonpayment of rent.

The 60-day waiver provision of CPLR 3211(e) does not apply in the Court of Claims because the failure to comply with the service requirements in the Court of Claims Act touches on that special court's subject matter jurisdiction over an action. See Zoeckler v. State, 109 A.D.3d 1133, 971 N.Y.S.2d 760 (4th Dep't 2013); see also Diaz v. State, 174 Misc.2d 63, 662 N.Y.S.2d 719 (Ct.Cl. 1997).

A coordinate amendment of CPLR 3214(b) was made in the same 1997 law that amended CPLR 3211(e). CPLR 3214(b) automatically stays all outstanding disclosure proceedings when the defendant makes a motion under CPLR 3211 (motion to dismiss), CPLR 3212 (motion for summary judgment), or CPLR 3213 (motion for summary judgment in lieu of complaint). Under the amendment of CPLR 3214(b), if the motion is based on the improper service ground addressed in CPLR 3211(e), the motion does not automatically suspend disclosure.

Only Showing of "Undue Hardship" Can Extend the 60 Days

The court can extend the 60 days, but only on the ground of "undue hardship." This provision has had a lot of attention, usually with bad news for the defendant. The phrase has been given a strict construction.

The lighter showing exacted under a "good cause" or "in the interests of justice" standard, applicable under diverse other procedural statutes, does not suffice under the "undue hardship" criterion of CPLR 3211(e). So concludes Abitol v. Schiff, 180 Misc.2d 949, 691 N.Y.S.2d 753 (Sup.Ct., Queens County, 1999, treated in Issue 84 of Siegel's Practice Review), modified on other grounds 276 A.D.2d 571, 714 N.Y.S.2d 880 (2d Dep't 2000). The court cites, and rejects for CPLR 3211(e) application, the more liberal measures of CPLR 306-b (extension of time to serve summons and complaint), CPLR 2004 (extension of time for taking procedural steps in general), and CPLR 3212(a) (extension of time to make motion for summary judgment). The defendant in Abitol did not make any showing of "undue hardship" to excuse the delay, and the jurisdictional objection was held waived.

In this light, certainly the general--and liberal--time extending power of the court under CPLR 2004 is superseded for CPLR 3211(e) purposes by the "undue hardship" provision.

A connected question arose in Zucco v. Antin, 257 A.D.2d 421, 682 N.Y.S.2d 354 (1st Dep't 1999): whether the 60-day period will start to run anew from an amended answer. The court said no: even if the original answer had the objection, the failure to bring it to judgment within 60 days from service of the original answer waives it; an amended answer will not offer a new 60-day period.

Does Removal to Federal Court Effect Waiver of Objection to Personal Jurisdiction?

In Cain v. Commercial Publishing Co., 232 U.S. 124, 34 S.Ct. 284 (1914), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the removal of an action from state court to federal court does not waive an objection to personal jurisdiction, and many a defendant's lawyer will confirm that one of the considerations in whether to remove a case may be to have the federal rather than the state court rule even on a mere objection to personal jurisdiction that the defendant has raised in the state court. The Appellate Division has more recently held, however, that an objection of improper service--which is of course a category of personal jurisdiction--does get waived by the defendant's removing the case to federal court. Quinn v. Booth Memorial Hosp., 239 A.D.2d 266, 657 N.Y.S.2d 680 (1st Dep't 1997).

The removal in Quinn was held to be a general appearance, at least to the extent that when the case was afterwards remanded, the waiver was held to apply by the New York court. As noted above, however, one of the purposes of the removal may have been to have the federal court rule on the objection. Perhaps the defendant in Quinn was somehow remiss in preserving the jurisdictional objection before the removal. One counseling point for a defendant bent on removal is to at least assert the objection in the state court before the removal, even if in no other form than as a defense in a promptly served answer--always mindful, of course, of the 30-day time limit on removal from state to federal court under 28 U.S.C.A. 1446(b).

If the ground of the jurisdictional objection is improper service and the defendant has chosen to assert it as a defense in the answer--and the answer has already been served at the time of removal--the defendant must also attend to New York's 60-day time limit on bringing the objection to judgment. To be on the safe side, the defendant should promptly, after removal, make a motion for judgment in the federal court based on the jurisdictional objection, being certain that the motion in the federal court also falls within the 60-day period following the service of the answer in the state court. By doing that, the defendant can avoid having to rely on a federal court determination of whether the CPLR 3211(e) 60-day time limit would have to be applied by the federal judge.

And if the defendant chooses to remove the case before answering, the defendant would do well to make a prompt motion to dismiss in the federal court after the removal, under Rule 12(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, based on the improper service objection.

By so proceeding, the defendant should be able to preserve the objection through the process of removal to federal court, and even through the process of removal and remand, should the case be sent back. It is in any event hard to think that a defendant intent on removing a case should be held, despite all procedural precautions, to forfeit an objection to the court's personal jurisdiction by the mere fact of the removal. See Benefits by Design Corp. v. Contractor Management Services, LLC, 75 A.D.3d 826, 905 N.Y.S.2d 340 (3d Dep't 2010).

Answer by Unserved Defendant Is Not Jurisdictional Waiver

In authorizing a defendant to object to personal jurisdiction either with a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(8) or with a defense in the answer, the CPLR has in mind a defendant on whom service of process has at least been attempted. But suppose that there has been no service at all. Will the defendant's service of an answer in that situation--duly setting forth a jurisdictional objection--preserve it? It will, holds the Second Department in Colbert v. International Security Bureau, Inc., 79 A.D.2d 448, 437 N.Y.S.2d 360 (2d Dep't 1981).

A situation like this arises, as it did in Colbert, when there are several named defendants in the case, of which X is only one. The rest have been served, so that there is a pending action in which, X learns, she is also a named defendant, and yet there has been no summons served on her. X may nevertheless have an objection to jurisdiction, not for want of service, obviously, but based on some other ground, such as the absence of a jurisdictional basis for extraterritorial jurisdiction.

The plaintiff contended in Colbert that because no service was attempted on X, X's service of an answer constituted a voluntary appearance and submission to jurisdiction; that the modes of a CPLR 3211 motion or a defense in the answer are available only to defendants upon whom service was at least attempted. The court rejected those arguments. X need not stand by idly, knowing that an action is pending in which she is a named party and can be served at any time, the court says. As long as X is named, X may, if she contends that there is no jurisdiction over her, take the initiative of having the court so hold. She has the right to appear in the action and state the jurisdictional objection, and since one of the ways the CPLR allows for the assertion of the objection is an answer, X may serve an answer and the answer can include the jurisdictional objection as well as plead whatever else is appropriate to an answer.

If the plaintiff does not want to serve X, and does not want X serving papers and making objections, the plaintiff should approach X with the offer to stipulate to drop X from the action entirely.

Jurisdictional Objection Arising Later Is Assertable Later

It may sometimes happen that at the outset of the litigation, at the juncture at which a jurisdictional objection is most appropriate, the jurisdictional objection does not yet exist. Since CPLR 3211(e) requires that an objection to jurisdiction--we refer here to personal or rem as opposed to subject matter jurisdiction--be asserted either by a CPLR 3211 motion before answering or as a defense in the answer, what should a defendant do when the jurisdictional objection does not arise until after the time for the making of the CPLR 3211 motion has expired and the answer has already been served? In a situation like that arising in Rich v. Rich, 103 Misc.2d 723, 426 N.Y.S.2d 936 (Sup. Ct., New York County 1980), the court held that the defendant may make a motion for summary judgment based on the newly arising jurisdictional objection. See Siegel, New York Practice § 111 (Connors, 5th ed.).

The problem in the case revolved around an attachment. Under the procedures of article 62 of the CPLR, an attachment properly levied at the outset validates jurisdiction, but it is subject to the condition subsequent of a perfection of the levy by appropriate steps. In the interim, the time for making a CPLR 3211 motion, and for serving an answer, the two devices by which a jurisdictional objection may be asserted, expires. The time for perfecting a levy of the attachment may not yet have expired when the answering time does, however; perfection may yet take place, so there is not as yet any jurisdictional defect. But then suppose the time for perfection does expire, and without appropriate steps by the plaintiff. The Rich case holds that as soon as it becomes plain that the levy has been voided for want of perfection, thus undoing the jurisdiction that the levy had initially secured, the objection may be raised by the defendant and an appropriate expedient for the raising is a motion for summary judgment. That motion, which is governed by CPLR 3212, has no pre-answer time limit such as CPLR 3211 imposes.

Consistent with the procedural realities of the case in such a situation, the plaintiff's contention that the defendant "waived" a jurisdictional objection at a moment when she did not have one is of course rejected.

C3211:56. Counterclaim or Cross-Claim as Waiving Jurisdictional Objection.

If the plaintiff has an objection under paragraphs 8 or 9 of CPLR 3211(a)--that jurisdiction in personam or in rem is lacking--the plaintiff may assert it by a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a). Or, if the plaintiff makes no motion, she may assert the objection by way of defense in the answer. The mere service of an answer containing a defense of lack of jurisdiction preserves the objection under the CPLR; it is not a waiver of it.

But assume that the defendant also includes a counterclaim in the answer. It was held early in the life of the CPLR that inclusion of a counterclaim does not waive the jurisdictional objection. Goodman v. Solow, 27 A.D.2d 920, 279 N.Y.S.2d 377 (1st Dep't 1967).

Since that time the rule has been refined, evolving a distinction between a counterclaim related to the plaintiff's claim, and an unrelated one. The related one (it was a related one in Goodman) does not waive the jurisdictional objection, but the interposition of an unrelated counterclaim does. See Liebling v. Yankwitt, 109 A.D.2d 780, 486 N.Y.S.2d 292 (2d Dep't 1985), in which the court holds that [w]hen defendant interposed a counterclaim unrelated to the plaintiff's claim, he placed himself in the position of a plaintiff who initially invokes the jurisdiction of a court and by so doing effectively waives any jurisdictional objection he might have had against the prime action.

How does one test whether a counterclaim is "related" to the main claim? The Court of Appeals addressed the matter in Textile Technology Exchange, Inc. v. Davis, 81 N.Y.2d 56, 595 N.Y.S.2d 729, 611 N.E.2d 768 (1993), holding that the doctrine of issue preclusion (collateral estoppel) holds the answer. When there are issues in common between the counterclaim and the plaintiff's main claim, such that an adjudication of an issue in the course of trying the main claim would necessarily be dispositive of the same issue when it afterwards becomes relevant on the trial of the counterclaim, then the counterclaim is to be deemed a related one and, practically speaking, the defendant really has no choice but to interpose it. Interposing it, therefore, does not waive a jurisdictional defense that the defendant may also have.

The defendant who is in doubt about the relatedness of the counterclaim and who wants at least a preliminary test of the merits of the jurisdictional objection should use the motion method to contest jurisdiction, i.e., move to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(8). The mere making of the motion extends the answering time, CPLR 3211(f), and the defendant will shortly have at least the trial court's view of whether the jurisdictional objection is valid.

As is plain from the Appellate Division stage of the Textile case, the judges will sometimes disagree about whether the counterclaim is related to the main claim. The adoption of the issue preclusion doctrine to test the point will help to avoid that, but is not likely to be a talisman in its own right.

What about a cross-claim? The Goodman case indicates that the inclusion of a cross-claim against a co-defendant may constitute a jurisdictional waiver, but it would be best to qualify that conclusion, too, so as to apply the waiver only to a cross-claim wholly unrelated to anything else in the action.

The same rationale that enables a defendant to interpose a related counterclaim without waiver consequences should apply to a related cross-claim as well. If a defendant fails to interpose a related cross-claim, she will be risking the consequences of the issue preclusion (collateral estoppel) doctrine: issues decided in the case will be binding on the defendant if they also turn up in a later, separate suit by the defendant on what would have been the cross-claim.

The interposition of an unrelated cross-claim, on the other hand--the cross-claim that neither seeks indemnity for something interposed against the defendant by some other party nor has any issue of law or fact in common with anything else in the case--marks the defendant's intention to exploit the forum for her own purposes, a posture inconsistent with the contention that the forum lacks jurisdiction.

Impleader of Third-Party Defendant as Waiving Jurisdictional Objection

The general rule that the interposition of a related counterclaim or cross-claim by the defendant should not be deemed a waiver of a jurisdictional defense that is also contained in the answer, has also been extended to a defendant's use of the impleader device. Thus, where the defendant included in her answer a defense of lack of jurisdiction of her person and then served a third-party summons and complaint on X, she did not forfeit the jurisdictional objection. That would be tantamount to forcing the defendant to raise the jurisdictional objection by motion, which in turn would divest her of her clear CPLR right to assert it by defense in the answer as an alternative. Italian Colony Restaurant v. Wershals, 45 A.D.2d 841, 358 N.Y.S.2d 448 (2d Dep't 1974).

Even under the expanded use of the impleader device of CPLR 1007, permitting it for anything related to something else in the case rather than restricting it--as a tight reading of the statute's language would indicate--only to a claim of indemnification to cover liability of some other claim, the device is limited to claims having at least some relationship to a matter already in the case. That relatedness should assure that the inclusion of a claim of want of jurisdiction will not run into any argument of waiver.

Risk of Moving for Summary Judgment on Counterclaim If Defendant Has Also Asserted Jurisdictional Objection

As noted, the mere assertion of a related counterclaim does not prevent the defendant from also including in the answer a jurisdictional objection. But other conduct may forfeit the objection, as illustrated in the bizarre goings-on in Flaks, Zaslow & Co. v. Bank Computer Network Corp., 66 A.D.2d 363, 413 N.Y.S.2d 1 (1st Dep't 1979).

The defendant took the jurisdictional objection by answer instead of by motion, also including a related counterclaim in the answer. Then the defendant apparently had a change of heart and wanted the jurisdictional point disposed of early. Too late now to make a CPLR 3211(a)(8) motion, the defendant made the jurisdictional objection the subject of a summary judgment motion (or, in any event, the equivalent of a summary judgment motion), which is a permissible alternative. Moreover, the defendant won on the point: plaintiff's action was dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

The counterclaim survived, however, and now the defendant moved for summary judgment on it on the merits. Although the mere interposition of the counterclaim did not waive the jurisdictional objection, the motion for summary judgment on the counterclaim--after the jurisdictional point in respect of the plaintiff's main claim was raised and disposed of in the defendant's favor--did. The plaintiff contended, in any event, that these merits proceedings by the defendant in respect of the counterclaim evinced an intention to submit to the court's general jurisdiction, and the court accepted this contention and permitted the plaintiff, with an amendment, to re-assert the main claim (the one which had been dismissed when the defendant's jurisdictional objection was sustained). Perhaps it would be more accurate to describe the situation as one in which a defendant, against whom jurisdiction was initially lacking, submitted to jurisdiction with the equivalent of an informal appearance, that is, a voluntary participation on the merits of the case, when he no longer had to (the claim against him having been dismissed).

The defendant brought this on itself. Had the defendant wanted the action dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, the defendant should have made a prompt motion under CPLR 3211(a)(8), which would have been granted and the action dismissed. Perhaps the defendant had calculated that with an answer instead of a motion the case could have been so set up that the defendant could obtain the services of the court for its counterclaim while denying them to the plaintiff for the main claim. The scheme, if that it was, did not work. Said the court, "If 'man bites dog' in this case, it is purely the defendant's fault," and with those words the court proceeded to add insult to injury: the defendant still had at least some hope of prevailing with the summary judgment motion that the defendant had made on the counterclaim. Here, too, a disappointment was in store for the defendant. A summary judgment motion "searches the record." See Commentary C3212:23 on McKinney's CPLR 3212. This means that the court will look behind the pleading being attacked (in this case the plaintiff's reply to the counterclaim), and back to the pleading containing the claim on which summary judgment is being sought (in this case the counterclaim in the defendant's answer). If that claim is defective, the search-the-record doctrine authorizes the court to grant summary judgment dismissing it even though the opposing party, in this case the plaintiff, has not asked for such relief. That is what happened in the Flaks case. The plaintiff, having been awarded jurisdiction (of the plaintiff's main claim) that the court did not initially have, was now also the beneficiary of a summary judgment (on the defendant's counterclaim) that the plaintiff did not ask for.

The case is one of the most vivid illustrations of the pitfalls that await a defendant who first elects to take a jurisdictional objection as a defense in her answer rather than by a clear-cut preliminary motion, and who then confounds the situation by presuming to impose on the court's jurisdiction with her own counterclaim after it has been advised that the court is willing to uphold the defendant's jurisdictional objection against the plaintiff.

C3211:57. Tools of CPLR 308(5) Designee.

On an ex-parte motion by the plaintiff pursuant to CPLR 308(5), the court can devise--literally invent--a method of summons service. One of the things the courts occasionally do under that provision is designate a person having some relationship to the defendant, directing the plaintiff to effect service on that person in the defendant's behalf. The premise is that the relationship of the designated person to the defendant is such as to make it reasonable to assume that the defendant will be notified through the designee.

It may be true, however, that no such relationship exists, despite the fact that the plaintiff claimed it did on her ex-parte motion under CPLR 308(5). How does the designated person call to the court's attention the fact that she does not bear the assumed relationship to the defendant, or that she has no knowledge of the defendant's whereabouts, or, indeed, that she is even hostile to the defendant? The possibilities are many.

If it is quite clear that the designee does bear a relationship to the defendant such as to justify the designation-for-service under CPLR 308(5), it may be reasonable to require the designee to state any objections she has to the designation through the same routes that would be open to the defendant herself. Cf. Cosby v. Moyant, 55 Misc.2d 393, 285 N.Y.S.2d 980 (Sup. Ct., New York County 1967). The routes open to the defendant herself are the motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211 or the answer by way of defense. Clearly, however, the designee cannot be asked to assert her objections in an answer; she is not the defendant and cannot be asked to answer anything. Nor would it be appropriate to limit such a designee to the expedient of moving to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a)(8). Since she is not a party, but a mere expedient through whom the plaintiff seeks to notify the defendant, she should not be compelled to retain her own attorney and formally move under CPLR 3211. It would also seem that CPLR 3211 is not available to her, since it is the tool of the party against whom a claim is asserted. A person's designation under CPLR 308(5) as a person to be served in the defendant's behalf does not make her the equivalent of the defendant's attorney or empower her to act in the defendant's behalf.

The court nevertheless may hear anything the designee has to say about her designation. The court must recognize that her designation was made on only the ex-parte proof of the plaintiff, which could have been false or mistaken. The designee should not be bound to any particular course of procedure in bringing to the court's attention objections to her designation. Whatever means she chooses should be accepted by the court. If she has been served with or has otherwise obtained a copy of the ex-parte order designating her, so that she knows the name of the judge who signed the order, and she contacts the court, it could take the initiative in setting up a procedure whereby the designee's objections can be heard. The designee can be invited to chambers, the plaintiff being notified to attend and the matter resolved there.

The court should recognize the difficult position of the CPLR 308(5) designee and hear her objections regardless of the procedural route through which they come to the court's attention.

C3211:58. Initially Raising Objection in Amended Pleading.

If the party does not make a motion based on a subdivision (a) objection and also fails to include the objection in a responsive pleading, the objection is waived. Apparently excepted from the operation of this rule are the objections contained in paragraphs 2, 7, and 10 of CPLR 3211(a). See Commentary C3211:54. We thus address discussion here to the other grounds of objection contained under subdivision (a).

Assume that the defendant neither moves to dismiss on the particular ground nor includes it as a defense in the initial answer. May the defendant include it as a defense in an amended answer? In answering this question it will help to distinguish between the amendment of right allowed by CPLR 3025(a) and the amendment that requires court leave under CPLR 3025(b).

Amendment of Course; CPLR 3025(a)

If the amendment is one made of right (without court leave) under CPLR 3025(a), the amended pleading may include the previously omitted defense for the first time. See, e.g., Iacovangelo v. Shepherd, 5 N.Y.3d 184, 800 N.Y.S.3d 116, 833 N.E.2d 259 (2005); Moezinia v. Ashkenazi, 136 A.D.3d 990, 25 N.Y.S.3d 632 (2d Dep't 2016). The as-of-course amendment allowed by CPLR 3025(a) is designed to permit each pleader to correct her pleading at least once without leave of court, and this category of amendment must be made so close in time to the service of the original pleading that it may be said to be nothing more than a final version of the original one. The time limit on the amendment as of course under CPLR 3025(a) will itself guarantee in almost all instances that the adverse party will not be able to claim any prejudice traceable to the brief delay in asserting the objection in an as-of-course amendment.

We turn attention now more specifically to the amendment that requires court leave.

Amendment by Leave; CPLR 3025(b)

If the time to amend as of course has expired under CPLR 3025(a), and the pleader wishes to assert a CPLR 3211(a) objection for the first time in an amendment for which leave is needed under CPLR 3025(b), the pleader now faces an exercise of the court's discretion. Although CPLR 3025(b) directs that leave to amend be "freely given," the allowance of the amendment is in the last analysis for the court to determine on a case by case basis. The best rule of thumb under CPLR 3025(b), for the purpose of permitting an amendment to include a previously omitted CPLR 3211(a) objection, is that the amendment should be allowed if the adverse party cannot claim any significant prejudice due to the mere delay in asserting the objection. The court should consider too whether the proposed amendment is palpably insufficient or patently devoid of merit. See, e.g., Onewest, F.S.B. v. Goddard, 131 A.D.3d 1028, 17 N.Y.S.3d 142 (2d Dep't 2015).

Here the likelihood of prejudice is greater than with the of-right amendment. If, for example, the objection is that the court lacks jurisdiction of the defendant's person and its omission from the original answer has prompted the plaintiff to go to substantial trouble or expense preparing the case on the merits, on the assumption that no jurisdictional objection has been asserted, the amendment to add the objection would properly be denied. But if the amendment is sought reasonably close in time to the service of the pleading to be amended and the plaintiff can show no prejudice because of the mere passage of time, the amendment should be allowed. It should also be allowed when a substantial period of time has passed unless the plaintiff can demonstrate that she has taken such steps in the interim as would enable the court to say that the delay in assertion of the objection by itself significantly prejudices the plaintiff.

Discourse like the foregoing should not be necessary for the careful practitioner. Once again: it is obviously the sounder practice to include the objection in the original pleading or in an amendment of right so as not to have to depend on an exercise of the court's discretion.

An additional dimension appears when the objection that a party seeks to interpose by way of amendment did not come into being until after service of the original pleading, as where a defense like res judicata (or payment, release, etc.) arises only afterwards. There the time to amend as of course under CPLR 3025(a) may have expired, necessitating leave to amend under CPLR 3025(b). This is a different scenario. Here the party is technically seeking to "supplement" the pleading rather than merely amend it, and the very fact that the objection came into being after service of the earlier pleading would appear to mandate a grant of leave to add the objection. See Lance International, Inc. v. First National City Bank, 86 A.D.3d 479, 927 N.Y.S.2d 56 (1st Dep't 2011); George Strokes Electrical and Plumbing Inc. v. Dye, 240 A.D.2d 919, 659 N.Y.S.2d 129 (3d Dep't 1997). That would be so, in any event, if the motion is made within a reasonable time after the objection comes into existence.

Leave to amend an answer to include a waived defense and summary judgment based on that defense can be sought in one motion. Armstrong v. Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co., 150 A.D.2d 189, 540 N.Y.S.2d 799 (1st Dep't 1989).

C3211:59. Raising Objection in Answer to Amended Complaint.

Assume that the plaintiff serves a complaint and the defendant answers it without including an objection to personal jurisdiction, a CPLR 3211(a) ground of objection. Then the plaintiff, as allowed by CPLR 3025(a), amends the complaint as of right. The defendant must serve a new answer to it under CPLR 3025(d). The defendant now asserts the jurisdictional defense in her answer to the amended complaint. This was held permissible in Blatz v. Benschine, 53 Misc.2d 352, 278 N.Y.S.2d 533 (Sup. Ct., Queens County 1967), but later cases, such as Boulay v. Olympic Flame, Inc., 165 A.D.2d 191, 565 N.Y.S.2d 905 (3d Dep't 1991), indicate no, at least in general language. Boulay and like cases may reach the right result on their facts, but they should not be taken as setting forth a hard and fast rule in their reading of the Court of Appeals Addesso case. In Boulay, there may have been a little chicanery on the defendant's part in getting the plaintiff to amend the complaint to assert a different date for the accident--the change of date does not appear to have been of any consequence by itself--just so that the defendant, who failed to make a jurisdictional defense to the original complaint, might now make it against the amended one. The court would not countenance that.

Whether a defendant who has interposed no jurisdictional objection against the claim in the original complaint should be permitted to interpose one against an amended complaint should depend on what the amended one contains, and on the nature of the jurisdictional defect alleged. If, for example, the defendant claims never to have been served with a summons at all, or was served in a defective manner, such an objection would have just as much bearing on the original complaint as on the amended one. The fact that it was omitted from the CPLR 3211 motion made against the original complaint, or from an answer addressed to the original complaint, should therefore mean that it is waived so that it cannot be used against an amended complaint either. But if the particular ground of jurisdictional objection depends on the contents of the complaint, a waiver should not necessarily result. It is quite possible that an objection exists legitimately against a claim appearing for the first time in an amended complaint while the defendant may have had no jurisdictional objection to claims asserted in the original complaint. A situation involving longarm jurisdiction illustrates:

The plaintiff effects service of the summons and original complaint on the defendant, a nondomiciliary, in Ohio. The defendant concedes that the claims asserted in the original complaint arise out of the defendant's New York acts and, making no jurisdictional objection, the defendant appears in the action by serving an answer on the merits. The plaintiff then amends the complaint as a matter of right, as the plaintiff may do under CPLR 3025(a), and adds yet another cause of action, claiming that this one, too, has a longarm basis in CPLR 302. (Note also, in this situation, CPLR 302[c].) The defendant does not concede longarm jurisdiction of this new claim, however, and wants to assert a jurisdictional defense to it. The defendant should of course be permitted to. If general language in Boulay and like cases indicate that the defendant is barred from making the objection, the courts are likely to narrow the language so as to preserve what seems plainly to be the defendant's right in the example just put.

It is the plaintiff, when she amends the original complaint, who injects new matter into the case, and the defendant should be able, in answering the amended complaint, to address the new matter just as if the answer to the amended complaint is the only answer to appear in the case--the original answer deemed as effectively superseded by the amended answer as the original complaint is by the amended complaint.

A lesson from all of this for the plaintiff is that if the plaintiff has the remotest suspicion of the existence of a CPLR 3211(a) objection that the defendant has omitted from the initial answer, the plaintiff had best think twice before invoking CPLR 3025(a) and amending the complaint.

C3211:60. Leave to Replead on (a)(7) or (b) Motion.

The motion to dismiss a cause of action under CPLR 3211(a)(7) or to dismiss a defense under CPLR 3211(b) may be made to attack the cause of action or defense as defective on its face, or, conceding that it is good on its face, to attack it for lack of underlying merit.

If the basis of the defendant's attack on the plaintiff's claim is a defect in its pleading and the plaintiff now wishes to remedy the defect by amendment, the plaintiff may ask in the opposing papers for leave to replead. If the plaintiff is in doubt about whether the objection goes to the face of the pleading, the plaintiff should include the repleading request as a precaution. Perhaps the best rule of thumb here is that the plaintiff should make the request in the opposing papers, at least as an alternative, in any instance in which the plaintiff is confronted with a motion under subdivision (a)(7). The same is true for the defendant when it is defendant's defense that is attacked for facial invalidity.

The party who has at hand evidence to establish the validity of a claim or defense may of course submit it in or with his opposing papers. Affidavits used to support leave to replead should be made by those with knowledge of the facts. The courts constantly remind the bar that the affidavit of one lacking knowledge will not suffice and that leave to replead will be denied, although perhaps with leave to reapply on adequate papers. See, e.g., Young v. Nelson, 23 A.D.2d 531, 256 N.Y.S.2d 649 (4th Dep't 1965). The party who does not, merely needing time to secure supportive affidavits or to conduct disclosure proceedings to get the requisite evidence, see CPLR 3211(d), should so state in opposing papers.

If the party seeking leave to replead includes no extrinsic proof and relies solely on the face of the attacked pleading, all of that pleading's allegations are assumed to be true. And if the pleading is defective only as a matter of draftsmanship, as where it omits an essential allegation that can be shown to exist in fact, the court will be more disposed to grant leave to replead. Even in the situation in which the movant uses no extrinsic proof, however, the opposing party might still do well to submit extrinsic proof of the validity of the claim and the existence in fact of all of the elements on which it depends. The party who does that goes as far as possible to encourage the court to grant leave to replead if a defect is found to exist.

CPLR 3211(e) used to require a party desiring leave to replead to expressly request that relief in the opposing papers and demonstrate that she had "good ground" to support the claims she wished to replead. And the court was authorized to insist that the party produce evidence demonstrating the merit of those claims. These requirements were deleted as a result of a 2005 amendment of CPLR 3211(e). L.2005, ch. 616.

In the first significant appellate treatment of the post-amendment CPLR 3211(e), the Second Department in Janssen v. Inc'd Village of Rockville Ctr., 59 A.D.3d 15, 869 N.Y.S.2d 572 (2d Dep't 2008), made several important points about the leave-to-replead device. First, in amending the law to eliminate the requirements previously associated with seeking leave to replead, the Legislature did not eliminate repleader. Second, the standard to be employed by a court in considering whether to grant a request or motion for leave to replead is the same as the standard employed on a motion for leave to amend a pleading (i.e., relief should be freely granted absent significant prejudice unless new claim is devoid of merit or palpably insufficient). See, e.g., Rabos v. R&R Bagels & Bakery, Inc., 100 A.D.3d 849, 955 N.Y.S.2d 109 (2d Dep't 2012). Third, there is no time limitation on a motion for leave to replead.

With respect to the third point, the plaintiff pleaded several claims (including for harassment and retaliatory action) against several defendants (we'll call them collectively the defendant), along with their village employer. The court on the defendant's motion dismissed several of these. The plaintiff did not request leave to replead in the papers answering the motion. Months after that, with the action still pending, the plaintiff moved for leave to replead--couched also in the form of a motion to amend (which is in effect the same thing)--and the defendant argued that the motion was too late; that it was, by analogy if nothing else, limited to the time for appealing under CPLR 5513 or the time for moving to reargue under CPLR 2221(d)(3). The court rejected both analogies and held plaintiff's motion, made half a year after the original dismissal, timely enough. Neither the amendment itself nor any statement in its legislative bill jacket prescribes any time limit on a motion for leave to replead, the court pointed out.

A party desiring leave to replead should not take Janssen as an invitation to make a repleader motion at some remote point in the action. The motion will be judged under the standards applicable to a CPLR 3025(b) motion, and the principal consideration on the motion to amend is whether the non-moving party would be significantly prejudiced by the proposed amendment. The greater the delay in moving to amend, the greater the likelihood that such prejudice can be demonstrated. See Siegel, New York Practice § 275 (Connors 5th ed.).

Courts occasionally insist that the party seeking leave to replead submit with her motion a proposed amended pleading. Parker Waichman LLP v. Squier, Knapp & Dunn Communications, Inc., 138 A.D.3d 570, 28 N.Y.S.3d 603 (1st Dep't 2016); Fletcher v. Boies, Schiller & Flexner, LLP, 75 A.D.3d 469, 906 N.Y.S.2d 212 (1st Dep't 2010); see JJM Sunrise Automotive, LLC v. Volkswagen Group of America, Inc., 49 Misc.3d 1208(A), 26 N.Y.S.3d 724 (table), 2015 WL 5971752 (Sup. Ct., Nassau County 2015). This requirement flows naturally from the Janssen court's conclusion that a motion for leave to replead is to be viewed in the same light as a motion for leave to amend. See CPLR 3025(b) ("Any motion to amend or supplement pleadings shall be accompanied by the proposed amended or supplemental pleading clearly showing the changes or additions to be made to the pleading.").

If repleading is allowed, the disposition of the motion should be a grant with leave to replead. The action itself would not be dismissed.

C3211:61. Amendment of Objectionable Pleading as Abating Motion.

It may happen that while defendant's CPLR 3211(a) motion against plaintiff's complaint is pending, the plaintiff amends the complaint as of right (without leave of court) under CPLR 3025(a). Upon such an amendment, the amended complaint supersedes the original pleading and becomes the only complaint in the action. D'Amico v. Correctional Medical Care, Inc., 120 A.D.3d 956, 991 N.Y.S.2d 687 (4th Dep't 2014). Should such an amendment be deemed to abate the motion?

No amendment as of right of the pleading that asserts the cause of action should be deemed to abate a motion to dismiss under CPLR 3211(a). That rule has particular force where the amendment did not substantively alter the causes of action being challenged on the motion. See Sim v. Farley Equipment Company LLC, 138 A.D.3d 1228, 30 N.Y.S.3d 736 (3d Dep't 2016); EDP Hospital Computer Systems, Inc. v. Bronx-Lebanon Hospital Ctr., 212 A.D.2d 570, 622 N.Y.S.2d 557 (2d Dep't 1995).

A motion that seeks merely to compel an amendment of the pleading, on the other hand, should be deemed abated upon amendment of the pleading moved against. A motion to require a separate statement and numbering of allegations under CPLR 3024 would be an example. See the Commentaries on 3024 and 3025. Since CPLR 3211(e) requires the court on a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion to consider not merely whether the plaintiff has properly pleaded the cause of action but whether the plaintiff in fact has a cause of action, an amendment of the objectionable pleading while a motion is being brought on under CPLR 3211(a)(7) should not, under the CPLR, be deemed automatically to abate the motion. If the pleader has no cause of action, no quantity of amendments is going to give her one, for which reason the CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion does not necessarily lose its vigor because of the amendment. And whether or not it does is also a matter likely to engender disagreement between the parties, which only the court can resolve.

The court in Sholom & Zuckerbrot Realty Corp. v. Coldwell Banker Commercial Group, Inc., 138 Misc.2d 799, 525 N.Y.S.2d 541 (Sup. Ct., Queens County 1988), held that plaintiff's amendment of the complaint after the defendant has made a motion under CPLR 3211 to dismiss it does not automatically abate the motion. It says that the "better rule" gives the movant "the option of withdrawing its motion or pressing it with regard to the amended pleading," observing that a rule that would have the amendment abate the motion automatically would only invite "additional motion practice." It is a good idea for the parties to be in touch to discuss the matter. Perhaps the defendant can be convinced that the amendment meets her objection and makes the motion academic, prompting its withdrawal.

Reviewing this subject in Sage Realty Corp. v. Proskauer Rose LLP, 251 A.D.2d 35, 675 N.Y.S.2d 14 (1998), the First Department held that the moving party "has the option to decide whether its motion should be applied to the new pleadings." In Sage, the defendant asked the court to treat the original motion as being addressed to the amended complaint as well. This was permissible, held the court. And because plaintiff did not object to the treatment, plaintiff could claim no prejudice. See Sobel v. Ansanelli, 98 A.D.3d 1020, 951 N.Y.S.2d 533 (2d Dep't 2012); Toikach v. Basmanov, 31 Misc.3d 615, 918 N.Y.S.2d 844 (Sup. Ct., Kings County 2011).

By making such a request, the defendant must of course be satisfied that the amended complaint does not add anything new, or at least does not add any new matter to which the original motion has not addressed itself. But that's up to the defendant. If there is anything at all in the amended complaint that was not present in the original one, the defendant may well wish to respond to it.

It would seem that the defendant could do so, if so disposed, by asking the court to retain the original motion papers and consider them as a response to the amended complaint, while perhaps offering the court additional affidavits responsive to just the new matter contained in the amended complaint. If the nature of the pleadings makes that feasible, it could save the effort that the total redoing of the answering papers might entail.

While Sage indicates that the matter should be left to the defendant in first instance, if the defendant chooses a course that encumbers the court's consideration of the motion after the plaintiff has amended the complaint, the court can direct the parties to do whatever's necessary to remove the encumbrance.

Most of the grounds stated in CPLR 3211(a) appear to be of the kind that cannot be cured by mere amendment of the pleading.

It has been held that where the plaintiff serves an amended complaint pursuant to a court order (as opposed to an amendment as of course) disposing of a CPLR 3211(a) motion, the service of such an amended pleading does make the original issues academic on an appeal from the order. See Langer v. Garay, 30 A.D.2d 942, 293 N.Y.S.2d 783 (1st Dep't 1968). This is a kind of abatement coming about because of an amended pleading--but only for appeal purposes. If there is some dispute about whether the amended complaint satisfies the order that permitted it, the dispute should be resolved by the judge who made the order before an appellate court is imposed on to determine the point.

C3211:62. Res Judicata Treatment of Granted CPLR 3211 Motion.

If a motion under CPLR 3211 is granted, the order or judgment in which it culminates is entitled to res judicata treatment. But it will of course be res judicata only of the point it decides.

If the motion was based on a ground in absolute bar of the action, such as release or payment, it will have the effect of a final judgment on the merits and will be entitled to future res judicata treatment as such. If it was based only on a ground in abatement, it will have narrower effect. Thus, where the action is dismissed on a CPLR 3211(a)(8) motion for lack of jurisdiction of the defendant's person, the plaintiff may of course sue anew if she can afterwards get jurisdiction; the only point decided is that the court lacked jurisdiction in the first action.

Most of the grounds listed in CPLR 3211(a)(5) are the so-called objections "in bar," and their application will ordinarily result in complete res judicata treatment precluding future suit on the same cause of action. Among these grounds are arbitration and award, collateral estoppel, discharge in bankruptcy, payment, release, and res judicata. The objection of infancy or disability, however, is only an objection "in abatement" and will not preclude future suit when the disability is removed or rectified.

The statute of limitations and statute of frauds objections cannot be as easily categorized. A limitations dismissal will bar future suit on the same claim in New York, at least to this extent: when the plaintiff sues anew in New York she can be met by the objection that the fact of untimeliness is res judicata, thereby necessitating dismissal of the second suit without relitigation of the timeliness issue. See Spindell v. Brooklyn Jewish Hospital, 35 A.D.2d 962, 317 N.Y.S.2d 963 (2d Dep't 1970), aff'd 29 N.Y.2d 888, 328 N.Y.S.2d 678 (1972). But if the first adjudication purported only to apply the New York period of limitation in a case with foreign elements, without any investigation or application of any foreign period of limitations, it may be possible for the plaintiff to sue anew in the foreign forum whose statute of limitations is applicable and under which the claim is still timely. If, however, the New York court in making the adjudication applied a foreign period of limitations under the so-called "borrowing statute," CPLR 202, the adjudication should preclude suit anew both in New York and in the foreign forum whose statute was applied. The objection to the second suit in either instance would be that the fact of untimeliness is res judicata, and it would be entitled to full faith and credit in the foreign forum.

The statute of frauds dismissal will bar future suit on the alleged agreement, but it may or may not bar a second suit based on a quantum meruit (depending on whether the particular statute of frauds applicable in the first action is construed to intend a complete bar to all recovery emanating from the transaction or merely to bar a claim based on the alleged agreement itself). Here, too, the impact of the New York dismissal may have differing results if the second suit is brought elsewhere. Much remains to be determined in this difficult conflict of laws realm, which is further discussed in Commentary C3211:65.

Many of the CPLR 3211(a) grounds are objections in mere abatement. A dismissal based on one of these grounds will not necessarily preclude future suit. Thus, a dismissal under paragraph 2 will not preclude suit in a court of adequate jurisdiction; one under paragraph 3 will not preclude future suit when the capacity to sue is achieved; one under paragraph 4 will not preclude future suit if the earlier action whose pendency wrought the dismissal is itself later dismissed for lack of jurisdiction; one under paragraph 10 will not preclude future suit in which the necessary party is brought under the court's jurisdiction.

A nice illustration of an objection in mere abatement at work is provided by Landau, P.C. v. LaRossa, Mitchell & Ross, 11 N.Y.3d 8, 862 N.Y.S.2d 316, 892 N.E.2d 380 (2008). Landau, P.C., involved a disbarred lawyer unable to keep his firm name (Eisen, P.C.) after the disbarment. So he dissolved the Eisen, P.C. firm and filed a certificate renaming it Landau, P.C., after his daughter, Debbi (also a lawyer). The gist of the dispute was a legal malpractice action by Landau, P.C. against the law firm (the defendant) that represented Eisen in an earlier action brought by New York City against Eisen for fraud and various other activities. Eisen claimed the firm didn't properly resist the city's summary judgment motion in that case.

The legal malpractice action was dismissed for lack of both "standing" and "capacity." Eisen couldn't sue for Eisen, P.C., because, since he was no longer a lawyer, he lacked "standing." And Eisen, P.C., could not be a plaintiff and initiate the action for itself because, as a dissolved corporation, it had no "capacity". The action by both attempted plaintiffs was therefore dismissed on those grounds, the judgment of dismissal reciting that it was "without prejudice."

Now, with Landau, P.C., as plaintiff, the legal malpractice action was brought with "a virtually identical summons and complaint." The defendant moved to dismiss this one on several grounds, but we address here only the res judicata ground. The Court of Appeals held that the earlier action was not res judicata.

The case occasioned a review of which of the various dismissal grounds listed in CPLR 3211(a) count as merits dispositions in actuality or in effect so as to bar a subsequent action under the res judicata doctrine. The grounds of the earlier dismissal here--lack of capacity and lack of standing--do not count as such grounds, the Court held, thus leaving the merits to be adjudicated when the "capacity" or "standing" defect was cured with a proper substitution of Landau, P.C., as plaintiff. See Brown v. Lutheran Medical Ctr., 107 A.D.3d 837, 968 N.Y.S.2d 526 (2d Dep't 2013) (lack of capacity dismissal did not bar subsequent action).

Paragraph 7 dismissals merit separate treatment. See Commentary C3211:63.

C3211:63. Impact of Dismissal under CPLR 3211(a)(7).

The objection of failure to state a cause of action under CPLR 3211(a)(7) today tests not just the face of the pleading, but its basic merits as well. See Commentary C3211:23.

If the paragraph 7 dismissal is based solely on the facial insufficiency of the pleading of the cause of action, the plaintiff may sue anew with a complaint that corrects the deficiency, see, e.g., Addeo v. Dairymen's League Co-op. Ass'n, 47 Misc.2d 426, 262 N.Y.S.2d 771 (Sup. Ct., New York County 1965); the prior dismissal, which was not on the merits, will not be given res judicata effect. Hock v. Cohen, 125 A.D.3d 722, 4 N.Y.S.3d 70 (2d Dep't 2015). But if the complaint in the second suit is "virtually identical" to the one dismissed for insufficiency in the first, res judicata will be a basis for the second's dismissal. Flynn v. Sinclair Oil Corp., 20 A.D.2d 636, 246 N.Y.S.2d 360 (1st Dep't 1964) aff'd 14 N.Y.2d 853, 251 N.Y.S.2d 967, 200 N.E.2d 633 (1964); Grinstein v. Official Laura Branigan Fan Club, 174 A.D.2d 545, 571 N.Y.S.2d 725 (1st Dep't 1991).

What about the situation where the granted CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion was supported by evidence? Is that dismissal entitled to res judicata effect, barring a subsequent similar action? The answer appears to be no. See Amsterdam Savings Bank v. Marine Midland Bank, N.A., 140 A.D.2d 781, 528 N.Y.S.2d 184 (3d Dep't 1988); Plattsburgh Quarries, Inc. v. Palcon Industries, Inc., 129 A.D.2d 844, 513 N.Y.S.2d 861 (3d Dep't 1987).

Of course, if the paragraph 7 motion in the first action was converted to one for summary judgment under CPLR 3211(c) and the converted motion is granted, the judgment or order from the first action should be entitled to res judicata effect. See Commentary C3211:64.

C3211:64. Impact of CPLR 3211 Motion "Treated" as Summary Judgment.

As previously discussed in Commentary C3211:42, the court is empowered to treat any CPLR 3211 motion as one for summary judgment. If it elects to do so, regardless of the ground on which the CPLR 3211 motion is made, it is in effect saying that the claim or defense lacks merit--a holding equivalent to a final judgment after trial--and it should as a rule be accorded full res judicata (claim preclusion) treatment in any future suit on the same cause. It should also be given full collateral estoppel (issue preclusion) treatment in a future suit on a different cause of action regardless of what the dismissed party may do in the interim.

But here we must hedge. The res judicata realm is one of the most subtle in the law. Even a dismissal made upon an outright motion for summary judgment under CPLR 3212 may carry less than res judicata consequences, as where judgment was granted summarily based on a mere objection "in abatement," such as lack of jurisdiction. This point is more fully developed in Commentary C3212:21 on CPLR 3212.

Ironically, the "treatment" of a CPLR 3211 motion as one for summary judgment may be more apparently a disposition on the merits than a dismissal made on a direct summary judgment motion under CPLR 3212. The court's election to "treat" the CPLR 3211 motion as one for summary judgment is its shorthand term to indicate that it has a complete body of evidence before it on the motion, that it has examined the evidence carefully, that it finds the claim or defense to lack merit, and that it therefore wants the judgment to be on the whole merits rather than limited to the particular CPLR 3211 ground on which the motion was made. But since a summary judgment motion under CPLR 3212 can be predicated on a ground that would have been a basis for a dismissal motion under CPLR 3211--as long as the objection has been preserved by being included as a defense in the answer--a situation may arise in which such a narrowly based summary judgment under CPLR 3212 can occur without the judgment or order specifying the limited ground of it. The fact that a CPLR 3211 motion has been treated as one for summary judgment, on the other hand, should always appear in the judgment or order itself. See Commentary C3211:42.

The practitioner should see to it that the order or judgment resulting from either a CPLR 3211 or CPLR 3212 motion fully clarifies its scope. Its future availability (or unavailability) for preclusion use will depend largely on that. If the matter is omitted and the judge who decided the case wrote no opinion, it may become difficult and sometimes impossible to know the precise ground of the disposition, thereby necessitating a rehearing that might otherwise have been avoided.

C3211:65. Res Judicata in Later Suit in Foreign Forum.

The problems that res judicata and its family can present in the most usual of situations--when sought to be applied to a final judgment rendered only after a full trial--are ample enough and are not a topic of discussion here. When it is sought to append res judicata to a pretrial dismissal such as one resulting under CPLR 3211(a), the problems multiply, and that's the current subject. If one essays to determine how a foreign forum will treat a New York CPLR 3211 disposition, the problems can become more complicated still and will often involve the full faith and credit clause of the federal constitution.

Stating only a few essentials, we may take as the general rule that a New York disposition made with jurisdiction will be just as binding in the foreign forum as it would be in New York. But the scope that New York intended the disposition to have will be a prime source of contention in many cases. Here is one example.

New York dismisses the case on motion under CPLR 3211(a)(5) because the claim is on an oral contract and is barred by the statute of frauds. If the statute of frauds of State X would allow such suit, will the New York disposition be res judicata in State X? This will depend on a number of factors. Did the New York disposition presume to declare only that the case was barred in New York and intend to leave open the possibility of suit later in a forum that allows it? Did the court in New York look at the statutes of all of the related jurisdictions and then decide that the New York statute of frauds was the proper one to apply based on the contacts that the case had with New York? Did the New York court treat the matter as purely a "procedural" question? (If it did, then the adjudication may carry no effect at all in a foreign forum.) To resolve issues like these would require more space than we have here.

We raise the issues only to call to the practitioner's attention the fact that unique factors may be involved if foreign states also have contacts with the case and if jurisdiction of the defendant can be secured in a foreign forum and a suit is commenced anew there. Both sides would do well in such a case to anticipate the possible res judicata questions that can arise after a grant of a CPLR 3211 motion, researching foreign law in advance of the motion. A revelation concerning foreign law and its possible application later can dictate a step to be taken now in connection with the CPLR 3211 motion.

Assume, for example, that State X will apply its own longer statute of limitations to the case if it is shown that the New York court, in dismissing for untimeliness, looked only to the New York statute of limitations and gave no treatment to the foreign one. (See CPLR 202.) If the plaintiff can discern this to be the State X approach, and suit would be timely in State X after the New York dismissal, the plaintiff should see to it that either the order or judgment concluding the CPLR 3211 motion, or an opinion of the court written in connection with it, clarifies that only the New York statute of limitations was considered and applied.

The old adage about letting sleeping dogs lie might be invoked here to dictate that these matters not even be discussed within the framework of a general CPLR 3211 Commentary. The difficulty is that this sleeping dog may wake up later on, and wake up hungry, when a second suit is brought elsewhere. Research into foreign law in advance of making or answering a CPLR 3211 motion--whenever there is a prospect of a later foreign suit on the same or a connected claim--can suggest procedures that will be of great moment in the later suit but which would not have occurred to the party in the present action in New York without that little bit of foresight and research.

C3211:66. Denial of CPLR 3211 Motion as "Law of the Case."

The "Law of the Case" doctrine is a kind of intra-action res judicata. Within the framework of a single action it prevents relitigation of a point already adjudicated in it. The denial of a motion under CPLR 3211 will generally invoke this doctrine and prevent the adjudicated point from again being litigated within the action. See Siegel, New York Practice § 448 (Connors 5th ed.).

Thus, the denial of a motion to dismiss for (e.g.) lack of jurisdiction of the defendant's person is a determination that the court has such jurisdiction and precludes relitigation of the point. While the defendant may appeal the order denying the motion, see CPLR 5701(a)(2), and may do so immediately or as part of an appeal from a later final judgment on the merits, see CPLR 5501(a)(1), she may not, after a denial of the motion, plead the objection as a defense in her answer and expect that the trial judge will hear the matter a second time.

The law of the case doctrine is invoked only when the court has actually adjudicated the point urged on the motion. If it has denied the motion without prejudice to its assertion by way of defense in a responsive pleading or otherwise indicated that it is not passing on its merits but rather deferring it to the trial or some later pretrial juncture--which the court has express power to do under CPLR 3211(d)--the matter is in no sense disposed of and may of course be determined at that future time.

If the point was adjudicated, however, the loser cannot raise the point at trial level again. Of course, she may move to reargue the motion; or, if she has additional and recently uncovered proof justifying a different result, she may move to renew the motion, but that is a different matter entirely. (On the reargument and renewal of motions, see Siegel, New York Practice § 254 and the Commentaries on CPLR 2221.)

Subdivision (f)

C3211:67. Motion Automatically Extends Responding Time.

The defendant or other person who must respond to a pleading (such as the plaintiff to a counterclaim) need not fear being in default by making a CPLR 3211 motion instead of pleading. The mere making of the motion during the time in which to respond automatically extends the responding time until 10 days after the movant is served with notice of entry of the order that disposes of the motion. CPLR 3211(f). A party gets the benefit of subdivision (f) only if the pre-answer motion was made within the time the party had to respond to the pleading. See Wenz v. Smith, 100 A.D.2d 585, 473 N.Y.S.2d 527 (2d Dep't 1984). As any practitioner can attest, that 10-day period, measured as it is by service of notice of entry of the order resolving the CPLR 3211 motion, can be a long time and can sometimes cover many months. See CPLR 2219(a). Note that if notice of entry of the order denying the motion isn't served, the CPLR 3211 movant's time to serve a responsive pleading will not begin to run. De Falco v. JRS Confectionary, Inc., 118 A.D.2d 752, 500 N.Y.S.2d 143 (2d Dep't 1986); Moore v. Latovitzki, 25 Misc.3d 130(A), 901 N.Y.S.2d 908 (table), 2009 WL 3378381 (App. Term, 2d Dep't 2009).

Although subdivision (f) speaks only of service of "notice of entry" of the order, which is usually entered on the initiative of the prevailing party, it is customary to include with it a copy of the order itself.

If the dismissal motion is granted, resulting in a dismissal of the attacked pleading, there is of course nothing to answer. If several causes of action were pleaded, however, and the motion was aimed, successfully, at only one of them, only that one would be dismissed and the rest would now have to be responded to in a pleading.

If the motion is one by the plaintiff under CPLR 3211(b) to dismiss a defense contained in an answer that has no counterclaim, the answer requires no responsive pleading (see CPLR 3011) and the plaintiff therefore need not be concerned about the time element. If the answer does contain a counterclaim, however, it will require a reply, in which event the same time rules that govern the defendant's answer will govern the plaintiff's reply.

Since the making of a motion under CPLR 3211 extends the movant's responding time, it will ipso facto extend the time within which the opposing party can amend the attacked pleading as of right. CPLR 3025(a). Thus, where the defendant moves to dismiss the complaint and thereby extends her own time to answer until 10 days after notice of entry of the resulting order, the plaintiff can, within that extended period, amend the complaint as of right.

The question of whether an amendment of the attacked pleading abates the motion being made against it is discussed in Commentary C3211:61.

Where a party's CPLR 3211 motion is denied and she does not serve a responsive pleading within CPLR 3211(f)'s 10-day window period, that party is in default. To be relieved from that default, the party must make a motion for an extension of time to serve the responsive pleading (see CPLR 3012[d]) or to vacate the default under CPLR 5015(a)(1). If no default judgment or order has been entered, the former mechanism can be used; if a default judgment or order has been entered, the latter should be invoked. See Munroe v. Burgher, 43 A.D.3d 891, 841 N.Y.S.2d 636 (2d Dep't 2007); Rockland County Patrolmen's Benevolent Assoc., Inc., 288 A.D.2d 456, 733 N.Y.S.2d 874 (2d Dep't 2001).

C3211:68. Time to Respond Where Only Part of Pleading Attacked.

Assume that the plaintiff has pleaded multiple causes of action in the complaint. The defendant moves to dismiss the first one only. Must the defendant serve an answer to the others within the original responding time? No, because a CPLR 3211 motion made against any part of a pleading extends the time to serve a responsive pleading to all of it. Siegel, New York Practice § 277, n.3 (Connors 5th ed.), citing United Equity Services, Inc. v. First Amer. Title Ins. Co. of N.Y., 75 Misc.2d 254, 347 N.Y.S.2d 377 (Sup. Ct., Nassau County 1973); see Chagnon v. Tyson, 11 A.D.3d 325, 783 N.Y.S.2d 29 (1st Dep't 2004). Thus, where the defendant moves to dismiss claim #1, she should be able to rely on subdivision (f) and its extension of time to serve her answer to the other claims (which answer would of course respond to the first claim, too, if the CPLR 3211 motion to dismiss it is denied).

Even if the construction were otherwise, the court's general power to extend time (CPLR 2004) is so broad--and its propensity to forgive defaults when reasonable ground is offered so widespread--that a plaintiff who seeks a default judgment on claim #2 simply because the defendant has deferred answering until after the disposition of a CPLR 3211 motion made against claim one will often be doing nothing more than wasting time.

The multiple-claim situation can get stickier when an appeal is also involved. Look at the situation in Rotondo v. Reeves, 192 A.D.2d 1086, 596 N.Y.S.2d 272 (4th Dep't 1993). The defendant was a county, which, under CPLR 5519(a)(1), gets an automatic stay of enforcement of an order when it takes an appeal. The defendant moved to dismiss two claims. The court granted the dismissal of claim one but not two. The defendant appealed the order--aggrieved that claim two was not also dismissed--but served no answer to claim two in the interim on the assumption that the need to answer was suspended. The court holds that it wasn't; that only proceedings to "enforce" the order are stayed, and that the obligation to answer was not a proceeding to "enforce" the order. The plaintiff was therefore granted a default judgment against the defendant. The Second and Third Departments would probably agree with that outcome; the First Department may well have gone the other way. See Robert L. Haig, Commercial Litigation in New York State Courts, § 8:74 (4th ed.).

Subdivision (g)

C3211:69. Easier Standard for Dismissing "SLAPP" Suit.

Subdivision (g) was added to CPLR 3211 in 1992, designed to deter what is sometimes referred to as a "SLAPP" suit, an acronym standing for "strategic lawsuit against public participation." A little background will make clear what a SLAPP suit is.

Developers, property owners, and a variety of others who must secure public approval of a project from some public agency, such as in the form of a permit, license, certificate, or like authorization, are often opposed before the agency by members of the public for an assortment of reasons, some publicly minded and some privately motivated.

Whatever the source of the opposition, these "opposers," to use a handy reference word, don't make the applicants very happy, and it has become increasingly common, in an effort to discourage such opposition, for the applicant, during or after the agency proceedings, to bring an action against the opposer for damages, perhaps for defamation, perhaps on other grounds. See 600 W. 115th Street Corp. v. Von Gutfeld, 80 N.Y.2d 130, 589 N.Y.S.2d 825, 603 N.E.2d 930 (1992). Legislation adopted in Chapter 767 of the Laws of 1992 is designed to deter such "SLAPP" suits--which the Legislature describes as an "action involving public petition and participation"--by tightening up the legal requirements for them and by making it easier for the opposer (the defendant in the damages action) to get them dismissed.

Two of the several amendments with that purpose affect the CPLR: subdivision (g), added to CPLR 3211, and subdivision (h), added to CPLR 3212. These are best negotiated a little further on, after the more substantive parts of the package are briefly analyzed.

The more substantive parts of the package are in the Civil Rights Law, in §§ 70-a and 76-a. Subdivision (1)(a) of the latter contains the "public petition and participation" definition quoted above. See National Fuel Gas Distribution Corp. v. PUSH Buffalo, 104 A.D.3d 1307, 962 N.Y.S.2d 559 (4th Dep't 2013); OSJ, Inc. v. Work, 180 Misc.2d 804, 691 N.Y.S.2d 302 (Sup. Ct., Madison County 1999). The crux of the legislation is in subdivision 2 of § 76-a, which permits the recovery of damages in such an action only if the plaintiff (the applicant before the agency) establishes by "clear and convincing evidence" that the statement made before the agency by the defendant (the opposer before the agency) was made "with knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard of whether it was false," at least when falsity is at issue.

Section 70-a goes even further by enabling the opposer, either in the same suit by way of counterclaim or with a separate action against the applicant, to recover damages from the applicant, including attorneys' fees, if it can be shown that the applicant brought the action "without a substantial basis in fact and law." The "substantial" basis is supposed to be more stringent than the standard that would otherwise apply--"reasonable" rather than "substantial"--but, as the first Governor Cuomo noted in his approval message, the difference may be more theoretical than real.

If it is found that the applicant was motivated by harassment or intimidation in bringing the suit--and such a finding won't be hard if the action is determined to lack "substantial basis"--punitive damages can be assessed against the plaintiff/applicant, in addition to such compensatory damages as may be called for. The function of the two CPLR provisions in this whole design is to facilitate the early dismissal of the "SLAPP" suit if the proper showing can be made.

Subdivision (g) of CPLR 3211 provides that if the defendant/opposer moves to dismiss the action under subdivision (a)(7) of CPLR 3211 and demonstrates that the action is a SLAPP suit, the burden is thrust onto the plaintiff/applicant to establish that the claim has the requisite "substantial basis." See Matter of Related Properties, Inc. v. Town Board of Town/Village of Harrison, 22 A.D.3d 587, 802 N.Y.S.2d 221 (2d Dep't 2005). Subdivision (g) also requires that the "hearing of such motion" be granted a preference. That may be helpful if the court's or the individual judge's motion calendar is clogged. The preference instruction is a legislative statement that it wants this motion to go up front. What it probably really means to grant a preference to, however, is not just the "hearing" of the motion, but the trial of an issue of fact if such an issue should arise on the motion and hold up its disposition. See subdivision (c) of CPLR 3211.

The matter may come up on a summary judgment motion under CPLR 3212 made after the service of the answer instead of on a pre-answer CPLR 3211 motion. The same burden alights upon the plaintiff/applicant in the summary judgment context. That's what subdivision (h), added to CPLR 3212, prescribes. It also calls for a preference, but in this instance that may be a more substantial gift than it is under the counterpart CPLR 3211(g). If subdivision (h) of CPLR 3212 is construed to require not just a prompt entertainment of the motion, but the ordering of a prompt trial of any issue of fact arising on the motion, it will be by-passing the rule that subdivision (c) of CPLR 3212 applies on summary judgment motions generally.

Under that subdivision, the only time an immediate fact trial can be ordered in the summary judgment context is when it concerns only damages (as opposed to liability), or when the motion is based on one of the grounds enumerated in subdivision (a) or (b) of CPLR 3211. That authorization contained in CPLR 3212(c) was probably not intended to authorize the immediate trial of an issue of fact arising on a motion under CPLR 3211(a)(7), however--where the ground is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action--because that would open the door to the immediate trial of any issue of fact at all. See Commentary C3212:22. But given the general background and history of the "SLAPP" suit, the "preference" instruction of subdivision (h) of CPLR 3212 can reasonably be construed to permit just such an immediate trial--even of an issue going to liability under the new "SLAPP" suit standards.

As to whether CPLR 3211(g) applies in federal court actions, see Egiazaryan v. Zalmayev, 2014 WL 1244790, *2 (S.D.N.Y. 2014); Douglas v. New York State Adirondack Park Agency, 895 F.Supp.2d 321, 384-385 (S.D.N.Y. 2012); Yeshiva Chofetz Chaim Radin, Inc. v. Village of New Hempstead by its Board of Trustees of the Village of New Hempstead, 98 F.Supp.2d 347, 358-360 (S.D.N.Y. 2000).

Subdivision (h)

C3211:70. Greater Scrutiny of Complaint Where Defendant is Design Professional.

Subdivision (h) provides a special dismissal tool to certain design professionals who are named as defendants in tort actions. If a licensed architect, engineer, land surveyor or landscape architect is a defendant in an action that is subject to CPLR 214-d ("Limitations on certain actions against licensed engineers and architects") and moves to dismiss the action under CPLR 3211(a)(7), the plaintiff must, to defeat the motion, "demonstrate[ ] that a substantial basis in law exists to believe that the performance, conduct or omission complained of such [design professional] ... was negligent and that such performance, conduct or omission was a proximate cause of [the plaintiff's damages]." CPLR 3211(h).

CPLR 214-d and 3211(h) (as well as CPLR 3212[i]) were added by the Legislature in 1996 to ameliorate the effects of New York's tort law, which, at the time, "tended to facilitate marginal claims against design professionals based on defects arising long after their work was completed and the improvements for which they were initially responsible had been in the owner's possession and subject to the owner's use and maintenance." Castle Village Owners Corp. v. Greater New York Mutual Ins. Co., 58 A.D.3d 178, 183, 868 N.Y.S.2d 189, 192 (1st Dep't 2008).

As a result of subdivision (h)'s "substantial basis" element, a court reviewing a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion in a qualifying action (see CPLR 214-d) must ask whether the plaintiff's claim is "supported by 'such relevant proof as a reasonable mind may accept as adequate to support a conclusion or ultimate fact.' " Castle Village Owners, Corp., 58 A.D.3d at 183, 868 N.Y.S.2d at 192, quoting Senate Memorandum in Support, L.1996, ch. 682, 1996 McKinney's Session Laws of N.Y., at 2614. While the plaintiff need not adduce evidence demonstrating that the claim is supported by a preponderance of the evidence--that's the burden that the plaintiff must meet at trial (see 1A N.Y. P.J.I.3d 1:23 [2016])--the bar at the motion-to-dismiss stage is set higher for the plaintiff. See Practice Commentaries for CPLR 214-d.

In the typical case, the CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion will be denied if the complaint states, i.e., pleads, a cognizable cause of action. When the motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action is augmented by subdivision (h), the plaintiff must adduce allegations and evidence that demonstrate the existence of triable issues of fact regarding the design professional's negligence and proximate cause. See Castle Village Owners Corp., 58 A.D.3d at 183, 868 N.Y.S.2d at 192. Detailed allegations of negligence and the affidavit of an expert can go a long way in helping the plaintiff to defeat a CPLR 3211(a)(7) motion by a design professional. See Schmitt v. Spector, 129 A.D.3d 1052, 11 N.Y.S.3d 680 (2d Dep't 2015); Castle Village Owners Corp. v. Greater New York Mutual Ins. Co., supra.

A motion subject to subdivision (h) is to be afforded a "preference," just like one subject to CPLR 3211(g). See Commentary C3211:69.

LEGISLATIVE STUDIES AND REPORTS

The First Report of the Revisers to the Legislature notes that this rule, taken from §§ 30 and 237(a)(1) of the civil practice act and rules 106, 107, 109 and 110 of the rules of civil practice, allows a motion at any time before a responsive pleading is required, with or without supporting proof, asserting specified objections which, if sustained, will dispose of the action.

In the original draft of subd. (a) of this rule, the Revisers eliminated the motion to dismiss for failure to state a cause of action which was authorized by rule 106(4) of the rules of civil practice. They comment that lawyers, judges and commentators have long been concerned about the ineffectiveness and dilatory nature of the motion to dismiss for legal insufficiency on the face of a pleading. Requiring a determination on the basis of allegations rather than facts, it does not perform well its traditional function of terminating groundless suits. With free amendment permitted, it more often serves only to secure a new and more technically acceptable pleading in place of one omitting an essential allegation or stating a claim in conclusory or other uninformative terms. The round of demurrers and amendments continues while the facts underlying the controversy remain hidden behind a wall of unsupported allegation. See, e.g., Dulberg v. Mock, 286 A.D. 1008, 145 N.Y.S.2d 533 (1st Dep't 1955), reversed, 1 N.Y.2d 54, 133 N.E.2d 695 (1956).

It is further stated that legal sufficiency should be tested on the basis of facts, rather than the allegations, to the extent that they may be ascertained prior to trial. To that end, the jurisdictions following the Federal rules allow proof outside the pleading to be submitted, both on a motion to dismiss and a motion for judgment on the pleadings, converting the motion into one for summary judgment. See rule 12(b), (c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U.S.C.A. This rule goes a step further, dispensing with the motion prior to answer and requiring that a preliminary challenge to legal sufficiency be made by motion for summary judgment after answer. Since such an attack, particularly when it goes beyond the pleadings, usually requires some preparation by counsel on the whole case, there is no extra burden in requiring an answer. At the same time, certain benefits ensue: since answer will not be stayed, the motion is less attractive as a delaying tactic. Moreover, the submission of the responsive pleading permits disclosure to proceed, it defines the issues, and it enables the court to grant judgment against the moving party where such a disposition is indicated.

Nor should the de-emphasis of the statement of the claim condone or encourage poor pleading. For the same reasons that dictate omission of rule 106(4) of the rules of civil practice, this rule abolishes the other motions directed to the legal sufficiency of a pleading on its face under rules 109(5), 109(6), 111 and 112 of the rules of civil practice.

Nevertheless, in the final draft of this subdivision, the Revisers inserted par. 7, which is derived from rule 106(4), and states that it reflects a middle view between the original proposal that the motion to dismiss for legal insufficiency should be abolished, and the feeling of some bar association committees that, despite abuses, such motions often perform a valuable function in permitting a party to have a defective pleading dismissed before being required to frame a responsive pleading and perhaps submit to disclosure proceedings unjustifiably extended by the scope of the defective pleading. The words "facts sufficient to constitute" were not carried forward into par. 7 to conform with the pleading rule which does not use this phrase.

It is further explained in the First Report that there is good reason to continue the provisions for a preliminary motion under rules 107 and 110 of the rules of civil practice and, indeed, to expand them. As separable and easily demonstrable bars to an action, they may often save a lawyer considerable time and effort preparing an answer in a complicated case. There is little danger that they will delay the litigation since, by their nature, they are difficult to fabricate and raise issues that are relatively easily resolved. The commentators have highly praised the New York provisions. See, e.g., Millar, Civil Procedure of the Trial Court in Historical Perspective 250-52 (1952); Atkinson, Pleading the Statute of Limitations, 36 Yale L.J. 914, 930-32 (1927). Similar provisions exist in Illinois and Michigan. Ill.Ann.Stat. c. 110, § 48 (Smith-Hurd Supp.1955); 6A Mich.Comp.Laws Annotations, app. 4, Court Rule 18 (1948).

A new par. 1, relating to defense founded upon documentary evidence, was added by the Revisers, and they also included the defenses of estoppel, arbitration and award and discharge in bankruptcy in par. 5. The latter were chosen because they represent affirmative defenses that are usually easily established. Discharge in bankruptcy is an enumerated objection in the analogous Illinois provision, but this rule has not adopted the phrase "other affirmative matter" used in Illinois. Although par. 5 includes the most common defenses founded upon documentary evidence, par. 1 is added to cover all others that may arise, as for example, a written modification or any defense based on the terms of the written contract.

The words "in a court of any state or the United States" have been added in par. 4, in order to do away with the anomalous doctrine that an action in another state is not "another action pending" within the meaning of the rule. See Squier v. Houghton, 131 Misc. 129, 226 N.Y.S. 162 (Supp.Ct.1927). In the final draft of par. 4, the Revisers inserted provisions to give the court discretion to make an order other than dismissal, and they comment that in some cases, for example, stay of one of the actions or consolidation might be a more desirable solution.

Pars. 8 and 9 of subd. (a) of this rule were inserted to cover jurisdiction over the person and in rem or quasi in rem jurisdiction.

The objection of nonjoinder is covered by par. 10, and it is said that the rule that this objection is nonwaivable has been placed in subd. (e) of this rule.

Subd. (b) of this rule is derived from rule 109(6) of the rules of civil practice. As noted above in the discussion of subd. (a) of this rule, the Revisers originally planned to eliminate this provision. However, since they included the motion to dismiss for legal insufficiency, they carried forward rule 109(6) in this subdivision. The words "facts sufficient to constitute" a defense were omitted since this language in not used in the pleading rule.

Subd. (c) of this rule authorizes submission of evidence upon the hearing of a motion. The Revisers state in the First Report to the Legislature that rules 107 and 110 of the rules of civil practice, as to the evidence permitted, mention only affidavits, but "it is clear that the motion is in essence one for summary judgment."

Rule 108 of the rules of civil practice, permitting the court to direct an immediate trial of the issues raised, is continued in the second sentence of subd. (c). It is said that as to the specified defenses, it makes possible an accelerated judgment even though a genuine issue of fact exists which would defeat a motion for summary judgment. The Illinois and Michigan provisions analogous to rules 107 and 110 allow such a preliminary trial except where a jury trial is required. See note, 33 Chi.-Kent Law Rev. 191 (1955). The procedure seems worthy of retention, although courts are sometimes reluctant to use it because of the fear of two separate trials if the determination is against the moving party. See, e.g., Rizzuto v. U.S., Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corp., 213 A.D. 326, 210 N.Y.S. 482 (2d Dep't 1925); Gordon v. Prishkoff, 67 N.Y.S.2d 373 (Sup.Ct.1946), aff'd 272 A.D. 872, 72 N.Y.S.2d 402 (1st Dep't 1947). A trial on any of the enumerated objections will usually be short; if it is before the court, it will require little more time than the motion itself. As often as not, it will result in a speedy disposition without calendar delay or the necessity of trying the whole case.

Rule 56(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U.S.C.A., is the source of subd. (d) of this rule. The discussion accompanying this subdivision in the First Report to the Legislature states that rule 108 of the rules of civil practice permits the court, in its discretion, to deny the motion and "allow the same facts to be alleged in the answer as a defense." Although the rule offers no criteria for exercise of this discretion, it would undoubtedly cover the situation where the facts are then unavailable to the opposing party This subdivision goes beyond this, allowing the court to retain the motion while permitting disclosure. Further, under the power to make "such other order as is just," it is contemplated that the court could require service of an answer during the continuance for disclosure and thereafter treat the motion as one for summary judgment.

Subd. (e) of this rule is based on § 279 of the civil practice act. As originally drafted this subdivision provided: "A party may combine in a single motion two or more of the enumerated objections, and no more than one motion shall be permitted under this rule. Any objection or defense enumerated in this rule except jurisdiction over the subject matter is waived unless it is raised by motion or in the responsive pleading." The Revisers explained in the First Report to the Legislature that this subdivision is designed to prevent the delay before answer that could result from a series of motions under this rule. With only a relatively short period ordinarily required for disposition of this motion, there is no serious need for allowing subsequent motions based on newly discovered evidence. In any event the party will lose no rights by failing to move or to include all available grounds in his motion, for he still may assert in his answer or reply any defense or objection not raised by motion.

The Revisers also stated that the waiver provision in the original draft does not change existing law. Affirmative defenses may not be proved unless pleaded. The generally non-waivable objections of nonjoinder and failure to state a cause of action or defense (cf. C.P.A. § 279; Rule 12(h) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U.S.C.A.) are not affected because the provision applies only to objections or defenses enumerated in this rule. The rules concerning amendments and summary judgments, however, de-emphasize the objection of failure to state a cause of action and focus instead upon whether a cause of action actually exists.

Section 278 of the civil practice act provides for waiver of certain of the enumerated objections if they are not taken by motion; the purpose of that section, however, is merely to preserve the common law doctrine that dilatory pleas and pleas in abatement are waived unless claimed before trial. Thus, the doctrine is satisfied by the provision that they are waived unless claimed by motion or answer.

The final draft of subd. (e) of this rule inserted provisions relating to time, the rule of non-waiver of objection of legal insufficiency or of non-joinder, and the last sentence.

The rules of non-waiver of objections of legal insufficiency or of non-joinder were originally omitted from this subdivision becase of the proposal of the Revisers to omit the defense of legal insufficiency from subd. (a) of this rule. However, since the defense was included within subd. (a), the rules of non-waiver were required to be incorporated in subd. (e).

The last sentence was also added as part of the compromise approach toward the motion to dismiss for legal insufficiency. It is designed to remove the major objection to such objections--i.e., the liberality with which leave is granted to plead over without any showing that a legally sufficient claim exists. The combined operation of par. 7 of subd. (a) of this rule and this provision is to allow the motion at any time but also to put the burden on the opposing party to show that he has a good claim or defense even if he has not stated it; otherwise leave to plead over will not be granted.

The Sixth Report notes that subd. (e) of this rule, in its final form, is very flexible. If the judge hearing the motion wishes, he may insist that the party seeking leave to amend furnish him and the opponent with a proposed new pleading which can be considered in the light of the argument on the motion to dismiss and the information, if any, set forth in the opposing papers.

Subd. (f) of this rule follows the law under § 283 of the civil practice act. It will not operate to relieve a party's default if his time to plead expired before a motion was made, absent a stipulation or court order extending his time.

Official Reports to Legislature for this rule:

1st Report Leg.Doc. (1957) No. 6(b), p. 83.

2nd Report Leg.Doc. (1958) No. 13, p. 152.

5th Report Leg.Doc. (1961) No. 15, p. 482.

6th Report Leg.Doc. (1962) No. S, p. 329.

Notes of Decisions (4997)

McKinney's CPLR Rule 3211, NY CPLR Rule 3211
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Election Law (Refs & Annos)
Chapter Seventeen. Of the Consolidated Laws (Refs & Annos)
Article 17. Protecting the Elective Franchise (Refs & Annos)
Title 2. John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York (Refs & Annos)
McKinney's Election Law § 17-200

§ 17-200. Legislative purpose and statement of public policy

Effective: July 1, 2023

Currentness

In recognition of the protections for the right to vote provided by the constitution of the state of New York, which substantially exceed the protections for the right to vote provided by the constitution of the United States, and in conjunction with the constitutional guarantees of equal protection, freedom of expression, and freedom of association under the law and against the denial or abridgement of the voting rights of members of a race, color, or language-minority group, it is the public policy of the state of New York to:

1. Encourage participation in the elective franchise by all eligible voters to the maximum extent; and

2. Ensure that eligible voters who are members of racial, color, and language-minority groups shall have an equal opportunity to participate in the political processes of the state of New York, and especially to exercise the elective franchise.

Credits

(Added L.2022, c. 226, § 4, eff. July 1, 2023.)

McKinney's Election Law § 17-200, NY ELEC § 17-200
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Election Law (Refs & Annos)
Chapter Seventeen. Of the Consolidated Laws (Refs & Annos)
Article 17. Protecting the Elective Franchise (Refs & Annos)
Title 2. John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York (Refs & Annos)
McKinney's Election Law § 17-204

§ 17-204. Definitions

Effective: August 6, 2024

Currentness

For the purposes of this title:

1. "At-large" method of election means a method of electing members to the governing body of a political subdivision: (a) in which all of the voters of the entire political subdivision elect each of the members to the governing body; (b) in which the candidates are required to reside within given areas of the political subdivision and all of the voters of the entire political subdivision elect each of the members to the governing body; or (c) that combines at-large elections with district-based elections, unless the only member of the governing body of a political subdivision elected at-large holds exclusively executive responsibilities. For the purposes of this title, at-large method of election does not include ranked-choice voting, cumulative voting, and limited voting.

2. "District-based" method of election means a method of electing members to the governing body of a political subdivision using a districting or redistricting plan in which each member of the governing body resides within a district or ward that is a divisible part of the political subdivision and is elected only by voters residing within that district or ward, except for a member of the governing body that holds exclusively executive responsibilities.

3. "Alternative" method of election means a method of electing members to the governing body of a political subdivision using a method other than at-large or district-based, including, but not limited to, ranked-choice voting, cumulative voting, and limited voting.

4. "Political subdivision" means a geographic area of representation created for the provision of government services, including, but not limited to, a county, city, town, village, school district, or any other district organized pursuant to state or local law.

5. "Protected class" means a class of individuals who are members of a race, color, or language-minority group, including individuals who are members of a minimum reporting category that has ever been officially recognized by the United States census bureau.

5-a. “Language minorities” or “language-minority group” means persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives or of Spanish heritage.

6. “Racially polarized voting” means voting in which there is a divergence in the candidate, political preferences, or electoral choice of members in a protected class from the candidates, or electoral choice of the rest of the electorate.

7. “Federal voting rights act” means the federal Voting Rights Act of 1965, 52 U.S.C. § 10301 et seq., as amended.

8. The “civil rights bureau” means the civil rights bureau of the office of the attorney general.

9. “Government enforcement action” means a denial of administrative or judicial preclearance by the state or federal government, pending litigation filed by a federal or state entity, a final judgment or adjudication, a consent decree, or similar formal action.

10. Repealed by L.2024, c. 216, § 2, eff. Aug. 6, 2024.

Credits

(Added L.2022, c. 226, § 4, eff. July 1, 2023. Amended L.2024, c. 216, §§ 1, 2, eff. Aug. 6, 2024.)

McKinney’s Election Law § 17-204, NY ELEC § 17-204
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Election Law (Refs & Annos)
Chapter Seventeen. Of the Consolidated Laws (Refs & Annos)
Article 17. Protecting the Elective Franchise (Refs & Annos)
Title 2. John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York (Refs & Annos)
McKinney's Election Law § 17-206

§ 17-206. Prohibitions on voter disenfranchisement

Effective: August 6, 2024

Currentness

1. Prohibition against voter suppression. (a) No voting qualification, prerequisite to voting, law, ordinance, standard, practice, procedure, regulation, or policy shall be enacted or implemented by any board of elections or political subdivision in a manner that results in a denial or abridgement of the right of members of a protected class to vote.

(b) A violation of paragraph (a) of this subdivision shall be established upon a showing that, based on the totality of the circumstances, members of a protected class have less opportunity than the rest of the electorate to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcome of elections.

2. Prohibition against vote dilution. (a) No board of elections or political subdivision shall use any method of election, having the effect of impairing the ability of members of a protected class to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcome of elections, as a result of vote dilution.

(b) A violation of paragraph (a) of this subdivision shall be established upon a showing that a political subdivision:

(i) used an at-large method of election and either: (A) voting patterns of members of the protected class within the political subdivision are racially polarized; or (B) under the totality of the circumstances, the ability of members of the protected class to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcome of elections is impaired; or

(ii) used a district-based or alternative method of election and that candidates or electoral choices preferred by members of the protected class would usually be defeated, and either: (A) voting patterns of members of the protected class within the political subdivision are racially polarized; or (B) under the totality of the circumstances, the ability of members of the protected class to elect candidates of their choice or influence the outcome of elections is impaired.

(c) For the purposes of demonstrating that a violation of paragraph (a) of this subdivision has occurred, evidence shall be weighed and considered as follows: (i) elections conducted prior to the filing of an action pursuant to this subdivision are more probative than elections conducted after the filing of the action; (ii) evidence concerning elections for members of the governing body of the political subdivision are more probative than evidence concerning other elections; (iii) statistical evidence is more probative than non-statistical evidence; (iv) where there is evidence that more than one protected class of eligible voters are politically cohesive in the political subdivision, members of each of those protected classes may be combined; (v) evidence concerning the intent on the part of the voters, elected officials, or the political subdivision to discriminate against a protected class is not required; (vi) evidence that voting patterns and election outcomes could be explained by factors other than racially polarized voting, including but not limited to partisanship, shall not be considered; (vii) evidence that sub-groups within a protected class have different voting patterns shall not be considered; (viii) evidence concerning whether members of a protected class are geographically compact or concentrated shall not be considered, but may be a factor in determining an appropriate remedy; and (ix) evidence concerning projected changes in population or demographics shall not be considered, but may be a factor, in determining an appropriate remedy.

3. In determining whether, under the totality of the circumstances, a violation of subdivision one or two of this section has occurred, factors that may be considered shall include, but not be limited to: (a) the history of discrimination in or affecting the political subdivision; (b) the extent to which members of the protected class have been elected to office in the political subdivision; (c) the use of any voting qualification, prerequisite to voting, law, ordinance, standard, practice, procedure, regulation, or policy that may enhance the dilutive effects of the election scheme; (d) denying eligible voters or candidates who are members of the protected class to processes determining which groups of candidates receive access to the ballot, financial support, or other support in a given election; (e) the extent to which members of the protected class contribute to political campaigns at lower rates; (f) the extent to which members of a protected class in the state or political subdivision vote at lower rates than other members of the electorate; (g) the extent to which members of the protected class are disadvantaged in areas including but not limited to education, employment, health, criminal justice, housing, land use, or environmental protection; (h) the extent to which members of the protected class are disadvantaged in other areas which may hinder their ability to participate effectively in the political process; (i) the use of overt or subtle racial appeals in political campaigns; (j) a significant lack of responsiveness on the part of elected officials to the particularized needs of members of the protected class; and (k) whether the political subdivision has a compelling policy justification that is substantiated and supported by evidence for adopting or maintaining the method of election or the voting qualification, prerequisite to voting, law, ordinance, standard, practice, procedure, regulation, or policy. Nothing in this subdivision shall preclude any additional factors from being considered, nor shall any specified number of factors be required in establishing that such a violation has occurred.

4. Standing. Any aggrieved person, organization whose membership includes aggrieved persons or members of a protected class, organization whose mission, in whole or in part, is to ensure voting access and such mission would be hindered by a violation of this section, or the attorney general may file an action against a political subdivision pursuant to this section in the supreme court of the county in which the political subdivision is located.

5. Remedies. (a) Upon a finding of a violation of any provision of this section, the court shall implement appropriate remedies to ensure that voters of race, color, and language-minority groups have equitable access to fully participate in the electoral process, which may include, but shall not be limited to:

(i) a district-based method of election;

(ii) an alternative method of election;

(iii) new or revised districting or redistricting plans;

(iv) elimination of staggered elections so that all members of the governing body are elected on the same date;

(v) reasonably increasing the size of the governing body;

(vi) moving the dates of regular elections to be concurrent with the primary or general election dates for state, county, or city office as established in section eight of article three or section eight of article thirteen of the constitution, unless the budget in such political subdivision is subject to direct voter approval pursuant to part two of article five or article forty-one of the education law;

(vii) transferring authority for conducting the political subdivision's elections to the board of elections for the county in which the political subdivision is located;

(viii) additional voting hours or days;

(ix) additional polling locations;

(x) additional means of voting such as voting by mail;

(xi) ordering of special elections;

(xii) requiring expanded opportunities for voter registration;

(xiii) requiring additional voter education;

(xiv) modifying the election calendar;

(xv) the restoration or addition of persons to registration lists; or

(xvi) retaining jurisdiction for such period of time on a given matter as the court may deem appropriate, during which no redistricting plan shall be enforced unless and until the court finds that such plan does not have the purpose of diluting the right to vote on the basis of protected class membership, or in contravention of the voting guarantees set forth in this title, except that the court's finding shall not bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such redistricting plan.

(b) The court shall consider proposed remedies by any parties and interested non-parties, but shall not provide deference or priority to a proposed remedy offered by the political subdivision. The court shall have the power to require a political subdivision to implement remedies that are inconsistent with any other provision of law where such inconsistent provision of law would preclude the court from ordering an otherwise appropriate remedy in such matter.

6. Procedures for implementing new or revised districting or redistricting plans. The governing body of a political subdivision with the authority under this title and all applicable state and local laws to enact and implement a new method of election that would replace the political subdivision's at-large method of election with a district-based or alternative method of election, or enact and implement a new districting or redistricting plan, shall undertake each of the steps enumerated in this subdivision, if proposed subsequent to receipt of a NYVRA notification letter, as defined in subdivision seven of this section, or the filing of a claim pursuant to this title or the federal voting rights act.

(a) Before drawing a draft districting or redistricting plan or plans of the proposed boundaries of the districts, the political subdivision shall hold at least two public hearings over a period of no more than thirty days, at which the public is invited to provide input regarding the composition of the districts. Before these hearings, the political subdivision may conduct outreach to the public, including to non-English-speaking communities, to explain the districting or redistricting process and to encourage public participation.

(b) After all draft districting or redistricting plans are drawn, the political subdivision shall publish and make available for release at least one draft districting or redistricting plan and, if members of the governing body of the political subdivision would be elected in their districts at different times to provide for staggered terms of office, the potential sequence of such elections. The political subdivision shall also hold at least two additional hearings over a period of no more than forty-five days, at which the public shall be invited to provide input regarding the content of the draft districting or redistricting plan or plans and the proposed sequence of elections, if applicable. The draft districting or redistricting plan or plans shall be published at least seven days before consideration at a hearing. If the draft districting or redistricting plan or plans are revised at or following a hearing, the revised versions shall be published and made available to the public for at least seven days before being adopted.

(c) In determining the final sequence of the district elections conducted in a political subdivision in which members of the governing body will be elected at different times to provide for staggered terms of office, the governing body shall give special consideration to the purposes of this title, and it shall take into account the preferences expressed by members of the districts.

7. Notification requirement and safe harbor for judicial actions. Before commencing a judicial action against a political subdivision under this section, a prospective plaintiff shall send by certified mail a written notice to the clerk of the political subdivision, or, if the political subdivision does not have a clerk, the governing body of the political subdivision, against which the action would be brought, asserting that the political subdivision may be in violation of this title. This written notice shall be referred to as a "NYVRA notification letter" in this title. The NYVRA notification letter shall specify the potential violation or violations alleged and shall contain a statement of facts to support such allegation; provided, however, that failure to so specify shall not be a basis for dismissal of such judicial action, but may affect the calculation of reimbursement pursuant to paragraph (e) of this subdivision. The prospective plaintiff shall also send by first class mail or email a copy of the NYVRA notification letter to the civil rights bureau. For actions against a school district or any other political subdivision that holds elections governed by the education law, the prospective plaintiff shall also send by certified mail a copy of the NYVRA notification letter to the commissioner of education.

(a) A prospective plaintiff shall not commence a judicial action against a political subdivision under this section within fifty days of sending to the political subdivision a NYVRA notification letter.

(b) Before receiving a NYVRA notification letter, or within fifty days of mailing of a NYVRA notification letter, the governing body of a political subdivision may pass a resolution affirming: (i) the political subdivision's intention to enact and implement a remedy for a potential violation of this title; (ii) specific steps the political subdivision will undertake to facilitate approval and implementation of such a remedy; and (iii) a schedule for enacting and implementing such a remedy. Such a resolution shall be referred to as a "NYVRA resolution" in this title. If a political subdivision passes a NYVRA resolution, such political subdivision shall have ninety days after such passage to enact and implement such remedy, during which a prospective plaintiff shall not commence an action to enforce this section against the political subdivision. For actions against a school district, the commissioner of education may order the enactment of a NYVRA resolution pursuant to the commissioner's authority under section three hundred five of the education law. Within seven days of passing a NYVRA resolution, the political subdivision shall send by first class mail or email a copy of the resolution to the civil rights bureau.

(c) If the governing body of a political subdivision lacks the authority under this title or applicable state law or local laws to enact or implement a remedy identified in a NYVRA resolution, or fails to enact or implement a remedy identified in a NYVRA resolution, within ninety days after the passage of the NYVRA resolution, or if the political subdivision is a covered entity as defined under section 17-210 of this title, the governing body of the political subdivision shall undertake the steps enumerated in the following provisions:

(i) The governing body of the political subdivision may approve a proposed remedy that complies with this title and submit such a proposed remedy to the civil rights bureau no later than one hundred twenty days after the passage of the NYVRA resolution. Such a submission shall be referred to as a "NYVRA proposal" in this title.

(ii) Prior to passing a NYVRA proposal, the political subdivision shall hold at least one public hearing, at which the public shall be invited to provide input regarding the NYVRA proposal. Before this hearing, the political subdivision may conduct outreach to the public, including to non-English-speaking communities, to encourage public participation.

(iii) Within sixty days of receipt of a NYVRA proposal, the civil rights bureau shall grant or deny approval of the NYVRA proposal. The civil rights bureau may invoke an extension of up to twenty days to review the proposal.

(iv) The civil rights bureau shall only grant approval to the NYVRA proposal if it concludes that: (A) the political subdivision may be in violation of this title; (B) the NYVRA proposal would remedy any potential violation of this title cited in the NYVRA notification letter and would not give rise to any other violation of this title; (C) the NYVRA proposal is unlikely to violate the constitution or any relevant federal law; and (D) implementation of the NYVRA proposal is feasible.

(v) If the civil rights bureau grants approval, the NYVRA proposal shall be enacted and implemented immediately, notwithstanding any other provision of law, including any other state or local law.

(vi) If the political subdivision is a covered entity as defined under section 17-210 of this title, the political subdivision shall not be required to obtain preclearance for the NYVRA proposal pursuant to such section upon approval of the NYVRA proposal by the civil rights bureau.

(vii) If the civil rights bureau denies approval, the NYVRA proposal shall not be enacted or implemented. The civil rights bureau shall explain the basis for such denial and may, in its discretion, make recommendations for an alternative remedy for which it would grant approval.

(viii) If the civil rights bureau does not respond, the NYVRA proposal shall not be enacted or implemented.

(d) A political subdivision that has passed a NYVRA resolution may enter into an agreement with the prospective plaintiff providing that such prospective plaintiff shall not commence an action pursuant to this section against the political subdivision for an additional ninety days. Such agreement shall include a requirement that either the political subdivision shall enact and implement a remedy that complies with this title or the political subdivision shall pass a NYVRA proposal and submit it to the civil rights bureau.

(e) If, pursuant to a process commenced by a NYVRA notification letter, a political subdivision enacts or implements a remedy or the civil rights bureau grants approval to a NYVRA proposal, a prospective plaintiff who sent the NYVRA notification letter may, within thirty days of the enactment or implementation of the remedy or approval of the NYVRA proposal, demand reimbursement for the cost of the work product generated to support the NYVRA notification letter. A prospective plaintiff shall make the demand in writing and shall substantiate the demand with financial documentation, such as a detailed invoice for demography services or for the analysis of voting patterns in the political subdivision. A political subdivision may request additional documentation if the provided documentation is insufficient to corroborate the claimed costs. A political subdivision shall reimburse a prospective plaintiff for reasonable costs claimed, or in an amount to which the parties mutually agree. The cumulative amount of reimbursements to all prospective plaintiffs, except for actions brought by the attorney general, shall not exceed forty-three thousand dollars, as adjusted annually to the consumer price index for all urban consumers, United States city average, as published by the United States department of labor. To the extent a prospective plaintiff who sent the NYVRA notification letter and a political subdivision are unable to come to a mutual agreement, either party may file a declaratory judgment action to obtain a clarification of rights.

(f) Notwithstanding the provisions of this subdivision, in the event that the first day for designating petitions for a political subdivision’s next regular election to select members of its governing board has begun or is scheduled to begin within thirty days, or in the event that a political subdivision is scheduled to conduct any election within one hundred twenty days, a plaintiff alleging any violation of this title may commence a judicial action against a political subdivision under this section, provided that the relief sought by such a plaintiff includes preliminary relief for that election. Prior to or concurrent with commencing such a judicial action, any such plaintiff shall also submit a NYVRA notification letter to the political subdivision. In the event that a judicial action commenced under this provision is withdrawn or dismissed for mootness because the political subdivision has enacted or implemented a remedy or the civil rights bureau has granted approval of a NYVRA proposal pursuant to a process commenced by a NYVRA notification letter, any such plaintiff may only demand reimbursement pursuant to this subdivision.

8. Coalition claims permitted. Members of different protected classes may file an action jointly pursuant to this title in the event that they demonstrate that the combined voting preferences of the multiple protected classes are polarized against the rest of the electorate.

Credits

(Added L.2022, c. 226, § 4, eff. July 1, 2023. Amended L.2024, c. 216, §§ 3 to 8, eff. Aug. 6, 2024.)

McKinney's Election Law § 17-206, NY ELEC § 17-206
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Election Law (Refs & Annos)
Chapter Seventeen. Of the Consolidated Laws (Refs & Annos)
Article 17. Protecting the Elective Franchise (Refs & Annos)
Title 2. John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York (Refs & Annos)
McKinney's Election Law § 17-208

§ 17-208. Assistance for language-minority groups

Effective: June 20, 2025

Currentness

<[Eff. June 20, 2025.]>

1. Political subdivisions required to provide language assistance. A board of elections or a political subdivision that administers elections shall provide language-related assistance in voting and elections to a language-minority group in a political subdivision if, based on data from the American community survey, or data of comparable quality collected by a public office, that:

(a) more than two percent, but in no instance fewer than three hundred individuals, of the citizens of voting age of a political subdivision are members of a single language-minority group and are limited English proficient.

(b) more than four thousand of the citizens of voting age of such political subdivision are members of a single language-minority group and are limited English proficient.

(c) in the case of a political subdivision that contains all or any part of a Native American reservation, more than two percent of the Native American citizens of voting age within the Native American reservation are members of a single language-minority group and are limited English proficient. For the purposes of this paragraph, "Native American" is defined to include any persons recognized by the United States census bureau or New York as "American Indian" or "Alaska Native".

2. Language assistance to be provided. A board of elections or political subdivision required to provide language assistance to a particular language-minority group pursuant to this section shall provide voting materials in the covered language of an equal quality of the corresponding English language materials, including registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots. Any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, in a covered political subdivision, shall be provided in the language of the applicable language-minority group as well as in the English language, provided that where the language of the applicable language-minority group is historically oral or unwritten, the board of elections or political subdivision shall only be required to furnish oral instructions, assistance, or other information relating to registration and voting.

3. Action for declaratory judgment for English-only voting materials. A board of elections or political subdivision subject to the requirements of this section which seeks to provide English-only materials may file an action against the state for a declaratory judgment permitting such provision. The court shall grant the requested relief if it finds that the determination was unreasonable or an abuse of discretion.

4. Standing. Any aggrieved persons, organization whose membership includes aggrieved persons or members of a protected class, organization whose mission, in whole or in part, is to ensure voting access and such mission would be hindered by a violation of this section, or the attorney general may file an action pursuant to this section in the supreme court of the county in which the alleged violation of this section occurred.

5. This section shall not apply to special districts as defined by section one hundred two of the real property tax law.

Credits

(Added L.2022, c. 226, § 4, eff. June 20, 2025.)

McKinney's Election Law § 17-208, NY ELEC § 17-208
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Election Law (Refs & Annos)
Chapter Seventeen. Of the Consolidated Laws (Refs & Annos)
Article 17. Protecting the Elective Franchise (Refs & Annos)
Title 2. John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York (Refs & Annos)
McKinney's Election Law § 17-212

§ 17-212. Prohibition against voter intimidation, deception or obstruction

Effective: August 6, 2024

Currentness

1. (a) No person, whether acting under color of law or otherwise, may engage in acts of intimidation, deception, or obstruction that affects the right of voters to access the elective franchise.

(b) A violation of paragraph (a) of this subdivision shall be established if:

(i) a person uses or threatens to use any force, violence, restraint, abduction or duress, or inflicts or threatens to inflict any injury, damage, harm or loss, or in any other manner practices intimidation that causes or will reasonably have the effect of causing any person to vote or refrain from voting in general or for or against any particular person or for or against any proposition submitted to voters at such election; to place or refrain from placing their name upon a registry of voters; or to request or refrain from requesting an early mail or absentee ballot; or

(ii) a person knowingly uses any deceptive or fraudulent device, contrivance or communication that (A) pertains to: (1) the time, place, or manner of any election; (2) the qualifications or restrictions on voter eligibility for such election; (3) any voter's eligibility to vote in any election; (4) the consequences for voting or failing to vote in any election; or (5) a statement of endorsement by any specifically named person, political party, or organization; and (B) impedes, prevents or otherwise interferes with the free exercise of the elective franchise by any person, or causes or will reasonably have the effect of causing any person to vote or refrain from voting in general or for or against any particular person or for or against any proposition submitted to voters at such election; to place or refrain from placing their name upon a registry of voters; or to request or refrain from requesting an early mail or absentee ballot; or

(iii) a person obstructs, impedes, or otherwise interferes with access to any polling place or elections office, or obstructs, impedes, or otherwise interferes with any voter in any manner that causes or will reasonably have the effect of causing any delay in voting or the voting process, including the canvassing and tabulation of ballots.

2. Standing. Any aggrieved persons, organization whose membership includes aggrieved persons or members of a protected class, organization whose mission, in whole or in part, is to ensure voting access and such mission would be hindered by a violation of this section, or the attorney general may file an action pursuant to this section in the supreme court of the county in which the alleged violation of this section occurred.

3. Remedies. Upon a finding of a violation of any provision of this section, the court shall implement appropriate remedies that are tailored to remedy the violation, including but not limited to providing for additional time to cast a ballot that may be counted in the election at issue. Any party who shall violate any of the provisions of the foregoing section or who shall aid the violation of any of said provisions shall be liable to any prevailing plaintiff party for damages, including nominal damages for any violation, and compensatory or punitive damages for any intentional violation.

Credits

(Added L.2022, c. 226, § 4, eff. July 1, 2023. Amended L.2023, c. 481, § 33, eff. Jan. 1, 2024; L.2024, c. 216, § 12, eff. Aug. 6, 2024.)

Notes of Decisions (1)

McKinney's Election Law § 17-212, NY ELEC § 17-212
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Election Law (Refs & Annos)
Chapter Seventeen. Of the Consolidated Laws (Refs & Annos)
Article 17. Protecting the Elective Franchise (Refs & Annos)
Title 2. John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York (Refs & Annos)
McKinney's Election Law § 17-218

§ 17-218. Attorneys' fees

Effective: July 1, 2023

Currentness

In any action to enforce any provision of this title, the court shall allow the prevailing plaintiff party, other than the state or political subdivision thereof, a reasonable attorneys' fee, litigation expenses including, but not limited to, expert witness fees and expenses as part of the costs. A plaintiff will be deemed to have prevailed when, as a result of litigation, the defendant party yields much or all of the relief sought in the suit. Prevailing defendant parties shall not recover any costs, unless the court finds the action to be frivolous, unreasonable, or without foundation.

Credits

(Added L.2022, c. 226, § 4, eff. July 1, 2023.)

McKinney's Election Law § 17-218, NY ELEC § 17-218
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Town Law (Refs & Annos)
Chapter 62. Of the Consolidated Laws (Refs & Annos)
Article 4. Town Boards

McKinney's Town Law § 60

§ 60. Town board constituted

Effective: August 17, 2022

Currentness

1. In every town the supervisor and the town council members shall constitute the town board and shall be vested with all the powers of such a town and shall possess and exercise all the powers and be subject to all the duties now or hereafter imposed by law upon town boards and town boards of health within such towns; but it is not intended to extend the power of said boards or officers within the limits of any incorporated village or city, or in any manner to abridge or interfere with the power and authority of the officers of any such village or city within its corporate limits, except as otherwise provided by law.

2. In any town in which a town justice serves as a member of the town board, such town justice shall continue to serve as a member of the town board until the expiration of their term. Thereafter any town justice shall not be a member of the town board and a town council member shall be elected as a member of such town board in place of such town justice except as otherwise provided by the town board by resolution adopted pursuant to the provisions of section sixty-a of this article.

Credits

(Added L.1976, c. 739, § 2. Amended L.1981, c. 123, § 3; L.2022, c. 513, § 18, eff. Aug. 17, 2022.)

Notes of Decisions (9)

McKinney's Town Law § 60, NY TOWN § 60
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

West's Revised Code of Washington Annotated
Title 29a. Elections (Refs & Annos)
Chapter 29A.92. Voting Rights Act

West's RCWA 29A.92.010

29A.92.010. Definitions

Effective: January 1, 2024

Currentness

The definitions in this section apply throughout this chapter unless the context clearly requires otherwise. In applying these definitions and other terms in this chapter, courts may rely on relevant federal case law for guidance.

(1) "At large election" means any of the following methods of electing members of the governing body of a political subdivision:

(a) One in which the voters of the entire jurisdiction elect the members to the governing body;

(b) One in which the candidates are required to reside within given areas of the jurisdiction and the voters of the entire jurisdiction elect the members to the governing body; or

(c) One that combines the criteria in (a) and (b) of this subsection or one that combines at large with district-based elections.

(2) "Cohesive" means that members of a group tend to prefer the same candidates or other electoral choices.

(3) "District-based elections" means a method of electing members to the governing body of a political subdivision in which the candidate must reside within an election district that is a divisible part of the political subdivision and is elected only by voters residing within that election district.

(4) "Polarized voting" means voting in which there is a difference in the choice of candidates or other electoral choices that are preferred by voters in a protected class or a coalition of protected classes, and in the choice of candidates and electoral choices that are preferred by voters in the rest of the electorate.

(5) “Political subdivision” means any county, city, town, school district, fire protection district, port district, or public utility district, but does not include the state.

(6) “Protected class” means a class of voters who are members of a race, color, or language minority group in the state of Washington, as this class is referenced and defined in the federal voting rights act, 52 U.S.C. 10301 et seq.

Credits

[2023 c 56 § 2, eff. Jan. 1, 2024; 2018 c 113 § 103, eff. June 7, 2018.]

OFFICIAL NOTES

Effective date--2023 c 56: See note following RCW 29A.92.720.

Notes of Decisions (3)

West’s RCWA 29A.92.010, WA ST 29A.92.010
Current with all legislation from the 2024 Regular Session of the Washington Legislature. Some sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document

NEW YORK STATE OF OPPORTUNITY.

Division of Local Government Services

Local Government Handbook

Kathy Hochul, Governor
Robert J. Rodriguez, Secretary of State

A Division of the New York State Department of State

COLLABORATORS
	TITLE : Local Government Handbook
ACTION	NAME	DATE	SIGNATURE
WRITTEN BY	Division of Local Government Services	November 16, 2018

REVISION HISTORY
NUMBER	DATE	DESCRIPTION	NAME
7.0.0	November 16, 2018	7th Edition	DoL

Reprint Date: 2023

Contents

List of Figures

List of Tables

Foreword

Since 1975, the Local Government Handbook has provided a brief history and a comprehensive and authoritative overview of our local, state, and federal governments. Now in its seventh edition, this publication is an invaluable tool for citizens, municipal officials, teachers, students, and anyone who seeks to understand the complexity of state and local government.

New York State has a tradition of home rule authority and providing citizens with a strong voice in their local governments. In order to exercise that voice effectively, it is important to understand how our government and officials function at every level. The New York State Department of State Division of Local Government Services assists local citizens and local officials in providing effective and efficient services.

The Local Government Handbook was made possible through the efforts and contributions of experts working at all levels of state agencies. Their work on this important document is greatly appreciated.

Acknowledgments

The Department of State received generous assistance and information from many state entities in the preparation of this 7th Edition of the Local Government Handbook, including:

- Empire State Development
- Division of the Budget
- Legislative Commission on Rural Resources
- New York State Court of Appeals
- New York State Department of Civil Service
- New York State Department of Correctional Services
- New York State Department of Environmental Conservation
- New York State Department Education
- New York State Department of Transportation
- New York State Thruway Authority and Canal Corporation
- New York State Senate Research Service
- Office of the Speaker of the New York State Assembly
- Office of the State Comptroller
- Office of Real Property Services
- Office of Court Administration

Chapter 1

The Origins of Local Government and the Federal System

Local government in New York has evolved over centuries. The governmental forms created by the people reflect functional concerns and a sustained dedication to basic ideas of representative government.

Although we often speak of three "levels" of government, the United States Constitution mentions only two: the federal government and the state governments. The federal system, however, implicitly includes the idea that the states, in the exercise of powers reserved to them by the United States Constitution, would provide for local governments in ways that would take into account local diversities and needs. To the extent that the states have made such provisions in the form of state constitutional grants of home-rule power to the local units, such as in New York, local governments have become, in fact as well as theory, a third level of the federal system.

The experiences of the millions of people who have lived in this state have provided the raw materials for the creation of present-day social and governmental institutions. This chapter reviews some basic considerations that are relevant to the following questions:

- Why did New Yorkers of long ago create local governments?
- What types of governments did they establish?
- What did they believe about governmental power and its uses?
- How did the land, its climate and its diversities contribute to the shaping of governmental patterns?
- How did New Yorkers mesh their governmental patterns with those of the emerging nation?

1.1 The Heritage of History

A historian of county government will find that the familiar office of sheriff existed in England over one thousand years ago — as did the reeve (tax collector) of the shire or "shire-reeve." [1]

Long before early European settlers began to plan their particular forms of governmental organization in New York State, the Iroquois Confederacy existed as a sophisticated system of government. The Iroquois Confederacy

[1] Readers interested in the history of local government in New York will find informative the "Early History of Town Government" in McKinney's Town law, prepared in 1933 by Frank C. Moore. Moore later became Comptroller and Lieutenant Governor of New York, and his essay appeared in all subsequent editions of Mckinney's Town Law. Also of interest is the "History of the County Law," prepared by James S. Drake as an Introduction for the 1950 edition of McKinney's County Law.

included extensive intergovernmental cooperation and operated effectively from the mouth of the Mohawk River to the Genesee River. The Iroquois had found it advantageous to substitute intertribal warfare and strife for a cooperative arrangement in which each of the six tribes carried out assigned functions and duties on behalf of all. The federal arrangement in the United States Constitution was patterned after the Iroquois Confederacy. The familiar patterns of local government in New York today, however, stem largely from the colonial period.

1.1.1 Colonial Government in New York

Established by the Dutch, the first local governments in New York began as little more than adjuncts to a fur-trading enterprise. Under a charter from the government of the Netherlands, the Dutch West India Company ruled the colony of New Netherland from 1609 until the British seized it in 1664.

At first the Dutch concentrated almost wholly on commerce and trade, particularly the fur trade. As early as 1614 and 1615, they established trading posts at Fort Nassau, near the present Albany, and on Manhattan Island. Serious efforts to colonize began in 1624, when New Netherland became a province of the Dutch Republic. Beginning in 1629, the Dutch established feudal manors called "patroonships" to expedite the effort of permanent settlement. This system bestowed vast land grants upon individual "patroons," who were expected to populate their holdings with settlers who would then cultivate the lands on their behalf.

The Dutch rulers of New Netherland initially did not draw a sharp line between their overall colonial or provincial government and that of their major settlement, which was called New Amsterdam. It was not until 1646 that the Dutch West India Company granted what appears to have been certain municipal privileges to the "Village of Breuckelen" — lineal ancestor of the present-day Brooklyn — located across the East River from New Amsterdam. Fort Orange, which later became the City of Albany, obtained similar municipal privileges in 1662. In 1653 the "Merchants and Elders of the Community of New Amsterdam" won the right to establish what was called "a city government." This was the birth of the municipality which would later become New York City.

The Dutch colonial period lasted for more than 50 years. In 1664, during hostilities leading up to the second Anglo-Dutch War, Peter Stuyvesant, the last Dutch governor, surrendered New Netherland to James II of England, who came to be known as James, Duke of York. The British easily adapted the governments previously established by the Dutch to their own patterns and then further modified them to meet the needs of colonial New Yorkers.

Pressed to name a single source for the present pattern of local government in New York, a historian may cite a number of dates and places and argue that each has validity. However, the most prominent single event in the development of contemporary forms of local government in colonial New York was the "Convention" of delegates, which took place in 1665 at Hempstead, in what is now Nassau County. The purpose of the event was to propose laws for the colony which only the year before had passed from Dutch to British rule. The laws proposed by these delegates were adopted for the most part and came to be called the Duke of York's laws. They recognized the existence of 17 towns and created one county, called Yorkshire. Thus, the beginnings of town and county government in New York reflected colonial policies of the English government, certain Dutch patterns, and British colonial experience.

At a historic "General Assembly of Freeholders" convened in 1683 by Governor Thomas Dongan, participants passed a charter outlining the principles by which the colony ought to be governed. Known as the Charter of Liberties and Privileges, its principles were drawn from the Magna Carta and closely resembled our modern constitutions. Among other important actions, the Assembly divided the province of New York into 12 counties. The county became the basis of representation in the Colonial Assembly and also the unit of administration for the system of courts that was established at the same time. The charter was signed by the Duke of York and then vetoed by him five months later when he ascended to the throne as King James II. He abandoned the throne in 1688 and, in 1691, a new assembly elected under Governor Henry Sloughter passed new statutes reasserting the principles contained in the original charter.

The office of town supervisor also originated at this time in a directive to each town to elect a freeholder, to be called the "town treasurer," "to supervise and examine the publique and necessary charge of each respective county." It is of interest to note that the original function of this office, called the "town supervisor" after 1703, was to allocate county expenses among the towns. County boards of supervisors and county legislatures developed from the meetings of the colonial town supervisors for the purpose of apportioning county expenses.

In 1686, the British Crown issued charters known as the "Dongan Charters" to the cities of New York and Albany. A century would pass before another city was chartered in New York. The City of Hudson received its charter in 1785 by an act of the State Legislature and thus became the first city to be chartered in the new United States.

It is apparent that many of the basic patterns, forms, and some of the practices of local government in the Empire State already existed at the time of the Revolution. The first State Constitution, which became effective in 1777, recognized counties, towns and cities as the only units of local government.

The village emerged as a fourth unit of local government in the 1790s through a series of legislative enactments granting recognition and powers to certain hamlets (see Chapter 8 [81]). This trend culminated in 1798, when the Legislature incorporated the villages of Troy and Lansingburgh. Neither now exists as a village; Lansingburgh was long ago absorbed into what has become the City of Troy.

1.2 Some Basic Beliefs

Local governments in the Empire State are more than merely products of four centuries of history; they also reflect basic beliefs and perceptions that are deeply held by past and present residents of the State.

There is a fundamental perception, widely shared among Americans, that although governmental power can be used to benefit the people, it can also be used to harm them. This awareness has fostered a firm conviction in New Yorkers that the people must not only promote the desirable uses of governmental power, they must also carefully protect themselves from the abuse of such power.

For this reason, many protective mechanisms have been put in place to hedge the constitutional and statutory provisions that authorize the use of power for specific purposes. These mechanisms are designed to assure that power will only be used for generally acceptable purposes and in ways which will not infringe unduly upon either the dignity or the established rights of the individuals, on whose behalf the power is presumed to be exercised.

Later chapters will identify and describe such protective measures as the judicial system, due process of law, certain constitutional protections, instruments of direct democracy (such as referenda, citizen boards and commissions), and other mechanisms of representative self government — all of which reflect a basic belief that we must subject governmental power to tight controls if we want to protect the people against tyranny, whether it is the tyranny of a king, a dictator or a political majority.

The people's strong attachment to representative government has greatly influenced the organization and operation of local government. The Charter of Liberties and Privileges (also known as "Dongan's Laws") declared in 1683 that the supreme legislative authority, in what was then the colony, "under his Majesty and Royal Highness should forever be and reside in a Governor, Council, and the people met in General Assembly." The Council and the Assembly, thus endowed with supreme legislative authority, constituted a bicameral (two-chambered) legislature in which at least the Assembly reflected a belief in representative government. In this particular case, representation was by counties. From the very earliest days, the forms of local government in New York have demonstrated the people's firm belief in representative government.

In addition, New Yorkers have always regarded government in a very practical way. Conceiving of governments as instruments to carry out duties and functions to meet specific needs, they created local governments to carry out particular activities. The Constitution, the statutes, and the charters of the cities, a few villages and some counties spell out these duties and functions.

Since New Yorkers have typically created local governments to meet generally recognized needs, it follows that they would see the forms, powers and operational arrangements of local governments as devices to accomplish specific ends. Constitutional amendments, changes in state laws, and local legislative and administrative action have all facilitated the adjustment of form to function. Such measures have kept local governments responsive to the practical needs of the people they serve. Of course, it is not always easy to make such adjustments and later chapters will identify and describe tensions which develop when adjustments lag behind perceived needs.

1.2.1 The Land and the People

The functions of local governments reflect not only the history and beliefs of the people, but also their interests, how they go about the business of conducting their lives and the characteristics of their physical environment.

New York State encompasses an enormous variety of natural environments. While many local governments on Long Island are concerned with beach erosion and mass transit, those of the North Country often focus on such issues as winter recreation development and snow control.

New York State's location and geography has influenced the shaping of local government in several fundamental ways. Occupying a prominent position among the 13 original colonies, New York firmly held its position as the nation expanded over the centuries that followed. More than one-third of the battles of the American Revolution were fought in New York, including two decisive battles in the Town of Stillwater and the resulting British surrender at Saratoga, which collectively became the turning point of the war. In New York City, the Federal Union came into being in 1789.

From the start, New York has been the nation's most important roadway to its interior and its primary gateway from and to the rest of the world. The harbor of New York City and the waterways, railroads and highways of the state have provided the arteries over and through which a large portion of the nation's commerce has flowed. Airline route maps for the United States and the world illustrate the convergence of transportation in New York State and New York City. New York's natural resources and its people have maintained New York's standing as one of the nation's largest manufacturing states, and as the undisputed financial center of the nation.

If there is a single attribute that characterizes New York, it is diversity. Montauk Point at the eastern tip of Long Island, Rouses Point at the state's northeastern corner, and Bemus Point near the southwestern corner share little beyond their designation as "Points," and all abut bodies of water which are themselves diverse — the Atlantic Ocean, Lake Champlain and Chautauqua Lake, respectively.

1.2.2 The Land

New York has an area of 53,989 square miles, of which 6,765 square miles are water. Two masses of mountains — the Adirondacks and the Catskills — stand out in New York's topography, while Long Island, a 1,401-square-mile glacial terminal moraine, juts 118 miles into the Atlantic Ocean from the mouth of the Hudson River at the tip of Manhattan Island. New York is additionally unique in that its 75 miles of shoreline on Lake Erie, more than 200 miles on Lake Ontario and approximately 165 miles on the Atlantic shore make New York the only state that is both a Great Lakes state as well as an Eastern Seaboard state.

The waters of New York drain literally in all directions: southward to the Hudson, Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers; westward to Lake Erie; and northward to Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River. Also, a small part of the state's southwest corner lies in the Mississippi River watershed. Those New York waters drain eastward into the Allegheny River and onward into the Ohio River. The Ohio River empties into the Mississippi River, and ultimately, New York waters discharge into the Gulf of Mexico.

The rivers and waterways of New York greatly influenced the development of local government in the state. Settlement followed the waterways and hence river valleys saw the earliest local governments. Most prominent among the rivers, the Hudson is navigable by ocean-going vessels for nearly 150 miles inland to Albany. Also near Albany, the Mohawk River and the Erie Barge Canal extend westward from the Hudson River to form a water transportation route from eastern to western New York. In the southern tier region of the state the Susquehanna River, and to some extent the Delaware River, provided waterways along which commerce, trade and settlement moved. In the northern and northwestern parts of the state, Lakes Erie, Ontario, and Champlain, as well as the St. Lawrence River provided additional avenues for development.

1.2.3 The Climate

Meteorologists describe the climate of New York State as "broadly representative of the humid continental type which prevails in the northeastern United States, but its diversity is not usually encountered within an area of comparable size." [2] This means that New York enjoys a climate of extremes — hot in the summer and cold in the winter.

Immediately east of Lake Erie, in the Great Lakes plain of western New York, and in those areas influenced by the Atlantic Ocean, such as Long Island, winter temperatures are often substantially more moderate. Long Island and New York City, for example, record below-zero temperatures in only two or three winters out of ten.

To understand the significance of this climatic diversity one need only glance at the average length of the frost-free season, which varies from 100 to 120 days in the Adirondacks, Catskills and higher elevations of the western plateau, to 180 to 200 days on Long Island. With its obvious implications for the agricultural and other economic interests of New Yorkers, the climate directly affects local government. In parts of the state that are referred to as "snowbelt" regions, the average yearly snowfalls exceed 90 inches. In these areas, local government must devote a major portion of its time and municipal budget to snow control on the highways and related challenges of highway maintenance.

1.2.4 The People

Nowhere is the essential diversity of New York more clearly demonstrated than in the ethnic and national origins of its people. From the earliest days of colonial settlement, the multiplicity of people coming to the great harbor at the mouth of the Hudson River nurtured the growth of the nation's largest city. Immigrants from all over the world flowed through the vast funnel of New York City. While many went on to populate the nation, others remained residents of the city or the state. The languages of the world continue to echo on the streets of Manhattan.

For 16 decades prior to 1970, more residents of the United States lived in New York than in any other state. After 1980, New York was supplanted by California as the most populous state Based on 2010 Census data, the New York population of 19,378,102 now ranks third to the California population of 37,253,956 and the Texas population of 25,145,561.[3]

The downstate counties — Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester and the five boroughs of New York City — account for over 61.7 percent of the state's population.

Table 1.1 [6] reveals the diverse sizes of New York's towns and villages. The largest number of towns and villages fall in the 500 to 2,499 population grouping. However, some New York villages have more than 25,000 people and some towns have populations over 50,000.

[2] Climate of New York, U.S. Department of Commerce, NOAA, "Climatography of the United States," No. 60, p.2.

[3] With a 2000 Census population of 18,976,457, New York now ranks third to California and Texas, which have 2000 Census populations of 33,871,648 and 20,851,820, respectively.

Table 1.1: Distribution of New York Towns and Villages by Population Category.[5]

Population	Towns Number	Towns Percent	Villages Number	Villages Percent
Up to 500	31	3.3	73	13.2
500 - 2,499	381	40.9	270	48.6
2,500 - 4,999	213	22.8	103	18.6
5,000 - 9,999	151	16.2	74	13.3
10,000 - 14,999	53	5.7	14	2.5
15,000 - 19,999	24	2.6	10	1.8
20,000 - 24,999	15	1.6	3	0.5
25,000 - 49,999	43	4.6	7	1.3
More than 50,000	21	2.3	1	0.2
Total	933	100	555*	100

Source: 2010 Census of the Population, courtesy of the Empire State Development.

- As of December 31, 2017 the number of villages were 536

These population statistics and those of Figure 1.1 [7] and Table 1.2 [7] reveal a great deal about local government activity. In some areas of the state, the local governments habitually deal with issues of expansion and growth. They must provide basic public services and amenities under conditions of rapid expansion, and somehow finance these activities. In other areas, local governments oversee static communities where little or no growth is taking place. A few areas face issues associated with contraction, where, for instance, excess school facilities are visible in communities with declining populations of school-age children.

[5] Source: 2010 Census of the Population, courtesy of the Empire State Development.

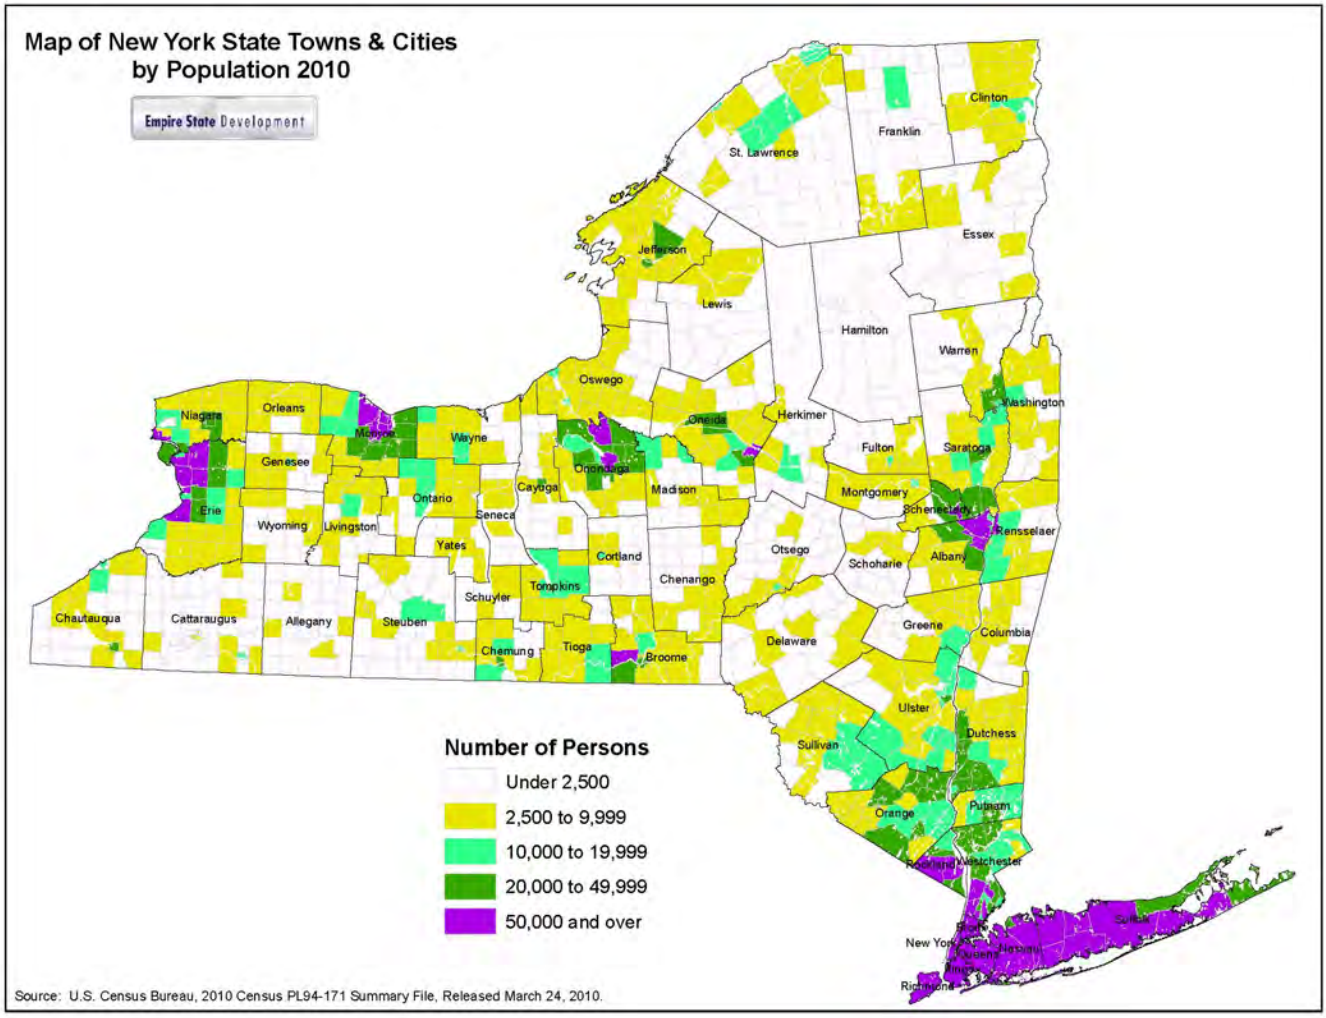

Figure 1.1: New York Counties with Population

Table 1.2: Population Change by Type of Municipality, 2000 - 2010. [7]

	2000	2010	Percent Change	Percent of Total Population
Towns [8]	8,692,132	8,958,225	3.1	46.2
Villages	1,871,947	1,905,581	1.8	9.83
Towns Outside of Villages	6,820,185	7,052,644	3.4	36.39
Cities other than NYC	2,265,897	2,235,187	-1.4	11.53
New York City [9]	8,008,686	8,175,133	2.1	42.19
American Indian Reservations	7,213	9,557	32.5	0.05
Total	18,976,811	19,378,102	2.1	100.0

1.2.5 The People's Interests

If government does indeed exist to serve the practical needs of the people, it follows that local governments should reflect the desires of the people and devote efforts to their concerns.

New Yorkers, like most people, are vitally concerned with issues related to making a living. Government at all levels has a role in maintaining an environment that is conducive to such pursuit. Accordingly, some basic economic statistics concerning New Yorkers are in order.

More than one-sixth of those employed in New York State work for federal, state or local government. Whether or not employees of local school districts are included, local governments employ far more people in New York State than the state and federal governments combined.

The total non-agricultural labor force of the state in October of 2011 was estimated at 8,727,000; a 176,400 job increase over October of 2001. Service industries, including wholesale and retail trade, financial, transportation and other services, lead the way with over 89 percent of the non-agricultural employment in New York State.

New York State agriculture is surprisingly diverse and vibrant. Agriculture is not only a vitally important element of New York's total economic life, it is often times the socio-economic backbone of New York's rural communities. The positive impact that New York State agriculture has on the local economic multiplier estimates far exceeds the local economic multipliers of many other employment sectors.[10] Agriculture also provides many valuable quality-of-life benefits such as open space, habitat protection, agri-tourism and recreational opportunities in the form of hunting, fishing and snowmobiling. In 2007, there were 36,350 farms in New York State, comprising 7.2 million acres of land or about 25 percent of the state's land area. The total value of agricultural products sold in 2007 was $4.4 billion dollars, which represents an increase of 51 percent over 1997 numbers, more than half of which was derived from dairy cattle and milk production.[11]

[7] SOURCE: 2010 Census of the Population, cited in the 2005 Annual Report, Office of the State Comptroller

[8] Includes villages.

[9] Includes the five boroughs of New York City.

[10] Policy Issues in Rural Land Use, Vol. 9, No. 2 December, 1996. Department of Agriculture, Resource and Managerial Economics-Cornell Cooperative Extension.

[11] New York State Agricultural Statistics 2005-2006 Annual Bulletin, printed and distributed by NYS Department of Agriculture and Markets.

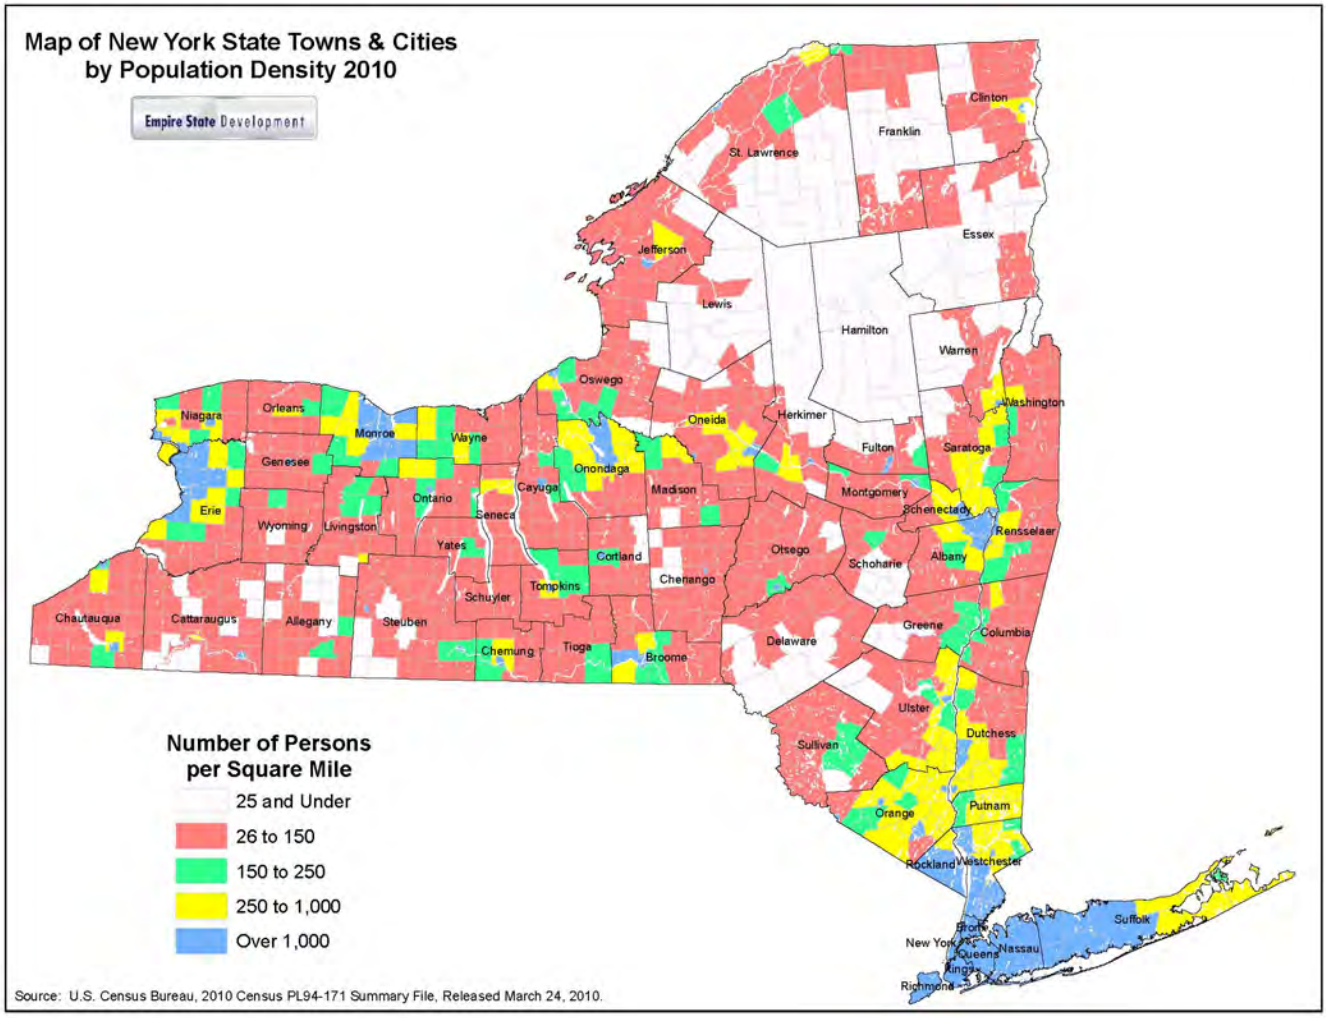

Figure 1.2: Map of New York Towns and Cities by Population Density

1.3 The Federal System

Among the factors that have influenced the nature and development of local government in New York, one of the most important has been the state's role as a member – a charter member – of the federal union called the United States. The state and its local governments are an integral element of the federal system.

At the time the people of the United States were creating the Federal Union in 1787-1789, they deeply feared great concentrations of governmental power. Accordingly, the United States Constitution established more than one principal center of sovereign power.

Although the United States Constitution does not mention local governments, the constitutional fathers were well aware of its existence and importance; it is clear that they saw it as a vital and continuing element of American life. The First Congress made the intention of the framers explicit in 1789 when it proposed the Tenth Amendment – all powers which were not delegated to the national government would rest with the states.

Among other reserved powers, the states were free to subdivide not only their territory, but also their powers, authority, and functional responsibilities, as they believed appropriate to their unique needs and requirements.

Accordingly, every state in its own way has provided for local governments and has endowed them with relatively independent authority to deal with issues that are regarded as local in nature. This has been done within limitations and according to applicable procedures set forth in the United States Constitution. The reapportionment of county legislative bodies to conform with the Equal Protection clause of the 14th Amendment (described in Chapter 5 [45]) provides a clear example.

When, as in New York, the people of a state have endowed their local governments with extensive home-rule authority through State Constitutional provisions, it is possible to regard the local government as a third level of the federal system. By delegation from the people of the state, the local government constitutes a third center of sovereign power, energy and creativity.

1.3.1 The Federal Idea

Local government in New York is more than a mechanical device or a set of legal formulas that channel political power toward specific objectives. It includes beliefs and values that reflect basic ideas and it embodies centuries of practical experience.

In 1789, the people of the several states were aware of and asserted their differences and diversities. If they were to accept a central government, it would have to recognize that the states would retain and exercise powers and decision-making authority in affairs of immediate and direct importance to the people in the places where they lived and worked. The American people still hold firmly to the idea of federalism. It operates both between the national government and the 50 state governments on the one hand, and between the individual states and their local governments on the other.

The federal system should not be viewed exclusively, however, as a means for limiting the concentration of power. It also permits the people to use power most effectively to deal with problems that are special and unique to different regions of such a highly diverse land.

By leaving the states free to organize and empower local government in response to the demands and needs of local areas, the constitutional framers gave a vast nation the capacity to achieve necessary unity without sacrificing useful diversity. Fostering the unity necessary to have a nation and giving free play to diversity at the same time is the essence of the federal system. Over two hundred years of American history demonstrate the suitability of local government for the nation as a whole, and for New York State in particular.

1.3.2 The National Government

A thorough description of the national government would comprise several lengthy books. Here are some fundamental facts:

First, the national government is a government of “restricted” powers. Over the years, presidential, congressional and judicial interpretations have found constitutional authority for adjusting and broadening the specific powers granted to the national government into functional areas that the framers could never have foreseen. Nonetheless, the Tenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, which reserves powers to the states, is still applicable.

Article 1, section 8 of the Constitution grants Congress the power “to regulate Commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states. . . .” Without formal amendment, this has sufficed to accomplish such diverse national purposes as the assurance of orderly air travel, electronic communication by radio, television and (potentially) the internet, and the maintenance of orderly labor-management relations in the nation’s industries.

Because the national powers alone cannot direct many areas of governmental activity efficiently or effectively, there has been a clarification — perhaps even a strengthening in some cases — of the roles of states and local governments in the federal system. We can see this, for instance, in some aspects of governmental action regarding environmental pollution. The national government has not been urged to assume the task of picking up solid waste matter from the curbs in front of homes throughout the country. Nor is this an appropriate matter for the states. The duty to collect solid waste is, by general agreement, a function of local government.

What, then, should the national and state governments do in the area of solid waste management? The national government sets standards, conducts and finances research to develop new technologies for waste disposal, and provides financial assistance to utilize the new technologies to meet the standards. State governments match the research findings to their particular needs, develop specific regulations and operational procedures to meet the standards, devise optional organizational arrangements, and provide technical and financial assistance to local governments with issues related to solid waste management.

Collaborative governmental action can also best handle many other areas of public service.

1.3.3 The Role of the States and Local Government

The states have “residual” powers. In the words of the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution, the states have “the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it....”

Some people assert that the states have “lost” power to the national government, as the latter has moved more and more into areas once regarded as the exclusive province of the states.

To some extent this may be true, but it is also true that state activity has grown. The situation is not so much one of relative gains or losses of power as it is of expanding governmental roles at all levels.

Recent experience shows that even as societal issues become nationwide in scope, they often retain state and local dimensions that make it desirable for the states and local governments to act in concert with the national government.

More and more, contemporary federalism has become a cooperative arrangement whereby national, state and local governments direct their energies toward common objectives. Consider the great highway network that now spans the nation. National, state and local governments all help to finance, build and maintain roads.

Any recent state or municipal budget includes a range of joint national-state-local actions that extends into familiar areas of modern life - public, health, social services, education, environmental pollution, and land-use planning. Local government officials increasingly find themselves cooperating in enterprises where they must coordinate their individual roles with officials who are similarly engaged at other levels of government.

1.3.4 The Contemporary Federal System

For more than a century and a half, people sought to clearly distinguish what the national government could do from what the states could do. The United States Supreme Court filled many shelves with learned discourses and decisions related to this purpose.

In recent decades, relationships within the federal system raise less questions of relative powers, and more questions regarding the portion of an overall governmental objective that each level of government can achieve. Since contemporary social problems have many facets and dimensions that cross governmental lines, it is no longer productive to view the federal system as an arena where antagonists contend for power. It is far more useful to consider which government can perform a given function, activity or duty and produce the best results.

The contemporary questions of federalism ask: how best to spread the costs of certain types of government programs among the tax-payers of the whole nation, how best to channel the dwindling natural resources of the nation to purposes of greatest benefit to all, how best to ensure that the powers of government are not used unfairly for the benefit of one segment of the society at the expense of others, and how best to ensure that citizens have a meaningful role in making decisions that are important to them.

In some ways the contemporary federal system operates in the way the framers envisaged. But we look at the system somewhat differently now than we did in the past. The root question of the national-state relationship has always been the extent to which the system would be centralized or decentralized. Today we often answer this question in terms of how much centralization or decentralization is necessary or desirable to meet agreed upon general objectives.

For local officials, one of the most significant attributes of the contemporary federal system is the array of federal financial grant programs that have been authorized by Congress, especially since World War II. The Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance, https://www.cfda.gov/, available from the Superintendent of Documents, contains more than 1,000 separate federal aid programs. Many, though not all, are available to local governments. The fact that a program appears in the Catalog does not necessarily mean that funds are readily available. Making a federal grant program operational involves three necessary steps. Congress must enact legislation that "authorizes" a relatively large amount of money for the program. Congress must then appropriate all or part of the authorized amount — usually a considerably smaller figure than the full authorization. Finally, the President must release the appropriated funds through the federal budgetary control mechanisms for administration by the designated federal agency.

In recent years, many federal categorical assistance programs have been consolidated into block grants in response to demands for a simpler aid system and greater flexibility in state and local use of federal funds. Despite the continued consolidation of domestic assistance funding into block grants, the dollar amounts allocated to various programs have been continually reduced.

1.3.5 The Future of the Federal System

The resolution of public problems often requires a multi-pronged approach that the federal system not only makes possible, but facilitates. Many of our challenges can only be overcome by focusing the efforts of people at all levels. This belief has renewed the interest in various forms of decentralization, both of authority and of capacity to deal with specific problems. At the same time, it is realized that popular participation in community decision making should always be encouraged in an increasingly pluralistic society.

Proper functioning of the federal system requires citizen participation, continual patience and compromise, and toleration of diverse views and approaches. The federal system of government is far from perfect. However, its inclusion of checks and balances, diffusion of authority over several levels, and paramount respect for overarching constitutional principles, makes it the strongest bulwark against tyranny that has ever been seen in the world.

Chapter 2

The State Government

Government in New York State is essentially a partnership between the State and the local units of government — cities, towns and villages. All of the elements of the State government — the Legislature, the office of the Governor, the courts and the vast administrative structure — are engaged in activities for which the local governments also share responsibility. To understand local government fully, it is necessary to gain a basic understanding of the State government and its far-reaching activities.

Our federal system of government divides responsibilities between the national and state governments. The states, in turn, delegate much power to local governments. The entire system calls for fiscal and political accountability at each government level — from the White House to the village hall.

The interdependence and interrelationships among the Office of the Governor, the State Legislature, state agencies and the local governments are important to know. We must understand the grants of authority, the scope of jurisdiction, the organization and the operative processes of the executive, legislative, judicial and administrative elements of state government in relation to the other elements and to the local government function. The Governor makes policy and provides administrative leadership and direction; the Legislature also makes policy and implements it by enacting legislation and appropriating funds. State agencies carry out the actual programs of state government, and they act as intermediaries and close working partners with local governments. By providing a check and balance on the system, the courts also play an integral part in the operation of state and local government. We will discuss the courts in the following chapter.

2.1 The Legislature and the Legislative Process

The Constitution of the State of New York vests the lawmaking power of the state in the Legislature. It is a bicameral, or two-house, legislative body consisting of the Senate and the Assembly. Bicameralism in the United States today has two major roots: the English Parliament and the “Great Compromise,” which was advanced by the State of Connecticut at the Constitutional Convention of 1787. This compromise resulted in a Congress in which all states have equal representation in the Senate and representation roughly proportional to population in the House of Representatives.

2.1.1 Composition

Article III, section 2 of the State Constitution prescribes the number and terms of senators and assembly members. The number of senators varies, but there must be a minimum of 50. At present the Senate membership numbers

63.[1] Elected for two-year terms, its members are chosen from senatorial districts established by the Legislature.[2] The presiding officer is the Lieutenant Governor, who may not participate in debates and may vote only in the case of a tie. This tie-breaking vote applies only to organizational and procedural matters and may not be exercised on legislation since constitutionally no bill can become law "…except by the assent of a majority of the members elected to each branch of the legislature." [3] The Lieutenant Governor is not regarded as a member of the Senate. In the absence of the Lieutenant Governor, the presiding officer is the President pro tem, whom the Senate chooses from its own membership, or the President pro tem may designate another member to serve as presiding officer. When the presiding officer is a duly elected member of the body, he or she retains the right to vote on all matters.

The State Constitution specifies that the Assembly shall consist of 150 members chosen from single-member districts. Assembly members are elected simultaneously with senators for a term of two years. The presiding officer of the Assembly is the Speaker, who is elected by members of the Assembly.

2.1.2 Eligibility

Article III, section 7 of the State Constitution requires that legislators be citizens of the United States, state residents for at least five years, and residents of the district they represent for at least one year prior to their election. The Constitution does not specify a minimum age requirement for members of the Legislature, but the statutes provide that "No person shall be capable of holding a civil office who shall not, at the time he shall be chosen thereto, have attained the age of eighteen years." [4]

2.1.3 Compensation

Article III, section 6 of the State Constitution allows the Legislature itself, by statutory enactment, to establish rates of legislative compensation. Salary is paid on an annual basis and provision is made for reimbursement of expenses. Neither salary nor any other allowance can be altered during the legislative term in which it is enacted.

2.1.4 Dual Office Holding

The State Constitution bars legislators from accepting, during the term for which they are elected, a civil appointment from the Governor, the Governor and the Senate, the Legislature, or from any city government if the office is created or if its compensation is increased during the term for which the member has been elected.[5]

The Constitution also provides that a legislator elected to a congressional seat or accepting any paid civil or military office of the United States, New York State (except as a member of the National Guard, Naval Militia or Reserve Forces), or any city government shall vacate his legislative seat.

2.1.5 Internal Procedures

The State Constitution contains provisions regarding the general organization of the Legislature. Each house: determines its own rules; judges the elections, returns and qualifications of its members; chooses its own officers;

[1] State Law § 123.

[2] Please note that a concurrent resolution proposing an amendment to the State Constitution on legislative redistricting is now being considered. Article III, § 5-b is a proposed Constitutional Amendment that would authorize an Independent Redistricting Commission composed of 10 appointed members who would determine the district lines for congressional and state legislative offices. The proposal has been passed by the Legislature in 2012 by bill A.9526 and in 2013 by bill A.2086 and will become law if approved by vote of the people in November 2014.

[3] N.Y.S. Constitution, Article III, §14; see also Public Officers Law, §3.

[4] See N.Y.S. Constitution, Article VII; Public Officers Law, §3.

[5] N.Y.S. Constitution, Article III, § 7.

keeps and publishes a journal of its proceedings; and keeps its doors open except when the public welfare may require otherwise.

2.1.6 The Legislative Process

The Legislature convenes annually in regular session on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in January. The Legislature, or the Senate alone, may also be convened in special session at the call of the Governor or upon presentation to the Temporary President of the Senate and the Speaker of the Assembly of a petition signed by two-thirds of the members of each house of the Legislature.

2.1.6.1 Introduction of Bills

The introduction of a bill starts the formal legislative process. In general, members of the Legislature may introduce bills, which often appear simultaneously in both the Senate and the Assembly, beginning on the date the Legislature convenes. However, under Article VII of the State Constitution the Governor can introduce his Executive Budget bills without legislative sponsors. Bills may be presented for "prefiling" in the fall of an even numbered year for formal introduction when the Legislature convenes the following January, which will mark the start of a new two-year legislative term. Budget and appropriation bills that the Governor has submitted pursuant to section 3 of Article VII of the Constitution are delivered on or before the first day of February in each gubernatorial election year, and on or before the second Tuesday following the first day of the annual meeting of the legislature in all other years. The Temporary President designates the final day for unlimited introduction of bills in the Senate in each session. In the Assembly, the final day for the unlimited introduction of bills is the first Monday four weeks before the scheduled end of the Legislative session in the annual legislative calendar in the second year of the term of the Assembly. After that, a bill can only be introduced by the Committee on Rules, by message from the Senate or, with the consent of the Speaker, by members elected at a special election who take office on or after the first Tuesday in May. Otherwise, bills may be introduced at any time by unanimous consent of the House.

2.1.6.2 Committees

The rules of each house provide for the establishment of standing committees to consider and make recommendations concerning bills assigned to the committees according to the subject matter, area affected or specific function to which the bills relate. A bill introduced in the Senate or Assembly is first referred to a standing committee unless, by unanimous consent, it advances without committee reference. A bill begins its course through the Legislature when a majority of the committee membership votes it out of committee.

2.1.6.3 Amendment

Bills may be amended an unlimited number of times. In either house the sponsor may amend and recommit a bill in committee, or the committee may report the bill with amendments. Either house may amend a bill even after it has passed in the other house.

The originating house must concur on amendments added by the second house and repass the bill as amended before it may be transmitted to the Governor. Each time a sponsor amends a bill, it adds a letter of the alphabet, beginning with "A," to the bill number. Either house may substitute, on a motion from the floor, an identical bill from the other house.

2.1.6.4 Action by the Governor

Ordinarily the Governor must sign a bill which has passed both houses of the Legislature before it becomes a law. While the Legislature is in session, the Governor has 10 days, excluding Sundays, to approve or veto a bill. If the Governor signs the bill, or does not take action within the 10 days, the bill becomes a law. If the Governor vetoes the bill, it dies unless it is repassed with the approval of two-thirds of the members of each house in which case it becomes a law notwithstanding the veto.

All bills passed or returned to the Governor during the last 10 days before the Legislature finally adjourns are treated as "30-day" bills. On such bills, the Governor has 30 calendar days, including Sundays, after the Legislature adjourns, within which to act. If the Governor does not act on a bill during the 30-day period, it does not becomes a law, but is deemed vetoed. Such bills are said to have been "pocket vetoed", since the Governor is not required to act upon them and does not have to give reasons for his or her failure to act.

2.1.7 Constitutional Amendments

A concurrent resolution proposing an amendment to the State Constitution is considered by the Legislature in the same manner as a bill. The Legislature must, however, transmit the proposed amendment to the Attorney General for an opinion as to its possible effect upon other provisions of the Constitution. The Attorney General must return the proposal within 20 days. Failure of the Attorney General to render an opinion does not affect the proposal or action thereon. If adopted by both houses, it is sent to the Secretary of State for filing and publication prior to the election of a new Legislature. No action by the Governor is required. The proposal must again be submitted to the next succeeding Legislature. If adopted a second time, it is submitted to the people for consideration and vote. If approved, it becomes part of the Constitution as of the following January first.

A concurrent resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the United States Constitution is treated in the same manner as a bill. If adopted by the Legislature, the resolution is delivered to the New York State Secretary of State, who forwards it to the United States General Services Administration.

2.1.8 Sources of Legislation

A characteristic of our relatively open society in the United States is that an idea for legislation, and indeed a bill itself, may originate from almost any source. Sources of legislative proposals include the Governor's annual legislative program, the legislative programs of the various state departments, individual legislators, special interest groups, municipal associations, local governments, individual citizens and various committees of the Legislature.

2.1.9 Legislation — Local Government Role

The legislative process provides local officials and the public with the opportunity to express their views on pending legislation to the Legislature and the Governor. Individuals can have an impact on legislation; it does not take an accomplished lobbyist to point out to legislators and legislative leaders the advantages or deficiencies of a particular bill. Officials and citizens alike should not be dissuaded from making their views known merely because they are unfamiliar with the legislative process. Local officials can turn to their municipal associations for guidance on legislative matters, and citizens have the opportunity to work with an array of public and special interest groups.

In many cases, the task of making one's views known may begin before specific legislation has been introduced. Legislative commissions and committees frequently hold public hearings on particular problems at which the views of public officials and citizens are sought. Also, individual legislators often actively seek out the views of their constituents as to needed legislation.

The time to make one's views known about a particular bill is while it is under consideration by the Legislature, particularly while the bill is in committee. Written comments given to the committee's chairperson, with sufficient copies for committee members and staff, will help accomplish this purpose.

After a bill is reported out of committee, getting an opinion across may be increasingly difficult, because, if for no other reason, a vast number of bills come before each house. At this point it is best to direct comments to the leaders of each house. Anyone wishing to express views on a bill should remember that even after a bill has passed one house prior to becoming law, the other house must consider it, first in committee and then on the floor. After a bill has passed both houses, comments should be directed to the Governor or his or her Counsel. Here, again, time is of the essence. If passed early in the session, the Governor has 10 days from the time the bill is delivered to him or her in which to sign or veto it.

In the Assembly, the news media and the public are provided access to all standing committee meetings. The committee chairpersons have the option to close meetings or hold executive sessions in accordance with the Open Meetings Law, but roll call votes must be available to the press and to the public as soon as practicable. The public may also check committee attendance records. The Assembly public information office provides the public with a variety of materials relating to standing committees (schedules of meetings, hearings, etc.), sponsor's memoranda on bills, transcripts of debates, daily calendars and other relevant information. The Assembly also maintains a website.

The Senate rules require a great deal of transparency about actions taken by the Senate, its members and its committees. These rules provide that all committee meetings must be open to the news media and the public. Additionally the committee meetings are webcast and archived (available after the meeting is over) on the Senate Standing Committee website (although committee chairpersons may call special closed meetings in accordance with the Open Meetings Law). The rules also provide that agendas for committee meetings must be made available to the news media and to the public, the Thursday prior to the meeting and provide that standing committees must serve all year. The Senate Journal Clerk's office provides, or helps the public to obtain, materials similar to those available from the Assembly Public Information Office. The Senate also maintains a website, which has public information about bills introduced, committee actions, and provides access to all hearings, roundtables, committee meetings and reports and information of interest to the public. Both houses provide a telephone "hotline" service during sessions, from which anyone can obtain information on the current status of any bill.

2.2 The Governor

The Governor is the central figure in the State's public affairs. The Governor initiates programs and executes them; guides the Legislature; appoints and removes key officials; and represents the state and its people. The Governor has a very strong role in the State of New York, since the office includes policy development, legislative leadership, executive control and sovereign responsibilities.

2.2.1 Policy Development

The policymaking role derives from the Governor's responsibilities and position as chief executive officer of the state. The role of chief policymaker is therefore more implied than explicitly stated in either the State Constitution or other state laws. As the state's activities have grown, the Governor's concerns have become broader. Today they include economic and community development, transportation, education, environmental conservation, health, criminal justice, drug abuse, housing and other matters affecting daily life. The people look to the Governor for leadership and direction in these areas, but the Constitution does not explicitly vest the office with such powers. The Constitution mandates that the Governor annually present a "State of the State" message and an executive budget to the Legislature.[6]

[6] N.Y.S. Constitution, Article IV, § 3.

2.2.2 Legislative Leadership

Legislative authority is often required to implement executive policy proposals. To achieve implementation, the Governor has substantial constitutional, statutory and other less-formal resources. The Governor not only has influence with legislators and with the public, but he or she also has constitutional authority to convene and specify the agenda of special legislative sessions. Via messages of necessity, the Governor also has the power to clear bills for consideration. With those powers, the Governor has a key role in establishing the agenda for decision making and in shaping those decisions. The Governor serves as a public leader as well as the chief administrator of the State of New York.

2.2.3 Executive Control

The State Constitution provides that "the executive power shall be vested in the Governor," who "shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed." [7] The Constitution also empowers the Governor to appoint and remove the heads of most state agencies and to propose the budget. These provisions form the basis for gubernatorial direction of state activities.

The executive budget is perhaps the strongest managerial tool that the Constitution provides the Governor. Since 1927, Article VII of the New York Constitution has conferred on the Governor initial responsibility for proposing to the Legislature a coherent statewide plan for government spending. Under this system, the State's budget originated with the Governor, and he or she must submit to the Legislature proposed legislation, including "appropriation bills," to put his or her proposed budget into effect. The Legislature may not alter an appropriation bill the Governor has submitted, except to strike out or reduce items. The Legislature may, however, add items of appropriation, provided that each such item is stated separately and distinctly from the original items and that each refer to a single object or purpose. "Such an appropriation bill shall when passed by both houses be a law immediately without further action by the governor, except that separate items added to the governor's bills by the legislature shall be subject to [the governor's line-item veto]." Gubernatorial direction over administrative agencies centers in the Division of the Budget, which both recommends to the Governor how much state agencies should be allowed in appropriations, and exercises considerable authority over how agencies spend the funds appropriated by the Legislature. The Governor's specific constitutional powers for administrative control, however, are not extensive and do not include complete administrative and managerial powers. Constitutionally, the Governor does not control the entire executive branch. Both the State Comptroller and the Attorney General are popularly elected, and the Legislature chooses the Regents of the University of the State of New York, who supervise the Education Department. The Governor primarily concentrates on policy, and focuses gubernatorial administrative attention on overall direction.

2.2.4 Sovereign Responsibilities

The Governor has power to grant reprieves, commutations and pardons after conviction for all offenses except treason or in cases of impeachment. The Governor also may remove certain local officials, particularly those concerned with law enforcement, and may appoint certain judges and local officials to complete terms in some cases and to fill vacancies pending election in others. Finally, the Governor is commander-in-chief of the state's military and naval forces.

2.2.5 Eligibility

The Governor must be a citizen of the United States, not less than 30 years old, and must have resided in the state for at least five years at the time of election.

[7] N.Y.S. Constitution, Article III, §2; see also Public Officers Law, §3.

2.2.6 Succession

If the Governor dies, resigns or is removed from office, the Lieutenant Governor becomes Governor and, upon succession to the office, the Governor may fill the vacancy created in the office of Lieutenant Governor by appointment.[8] If the Governor is absent from the state, under impeachment, or is otherwise unable to discharge the duties of the office, the Lieutenant Governor acts as Governor until the inability ceases. The Temporary President of the Senate and the Speaker of the Assembly are next in the line of succession, respectively.

2.3 Lieutenant Governor

The Constitution assigns the Lieutenant Governor only the role of serving as President of the Senate. The Governor and the Legislature may, however, make other assignments, and traditionally Governors have turned to the Lieutenant Governor for various kinds of help, ceremonial and otherwise.

2.4 State Comptroller

The State Comptroller is the state's chief fiscal officer. The Office of the State Comptroller: maintains accounts and makes payments on behalf of the State; audits the finances and management of state agencies, New York City and public authorities; examines the fiscal affairs of local governments; provides fiscal legal advice to both state agencies and local governments; trains local officials in fiscal matters; and administers the State's retirement systems. The State Comptroller's Office publishes a wide range of materials on fiscal matters, including annual reports on state and local government finances, as well as an annual volume of legal opinions on local government operations.

2.5 Attorney General

The Attorney General is the state's chief legal officer. The Office of the Attorney General prosecutes and defends actions and proceedings for and against the state, and defends the constitutionality of state law. Local government legal officers may obtain informal, written Opinions from the Attorney General. These Opinions, while not binding on the local government, are nonetheless extremely useful, and are given great weight by the courts. The Attorney General's responsibilities also include supervising the Organized Crime Task Force; protecting consumers against fraud; safeguarding civil rights and the rights of workers; the condemning property; and collecting debts. Specialized bureaus handle: criminal prosecutions, antitrust cases, investor protection, environmental protection, consumer fraud and protection, civil rights, worker protection, regulation of cooperative and condominium housing, charities, and trusts and estate matters.

2.6 State Agencies

The State Constitution provides that there shall be no more than 20 civil departments in the state government. These departments previously were specified by name, but the Constitution was amended in 1961 to eliminate the specification of departments and to set the maximum number of departments at 20.

The Legislature is authorized by law to assign new powers and functions to departments, offices, boards, commissions or executive offices of the Governor, and to increase, modify or diminish such powers and functions. The Legislature is further authorized to create temporary commissions for special purposes or executive "offices" in the Executive Department. Numerous state agencies fall into the latter two categories — that is, temporary commissions and "offices" in the Executive Department. Generally speaking, the heads of all departments, boards and commissions (except the State Comptroller, Attorney General and the members of the Board of Regents) must be appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate, and may be removed by the Governor in a manner prescribed by law. Another exception involves the authority of the Board of Regents to appoint and remove the Commissioner of Education.

[8] See Skelos v. Paterson, 13 N.Y.3d 141 (N.Y. 2009).

A final exception is the Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture and Markets. The Constitution provides that this department head shall be appointed as provided by law, which presently provides for the Governor to make this appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.[9] While this manner of appointment is consistent with the general manner of appointment of department heads, the Governor's appointment power is statutory rather than constitutional.

The administrative structure of New York State government currently consists of 20 state departments and a great number of other agencies, such as public authorities, temporary state commissions, and various divisions and offices in the Executive Department. Each department and agency has been established for a particular purpose, and each functions in a particular way and within a legally prescribed area of operation. Each department directly or indirectly affects local governments of the state in terms of jurisdictional or regulatory authority, advisory services, aid programs and other related functions, depending on its program responsibilities.

Some state agencies were created in response to federal mandates requiring that a particular type of statewide agency handle a particular program. Pressures from within the state for new agencies to furnish specialized services led to the establishment of other agencies. The relationships between these agencies and local governments in the provision of public services are discussed Chapter 15 [163].

[9] N.Y.S. Agriculture and Markets Law § 5.

Chapter 3

The Judicial System

The State Constitution establishes a unified court system for New York State. All courts, except those of towns and villages, are financed by the state in a single court budget. Administration of the courts is the responsibility of a single administrator, having statewide authority, who acts in accordance with policy direction supplied by the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals.

The courts that compose the state's judicial system generally may be arranged on three functional levels: (1) appellate courts, including the Court of Appeals and the Appellate Divisions of Supreme Court; (2) trial courts of superior jurisdiction, including the Supreme Court and various county level courts; and (3) trial courts of inferior jurisdiction, including the New York City civil and criminal courts and various district, city, town and village courts upstate.

The court system in New York is one of the three separate branches of state government (Executive, Legislative and Judicial), it plays an integral role in both state and local governmental operations. The courts are charged with: interpreting provisions of the State Constitution and laws enacted by state and local governments; resolving disputes between private citizens or between a private citizen and a state agency; exercising jurisdiction over persons accused of crimes and other violations of law; and adjudicating claims of individuals against state and local governments.

In 1962, New York made its first court reorganization in more than a century by completely revising the judiciary article of the State Constitution (Article VI). This new article continued or established the various courts that now comprise the New York court system. It also prescribed the number of judges and justices for each of these courts, their method of selection, and their terms of office (see Table 3.1 [22]). The new article also created an administrative structure responsible for administering the courts and for disciplining judges.

In November 1977, the people of the state approved a series of amendments to the judiciary article that: (1) changed the manner in which Judges of the Court of Appeals are selected from statewide popular election to gubernatorial appointment; (2) established a new, centralized system of court administration; and (3) streamlined procedures for disciplining judges. These amendments took effect on April 1, 1978.

Of great importance to the operation of the court system was the 1976 enactment by the State Legislature of a unified court budget for all courts of the unified court system, except town and village courts. Whereas formerly both state and local government sources had funded the affected courts in over 120 different court budgets, effective April 1, 1977, the state funded them entirely in a single court budget.

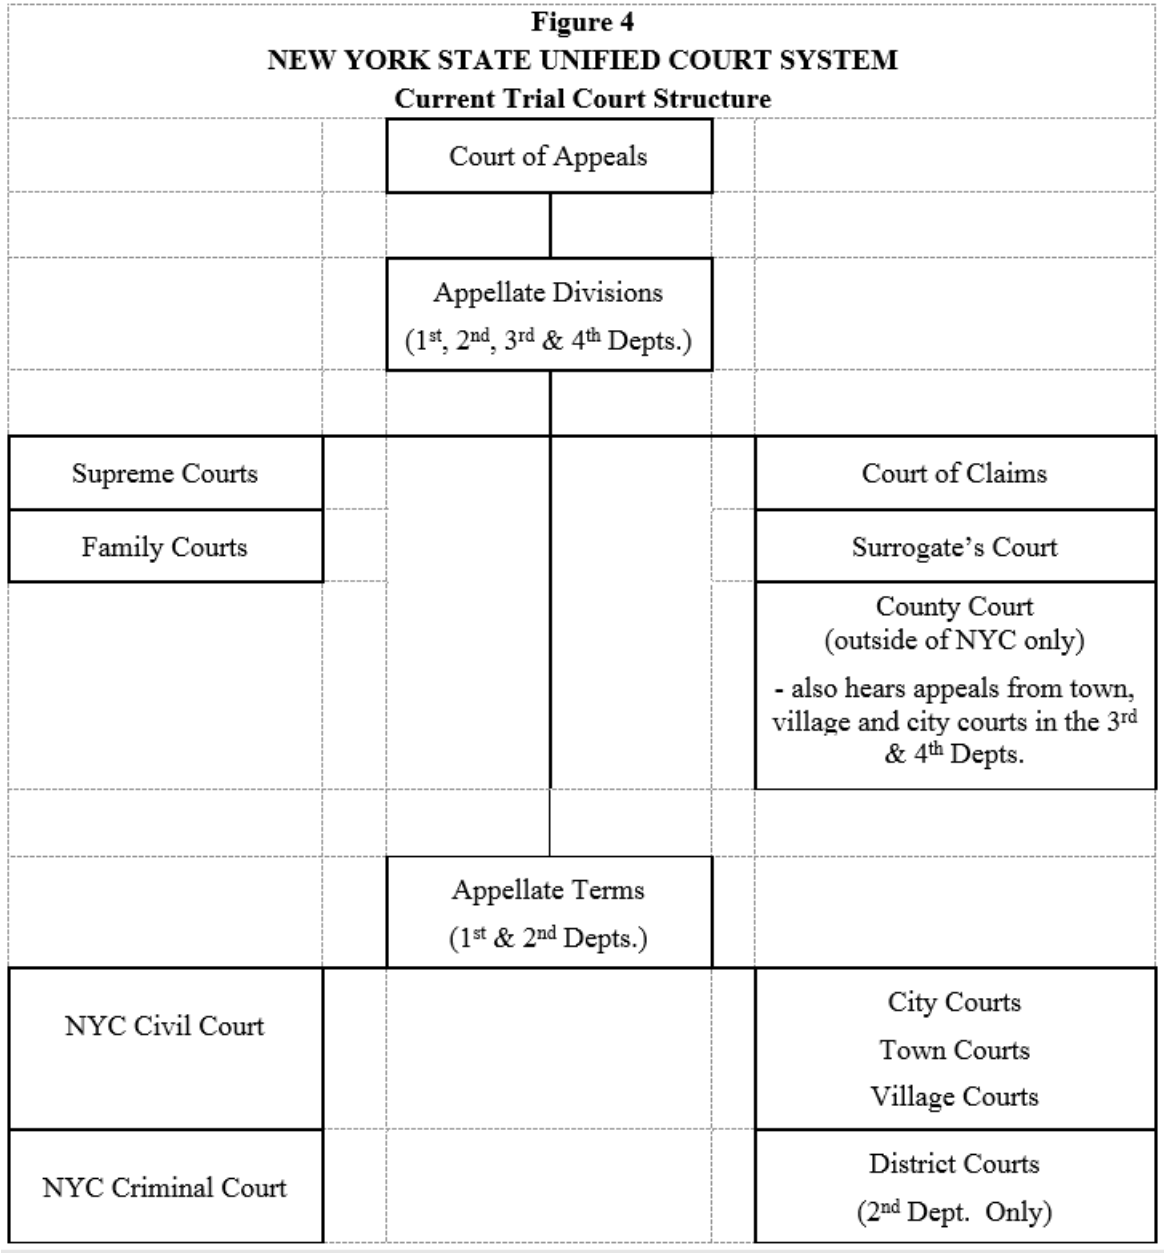

Figure 3.1: New York State Unified Court System Current Trial Court Structure

Table 3.1: New York State Court System Characteristics [1]

Court	Number of Judges	How Selected	Terms
Court of Appeals	7	Gubernatorial appointment with advice and consent of Senate upon recommendation of a commission on judicial nomination	14 years

Table 3.1: (continued)

Court	Number of Judges	How Selected	Terms
Appellate Division	24 permanent; more temporary	Gubernatorial designation from among duly elected Supreme Court justices Court justices	Presiding justice: 14 years, or balance of term as Supreme Court justice Associate justice (permanent): 5 years or balance of term as Supreme Court justice
Appellate Term	Varies	Designated by Chief Administrator of Courts, with approval of presiding justice of the Department, from among duly elected Supreme Court justices	Varies
Supreme Court	328[2]	Elected	14 years
Court of Claims	26	Gubernatorial appointment with advice and consent of Senate	9 years or, if appointed to fill a vacancy, the period remaining in that term
Surrogate's Court	31[3]	Elected	14 years in New York City 10 years outside the City
County Court	129[4]	Elected	10 years
Family Court	127	Mayoral appointment in New York City. Elected outside the City	10 years or, if appointed to fill a vacancy, the period remaining in that term
Civil Court of New York City	120	Elected	10 years
Criminal Court of New York City	107	Mayoral appointment	10 years or, if appointed to fill a vacancy, the period remaining in that term
District Court	50	Elected	6 years
City Court	162	Most elected, some appointed by Mayor of Common Council	Varies
Town Court	Approx. 2,000	Elected	4 years
Village Court	Approx. 570	Elected	Varies; most are 4 years

3.1 Court of Appeals

Established in 1846, the New York Court of Appeals has emerged as a great common law court at the apex of the state court system.

[1]Mandatory retirement at end of year in which Judge reaches age 70, with limited potential exceptions for Supreme, Appellate and Court of Appeals justices.

[2]Includes justices designated to the Appellate Division and Terms. Does not include certified justices of the Supreme Court (which number may vary significantly each year).

[3]Includes only separately elected surrogates.

[4]Includes 72 county judges and 57 multi-hatted county-level judgeships.

In civil cases, appeals may be taken as of right or by permission, depending on the finality of the determination from which an appeal is sought, the issues involved, the court in which the action or proceeding originated, and whether there was disagreement in the court below.

The Court of Appeals consists of a Chief Judge and six Associate Judges. Each judge serves a term of 14 years or until the end of the calendar year in which he or she reaches age 70, whichever occurs first. Vacancies on the court are filled by gubernatorial appointment from among individuals found to be qualified by a nonpartisan Commission on Judicial Nomination. In order to be eligible for appointment, candidates must have been admitted to the practice of law in New York for at least 10 years. All appointments must be approved by the State Senate. The Governor is empowered to designate justices of the Supreme Court to serve as additional Associate Judges on the Court of Appeals during times of heavy caseload.

Generally, all seven judges of the Court of Appeals hear each case, although the Constitution requires only a quorum of five judges. In every case the concurrence of at least four judges is necessary for a decision.

The operations of the Court of Appeals are supervised and controlled by the court itself, the Chief Judge, and the clerk of the court. The Chief Judge serves as the principal officer of the court and oversees its maintenance and operation. The Chief Judge presides at the hearing of arguments and at the conference of judges during which decisions are reached.

3.2 Appellate Division

Established in 1894, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court serves a very important function in the administration of justice in New York State. The four courts of the Appellate Division correspond geographically to the four Judicial Departments on the map in Figure 3.2 [25]. They are constituted as courts of intermediate appellate jurisdiction. For all practical purposes, however, they serve as courts of last resort; 90 percent of the cases they hear are not subsequently reviewed by the Court of Appeals.

Under the Constitution and implementing statutes, appeals in civil matters are taken to the Appellate Divisions from each of the trial courts in the unified court system, except the New York City Civil Court, and district, town, village and city courts outside the City of New York. On an appeal, the Appellate Division reviews questions of law and questions of fact. Appeals in criminal matters are taken to the Appellate Division from County and Supreme Courts. As in civil cases, the Appellate Division reviews questions of fact and questions of law in criminal appeals. The Appellate Division also has original jurisdiction in a limited number of cases.

The State Constitution authorizes the First and Second Judicial Departments to have seven justices while the Third and Fourth Judicial Departments are each authorized to have five justices. The Governor can assign additional justices to each of the courts to assist with the case load. Justices of the Appellate Division, other than the presiding justice, are designated by the Governor from among the justices elected to the Supreme Court. The term of office of each justice is five years, but is limited also to the end of the calendar year in which the justice reaches age 70. However, Associate Justices who have been certified for continued service may be designated to remain on an Appellate Division beyond this retirement age. While the Governor is not generally limited to choosing justices who reside in the Judicial Department where a vacancy exists, the Constitution requires that a majority of the justices designated to sit in any Appellate Division shall be residents of that Department.

The presiding justice of each Appellate Division is designated by the Governor from among the Supreme Court justices in that Department. The term of office of the presiding justice equals the period of time remaining in his or her term as a Supreme Court justice. From time to time, as terms expire or vacancies occur, the Governor makes new designations. The Governor is also empowered to make additional designations during times of heavy caseload, or when a sitting justice is unable to serve for a period of time.

The Appellate Division courts generally sit in panels of five justices, although panels of four justices are authorized. In every case the concurrence of at least three justices is necessary for a decision. The operations of the Appellate Division are supervised and controlled by each court itself, its presiding justice and the clerk of the court.

3.3 Appellate Term

The Constitution authorizes the Appellate Division in each judicial Department to establish an Appellate Term for that Department or a part of that Department. The Appellate Terms are conducted by no more than three Supreme Court justices who have been specially assigned to the terms. Two justices constitute a quorum, and the concurrence of at least two is necessary for a decision. Where they have been established, Appellate Terms exercise jurisdiction over civil and criminal appeals from local courts and certain appeals from county courts. At the present time, Appellate Terms have been established only in the First and Second Departments.

Figure 3.2: Judicial Districts of New York

3.4 Supreme Court

The Supreme Court, as presently constituted, was established in 1846. Formed by the consolidation of the offices of circuit judge and chancery judge with the preexisting Supreme Court, it is now considered a single court having general original jurisdiction in law and equity.

Under this broad constitutional grant of jurisdiction, the Supreme Court may hear any criminal or civil action or proceeding irrespective of its nature or amount, except claims against the State. In practice, however, the Supreme Court outside New York City principally hears civil matters, and the County Courts hear criminal matters. In New York City, Supreme Court sits in both civil and criminal parts.

Justices are elected for 14-year terms by electors within their judicial districts. Retirement is mandatory at the end of the calendar year in which a justice reaches age 70, but justices can be certified for up to three two-year periods after reaching 70. A justice of the Supreme Court must have been admitted to practice law in the State for at least 10 years before assuming office. The number of justices for each judicial district is prescribed by the State Legislature, subject to a constitutionally prescribed maximum number.

3.5 Court of Claims

From 1777 until 1897, New York State did not permit any claim for damages to be asserted against it in any court. During that period, the state was entirely immune from suit in its courts. Individuals suffering injury to their persons or property through the activities of public employees were not, however, wholly without remedy, as they could petition the Legislature for redress in the form of private legislation. In 1817, an administrative remedy was made available for some claims related to the Erie Canal. From this modest 1817 provision, the Court of Claims evolved through many enactments, culminating in Chapter 36 of the Laws of 1897.

Article VI, section 9, of the Constitution provides: “The Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine claims against the state or by the state against the claimant or between conflicting claimants as the legislature may provide.”

Implementing this grant of authority, the Legislature has provided that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction over claims against the State for appropriation of real or personal property, breaches of contract, and torts. The Legislature also has specifically granted the court jurisdiction to hear claims involving: wrongful acts by members of the military; military employees in the operation of any vehicle or aircraft; and claims of imprisoned convicts later pardoned as innocent by the Governor. The court serves as a forum for claims by or against the State and certain public authorities. It does not possess the power to grant claims against political subdivisions such as counties, cities, towns and villages. These claims are litigated in the Supreme Court. The Court of Claims currently consists of 26 judges, who hear claims against the State. The court holds two trial terms each year in each of its 9 districts throughout the state. Claims are usually tried and decided by one judge, unless the presiding judge appoints up to three judges to sit in a particular case. Judges of the Court of Claims are appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, for nine year terms (although retirement is mandatory at the end of the calendar year in which the judge reaches age 70). A judge must have been admitted to practice law in the state for at least 10 years before he or she may begin to serve on the bench.

3.6 County Court

A County Court sits in each of the 57 counties of the state outside the City of New York. Under the Constitution, they have unlimited criminal jurisdiction, but their civil jurisdiction is limited to money claims for not more than $25,000. The County Court also has limited appellate jurisdiction; in the Third and Fourth Judicial Departments, it hears appeals from civil and criminal judgments of justice courts and city courts.

The State Constitution of 1846 declared that there should be elected in each of the counties of the state, except the City and County of New York, one county judge, who should hold office for four years. The term of office has been changed to 10 years, but the office has remained elective. A candidate, to be eligible for election, must have been admitted to practice law in the state for at least five years and must be a resident of the county. Retirement is mandatory at the end of the calendar year in which a judge turns 70 years of age.

The Constitution authorizes the Legislature to provide that the same individual may hold two or all of the positions of county, surrogate and family court judge at the same time. There are many so-called “two-hat” and “three-hat” judges in upstate counties.

3.7 Surrogate’s Court

The existence of the Surrogate’s Court in New York can be traced back to colonial times, when early Dutch officials exercised jurisdiction over estate matters. This practice continued through the British colonial period. The granting of letters of administration and the probate of wills in the State of New York became the responsibility of the Governor. In discharging this responsibility, the Governor was authorized to appoint a delegate to act in his stead. One of the early delegates used the title of “surrogate.”

The Constitution (Article VI, section 12) provides that the Surrogate’s Court shall have jurisdiction over all actions and proceedings relating to:

- the affairs of decedents, probate of wills and administration of estates;
- the guardianship of the property of minors; and
- such other actions and proceedings, not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, as may be provided by law.

In practice, the court’s jurisdiction, which includes such equity jurisdiction as may be provided by law, extends to, among other proceedings: the probate and construction of wills; grants of letters testamentary to executors; grants of letters of administration; proceedings for the payment of creditors’ claims; proceedings by fiduciaries and claimants to determine the ownership of property; proceedings for the payment of bequests; grants of letters of trusteeship; appointment of guardians for infants and their property; and accountings by executors, administrators, trustees and guardians.

The Constitution provides that there shall be at least one judge of the Surrogate’s Court in each county and such number of additional judges as may be provided by law. Each judge of the Surrogate’s Court, also known as a “surrogate,” must be a resident of the county in which the surrogate serves and elected by the voters of that county. The term of office is 14 years within the five counties of the City of New York and 10 years in the other 57 counties. All surrogates are subject to mandatory retirement at the close of the calendar year in which they turn 70 years of age.

There is no constitutional requirement that the surrogate be a separately elected position. The Legislature has provided that where it is not, the county court judge shall discharge the duties of the surrogate, as well as those of the County Court.

3.8 Family Court

Viewed as one of the major accomplishments of the 1962 constitutional reorganization of the judiciary, the Family Court has emerged as a major entity in dealing with difficult issues involving children and families. The court sits in every county in the state outside of New York City, and citywide in New York City.

The Family Court’s jurisdiction is divided between matters that originate as provided by law and those that are referred to it from the Supreme Court. The court’s original jurisdiction includes authority to adjudicate matters related to the:

- protection, treatment, correction, and commitment of minors;

- custody of minors;
- adoption of persons (shared concurrently with Surrogate's Court);
- support of dependents;
- establishment of paternity; and
- proceedings for conciliation of spouses and family offenses (shared concurrently with courts with criminal jurisdiction).

The Family Court, when exercising its jurisdiction over matters referred to it from the Supreme Court, has the same powers possessed by the Supreme Court.

In New York City, judges of the Family Court are appointed by the mayor for terms of 10 years. In counties outside the City of New York, judges of the Family Court are elected by the voters of the counties for terms of 10 years. All judges of the Family Court must retire at the end of the calendar year in which they turn 70 years of age.

3.9 Criminal Court of the City of New York

The Criminal Court of the City of New York was constituted in its present form in 1962. The court has its roots in colonial days and is the product of an evolutionary process that culminated in the abolition of two court systems in the City — the Magistrates Court and the Court of Special Sessions — and their replacement by the Criminal Court of the City of New York. The court now has an authorized complement of 107 judges.

The Criminal Court of the City of New York has jurisdiction to adjudicate misdemeanors and offenses less than misdemeanors, and to conduct pre-indictment felony hearings. Most of the court's business consists of traffic violations, and violations of the Administrative Code of New York City or the Multiple Dwelling Law.

Judges of the Criminal Court must be residents of New York City. They are appointed for terms of 10 years by the mayor. Where a vacancy occurs for reasons other than expiration of a 10-year term, the mayor appoints a judge to fill the position for the balance of the unexpired term. Retirement is mandatory at the end of the calendar year in which the judge turns 70 years of age.

3.10 Civil Court of the City of New York

The Civil Court of the City of New York came into existence on September 1, 1962, when it was established through a merger of the City and Municipal Courts as part of the state's plan of court reorganization. The court has jurisdiction over numerous civil actions, including contracts, actions for personal injury, real property actions, and actions in equity. The State Constitution, however, limits the civil jurisdiction in actions involving money claims to a maximum of $25,000. The Civil Court has a special housing part, instituted in 1972, to assure the effective enforcement of state and local laws for the establishment and maintenance of proper housing standards in New York City.

The Civil Court also has a small claims part. Claimants may present a small claim without being represented by an attorney. Corporations, associations and assignees may not institute actions in the small claims part, although they may be sued as defendants. They may, however, institute small claims in the Court's commercial claims part, which observes the same informal, expedited procedures as the small claims part.

The Civil Court presently consists of 120 judges, selected for terms of 10 years by voters within New York City from "districts" established by the State Legislature. Retirement is mandatory at the end of the calendar year in which a judge turns 70 years of age.

3.11 District, Town, Village and City Courts

Minor civil and criminal litigation, as well as the early stages of major criminal litigation, arising outside New York City are handled by district, city, town and village courts. These courts of "inferior jurisdiction," as they are sometimes called, include some of the oldest of the state's courts — town justices date back to the seventeenth century— and some of the newest — the Nassau and Suffolk District Courts were established in 1937 and 1964, respectfully. The population centers served by courts of inferior jurisdiction range from small cities, villages and towns, many of which have populations under a thousand, to counties having more than one million residents. These courts deal with a variety of matters, including simple traffic offenses, bill collection cases, felony hearings, and complex commercial litigation.

Town and village courts are staffed by full-time or part-time justices, who often are not lawyers. District courts and some of the city courts are staffed by full time judges who are lawyers. Court sessions are held in places ranging from the justice's living room or office, to rooms in town or village halls, to formal court houses. In some localities, court records are kept directly by the judicial officer. In others, records are kept by one or more full-time or part-time clerks.

An initiative to achieve procedural uniformity in the lower courts in New York culminated in the enactment of sections of the Uniform Court Acts, which assure that procedures followed in these courts are substantially the same throughout the state.

3.11.1 Town Courts

The town justice court is the oldest of the "inferior" courts in the state (see also Chapter 7 [69]). Under the original town structure, justices of the peace were members of the town board and thus had legislative as well as judicial functions. The Town Law, adopted in 1934, substituted town councilmen for justices on the town board in towns of the first class. In towns of the second class, justices remained members of the town boards, although the town boards had the option — by resolution subject to permissive referendum — of providing that justices should not be members of the board. In1976, the Town Law was amended again to preclude all town justices from serving on town boards during the tenure of their judicial office. All town justices of the peace formerly ran their courts independently, regardless of the number of justices in the same town. In 1962, however, the Court Reorganization Amendment integrated town justice courts into the unified court system, and the enactment of the Uniform Justice Court Act firmly established the single court concept in each municipality. All justices of a town are considered to be justices of the same court, and the proceedings of one justice are treated as acts of the whole court. The salaries of judicial and non-judicial personnel of a town justice court are funded by the town.

3.11.2 Village Justice Courts

Although villages appeared as local governmental units as long ago as 1790, village justices have not played the same central roles in village organization as justices of the peace played in town development. The constitutional history of the office of village justice, formerly known as the police justice, starts with the Constitutional Convention of 1846. Until then, village police justices apparently were not the subject of general legislation. At the convention, a proposal was made to authorize the Legislature to create inferior local courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction in cities and villages. Today's village justice court traces its roots to that point in time.

A village justice court has the same jurisdiction within the village as a town justice court has within the town. The cost of village justice court operations is funded locally.

3.11.3 City Courts

Since 1846, the Legislature has been authorized to create city courts of limited jurisdiction and to establish the tenure of city judges and the method of their selection. For many years, the resulting legislative enactments were framed as individual court acts, each affecting only one city. In 1988, however, the Legislature combined all provisions of law regulating city courts and their judgeships into a single section of law. Also, as has been done with town and village justice courts and the district courts, the Legislature has established general procedural and jurisdictional regulations in one consolidated statute of general applicability to all city courts in the state outside the City of New York — the Uniform City Court Act.

3.11.4 District Courts

The first district court was established in Nassau County in 1937, under the provisions of the Constitution and the Alternative County Government Law. The only other district court now in existence is the district court of the First Judicial District of Suffolk County, comprising the towns of Babylon, Brookhaven, Huntington, Islip and Smithtown. It was created by the Legislature with the approval of the voters of those towns in 1963.

Although there are only two district courts now in operation in the state, the State Constitution provides that a district court may be established in any area of the state where the local governing body of the affected area requests the State Legislature to establish such court and where both the Legislature and the voters of that area approve its establishment.

3.11.5 Jurisdiction

District, town, village and city courts have limited civil and limited criminal jurisdiction, as defined in the Uniform Court Acts. In general, the civil jurisdiction of these courts is limited to claims for money damages not exceeding $15,000 in the district court and city courts, and $3,000 in the town and village justice courts, and to jurisdiction over summary proceedings for the recovery of real property. Each court also has jurisdiction over small claims, as discussed below. The criminal jurisdiction of these courts is identical to that of the New York City Criminal Court.

3.11.6 Small Claims

Each town, village, city and district court has a small claims part where money claims up to a maximum of $5,000 ($3,000 in town and village courts) may be heard and determined in accordance with more informal court procedures. Special jurisdictional requirements must be met before a suit may be brought in a small claims part. If suit is brought in a town or village justice court, the defendant must reside or have an office for the transaction of business or a regular employment within the municipality in which the court is located. If brought in a city court, the defendant must reside, have an office or be regularly employed within the county in which the court is located. If brought in a district court, the defendant must reside, have an office or be regularly employed within the territory embraced by the court.

City and district courts also have commercial claims parts where money claims up to a limit of $5,000 may be brought by businesses and heard and determined as in small claims parts.

State rules provide for a simple, informal and inexpensive procedure for prompt determination of small claims and commercial claims. Such claims must receive an early hearing and determination, and the hearings must be conducted in such a way as to ensure substantial justice between the parties according to the rules of substantive law. The parties are not, however, bound by statutory provisions or rules of practice, procedure, pleading or evidence.

3.12 Court Financing

Effective April 1, 1977, New York adopted a unified court budget system. Under this system, the state took over the entire non-capital cost of the operation of all courts and court-related agencies of the unified court system, except town and village justice courts.

3.13 Disciplining of Judges

Effective April 1, 1978, new constitutionally mandated procedures for the disciplining of judges were established. A Commission on Judicial Conduct, comprising 11 persons selected from the community by the Governor, the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals, and the leadership of the Legislature, has primary responsibility for the investigation and initial determination of complaints against judges. The Commission may admonish, censure, remove or retire judges against whom complaints are sustained. The Court of Appeals may review all determinations.

The Constitution authorizes two other methods by which judges who are found guilty of misconduct may be removed from office, both of which require action by the Legislature: removal by impeachment and removal by concurrent resolution of the Senate and Assembly. Neither method is frequently used.

3.14 Court Administration

Effective April 1, 1978, the structure of court administration in New York changed considerably. The principal features of the new system include:

- appointment of a Chief Administrator of the Courts by the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals, with the advice and consent of an Administrative Board of the Courts;
- central administrative direction of the courts by the Chief Judge and the Chief Administrator;
- approval by the Court of Appeals of statewide standards and policies governing the operation of all courts;
- promulgation by the Chief Judge, and approval by the Court of Appeals, of a code of conduct for judges; and
- frequent consultation with the Administrative Board of the Courts in court management decisions.

The Chief Administrator has numerous duties. Among the most significant are: preparing the judiciary budget; establishing the terms and parts of court and assigning judges to them; engaging in labor negotiations with unions representing non-judicial employees of the courts; and recommending to the Legislature and Governor changes in laws and programs to improve the administration of justice and court operations. To assist in the performance of these duties, the Chief Administrator has established an Office of Court Administration, staffed by lawyers and management experts. The Chief Administrator has also delegated responsibility to a cadre of administrative judges, each serving on a regional basis.

The Office of Court Administration seeks to reduce the caseload in the state's courts through an alternative approach to resolving problems that develop between people — the Community Dispute Resolution Centers Program. Under the program, which was authorized by the Legislature in 1981 and made a permanent part of the Unified Court system in 1984, the Chief Administrator of the Courts contracts with nonprofit community agencies to provide mediation assistance to help disputants reach mutual agreement. Now operating statewide, these centers take referrals from judges, law enforcement agencies, individuals and others. They handle such matters as animal complaints, breaches of contract, domestic arguments, harassment, landlord/tenant problems, noise complaints, petty larceny, school problems, small claims and ordinance violations.

Chapter 4

Local Government Home Rule Power

The constitutional and statutory foundation for local government in New York State provides that counties, cities, towns and villages are "general purpose" units of local government. They are granted broad home rule powers to regulate the quality of life in communities and to provide direct services to the people. In doing so, local governments must operate within powers accorded them by statute and the New York and United States Constitutions.

The home rule powers available to New York local governments are among the most far-reaching in the nation. The extent of these powers makes the local government a full partner with the state in the shared responsibility for providing services to the people.

Local government in New York State comprises counties, cities, towns and villages, which are corporate entities known as municipal corporations. These units of local government provide most local government services. Special purpose governmental units also furnish some basic services, such as sewer and water services. School districts, although defined as municipal corporations, are single-purpose units concerned basically with education in the primary and secondary grades. Fire districts, also considered local governments in New York State, are single-purpose units that provide fire protection in areas of towns. Fire districts are classified as district corporations. There are other governmental entities which have attributes of local governments but which are not local governments. These miscellaneous units or entities are generally special-purpose or administrative units normally providing a single service for a specific geographic area.

In this country's federal system, consisting of the national, state and local governments, local government is the point of delivery for many governmental services and is the level of government most accessible to and familiar with residents. It is often referred to as the grass-roots level of government.

New York has many local governmental entities that possess the power to perform services in designated geographical areas. While all of these entities fall within the broad definition of "public corporation," [1] only a very small percentage of them are "general purpose" local governments - counties, cities, towns and villages - which have broad legislative powers as well as the power to tax and incur debt. In order to stem the proliferation of overlapping and independent local taxing units, the New York Constitution was amended in 1938 to prohibit the creation of any new type of municipal or other corporation possessing both the power to tax and to incur debt.[2]

While New York has long had counties, towns, villages and cities, their powers have increased greatly in the last century. Originally, each individual local government was created by a special act of the State Legislature. Each

[1] A public corporation includes municipal corporations, district corporations and public benefit corporations. Municipal corporations are cities, towns, villages, counties and school districts. District corporations are territorial divisions of the state with the power to contract indebtedness and to levy (or require the levy of) taxes, such as a local fire district. Public benefit corporations are formed for the purpose of constructing public improvements, such as a local parking authority. District and public benefit corporations are discussed in Chapter 9 [91].

[2] New York Constitution, Article VIII, § 3; see the discussion in Greater Poughkeepsie Library District v. Town of Poughkeepsie, 81 N.Y.2d 574 (1993).

act created the corporate entity, identified the geographical area that would be served by the entity and granted it powers and duties.[3] Over time, the State Legislature adopted general laws to govern the nature and extent of local governments' powers: the Town Law, Village Law, General City Law and the County Law.[4] These general laws still apply, and now are augmented by the overriding constitutional guarantee of "home rule." [5]

A local government's power is primarily exercised by its legislative body. The general composition of legislative bodies for counties, cities, towns and villages is discussed in the individual chapters addressing each particular form of government. The New York State Constitution, however, guarantees and requires that each county, city, town and village have a legislative body elected by the people of the respective governments.[6] Local legislative bodies are granted broad powers to adopt local laws in order to carry out their governmental responsibilities.[7]

Local governments serve a vital link in the relationship between the states and the federal government under the federal system. Many governmental services, whether from the national or state level, have implications for, or call for the involvement of, local government. Additionally, in exercising its broad legislative authority, a local government can profoundly impact the quality of life of its residents. This sharing of responsibility with the other levels of government emanates from the federal and state constitutions and the various statutory grants of power which the State Legislature has passed to local governments.

4.1 Constitutional and Statutory Sources of Local Authority

4.1.1 Federal Constitutional Foundation

Because in the states and, particularly in New York, local governments are integral elements of the federal system, neither state constitutional and statutory provisions nor local government legislative actions may contravene the United States Constitution. It is rare for many of the specific restrictions on state powers and authority, such as those found in Article I, section 10, of the federal Constitution, to affect the day-to-day activities of local government, since these restrictions are designed primarily to ensure the supremacy of the national government in foreign relations. Whenever any local government exercises any power accorded it by either the state constitution or by statute it must take care to consider whether its actions would compromise federal constitutional provisions that define the relationship of the state (and, by implication, any of its political subdivisions) within the federal system, or guarantee personal liberties to individuals. For example, Article 1, section 8 of the United States Constitution provides Congress with the power to "regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." This grant of power over commerce among the States has been interpreted to limit States' power to adversely impact interstate commerce. Local regulatory measures that restrict interstate commerce have been struck down by the United States Supreme Court as unconstitutional.[8]

The federal Constitution also guarantees that certain personal liberties will not be taken away by the federal government or by any state or local government. Of great importance among these are the limitations on state power that derives from the language of the Fourteenth Amendment, which reads in part:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

[3] The 1777 New York State Constitution, Article XXXVI, confirmed land grants and municipal charters granted by the English Crown prior to October 14, 1775. Chapter 64 of the Laws of 1788 organized the state into towns and cities.

[4] A small group of villages still operate under their original special act charters. See Chapter 8 [81].

[5] See the New York Constitution, Article IX, added to the Constitution in 1963 and effective January 1, 1964.

[6] New York Constitution, Article IX, § 1(a).

[7] New York Constitution, Article IX, § 1(a).

[8] A town's solid waste flow control law which restricted interstate commerce by limiting out-of-state firms' entry to the unsorted garbage market was struck down under what is called the "dormant" Commerce Clause. C.& A. Carbone, Inc. v. Town of Clarkstown, 511 U.S. 383 (1994).

It is not practicable here to review the many ways in which the Fourteenth Amendment limits and restricts the exercise of state and local power. Suffice it to say that in exercising the general power to make regulations for the "…health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people…" — the power known as "police power" — the state, as well as its local governments, must be careful to do so only in ways that do not contravene the "due process of law," "equal protection of the laws," and "privileges and immunities" provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment.

4.1.2 State Constitutional Foundation

Local governments look to the State Constitution for the basic law which provides for their structure, powers and operational procedures. Two articles of the State Constitution concern key local government needs: home rule (Article IX) and finance (Article VIII). Article IX, entitled "Local Government," is commonly referred to as the "Home Rule" article of the Constitution, for it provides both an affirmative grant of power to local governments over their own property, affairs and government, and restricts the power of the State Legislature from acting in relation a local government's property, affairs, and government pursuant only special laws upon home rule request or to general laws.[9] This article includes:

- a local government bill of rights;
- local government's power to adopt local laws;
- the duty of the State Legislature to provide for the creation and organization of local governments;
- the duty of the Legislature to enact a statute of local governments;
- restrictions upon the power of the Legislature to act by special legislation in relation to the property, affairs or government of a local government;
- the power of the Legislature to confer additional powers upon local governments.

Article VIII, entitled "Local Finances," contains the constitutional powers pertaining to local taxation and the incurring of debt. Among its provisions are the following:

- prohibition on gift and loan of public money or property to any private undertakings except for the care of the needy;
- prohibition of loan or credit to any public or private individual, corporation or undertaking;
- authorization for two or more local governments to incur debt for cooperative arrangements;
- limitations on the amount of debt that counties, cities, towns, villages and school districts may contract and the purposes for which such debt may be incurred;
- limitation on the creation of a municipal or other corporation which would have both the power to levy taxes and the power to incur debt other than a county, city, town, village, school district or fire district;
- the manner of computation of the amount of debt that may be incurred, including specified exclusions from the total debt-incurring power;
- limitations on the amount of real property taxes that may be raised for local purposes; and
- the power of the State Legislature to restrict the powers of taxation and incurring of debt.

[9] New York Constitution, Article IX, § 2(b)(2).

Table 4.1 [36] indicates other articles of the State Constitution which contain references relating to local government powers and operations or which place restrictions on the State Legislature. Article IX of the State Constitution grants power in two ways: directly, where the grants are, in effect, self-executing and require no further state legislative implementation; and indirectly, where the grants require further legislation before they can be exercised.

Examples of direct grants of power are contained in section 1 of Article IX of the State Constitution, entitled "Bill of Rights for Local Governments." These rights include: (1) the right of a local government to have a legislative body elected by the people; (2) the power to elect or appoint local government officers whose election or appointment is not otherwise provided for by the Constitution; (3) the power to take private property for public use by eminent domain; and (4) the right to make a fair return on local government utility operations.

In some cases, although the Constitution sets forth direct grants of power, these grants may still be subject to state legislative implementation through enactment of procedural steps for their use. For example, Article IX of the State Constitution grants local law powers to local governments, but the exercise of the local law power must be in accordance with the procedures set forth in the Municipal Home Rule Law, which was enacted by the State Legislature to implement the constitutional grants of power.

Some grants of power require additional legislative authorization or direction in order for a local government to utilize them. These grants include: (1) the power to engage in cooperative undertakings as authorized by the Legislature; (2) the power to apportion the costs of governmental services as authorized by the Legislature; and (3) the power for counties to adopt alternative forms of county government under a special law or a general law enacted by the State Legislature.

These constitutional references indicated in the following table are intended only to acquaint the reader with the existence of a constitutional base for local governments. Determining whether a local government may exercise a particular power or function requires a greater familiarity with the complete text of the constitutional provision, the state legislative implementation, and judicial interpretations, if any.

Table 4.1: Constitutional Provisions Relating to Local Government

New York State Constitution	Subject
Article V, §6	Prescribes civil service merit system.
Article V, §7	Prescribes that after July 1, 1940 membership in any pension or retirement system of the state or civil division is a contractual relationship and cannot be diminished or impaired.
Article VI	Provides for the court system.
Article X, §5	Prescribes the power of the State Legislature to create public corporations.
Article XI	Provides for the educational system.
Article XIII	Contains several provisions relating to local office holders, including: filling of vacancies, compensation of constitutional officers and election of city officers.
Article XVI	Contains the general provisions relating to taxing authority.
Article XVII	Contains the basic provisions relating to public assistance and the social services system.
Article XVIII	Provides the authority for the provision of low-rent housing and nursing home accommodations for persons of low income and for urban renewal.

4.1.3 The Statutes

In many instances, the Constitutional provisions described above direct the State Legislature to adopt laws which give local governments the authority to take certain legislative actions, such as entering into inter-municipal agreements or adopting city or county charters. The State Legislature also may delegate to local governments additional authorizations as it deems appropriate or necessary to enable local governments to fulfill their obligations in the partnership of government.

The Legislature has enacted a body of law, known as the Consolidated Laws, containing the statutory provisions from which local governments derive most of their substantive and procedural power. The title of each volume of the law generally suggests the subject matter or level of government to which it has primary application. Table 4.2 [37] indicates the Consolidated Laws most relevant to local government.

Table 4.2: Consolidated Laws Relating to Local Government

Law	Scope
Civil Service Law	The state's merit system; powers and duties of the State Civil Service Commission; provisions for civil service administration at the local level; the Public Employees' Fair Employment Act, commonly referred to as the Taylor Law.
County Law	The structure, administrative organization, and power and duties of county government.
Education Law	The powers of the State Education Commissioner; the structure, organization, and powers and duties of school districts; and the basic programs of state aid to school districts.
Election Law	The conduct of elections.
Eminent Domain Procedure Law	Procedure for acquiring property by exercise of the power of eminent domain.
General City Law	The powers and duties of cities generally, as well as specific authorizations of taxation for the City of New York.
General Municipal Law	Powers and duties pertaining to all local governments and school districts, including provisions relating to the maintenance of reserve funds, planning activities, cooperative undertakings, establishment of municipal hospitals, public bidding requirements, municipal airports, local bingo and games of chance option, urban renewal, annexation, and conflicts of interest.
Highway Law	Construction and maintenance of state highways and arterials; powers of the State Department of Transportation; powers and duties of county and town superintendents of highways; the construction and maintenance of county and town highways, including limitations on expenditures for certain highway-related purposes, as well as state aid programs for highways.

Table 4.2: (continued)

Law	Scope
Local Finance Law	Authorizations and procedures relating to the incurring of debt by counties, cities, towns, villages, school districts, fire districts and district corporations.
Municipal Home Rule Law — Statute of Local Governments	Basic authorizations, requirements and procedures for the adoption of local laws by counties, cities, towns and villages, and the procedures for enactment and revision of county charters and city charters, as well as the Statute of Local Governments.
Public Officers Law	Provisions applicable to state and local officers, including residency requirements, official oaths and undertakings, resignations, filling of vacancies, removal from office, public access to records and open meetings.
Retirement and Social Security Law	State and local retirement systems.
Second Class Cities Law	The organization of cities which were classified as cities of the second class on December 31, 1923. This law has limited application.
Tax Law	General taxation laws of the state and authorizations for sales and use taxes by counties, cities and certain school districts.
Town Law	The structure, organization, provision of services, and powers and duties of towns and fire districts, as well as fiscal procedures and requirements.
Vehicle and Traffic Law	State operation and regulation of vehicular traffic as well as authorizations for regulation by counties, cities, towns and villages.
Village Law	The structure, organization, powers and duties of villages.
Volunteer Firefighters' Benefit Law	Disability or death benefits for firefighters or their families as a result of injuries or death arising from the performance of duties by volunteer firefighters.
Workers' Compensation Law	Workers' compensation benefits for employees of public as well as private employers. Also contains authorizations for self-insurance plans by local governments.

This listing is not a complete compilation of the laws having local government application. Many other laws that have significance either to a particular level of government or to an individual local government are scattered through the statutes. For example: the State Finance Law sets forth the provisions relating to the state's revenue-sharing programs; the Labor Law contains provisions relating to prevailing wage requirements in public works contracts; the Agriculture and Markets Law contains provisions relating to the establishment of agricultural districts, dog regulation and impoundment and sealers of weights and measures; the Correction Law contains provisions relating to supervision and administration of county jails and penitentiaries and state supervisory powers over city jails; the Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation Law contains authorizations for historic preservation and local snowmobile operation regulation; and the Transportation Corporations Law contains local government approval requirements for the formation of private sewer and waterworks corporations. The Social Services Law, Mental Hygiene Law, Real Property Tax Law and Public Health Law are discussed elsewhere in this book.

4.1.4 Statute of Local Governments

Article IX of the State Constitution required the State Legislature to enact a "Statute of Local Governments" in order to grant certain powers to local governments. The granted powers include the power to: adopt ordinances, resolutions, rules and regulations; acquire real and personal property; acquire, establish and maintain recreational facilities; fix, levy and collect charges and fees; and in the case of a city, town or village, to adopt zoning regulations, and conduct comprehensive planning.

The powers granted in the Statute of Local Governments are accorded quasi-constitutional protection by Article IX; a power so granted cannot be repealed, impaired or suspended, except by the action of two successive Legislatures, and with the concurrence of the Governor. Thus, for example, the repeal of village ordinance power by the State Legislature was accomplished by Chapter 975 of the Laws of 1973 and Chapter 1028 of the Laws of 1974.

The Statute of Local Governments reserves certain powers to the State Legislature, even where the exercise of these powers could or would diminish or impair a local power. These include the power to take actions relating to the defense of the state, to adopt laws upon local home rule request, to adopt laws relating to creating alternative forms of county government and to adopt laws relating to matters of overriding state or regional concern.

4.1.5 Limitations on the State Legislature

The powers of the State Legislature are derived from Article III of the State Constitution, as well as from other Constitutional provisions. Additional powers, as well as restrictions thereon, were conferred upon the Legislature by Article IX of the State Constitution, which directs the State Legislature to adopt certain laws necessary to affect the local powers granted by that article. Article IX also restricts the State Legislature from adopting special laws which affect a local government's property affairs or government. Article IX, therefore, serves both as a source of authority for local governments and as a shield against intrusion by the State upon their home rule prerogatives.

The restriction upon the State Legislature's legislative powers is predicated upon the phrases "property, affairs or government" and "general law." The Legislature is specifically prohibited from acting with respect to the property, affairs or governance of any local government except by general law, or by special law enacted on a home rule request by the legislative body of the affected local government or, except in the case of the City of New York, by a two-thirds vote of each house upon receiving a certificate of necessity from the Governor. The definitions of the terms "general law" and "special law" as set forth above also apply in the context of this provision.

4.1.6 Local Laws and Ordinances

Local legislative enactments must be considered in order to fully define the power and authority of a local government. City and county charters originally were adopted by a special act of the State Legislature when a city or county was created. These charters created the municipal corporation and, importantly, directed its organization, its responsibilities and accorded its powers. The Municipal Home Rule Law, pursuant to constitutional direction, authorizes cities to amend their charters and counties to adopt or amend charters by local law.[10] Charters of charter local governments must be consulted in order to ascertain the nature and extent of any power held by that government.[11]

[10] Municipal Home Rule Law, Article 4.

[11] This holds true for any charter village, as well.

Once a local government adopts an ordinance or local law, the government is bound by such legislative enactment until it is amended or repealed. Since local laws may direct that a local government's power be exercised in a certain manner, and, in some instances, may supersede state law (to be discussed later), the local government's local laws and ordinances must be consulted in order to fully define its powers.

4.1.7 Administrative Rulings and Regulations

Local government powers also may be expanded, restricted or qualified by the rules and regulations of state agencies. These rules and regulations are usually adopted as part of the implementation of a state program having local impact or application. Thus, it is advisable to review state regulations on the particular subject in order to ascertain the extent of local authorization in undertaking a particular activity or program.

An example is the promulgation of a local sanitary or health code. While a local government may promulgate such a code, it must first ascertain what areas of regulation have been covered by the State Sanitary Code. The State Sanitary Code and other rules and regulations appear in the Official Compilation of Codes, Rules and Regulations of the State of New York, which is published and continually updated at the direction of the Secretary of State.

4.1.8 Home Rule and Its Limitations

What "home rule" means depends upon the context in which it is used. Home rule in a broad sense describes those governmental functions and activities traditionally reserved to or performed by local governments without undue infringement by the state. In its more technical sense, home rule refers to the constitutional and statutory powers given local governments to enact local legislation in order to carry out and discharge their duties and responsibilities. This affirmative grant of power is accompanied by a restriction upon the authority of the State Legislature to enact special laws affecting a local government's property, affairs or government.

4.1.9 Interpreting Home Rule

Originally, the powers of local legislation were derived from specific delegations from the State Legislature. These delegations concerned specific subjects and were narrowly circumscribed. The courts applied strict rules of construction when called upon to interpret state statutes which delegated legislative power to local governments. However, with the evolution of the broad home rule powers, which culminated in constitutional grants to all local governments in 1964, there emerged a gradual recognition that the rules of strict construction were no longer applicable to the interpretation of such delegated powers. Rather, the same rules of liberal construction applicable to enactments of the State Legislature should be applied to the local law power.

Judicial interpretations of the Home Rule article illustrate the tension between the affirmative grant of authority to local governments and the reservation of matters outside the term "property, affairs or government" of local governments to the State Legislature. In a society where many issues transcend local boundaries, a growing number of matters are considered to be matters of state concern.[12]

The home rule powers enjoyed by local governments in this state are among the most advanced in the nation. By recognizing the extent of their powers and by continuing to exercise them, local governments can best avoid the erosion of such powers. In this fashion, local governments will not only serve the needs of the people, but will strengthen state-local relationships as well.

[12] The most recent home rule cases indicate a growing class of state concerns. City of New York v. State of New York, 76 N.Y.2d 479 (1990); Albany Area Builders Association v. Town of Guilderland, 74 N.Y.2d 372 (1989).

4.2 Local Legislative Power

4.2.1 Forms of Local Legislation

Local legislation may take the form of local laws, ordinances and resolutions.

A local law is the highest form of local legislation, since the power to enact a local law is granted to local governments by the State Constitution. In this respect, a local law has the same quality as an act of the State Legislature, since they both are exercises of legislative power accorded by the State Constitution to representative bodies elected by the people. Indicative of this is the fact that acts of the State Legislature and local laws are both filed with the Secretary of State, the traditional record keeper for State government.

An ordinance is an act of local legislation on a subject specifically delegated to local governments by the State Legislature. Counties do not ordinarily possess ordinance powers and the power of villages to adopt ordinances was eliminated in 1974.

A resolution is a means by which a governing body or other board expresses itself or takes a particular action. Unlike local laws and ordinances, which can be used to adopt regulatory measures, resolutions generally cannot be used to adopt regulatory measures. Exceptions exist to this rule, however, as authorized by the State Legislature. For example, section 153 of the County Law provides that a power vested in a county may be exercised by local law or resolution.

4.2.2 The Local Law Power

Article IX of the State Constitution was implemented in 1964 by the State Legislature through the enactment of the Municipal Home Rule Law, which reiterates and explicates the constitutional local law powers and provides procedures for adopting local laws.

Both the Constitution and the Municipal Home Rule Law provide the following categories of local law powers:

- The power to adopt or amend local laws relating to their property, affairs or government which are not inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution or with any general law;
- The power to adopt or amend local laws, not inconsistent with the Constitution or any general law, relating to specifically enumerated subjects, whether or not these subjects relate to the property, affairs or government of the local government, and subject to the power of the Legislature to restrict the adoption of local laws in areas not relating to property, affairs or government; and
- The State Legislature is expressly empowered to confer upon local governments additional powers not relating to their property, affairs or government and to withdraw or restrict such additional powers.

The phrase “property, affairs or government” is a term of art which has been defined largely by court decisions which have determined what it is not.[13] Even where the subject matter of a local law falls instead within the meaning of “property, affairs or government,” the local law must be consistent with all general state laws and with the Constitution.

The second category of local laws set forth above includes the specifically enumerated topics found in section 10 of the Municipal Home Rule Law. For example, a county, city, town or village may, by local law, modify the powers, qualifications, number, mode of selection and removal, terms of office, compensation and hours of work of its officers and employees. It may: create and discontinue departments of its government; decide the membership and composition of its legislative body; and regulate the acquisition and management of property, the levy collection and administration of local taxes and assessments, and the fixing, levying and collecting of local rental charges and fees. It may also provide for the protection of its environment, the welfare and safety of persons and property within its boundaries, and the licensing of business and occupations.

[13] For example, the phrase “property, affairs or government” is not “matters of state concern”.

Additional powers are conferred upon counties, cities, towns and villages in section 10 of the Municipal Home Rule Law, for example:

- Counties may assign administrative functions to the chairperson of the county legislative body, create an administrative assistant to the chairperson, and provide for the control of floods and reforestation of lands owned by the county;
- Cities may revise their charters, as well as authorize benefit assessments for local improvements;
- Towns may adopt local laws relating to the preparation, making, and confirmation of assessments of real property and the authorization of benefit assessments, consistent with state law. They may also supersede any provision of the Town Law in relation to an authorized area of local legislation, unless such supersession has been restricted by the State Legislature and except for those provisions of the Town Law relating to improvement districts, areas of taxation, referenda and town finances;
- Villages may authorize benefit assessments and may also supersede any provision of the Village Law in relation to an authorized area of local legislation, unless the State Legislature has restricted such supersession.

The courts also have recognized the extent of local law power. In a landmark case, the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, upheld a locally enacted county charter provision that superseded a general state law.[14] Similarly, a town's authority to supersede provisions of the Town Law has been upheld.[15]

It can be readily seen that the grant of local law power to local governments in New York is quite broad.

4.2.3 Restrictions on Local Law Powers

The local law power is not without its limitations. The restrictions upon the exercise of the local law power are as follows:

- A local law cannot be inconsistent with the Constitution or with any general law. The term "general law" is defined in the Constitution as a law enacted by the State Legislature which in terms and in effect applies alike to all counties outside the City of New York, to all cities, to all towns or to all villages. Conversely, a special law is defined as one which applies to one or more, but not all, counties, cities, towns or villages;
- A number of specific restrictions or qualifications are contained in the Constitution or have been enacted by the State Legislature, such as those set forth in section 11 of the Municipal Home Rule Law. This section, for example, restricts the adoption of a local law if it would remove a restriction of law relating to the issuance of bonds;
- Local law power is restricted where the subject of the local law is one considered to be of "state concern." "Matters of state concern" is a phrase born in judicial opinions rather than in the Constitution or statutes. It is a term used by the courts to define what local governments may not accomplish by local law – in other words, what is not within their "property, affairs or government." Matters of state concern are those of sufficient importance to require State legislation. If the matter is to a substantial degree a matter of State interest, it is considered a matter of State concern, even if local concerns are intermingled with the State concerns.[16] Court cases construing the home rule grants have indicated that "state concern" includes such matters as taxation, incurring

[14] Town of Smithtown v. Howell, et al., 31 N.Y. 2d 365, 339 N.Y.S. 2d 949.
[15] Kahmi v. Town of Yorktown, 74 N.Y.2d 423 (1989).
[16] See Adler v. Deegan, 251 N.Y. 467 (1929) and Wambat Realty Corp. v. State of New York, 41 N.Y.2d 490 (1977).

of indebtedness, education, water supply, transportation and highways, health, social services, aspects of civil service and banking. As a general principle, a local government may not adopt a local law relating to a "matter of state concern" unless the Legislature has specifically granted such power by law; and

- Local law power is restricted where the subject of proposed local law action has been preempted by the state. Preemption occurs when the State Legislature specifically declares its intent to preempt the subject matter, or when the Legislature enacts sufficient legislation and regulation so as to indicate an intent to exclude regulation by any other governmental entity. The courts have termed such indication intent to "occupy the field."

4.2.4 Referenda

New York's governmental heritage is that of a representative form of government where most matters are addressed by elected officials. Certain matters of particular importance, however, are set aside to be confirmed by the voters through referenda. These matters generally include approval of Constitutional amendments and bonding authorizations. The preference for a representative form of government also carries through to the local level. Matters may be set for local referendum only when authorized by state statute. Certain local laws, which are subject to mandatory referendum, do not become effective until approved by the voters through a referendum. The referendum requirements that apply to local laws are set forth primarily in sections 23 and 24 of the Municipal Home Rule Law, and are discussed at greater length in Chapter 10 [103].

Chapter 5

County Government

While originally established to serve as instrumentalities of the state existing for state purposes, counties in New York are now full-service general purpose units of government that provide a vast array of services to their residents.

5.1 What is a County?

New York counties started as entities established by the State Legislature to carry out specified functions at the local level on behalf of the state. During the 20th century, county government in New York underwent major changes in function, form and basic nature.

The counties in New York are no longer merely subdivisions of the state that primarily exist to perform state functions. The county is now a municipal corporation with geographical jurisdiction, home rule powers and the fiscal capacity to provide a wide range of services to its residents. To some extent, counties have evolved into a form of "regional" government that performs specified functions and which encompasses, but does not necessarily supersede, the jurisdiction of the cities, towns and villages within its borders.

New York State outside New York City is divided into 57 counties. The five boroughs of the City of New York function as counties for certain purposes, although they are not organized as such nor do they operate as county governments. Unless otherwise indicated, references to counties in this chapter will apply only to those outside New York City. Counties in New York are diverse in population and demographics. The 2010 Census populations of the counties vary from Suffolk County's 1,493,350 to Hamilton County's 4,836. St. Lawrence County is the largest in geographical area, with over 2,700 square miles, and Rockland is the smallest, with an area of 175 square miles. The most densely populated county is Nassau County with more than 4,700 people per square mile, and the most sparsely populated is Hamilton County, with fewer than 3 people per square mile. The population of New York's counties is shown in Table 5.1 [46] and Table 5.2 [48].

Of the state's 57 counties outside New York City, 21 contain no cities. All counties include towns and villages, although the number of each varies widely. For example, St. Lawrence, Cattaraugus and Steuben counties each contain 32 towns, while there are only three towns in Nassau County. Hamilton and Warren counties each contain one village to the 64 villages within Nassau County.

The foregoing statistics demonstrates that not all counties in New York State are alike. The State of New York has some of the most urban and rural counties in the nation, and the interests, concerns and governmental expectations of their residents are similarly diverse.

5.2 Historical Development

The patterns of county government organization in New York were set in colonial times. The "Duke's Laws" of 1665 created "ridings," or judicial districts, which were in effect a system of embryonic counties. In 1683, an act of the first Assembly of the Colony established the first 12 counties — adding 2 to the 10 which had previously come into existence — and created the office of sheriff in each county. These original counties were Albany, Cornwall, Dukes, Duchess, Kings, New York, Orange, Queens, Richmond, Suffolk, Ulster, and Westchester. Cornwall and Dukes were deemed part of Massachusetts after 1691. County legislative bodies began at the same time, when freeholders, later known as supervisors, were elected to represent each town in the establishment of tax rates to defray the costs of county government, including the operation of a court house and a jail.

The reasons for the creation of county governments in the early colonial period appear to have been practical: to improve protection against enemies and to provide a more broadly based mechanism for maintaining law and order. The first duties of county government lay in these functional areas. The sheriffs in the first counties were appointed by the Governor and could serve only one term. The first State Constitution in 1777, which designated counties, towns and cities as the only units of local government, recognized the existence of 14 counties that had been established earlier by the colonial Assembly. Two of those counties were ceded to Vermont in 1790 in the settlement of the New Hampshire land-grant controversy. All of New York's other 50 counties were created by acts of the State Legislature. The state's newest county, Bronx, was established in 1914.

The basic composition of the counties was set in 1788 when the State Legislature divided all of the existing counties into towns. Towns, of course, were of earlier origin, but in that year they acquired a new legal status as components of the counties.

Throughout the nineteenth century, additional counties were created, usually when an area contained approximately 1,000 residents. New counties were typically formed out of existing counties, some of which originally covered vast geographical areas.

Table 5.1: New York State Counties [1]

County	Chief Administrative Official	Legislative Body	Number of Members	Population
Albany*	Executive	Legislature	39	304,204
Allegany	Administrator	Legislature	15	48,946
Broome*	Executive	Legislature	15	200,600
Cattaraugus	Administrator	Legislature	21	80,317
Cayuga	Manager	Legislature	15	80,026
Chautauqua*	Executive	Legislature	19	134,905
Chemung*	Executive	Legislature	15	88,830
Chenango	Chair of Legislative Body	Supervisors	23	50,477
Clinton	Administrator	Legislature	10	82,128
Columbia	Chair of Legislative Body	Supervisors	23	63,096
Cortland	Administrator	Legislature	17	49,336
Delaware	Chair of Legislative Body	Supervisors	19	47,980
Dutchess*	Executive	Legislature	24	297,488
Erie*	Executive	Legislature	11	919,040
Essex	Manager	Supervisors	18	39,370
Franklin	Manager	Legislature	7	51,599

Table 5.1: (continued)

County	Chief Administrative Official	Legislative Body	Number of Members	Population
Fulton	Administrator	Supervisors	20	55,531
Genesee	Manager	Legislature	9	60,079
Greene	Administrator	Legislature	14	49,221
Hamilton	Chair of Legislative Body	Supervisors	9	4,836
Herkimer*	Administrator	Legislature	17	64,519
Jefferson	Administrator	Legislature	15	116,229
Lewis	Manager	Legislature	10	27,087
Livingston	Administrator	Supervisors	18	65,393
Madison	Administrator	Supervisors	20	73,442
Monroe*	Executive	Legislature	29	744,344
Montgomery	Executive	Supervisors	9	50,219
Nassau*	Executive	Legislature	19	1,339,532
Niagara	Manager	Legislature	19	216,469
Oneida*	Executive	Legislature	23	234,878
Onondaga*	Executive	Legislature	17	467,026
Ontario	Administrator	Supervisors	20	107,931
Orange*	Executive	Legislature	21	372,813
Orleans	Administrator	Legislature	7	42,883
Oswego	Administrator	Legislature	25	122,109
Otsego	Chair of Legislative Body	Legislature	14	62,259
Putnam*	Executive	Legislature	9	99,710
Rensselaer*	Executive	Legislature	19	159,429
Rockland*	Executive	Legislature	17	311,687
St. Lawrence	Administrator	Legislature	15	111,944
Saratoga	Administrator	Supervisors	22	219,607
Schenectady*	Manager	Legislature	15	154,727
Schoharie	Chair of Legislative Body	Supervisors	15	32,749
Schuyler	Administrator	Legislature	9	18,343
Seneca	Manager	Supervisors	14	35,251
Steuben	Manager	Legislature	17	98,990
Suffolk*	Executive	Legislature	18	1,493,350
Sullivan*	Manager	Legislature	9	77,547
Tioga	Chair of Legislative Body	Legislature	9	51,125
Tompkins*	Administrator	Legislature	14	101,564
Ulster*	Executive	Legislature	23	182,493
Warren	Administrator	Supervisors	20	65,707
Washington	Administrator	Supervisors	17	63,216
Wayne	Administrator	Supervisors	15	93,772
Westchester*	Executive	Legislature	17	949,113
Wyoming	Chair of Legislative Body	Supervisors	16	42,155

Table 5.1: (continued)

County	Chief Administrative Official	Legislative Body	Number of Members	Population
Yates	Administrator	Legislature	14	25,348

* Denotes a Charter County

Table 5.2: New York City Boroughs/Counties

Borough	Population [2]
Bronx	1,385,108
Kings (Brooklyn)	2,504,700
New York	1,585,873
Queens	2,230,722
Richmond (Staten Island)	468,730

5.3 The Changing Nature of County Government

The basic changes in form, powers and functions, which the counties in New York have been undergoing, have been hastened and facilitated by three major developments:

- The rapid urbanization of many areas of the state after World War II, particularly in the environs of large cities;
- The availability, by general law, of authority for the residents of a county to draft and adopt a home rule charter to provide whatever form of government they consider most appropriate to local needs, and through the charter, to assign to the county government duties and functions they want the county to undertake — within state Constitutional and statutory limitations;
- Basic alteration of the representative base for county legislative bodies resulting from federal and state court rulings requiring that such representation comply with the “one person-one vote” principle.

While county government still must perform as an administrative arm of state government for many purposes, at the same time it must be an independent unit of government exercising powers of its own to meet demands.

As the population spilled out from the central cities of the metropolitan areas, the towns and the counties occupying the periphery had to take on a wide range of new functions, services and duties. As a result, the forms and procedures of county government changed to meet the needs of the metropolitan areas. At the same time, however, the old forms of county government, which largely reflected rural needs and county functions as state administrative units, were retained in areas where they were still appropriate. Even in the latter case, however, it has proven convenient for the state to use the counties in new ways for new purposes in carrying out new state programs and objectives.

[1] County government information courtesy New York State Association of Counties
[3] Source: U.S. Bureau of the Census, courtesy of Empire State Development Corporation

At the present time, most New Yorkers live in counties that are now considered urban because of their population or proximity to a major city. Some counties are marginally urban because of their economic orientation and because people journey to work from those counties to larger metropolitan centers that may be some distance away. This very fact, however, lends an urban aura to those counties even though their primary activities may still have rural characteristics.

5.4 The County Charter Movement

One of the developments that has facilitated the changing nature of county government in New York has been the provision of general law authority for counties to draft and adopt home rule charters by local initiative and action.

Most of the counties of the state still operate, as they did in the past, under the general provisions of the New York State County Law. Even these counties have certain latitude under state law to develop their own organizational structures and to provide for the administration of their services. In fact, a majority of the counties that operate under the County Law have a county administrator or comparable position.

Any county, regardless of size, may gain a much wider scope for local initiative and action through the adoption of a county charter. Table 5.3 [49] lists the 23 charter counties in New York and the year of adoption of their current charter.

Table 5.3: Charter Counties in New York State

County	Date Charter Adopted
Nassau	1936
Westchester	1937
Suffolk	1958
Erie	1959
Oneida	1961
Onondaga	1961
Monroe	1965
Schenectady	1965
Broome	1966
Herkimer	1966
Dutchess	1967
Orange	1968
Tompkins	1968
Rensselaer	1972
Albany	1973
Chemung	1973
Chautauqua	1974
Putnam	1977
Rockland	1983
Sullivan	1999
Ulster	2006
Montgomery	2012
Steuben	2013

The spread of the county charter movement in New York has been a relatively recent phenomenon. In 1937, the Legislature enacted an Optional County Government Law which broadened the scope of local choice as to organization and form. By the early 1950's only three counties — Nassau, Monroe and Westchester — had organized under optional or special charters granted by the State Legislature. Because of the counties indifferent response to this form, in 1952 the Legislature repealed the Optional County Government Law and enacted the Alternative County Government Law, which extended to the counties a choice of four optional alternative forms of government organization. However, no county utilized the provisions of this law. In 1958, Suffolk County was granted an alternative form of county government by special state legislation.

An amendment to the State Constitution in 1959 provided the necessary constitutional basis for locally developed and adopted charters. With the implementing statutes enacted by the State Legislature, the amendment enabled counties to adopt charters that could supersede the governmental structures provided in the County Law. The response was immediate; Erie County in 1959 was the first to adopt its own charter under the new law. In 1961, Oneida and Onondaga Counties followed. Enactment in 1963 of the Municipal Home Rule Law, to which the County Charter Law provisions were transferred, further facilitated the reorganization by charter of county governments. Since that change, the number of counties operating under charters has increased to 23. One of these counties — Herkimer — chose only to reapportion the county legislative body through the county charter method and left intact the organizational arrangements provided under the County Law.

5.4.1 Reform of County Legislative Bodies

A third recent development that significantly impacted county government in New York was the reapportionment of representation in county legislative bodies in response to judicial mandates.

From the earliest days of county government, the county's legislative body — and its executive and administrative elements as well — was a board of supervisors. The board of supervisors consisted primarily of the supervisors of the towns within the county, who were elected solely as town officers at town elections, but who served ex officio as county legislators. In counties containing cities a number of "city supervisors" were elected by city voters, usually by wards, to serve solely as county officials and having no other duties as city officials.

In the early 1960s, the courts found that many of the arrangements in New York for boards of supervisors violated the Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. The basis for this ruling was the fact that each town in a county, small or large, had one vote in the legislative body. Thus, a voter in a town with a population of a hundred wielded ten times more weight in the county legislative body than did a voter in a town of a thousand. Accordingly, the counties were ordered to bring the apportionment of their legislative bodies into compliance with the principle of one person-one vote.

The counties of New York State have used one of two basic methods to comply with the Supreme Court's mandate: weighted voting or districting. Some counties still retain the board of supervisor's arrangement, but with an appropriate weighting of the relative voting strength of each supervisor. Other counties now elect legislators from districts, which may or may not coincide with town lines.

Variations of these two basic methods have been used to accommodate local conditions. In some counties, weighted voting provides that each legislator "casts the decisive vote on legislation in the same ratio which the population of his or her constituency bears to the total population." In others, the weighting simply reflects the represented population. Districting has taken the form of single or multi-member districts or a mix of both.

In many cases the members of the county legislative bodies now occupy their positions in that capacity alone; they are clearly county legislators, elected as such. This is a major change in the basic structure of county government, since it can be argued that until the county had its own independently elected legislative body, it could not truly be regarded as a full unit of local government with its own defined powers and its own authority to utilize those powers in response to countywide needs.

5.5 County Government Organization

Four organizational elements exist in some form and in varying degrees among all counties, both charter and non-charter. These are: (1) a form of executive or administrative authority, either separate from or as a part of legislative authority; (2) a legislative body; (3) an administrative structure; and (4) certain elective or appointed officers who carry out specific optional duties and functions.

5.5.1 Executive and Administrative Authority

5.5.1.1 Non-charter Counties

The County Law, which provides the legal framework for non-charter county government, makes no provision for an independent executive or administrative authority. The executive and legislative authority remain joined in the legislative body, which may exercise that function in different ways. The legislative body may organize its committee structure around the functional areas of county government; each committee or its chair exercises a certain amount of supervisory or administrative authority on behalf of the legislative body over the operational arrangements for the provision of the specific service or activity. The legislature may also delegate to its chair a substantial amount of administrative authority to be exercised on its behalf.

As long as the functions of county government were relatively few and simple, such arrangements assured the legislature of direct information about day-to-day county operations. As county functions and programs increased in number, diversified in kind, and expanded enormously in both complexity and cost, this fragmentation of administrative authority often fell short of providing necessary overall supervision and coordinated direction. Partly to correct this inadequacy, the county charter movement spread rapidly during the 1950's and 1960's among the larger and rapidly urbanizing counties of the state.

In addition to the internal arrangements whereby a county legislative body may exercise a certain amount of executive and administrative authority, several provisions of law authorize the county legislature to establish the office of county administrator or a similar office to carry out, on behalf of the legislature, certain administrative functions.

The first of these provisions is section 10(1)(a)(1) of the Municipal Home Rule Law, which authorizes local governments to enact local laws relating to the powers, duties, qualifications, number, mode of selection and removal, and terms of office of their officers and employees. Under this provision, a county may create the office of county administrator or manager, and assign to the office certain administrative functions and duties to be performed on behalf of the county legislature.

A county legislature should keep two factors in mind when creating such an office. The first is to determine whether the powers and functions to be assigned to the office would either diminish the powers of any elected county official or transfer to such an office any powers and duties presently vested by law in other county offices. In such situations, the Municipal Home Rule Law provides for a mandatory referendum. The second is to determine how far the county legislature is empowered to go in assigning various functions and duties to the office of county administrator. At what point will the legislature, in effect, be enacting an alternative form of county government? In other words, how far can the county go in assigning powers and functions before it becomes necessary to enact a county charter?

Another option is found in the Municipal Home Rule Law, section 10(1)(b)(4), which authorizes a county to create by local law the position of administrative assistant to the chairman of the board of supervisors. While such a law may assign specified administrative functions, powers, or duties to this office the board must remain the final authority with respect to such administrative functions and duties.

Finally, Section 204 of the County Law provides that the county legislative body may establish the position of "executive assistant" by local law, resolution, or by inclusion in the county budget.

The foregoing illustrates that a county government without a charter still has a number of options through which it can provide itself with a certain amount of administrative leadership and day-to-day direction. However, the legislative body must retain the executive authority generally embodied in making policy and developing the annual budget.

5.5.1.2 Charter Counties

The principal difference between a county government operating pursuant to the County Law and one operating pursuant to a charter is that a county charter ordinarily provides for an executive or administrator, independent of the legislature, who administers the day-to-day affairs of county government. Of the 23 charter counties in the state, 18 have elected executives, while 3 have professional managers, and 2 have administrators.

Voters in the charter counties of New York, in most cases, have chosen the elected executive form of county government organization. The creation of the office of elected executive provides the county with potentially strong leadership, because the executive is elected by the voters of the entire county. Thus, the executive operates from a strong political base to speak for the county, and to exercise leadership in relation to the legislative body. This principle holds true even where the charter does not endow the executive with extensive powers.

The elected executive also provides a focus of public attention in county government that is lacking in the organization under the County Law. Like elected executives at other levels, the county executive operates under constant scrutiny.

Under most county charters, the elected county executive may secure additional professional administrative assistance, subject to appropriated funds. For example, the executive may provide, within the annual appropriation, for the creation of the office of deputy county executive for administration or for an executive assistant to carry out responsibilities that may be delegated by the executive.

One of the most influential elements of the elected executive's authority is the budgetary power, an essential tool of executive participation in policy development and in strong administration. Through the framing of an executive budget, the county executive establishes and recommends to the county legislature priorities among programs. If they are approved by the legislative body, these priorities provide a direction for the implementation of policies.

Another important element of the authority of the county executive or county manager in charter counties is the power to appoint and remove department heads. The charter may allow the executive to exercise this authority without confirmation or approval by the legislative body, and in other cases, the charter may require the confirmation or approval of the action. In either case, the executive must exercise this authority within the scope of the applicable civil service laws as described in Chapter 13 [143].

Initially, the size of a county's population has much to do with whether the county's voters believe is necessary to provide the county with executive leadership and day-to-day direction of operations by adopting a locally drafted charter. It is possible, however, that other considerations, such as fiscal concerns, are of equal importance. Without a strengthening of executive capacity, the urbanizing counties of the state found themselves severely handicapped in meeting and dealing with new and expanding service demands. Legal authority to draft and adopt a charter locally, one specifically tailored to fit local conditions and requirements, has facilitated the efforts of counties to meet their rapidly growing responsibilities as true units of local government.

5.5.2 County Legislative Bodies

Every county has power to enact laws, adopt resolutions, and take other actions having the force of law within its jurisdiction. This power, along with the related authority to make policy determinations, is vested in a legislative body.

The legislative bodies of the counties are designated by various names, including Board of Supervisors, Board of Representatives, Board of Legislators, and County Legislature. Originally, the legislative bodies of all counties were boards of supervisors, consisting of the town and city supervisors. With the adoption of various reapportionment plans and with the spread of home rule charters, however, other designations were developed according to local preference.

Table 5.1 [46] shows the basic makeup of county legislative bodies, along with their 2010 Census populations. This table illustrates that neither the size of a county's population nor the fact of having a charter have little if anything to do with the size of a county's legislative body. Legislatures range in size from seven members in Franklin and Orleans Counties to 39 in Albany County.

Generally, members of county legislative bodies are elected for either two or four year terms. In counties that have retained a Board of Supervisors, the term of office for each member is two years, except in towns that have exercised the option under the Town Law to extend the term to four years. Of the 57 county legislative bodies, 36 conduct scheduled meetings once a month and 17 meet twice a month. Other meeting patterns are practiced by three counties. One legislative body, Herkimer, conducts a scheduled meeting quarterly but holds additional meetings as needed. All of the legislative bodies convene for special meetings, a fairly frequent occurrence in many counties.

Since the role of the county as a true unit of local government continues to evolve, the legislative bodies of New York counties are continuing to change. Their committee structures, rules of procedure, and patterns of action may reflect some practices of earlier times, but it is clear that adjustments are under way. The heightened responsibility of members of county legislative bodies is indicated by the fact that the budgets they must consider and adopt each year range from tens of millions of dollars in small counties to hundreds of millions in large counties. Several counties have budgets in excess of one billion dollars, and Nassau County's budget exceeds three billion dollars.

5.5.3 Administrative Structure

The administrative structures of county governments in New York are generally similar. The basic organizational arrangements and operational procedures of county administration were set at a time when the functions and duties were few, relatively simple and largely reflective of state objectives. In some counties with smaller and homogeneous populations, the traditional arrangements still provide an adequate administrative structure.

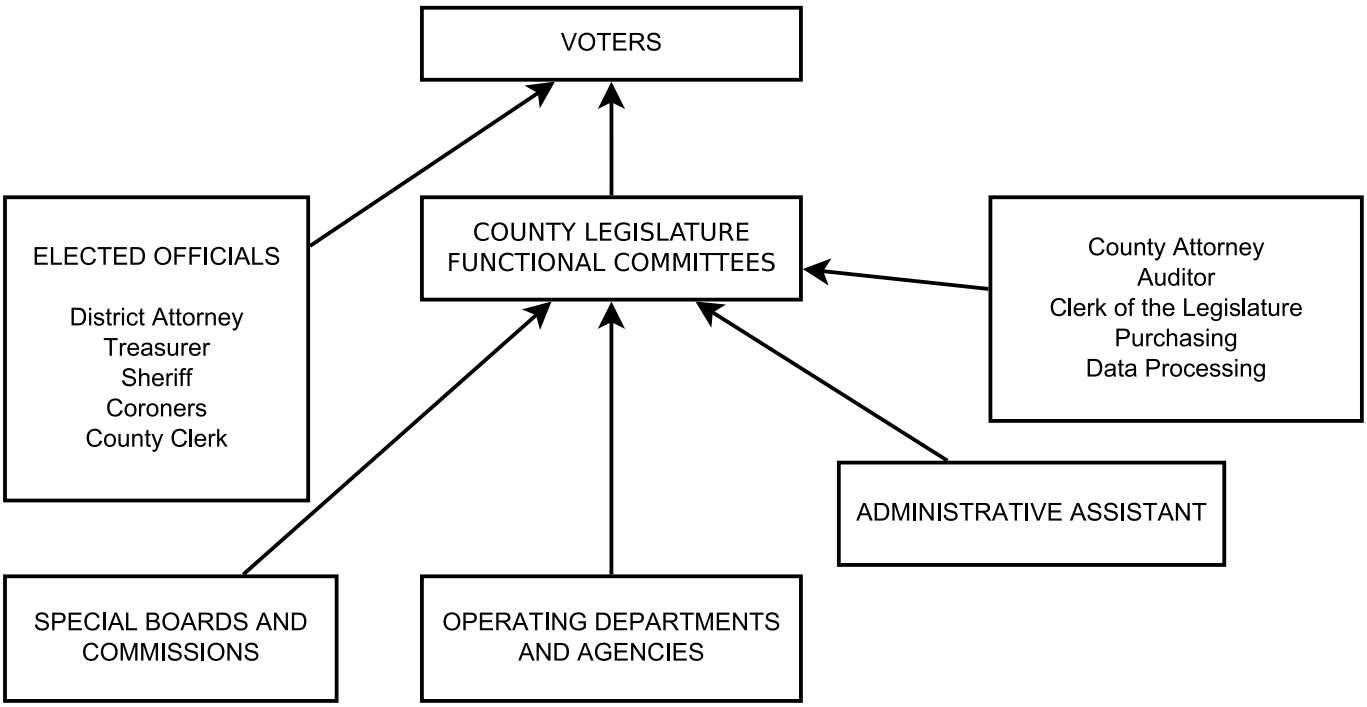

Figure 5.1: County Law Form Organization Chart

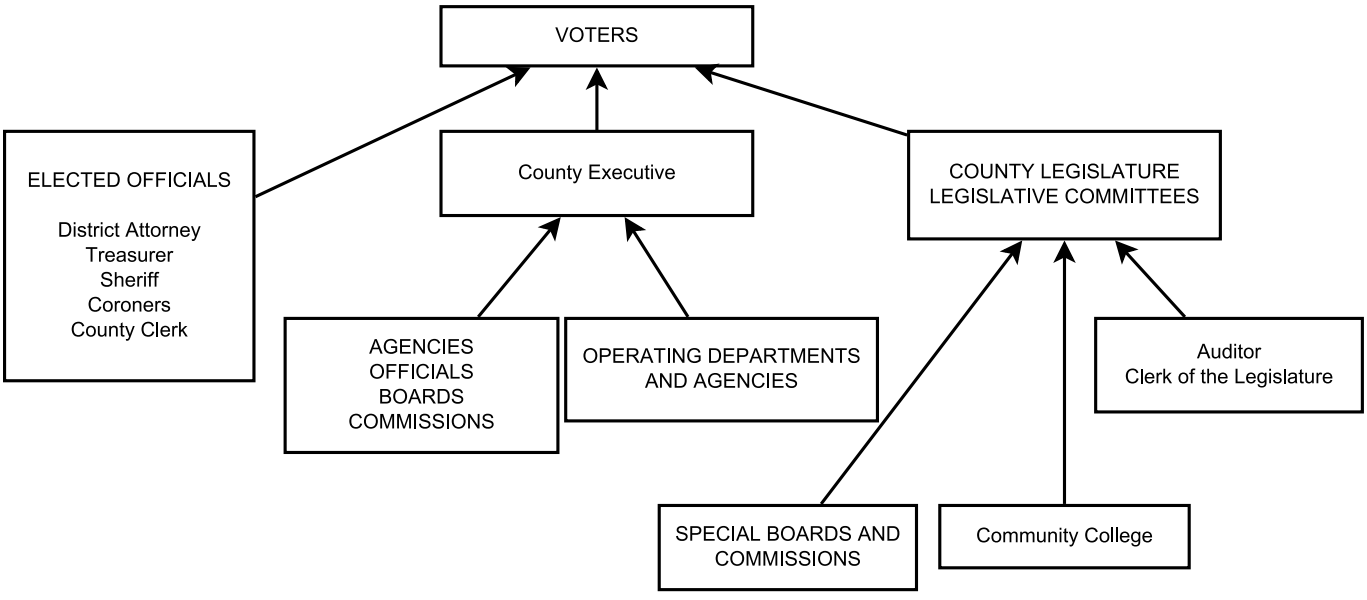

Figure 5.2: County Executive Form Organization Chart

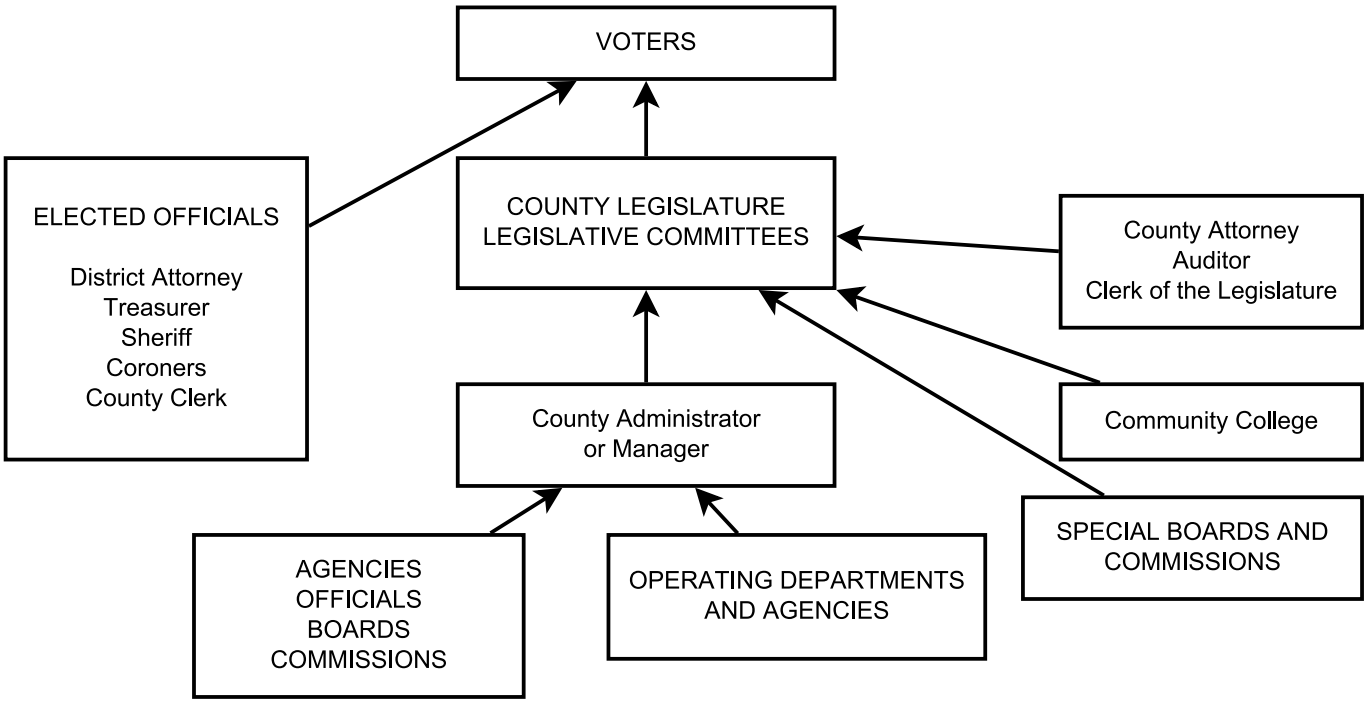

Figure 5.3: County Manager Form Organization Chart

In the large counties, however, urbanization has created a need for new patterns of administration as well as new leadership arrangements. The result has been a rapid growth in both the size and complexity of county administrative structures. These arrangements meet the needs of both ongoing traditional county functions, such as law enforcement and record keeping, as well as the newer county functions in such areas as industrial and economic development, mental health services, and the provision of recreational facilities and programs.

The administrative structures of New York counties generally fall into three categories: (1) organization under the County Law; (2) organization with an elected county executive; and (3) organization with an appointed manager or administrator. As might be expected, there are many similarities among these three forms, but there are also differences. As illustrated in Figure 5.1 [54], Figure 5.2 [54], and Figure 5.3 [55], the primary differences among the three forms are at the top, in the relationship between the elected representative body and how the county is functionally administered. The administrative structure of a county government does not depend on whether the county elects an executive, appoints a manager, or leaves administrative direction and supervision to its legislative body. However, most of the larger counties have found it desirable, if not necessary, to divide their administrative structures into many departments. This organizational structure facilitates proper direction and supervision of what have become large-scale enterprises.

5.5.4 Other Elected and Appointed Officers

In counties organized under the County Law, the following officials must be elected: district attorney, sheriff, coroner(s) and county clerk. Under a home rule charter, a county may alter some of these officers' duties, subject to referendum. The treasurer must also be elected, but this office may be eliminated under either the County Law or a home rule charter.

Many of the charter counties have dropped the office of treasurer and incorporated its functions with those of a director of finance. The office of sheriff, although based in the Constitution, may also be substantially modified. In counties with county police departments, for example, the office of sheriff has few, if any, law enforcement functions, but may retain civil functions and responsibility for operating a county correctional facility.

5.6 The Functions of County Government

At the beginning of this chapter we noted that the principal reasons for creating county governments in the colonial period were to facilitate the defense of the community against enemies and to maintain public order.

With the establishment of state government, the counties provided an already existing and readily available administrative unit through which the state could carry out a number of its functions and duties. To do this, the counties found themselves keeping records on behalf of the state, enforcing state laws and conducting elections for the state, among other state-assigned functions. In New York, as in other states, the prevailing view saw county government as an arm of state government, serving state purposes.

It is doubtful that many residents of the counties of New York ever fully shared this assessment of the nature of the county. The people of the counties appear to have felt from earliest times that the county, like the city, the town and the village, was one of "their" local governments, even though it may have performed duties for the state.

The recent fundamental changes in the nature and form of county government in New York have in some ways brought the legal concept of a county closer in line with the concept held by most of the counties' inhabitants. The impetus for this merger of the de jure with the de facto probably sprang from the rapidly expanding demands for services, which were stimulated by population growth and urbanization, which often could not be supplied by the towns, cities, and villages.

The functions of county government at the beginning of the twenty-first century scarcely resemble those of colonial times, although the county still enforces laws and maintains order. In 1980, total expenditures by county government in New York amounted to $5.5 billion. By 2010, this amount had grown to over $23.1 billion. To see what counties are doing today and to illustrate the demands now being placed on county government, it is useful to examine how county government spends its money. <<county_expenditure_trends_table>> shows the dollar amount and percent distribution of major expenditures for all counties for 1980 and 2010.

SOURCE: Office of the New York State Comptroller

Economic assistance, which includes social services programs such as Medicaid and Aid to Dependent Children, remains the largest category of expenditure for county government. However, the share of the distribution of expenditure for this category has declined as expenditures in other categories have increased and accounting for Medicaid expenditures has changed. In 1980, county expenditures for Medicaid reflected the entire cost of the program (counties paid the full cost and were then reimbursed from state and federal sources). In 2003, however, county medical expenditures reflect only the county contribution (roughly 25 per cent of total Medicaid costs), making comparisons between these years difficult. The greatest percentage of growth in dollar terms has been in the education category, which includes the counties' obligation to pay for the education of pre-school special education children as well as the costs of providing community college education to county residents. Police and public safety has also experienced significant growth and expenditures accounting for the cost of operating a jail in addition to the expenses of a sheriff's department, plus probation and rehabilitation services. General government includes staffing and administrative costs of county officials, the district attorney, public defenders, maintenance of buildings and other central operations.

5.7 Elections

A significant change in voting systems was made with the implementation of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA), which required that voting machines and voting systems used in all states meet minimum performance standards, and for the uniform administration of the electoral process, from voter registration to the casting of the ballot. New York State Election Law, Article 7, in part, implements HAVA. One important change is the transfer of ownership of voting systems from each of New York's cities, towns, and villages to each respective County Board of Elections. Prior to this statutory change, with only several exceptions, voting machines were owned by local municipalities. In the federal election of November 2000, there were 15,571 election districts in New York State. With the exception of voters in approximately 60 election districts, the balance of the state's voters voted on one of the 19,843 lever machines in use at that time. Central count voting systems are owned by the county boards of elections, and are used to count absentee and affidavit optical scan or punch card ballots. In compliance with HAVA, the State Legislature banned punch card absentee systems in 2005, which resulted in the use of a single technology (optical scan system) certified for use in New York. At present, the majority of county boards in the state use central count op-scan central count voting systems.

In 2006, compliance with HAVA and an implementing Federal Court order required the placement of at least one such ballot marking device in each county, though counties could provide more access than just a single device for their entire county. The State Board of Elections certified five ballot marking devices to serve as an interim compliance solution to provide access for voters with disabilities, while New York's efforts at obtaining certification for HAVA-compliant voting systems and ballot marking devices continued. Today, all county boards of elections have implemented certified transparent, accurate and verifiable optical scan poll site voting systems and ballot marking devices throughout the state's 15,005 election districts.

5.8 Transfer of Functions

Article 9, section 1(h)(l) of the State Constitution authorizes alternative forms of county government to transfer functions or duties from one unit of local government to another, subject to referenda approval. Any such transfer, whether included in a proposed county charter or charter amendment, or by local law through procedures set forth in section 33-a of the Municipal Home Rule Law, must be approved by separate majorities in the area of the county outside the cities, and in all cities in the county, if any, "considered as one unit." In addition, if a function or duty is transferred to or from any village, the transfer must also be approved by a majority of voters in all villages so affected, again "considered as one unit."

In many cases, counties have assumed new activities without formal transfer of the function. So long as the county has power to engage in a specific activity — the provision of parks, for example — it often does so at the same time that cities, towns and villages undertake similar activity. This power of the local units to carry out the same activity presents local taxpayers with recurring policy questions regarding which units can perform each service best and at least cost. In many cases cities have urged counties to assume activities, such as oversight of parks, zoos, civic centers and the like, not only to spread the cost more equitably, since all county residents are likely to use such facilities, but also because the county has greater ability to finance such activities.

5.9 Summary

Although the counties still carry out, in one way or another, their original functions and duties, they also have taken on a vast array of new ones. As a result, county governments in New York have had to adapt so that they can provide and finance these services for all the cities, towns and villages within their jurisdiction.

County government has been strengthened as a unit between the cities, towns and villages on the one hand and the state government on the other. The State Legislature and the people of the state have made it possible, through the Constitution and statutes, for the counties to restructure themselves, if they choose, to provide the executive and administrative leadership, the administrative organization and the operational procedures required meeting new demands.

In urban areas, the counties are now major providers of services, and it appears likely that county government will continue to assume new responsibilities.

Chapter 6

City Government

Each of New York State's 62 cities is a unique governmental entity with its own special charter. Two — New York and Albany — have charters of colonial origin, and the other 60 were chartered separately by the State Legislature.

Although home rule was a hard-won prize for the cities of New York State, they now have substantial home rule powers, including authority to change their charters and to adopt new charters by local action. Now New York State contains all of the major forms of city government: council-manager, strong mayor-council, weak mayor-council and commission.

New York City was originally established as a consolidated "regional" government and is now the core of a vast metropolitan region which sprawls over large areas of Connecticut and New Jersey as well as New York. In response to swift-moving social and economic changes the government of New York City has undergone important changes in both structure and allocations of authority.

When the Dutch West India Company granted what roughly amounted to a charter to New Amsterdam in 1653, it established the first city organization in the future state. New Amsterdam operated as an arm of a "higher government." The provincial governor — Peter Stuyvesant, at the time — appointed local officials. These magistrates were then granted the power to choose their successors. However, Stuyvesant reserved the right to promulgate ordinances.

The charters granted to New York City and Albany by English Governor Thomas Dongan in 1686 gave these cities more privileges and authority which they could exercise independently of the colonial government.

The first State Constitution, adopted in 1777, recognized the existing charters of New York and Albany and authorized the Legislature "…to arrange for the organization of cities and incorporated villages and to limit their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing and involvement in debt." Since that time separate special legislative acts have been necessary to establish each new city, although later developments permitted cities to replace or amend their charters by local action.

By 1834, six new cities had been chartered along the state's principal trading route, the Hudson-Mohawk arterial between New York City and Buffalo. These new cities were Brooklyn, Buffalo, Hudson, Rochester, Schenectady and Troy. Thirty-two more cities were created between 1834 and 1899, as thousands of immigrants were attracted to the state. The most recently chartered city in New York is the City of Rye, which came into being in 1942.

6.1 What is a City?

Historically, the need to provide services for population centers prompted the creation of cities. Beyond that common factor, it is difficult to ascertain common purposes or to generalize about their structures, charters granted to cities in New York differ widely.

No general law provides authority for the incorporation of cities; there is no statutory minimum size, either in population or geographical area, which must be met for an area to become a city. Furthermore, there is no concept of progression from village to city status. The primary difference between a city and a village is that the organization and powers of cities is set out in their own charters, while most villages are organized and governed pursuant to provisions of the Village Law. Also, unlike a city, a village is part of a town, and its residents pay town taxes and receive town services.

The Legislature may incorporate any community of any size as a city. In fact, most of the state's 62 cities have populations smaller than the population of the largest village, whereas over 150 of the state's 544 villages have populations greater than that of the smallest city. As a practical matter, the State Legislature does not create cities without clear evidence from a local community that its people desire incorporation. This evidence ordinarily is a locally drafted charter submitted to the Legislature for enactment and a home rule message from local governments that would be impacted by the incorporation.

6.2 Home Rule and the Cities — Historical Development

Historically, the Legislature enacted a charter to meet the specific needs of a center of population. As these centers grew, expanded and experienced changing needs, these charters were amended by special acts of the Legislature. Later on, cities gained the authority to revise and adopt new charters without the approval of the State Legislature. As a result, there is little uniformity in city charters throughout the state, as each city has, by trial and error, determined for itself what it believes to be the most effective form of government.

New York cities, as instrumentalities created individually by the Legislature, struggled long and hard for greater authority to manage their own affairs as they saw fit. Not until the late 1800's did the Legislature begin to legislate for cities generally rather than passing specific laws on individual local matters.

In 1848, the State Constitution was amended to ensure the integrity of elections of local officials. Prior to this time, there had been continual battles between the State and the cities of New York and Brooklyn over state-imposed changes of local officials who had been elected by city voters. The state would regularly move in and appoint local officials, thereby nullifying local elections. After 1848 the state could no longer do this, and in 1854 the mayor of New York City demanded, and at last received, authority to appoint his agency heads.

Despite such changes, however, cities often were subjected to legislative intervention. In 1857, for example, the Legislature created a new police force in New York City and Brooklyn because of allegations of police corruption. Nine years later the state temporarily took over New York City's health and excise departments, despite a court battle by the mayor.

Municipal home rule was a major issue at the Constitutional Convention of 1894. The Constitution of 1894, as amended in Article 12, section 2, divided cities into three classes by population: First Class — 250,000 or over; Second Class— 50,000 to 250,000; and Third Class — under 50,000. This classification was intended to provide a scheme whereby the Legislature could legislate for municipalities by passing general laws and still meet the particular problems of each type of city. It was actually a compromise between those favoring regulation of particular city affairs through special laws, and those favoring the covering of all communities in one general scheme of regulations. In addition, provision was made to require that any law not applicable to all the cities in a class had to be submitted for approval to the mayors of the cities affected by it. If the mayors disapproved, the law was returned to the Legislature for reconsideration. In practice, however, mayoral vetoes seldom were overridden. In 1907 a Constitutional amendment altered the classification of cities so that all cities with a population over 175,000 became First Class. This, of course, narrowed the population range of Second Class cities.

Over the years, the Legislature has enacted a number of major general laws affecting cities. The General Municipal Law enacted in 1892 covered cities as well as other forms of local government. The General City Law of 1909 applied specifically to cities. It granted certain powers to cities generally, and at the same time regulated their administration. In 1913 the General City Law was amended to grant to each city the power "…to regulate, manage, and control its property and local affairs…" as well as "…the rights, privileges and jurisdiction necessary and proper for carrying such power into execution." [1]

The General City Law also granted specific powers in a number of areas, such as construction and maintenance of public works, expenditure of public funds, provision of pensions for public employees and, by an amendment in 1917, zoning. This legislation, which is still in effect, authorizes cities to implement these powers by enacting ordinances. Since the enactment of the Municipal Home Rule Law in 1964, all of these powers may also be exercised by local law.

6.3 Home Rule and the Cities — In the 1900s

Attempts by the State Legislature to address the question of city government structure included the Second Class Cities Law of 1906 and the Optional City Government Law of 1914. The Second Class Cities Law, which in effect provided a uniform charter for cities of the second class, is still operative for cities that were cities of the second class on December 31, 1923.

The way was opened in 1923 for cities to establish by local charter the form of government they wished, for in that year the voters approved a Home Rule Amendment to the Constitution and the Legislature enacted a City Home Rule Law. These actions spelled out the power of cities to amend their charters or adopt new charters by local law, without going to the Legislature. Under the Home Rule Amendment cities also were empowered to enact local laws dealing with their "property, affairs or government" as long as these laws were not inconsistent with the Constitution or general laws of the state. The Legislature was specifically prohibited from legislating on these matters, except through general laws affecting all cities alike. The tripartite constitutional classification of cities was abolished, except as it applied to the second class cities then in existence. The provisions of the City Home Rule Law were incorporated without substantial changes into the present Municipal Home Rule Law when it was enacted in 1964.

Abolition of the classification of cities in the 1923 constitutional amendment raised questions concerning the terms first, second and third class cities, which in some cases still exist. Since 1894 many statutes have referred to one or more of these designated classes of cities. Although most of these laws have been amended, revised or repealed, some are still in effect and statutes using these terms of classification have been enacted since 1923. Although it has been generally agreed that these statutes are constitutional, the problem arises as to how to interpret the classifications in the absence of a constitutional definition. References to classes of cities occurring in statutes passed prior to January 1924 are interpreted under the assumption that the statute effectively incorporated the constitutional classification which was in effect on the effective date of the statute. With respect to laws passed after 1924, the approach to interpretation is less clear. Often it is assumed that each class means what it had come to mean through prior usage.

6.4 The Forms of City Government

A city's charter forms the legal basis for the operation of the city. The charter enumerates the basic authority of the city to govern, establishes the form of government, and sets up the legislative, executive and judicial branches of city government.

Each city has enacted and amended various ordinances and local laws over time and has often codified these enactments into a code of ordinances and/or local laws. Together, the charter and code prescribe the method and extent to which a city carries out its legal powers and duties.

[1] General City Law §19, added by Chapter 247 of the Laws of 1913.

Because all cities have separate charters granted by the State Legislature and all now have the power to revise their charters by local action, it is difficult to describe a common city structure. All cities have elected councils, but elections are by wards, at large, or a combination of the two. Most cities have mayors; some mayors are elected at large by the voters, while others are selected by the council. Otherwise, city government in New York exhibits a variety of forms. In general, city government falls into four broad categories:

- council-manager, under which an appointed, professional manager is the administrative head of the city, the council is the policymaking body and the mayor, if the position exists, is mainly a ceremonial figure. The manager usually has the power to appoint and remove department heads and to prepare the budget, but does not have a veto power over council actions;
- strong mayor-council, under which an elective mayor is the chief executive and administrative head of the city, and the council is the policy making body. The mayor usually has the power to appoint and remove agency heads, with or without council confirmation; to prepare the budget; and to exercise broad veto powers over council actions. This form sometimes includes a professional administrator appointed by the mayor and is then called the "mayor-administrator plan;"
- weak mayor-council, under which the mayor is mainly a ceremonial figure. The council is not only the policy making body, it also provides a committee form of administrative leadership. It appoints and removes agency heads and prepares budgets. There is generally no mayoral veto power; and
- commission, under which commissioners are elected by the voters to administer the individual departments of the city government and together form the policy making body. In some cases one of the commissioners assumes the ceremonial duties of a mayor, on a rotating basis. This plan sometimes includes a professional manager or administrator.

All of these types of city government are found in New York State. Thirteen of the 62 cities have council-manager arrangements; three utilize the commission plan, one of which also has a city manager. The remaining 46 cities have the mayor-council form, three of which also have a city administrator; their governments are located at various points along a continuum between strong mayor and weak mayor. Within each group there are many hybrids. See Table 6.1 [62] for a listing of cities, their 2010 populations and their forms of government.

No new weak mayor-council or commission forms of city government have been adopted in recent years, although two cities with the council-manager form have switched to the mayor-council form. At present, the strong mayor-council form is the most popular form of city government in this New York.

Table 6.1: Form of City Government.[2]

City	Population 2010 Census	Rank	Form of Government	Council Members
Albany	97,856	6	Mayor-Council	16
Amsterdam	18,620	33	Mayor-Council	5+Mayor
Auburn	27,687	24	Mayor-Council-Manager	4+Mayor
Batavia	15,465	40	Council-Manager	9
Beacon	15,541	39	Mayor-Council-Administrator	6+Mayor
Binghamton	47,376	14	Mayor-Council	9
Buffalo	261,310	2	Mayor-Council	12
Canandaigua	10,545	51	Mayor-Council-Manager	8+Mayor
Cohoes	16,168	36	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor[3]

Table 6.1: (continued)

City	Population 2010 Census	Rank	Form of Government	Council Members
Corning	11,183	49	Mayor-Council-Manager	10+Mayor
Cortland	19,204	32	Mayor-Council	8+Mayor[4]
Dunkirk	12,563	46	Mayor-Council	5
Elmira	29,200	21	Mayor-Council-Manager	6+Mayor
Fulton	11,896	47	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor
Geneva	13,261	45	Mayor-Council-Manager	8+Mayor
Glen Cove	26,964	26	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor
Glens Falls	14,700	42	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor[5]
Gloversville	15,665	38	Mayor-Council	12+Mayor[6]
Hornell	8,563	56	Mayor-Council	10+Mayor[7]
Hudson	6,713	58	Mayor-Council	11
Ithaca	30,014	20	Mayor-Council	10+Mayor[8]
Jamestown	31,146	19	Mayor-Council	9
Johnstown	8,743	55	Mayor-Council	5+Mayor[9]
Kingston	23,893	28	Mayor-Council	10
Lackawanna	18,141	35	Mayor-Council	5
Little Falls	4,946	61	Mayor-Council	8+Mayor[10]
Lockport	21,165	30	Mayor-Council	8+Mayor[11]
Long Beach	33,275	16	Council-Manager	5
Mechanicville	5,196	60	Mayor-Commission	4+Mayor
Middletown	28,086	23	Mayor-Council	9
Mount Vernon	67,292	8	Mayor-Council	5
New Rochelle	77,062	7	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor
New York	8,175,133	1	Mayor-Council	51
Newburgh	28,866	22	Mayor-Council-Manager	4+Mayor
Niagara Falls	50,193	12	Mayor-Council-Administrator	7
North Tonawanda	31,568	18	Mayor-Council	5
Norwich	7,190	57	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor[12]
Ogdensburg	11,128	50	Mayor-Council-Manager	6+Mayor
Olean	14,452	43	Mayor-Council	7
Oneida	11,393	48	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor[13]
Oneonta	13,901	44	Mayor-Council	8+Mayor[14]
Oswego	18,142	34	Mayor-Council	7
Peekskill	23,583	29	Mayor-Council-Manager	6+Mayor
Plattsburgh	19,989	31	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor
Port Jervis	8,828	54	Mayor-Council	9
Poughkeepsie	32,736	17	Mayor-Council-Administrator	8
Rensselaer	9,392	53	Mayor-Council	10

Table 6.1: (continued)

City	Population 2010 Census	Rank	Form of Government	Council Members
Rochester	210,565	3	Mayor-Council	9
Rome	33,725	15	Mayor-Council	7
Rye	15,720	37	Mayor-Council-Manager	6+Mayor
Salamanca	5,815	59	Mayor-Council	5+Mayor
Saratoga Springs	26,586	27	Mayor-Commission	4+Mayor
Schenectady	66,135	9	Mayor-Council	7
Sherrill	3,071	62	Mayor-Commission-Manager	5
Syracuse	145,170	5	Mayor-Council	10
Tonawanda	15,130	41	Mayor-Council	5
Troy	50,129	13	Mayor-Council	9
Utica	62,235	10	Mayor-Council	10
Watertown	27,023	25	Mayor-Council-Manager	4+Mayor
Watervliet	10,254	52	Mayor-Council-Manager	2+Mayor
White Plains	56,853	11	Mayor-Council	6+Mayor
Yonkers	195,976	4	Mayor-Council	7

The comparatively greater frequency of the mayor-council form among New York cities can probably be attributed to both historic and socio-economic factors. The council-manager form occurs more frequently in younger cities of a more homogeneous composition found in the Midwest and the Far West. New York cities tend to be older than those in other parts of the country and tend to have more heterogeneous populations. In such cities the mayor-council form, especially with a strong mayor, has been more prevalent.

6.5 Contents of City Charters

Although cities have the home rule power to revise their charters and adopt new charters, this authority is not unlimited, and must be exercised in accordance with the State Constitution and the Legislature's grant of local law

[2] 2010 U.S. Census. Source: U.S. Bureau of the Census. Prepared by Empire State Development Corporation. Form of Government and Council Members reported by NYCOM 2007 Directory of City and Village Officials

[3] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[4] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[5] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[6] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[7] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[8] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[9] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[10] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[11] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[12] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[13] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

[14] Mayor may only vote when there is a tie

powers to cities. Cities act by law, which include adopting and amending charters that are not inconsistent with the State Constitution and are not inconsistent with any general law of the State. A city may act in the interest of good government, its management and business, the protection of its property, and the health, safety and welfare of its inhabitants.

Generally, city charters address the following topics:

- Name of the city
- Boundaries
- Wards, districts, or other civil subdivisions
- Corporate powers
- Fiscal year
- Legislative body, e.g., City Council, Common Council, Board of Aldermen
- Legislative powers
- Composition
- Meetings
- Rules of procedure
- Chief Executive
- Mayor
- Veto power/legislative override Power of appointment
- City Manager
- Corporation Counsel or City Attorney
- City Clerk
- Departments, offices, agencies and commissions
- Budget - financial procedures
- Tax administration

6.6 Decentralization and Urban Problems

Today New York State has 62 cities, ranging in population from 3,071 to over 8,000,000. There are 30 cities with a population of more than 20,000, including 13 with more than 50,000. Their geographic areas range from 0.9 to 303.7 square miles.

The problems of the large cities in the state reflect many complex elements of social change, but population changes are often seen as both cause and effect. All of the state's large cities experienced rapid growth between 1900 and 1930. In those 30 years the populations of the six largest cities increased 98 percent — from 4,202,530 to 8,303,038 — an increase from 58 percent to 66 percent of the state's total population. This surge in population was accompanied by a corresponding development in city facilities and services. The vast New York City Transit System was built, for example, and all cities built schools, roads, libraries, sewers, water systems, parks and a great array of other facilities to accommodate the needs and demands of their burgeoning populations.

This rapid growth tapered off during the depression decade between 1930 and 1940, and came to a halt in the 30 years from 1940 to 1970. In the period from 1970 to 1990 most cities experienced a population decline, and census estimates indicate that this trend has continued through the 2010's. The population of New York City dropped nearly 11 percent during the period from 1970 to 1980, but had recovered nearly half this loss by 1996. During the same period, the collective population of the next five largest cities declined by nearly 23 percent.

The stabilization and subsequent decrease of population in the central cities has been accompanied by growth in the surrounding suburban communities. Following closely on the heels of the residential shift to the suburbs has been a decentralization of commerce and industry. Economic considerations have prompted businesses to turn to the suburbs in search of more and cheaper space for expansion. The cost savings, coupled with the shift of the labor supply, have made it increasingly more attractive for industry to locate outside the central cities.

A transformation has occurred over the years in the characteristics of the urban population. City populations generally include a comparatively large proportion of immigrants, persons of lower incomes and persons in the youngest and oldest age groups (under 5 and over 65).

6.7 New York City

Although New York City is the oldest city in the country's 13 original states, its present city government is just over a century old. The city was assembled from a number of other counties, cities, towns and villages by the State Legislature after a more than 30-year effort by advocates of consolidation. The result of this governmental reorganization was the creation of five boroughs coterminous with county boundaries and the assembling of all five into the City of New York.

The present City of New York, the land area of which has remained basically unchanged since its consolidation in 1898, covers more than 303 square miles. Its population of over eight million is greater than that of 38 of the 50 states.

New York has been the most populous city in the United States since 1810. It currently has almost as many residents as the combined population of the next two most populous cities in the country. The city's 2010 Census population was 8,175,133.

The 42 percent of New York State's citizens who reside in New York City live in the only consolidated major local government in the state. There are five counties but no county governments. The area of the city contains no villages, no towns and no sub-city self-governing units.

In addition to the mayor, a comptroller and a public advocate are elected citywide. The council is composed of the public advocate and 51 council members, each of whom represents a council district.

In recent years, New York City has experimented with various forms of decentralization to meet a rising tide of objections from city residents that the government had become too remote and inaccessible. The most significant decentralization development has been the creation of 59 community boards.

6.7.1 The Mayor

The mayor serves as the chief executive officer of the city, and with the assistance of four deputy mayors, presides over many departments, offices, commissions and boards. The mayor may create, modify or abolish bureaus, divisions or positions within the city government. The mayor, who may be elected to serve a maximum of two four-year terms, is responsible for the budget and appoints and removes the heads of city agencies and other non-elected officials.

6.7.2 The Comptroller

The comptroller, who may be elected to serve a maximum of two four-year terms, serves as the chief fiscal officer of the city. The Comptroller advises the mayor, City Council and public of the city's financial condition, and makes recommendations on city programs and operations, fiscal policies, and financial transactions. The Comptroller also audits and examines all matters relating to the finances of the city, registers proposed contracts, verifies budget authorization and codes for contracts, determines credit needs, terms and conditions, prepares warrants for payment, issues and sells city obligations, is responsible for a post-audit, and is an ex officio member of numerous boards and commissions, most notably the board of estimate. The comptroller may investigate any financial matter, administer sinking funds, keep accounts and publish reports. The Governor may remove the comptroller, but only on charges after a hearing.

6.7.3 The Public Advocate

The public advocate is elected to a four-year term to represent the consumers of city services, in addition to presiding over meetings of the City Council. The public advocate may sponsor local legislation, is an ex officio member of all council committees, and may participate in council discussions but may not vote unless there is a tie. The public advocate reviews and investigates complaints about city services, assesses whether agencies are responsive to the public, recommends improvements in agency programs and complaint handling procedures, and serves as an ombudsman for people who are having trouble obtaining the service they need from city agencies.

6.7.4 The Council

The City Council is the city's legislative body. It has the power to enact local laws, including amendments to the city charter and the administrative code, originate home rule messages, and adopt capital and expense budgets. Members, who represent districts, are elected for a term of four years. In addition to its legislative role and oversight powers over city agencies, the Council approves the city's budget and has decision-making powers over land use issues.

6.7.5 The Borough Presidents

The five borough presidents, who are the executive officials of each borough, are also elected to four-year terms. The borough presidents' chief responsibilities involve working with the Mayor to prepare the executive budget and propose borough budget priorities directly to the Council, review and comment on major land use decisions and propose sites for City facilities within their boroughs, monitor and modify the delivery of City services within their boroughs, and engage in strategic planning for their boroughs.

6.7.6 Borough Board

Each borough has a Borough Board consisting of the Borough President, the district council members from the borough, and the chairperson of each community board in the borough.

6.7.7 Community Boards

The 59 community boards play an advisory role in zoning, other land use issues, community planning, the city budget process, and coordinating municipal services. Each board comprises up to 50 unsalaried members, appointed by the borough president in consultation with the City Council members who represent any part of the board district.

6.7.8 The Metropolitan Transportation Authority

One of the most important governmental agencies in the New York City area is the Metropolitan Transportation Authority (MTA). This agency was established by the State Legislature to provide mass transportation services within and to the City of New York, including the subway and all public bus systems, as well as the commuter systems of the Long Island Rail Road, Long Island Bus and the Metro-North Railroad. The Metropolitan Transportation Authority is also responsible for several bridges and tunnels. The Governor, with Senate advice, appoints the MTA Board which consists of a Chairman, Chief Executive Officer and 18 other members.

6.7.9 New York Metropolitan Transportation Council

The council is the official metropolitan planning organization for the New York metropolitan area, composed of elected officials, and transportation and environmental agencies.

The council is composed of nine members representing the principal jurisdictions involved in transportation planning in the downstate area: the county executives of Nassau, Putnam, Rockland, Suffolk and Westchester counties; the chairman of the New York City Planning Commission and the commissioner of the New York City Department of Transportation; the chairman of the Metropolitan Transportation Authority; and the commissioner of the New York State Department of Transportation (the permanent co-chairperson of the council). The advisory (nonvoting) members include representatives of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, the U.S. Department of Transportation's Federal Highway Administration and Federal Transportation Administration, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the NYS Department of Environmental Conservation. The chair is shared by the NYS transportation commissioner and one other council member elected annually.

The council coordinates transportation planning in the metropolitan area, prepares travel-related forecasts for personal transportation, serves as a cooperative forum for regional transportation issues, and collects, analyzes and interprets travel-related data. Major projects include the five-year Transportation Improvement Program and a long-range transportation plan for the region.

Chapter 7

Town Government

Town government in New York can be traced to both New England and Dutch colonial government arrangements in the Hudson Valley. The state's towns encompass all territory within the state except territory within cities and Indian reservations. In size, they are the most diverse of all the units of local government.

Towns existed independently in the colonial period. When New York became a state, towns were generally regarded as creations of the State Legislature that existed to serve state purposes. Town governments now, however, have long been recognized as primary units of local government. They possess authority to provide virtually the full complement of municipal services. By statutory and constitutional adjustments, towns are flexible units that can function as rural or as highly urbanized general purpose units of government, depending on local needs.

Everyone in New York who lives outside a city or an Indian reservation lives in a town. There are more towns in New York than there are cities and villages combined.

In New York, "town government" includes both the Town of Hempstead in Nassau County, with a 2010 population of 759,757, almost three times that of the City of Buffalo and taxable real property of over $115 billion, and the Town of Red House in Cattaraugus County with 38 residents and a taxable real property of $88 million. Between these two extremes are 930 other towns, some of which provide to their residents a great number of municipal services, while others do little more than maintain a few rural roads.

7.1 The Beginnings of Town Government

Town government in New York has both Dutch and English roots, with even earlier antecedents in the Germanic tribes — the English word "town" is derived from the Teutonic "tun," meaning an enclosure.

The Dutch communities established in the Hudson Valley in the early seventeenth century were easily integrated with the strong, tightly knit version of town government brought a few years later by immigrants from Massachusetts and Connecticut to the eastern shores of Long Island. In 1664, Charles II claimed the territory between the Connecticut and the Delaware rivers by right of discovery and conveyed it to the Duke of York. His agent, Colonel Nicolls, armed with a commission as Governor, appeared with a fleet off the shore of New Amsterdam, and the Dutch quickly capitulated.

Immediately after they established British sovereignty in New York in 1664, the English began to more fully develop the patterns of local government. Issued in 1665, the Code of Laws, known as the "Duke's Laws," confirmed the boundaries of 17 existing towns and provided for basic organization of the town governments. These laws gave freeholders the right to vote and provided for a town meeting system resembling one that is still used in New England.

Town government continued to develop throughout the remainder of the Seventeenth and into the Eighteenth Century. A town court system grew up. Provision was made for a chief fiscal officer, known as a town treasurer, a forerunner of the present supervisor. In 1683 the first general property tax was imposed. In 1703 provision was made for a system of highways.

The State Constitution of 1777 recognized the existence of 14 counties and some towns. The Constitution provided that "it shall be in the power of the State Legislatures of this State for the advantages and conveniences of the good people to divide the same into such other and further counties and districts as it may then appear necessary." Between 1788 and 1801, the Legislature was especially active in dividing counties into towns. However, the form of town government remained essentially the same as it had been under British rule.

In the early decades of the Nineteenth Century, town government began to assume a more modern form. In the Ninth Edition of the Revised Statutes of New York, laws affecting towns were segregated in Chapter 20 of the General Laws. This chapter was the immediate predecessor of the Town Law. The title "Town Law" appears to have been used first in its modern sense when laws affecting towns were re-codified by Chapter 569 of the Laws of 1890 and made applicable to most towns, with certain exceptions. In 1909, another re-codification grouped statutes applicable to towns into Chapter 62 of the Consolidated Laws.

Despite these re-codifications, the Town Law still contained general statutes and special acts which duplicated each other. In 1927 a Joint Legislative Committee set about to re-codify the Town Law once again. The result is the present Town Law, which is Chapter 634 of the Laws of 1932.

7.2 Characteristics of Towns

7.2.1 Geography

Towns and cities encompass all the lands within the state, except Indian reservations, which have special legal status. The 933 towns in the state vary greatly in size, ranging from the Town of Webb in Herkimer County (which is larger than 11 counties and covers 451.2 square miles) to the Town of Green Island in Albany County (which covers only 0.7 of a square mile.)

Towns are not distributed equally among the counties. Nassau County, with a population of 1, 339, 532 in 2010, being the second most populous county outside New York City, has only three towns, while Cattaraugus County, with a population of 80,317 (less than one-sixteenth of Nassau County's population), contains 32 towns.

7.2.2 Legal Status

Courts have determined that towns are true municipal corporations. Previously the courts had ruled that towns were: "…involuntary subdivisions of the state, constituted for the purpose of the more convenient exercise of governmental functions by the state for the benefit of all its citizens" (Short v. Town of Orange, 175 A.D. 260, 161 N.Y.S., 466, (1916)). Town Law definition now confirms that towns are municipal corporations:

> "A town is a municipal corporation comprising the inhabitants within its boundaries, and formed with the purpose of exercising such powers and discharging such duties of local government and administration of public affairs as have been, or, maybe conferred or imposed upon it by law." (section 2, Town Law)

Towns were finally granted full membership in the local government partnership when, in 1964, they were constitutionally granted home rule powers (see Chapter IV).

7.2.3 Development — Rural to Suburban

Physical development came to towns before their emergence as municipal corporations. Indeed, the pressing needs arising from physical development gave impetus to their legal development. For many years towns provided only basic government functions such as organizing and supervising elections, administering judicial functions, and constructing and maintaining highways. In carrying out these governmental functions, towns served their own needs while also carrying out the state's purposes. The elective machinery took care of maintaining local political organizations as well as giving town officials contact with, and an element of control or influence in, county, state and federal political organizations. The local judicial function, in conjunction with the police function of county sheriffs and state police or military agencies, gave security to the people of the towns. Control of highways assured residents of rural towns that they would maintain contact with their neighbors and distant urban centers and that they would be able to market their crops.

Even in rural areas, however, increasing population and its clustering into hamlets gave rise to needs for services not available at the town level. Towns required all-weather roads to assure year-round access to shops, sidewalks to protect pedestrians, public water to protect public health, sewers to carry waste away, and police to protect growing populations and increasingly valuable property.

The flight of city dwellers to the suburbs, which began as early as the second decade of the twentieth century, resulted in a continuous, almost geometric growth in town population. From 1950 to 2010, the population living in towns in New York State increased by 130 percent, while the population of cities decreased by 29 percent (excluding New York City). While the past three decades have seen a significant slowdown in this shift, an increasing proportion of the total outward migration during this time period has settled in more rural (as opposed to suburban) towns. New town-dwellers, whether suburban or rural, have demanded many of the services they had been accustomed to in the cities —water, sewage disposal, refuse collection, street lighting, recreational facilities and many more. Since suburban development in many cases was formless and without identifiable business centers, village incorporation often proved problematic. The suburban challenge has fallen upon town government, a challenge to develop services where they were needed without losing the traditional role as the most local of local governments.

7.3 Government Organization

7.3.1 Classification of Towns

The Town Law divides towns into two classes based on population. All towns of 10,000 or over in population as shown by the latest federal decennial census, with the exception of towns in Suffolk and Broome Counties and the towns of Ulster and Potsdam, are by statute towns of the first class. All towns in Westchester County, regardless of population, are towns of the first class.

In addition, any town may become a town of the first class by action of the town board, subject to a permissive referendum, if it:

- has a population of 5, 000 or more, as shown in any federal census (not necessarily decennial);
- has an assessed valuation over $10 million; or
- adjoins a city having a population of 300, 000 or more.

All towns which are not first class towns are towns of the second class. Under the Town Law, there are organizational differences between first class and second class towns. The elected officers of a first class town are its supervisor, four council persons (unless increased to six or decreased to two as provided by the Town Law), town clerk, two town justices, highway superintendent, and a receiver of taxes and assessments. Voters in second class towns, on the other hand, elect the supervisor, two councilpersons, two justices of the peace, a town clerk, a highway superintendent, three assessors and a collector.

In 1962, the Legislature created the additional classification of "Suburban Town." Suburban Towns must be towns of the first class, and must:

- have a population of at least 25, 000; or
- have a population of at least 7, 500, be within 15 miles of a city having at least 100,000 population, and have shown specified growth in population between the 1940 and 1960 decennial censuses.

Provided a town meets the above criteria, it may become a Suburban Town at the option of the town board, subject to permissive referendum.

When the classes of towns were originally authorized, there was a fairly clear-cut differentiation between the powers allotted to the different classes. As town powers were broadened, differences in powers among classes became less clear. For example, the Constitutional Home Rule Amendment in 1964 granted to all towns the local law powers formerly possessed only by Suburban Towns. Even organizational differences have become less sharply defined over time. For example, legislation enacted in 1976 granted all towns the authority to create and/or abolish elective as well as appointive offices and to restructure the administrative agencies of town government by local law. Formerly, only Suburban Towns had specific authority to departmentalize town government operations. To all intents and purposes, all towns, regardless of their statutory classification, possess roughly equivalent legal powers.

7.3.2 Legislative Leadership

The legislative body of the town is the town board. Historically, the town board consisted of the supervisor and the town justices of the peace. The dual status of justices of the peace (now designated as town justices) as judicial and legislative officers has always concerned students of government, but this was accepted in rural towns because it was less expensive than separate offices. When classification of towns was introduced, the judiciary was completely separated from the legislative branch in towns of the first class.

In 1971, the Town Law was amended to allow town boards in towns of the second class to exercise the option of removing town justices from the town board and electing two additional town councilpersons. In 1976, the Legislature amended the Town Law once again, separating the legislative and judicial functions in all town governments by removing town justices from town boards.

One of the distinguishing features of town government organization is the lack of a strong executive branch. Virtually all of a town's discretionary authority rests with the town board. What little executive power the supervisor has is granted by specific statute or by the town board. The town board, therefore, exercises both legislative and executive functions. This situation is not very different from the basic form of government prescribed by state law for counties, cities and villages. What is different, however, is that until recently, towns did not possess the same degree of home rule powers granted to the other units of government to change the basic prescribed forms of government.

It was not until 1964 that home rule was extended to towns. It had previously been extended to villages with a population in excess of 5, 000 and to counties and cities. While the extension of home rule powers to towns was a step forward in the evolution of towns to the status of full-fledged municipal corporations, towns were still generally bound by a much greater number of specific statutory directives than were counties, cities and villages.

Many of these directives fall within the constitutional definition of "general law," which could not be superseded by exercising home rule power. In this respect towns suffered in comparison to counties, cities and villages, each of which possessed extensive grants of authority to adopt a structure of government through the home rule process suitable to their individual needs. In 1976, the Legislature remedied the situation by authorizing towns to supersede certain provisions of the Town Law relating to the property, affairs or government of the town, notwithstanding the fact that they are "general laws" as defined by the Constitution. This grant of powers can be viewed as a major expansion of home rule powers for towns, for it equipped them with powers similar to those enjoyed by other units of local government.

7.3.3 Executive Leadership

7.3.3.1 Supervisor

The Town Law does not provide for a separate executive branch of town government. Because the supervisor occupies the leader's position on the town board, and because town residents often turn to the supervisor with their problems, many people think the supervisor's position is the executive position of town government. But the supervisor is part of the legislative branch and acts as a member and presiding officer of the town board. He or she acts as a full member of the board, voting on all questions and having no additional tie-breaking or veto power.

The supervisor is more of an administrator than an executive. The supervisor's duties under law are to:

- act as treasurer and have care and custody of monies belonging to the town;
- disburse monies;
- keep an accurate and complete account of all monies;
- make reports as required;
- pay fixed salaries and other claims; and
- lease, sell, and convey properties of the town when so directed by the town board.

The basic source of the supervisor's power lies in the position's traditional political leadership and the holder's ability to use this leadership. Familiarity with day-to-day problems of the town often enables the supervisor to influence the policy decisions of the town board.

In 1938, provision was made in the Town Law for a town manager form of government, which would have made possible greater executive coordination of town functions. TThe provisions were repealed in 1957. However, in 1972, the State Legislature enacted special legislation authorizing the Town of Fallsburg to adopt a town manager plan. Then, in 1976, Article 3-B of the Town Law was enacted, once again enabling any town, by local law, to establish a town manager form of government. Since 1998, the Towns of Collins, Erwin, Mount Kisco, Putnam and Southampton have been operating under a town manager form of government.

By delegating a few more specific powers, the Suburban Town Law gives the supervisor a bit more authority. Although designated as "chief executive officer", the Suburban Town supervisor has no major new executive powers.

As noted earlier, the Legislature has authorized towns to adopt local laws superseding many specific provisions of the Town Law. The purpose of this legislation was to allow towns to restructure their form of government to provide for an executive or administrative branch separate and apart from the legislative branch of government. Offices such as town executive and town manager may be established and granted powers similar to those granted by counties, cities and villages to the offices of county executive or manager, city mayor or manager, and village mayor or manager.

In addition, section 10 of the Municipal Home Rule Law authorizes local governments to enact local laws relating to the powers, duties, qualifications, number, mode of selection and removal, and terms of office of their officers and employees. Where it is constitutionally permissible, some offices which are elective by statute may be made appointive by local law. Conversely, offices which are appointive by statute may be made elective by local law. Both types of local laws require public referenda. A town may also change the term of office of any of its officers by local law.

7.3.4 Judicial

The state's judicial system has been described in Chapter 3 [21]. As was pointed out earlier, town justices were originally members of the town board, but uneasiness over this duality of functions led to the gradual phasing out of their legislative roles. Also, to enhance the level of professionalism of local justices, state law now mandates their training. The jurisdiction of the town court system is town-wide, even extending to village territory where it is coincident with that of village courts. The cost of the town judicial system is a town-wide charge.

7.4 Operations and Services

The operational organization of towns displays the same lack of sharp definition encountered in the legislative, executive and judicial branches of town government. Although there has been de facto departmentalization by many towns, and formal departments have been created in some instances, by specific statutory authorization or by home rule enactments, there is no general provision for departmental organization.

It is useful to differentiate the town operational structure into two general categories: 1. services provided and functions performed on a town-wide basis, including services to villages; and 2. those provided to part of the town, either to the entire area of the town outside existing villages (the "TOV") or to a specific district or area of the TOV.

7.4.1 Town-wide Organization and Services

Towns first emerged to carry out general governmental functions as distinguished from "proprietary" functions. These general functions cover the basic town-wide services still provided by the town; the operational costs are imposed town-wide. Through the years some services have been added, including those which may be carried out by a town within the territory of a village, either on a cooperative basis or with the consent of the village.

7.4.1.1 Elective Processes

One of the primary functions provided by towns on a town-wide basis is the organization and supervision of elections. The individual election district is the primary element in the election machinery. Towns, in all except Monroe, Nassau and Suffolk Counties, must establish and operate all election districts outside cities. In these districts all inspection clerks and election employees are appointed by the town board upon recommendation from the organized political parties. Party organization is also built around the election district. Party committee members, elected in each election district, form the backbone of town, county and state committees. It is likely that a town's greatest strength in maintaining and promoting its place in the governmental scheme of things rests with the electoral function. This strength can be brought to bear whenever the towns seem about to lose power to other units of government.

Representative democracy has traditionally been achieved in almost all towns through the system of electing town board members as at-large representatives. Towns of the first class (generally, towns with a population of 10,000 or more, or those towns with a smaller population that have chosen to become towns of the first class pursuant to Town Law sections 12 and 81) usually elect a Town Supervisor and four town board members as the town legislative body, separate from other elective or appointive town offices such as clerk, justice and assessor.

Under the current at-large system, each voter may cast a vote for each vacant seat on the board. Casting multiple votes for one candidate is prohibited. The available town board positions are filled by the candidates who receive the highest vote total; a candidate need not receive a majority of votes to assume a seat on the board.

The ward system of electing town board members is an alternative to the at-large system of election and is authorized by sections 81 and 85 of the Town Law. Unlike cities in New York, which have a mix of both at-large and ward-elected board members, only a handful of towns currently elect board members by ward. As of 2012, only 11 of 933 towns in New York use the ward system, and since the mid-1970's, voters have defeated its implementation wherever it has been on the ballot.

A town of the first class may, upon the vote of the town board or upon a duly qualified petition, submit a proposition to the voters for establishing the ward system. If the voters approve the proposition, the county board of elections must divide the town into four wards and fix their boundaries. "So far as possible the division shall be so made that the number of voters in each ward shall be approximately equal" (Town Law section 85[1]). The ward system is deemed established only upon the date the county board of elections duly files a map "showing in detail the location of each ward and the boundaries thereof" (Town Law section 85[1]).

The boundaries of the wards are not generally known at the time of the ballot, but instead are fixed by the board of elections if the proposition is successful. Apart from the constitutional requirement of "one person one vote" (see, Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 84 S. Ct. 1362) codified in the statute by its demand that wards contain "approximately" the same number of voters, the voter has few assurances how wards will be drawn.

If the ward system is established, the terms of the sitting board members end on December 31, after the first biennial town election held at least 120 days after the ward system is established. The terms of the board members elected by ward commence January 1 following such election.

Only a town of the first class is authorized to both establish the ward system and increase the number of board members from four to six, and such a town may submit both propositions at the same election (Op. Atty. Gen. [Inf.] 90-63; 1968 Op. Atty. Gen. [Inf.] 52; 13 Op. St. Compt. 223, 1957). May a town of the second class, which is not authorized to increase the number of board members or establish the ward system, submit a proposition to the electorate to change its classification to first class at the same election it submits the other propositions? Under the authorizing sections of sections 81 and 85 the Town Law, the answer is that the electorate must first approve a change in classification to first class, with subsequent elections necessary to increase the number of board members and establish the ward system. The Attorney General has opined, however, that a town of the second class may, by enactment of a local law, increase its number of board members and establish the ward system (Op. Atty. Gen. [Inf.] 90-63). Under the Municipal Home Rule Law (MHRL) towns, cities, counties and villages are authorized to adopt local laws not inconsistent with the Constitution or any general law, in relation to, inter alia, "the powers, duties, qualifications, number, mode of selection and removal, terms of office, compensation, hours of work, protection, welfare and safety of its officers and employees" (MHRL, section 10 [1] [ii] [a] [1], emphasis supplied). Such a local law would be itself subject to a mandatory referendum (MHRL, section 23 [2] [b], [e], [g]).

Therefore, if the voters want representation by ward they have the means to establish it.

7.4.1.2 Tax Assessment

One of the cornerstones of town government is in its authority to assess, levy, collect and enforce payment of taxes. The real property tax remains the most important source of locally raised municipal revenue despite enactments of sales and use, admissions, off-track betting and income taxes. Another major portion of municipal revenue comes from intergovernmental transfers. Fundamental to the levy and collection of real property taxes is the function of property assessment. The goal of property tax assessment is to value property consistently and fairly. The practice has been to make uniform assessments at a constant percentage of full value within a municipality, and to equalize these rates among municipalities. This matter is discussed more fully in Chapter 11 [115].

Assessing is done in towns by an assessor or board of assessors. In the past, all towns had to have a board of three assessors. Later, towns were permitted to substitute a single assessor for the board. Still later, the Assessment Improvement Act of 1970, which required training and county assistance for local assessors, also stated that each town had to provide for a single, appointed assessor unless it took positive action, by way of mandatory referendum, to retain its elected three-member board. All towns also must provide for a board of assessment review, consisting of three to five members, to hear grievances and appeals from determinations of the assessor.

The assessment roll which the town assessor prepares serves a dual, and sometimes triple, purpose. First, it is the basis for all town general taxes and county taxes levied within the town. Second, a copy of the roll must be made available to all school districts within the town and is used, unchanged as to assessments, to prepare the school district tax roll. Third, any village, wholly or partially, within the town may adopt and use the town roll for levying village taxes instead of assessing its own properties.

7.4.1.3 Levy of Taxes

The completed tax roll is forwarded to the county together with the town budget and estimates of levies required for town purposes. These amounts, and the county taxes required within the town, are levied and recorded on the tax roll prior to December 31st of each year. At this point, unpaid school taxes from the last school tax roll, are also re-levied on the town tax roll. This process may differ within the jurisdiction covered by city school districts.

7.4.1.4 Collection and Enforcement

In towns of the first class, the collection of taxes is carried out by a receiver of taxes and assessments, an office that may be either elective or appointive by local choice. Prior to August 2016, the town receiver also collected all school taxes for school districts located wholly or partially in the town, unless the town and school district have made an agreement to the contrary. New legislation enacted in 2016 authorizes school boards to advise the town's receiver of taxes in writing by no later than February first of each year that the school district will collect its own taxes. In towns of the second class, the collecting officer is the elected town tax collector. However, such towns may abolish the office of collector and, thereafter, the town clerk must collect the taxes.

7.4.1.5 General Administration

The cost of general administration of town functions, including the salaries of town officers is levied as town-wide charges even where the functions are less than town-wide in scope. For example, the salary of the town superintendent of highways and the capital cost and operation of the town highway garage are both general (town-wide) charges, even though their functions basically cover only part of the town (the portion outside villages). On the other hand, the salaries of highway employees may be either general charges or applied to only part of the town, depending on the highway item to which their time is charged.

7.4.2 Part-town Organization

Services for part of the town may be rendered to either all of that portion of the town outside villages (TOV), or to particular areas of the town by way of improvement districts or improvement areas.

Until recent decades, the only major service that towns were required to provide to town residents living outside villages was highway maintenance. Town government provided few services other than general government administration and basic functions, such as justice court. Lately, however, population growth in TOV areas has resulted in demands for many of the services already provided by villages. It should be noted that functions, such as waste collection and disposal, can, and often are, provided on either a town-wide or TOV basis. The more common TOV functions include:

- Appointment of a planning board to regulate subdivisions and review site plans, and assist in developing and administering zoning;
- Adoption of zoning regulations, appointment of a building inspector or zoning enforcement officer to administer and enforce them, and appointment of a zoning board of appeals to hear appeals and grant relief in proper instances;
- Police protection, which may be provided on either town-wide or TOV basis, depending upon the availability of police protection within the villages in the town; and
- Highway construction and maintenance, which must be considered a TOV function, since it normally encompasses only town streets and highways outside villages.

Since the highway function of towns predated the establishment of villages, certain highway maintenance costs are town-wide charges.

Over the years, village taxpayers' responsibility for sharing the cost of town highways has been a contentious factor in town-village relationships. Consequently, there has been a continual search for ways of promoting equity in the distribution of costs. One compromise permits towns to exempt village property from assessment for the cost of acquisition and repair of highway machinery, the cost of snow removal, and several other miscellaneous items.

7.4.2.1 Fire Protection

Fire protection is not a town function, since it can only be provided in towns through the medium of districts — fire districts, fire protection districts and fire alarm districts — all of which are discussed in Chapter 9 [91]. Since most TOV areas are covered by districts, fire protection can be considered, in a sense, a TOV service.

7.4.2.2 Special Districts

Towns in the path of suburban growth were not prepared to provide needed services on a town-wide basis. Tax bases were hardly sufficient to support town-wide water systems or sewer systems. The need was not general enough throughout the town so as to garner voter support to town-wide services. The expedient answer was, therefore, to create the special district. Large enough to serve the area of need and supported only by the property owners within the district, the special district required from the rest of the town only use of the town's credit to financially support its obligations and use of the town's organization to administer the services within the district. Districts have worked well and have multiplied in both number and type.

Unlike the districts discussed in Chapter 9 [91], special districts created under the Town Law are not units of local government, but are administered by the town board. Town improvement districts have proliferated, with lighting, water supply, sewerage, drainage, park, public parking, and refuse and garbage districts accounting for over 95 percent of all special districts. The idea has proved so flexible and has worked so well that it has been used to meet some unusual and unique needs. Escalator districts have been formed to relieve weary commuters of their climb to elevated train stations, and dock and erosion control districts have enhanced seaside properties on Long Island.

Special districts have been established, extended and consolidated until, by the end of 2010, there were approximately 6,927 improvement districts in existence — an average of more than seven for each town in the state.

Table 7.1: Town Special Improvement Districts by Type of District
As of December 31, 2010 [2]

Type of District	Number of Districts
Fire Protection	951
Drainage	582
Lighting	1,783
Park	153
Refuse and Garbage	160
Sewer	1,211
Water	1,602
Other	485
Total	6,927

Most special districts can be and are established under general provisions of Articles 12 and 12-A of the Town Law. Those which cannot must be created by act of the State Legislature.

Under Article 12, a petition from property owners in the area of the proposed district must specify the boundaries of the district and state the maximum permissible expenditure. For certain types of districts a map showing the boundaries of the district and the proposed improvements must accompany the petition. The petition must be signed by owners of more than one-half of the total assessed valuation of taxable property in the proposed district, including at least one-half of the resident-owned, taxable, assessed valuation therein. When such a petition is filed, the town board must call a public hearing on the proposal and, after consideration, approve or deny the establishment of the district. If the town board approves the establishment of a district for which the town is to incur indebtedness, it must apply to the State Comptroller for approval. The State Comptroller, after considering the application, must make an independent determination that establishment of the district will serve the public interest and that it is not an undue burden on the property or property owners who live there. After the State Comptroller approves the petition, the town board may adopt an order establishing the district.

Under Article 12-A, a petition is not required to establish a district; the town board may, on its own motion, subject to a permissive referendum, establish a district. All other procedural steps are essentially the same as under Article 12.

With the exception of 78 older special districts which retain their separate boards of commissioners, the town board acts as the administrative body for all improvement districts in a town. Specific provisions of the Town Law authorize a town board to let contracts for the construction of district improvements, determine the manner of levying assessments to cover costs, set water and sewer rents or other service charges, and provide for the issuance of obligations to cover capital costs. Although all district costs must be levied against the properties therein, the districts have no debt-incurring powers of their own. All obligations issued on their behalf must be general obligations of the town, and are chargeable to town debt limits.

7.4.2.3 Town Improvements

As towns have continued to develop in suburban areas, the need for services on a town-wide or at least TOV basis has become more pressing. The “town improvement” is a compromise between the district approach and the provision of services as a true town function. This approach allows a town board to construct infrastructure improvements in specific areas of the town while not establishing a district with defined boundaries. First authorized only for Suburban Towns, authority for town improvements was later extended to all towns. In establishing an improvement by this method, the town board has the option of levying the capital costs against the entire TOV area, or against the benefited areas only, or of allocating it between the two areas in any way it chooses. The cost of operating and maintaining the improvement must be levied against the entire TOV area. Thus, the town improvement procedure is simpler and more flexible than that available for creating an improvement district.

[2] NYS Attorney General Office 2010

7.5 Summary

Many towns in New York are still small governments providing basic services to rural residents and they continue the pattern of town government which originated before the American Revolution. Other town governments, caught in the mass population migrations of the Twentieth Century, have had to provide services usually associated with urban living. Both kinds of town governments — and the gradations between — must deal with problems such as protecting the environment and delivering municipal services against a fiscal background of ever increasing costs. Rising costs will probably compel town government to develop new patterns of working with other governments and new ways to deliver services. Town residents and government officials, who have had to respond to similar challenges in the past, will doubtless continue town government's long tradition of responding to change.

Chapter 8

Village Government

In New York State, the village is a general purpose municipal corporation formed voluntarily by the residents of an area in one or more towns to provide themselves with municipal services. But when a village is created, its area still remains a part of the town where it is located, and its residents continue to be residents and taxpayers of that town.

The first village was incorporated at the end of the eighteenth century. The village form of municipal organization became a prominent feature of the state's growing metropolitan areas between 1900 and 1940. The patterns of village organization are similar to those of cities.

Many people think of villages as being small, rural communities. Population size alone, however, does not determine whether one community becomes a village and another remains as an unincorporated "hamlet" in a town. In New York State, a village is a legal concept; it is a municipal corporation. The largest village in the state, Hempstead in Nassau County, had more than 53,000 residents in 2010, while the smallest city, Sherrill, had 3,071. Forty-eight of New York's 62 cities had populations in the year 2010 that were smaller than Hempstead's.

Villages were originally formed within towns to provide services for clusters of residents, first in relatively rural areas and later in suburban areas around large cities. Today, many of the existing 550 villages are in the areas surrounding the state's larger cities. Many villages have public service responsibilities which differ little from those of cities, towns and counties, and village officials face the full range of municipal obligations and challenges.

8.1 What is a Village?

A village is often referred to as "incorporated." However, since legally cities, towns, villages and counties are all "incorporated," there are no "unincorporated villages." The vernacular "incorporated village" likely came about because villages are areas within towns for which an additional municipal corporation has been formed.

Many places in the state having large numbers of people living in close proximity to one another are neither villages nor cities. Many have names, like neighborhoods often do. Others may even have a post office that bears the community's name. Some, like Levittown on Long Island, have thousands of residents. If, however, the people in these informal communities have not incorporated pursuant to the Village Law, they do not constitute a village. While many people refer to such places as "hamlets", the term "hamlet" does not define a formal community like a city, town or village.

By definition, a village is a municipality which, at the time of its incorporation, met statutory requirements then established as prerequisites to that incorporation (Village Law.) Although the Village Law now sets area and population criteria for initial village incorporation, a number of existing villages have populations smaller than the present statutory minimum.

8.2 Historical Development

The earliest villages in the state were incorporated partly to circumvent the legal confusion about the nature and scope of town government that resulted from legislative modification of English statutes. Generally, in the decades after the Revolution, villages in New York were created because clusters of people in otherwise sparsely settled towns wanted to secure fire or police protection or other public services. Those inhabitants receiving the fire or police service, and not the whole town, paid for such services. A forerunner of villages appears to have been a 1787 legislative act granting special privileges to part of a town, entitled "An act for the better extinguishing of fires in the town of Brooklyn."

The appearance of the village as a formal unit of local government stems from the 1790s. Villages were created by special acts of State Legislature, but the starting date for this process is in dispute among historians due to a lack of precision in terminology in those early legislative acts. In 1790, the Legislature granted specific powers to the trustees of "… part of the town of Rensselaerwyck, commonly called Lansingburgh." The term "village" first appeared in state law in a 1794 enactment incorporating Waterford. The legislative act of 1798, providing for the incorporation of Lansingburgh and Troy as villages, is seen by many historians as the first formal authorization in the state for the village form of government. This enactment included all of the legal elements (including an incorporation clause and delegation of taxing and regulatory power) deemed necessary for a true unit of local government.

First mention of the village as a constitutional civil division appeared in a section of the 1821 Constitution prescribing qualifications of voters. The Constitution of 1846 required that the Legislature "provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages." The Legislature passed a general Village Law in 1847, but continued to incorporate villages through the enactment of special charters, as it had for the previous half-century. Separate incorporation led to a variety of village government forms, even for villages of similar characteristics. In 1874, however, a revised Constitution forbade incorporation of villages by special act of the State Legislature. Since that time, New York State villages have been formed through local initiative pursuant to the Village Law.

An 1897 revision of the Village Law subjected those villages with charters to provisions of the Village Law that were not inconsistent with their charters. It also gave the charter villages the option of reincorporating under the general law. Although numerous charter villages did reincorporate, 12 villages still operate under charters. These are Alexander, Carthage, Catskill, Cooperstown, Deposit, Fredonia, Ilion, Mohawk, Ossining, Owego, Port Chester and Waterford.

In the first 40 years of the twentieth century, as people moved from cities into the suburbs, more than 160 villages were incorporated under the Village Law. The rapid growth of towns in suburban areas in the late 1930s and following World War II emphasized the need for alternatives to villages. To provide services, suburban areas made increasing use of the town improvement district. This had a profound effect on the growth of villages. Although more than 160 villages were formed from 1900 to 1940, 27 new villages appeared and 26 villages dissolved between 1940 and December 31, 2012.

There were 535 villages in New York State in 2018. They range in size from the Village of Dering Harbor with a 2010 Census population of 11, to the Village of Hempstead, with a 2010 Census population of 53,891. The majority of villages have populations under 2,500, although there were 24 villages between 10,000 and 20,000 population in 2010, and 11 villages with more than 20,000 population.

There are 72 villages located in two towns and 5 villages are located in three towns. There are nine villages which are in two counties. One village, Saranac Lake, lies in three towns and two counties. Five villages — Green Island in Albany County; East Rochester in Monroe County; and Scarsdale, Harrison and Mount Kisco in Westchester County — are coterminous with towns of the same name. A coterminous town-village is a unique form of local government organization. The town and village share the same boundaries and the governing body of one unit of the coterminous government may serve as the governing body of the other unit (i.e., the mayor serves as town supervisor and trustees serve as members of the town board).

8.3 Creation and Organization

The Village Law governs the incorporation of new villages and the organization of most existing villages. The 12 remaining charter villages are subject to this law only where it does not conflict with their respective charters.

8.3.1 Incorporation

A territory of 500 or more inhabitants may incorporate as a village in New York State, provided that the territory is not already part of a city or village. The territory must contain no more than five square miles at the time of incorporation, although it may be larger in land area if its boundaries are made coterminous with those of a school, fire, improvement or other district, or the entire boundaries of a town.

The incorporation process begins when a petition, signed by either 20 percent of the residents of the territory qualified to vote, or by the owners of more than 50 percent of the assessed value of real property in the territory, is submitted to the supervisor of the town in which all or the greatest part of the proposed village would lie. If the area lies in more than one town, copies of the petition are presented to the supervisors of the other affected towns.

Within 20 days from the filing of the petition the supervisor of each town affected must post a notice of public hearing on the petition. Where the proposed village is in more than one town, the giving of notice and subsequent hearing are a joint effort of the affected towns. The purpose of the hearing is to determine only whether the petition and the proposed incorporation are in conformance with the provisions of the Village Law. Other considerations and objections to the incorporation are not at issue. This formal hearing must be held between 20 and 30 days following posting of notice.

Within 10 days after the conclusion of the hearing the supervisor of the affected town must judge the legal sufficiency of the petition. If more than one town is involved and the supervisors cannot agree on a decision, their decision is deemed to be adverse to the petition. Any decision made is subject to review by the courts. If no review is sought within 30 days, the decision of the supervisor is final. If the supervisor decides against the petition, a new petition may be presented immediately. If the supervisor finds that the petition meets the requirements of the law or if the petition is sustained by the courts, a referendum is held within the proposed area no later than 40 days after the expiration of 30 days from the filing of the supervisors' favorable decision, or the filing of a final court order sustaining the petition. Only those residing in the proposed area of incorporation and qualified to vote in town elections may vote in the referendum.

Where the proposed area lies in one town, a majority of those voting is required in order to incorporate. Where more than one town is involved, an affirmative majority in the area proposed for incorporation in each town is required. If the required majorities are not obtained, then the question is defeated, and no new proceeding for incorporation of the same territory may be held for one year. If a favorable vote is obtained, and there is no court challenge, the town clerk of the town in which the original petition has been filed makes a report of incorporation.

Table 8.1: Village Incorporations Since 1940

Village	County	Date
Prattsburg	Steuben	12/07/1948
Tuxedo Park	Orange	08/13/1952
Sodus Point	Wayne	12/30/1957
New Square	Rockland	11/06/1961
Atlantic Beach	Nassau	06/21/1962
Amchir	Orange	09/09/1964
Pomona	Rockland	02/03/1967

Table 8.1: (continued)

Village	County	Date
Lake Grove	Suffolk	09/09/1968
Round Lake	Saratoga	08/07/1969
Sylvan Beach	Oneida	03/17/1971
Lansing	Tompkins	12/19/1974
Harrison	Westchester	09/09/1975
Kiryas Joel	Orange	03/02/1977
Rye Brook	Westchester	07/07/1982
Wesley Hills	Rockland	12/07/1982
New Hempstead	Rockland	03/21/1983
Islandia	Suffolk	04/17/1985
Montebello	Rockland	05/07/1986
Chestnut Ridge	Rockland	05/16/1986
Pine Valley	Suffolk	03/15/1988
Kaser	Rockland	01/25/1990
Airmont	Rockland	03/28/1991
W. Hampton Dunes	Suffolk	11/19/1993
East Nassau	Rensselaer	01/14/1998
Sagaponack	Suffolk	09/27/2005
S. Blooming Grove	Orange	07/14/2006
Woodbury	Orange	08/28/2006
Mastic Beach	Suffolk	09/21/2010

The report is sent to the Secretary of State, the State Comptroller, the State Office of Real Property Services, the county clerk and county treasurer of each county in which the village will be located, and the town clerks of each town in which the village will be located.

Upon receipt of the report, the Secretary of State prepares and files a Certificate of Incorporation. The certificate is also filed with the clerks of each town in which the village is located. The village is deemed incorporated on the date the report is filed with the Secretary of State. Within five days after the filing of the Certificate of Incorporation, the clerks of each town in which the village is located jointly appoint a resident of the new village area to serve as village clerk until a successor is chosen by the village's first elected board of trustees. Election of the board and mayor is held within 60 days of the appointment of the interim village clerk, except in instances where the new village embraces the entire territory of a town. In that case the election of village officers is held at the next regular election of town officials occurring not less than 30 days after the filing of the certificate of village incorporation.

8.3.2 The Legislative Body

The legislative body of a village — the board of trustees — is composed of the mayor and four trustees. However, the board may increase or decrease the number of trustees, subject to either referendum on petition or mandatory referendum, depending on how the local law is structured. Trustees are elected for a two-year term unless otherwise provided by local law.

The village board has broad powers to govern the affairs of the village, including:

- organizing itself and providing for rules of procedure

- adopting a budget and providing for the financing of village activities;
- abolishing or creating offices, boards, agencies and commissions, and delegating powers to these units;
- managing village properties; and
- granting final approval of appointments of all non-elected officers and employees made by the mayor.

The mayor presides over meetings of the board. A majority of the board, as fully constituted, is a quorum. No business may be transacted unless a quorum is present.

8.3.3 Executive Branch

The chief executive officer of most villages in New York State is the mayor. Unless otherwise provided by local law or charter, the mayor is elected for a two-year term. In addition to executive duties, the mayor presides over all meetings of the board of trustees and may vote on all questions coming before that body. The mayor must vote to break a tie. Unless provided by local law the mayor does not have veto power. The mayor is responsible for enforcing laws within the village and for supervising the police and other officers of the village. The mayor may share the law-enforcement responsibility with a village attorney — who may handle prosecutions for violations of village laws — and the county district attorney — who usually handles general criminal prosecutions in the county.

At the direction of the board of trustees, the mayor may initiate civil action on behalf of the village or may intervene in any legal action "necessary to protect the rights of the village and its inhabitants." Subject to the approval of the board of trustees, the mayor appoints all department and non-elected officers and employees. Except in villages which have a manager, the mayor acts as the budget officer. The mayor may, however, designate any other village officer to be budget officer. The budget officer serves at the mayor's pleasure. The mayor ensures that all claims against the village are properly investigated; the mayor may also execute contracts approved by the board of trustees and issue licenses. In certain cases, when authorized by the board of trustees, the mayor may sign checks and cosign, with the clerk, orders to pay claims.

At the annual meeting of the board of trustees, the mayor appoints one of the trustees as deputy mayor. If the mayor is absent or unable to act as mayor, the deputy mayor is vested with and may perform all the duties of that office.

8.3.4 Village Managers or Administrators

In order to provide full-time administrative supervision and direction some villages have created the office of village manager or administrator. The position of village manager is created by a local law, which fixes the powers of the office and the term of the incumbent. As an alternative to direct adoption of a local law establishing a village manager, a village may create a commission to prepare a local law establishing a village manager and defining the manager's duties and responsibilities. The commission must issue a report within the time set forth in the local law, which can be no later than two years after the appointment of its members. While there is no mandate that the commission prepare a local law creating a village manager, if the commission does prepare such a local law, it must be placed before the voters at a referendum; the board of trustees need not approve the local law.

The village manager is usually assigned administrative functions which would otherwise performed by the mayor. Under the Village Law, the manager may designate another village official as budget officer, to serve at the pleasure of the manager.

Fifty five villages in New York State had an administrator or manager in 2005; they are listed in Table 8.2 [86]. Some of these individuals hold more than one title and some are known as "coordinator".

Table 8.2: Villages Which Have Administrators/Managers [1]

Amityville	Ardsley	Attica	Bergen
Briarcliff Manor	Brockport	Bronxville	Canastota
Croton-on-Hudson	Dobbs Ferry	East Aurora	East Hampton
East Rochester	Ellenville	Elmsford	Fairport
Floral Park	Fredonia	Garden City	Great Neck Estates
Groton	Hamburg	Hastings-on-Hudson	Horseheads
Huntington Bay	Irvington	Lake Success	Lawrence
Lowville	Mamaroneck	Massapequa Park	Massena
Mount Kisco	Muttontown	Oakfield	Ocean Beach
Old Westbury	Ossining	Pelham	Pelham Manor
Pleasantville	Port Chester	Port Jefferson	Potsdam
Rockville Centre	Sea Cliff	Seneca Falls	Scarsdale
South Floral Park	Tarrytown	Thomaston	Walden

8.3.5 Other Village Officers

The village treasurer is the chief fiscal officer of the village. The treasurer maintains custody of all village funds, issues all checks and prepares an annual report of village finances.

The village clerk has responsibility for maintaining all records of the village. The clerk collects all taxes and assessments, when authorized by the village board, and orders the treasurer to pay claims. The clerk is required "on demand of any person" to "produce for inspection the books, records and papers of the office." The clerk must keep an index of written notices of defective conditions on village streets, highways, bridges or sidewalks and must bring these notices to the attention of the board at the next board meeting or within 10 days after their receipt, whichever is sooner.

Unless local law provides otherwise, the mayor appoints both the clerk and the treasurer with the approval of the board of trustees. The village board may also establish a term of office for each position by local law. In many villages, the offices of clerk and treasurer are combined and are held by a single person.

The board of trustees may establish the office of village justice. Where no village justice is established, or where the office has been abolished, the functions devolve on the justices of the town — or towns — in which the village is located.

8.3.6 Organization for Service Delivery

Differences in the size of villages and in the services they perform make it difficult to describe the organization of a "typical" village. Larger villages often have multi-departmental organizations similar to cities, while small villages may employ one or two individuals. Functions performed by villages range from basic road repair and snow removal to large-scale community development programs and public utility plants. A number of villages operate their own municipal electric systems.

[1] Source: 2005 NYCOM Directory of City & Village Officials, New York State Conference of Mayors and Municipal Officials, 2005.

8.4 Financing Village Services

Like most local governments, villages have a strong reliance on the real property tax to finance their activities. In the 2012 fiscal year the real property tax accounted for 49 percent of total village revenues in New York State. The balance of revenues comes from a variety of sources. These include user charges and other revenue from water and sewer services, electric systems, airports and marinas, as well as license and rental fees and penalties on taxes. Special activities generated 37 percent of all village revenues in fiscal 2012. Sales tax revenues in 2012 accounted for 6 percent of total revenues for villages. State and federal aid provided 8 percent of village revenue in 2012.

8.4.1 State Aid and Village Finance

The major state aid program which provides funds to villages is per capita revenue sharing. Other important components of state aid to villages include the mortgage tax, aid for the construction and operation of sewage treatment plants, and aid to youth bureaus and recreation programs. A more detailed discussion of revenue sharing and other state aid appears in Chapter 11 [115].

The mortgage tax is a state tax which is collected by counties. The allocation to towns is made according to the location of the real property covered by the mortgages upon which the tax was collected. For towns which contain a village within its limits, a portion of the town allocation is made to the village according to the proportion the assessed value of the village bears to twice the total assessed valuation of the town. While a village, under this formula, would receive aid even if no mortgages were registered in a village, the town may receive the greater amount of revenue, even though much of the property which yields the revenue may be within villages in the town.

8.5 Village Dissolution

Just as villages are formed by local action, they can be dissolved by local action. Article 17-A of the General Municipal Law, effective March 2010, provides the procedure for village officials and electors to disband their village. Since villages are formed within towns, the underlying town or towns would become fully responsible for governing the territory of the former village after it is dissolved.

The dissolution process may be commenced by the village board of trustees on its own motion or through the presentation of an appropriate petition to the board of trustees. If the board seeks to initiate dissolution process on its own motion, it may submit a proposition to dissolve the village to the electors, in accordance with a plan for dissolution. If a petition is presented, the board is obligated to hold a referendum on the dissolution question. If a majority of electors vote to dissolve, then the board must create and endorse a “dissolution plan”, which is subject to permissive referendum by the electors. In either case, the question must be decided by the voters of the village at an election.

It is not unusual for a village board to seek assistance of community members and other government officials as it explores the question of dissolution. One way of doing this is to form a study committee charged with preparing a dissolution study and a draft dissolution plan for consideration by the board of trustees. Alternatively, the board of trustees can study dissolution on its own, with the assistance of other village officers and employees. Since village dissolution results in the termination of the corporate entity, there are many issues to be considered, including:

- potential means to continue services, such as fire, police, garbage collection, water and sewer services, and the projected cost of services;
- disposition of surplus village properties;

- regulatory matters, such as the continuation of land use restrictions; and
- continuing contractual matters, including public employee contracts.

Many of these issues require implementation by the underlying town or towns, yet the statutory dissolution process provides no role for towns. Despite this, successful dissolutions have involved town officials from the start of dissolution deliberations. This can be accomplished through active participation of town officials on a village study committee or through regular joint meetings of village and town officers. While village electors alone determine whether dissolution will occur, these same electors are, and will continue to be after dissolution, town electors as well. This factor favors early and active participation by town officers as the plan for dissolution is formed.

Table 8.3: Village Dissolutions in New York State

Village	Date
Altmar (Oswego County)	06/01/2013
Andes (Delaware County)	12/31/2003
Belleville (Jefferson County)	04/20/1979
Bloomingdale (Essex County)	02/26/1985
Bridgewater (Oneida County)	12/31/2014
Downsville (Delaware County)	09/21/1950
East Randolph (Cattaraugus County)	12/31/2011
Edwards (St. Lawrence County)	12/31/2012
Elizabethtown (Essex County)	04/23/1981
Fillmore (Allegany County)	01/13/1994
Forestport (Oneida County)	06/18/1938
Fort Covington (Franklin County)	04/05/1976
Friendship (Allegany County	04/04/1977
Henderson (Jefferson County)	05/23/1992
Keeseville (Clinton & Essex County)	12/31/2014
LaFargeville (Jefferson County)	04/18/1922
Limestone (Cattaraugus County)	12/31/2010
Lyons (Wayne County)	12/31/2015
Marlborough (Ulster County)	04/20/1928
Mooers (Clinton County)	03/31/1994
Newfield (Tompkins County)	12/02/1926
North Bangor (Franklin County)	03/24/1939
Northville (Suffolk County)	05/16/1930
Old Forge (Herkimer County)	10/21/1933
Oramel (Allegany County)	12/23/1925
Pike (Wyoming County)	12/31/2009
Prattsburg (Steuben County)	09/22/1972
Prattsville (Greene County)	03/26/1900
Randolph (Cattaraugus County)	12/31/2011
Rifton (Ulster County)	08/18/1919
Rosendale (Ulster County)	05/23/1979
Perrysburg (Cattaraugus County)	12/31/2011
Pine Valley (Suffolk County)	04/4/1990
Pine Hill (Ulster County)	09/24/1985
Pleasant Valley (Dutchess County)	05/22/1926
Roxbury (Delaware County)	04/18/1900

Table 8.3: (continued)

Village	Date
Savannah (Wayne County)	04/25/1979
Schenevus (Otsego County)	03/29/1993
Seneca Falls (Seneca County)	12/31/2011
The Landing (Suffolk County)	05/25/1939
Ticonderoga (Essex County)	05/1/1992
Westport (Essex County)	05/29/1992
Woodhull (Steuben County)	01/13/1986

8.6 Trends

Several significant trends, issues and problems affecting village government in New York have become apparent in the last quarter of the Twentieth Century.

8.6.1 Zoning

The power to zone the area of the village separately from the remainder of the town still provides an incentive for village incorporation. The 1972 recodification of the Village Law continues the authority of the board of trustees to regulate land use, lot sizes and density of development. With certain exceptions, villages which adopt their first zoning law must establish a zoning commission to draft regulations and establish zone boundaries. They must also establish a zoning board of appeals to hear appeals from decisions made by the village official who enforces zoning regulations. A more detailed discussion of zoning and other aspects of land use regulation appears in Chapter 16 [183]. It should be noted that the proliferation of villages in Nassau County resulted in a charter provision that grants zoning authority to towns within any territory incorporated as a village on or after January 1, 1963. There have, however, been no villages incorporated on or since that date.

8.6.2 Village-Town Relations

Fiscal relations continue to be a source of contention between towns and villages. Village residents are liable for payment of taxes to the town in which their village is located, as well as to the village in which they reside. Before the advent of the automobile, village residents rarely considered this dual taxation unduly burdensome. However, the need for paved town roads and the rapid growth of population in towns near the state's metropolitan areas has greatly increased expenditures for town highways and highway-related items.

The State Highway Law exempts village residents from paying the costs of repair and improvement of town highways, thus relieving them of a substantial portion of the town highway maintenance expense. Unless exempted by the town board, however, village residents must help bear the costs of town highway equipment and snow removal on town roads. Village residents not exempted from such highway costs may believe they are being taxed for town services they do not receive or use in addition to being taxed for the same services within their village. Villages also regard as inequitable the rent the town may charge for village use of the town highway equipment that the village residents have already helped pay for through taxation.

The question of who should pay for what services has been a source of contention between towns and villages since the 1950s, but it is one which can be resolved through local cooperative action. Towns and their constituent villages often undertake formal and informal cooperative ventures. Many share municipal buildings as well as officials and employees, or engage in cooperative purchasing, auto maintenance and emergency vehicle dispatching. For example, one government may provide library, ambulance, landfill or recreation programs to the other at a negotiated fee. More information on inter-municipal agreements is found in Chapter 17 [197].

Chapter 9

Special Purpose Units of Government

Local municipal services are provided in New York not only by the general purpose municipal corporations - counties, cities, towns and villages - but by several types of special purpose units of government. These include school districts, fire districts and a variety of public benefit corporations — often called "authorities." In most cases, such units provide only a single service or a group of closely-related services.

As demands for municipal services have increased, many new types of public benefit corporations have been established. These entities normally provide a single service or type of service, such as water and sewer services, airport management, or industrial development, rather than the gamut of government services provided by the general purpose municipality.

School districts, fire districts and "local" public benefit corporations, often referred to as authorities, are discussed within this chapter.

9.1 Public Education

The constitutional basis for school district organization appears in Article XI, section 1 of the State Constitution:

> "The legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of free common schools, wherein all the children of the state may be educated."

The 1795 legislative session provided, on a five-year basis, a statewide system of support for schools, but comprehensive legislation establishing school districts was not enacted until 1812.

Education in New York State today represents the largest single area of expense for local governments, accounting for approximately one-third of all local government expenditures in the state.

By any measure, the most prominent elements of the educational effort are the 697 local school districts, which in 2010-11 enrolled more than 2.6 million pupils and spent over $56 billion.

School districts cover the entire area of New York State, frequently crossing city, town, village and even county lines. With the exception of the "big five" cities (over 125,000 in population), where the school budget is part of the municipal budget, each school district is a separate governmental unit having the power to levy taxes and incur debt.

The State Education Department, acting in accordance with policies determined by the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York, supervises and provides leadership to the public schools.

Some of this responsibility is exercised through supervisory districts headed by district superintendents of schools.

9.1.1 Basic School District Types

Table 9.1: New York State School Districts, as of July 2004 [1]

Type	Number of Districts
Common School Districts	11
Union Free School Districts	161
Central School Districts	460
City School Districts	62
Central High School Districts	3
Total	697

SOURCE: Department of Education

There are five different types of school districts in New York State:

9.1.1.1 Common School Districts

The common school district, with its origins in legislation of 1812, is the oldest of the existing types. Common school districts do not have the legal authority to operate high schools but, like all school districts, are responsible for ensuring a secondary education for resident children. As a consequence, common school districts send pupils to designated high schools of neighboring school districts. As of July 2011, there were 11 common school districts operating in the state. One common district, the South Mountain Hickory District in the Town of Binghamton, does not directly provide education; it contracts for all education. Common school districts are typically governed by either a sole trustee or a three-member board of trustees.

9.1.1.2 Union Free School Districts

The 1853 session of the Legislature established the union free school district, which is generally formed from two or more common school districts joining together for the purpose of providing a high school. Many of the early union free districts had boundaries which were coterminous with, or close to, those of a village or city.

Although the original purpose of the union free district was to provide for secondary education, about one-fifth of these districts currently do not operate a high school. As of July 2011, there were 161 union free school districts, of which 28 provide less than a K-12 education. Thirteen of the latter are components of central school districts, while the rest provide secondary education by contracting with neighboring districts. Another 13 are districts that are established solely to serve children residing in specified child care institutions. These districts are often referred to as “special act” school districts. Union free school districts are governed by a board of education that is composed of between three and nine members.

9.1.1.3 Central School Districts

The central school district is the most common type of school district in New York State, with 460 in existence as of July 1, 2011. They were established as a means of providing a more comprehensive and intensive education than was possible in most of the 10,000 small common districts operating in the state at the turn of the 20th century.

[1] Source: NYS Department of Education.

The solution came in the form of the Central Rural Schools Act of 1914, which was revised in 1925. This legislation, together with state aid incentives, preceded a massive school reorganization, which resulted in the central school districts of today.

A central school district may be formed by any number of common, union free and central districts. As in the case of union free districts, central school districts have the authority to operate high schools. The governance of a central district follows essentially the same laws as a union free district; thus, it can be viewed as a variation of the union free type of district.

One difference between the two types of districts is the size of the board of education. A central district's board may consist of five, seven or nine members. Within this limitation, the size of the board or length of term (three, four or five years) may be changed by the voters of the district.

9.1.1.4 City School Districts

There are two types of organization for city school districts, the application of which depends on population.

School districts in the 57 cities of under 125,000 in population are separate governmental units. Each district is governed by its own board of education and has independent taxing and debt-incurring powers. In all of these districts, the members are elected to the school boards, which may consist of five, seven, or nine members.

Many of these city districts encompass larger geographic areas than their respective cities, and are referred to as "enlarged city school districts." Seven of these enlarged districts have been reorganized as "central city school districts," a designation limited to districts in cities with less than 125,000 population.

In the state's five cities of over 125,000 in population (the "Big Five" – Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Yonkers and New York City), district boundaries are coterminous with those of their respective cities. Each of these school districts has a board or panel with varying independence and power to set policy for the school system. However, none of these boards have the power to levy taxes or incur debt for the district. Instead, funding is provided as part of the overall municipal budget. Buffalo, Rochester and Syracuse have separately-elected boards of education. In Yonkers, however, the board is appointed by the mayor. Buffalo and Yonkers each have nine-member boards, while Rochester and Syracuse have seven-member boards.

Since 2002, New York City public school system is been run as a city agency, headed by a Chancellor. Instead of a Board of Education that is responsible for setting broad policy, the Department of Education has the Panel for Educational Policy (PEP), which advises the Chancellor and approves major Department of Education initiatives, budgets and union agreements. The PEP consists of 13 appointed members and the Chancellor. Each borough president appoints one member and the mayor appoints the remaining eight. The Chancellor serves as an ex-officio non-voting member. The PEP is responsible for electing a chairperson from among the voting members.

9.1.1.5 Central High School Districts

The central high school district is the most unique organization type; as of July 2011 only three existed, all in Nassau County.

Central high school districts provide secondary education to children from at least two common or union free districts, which provide elementary education. Appointed representatives from the component districts' boards of education comprise the board of education for each central high school district.

Authorized in 1917, this type of district was seen as a way to promote reorganization of smaller school districts. However, central high school districts proved unpopular, resulting in the repeal of authority for the formation of additional districts in 1944. Thirty-seven years later, in 1981, legislation reinstated the option of central high school districts for Suffolk County only.

9.1.1.6 The Supervisory District

The supervisory district was established in 1910, as a means of providing educational supervision and leadership to the thousands of tiny school districts then in existence. A district superintendent of schools was appointed to head each supervisory district.

At the time of their founding, 208 supervisory districts were established in the state, with as many as seven located in a single county. As of July 1, 2011, 37 supervisory districts existed, each coterminous with the area served by one of the 37 Boards of Cooperative Educational Services (BOCES) in the state.

The district superintendent of schools serves as a local representative of the Education Commissioner and as chief executive officer of the BOCES. Reflecting this dual role, the district superintendent is appointed by the governing body of the BOCES from a list of candidates approved by the Education Commissioner.

9.1.1.7 The BOCES

A Board of Cooperative Educational Services (BOCES) provides a single organization through which local school districts may pool their resources to provide services which might ordinarily be beyond their individual capabilities. The BOCES is formed by a majority vote of the members of local school boards within a supervisory district. A board of five to fifteen members governs the BOCES organization. Members are elected for staggered three-year terms at an annual meeting of the boards of education of the constituent districts.

BOCES services include specialized instructional services — such as classes for students with disabilities and vocational education — as well as support services such as data processing, purchasing and the provision of specialized equipment for constituent districts.

A BOCES has no taxing authority; the sources of BOCES funds are primarily taxes levied by its component districts, state aid, and a relatively small amount of federal aid. The component districts' share of costs is based either on full valuation, a pupil count based on enrollment, or upon the Resident Weighted Average Daily Attendance (RWADA) of each district. Currently, all BOCES, except for one, use the RWADA method of allocating costs.

BOCES services include specialized instructional services – such as classes for students with disabilities and vocational education – as well as support services such as data processing, purchasing and the provision of specialized equipment for constituent districts. Specific BOCES services are financed through contracts between the BOCES and the individual school districts. Thus, a school district pays only for those services it uses. The state reimburses a portion of the individual district's payment to the BOCES for such services.

At the end of the 2010-11 school year, the number of students enrolled from constituent districts ranged from 8,413 to 203,023 students. All but nine school districts in the state were members of a BOCES. Of the nine, four are eligible to become members of BOCES; the remaining districts are the five city school districts with a population over 125,000 which are not eligible to join BOCES. The 37 BOCES served a total of 1,529,320 students in the 2010-11 fiscal year.

9.1.1.8 Charter Schools

A charter school is an independent public school that operates under a "charter," a type of contract issued by the New York State Board of Regents. Charter schools typically provide innovative curricula or other non-traditional approaches that differentiate them from regular public schools. Charter schools are financed by local, state and federal funds, but they have the flexibility to operate free of many educational laws and regulations.

Each charter school, however, is held accountable to provisions in the Charter School Law (Article 56 of the Education Law) and the charter authorizing the school. Every school must also satisfy the same health and safety, civil rights, and student achievement requirements that are applicable to other public schools. A school's charter may be revoked for violation of charter provisions, failure to meet performance levels on state assessments, serious violations of law, fiscal mismanagement, or employee discrimination in contravention of the Civil Service Law.

A charter is originally issued for a term of up to five years. Upon the expiration of each term, a charter may be renewed for five more years. The Board of Regents may not issue more than 460 charters statewide.

9.1.2 Financing Education

9.1.2.1 Property Taxes

With few exceptions, property taxation is the only major local revenue source available to school districts. Property taxes for schools totaled more than $26.3 billion in 2010-11, or 46 percent of all school revenues. School districts are not subject to constitutional or statutory tax limits, but resident district voters approve annual school budgets, except for the "Big Five" cities. A property tax cap, enacted for school districts and other municipalities in 2011, beginning with the 2012-13 school year, limits the growth of property taxes. If the voters defeat a proposed budget, a school board may only levy taxes equal to the prior year's levy to meet costs for teachers' salaries and a number of "ordinary contingent" expenses. Levy to support capital expenditures, increases in expenditures from court orders and increases in pension cost is excluded from the property tax cap.

In each of the state's five largest cities, the city council determines the school tax levy. The board of education prepares its budget for approval by the city council. The council may increase or decrease the budget as a whole, but it may not change individual items. The levy for schools is then included in the overall city tax levy. Furthermore, the school tax levy must be accommodated within the two percent city tax limit allowed by the state constitution for Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse and Yonkers, and 2.5 percent allowed for New York City. Nonproperty Taxes. Nonproperty taxes represent a small revenue source for school districts. In 2010-11 school districts collected $271 million from non-property tax sources, or slightly more than one percent of total revenue collected from taxes.

The only nonproperty tax a school district may levy directly is a tax on consumers' utility bills, which may be imposed at a maximum rate of three percent. This tax is limited to school districts with territory in cities of under 125,000 population. Of the 66 school districts eligible to impose this tax in 2010-11, only 24 actually did so.

While only cities and counties can impose a sales tax, the Tax Law provides that they may distribute all or part of the proceeds to school districts. Five of the counties which collected sales taxes in fiscal 2010-11 distributed a portion of the revenue to school districts.

9.1.2.2 State Aid

Receipts from state aid programs represented the second largest revenue source for school districts in the 2010-11 school year. Approximately $20 billion was received in that year, representing about 35 percent of total school revenues. There are two major categories of state aid to education: general and special aids. The latter is a group of relatively small programs, generally experimental or aimed at meeting the special needs of a specific group of pupils.

General aid is paid to all school districts, with variations related to formulas taking into account such items as taxable property, income of district residents per pupil, and district size and organization. General aid includes:

- operating expense aid;
- BOCES aid;
- transportation aid;
- high tax rate aid;

- growth aid;
- building aid;
- reorganization incentive aid.

Operating aid, which represents more than one-half of total aid provided, is for support of the general operating expenditures of a district. Other general aid formulas exist to compensate for particular cost factors in school operations, building construction costs, high tax rates and transportation costs.

9.1.2.3 Federal Aid

The third largest revenue source, but one far smaller than state aid or local revenues, is federal aid. Federal assistance represented about $4.6 billion in revenues for the 2010-11 fiscal year, or 8.2 percent of total revenues.

9.2 Organizing for Fire Protection

Fire protection services in New York have long been viewed as an essential governmental function in densely populated areas. Early on, cities as well as many villages made provisions for fire departments and the organization of fire companies using both career and volunteer services. This did not happen in towns, however, where sparse development made fire, while no less catastrophic to the individuals involved, a more personal than a communal threat.

Traditional fire protection in rural areas consisted of close neighbors forming bucket brigades. The era of the bucket brigade was followed by the formation of loosely-knit groups which accumulated rudimentary firefighting equipment. Such groups were the precursors to the modern-day volunteer fire companies, which have developed a high degree of organization and capability.

For many years volunteer fire companies supplied reasonably effective fire protection to rural areas without government assistance or support. Gradually, however, greater demands for fire protection service, the high cost of modern and specialized equipment, and the need for giving volunteers economic security in the event of duty-connected death or injury, forced the independent fire services to request assistance from the government.

In towns, the answer came through the establishment of special districts on an area-by-area basis. These districts took two basic forms: fire districts, which were true district corporations and enjoyed autonomy from town government; and other types of districts, including fire protection districts, fire alarm districts and certain water supply districts, which were little more than assessment areas that received fire protection.

9.2.1 Fire Districts

A fire district is a public corporation established for the purpose of providing fire protection and responding to certain other emergencies. The New York State Constitution (Article X) recognizes that fire districts have certain characteristics of general purpose municipal corporations, such as powers to incur indebtedness and to require the levy of taxes. Generally, fire district taxes are levied by the county and collected by the town or towns where the district exists. A fire district is almost a completely autonomous political entity; it has its own elected governing body, its own administrative officers, and it must observe its own expenditure limitations. However, it is dependent upon the parent town or towns for its initial creation and extension pursuant to Article 11 of the Town Law; to consolidate or dissolve, a fire district must follow the procedures in Article 17-A of New York State General Municipal Law.

As of December 31, 2010, New York had 864 fire districts. They are of varying sizes, including smaller districts with annual budgets of several thousand dollars and large districts, some of which feature departments that have both career and volunteer firefighters and annual budgets of several million dollars.

9.2.1.1 Establishment

A fire district is created to provide fire protection to areas of towns outside villages. Villages usually provide fire protection on their own. Towns and villages may establish joint town-village fire districts.

A town board may establish a fire district on its own motion or upon receipt of a petition from owners of at least 50 percent of the resident-owned taxable assessed valuation in the proposed district. Whichever method is used, the town board must hold a public hearing and determine that: all properties in the proposed district will benefit, all properties which benefit have been included and that the creation of the district is in the public interest.

If the town board decides to establish a district and proposes to finance an expenditure for the district by the issuance of obligations, it must request approval from the State Comptroller, who must first determine that the public interest will be served by the creation of the district and that the cost of the district will not be an undue burden on property in the district. If such approval is not required, a certified copy of the notice of hearing must be filed with the State Comptroller.

After a fire district has been established, the town board appoints the first temporary board of five fire commissioners and the first fire district treasurer. At the first election, five commissioners are elected for staggered terms of one to five years so that one term expires each year. At each subsequent election one commissioner is elected for a full term of five years. The fire district treasurer is elected for three years, although the office may subsequently be made appointive for a one-year term. A fire district secretary is appointed by the board of fire commissioners for a one-year period.

9.2.1.2 Operational Organization

After establishment and initial appointments by the town board, the fire district becomes virtually autonomous from the town in its day-to-day operations.

A fire district has only those powers that are expressly granted by statute, or which are necessarily implied by the statute. Unlike towns, villages, cities and counties, a fire district does not possess home rule powers.

The powers granted to a fire district board are extremely specific and narrowly limited. A listing of some of the more important and general powers granted to the board of fire commissioners in Town Law serves as a quick synopsis of many of the important areas of operation for fire districts:

- They shall have the powers to make any and all contracts for statutory purposes within the appropriations approved by the taxpayers or within statutory limitations;
- They may organize, operate, maintain, and equip fire companies, and provide for the removal of members for cause;
- They may adopt rules and regulations governing all fire companies and departments in the district, prescribe the duties of the members, and enforce discipline;
- They may purchase apparatus and equipment for the extinguishing and prevention of fires, for the purpose of the emergency rescue and first aid squads and the fire police squads;
- They may acquire real property and construct buildings for preservation of equipment and for social and recreational use by firefighters and residents of the district;

- They may construct and maintain fire alarm systems;
- They may purchase, develop, or contract for a supply of water for firefighting purposes; and
- They may contract to provide firefighting or emergency services outside the fire district where such services can be supplied without undue hazard to the fire district.

9.2.1.3 Financing

Fire districts are not governed by the constitutional tax or debt limits that restrict most municipal corporations. However, statutory limitations are imposed on their spending and financing authority.

Under section 176(18) of the Town Law, every fire district has a minimum basic spending limitation of $2,000, plus an additional amount related to full valuation of district taxable real property in excess of one million dollars. Several important expenditures are exempt from this spending limitation, such as certain insurance costs, salaries of career firefighters, most debt service and contracts for fire protection or water supplies. The basic spending limitation may be exceeded only if a proposition for the increase is approved by the voters of the district. Further, many capital expenditures proposed for a fire district, which would exceed the spending limitation, also require voter approval. Certain expenditures which are not chargeable to the spending limitation may also be subject to voter approval under other provisions of law (e.g., General Municipal Law §6-g, relative to capital reserve funds).

A fire district may incur debt by issuing obligations pursuant to provisions of the New York State Local Finance Law. Fire districts are subject to a statutory debt limit (generally three percent of the full valuation of taxable real property in the fire district) and mandatory referendum requirements.

Within the statutory constraints, the district has general autonomy in developing its budget. When completed, the budget is filed with the town budget officer of each of the towns where the district is located. The town board can make no changes in a fire district budget and must submit it with the town budget to the county for levy and spreading on the town tax roll. When the taxes are collected, the town supervisor must turn over to the district treasurer all taxes levied and collected for the fire district.

In 1956, the Volunteer Firefighters' Benefit Law was enacted to provide benefits similar to those provided by Workers' Compensation for volunteer firefighters injured, or die from injuries incurred, in line of duty. Cities, towns, villages and fire districts finance these benefits through their annual budgets.

9.2.1.4 Fire Department Organization

The board of fire commissioners exercises general policy control over its fire department, while the chief of the department exercises full on-line authority at emergency scenes. The fire department of a fire district encompasses all fire companies organized within the district, together with career employees who may be appointed by the board of fire commissioners. Fire companies usually are, but need not be, volunteer fire companies incorporated under the provisions of the Not-for-Profit Corporation Law. They can be formed within the fire district only with the consent of the board of fire commissioners and, thereafter, new members can only be admitted with board consent.

All officers of the fire department must be members of the department, residents of the state and, if required by the board of fire commissioners, residents of the fire district. Officers are nominated by ballot at fire department meetings, and appointments by the board can be made only from such nominated candidates.

9.2.1.5 Joint Fire Districts in Towns and Villages

Article 11-A of the Town Law and Article 22-A of the Village Law allow for the establishment of joint fire districts in one or more towns and one or more villages. Under the provisions of the Town Law, if it appears to be in the public interest, the town board(s) and village board(s) shall hold a joint meeting for the purpose of jointly proposing the establishment of a joint fire district. If, at the joint meeting, it is decided by majority vote of each board to propose a joint district, the boards must hold, upon public notice, a joint public hearing at a location within the proposed district. If, after the public hearing, the town board(s) and village board(s) determine that the establishment of the joint fire district is in the public interest, each board may adopt a separate resolution, subject to a permissive referendum, establishing the joint fire district.

The new joint fire district established pursuant to Article 11-A of the Town Law is governed by the provisions of Article 11 of the Town Law unless there is an inconsistency between the two articles. In such case, Article 11-A would provide the prevailing language. Management of the affairs of joint fire districts is under a board of fire commissioners composed of between three and seven members, who are either appointed by the participating town boards and/or village boards of trustees in joint session, or elected as provided in Article 11.

Upon the establishment of a joint district, the town board or village board of trustees of each participating municipality shall by local law dissolve any existing fire, fire alarm or fire protection districts contained within the joint fire district. The board of trustees of a village or the board of commissioners of a fire district, all of the territory of which is embraced within the boundaries of a joint fire district, may by resolution authorize the sale or transfer of any village-owned or district-owned fire house, fire apparatus, and fire equipment to the joint district. Such transfer may occur with or without consideration, and subject to the terms and conditions deemed fitting and proper by the board of trustees or board of commissioners.

9.2.2 Fire Protection and Fire Alarm Districts

Fire protection districts and fire alarm districts are not public corporations. Both types of districts may be described as assessment areas within which a town can provide limited services and assess the cost back against the taxable properties within the district.

Fire protection districts are established for the sole purpose of providing fire protection by contract. After establishing a fire protection district, a town board may contract with any city, village, fire district or incorporated fire company maintaining suitable apparatus and appliances to provide fire protection to the district for a period not exceeding five years. A town may also acquire apparatus and equipment for use in the district and may contract with any city, village, fire district or incorporated fire company for operation, maintenance and repair of the apparatus and equipment and for the furnishing of fire protection in the district. The cost of the contracted services, together with certain other expenses incurred by reason of the establishment of the district, is then levied against the properties of the district on the annual tax roll.

Fire alarm districts are formed primarily to finance the installation and maintenance of a fire alarm system. However, a town board can contract for fire protection for these districts in a manner that is similar to the way it provides protection for fire protection districts.

9.3 Public Benefit Corporations

9.3.1 The Nature of Public Benefit Corporations

Public benefit corporations and other special purpose entities created for specific limited public purposes are often referred to as authorities. Many of these entities, however, carry other terms within their titles such as commissions, districts, corporations, foundations, agencies or funds. For the sake of clarity, this chapter limits discussion to municipal level authorities and special purpose entities.

The first public authority in New York State was created in 1921 by an interstate compact that required the approval of the United States Congress. However, the idea of public benefit corporations or local authorities with independent powers, including the ability to incur debt and by extension the power to levy taxes in order to retire debt, was not quickly embraced by the public. In 1956, only 90 such entities existed in the state. As of 2012, 1266 such entities, including local housing authorities, urban renewal agencies, industrial development agencies and others, filed separate financial statements with the Office of the State Comptroller.[2]

Table 9.2: Local Authorities and other Special Purpose Entities [4]

Type	Number of Entities
Housing authorities	143
Parking authorities	7
Urban Renewal Agencies	46
Industrial Development Agencies	112
Public Libraries	403
Library Systems	23
Association Libraries	354
Soil & Water Conservation Districts	58
Other Town Special Districts	70
Consolidated Health Districts	50
Total	1266

The traditional purpose of the public authority was to construct, operate and finance specific types of improvements. This concept has broadened, however, and many authorities now exist to meet such diverse needs as housing, parking, water supply, sewage treatment, industrial development, solid waste management, urban renewal, transportation, and community development.

9.3.2 Objectives

Public benefit corporations have been created for a number of reasons, including to:

- overcome jurisdictional problems in the operation of facilities or services that are best provided on a regional, interstate or even international basis;
- provide an administrative entity with the ability to operate and manage public enterprises, without being subject to many of the limitations which apply to the operations of the state and its political subdivisions;
- facilitate a transition from private to public operation;
- finance public improvements or services by using rents or user charges from the improvement or service itself without having to levy additional taxes;
- permit the use of revenue bonds (secured by revenues which the improvement) in order to finance the project, rather than general obligation bonds of a municipality;
- permit financing without being subject to voter approval or constitutional debt limit restrictions; and
- provide a vehicle which can take advantage of certain types of federal grants and loans that are not easily available to general purpose municipal corporations.

[2] Office of the State Comptroller, 2013

[4] Entity totals reflect units (not including joint activity units or component units) that file separate financial statements with the Office of the State Comptroller. Note: Housing Authorities are not required to file financial statements with the Office of the State Comptroller.

9.3.3 Powers and Restraints

Public benefit corporations have many of the same powers as general purpose governments, plus some powers that are not enjoyed by general purpose governments. In addition, authorities are not subject to some of the traditional constitutional and statutory restraints imposed upon general purpose governments, such as:

- constitutional debt limitations, but they may be subject to statutory limits set forth in their own enabling legislation;
- provisions of the State Finance Law or the Local Finance Law relating to the issuance and sale of obligations, except to the extent provided in their enabling legislation, and they have greater flexibility in scheduling debt payments;
- the type of public bidding provisions applicable to state and municipal governments.

The power of each public benefit corporation is set forth in its own legislative authorization. The tendency has been to put some of the requirements applicable to general purpose governments (such as the requirement for public bidding) into the special acts establishing authorities, although often in different forms. In addition, several provisions of the Public Authorities Law contain requirements applicable to all or a class of authorities, such as requirements to adopt investment guidelines and rules for awarding personal services contracts. However, the basic financial provisions that distinguish authorities from municipalities, again subject to the requirements of their own special acts, have been kept reasonably intact. Since enhanced fiscal powers often are the most important incentive for using authorities to provide public services, it is useful to explore these powers in greater depth.

9.3.4 Fiscal Powers

Authorities generally have one fiscal limitation that distinguishes them from municipal corporations. No authority may be established having both the power to incur debt and the power to levy or require the levy of taxes or assessments.[5] This is a constitutional power generally reserved for true municipal corporations. Also, an authority cannot be created with both debt-incurring power and the power to collect rentals, charges, fees or rates for services provided, except by special act of the State Legislature.

Generally, an authority may not be created within a city with power to both contract indebtedness and to collect charges from owners or occupants of real property within the city for a service formerly provided by the city, without approval of the electorate.[6]

Subject to these restrictions, authorities may use their fiscal power to finance their authorized functions. They sometimes may even finance improvements and services that cannot be provided directly by the municipal corporations included in the area of the authority. They also often enjoy the same income tax exempt status as municipal corporations on the interest on their obligations. In consideration of these factors, many municipalities to turn to authorities to provide capital-intensive improvements or services.

In the issuance of their financial obligations, authorities generally are not bound by the maturity and certain other requirements in the provisions of the Local Finance Law. Authorities, on the other hand, may have to pay somewhat higher interest rates to borrow money, since their obligations are secured by prospective revenues only and are not backed by the full faith and credit of a municipal corporation with the ability to levy taxes.

Neither the state nor any municipality may become liable for the payment of the obligations of any authority. However, the state or a municipality, if authorized by the Legislature, is not precluded from acquiring the properties of an authority and paying its indebtedness.

[5] State Constitution, Article VIII, section 3
[6] State Constitution, Article X, section 5

Chapter 10

Citizen Participation and Involvement

If the American system of government is to function properly, citizens must actively participate in its operations at all levels, but especially at the local level. Local officials have both a responsibility and a stake in keeping citizens fully informed about local programs and activities and giving them clear opportunities to play meaningful roles in determining local public policy and in carrying it out.

The history, tradition, development and patterns of local government in New York State are based on a belief that a responsive and responsible citizenry will maintain a vigorous, informed and continuous participation in the processes of local government. A basic principle upon which New York local government, with its broad home rule authority, is constructed is that local community values can be fostered and served. Assuring meaningful participation by citizens in government at all levels in the face of the complexity of contemporary society is one of the great challenges of American democracy.

The individual citizen has numerous ways to influence government. Some of these, such as writing letters to public officials, joining interest groups and supporting lobbying efforts, are of a private nature. The structure of government itself, however, provides other avenues of a more formal character. These include applications of the electoral process through which citizens may express their interests and concerns, plus devices such as public hearings and open meetings of legislative bodies. All local officials have a basic duty to assure that citizens have ways to participate actively and meaningfully in local government affairs. Apart from making themselves accessible to their constituents, local officials can keep citizens informed about public affairs, and the citizens, in turn may express their will through the electoral process.

10.1 The Electoral Process

Abroad base of participation in local government forms the foundation of our working democracy, and the electoral process is only one of many ways in which the individual citizen can make his or her views felt at the local level.

10.1.1 Elective Offices

At the turn of the twentieth century, enlightened citizen groups recommended adoption of the short ballot along with several electoral reforms. They believed that a citizen could acquire more knowledge about candidates and issues and could therefore vote more intelligently if fewer offices appeared on the ballot. They argued further that the voter's basic concern lay with choosing officers who would make policy rather than filling jobs of an administrative or even clerical nature in which there was no decision-making authority. Despite some improvements during the past century, the length of a ballot still seems to depend on the proximity to the citizen of the governmental level — national, state and local. In the American three-branch system of government, the minimum ballot would include a chief executive (or two), one or more legislators, and perhaps judges. At the state level, the ballot may also include the offices of attorney general, state comptroller or auditor, and others. At the local level, the ballot grows to include such miscellaneous offices as town clerk, superintendent of highways and others.

New Yorkers, in their local elections, have to vote for officers to serve in two, three, or even more different local governments. A city resident will, for example, be voting for county and city and often school district officials. A village resident will be voting not only for village officials but also for county, town and school district officials. A resident of the town outside the area of the village may be voting in a fire district election as well as in county, town and school district elections. Although there are infinite variations, the most typical elected local officials appear in the following list.

- County
- executive (charter county only)
- county legislators(s) (except in counties retaining boards of supervisors)
- county clerk
- county treasurer
- Coroner[1]
- comptroller
- sheriff
- district attorney
- county judge
- family court judge
- surrogate
- City
- mayor
- comptroller
- council members
- municipal judges
- Town
- supervisor
- board members
- justices
- town clerk

[1] Duties are performed by an appointive officer in some counties.

- superintendent of highways
- receiver of taxes or tax collector
- assessors[2]
- Village
- mayor
- trustees
- justice(s)

10.1.2 Legislative Elections

During the 1960s and 1970s, many counties changed their governing body from a board of supervisors to a county legislature, with representation based on districts. In those counties, town residents have to vote for one or more county legislators in addition to the town supervisor, who formerly served ex officio as the town's representative on the county legislative body. Counties with county legislatures elect legislators from single or multi-member districts, or a combination of single and multi-member districts. Cities elect members of the city council at-large, or from wards or districts, or both at-large and from wards or districts. Towns elect members of the town board at-large, or from wards that have been established pursuant of Town Law section 81. A few villages operate on a ward system.

10.1.3 Fire District Elections

Elections in fire districts generally occur pursuant to the Town Law, and each fire district elects five commissioners and a treasurer at large. Chapter 9 [91] discusses these officials in a greater detail.

10.1.4 School District Elections

With certain rare exceptions, all local school board members in New York are elected. The method of election varies from district to district. In all school districts that elect their board members, however, the citizens of the entire district elect all board members at large. The number of school board members prescribed by state law varies from one or three for common school districts to not more than nine for union free, central and city school districts (see Chapter 9 [91] for a more complete discussion of school boards). In most cases, the district has some latitude to decide upon the number of board members. Terms are staggered so that the entire board is never up for election at the same time.

10.1.5 Improvement Districts

In some towns, residents also elect boards of commissioners for independent improvement districts. Since it has not been possible to create additional independent districts under the Town Law since 1932, elections continue only in those districts which continue to exist.

[2] Appointive in some towns. As counties and cities adopt and revise charters, the trend is toward fewer elective offices. Changes in state legislation and expanded powers of home rule have also made it possible for towns and villages to reduce the number of elective offices by local action.

10.1.6 The Political Party System

State law provides for political party committees at the state and county level and other committees as the rules of the party provide. Generally, county committees consist of at least two members elected at primary elections from each election district within the county. As a practical matter, the party system is subdivided further into town committees and city committees. Many village elections and all school district and fire district elections are held on a nonpartisan basis, but town, county and (with a few exceptions) city elections are contests between local representatives of statewide parties.

In the absence of a primary election, candidates for local offices who are designated by party caucuses become the nominees, but a competing candidate who obtains the required number of voters' names on a petition can require that a primary be held on the statewide primary date. Primaries in New York State are closed, and voters must enroll in a party to be eligible to vote in that party's primary. Since 1967 permanent personal registration has been in effect statewide.

10.1.7 Election Calendar

Some municipal elections coincide with statewide elections, while others are also held in November, but in the "off" or odd-numbered years. In fact, a provision of the State Constitution requires that city campaigns for mayor not coincide with gubernatorial campaigns. An election may, however, be held in an even-numbered year if necessary to fill a vacancy in the office of the mayor. Village elections are generally held in March or June, but they may be held on any date the locality chooses. Except in cities, school district elections are generally held annually on the first Tuesday in May or June. Fire district elections are held annually on the second Tuesday in December.

Table 10.1: Election Calendar by Local Government Type

Type	Calendar
State	November even-numbered year
County	November odd-and even-numbered year
City	November odd-numbered year
Town	November odd-numbered year
Village	March or June annually or biennially
School District	May or June annually
Fire District	December annually

10.2 Referenda

The use of the referendum — direct vote of the people on issues — has been limited in New York State in accordance with the basic principles of a representative form of government. On the principle that voters elect government officials to make decisions on their behalf, government officials are not given broad authority to delegate decision making powers back to the electorate. Case law stipulates that a local government must find specific authority, either in the constitution or state law, to conduct an official referendum on any subject, and in the absence of such authority it may not conduct a referendum. A local government may not spend public monies to conduct a so-called "advisory referendum," one conducted to gather public opinion on a particular matter, unless state law specifically authorizes it.

10.2.1 Types of Referenda

There are general classifications of referenda available to local governments in New York State. These are mandatory, permissive, on petition and discretionary.

A mandatory referendum is one which is required and in which a local government has no choice; it must submit the particular question to referendum.

A permissive referendum is one in which the local governing body is authorized to place a matter before the voters on its own motion. Or, after the local governing body renders a decision on the matter, it may be required to wait a specified period of time (after public notice of the decision) before the matter is finally decided. During that interval, a petition may be filed demanding that the local governing body may submit the matter to referendum for a public decision. A proper petition, as defined by law, must be filed within the timeframe, set forth by law.

Referendum on petition relates to situations in which a proper petition may be circulated and filed, as defined by law, directing the local government body to schedule a referendum on the subject matter of the petition. A discretionary referendum, the most flexible variety, allows the governing body to determine whether a particular action under consideration shall be subject to referendum and if so, whether mandatory or permissive.

10.2.2 Referendum Majorities

There are a few instances in which more than a simple majority is required for the approval of a question submitted to the voters. Perhaps the most important of these is the requirement for adoption of a county charter. This requires a majority vote in any city or cities in the county and a majority vote outside the city or cities (i.e., towns). If a charter provides for the transfer of any function from the villages to the county, a majority vote in the affected villages is also required.

10.2.3 Subjects of Referenda

Generally local governments are required to conduct a referendum on any question involving basic changes in the form or structure of government, such as county or city charter adoption, changes in boundaries or in the composition of legislative bodies, and the abolition or creation of elective offices.

Procedures relating to permissive referenda must be observed in counties and cities, as well as in towns and villages, for such matters as appropriating money from reserve funds and constructing, leasing or purchasing a public utility service. In towns, permissive referenda are required for changes from second to first class if the town has between 5,000 and 10,000 in population. A permissive referendum is also required for a change from first class to suburban town status. Such actions by towns are roughly equivalent to charter adoption by a county or city, which is subject to mandatory referendum. The towns, however, are more generally bound by referendum requirements than any other type of local government unit. For example, towns, but not other units, are subject to permissive referenda when constructing, purchasing or leasing a town building or land there for and when establishing airports, public parking, parks, playgrounds, and facilities for collection and disposal of solid wastes.

Local laws of counties, cities, towns and villages are subject to referenda on petition if they result in changes in existing laws relating to such matters as public bidding, purchases, contracts, assessments, power of condemnation, auditing, and alienation or leasing of property.

The creation of improvement districts in both towns and counties is a frequent subject of referenda. The referendum for a county water, sewer, drainage or refuse district is permissive. A town improvement district can be established either on petition and action of the town board or by motion of the town board and with a permissive referendum held in the area to be included in the district.

In practice, matters subject to permissive referenda or referenda on petition are seldom actually brought to referenda, unless they become the subject of particular local controversy. Matters subject to referenda in recent elections have included:

- county charter adoption;
- increases in terms of local offices from two to four years;
- city charter amendments or revisions;
- county reapportionment plans;
- transfer of street-naming authority from cities, towns and villages to a county;
- change from at-large elections to the ward system;
- village incorporation;
- coterminous town-village; and
- village dissolution.

10.2.4 Initiative and Recall

New York State law does not recognize the principle of recall, by which an elected officeholder may be removed by a popular vote. There are very few instances in which there may be initiative, where the voters initiate and enact laws or constitutional amendments. Although not strictly an example of the initiative, citizens in New York may, by petition, require a referendum on certain actions taken by a local governing body. There are also instances in which a petition can initiate official action. The voters of a county may, by petition, require the submission of a proposition at a general election on the question of appointment of a charter commission. If approved by the voters, the county legislative body must appoint a commission.

Voters of a city may, by petition, require submission of a city charter amendment or new city charter to the electors. Since the substance of such a local law must be set forth in full in the petition, this procedure is similar to the initiative as it is known in other states. Voters in Suffolk County may, through an initiative and referendum procedure, enact amendments to the county charter. A special Act of the State Legislature provided authority for this power.

10.3 Facilitating Citizen Participation

10.3.1 Boards and Commissions

Since school board members and fire district commissioners are unpaid volunteers, and since many other local officials in New York State, including some chief executive officers and legislators, receive nominal salaries, they embody citizen participation in government. However, the growing responsibilities of local officials make it more difficult to operate local governments effectively with part-time leadership.

Citizens of New York State have many opportunities to participate in local government as members of advisory or operational special-purpose agencies, such as planning boards, environmental councils and recreation boards, to name a few. These agencies offer local officials opportunities to enlist the talents, interest and concern of the community in important aspects of local government. In addition to the many special agencies authorized by state law, local chief executives and legislative bodies have authority to establish and appoint ad hoc citizens' advisory committees on numerous matters, such as reapportionment, historical celebrations and new municipal buildings. A municipality may also, if it wishes, have a continuing citizens' advisory committee to consider a variety of matters as they arise.

There are many reasons for local officials to encourage citizens to participate actively in their local governments, including:

- involvement of citizens in the planning stages of a program or project so as to avoid misunderstandings and problems at later stages;
- obtaining firsthand knowledge of citizen needs and problems;
- taking advantage of expertise which might otherwise not be available, especially in small communities;
- spreading the base of community support;
- improving public relations; and
- fulfilling the requirements of certain federal programs.

10.3.2 Public Hearings

The public hearing provides a convenient and useful forum for citizens to play a significant role in the governmental decision-making process. As a general rule, local governments in New York State are required to hold public hearings whenever the action of the governing body can be expected to have significant impact on the citizenry. For example, the law requires public hearings as part of the approval process for:

- local laws and ordinances;
- zoning regulations;
- capital improvements;
- budgets; and
- certain federal programs.

Local governing bodies may also conduct a hearing at any time on any subject on which they wish to obtain the views of the public. In addition, the Open Meetings Law (see "Public Information and Reporting" below) requires that all meetings of public bodies be convened open to the public and preceded by notice given to the public and news media.

The choice of whether to hold a hearing often depends upon striking a balance between democratic requirements and the interests of government efficiency. The choice may not be easy, but an informational hearing, even when not mandated, maybe advisable where the subject matter is particularly controversial.

10.3.2.1 Notice

Where there is a specific provision in law regarding notice of a public hearing, the notice should be sufficient to inform the public of the date, time, place and subject of the hearing. A small notice in a large newspaper, however, is often inadequate. When significant issues affect either a particular neighborhood or the entire community, public notices may be conspicuously displayed at several key locations in the jurisdiction affected. Public officials should write notices in a language that laymen can understand, rather than in legal language unfamiliar to most people.

Public officials should consult with the language of New York State's Open Meeting Law and the Committee on Open Government (https://www.dos.ny.gov/coog/) to ensure compliance and best practices.

10.3.2.2 Location

Although governments traditionally hold public hearings in a central municipal building, they frequently use other venues in the community to conduct hearings on issues affecting specific geographic locations. By so doing, they gain greater neighborhood participation and sharper focus of attention on an issue. Government decision makers are likely to learn more about a problem by visiting the area of the problem.

10.3.2.3 Statutory Provisions

There is no uniformity in state law with respect to public hearings and procedures. Specific provisions requiring public hearings and setting forth procedures to follow are generally spread out through the laws relating to the various types of local governments. In many cases the requirements for a hearing will vary depending on the section of law involved.

10.4 Public Information and Reporting

10.4.1 Freedom of Information Law

In 1974, the State Legislature enacted the Freedom of Information Law (Article 6, Public Officers Law). Subsequently, the law was substantially amended to provide the public with broad authority to inspect and copy records of state and local government. Under the Freedom of Information Law, all government records are available, except those records or portions of records that the law allows the government to withhold. In most instances, the law describes the grounds for denial in terms of potentially harmful effects of disclosure.

The Law created the Committee on Open Government, which consists of 11 members. The Committee includes the Secretary of State, in whose Department the Committee is housed, the Lieutenant Governor, the Director of the Budget, the Commissioner of the Office of General Services, six non-office holding citizens, and an elected official of a local government. The Governor appoints four of the public members, at least two of whom must be or have been representatives of the news media, and an elected official of a local government; the Speaker of the Assembly and the Temporary President of the Senate appoint one public member each. The Law enables the Committee:

- furnish to any agency advisory guidelines, opinions or other appropriate information regarding the law;
- furnish to any person advisory opinions or other appropriate information regarding the law;
- promulgate rules and regulations with respect to the implementation of the law;
- request from any agency such assistance, services and information as will enable the committee to effectively carry out its powers and duties; and
- report annually on its activities and findings, including recommendations for changes in the law, to the Governor and the Legislature.

Each agency in the state must adopt procedural rules consistent with (and no more restrictive than) the rules promulgated by the Committee on Open Government. In addition to rights of access to records generally, units of local government as well as state agencies must maintain and make available three types of records, including:

- a record of votes of each member in every proceeding in which a member votes;
- a record identifying every officer and employee by name, public office address, title and salary; and

- a reasonably detailed current list by subject matter, of all records in the possession of the agency, whether or not the records are available (Note: It has been advised that municipalities, by resolution, may adopt the records retention schedule issued by the State Archives and Records Administration (SARA) as the subject matter list).

In a judicial challenge to a denial of access to records, the agency has the burden of proving that the records withheld fall within one or more of the grounds for denial. It has also been held that an agency may not merely assert a ground for denial and prevail; on the contrary, it must demonstrate that the harmful effects of disclosure described in the grounds for denial would arise.

Many local government records available for inspection under the Freedom of Information Law had been available under other earlier laws. The Freedom of Information Law also preserves rights of access granted prior to its enactment by other laws or judicial determinations. The existence of, and publicity given to, the law has also produced a greater uniformity of procedures in state and local government and increased the public's use of rights to obtain records.

10.4.2 Open Meetings Law

In 1976, the State Legislature enacted the Open Meetings Law (Article 7, Public Officers Law), which is applicable to all public bodies in the state (including governing bodies) as well as their committees, subcommittees and similar bodies. Later amendments to the Law clarified vague original provisions. The Open Meetings Law does not apply to: judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings (except proceedings of zoning boards of appeals); deliberations of political committees, conferences and caucuses; or any matters made confidential by federal or state law.

The Open Meetings Law provides the people with the right to observe the performance of public officials and attend, observe, and listen to the deliberations and decisions that go into the making of public policy. Just as the Freedom of Information Law presumes the public's right of access, the Open Meetings Law presumes openness. The deliberations of public bodies must be open to the public, except when one or more among eight grounds for executive session may appropriately be cited to exclude the public. The grounds for executive session are based largely upon the harmful effects of public airing of particular issues.

In a general statement of intent, the law asserts that every meeting of a public body shall be open to the public except when an executive session is called to discuss particular subjects that are listed in the law. The statute defines "executive session" as that portion of a meeting not open to the general public. Once in executive session, a public body may vote and take final action, except that any vote to appropriate public monies must be conducted in an open meeting.

When a meeting is scheduled at least a week in advance, public notice of its time and place must be given to the news media and posted in one or more designated public locations at least 72 hours before the meeting. Public notice of the time and place of all other meetings must be given to the public and the news media to the extent practicable at a reasonable time prior to the meeting.

Minutes must be compiled for open meetings and when action is taken during executive sessions. Minutes of executive sessions must be made available within one week; minutes of open meetings must be made available within two weeks. Minutes of executive sessions need not include information not required to be disclosed under the Freedom of Information Law.

Any aggrieved person has standing to enforce the provisions of the Open Meetings Law. If a public body has taken action in violation of the law, a court has the power to declare the action null and void. A court also has discretion to award reasonable attorney fees to the successful party in a proceeding brought under the law.

Public officials should consult with the Committee on Open Government (https://www.dos.ny.gov/coog/) to ensure compliance and best practices.

10.4.3 Records Management

A sound records management program enables local governments to create, use, store, retrieve and dispose of their records in an orderly and cost-effective manner pursuant to applicable state law. Such a program helps make records readily available to staff and the public, prevents the creation of unneeded records and promotes the systematic identification and preservation of records of long-term archival value. Article 57-A of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law, the "Local Government Records Law", requires that the governing body of a local government "promote and support a program for the orderly and efficient management of records." It also requires that each local government designate a "records management officer." In towns and villages, the clerk is always the records management officer; in fire districts, it is always the district secretary. All other local governments have discretion on whom they may assign to the records management officers. Through its Local Records Section, the State Archives and Records Administration (SARA) Unit of the State Education Department provides information and assistance to help local governments (except New York City) improve records management and archival administration. It publishes records retention and disposal schedules that list the minimum time periods during which records of all units of local government must be retained.

The State Archives also produces publications, workshops, and web resources to help all local governments better manage all their records, including electronic records. The Archives maintains nine regional offices across the state to provide local onsite advice and direction on records management to local governments.

Information on the administration of court records is provided by the state's Office of Court Administration. Within New York City, information on municipal records management is provided by the City's Department of Records, though the Archives' publications and workshops are also available for use by New York City agencies.

10.4.4 Public Reporting

10.4.4.1 Annual Reports and Newsletters

In municipal reporting, a fine line separates the need to keep the public informed from the tendency to use public funds to aggrandize an incumbent administration. Although many municipalities in New York State publish and distribute annual reports and/or periodic newsletters, state law does not require them to do so. However, both the Town Law and the Village Law authorize expenditure of funds for publication and distribution of a report relative to fiscal affairs of the municipality. This can and has been interpreted to include most of the items usually incorporated in annual reports, such as programs and services, capital projects, and land or property acquisition. Towns and villages are not expressly authorized to include items, such as biographies of incumbent officers, which are clearly non-fiscal in nature.

10.4.4.2 Informal Reporting

There are many other ways for local officials to keep the public informed both through the media and through municipal resources. In addition to traditional press releases, municipalities use:

- municipal websites that include basic information, such as agendas of meetings, minutes, proposed local laws and the ability to communicate by e-mail with local officials;
- press conferences and media interviews;
- weekly radio or TV interview programs;
- slide shows or presentations on new municipal programs, or on the budget, for distribution to civic, professional or school groups;

- displays on public services and programs at schools, shopping centers, fairs and other public gathering places;
- prominent posting of time and place of meetings (including public hearings) of the legislative body;
- rotation of legislative body meetings to various neighborhoods or communities within the municipality;
- radio or cable television broadcasts of meetings of the legislative body;
- informational meetings on new programs and significant issues;
- information centers to direct citizens to appropriate agencies; and
- publication of materials, such as a directory of local officials and municipal services, newsletters on public services and programs, and brochures or folders on specific services.

Meetings of municipal boards are frequently televised by public access TV stations. Two-way cable television systems are available in some communities and may offer opportunities for local officials to make themselves directly accessible to citizen inquiries.

10.4.4.3 Media Relations

The media can be valuable to local governments. In addition to using the media for special programs, local officials should contact the press, radio and TV as a means of keeping the public informed about governmental programs. The experience of many local officials suggests that the best approach to the media is to be as open and free with information as possible, and not to avoid controversial issues.

10.5 Handling Citizen Complaints

In larger units of government, where citizens may not have easy access to elected officials or know where to go for assistance, problems can arise which may alienate citizens from their governments. Public reporting as discussed above can enhance the ability to solve communication problems between citizens and their government. While most problems can be resolved simply through better communication, some may be insoluble because the citizen expects government to act in a manner inconsistent with or not authorized by law. But even in that case, the citizen may gain satisfaction from having gained the attention of the government and learning that the difficulty involves compliance with law rather than reluctance on the part of the government.

Some local governments have established ombudsman programs to assist citizens with problems involving their agencies. In many cases though, citizen assistance is provided by staffs of local chief executives, municipal clerks, public information officers, members of local legislative bodies and other officials in the performance of their routine duties.

Chapter 11

Administering Local Finances

The financing of local government activities in New York takes place within a number of limitations. The State Constitution limits the amounts that most municipalities may raise annually from the real property tax. Similarly, the municipalities operate under limitations on debts, with a variety of provisions which limit borrowing power. The fiscal management of local government, spelled out in the Constitution and in statutes, is subject to certain prescriptions, reviews and audits by the state.

The previous chapter discusses local government expenditure trends, principal sources of revenues and aspects of intergovernmental fiscal relations. This chapter discusses the more prominent legal limitations upon local government financing, the basic features of municipal financial administration and state supervision of local finances.

11.1 Tax and Debt Limits

11.1.1 Tax Limits

Article VIII of the State Constitution imposes limitations upon the amounts which local governments may raise by tax upon real property. These limitations have a history that goes back more than a century. They have had a pronounced impact on the financing of local government in the State of New York, particularly with regard to state aid, local non-property taxes, education financing, general purpose assistance and special city aid. The real property tax limitation has evoked much debate over the years.

Against a background of increasing state involvement in local finances, an 1884 constitutional amendment declared:

> "The amount hereafter to be raised by tax for county or city purposes, in any county containing a city of over one hundred thousand inhabitants or any such city of the state, in addition to providing for the principal and interest of existing debt, shall not, in the aggregate, exceed in any one year two percent of the assessed valuation of the real personal estate of such county or city . . . "

Thus the tax limitation first applied only to the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Buffalo and Rochester, and to New York, Kings, Erie and Monroe counties. With the consolidation of New York City in 1898, a single 2 percent limit was accepted as applying to the whole city and later to the overlying county government. As a result of population growth, Syracuse, Albany and Yonkers came within the constitutional tax limit, and with them Onondaga, Albany and Westchester counties.

11.1.1.1 Tax Limit Developments

Many other cities of the state have been subject to tax limitation under special laws or local charters. By 1920 there were 33 cities in this category. Limitations ranged from 1 to 2 percent of assessed valuations or took the form of appropriation restrictions. In virtually every instance, taxes for school purposes and debt service, as well as other municipal functions in certain of the cities, were excluded from these limitations.

After the First World War, every city suffered from inflation, a serious factor in municipal finances even in the prosperous years of the 1920s. Some of the stringency experienced by the tax-limit cities, however, probably resulted from policies of under-assessment. At its outset, the depression created difficulties because it reduced the valuations by which taxing power was measured and imposed additional expenditures for public relief.

11.1.1.2 Amendment of 1938

A 1938 amendment revised the constitutional tax limitation by substituting five-year average valuations as the measure of taxing power for the then-current annual valuations. The 2 percent limit was extended in 1944 to all the cities and villages of the state, with the provision that the Legislature might exclude amounts raised by local property taxation for school purposes in the case of villages and of cities having a population of less than 100,000. The 1938 amendment granted the Legislature the power to further restrict the authority of any county, city, town, village or school district to levy taxes on real estate.

11.1.1.3 Current Limitations

Material changes were made in the tax limits contained in Article VIII of the State Constitution during the period following World War II. They were accompanied by a series of major moves in state-local fiscal relations as they related to the distribution of shared taxes, categorical assistance, school aid, local non-property taxes and city-school relations.

Tax limit provisions of the Constitution as amended in 1949, 1951, 1953 and 1985, now provided as follows:

1. All Constitutional tax limits relate to the five year average of the full value of taxable real estate.
2. The tax limit for New York City for combined city and school purposes is fixed at 2.5 percent.
3. The tax limits for the other cities with populations of 125,000 or more are 2 percent for combined city and school purposes.
4. In cities under a population of 125,000, the tax limit is 2 percent for city purposes alone.
5. All counties outside New York City are subject to tax limits of 1.5 percent for county purposes; however any county may raise its limit to 2 percent by action of the county governing body in accordance with County Law.
6. The limit for villages is 2 percent for village purposes.
7. In certain instances, taxes levied for financing capital expenditures on a “pay-as-you go” basis and amounts raised for debt service are excluded from tax limitation.
8. School districts in cities under a population of 125,000 and towns have no Constitutional tax limit.

It may be said that the Constitutional real estate tax limit has two major components: A percentage limitation for operating purposes as listed in items (a) through (f) above, and certain exclusions of amounts required for debt service and capital improvements. Together these may be referred to as the total real property taxing power of a municipality or a school district.

11.1.1.4 Tax Limit Exclusions Challenged

To enable school districts which are coterminous with, partly within or wholly within a city having a population less than 125,000 and the cities of Buffalo, Rochester and Yonkers to meet their fiscal needs, the legislature enacted a series of statutes permitting the exclusion of annual pension requirements and social security contributions from their respective tax limitations.

The constitutionality of the statute applicable to the City of Buffalo was contested in 1973 on grounds that pension payments are ordinary annual operating expenses and consequently subject to tax limitation. In Hurd v. City of Buffalo (34 NY2d 628, 355 NYS2d 369 (1974)), the Court of Appeals affirmed that the exclusionary statute specifically applying to Buffalo was unconstitutional. The court thereby cast a shadow over the other exclusionary legislation.

Beginning in 1974, the Legislature adopted a stopgap measure to forestall the immediate impact of what has come to be known as the Hurd ruling. A Temporary State Commission on Constitutional Tax Limitations (the Bergan Commission) was created to pursue the matter.

The commission published its findings at the beginning of 1975, recommending that the issue be handled through a constitutional amendment. An amendment excluding retirement and social security costs from the tax limit was submitted for voter approval at the 1975 general election. It was defeated.

The 1976 Legislature passed a bill (Emergency City and School District Relief Act) continuing temporary relief to the cities of Buffalo and Rochester and to certain school districts by permitting them to exclude from Constitutional tax limitations certain pension and social security contributions until 1980.

In early 1978, the Court of Appeals struck down the Emergency City and School District Relief Act of 1976 and left the door open for a suit demanding a refund of tax dollars collected under the faulty legislation. In response to this decision, a special Task Force on the Financing of City School Districts was created. The Legislature implemented two principal recommendations of the task force in 1978: (1) It instituted special equalization ratios for the impacted cities and school districts and, (2) it advanced state funds to finance the "gap" on a revolving basis.

The special equalization ratios initially reduced the gap from $112 million to $20 million. However, as the growth of the cities' real property wealth has slowed down, the usefulness of these ratios has diminished. The state funds which were advanced to the districts impacted by Hurd were rolled over every year between 1978 and 1992-93. Pursuant to Chapter 53 of the Laws of 1991, advances to the districts were reduced by 50% a year and phased out in 2011-12. In addition, the state has provided these districts with grants since 1979.

Other recommendations of the Task Force were:

- require city school districts receiving advances to make maximum use of sales and utility taxes;
- redistribute or increase county sales taxes for city school district use;
- reallocate functions;
- adopt a statewide real property tax; and
- submit constitutional amendments.

11.1.2 Debt Limits

The economic collapse of 1837 exposed serious weaknesses in the credit operations of local government and the speculative character of the public improvement debt of the period. One result was that the State Constitution of 1846 directed the Legislature to restrict the municipalities' power of taxation, assessment and borrowing.

Unchecked growth in the debt of local governments continued. The Civil War was followed by inflation and great economic activity. New York City provided a special example of municipal extravagance. The unbridled expansion of local debt under Boss Tweed created acute difficulties for the city during the business depression of 1873.

11.1.2.1 Debt Limit Developments

The condition of local government finance became a matter of urgent interest to the state. A Constitutional amendment in 1884 imposed a debt limit of 10 percent of assessed valuation on cities with a population over 100,000 and on counties containing a city of the same size. In the case of New York City, the effect was a 10 percent limit on combined city and county debt, while in Brooklyn, Buffalo and Rochester the limit applied separately to city and county debt. Water debts extinguishable within 20 years were excluded.

In 1894, the 10 percent debt limitation was extended to all cities and counties in the state. No provision was made for the limitation of the indebtedness of towns, villages and school districts, although these units were restricted in their debt practices by statute.

11.1.3 Current Debt Limitations

In 1938, constitutional amendments extended debt limitation to towns and villages, prohibited the creation of new or novel units of local government possessing borrowing power, and required substantive guarantees for the repayment of municipal indebtedness.

Postwar changes in the debt provisions of the State Constitution have been numerous. The most significant occurred as a result of revisions in Article VIII which were approved in 1951. The 1938 and subsequent revisions resulted in the following features:

- All Constitutional debt limitations tied to specified percentages of the average full valuations of taxable real estate on the last completed assessment rolls and the four preceding rolls, as follows:
  - 10 percent for Nassau County;
  - 7 percent for other counties outside New York City;
  - 10 percent for New York City for combined city and school purposes;
  - 9 percent for other cities with a population of 125,000 or more for combined city and school purposes;
  - 7 percent for cities with a population of less than 125,000 for city purposes, exclusive of schools;
  - 7 percent for towns;
  - 7 percent for villages; and
  - 5 percent for school districts coterminous with, partly within, or wholly within a city with a population of less than 125,000 (with provisions for increasing the limit under certain conditions).
- A series of specific conditions governing the incurrence and management of municipal debt, such as:
  - prohibition upon the issuance of indebtedness beyond a period of probable usefulness or weighted period of probable usefulness to be specified by state law, and in no case to exceed 40 years;
  - issuance only of full faith and credit indebtedness and “tax increment financing” (Article XVI, section 6);
  - authorization for sinking fund bonds under certain circumstances and a requirement for the repayment of debt in installments, with no installment more than 50 percent in excess of the smallest prior installment, unless the governing body provides for substantially level or declining debt service payments as may be authorized by law;
  - requirement for the annual provision by appropriation for meeting principal and interest payments; and
  - prohibition upon the creation of municipal or other corporations (other than a county, city, town, village, school district, fire district or certain river regulation and drainage districts) possessing the power both to contract indebtedness and to levy or require the levy of taxes or benefit assessments upon real estate.

- Exclusions of municipal indebtedness from constitutional debt limitation, including certain water and sewer debt, certain debt issued to finance “self-liquidating” public improvements, and, in the case of New York City, certain additional exclusions for various purposes.

- Prohibitions upon the gift or loan of the credit of counties, cities, towns, villages or school districts to or in aid of any individual, public or private corporation or association or private undertaking with specified clarifications and an exception in the case of joint or certain cooperative undertakings among municipalities.

Article XVIII of the State Constitution prescribes the conditions under which a city, town, village or certain public corporations (other than a county) may aid certain low-income housing and nursing home accommodations, contract indebtedness, and provide for subsidies for these purposes. This article contains a separate 2 percent debt limit for cities, towns and villages computed on the basis of average equalized full valuations of taxable real property. Various conditions are attached to indebtedness incurred under Article XVIII.

11.2 Borrowings and Debt Management

11.2.1 Local Finance Law

To implement the 1938 constitutional amendments, the state undertook a comprehensive revision of the laws on local government financial affairs. In 1942, this effort produced the Local Finance Law. This statute regulates the issuance of municipal bonds and notes by local governments. It addresses the objects or purposes for which debt may be incurred, the maximum terms of indebtedness for various objects or purposes, the conditions of short-term loans, and the required content of municipal obligations.

11.2.2 Debt Management

While there are many legal requirements surrounding municipal debt procedures, they do not exhaust the subject of local debt management. The overlapping debt limits in the State Constitution and the safeguards and requirements of the Local Finance Law are necessarily controlling, but they are not substitutes for the exercise of prudence and sound judgment by local government officials.

Local officials may exercise discretion in debt management and borrowing policies in a number of vital respects. They make judgments as to the need for public improvements and their soundness from the standpoint of design, costs and architectural or engineering features. They decide whether such improvements are within the capacity of the community as measured by future annual costs for debt service and regular maintenance.

While state laws influence debt policies, the decisions of local officials have a direct bearing upon debt management. One feature of an orderly and manageable debt structure is early retirement of substantial amounts of outstanding debt. Another feature is to keep annual obligations for the payment of interest and principal within the limits of a reasonable relationship to total budgetary requirements. Local officials also find that it is good policy to make substantial contributions to the cost of public improvements from current revenue. Many capital outlays recur regularly, such as replacing motorized equipment or resurfacing streets, and borrowing for such purposes tends to effect on debt and debt charges.

The issuance and marketing of municipal obligations is a highly specialized subject. Since local officials wish to ensure the legality and marketability of the obligations and obtain the most favorable terms, they often utilize the services of bond counsel and other knowledgeable advisors.

11.2.3 Capital Programming

Capital programming and capital budgeting are recognized methods for implementing debt management policies. Practices among local governments in the state vary. In some cases there are detailed charter requirements for public improvement planning and financing. In other cases localities adhere to “paper” plans. Sometimes the local practice is to bring forward public improvements piecemeal and not necessarily in relation to each other, to separately authorize the funds necessary to pay for various improvements, and to defer into the future the question of how everything fits together.

A capital program, as the term is used by the Government Finance Officers Association (GFOA), is “a plan for capital expenditures to be incurred each year over a fixed period of years to meet the need for public improvements.” General Municipal Law, section 99-g contains express provision for capital programs. The capital program under section 99-g is submitted with the municipality’s regular annual budget. The capital program itself includes descriptions of proposed projects, the proposed method of financing for each project and an estimate of the effect, if any, on operating costs in the three years following the completion of the project. The factor of integration with the regular budget removes capital programming from the area of paper plans.

The goal of a capital program generally is to plan, in advance, how to pay for various improvements and how the improvements will affect the regular municipal budget in added debt service charges, appropriations from current revenue, and the annual expense of operating new facilities.

11.2.4 Debt Trends

Local government indebtedness is evaluated on an individual basis according to criteria by which financial position is customarily evaluated. Some areas of concern are growth in the amount of debt over a number of years, and purposes for which the debt is being issued. Local budgets traditionally include expenditures for which indebtedness could be issued. When local governments take expenditures that have traditionally been financed from current appropriations and begin to issue debt to finance such expenditures, it may be an indication that current revenues are not keeping pace with expenditures.

Other criteria extend beyond amounts of borrowings and debt and involve a number of factors indicative of fiscal capacity. A few such factors are the ratio of net debt to full valuations, the extent to which municipal debt is wholly or partially self-supporting, the relative amount of the municipal budget used for tax-supported debt, the amount of overlying debt, and the municipality’s tax collection.

11.3 Municipal Finance Administration

The general laws of the state are fairly explicit as to the powers and duties of local officials having fiscal responsibilities in non-charter counties, towns and villages. These statutes provide options as to the manner in which these responsibilities are assigned or organized within the structure of local governments. Options include the establishment of the office of comptroller and purchasing agent in counties, the office of purchasing director in towns and the office of auditor in villages. Pursuant to home rule authority, cities, charter counties and charter villages have latitude to amend their charters with respect to organization for finance administration.

Local government accounting, bookkeeping and record management systems vary in sophistication from simple manual systems to individual personal computers, to client server and mainframe systems. Software includes off-the shelf applications and custom applications designed to accommodate specific needs. A wide variety of software products are available to provide basic aspects of fiscal management such as budget preparation, appropriation accounting, assessment rolls preparation, payrolls, master employee records, real property tax billing and water billing.

Earlier discussion touched upon real property tax administration and municipal debt management. Further phases of municipal finance administration include budgeting, accounting, treasury functions, purchasing and contracting and audit procedures.

11.3.1 Municipal Budgeting

Local officials often regard the annual budget as perhaps their greatest single obligation, since budget preparation and continuing administration may be labor intensive and time-consuming. General state law spells out the principal steps in budget preparation and adoption in most local governments. For counties, cities and villages that have charters, budget provisions are generally contained in such charters.

The budget process generally entails many choices. These tend to be most apparent on the expenditure side of the local budget, but many choices may also exist on the revenue side. They include:

- magnitude of the real property tax levy and its relative burden expressed as a tax rate;
- local non-property taxes, as authorized by state law and implemented by local action;
- fees and earnings and use of special assessments, which are in the nature of charges against benefited properties in proportion to the benefit received, to defray the cost of certain municipal improvements or services;
- payments from other governments in the form of grants-in-aid, shared revenues and reserve fund moneys for current or capital purposes (depending upon the character, scope and availability of these payments); and
- indebtedness for authorized capital purposes, paying for improvements from current revenues (pay-as-you-go), or employing a combination of these methods of financing.

11.3.2 Budget Administration

Budget administration is generally preceded by the preparation and submission of departmental estimates. This process is usually followed by the formulation of the budget itself, which is a balanced plan of expenditures and revenues, normally prepared by or under the direction of the local government's executive or budget officer. The budget is then submitted to the local legislative body for review, approval or amendment, and enactment of appropriation orders giving effect to the budget.

Beyond the legislative phase of budget review and adoption is the stage of budget administration and enforcement. This process involves the maintenance of appropriation control accounts and procedures for budget transfers or modifications.

11.3.3 Local Initiatives

In budget preparation, presentation and subsequent administration there are opportunities for local initiatives, consistent with the basic requirements of law. Initiatives may be expressed in budget format, supporting data and comparisons, and accompanying explanatory matter in the budget message. A budget is more than an array of figures — it is also a statement of public policy.

Quite often, budgetary allotments or expenditure quotas are established. These are often made on at least a quarterly basis, are formulated from work programs or activity schedules, and developed in consultation with operating officials. Newer developments in budgeting relate the provision of money more closely to the accomplishment of program objectives and to the efficiency with which municipal activities are performed.

11.3.4 Accounting Control

Another essential aspect of municipal finance administration is the maintenance of an accounting control system. Fund accounting is a basic characteristic of municipal accounting. A "fund" is a fiscal and accounting entity with a self-balancing set of accounts. It contains recorded cash, other assets and financial resources, together with all related liabilities and residual equities or balances. A fund is segregated for the purpose of carrying on specific activities or attaining certain objectives in accordance with special regulations, restrictions or limitations.

Municipal accounting systems include a general fund and, depending upon the local government entity, such special revenue funds as highway funds, debt service funds, capital project funds, enterprise funds, internal service funds, and trust and agency funds. The central principle is that funds will be self-contained.

Accounting for municipal resources and expenditures should generally be on a modified accrual basis. A fundamental feature of budget administration is the maintenance of appropriation control accounts whereby appropriations are encumbered as obligations are incurred.

In this summary discussion, it is not feasible to outline a comprehensive system of municipal accounts or to describe prevailing practices in all the local governments of the state. For most of the municipalities the standard resource on governmental accounting procedures is the Office of the State Comptroller (OSC).

11.3.5 Financial Reporting

The systematic recording of financial information can be used "(1) as a basis for managing the municipality's affairs, (2) as a control to prevent waste and inefficiency, (3) as a check on the fidelity of persons administering municipal funds, and (4) as a means of informing interested parties of the municipality's financial condition and operations." [1]

The municipal accounting system is the source of both the municipality's fiscal year-end statements and the periodic internal reports that localities find important for management purposes. These periodic reports show whether revenues are coming in and expenditures are going out at the times and in the amounts projected by the budget plan. Monitoring of this information allows management to make appropriate budgetary modifications during the year.

General Municipal Law section 30 requires local governments to file a financial report annually with the OSC. Until 1996 the law required municipalities to file a paper report on forms provided by OSC, but an amendment in that year allowed for electronic filing. Beginning with the reporting for the fiscal year ending in 1996, counties, cities, towns, villages, school districts and joint activities have been able to transmit their reports electronically using the internet or through the Comptroller's Assistance Network (a 24 hour electronic bulletin board). Filing electronically with the free software provided by OSC (or by the State Education Department for school districts), saves time, improves accuracy and reduces paperwork.

11.3.6 Other Financial Functions

Other leading aspects of local government finance administration include the functions of cash management, purchasing and property acquisition, insurance and risk management and post audit.

11.3.6.1 Cash Management

Some local governments carry cash balances in excess of those necessary for transactions. Carrying excess funds costs the income the funds would have earned if invested. In order to anticipate their cash balance needs, local government officials can prepare a cash flow analysis to forecast the cash position of the local government over the entire fiscal period. Proper cash management can provide maximum earnings and minimum borrowing for the local government. Local government officials should be aware of investment factors including legality, safety, liquidity and yield. The Office of the State Comptroller provides guidance to local officials regarding cash management and a wide variety of other topics on local government finance.

[1] Municipal Finance Administration, Sixth Edition, International City Managers' Association, Chicago, 1962, p. 205.

11.3.6.2 Purchasing and Property Acquisition

Other features of financial management relate to purchasing, contracting and storage, and the problem of how far these responsibilities can or should be brought under centralized procurement policies and procedures. Counties, cities, towns, villages, school districts and fire districts purchase goods, services and real property pursuant to procedures and requirements set forth in applicable law. To reduce their purchasing costs, localities sometimes participate in cooperative purchasing endeavors and utilize assistance available from the state.

The New York State Office of General Services (OGS) offers local governments the opportunity to purchase a wide range of goods at favorable prices under state contracts. In addition, OGS offers various kinds of technical assistance for local government purchasing, and assists localities with the procurement of products made by prisoners and the blind. Through OGS, local governments are assisted in the acquisition of surplus state personal and real property and surplus federal property.

11.3.6.3 Post Audit

Municipalities are subject to audit by various federal and state government agencies. In addition, municipalities may elect on their own to have general or selective audits. A post audit is an audit made after the event, when financial transactions have been recorded and completed. Municipalities' internal auditors often conduct audits of subsidiary agencies within the municipal organization on a continuing basis.

11.3.6.4 Insurance and Risk Management

Decreasing resources and increasing insurance costs are putting greater emphasis on risk management. There is often a variance between the optimal and the maximum feasible amount of insurance coverage. While most localities need to have insurance coverage for catastrophic events, they may take a number of steps to reduce costs. An acceptable safety program, self-insurance, coinsurance, blanket insurance and competitive bids can sometimes reduce costs.

11.3.7 State Supervision of Local Finances

During the 1930s, there was a depression-born trend toward state scrutiny of municipal budgets and expenditure programs, review and approval of proposed municipal borrowings, and measures designed to assist in the marketing and acceptance of local bond issues. Municipal conditions inviting state intervention during these periods included persistent weaknesses in current accounts, the incurrence of large volumes of floating indebtedness, reliance upon borrowing for current expense to shore up sagging municipal budgets, debt readjustments and refunding, and actual or incipient defaults.

From these various factors and developments emerged the main ingredients commonly associated with state supervision of local finances: legal tax and debt limitation; debt regulation through uniform bond laws and their administration; reporting, auditing and accounting requirements; central review of debt proposals and expenditure programs; varying degrees of involvement in debt planning and issuance — all fortified by advisory and technical assistance.

11.3.8 Leading Features of State Supervision

Many of the leading features of state supervision of local finances in the State of New York derive from constitutional and statutory requirements previously discussed in this chapter. Chief responsibility for state supervision of municipal finance resides in the Office of the State Comptroller. Among other services, the OSC's functions include:

- providing ongoing assistance through the OSC Division of Local Government and School of Accountability to enable and encourage local government officials to:
  - continuously improve fiscal health
  - reduce costs and improve the effectiveness of their service delivery, and
  - to account for and protect their government's assets.

This Division also performs periodic audits and reviews of local governments, conducts training for local officials and provides consulting services;

- supervising compliance of local governments with legal tax and debt limitations and requiring submission by local governments of debt statements and annual budgets;
- providing technical assistance, reviewing applications requesting approval of exclusions from the local debt limit exclusions, and the formation or extension of town improvement districts, fire districts and county special districts;
- collecting and disseminating local government financial information including statistics on revenues, expenditures and debt;
- developing uniform accounting systems and providing guidance on financial management practices;
- administering the State and Local Government Employees' Retirement Systems; and
- providing advisory legal opinions to local governments pertaining to the powers and duties of the local government under state laws of general applicability including written advisory opinions on prospective actions of local government.

11.3.9 Annual Financial Report Reviews

A review of each local government's annual financial report is performed by the OSC to assess compliance with minimum established standards. The information from this process becomes an integral part of a Uniform Risk Assessment Process (developed in 1999). Based upon analysis of identified risk areas, assistance to improve local government operations is offered as appropriate.

11.3.10 Deficit Financing Legislation

Occasionally local governments accumulate deficits to a point that the only recourse left is to obtain special state legislation that authorizes the local government to issue debt to finance the deficit. This action enables the local government to pay off a portion of the debt (through annual debt service payments) over a number of years. Such legislation generally requires the OSC to certify to the amount of the deficit before any such indebtedness can be issued. The OSC also reviews and makes recommendations on the proposed budgets of these municipalities during the period such financing is outstanding.

11.3.11 Oversight Boards

In extreme situations the State Legislature has determined that certain local governments needed additional oversight. This action has been prompted by periods of prolonged fiscal difficulty or, in rare instances, because the local government has lost access to financial markets. Oversight boards typically have powers to approve debt issuances, approve budgets and/or financial plans, approve contracts including employee contracts, and, in rare instances, assure the payment of obligations through the intercept of state aid and tax revenues. Legislation creating control boards usually provide for members to represent interested parties such as the Governor, State Comptroller, State Legislature and generally the local government and/or, local business leaders and local representatives. The legislation also establishes criteria to determine when the local government has regained its financial health. Typically, once the local government meets those criteria, the oversight board approval powers cease.

11.3.12 Local Government Data Base

The oversight activities rely heavily on an improved computerized data file known as the Local Government Data Base. This file is created and maintained by the OSC and contains comprehensive financial and other data on all local governments in the state from fiscal year 1977 onward. Much of this data is obtained from annual financial reports filed by each local government. The reports contain financial statement data (i.e., financial position and results of operations and changes in financial position) as well as detailed revenues and expenditures. This data file is regularly transmitted to the Division of the Budget, the Senate Finance Committee and the Assembly Ways and Means Committee to be used as the basis for much of the program analyses and fiscal impact studies regarding state and local relations.

11.3.13 Generally Accepted Accounting Principles (GAAP)

Since the early 1900's the Office of the State Comptroller has prescribed Uniform Systems of Accounts for local governments. The purpose of these systems has been to provide a means of gathering financial data from local governments that is consistent in classification and content. This information is used by financial analysts in the Comptroller's Office, other agencies and the State Legislature.

These systems do not set Generally Accepted Accounting Principles (GAAP). They are promulgated by the Governmental Accounting Standards Board (GASB). GAAP is a technical term used to describe the conventions, rules and procedures that constitute accepted accounting practices on a nationwide basis.

Since the late 1970's the Office of the State Comptroller has determined that adherence to Generally Accepted Accounting Principles is in the best interest of New York State and its local governments. Consequently the Uniform Systems of Accounts prescribed by the Comptroller are periodically updated to reflect changes in GAAP. In addition, the Comptroller's Office issues accounting bulletins and conducts training sessions for local officials.

11.3.14 Governmental Accounting Standards Board (GASB)

The Governmental Accounting Standards Board, which is the standard-setting body for establishing governmental accounting and financial reporting principles, from time to time will issue statements that prescribe accounting and financial reporting requirements for certain transactions. When a new accounting/financial reporting standard is issued by GASB, it must be critiqued by the Office of the State Comptroller to identify the accounting issues involved as well as what information is required in order to comply. As part of the accounting issues determination process, both financial reporting requirements and the affect on the State's financial position must be identified. Input from the units, that may be impacted by the change, in OSC will be solicited. Based upon this information obtained, a decision is made whether to recommend implementation of the statement.

Chapter 12

Financing Local Government

The balancing of municipal programs and activities against available fiscal resources is the key element in financing local government. The task is performed in an environment essentially different from that of a business enterprise in the private sector since laws, constitutions, and public accountability, as well as considerations of public policy, all impose constraints.

Broadly speaking, financing local government is a twofold proposition. It involves a determination, on the expenditure side, of the quantity and quality of activities, services and improvements that will be undertaken by the community; and an allocation of resources from revenues and borrowing within the capacity of the community. Political, economic and social considerations are involved in the process. All enter into the formulation of financial plans, which are most visible in the budget of a municipality, where commitments and resources are brought into balance on an annual basis.

Compared to the private sector, local governmental financial decisions seem largely removed from the classical marketplace. They are constrained within a framework of State Constitution, state statutes, and legal restrictions found in charters, local laws and ordinances. The legal setting of local finances is one of the first things to impress public officials upon taking office. It permeates many aspects of municipal finance administration.

Local governments may spend money only for what are deemed public purposes, a basic condition which springs from the State Constitution and appears in statutes and official opinions of state agencies. Strict conditions are attached to the delegation of the state's taxing power. Many local governments are restricted as to the amounts they may raise by levies upon real property, and they may levy taxes other than property taxes only as authorized by the Legislature. New York State law also closely constrains local governments with respect to incurring indebtedness, including limitations on its purposes, the types of municipal obligations, maximum terms of debt for different purposes and basic conditions of bond sale and guarantees. Financing local government takes place in an arena of competing demands and conflicting interests. The individual local government faces internal and external pressures; the state and federal governments are very much in the picture. Local officials are responsible for striking a balance among these interests and pressures.

12.1 Local Expenditures in New York

Local government expenditures may be divided into current operations, equipment and capital outlays, and debt service costs. Equipment and Capital outlays cover expenditures for equipment purchases and the construction, improvement and acquisition of fixed assets. Debt service costs include the payments of principal and interest on debt. All other local costs fall into the current expense category, which accounts for the largest share of expenditures — 86 percent of local government costs in New York State in 2012.

12.1.1 Expenditure Patterns

Table 12.1 [128] and Table 12.2 [129] summarize 2012 current expenditures by general purpose local governments, excluding the City of New York. It presents a generalized profile, in dollar terms, of the service responsibilities of these local governments.

- Counties are heavily involved in social services programs. The expenditure profile, however, confirms the diversification of county services;
- City and village expenditures show a similarity in the application of resources to public safety;
- Traditional town responsibilities for general government and highway functions are reflected in the table. Towns are also heavily involved in water and sewer services, refuse management and public safety.

12.1.2 Expenditure Factors

Expenditures for social services and health programs mandated and partly financed by the state and federal governments have greatly increased. Population and economic changes pose challenges for local governments throughout the State of New York.

Central cities focus on a wide variety of municipal services including police and fire services, roads, health, transportation, economic assistance, culture and recreation, sanitation, sewer and water service, and upgrading deteriorating infrastructure and facilities. City officials are often looking for ways to conserve their cities' existing residential, commercial and industrial assets, and to attract and hold new enterprises. Towns, on the other hand, are more generally concerned with community development, the extension of necessary municipal services, the installation of public improvements and other typical demands of growth due to out-migration from cities.

Table 12.1: Local Government Current Expenditures by Function, 2012 (Excluding New York City) Amounts in Millions of Dollars.[2]

Function	Counties	Cities	Towns	Villages	Total
General Government	$4,126.6	$615.2	$1,049.3	$400.4	$6,191.5
Education	1,158.4	10.2	4.7	0.1	1,173.4
Public Safety	2,983.2	1,121.9	986.9	523.9	5,615.9
Health	1,810.2	1.2	51.7	1.7	1,864.8
Transportation	1,488.0	369.8	1,391.6	289.2	3,538.6
Social Services	5,699.0	57.1	89.6	24.8	5,870.5
Economic Development	259.9	139.8	49.4	25.1	474.2
Culture and Recreation	262.2	171.3	579.7	141.7	1,154.9
Community Services	254.9	41.5	98.8	24.2	419.4
Utilities	109.1	197.1	363.5	336.7	1,006.4
Sanitation	892.1	243.4	849.7	265.9	2,251.1
Employee Benefits	3,326.8	1,012.0	1,170.7	468.7	5,978.2
Debt Service	1,384.1	324.7	768.9	244.4	2,722.1
Total	$23,754.5	$4,305.2	$7,454.5	$2,746.8	$38,261.0

Table 12.2: Local Government Current Expenditures by Function, 2012 (Excluding New York City) Percent Distribution.[4]

Function	Counties	Cities	Towns	Villages	Total
General Government	17.4	14.3	14.1	14.6	16.2
Education	4.9	0.1	0.1	0	3.1
Public Safety	12.5	26.0	13.2	19.1	14.7
Health	7.6	0.1	0.7	0.1	4.9
Transportation	6.3	8.6	18.7	10.5	9.2
Social Services	24.0	1.3	1.2	0.9	15.4
Economic Development	1.1	3.2	0.7	0.9	1.2
Culture and Recreation	1.1	4.0	7.8	5.2	3.0
Community Services	1.0	1.0	1.2	0.9	1.1
Utilities	0.5	4.6	4.9	12.2	2.6
Sanitation	3.8	5.7	11.4	9.7	5.9
Employee Benefits	14.0	23.5	15.7	17.0	15.6
Debt Service	5.8	7.6	10.3	8.9	7.1
Total	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0

Table 12.3 [129] reflects growth in current expenditures from 2007 through 2012 for each respective unit of general and special purpose local government, excluding New York City. During the five-year period 2007 through 2012, local governments experienced a 10 percent increase in current expenditures. Growth of expenditures in school districts outpaced that experienced by other local governments during this period.

Table 12.3: Local Government Current Expenditures, 2007 and 2012 (Amounts in Millions of Dollars)

Government Unit	2007	2012	Percent Increase
Counties (excluding New York City counties)	$21,698.5	$23,754.5	9.5
Cities (excluding New York City)	4,213.7	4,305.2	2.2
Towns	7,411.3	7,454.5	0.6
Villages	2,599.4	2,746.8	5.7
School Districts (excluding New York City)	32,686.5	37,340.3	14.2

[2] Office of the State Comptroller
[4] Office of the State Comptroller

Table 12.3: (continued)

Government Unit	2007	2012	Percent Increase
Fire Districts	665.6	722.9	8.6
Total	$69,275.0	$76,324.2	10.2

12.2 Local Government Revenues

Total local government revenues in New York State increased by about 10 percent during the period 2007 to 2012, from $66.2 billion to $72.6 billion. A significant development in local revenue sources during the sixties and seventies was the growing importance of intergovernmental aid. The federal government, through its array of categorical grant programs, transferred substantial sums to state and local governments.

New York State also increased its aid to local governments, providing more general assistance as well as funds for specific programs.

The introduction of federal general revenue sharing in 1972 signaled the shift from categorical to block grants. Local government was thus provided with more control over the disposition of its federal monies, but with a reduced amount available, beginning in the second half of the seventies. The federal revenue sharing program expired in 1986. The early 1980's witnessed increased efforts to consolidate numerous categorical grant programs in such areas as education, social services and health into a greatly reduced number of block grants and has not changed dramatically since. The federal contribution to local revenues in New York State in 2012 was $5.1 billion, 29 percent more than the 2007 level of $4.0 billion. State aid of $ 16.1 billion in 2012 was 4 percent more than the 2007 amount of $15.6 billion, with increases in school aid a significant factor in state aid growth over the period.

Local government property tax in New York State rose from 59.5 percent of all local revenue in 2007 to 62.1 percent in 2012. Property taxes in 2012 totaled close to $32.1 billion, about 15 percent more than 5 years earlier.

Table 12.4 [131] shows total tax revenue for New York State and its local governments by type of tax. The real property tax raises significantly more revenue in the state than any other single tax.

12.3 Property Taxation

The property tax in New York State is a tax based on the value of real property (land and improvements). It occupies a special place in the financing of local government not only because of its yield in relation to total local revenue, but also because of its key position in the municipal budget process.

12.3.1 Property Tax and Local Budgets

Municipal budgeting follows a procedure which first estimates expenditures or appropriations and then deducts estimated revenues from sources other than the property tax to arrive at a remainder, which is the tax levy. Thus the property tax levy becomes the balancing item on the revenue side of the municipal budget. This process is constrained by the existence of legal limitations upon the amounts which may be raised by certain jurisdictions from the real property tax.

Table 12.4: Local Taxes in New York State, 2007 and 2012 (Amounts in Billions of Dollars).[6]

Local Taxes	2007 Amount	2012 Amount
Real Property	$27.8	$32.1
Sales	8.6	9.1
Other Taxes and Fees[7]	0.3	0.3
Total	$36.7	$41.5

The final step is fixing the local tax rate. The tax levy is divided by the total dollar amount of the taxable assessed valuation of real estate within the local government. The result is a percentage figure, which is expressed as a tax rate, normally so many dollars and cents per $1,000 of assessed valuation.

Where the tax levy for a county, school district or improvement district is spread between or among two or more municipalities, assessed valuations are equalized for each municipality through the use of equalization rates. Equalization is intended to ensure equity where a property tax is levied over several local government units that assess properties at different percentages of value.

For school apportionment and for county apportionment in most counties, the equalization rates are determined by the State Office of Real Property Tax Services (ORPTS). In other counties — except Nassau County and the counties in New York City — equalization rates are established by the county legislative body, subject to review by ORPTS.

12.3.2 Property Tax and Local Revenues

Table 12.5 [131] illustrates the position which real property taxes occupied in the general revenue structure of local governments and school and fire districts in 2012. Property taxes continue to play a prominent role in financing school district, town and village expenditures. Fire districts also depend heavily upon this revenue source.

Table 12.5: 2012 Local Government Revenue Sources Percent Distribution

Government Unit	Real Property Taxes and Assessments	Non-property Taxes	State Aid	Federal Aid	All Others	Total
Counties (excluding New York City counties)	23.2	32.2	11.8	11.6	21.2	100.0
Cities (excluding New York City)	26.5	20.8	18.8	5.9	28.0	100.0

[6] Office of the State Comptroller, Detail may not add due to rounding.

[7] Includes sales tax credits to towns used to reduce real property tax levy, utility gross receipts tax, consumer utility tax (if not included in sales tax), OTB surtax, hotel occupancy tax, harness and flat track admission tax, privilege tax on coin-operated devices, revenues from franchises, interest and penalties on non-property taxes, etc.

Table 12.5: (continued)

Government Unit	Real Property Taxes and Assess-ments	Non-property Taxes	State Aid	Federal Aid	All Others	Total
Towns	53.3	11.3	6.7	4.8	23.9	100.0
Villages	48.9	7.1	4.4	3.5	36.1	100.0
School Districts (excluding New York City)	55.9	0.7	33.9	5.1	4.4	100.0
Fire Districts	94.0	0	0.1	0.5	5.4	100.0
Total — All Units	43.9	12.9	22.2	7.0	14.0	100.0

Table 12.6 [132] shows the increase in real property tax income between 2007 and 2012 for all levels of local government. Overall, real property taxes in 2005 were about 34 percent higher than in 2000.

Table 12.6: Local Government Real Property Tax Revenue by Type of Government, 2007 and 2012 (Amounts in Millions of Dollars).[9]

Government Unit	2007	2012	Percent Increase
Counties	$4,648.6	$5,254.6	13.0
Cities	1,014.7	1,131.7	11.5
Towns	3,231.9	3,711.4	14.8
Villages	1,087.0	1,285.0	18.2
School Districts (excluding New York City)	17,238.4	20,086.7	16.5
Fire Districts	582.1	676.6	16.2
Total	$27,802.7	$32,146.0	15.6

12.3.3 Property Tax Exemptions

The exemption of federal property from local taxation springs from the American constitutional doctrine of intergovernmental immunity. The exemption of state property from local taxation rests on the principle that the sovereign entity cannot be taxed by subordinate political units and still be sovereign. When so determined by the Legislature, however, the state does permit taxation of its property.

The exemption of certain privately-owned property from local taxation is grounded in theory, history and practice. The underlying principle is that real property used exclusively for religious, educational or charitable purposes serves a public purpose by contributing to moral improvement, public welfare and the protection of public health. Although such property is wholly exempt from general municipal and school district taxes, it does pay a share of the costs of certain capital improvements made by improvement districts (such as water supply and sewer systems).

[9] Office of the State Comptroller

Exemptions from property taxation may be granted in the State of New York only by general law. References to the subject comprise some of the most extensive and complex provisions of the Real Property Tax Law. State law in some instances mandates exemption and in other instances allows exemption upon enactment of local legislation.

12.3.3.1 Non-fiscal Purposes

The use of the property tax for what may be described as non-fiscal purposes — to accomplish goals other than raising municipal revenue — is a controversial topic, particularly as such uses extend beyond the traditional confines of religious, educational, or charitable purposes and are directed toward economic, environmental and social ends. The following are examples of types of property which may be partially or fully tax-exempt: public housing, privately owned multiple dwellings, industrial development agency facilities, commercial and industrial facilities, railroads, air pollution control facilities, industrial waste treatment facilities, agricultural and forest lands, and the residences of veterans and low-income senior citizens.

Property tax exemptions may cause financial stresses on local governments. Exemptions do not reduce tax levies, but instead shift a greater portion of the levy to remaining taxpayers, who consequently must pay higher taxes. An exception is the School Tax Relief (STAR) exemption, a partial school tax exemption applicable to most residential property, which is State-funded. Many challenge the use of property tax exemptions for non-fiscal purposes, arguing that subsidies for such purposes might better come from broader revenue sources than the limited base of the local property tax.

The standard source at the state level for technical assistance on the law and practice of property tax exemption is the State Board of Real Property Tax Services. The Board has published a number of reports on the impact of various exemptions on local tax bases. In addition, it annually publishes a statistical report detailing the value and location of exempt property in the state.

The value of exempt property is often obscure. Many assessors conclude that they have no reason to place realistic values on property which will not be taxed. Furthermore, many assessors do not revise exempt property lists, even periodically, since the figures are not utilized for any apparent purpose. However, where a tax levy is spread between or among two or more municipalities, the equalized value of tax exempt properties is used when calculating the tax rates, so unrealistic values on tax exempt properties can affect a tax levy. Consequently, the reported valuations of exempt properties in New York State in all likelihood do not reflect their full impact on municipal tax bases or the revenue they would return if they were made taxable. With that caveat in mind, it is worth noting that the ratio of exempt valuation to the total of taxable and exempt valuation in New York State rose from 11 percent at the turn of the twentieth century to about 32 percent in 2005.

12.3.3.2 Exemptions in Cities and Towns

In 2005 there were 4.5 million property tax exemptions on assessment rolls in New York. The value of exempt property in cities and towns totaled $678 billion in 2005, almost 32 percent of the state's real property assessed value. In nine of New York's cities, more than half of the value of the real property contained therein was exempt from taxation. Twenty-three of the 933 towns in New York had in excess of 50 percent of their total real property value exempt from taxation on their 2005 assessment rolls.

Property owned by government and quasi-government entities, such as public authorities, accounts for 47 percent of the total value of exempt property. As for private owners, the largest proportion of exempt property is owned by community service organizations, social organizations and professional societies (13 percent of all exempt property). As for exempt residential property other than multiple dwellings, the leading categories of exemption based on value are the School Tax Relief (STAR) Program (23 percent of total exempt value), property owned by veterans (almost 5 percent) and property owned by senior citizens (about 2.5 percent).

The percentage of exempt value attributable to state-mandated exemptions statewide was 94 percent. In absolute terms, the total value of state-mandated exemptions on 2005 assessment rolls was $637 billion.

12.3.4 Property Tax Administration

The administration of the real property tax involves four tasks:

1. the discovery and identification of land and buildings;
2. their valuation by a defensible method or suitable combination of methods;
3. the preparation of the final assessment roll against which property taxes are levied; and
4. the review of assessed valuations for the correction of inequalities.

12.3.4.1 Organization for Assessment

The first three of the above tasks are the duty of local assessors. In New York State the assessing units include the 62 cities and 933 towns. Other local governments use the assessment rolls as they require them. County and school tax levies, it was noted earlier, are distributed among constituent municipalities in relation to their equalized values. Although the 550 villages are empowered to assess property for purposes of village taxation, many accept the town rolls and a majority have terminated their status as assessing units and transferred that function to the towns.

There are two county assessing units in the state: Tompkins County and Nassau County. Under the Tompkins County Charter, an appointed county director of assessment assesses all real property in the county subject to taxation for county, town, village, school district or improvement district purposes. The Nassau County Government Law establishes a county board of assessors, consisting of four appointed members and a chairman and executive officer who is elected from the county at large. The board assesses real property on a countywide basis for purposes of county, town, school district and improvement district taxation.

Local assessors are either elected or appointed to their positions. All but two cities have a single appointed assessor or appointed boards of assessors. Since 1927 village assessors have been appointed, and villages have either one or three assessors. In some villages, the village trustees act as assessors.

Title 2 of Article 3 of the Real Property Tax Law provides that, except in Tompkins and Nassau Counties, cities under 100,000 population and all towns shall have a single assessor, appointed to a six-year term of office. In any city or town where one or more of the offices of assessors was elective, the governing body was empowered to retain elective assessors by enactment of a local law, providing such action was taken prior to April 30, 1971. About 50 percent of towns retained elected assessors under this option.

12.3.4.2 Property Valuation

There are three basic methods for arriving at the value of real estate for tax assessment purposes - sales analysis and comparison, income capitalization, and the replacement cost of improvements. The separate valuation of land entails a further set of value factors and a judgment as to their combined effect upon a give parcel of land.

Among the various considerations are prevailing land use or classification, sales and income data, and the establishment of separate units of value (such as front foot), subject to modification for reasons of lot size, depth or irregularities.

The basic issues in property valuation are treating the owners of taxable property fairly and administering the property tax efficiently in the interest of both the municipality and the taxpayers. Until December, 1981, Section 306 of the Real Property Tax Law required all assessments to be set at full value. Historically, however, real property in this state was usually assessed at a percentage of full value. Inequities had long existed among and within different classes of property, e.g., residential, industrial, commercial. These inequities stimulated a series of court challenges to the property tax assessment system in New York State. The most notable cases are Hellerstein v. Assessor of the Town of Islip 37 NY2d 1,371 NYS2d 388 (1975) modified by 39 NY2d 920,386 NYS2d 406 (1976) and Guth v. Gingold (34 NY2d 440,358 NYS2d 367 (1974)).

In its June 1975 decision in Hellerstein, the Court of Appeals found that assessment of real property must be at its full value since the Real Property Tax Law did not, at that time, authorize fractional assessments. In Guth, the Court of Appeals determined that a property owner could use the equalization rate established by the State Board of Equalization and Assessment (now the State Board of Real Property Tax Services) as a sole means of proving inequality with respect to the assessment of a property.

In December 1981, the State Legislature repealed Section 306 of the Real Property Tax Law thereby removing the full value assessment requirement. Section 305 of the Real Property Tax Law authorizes the continuation of existing methods of assessment in each assessing unit. However, it specifically requires assessment at a uniform percentage of value (fractional assessment) within each assessing unit.

Special provisions applicable to New York City and Nassau County prescribe a classification system. In all other areas of the state, assessing units are authorized to preserve homestead class tax shares on taxing jurisdictions completely within the assessing unit - predominantly cities, towns or villages. This means they may reduce the tax burden on residential real property (dwellings for three or fewer families) and farmhouses relative to other types of property.

12.3.4.3 Assessment Improvement

Efforts at the local level to improve assessment administration take various forms such as assessor training, improved record-keeping, tax maps and computerization of assessment data. Many municipalities have conducted comprehensive reappraisals. State financial assistance on a per parcel basis is available to assessing units which conduct reappraisals. Statewide, however, wide disparities still exist among classes of property and within classes of property regarding a uniform and equitable relationship of property assessments to full value.

The State Board of Real Property Tax Services maintains a comprehensive system of software programs called the Real Property System (RPS) which is available, for free, to all assessing units. It is capable of maintaining assessment, physical property inventory, and valuation information for any type of real property. In addition, RPS has the ability to conduct a mass appraisal of an entire municipality and is capable of producing assessment rolls, tax rolls and tax bills. In addition, it includes a Geographic Information System (GIS) and ten layers of State-provided geographic coverage data (roads, municipal boundaries, wetlands, school district boundaries, etc.). A document image management system (DIM) allows any document, such as a photograph, a sketch, a deed or a map, to be electronically attached to a parcel of property. A custom report writer (CRW) provides the assessor with the ability to create reports regarding assessment, sale or inventory data. Other municipal systems or off-the-shelf software can be easily integrated with the RPS system. The Office of Real Property Tax Services (ORPTS) periodically develops updates to the RPS system.

Legislation passed in 1970 provided for the appointment of property tax directors at the county level to coordinate and assist local assessment functions; gave towns the option of converting from elected to appointed assessors; created boards of assessment review in each municipality; required all counties with the exception of Westchester and those in New York City to provide assessors with modern, accurate tax maps; established minimum qualifications for appointed assessors; and required many town and most city assessors to achieve certification from the State Board of Real Property Tax Services. The legislation also provided for advisory appraisals of taxable utility property by the State Board upon local request.

In 1977, the State Legislature enacted Article 15-B of the Real Property Tax Law. This article provides for state financial assistance to local governments which implement improved systems for real property tax administration. This program has been revised several times, including to encourage cyclical reassessments. The "Aid for Cyclical Reassessments" replaces the previous Aid programs. Assessing units that commit to conducting reappraisals of all property at least once every four years may receive up to $5 per parcel in the year of a full reappraisal with additional payments of up to $2 per parcel in interim years.

Effective in 1982, the legislature amended the Real Property Tax Law to make training mandatory for all assessors, whether elected or appointed, as well as for directors of county real property tax services. In addition, the State Board of Real Property Tax Services was given authority to review the qualifications of appointed assessors and county directors to determine if they meet the minimum qualification standards.

12.4 Local Non-Property Taxes

The power of taxation is an inherent attribute of state sovereignty, not possessed by its political subdivisions. Article XVI of the State Constitution declares:

> "The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away, except as to securities issued for public purposes pursuant to law. Any laws which delegate the taxing power shall specify the types of taxes which may be imposed thereunder and provide for their review."

Using this authority, the State Legislature has authorized the imposition of what have come to be known as local non-property taxes.

12.4.1 New York City Taxes

New York State began to utilize local non-property taxes because of the difficulties the City of New York experienced during the Great Depression in the 1930s. Delegation of local taxing power on a significant scale started with New York City. At the emergency session of 1933, the Legislature granted the City power to impose, for a six-month period, any type of tax which the State itself could impose. This initial grant of power was to expire six months after its effective date. Amid much controversy the initial grant was renewed and modified, but the broad outlines of state policy with regard to special local taxes did not emerge until 1939. After the 1938 Constitutional Convention, the State altered its home-rule stance toward New York City's authority to tax. From this point forward the Legislature narrowed the range of special taxes available to New York City and began to limit maximum rates. By the postwar period, New York City possessed the power to impose a variety of special taxes, which, under economic conditions in some degree peculiar to the City, became an important source of revenue. These included taxes on hotel room occupancy, sales, utilities, gross income, business gross receipts and pari-mutuel wagering.

12.4.2 Local Utility Taxes

In 1937, the Legislature extended optional, local taxing power to the upstate cities when it authorized upstate cities to levy a local one percent tax on the gross income of public utilities. Initially, the proceeds could only go to pay for relief. In 1942, the Legislature removed the welfare restriction upon the use of utility tax proceeds and receipts could thereafter be applied to general municipal purposes. The utilities gross income tax proved attractive, and cities throughout the state adopted it.

12.4.3 Housing Subsidy Taxes

Following a 1938 housing amendment to the State Constitution, the Legislature authorized a series of special non-property taxes, which could be levied by cities and by villages with a population of 5,000 or more. The proceeds were to cover periodic housing subsidies or to meet service charges for local housing debt incurred outside the normal constitutional debt limit. Although the only two municipalities that took advantage of this legislation — the Cities of Buffalo and New York — have since repealed their local statutes, the enabling legislation marked another phase in the development of local taxing power.

12.4.4 Extension of Permissive Taxing Power

The further extension of permissive local taxing power occurred in New York State at the same time it was expanding elsewhere. After the Second World War, municipal costs soared. Many people felt that the full weight of these additional expenditures should not fall upon the property tax base. Local government officials and finance officers throughout the country expressed interest in gaining authority to adopt non-property taxes at local option. One conspicuous result was the well-known "home rule" tax law adopted by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in 1947. In 1947 and 1948 the New York State Legislature also enacted permissive local tax laws, applicable to cities and counties. A principal factor stimulating their enactment had been the adoption of a permanent teachers' salary law. These permissive tax laws reflected state policy that optional local taxes had to be defined and that they would neither supplant nor supplement the principal existing sources of state revenue.

The most productive local tax contained in the law was the sales tax. Other items included a business gross receipts tax (later denied upstate), a tax on consumers' utility bills, and an array of miscellaneous taxes or excises. The permissive tax law has been frequently amended and additional local taxes or options have been made available under other provisions of law.

12.4.5 Adoption of Permissive Taxes

Among the important developments with respect to optional local taxing powers are the following:

- All 57 counties (outside of New York City) have adopted a sales and use tax. As of September 2005, 49 of these counties plus New York City have local sales tax rates that exceed the 3 percent statutory limit, including eight counties with local rates exceeding 4 percent.
- Extension of limited optional local taxing power to city school districts, with the result that by 2005, 21 city school districts had adopted a consumers utility tax.
- 60 cities, other than New York City, and 348 villages, have accepted at least a one percent tax on the gross income of utility companies.
- Ten of the 61 eligible cities, other than New York City, have adopted the miscellaneous taxes and excises allowed by law, including taxes on coin-operated amusement devices, hotel room occupancy, real estate transfers, restaurant meals, amusement admissions and the consumer utility tax.

Special local taxes now occupy a prominent place in the financing of local government in the State of New York. Table 12.5 [131] shows the proportion of total revenue provided by local non-property taxes in 2012. Non-property taxes were approximately one-quarter of total revenues for counties and cities other than New York City. Special local taxes were a less significant income-producer proportionately for towns, villages, and school districts in New York State.

The local non-property tax revenues of cities, other than New York City, towns, and school districts outside New York City reflect, in varying degrees, the distribution of county sales tax receipts. More jurisdictions have adopted higher sales tax rates in recent years. The 2007 to 2012 comparison in Table 12.7 [138] shows that jurisdictions are gaining larger sales tax yields. The methods of distribution specified in the Tax Law are varied and complex, and further variations are permissible with the approval of the State Comptroller. Methods employed to distribute county sales tax revenues are the responsibility of county governing bodies.

12.5 Special Charges, Fees and Earnings

Local governments in the State of New York derive substantial revenues from special charges, fees and the earnings of municipal enterprises. In cities, for example, fees and charges may be made for licenses, permits, rentals, departmental fees and charges, sales, recoveries, fines, forfeits and other items. Earnings of municipal enterprises and special activities include user payments and miscellaneous revenues of such operations as water service, bus transportation, airports, hospitals, stadiums and public auditoriums, off-street parking, and municipally-owned public utilities. In the aggregate, local government revenues from special charges, fees and municipal enterprises rose from $5.1 billion in 2000 to $6.7 billion in 2005, an increase of 32 percent.

Table 12.7: Local Non-property Tax Revenue, 2007 and 2012 (Amounts in Millions of Dollars) SOURCE: Office of the State Comptroller

Government Unit	2007	2012	Percent Increase
Counties (excluding New York City counties)	6,879.3	7,299.4	6.1
Cities (excluding New York City)	831.3	890.0	7.1
Towns	710.7	784.8	10.4
Villages	175.2	186.3	6.3
School Districts (excluding New York City)	278.3	269.2	-3.3
Fire Districts	0	0	0
Total	$8,874.8	$9,429.7	6.3

12.5.1 Municipal Practices

Local governments have some latitude in establishing user charges and fixing rates, although fees collected by local officials are often controlled by state law, particularly in the administration of justice and offices of record. In general, the amount of a regulatory license or permit fee must be reasonably related to the cost to the municipality of the particular regulatory program, and the fees established for the use of a municipal service or facility must be reasonably related to the cost of providing the service or operating the facility. Municipalities have found it profitable to reexamine their charges periodically and bring them in line with current costs. Policy issues, local choice, and practical considerations are involved in the imposition of user fees. For example, many local governments will cover, or more than cover, the costs of a water supply and distribution system through water rates. In the case of certain enterprises such as airports, hospitals, public auditoriums, bus transportation and rapid transit, however, considerations other than the recovery of full annual costs may prevail.

At this time, there is no general authority for the imposition of service charges for established responsibilities of local governments such as police, fire, public works and libraries. There are exceptions as to particular aspects of these services, but, in general, these services are viewed as providing benefits to the public at large without relation to particular benefits provided to individuals.

12.6 State Aid

Intergovernmental payments by the state to local governments are a major aspect of local finances. State aid consists of grants-in-aid, which are payments to local governments for specified purposes, and general assistance. State assistance during 2012 accounted for slightly under one-quarter of all revenues received by municipalities and school districts. Overall state aid, in actual dollars, increased 4.2 percent from 2007 to 2012.

12.6.1 Background of State Aid

12.6.1.1 Early Origins

Origins of state aid in New York go back to the early days of statehood. References to state aid for common schools appear in 1795, and education aid began to assume real importance with the free public school movement of the 1840's, although the principle of free schools was not fully realized until after the Civil War. A leading purpose of school aid in this era was to compensate for revenue losses which resulted from eliminating local tuition. At a later point, the state introduced incentive grants to stimulate local participation in particular aspects of public education. These purposes - providing assistance in meeting the costs of state-originated programs and providing an incentive for localities to participate in such programs - have continued to this day.

12.6.1.2 Growth and Expansion

State aid has grown from its small beginnings to its present dimensions because of various economic and social developments. These include free schools; the coming of the automobile; statewide initiatives in health and mental health, sanitation and public welfare; and, more recently, concern with the environment and natural resources, educational opportunity beyond twelfth grade, public safety and mass transportation.

12.6.2 Amount of State Aid

Table 12.5 [131] illustrates the position which state aid occupies in the general revenue structure of local governments in the state in 2012. Overall, state aid supplied 22.2 percent of all local government revenues in 2012. State aid is a very important revenue source for school districts outside New York City, representing 33.9 percent of their revenues in 2012.

Table 12.8 [139] illustrates the percentage increase in state aid between 2007 and 2012 for the different classes of government in the State.

Table 12.8: State Aid Payments to Local Governments by Type of Government, 2007 and 2012 (Amounts in Millions of Dollars).[11]

Government Unit	2007	2012	Percent Increase
Counties (excluding New York City counties)	$2,828.5	$2,678.5	-5.3%

Table 12.8: (continued)

Government Unit	2007	2012	Percent Increase
Cities (excluding New York City)	827.0	801.6	-3.1
Towns	640.2	468.8	-26.8
Villages	154.3	114.6	-25.7
School Districts (excluding New York City)	11,126.1	12,167.1	9.4
Fire Districts	1.8	0.6	-66.7
Total	$15,577.9	$16,231.2	4.2%

12.6.3 State Aid to Local Governments

12.6.3.1 General Purpose Assistance

General purpose assistance can be defined as financial aid for the support of local government functions without limitation as to the use of such aid and without the substantive program and procedural conditions that are routinely attached to categorical grants-in-aid. In the late 1990's, interest centered on the General Purpose Local Government Assistance program, which distributed over $770 million to cities, towns and villages during state fiscal year 1999-2000. The program, which had been titled "Revenue Sharing" in the early 1970's, grew to include four distinct components: General Purpose Local Government Aid (GPLGA); Emergency Financial Aid to Certain Cities; Emergency Financial Aid to Eligible Municipalities, and Supplemental Municipal Aid. The 2005-06 budget established the Aid and Incentives for Municipalities (AIM) Program, which collapsed these four programs into one "base level grant" for all cities, towns and villages statewide.

New York State has provided financial aid to its municipalities since 1789. Early programs included categorical grants for activities encouraged by the state and the shared tax system whereby localities received portions of taxes they had participated in collecting. The per capita aid program instituted in 1946 allocated specific dollar amounts per capita to cities, towns and villages. In 1965, a statutory formula was established to calculate aid based on fiscal need, effort and capacity indicators.

The revenue sharing program created in 1970 was designed to eliminate the complexity and uncertainty of previous state aid programs and to provide municipalities with flexible, equitable and predictable aid. New York State Finance Law Article 4-A, section 54 outlines the framework of the Revenue Sharing Program, which is based on the previous Per Capita Aid Program. This program was designed to allocate specific amounts to counties, cities, towns and villages (with special emphasis on cities), based on population and full value data. The original legislation envisioned a distribution of aid equaling 21 percent of Personal Income Tax (PIT) revenues and that such aid would grow annually keeping pace with growth in the State's major revenue source.

The revenue sharing program underwent numerous changes in the 1970s. Before the program was even implemented, allocations were cut in 1971 to 18 percent of PIT receipts. In 1977-78, the State capped distributions at the 1976-77 level. In 1978-79, revenue sharing aid was further restricted when statute was amended to change the basis of funding from 18 percent of PIT receipts to 8 percent of total State tax collections. In 1979-80, the State froze revenue sharing at the 1978-79 level, and until 1984-85, funding was capped at $800 million.

[11] Office of the State Comptroller

The program peaked in fiscal year 1988-89 at nearly $1.1 billion. During the early 1990's, New York reduced numerous programs, including unrestricted local government aid by roughly 50 percent over four years. By 1992-93, revenue sharing had been decreased by more than $500 million to a low of $532 million.

12.6.4 AIM Program

The Aid and Incentives for Municipalities (AIM) program enacted in 2005 – 2006, increased unrestricted aid to cities, towns and villages by $57 million. The 2007-2008 enacted Budget restructured the AIM program to target additional State aid primarily to fiscally distressed municipalities. An AIM increase of $450 million was authorized in 2007-2008, and in each of the three following years, for a four-year total of $200 million. These increases were tied to enhanced accountability requirements that encouraged local fiscal improvement. The 2007-2008 AIM program included $15 million in grants for a range of local shared services activities. In addition, a new $10 million consolidation incentive aid is created under SMSI provides a recurring 25 percent AIM increase to municipalities that merged or consolidated in 2007-2008.

12.7 Federal Aid

The role of federal aid in local finances from 2007 through 2012 is indicated in Table 12.9 [142]. During this period federal assistance to local governments in the state increased from $4.0 billion in 2007 to over $5.1 billion in 2012.

Under pressure from state and local governments, which were overwhelmed by the multiplicity of federal programs and their individual requirements and administration, Congress enacted legislation during the 1970s that consolidated various categorical aid programs into block grants in the broad functional areas of education, manpower, law enforcement, and housing and community development. These programs have been broadly characterized as "special revenue sharing" programs. Among the objectives of this legislation were the simplification of grant administration, the provision of increased discretion in the use of funds allocated to state and local government grant recipients, and the elimination of conventional matching requirements. This system of categorical block grants to local governments is still presently utilized.

A major development in federal aid was the passage of federal general revenue sharing in 1972. For the first time, the national government distributed aid to local and state governments with very few restrictions on how the money could be spent and without requiring governments to apply for the grants. A local government's allocation was based on a complex formula which, at the local level, took into account the adjusted taxes, per capita income, population and intergovernmental transfers of each governmental unit.

State and local governments received their first revenue sharing checks in December 1972 for the entitlement period January 1 through June 30, 1972. The federal general revenue sharing program was discontinued in the mid 1980's.

12.7.1 Amount of Federal Aid

Table 12.5 [131] illustrates the position which federal aid occupies in the general revenue structure of the local governments in the state in 2012. Overall, federal aid supplied 7.0 percent of all local government revenues in 2012.

Table 12.9 [142] reflects the growth of federal aid from 2007 through 2012 for each respective class of government, both in actual dollars and by percent increase.

Table 12.9: Federal Aid Payments to Local Governments, 2007 and 2012 by Type of Unit (Amounts in Millions of Dollars).[13]

Government Unit	2007	2012	Percent Increase
Counties (excluding New York City counties)	$1,988.5	$2,630.5	32.3
Cities (excluding New York City)	262.0	252.2	-3.7
Towns	212.6	337.4	58.7
Villages	85.6	91.2	6.5
School Districts (excluding New York City)	1,401.6	1,815.0	29.5
Fire Districts	3.2	3.2	0
Total	$3.953.5	$5,129.5	29.7

[13] Office of the State Comptroller

Chapter 13

Personnel Administration

Personnel administration in New York local governments is subject in many important respects to the State Civil Service Law. In general, the law makes several options available to local governments for civil service administration. Although the specific responsibilities of a municipal personnel agency may vary, a sound personnel program rests on clearly drawn local laws, rules and regulations which encompass such matters as recruitment, selection, and placement, performance appraisal; position classification and pay plans, fringe benefits, working conditions, separation, training and career development.

Personnel administration encompasses all of the activities concerned with the human resources of an organization and includes a series of functions which relate to its overall operation. These functions include position classification'` determination of salary scales, fringe benefits, recruitment and selection of employees, performance appraisal, training, establishment of policies and procedures for conduct and discipline, and the development of programs related to health, safety, affirmative action and retirement programs.

Numerous factors - economic and social resources, technological advances, intermunicipal relations, politics and political leadership, special interest groups such as employee unions, and concern for career services — greatly influence personnel programs.

13.1 Historical Development

To understand the goals and purposes of public personnel administration, it is helpful to trace its historic development and, in particular, to note the major role that New York State played in the civil service reform movement. Initially, the philosophy and practices of patronage almost universally governed personnel administration in the United States. Patronage involved giving government jobs to supporters of those who won elections and resulted in the famed and controversial spoils system. Jobs were filled with party workers and with friends and relatives of elected officials. During the nineteenth century the patronage system and its abuses produced increasing alarm. It was charged with lowering morale, encouraging disloyalty and dishonesty, obstructing reward for good work, and discouraging competent people from entering government service.

It is no coincidence that New York generated much of the early impetus for civil service reform, since the spoils system had become most pervasive in the Empire State." As one observer noted, “It was the politicians of New York who gave it its organized impulse. It was in response to Henry Clay’s taunt at the New York system that a New York senator made the famous defense that to the victor belong the spoils of his enemy.” [1] It is not surprising that civil service reformers were most active in New York State, where the problems were most acute. Organized in 1877, the New York Civil Service Reform Association stimulated the rapid development of similar associations in other states. This reform movement led to the enactment of the federal Pendleton Act in January 1883. This law required establishment of a bipartisan civil service commission to conduct competitive examinations and to assure the appointment and promotion of government employees based on merit. Later that year, New York State enacted its first civil service law.

[1] Jerome Lefkowitz, The Legal Basis of Employee Relations of New York State Employees (Association of Labor Mediation Agencies, 1973), p. 2.

13.2 New York State Civil Service Law

New York State has the oldest civil service system of any state in the nation. Beginning in 1883, as a reaction to the spoils system, it concentrated on the development of examinations and other recruitment devices. The state subsequently adopted a special classification system in order to determining titles and salaries. As state government assumed greater responsibilities and as the state's work force grew, the civil service system was modified and refined by legislation and administrative action. It became a highly complex and sophisticated system, which is now administered by the State Department of Civil Service. Within the department, separate divisions concentrate on specific personnel functions, such as classification, examination and placement. New York State's Civil Service Law also includes provisions for the administration of civil service at the local government level.

13.2.1 Forms of Local Civil Service Administration

The Civil Service Law specifies optional forms of civil service administration for the purpose of administering the law in the counties (including political subdivisions within counties), in the cities and in suburban towns with a population of more than 50,000. Villages have no authority to administer a separate civil service system, but must comply with state law and with locally adopted civil service rules and the regulations of the regional or county civil service commission or personnel officer.

Municipalities can select one of two major options for direct administration of civil service law - the civil service commission or the personnel officer. The commission consists of three persons with no more than two from the same political party. They are appointed either by the governing body or by the chief executive officer of the municipality. Their six-year terms of office are staggered, with one term expiring every two years.

Like the Civil Service Commission, the personnel officer is appointed by the governing body or chief executive for six years and the responsibilities of the office include those of the municipal civil service commission. In addition, the personnel officer often has non-civil service responsibilities of personnel management and human resources administration, such as labor relations, affirmative action and staff development activities. Other governments have developed a hybrid form of civil service/personnel administration. Typically, this joint system of administration consists of a part-time civil service commission and a personnel director. The civil service commission administers the Civil Service Law and promulgates local civil service rules and regulations, while the personnel director carries out the non-civil service functions.

In the event that a county or city chooses to not directly administer a separate civil service system, it may join with one or more other counties or cities, in the same or adjoining counties, to establish a regional civil service commission or a regional personnel officer position. This regional alternative for civil service administration may be established by written agreement approved by the governing bodies of each participating county and city. There are no regional operations in New York State at present.

Political subdivisions with populations of less than 5,000 fall into a special category. The State Civil Service Commission has standards for determining whether or not it is practical in such subdivisions to have civil service examinations for their employees.

13.2.2 Categories of Positions

Sections 35 and 40 of the Civil Service Law establish two major groups of municipal employee positions - the classified and unclassified services.

Positions in the unclassified service are defined by statute and include all elected officials, all officers and employees with duties and responsibilities directly related to either the legislative or elective functions, chief administrators (i.e., department heads) of government, and those individuals with instructional responsibilities within school districts, boards of cooperative educational services, county vocational education and extension boards, or the state university system.

Within the classified service there are four jurisdictional classifications of positions: competitive, exempt, noncompetitive and labor. All positions which are outside the competitive class must be specifically named by the civil service commission and approved by the State Civil Service Commission.

The basis for determining whether a position shall be in the competitive class is the practicality of ascertaining merit and fitness by competitive examination. This process may utilize any, or a combination, of several different tests: written, oral, performance, physical, and review of training and experience. If a position in the classified service is ruled to be outside the competitive class, it is placed in one of the other three classes in accordance with criteria found in the Civil Service Law.

Exempt class positions are designated primarily for positions of a policymaking or confidential nature for which a competitive or noncompetitive examination is impractical. The appointing authority selects employees in this class without regard to civil service rules and regulations governing eligible lists. The intention is that executive and judicial officers should have some latitude and flexibility in selecting, retaining and discharging their closest associates. Another important aspect of exempt positions is that there are no specified minimum qualifications as there are in competitive, non-competitive and labor class positions.

Noncompetitive class positions are positions for which there are established qualifications with respect to education and experience, but it is not practical to determine merit and fitness of applicants by competitive examination. The appointing authority can make appointments without regard to relative standing on eligible lists. There are no noncompetitive eligible lists The labor class includes all unskilled laborers, except those for which a competitive examination can be given. The local civil service commission or personnel officer may require applicants to take examinations for labor class positions if it is practical.

13.3 Local Civil Service Administration

13.3.1 Scope and Responsibility

The municipal civil service commission or personnel officer administers the Civil Service Law for classified municipal employees. Rules adopted by the commission or personnel officer are subject to approval by the State Civil Service Commission. The local commission or personnel officer must maintain extensive employee records for certifying payrolls, conducting examinations required by law and preparing appropriate lists of people eligible for appointment.

Regardless of the form chosen, the civil service commission or personnel officer of a county administers the Civil Service Law for the county and the political subdivisions within the county, including towns, villages and school districts, except for suburban towns with a population of 50, 000 or more and cities that choose to operate independently. In the case of a city or suburban town that opts to have its own civil service commission or personnel officer, the administration covers all officers and employees of the town or city, including the city school district. The jurisdiction of a regional commission or personnel officer includes all municipal employees within the region, who would otherwise be subject to the jurisdiction of the local civil service administration of the respective counties and cities within the region.

13.3.2 Changing the Form

The Civil Service law also makes provision for changing the system of administering civil service law in counties, cities and suburban towns. The governing body of a county, city or suburban town may elect to change from a civil service commission to the office of personnel officer or vice versa. They may choose to join with another municipality either within the county or on a regional basis to administer civil service jointly under either a commission or personnel officer. The law also establishes the effective dates of such changes, the duration of time before further changes may be made, and the authority of the governing body to revoke its action regarding changes. The advice and counsel of a municipal attorney may be helpful in interpreting and implementing the complicated procedures involved in changing the form of civil service administration.

13.3.3 The Functions of Personnel Administration

The specific responsibilities of a municipal personnel agency vary from one locality to another and from one level of government to another, depending upon size, jurisdiction and numbers of municipal employees. An effectively administered personnel program requires a strong legal base, a comprehensive and concise set of rules and regulations, and assistance and support from the municipality's legislative body.

These components are necessary to achieve continuity of policy and practice and to allow managers to make informed decisions and solve personnel problems. New York State's Civil Service Law includes the following elements in the personnel function: the principle of merit and fitness, rule-making authority, and a procedure for appeal. The administrative guidelines of such a program should emphasize stability of policy and flexibility of procedure. The following paragraphs briefly describe some of the major responsibilities of a personnel organization.

13.3.4 Classification and Salary Plans

Two of the most important functions of a personnel department are position classification and salary administration. To administer an organization effectively, management must have relevant facts about the specific jobs required to accomplish goals and objectives. Management must determine: first, what work must be done to attain the organization's goals; second, what skills are necessary to accomplish this work; and third, how much of this work can be accomplished by one person. On the basis of this information the personnel department classifies positions, determines qualifications and salaries and recruits suitable people to do the work. The information also underlies all testing programs.

The personnel department usually administers a salary plan on the basis of position classification. Sometimes the personnel staff develops the salary plan, but it is common for the department to hire an outside consultant who specializes in the area of personnel administration. However, the final adoption of the plan, including salary and wage scales, is a legislative prerogative. Establishment of a salary policy occurs in two phases: the first determines the general level of wages in an organization; and the second devises a plan to provide consistent internal salary relations. Both social and economic factors affect wage levels in government, and the salary plan must reflect balances between these factors. Wage levels must take the following into consideration:

- financial condition of the organization;
- wage scale of competitors;
- bargaining power of the employees;
- cost of living;
- federal and state regulations;

- internal equity;
- external competitiveness;
- difficulty of work performed;
- education/license required; and
- any special situations, such as hazardous working conditions, shift pay, etc.

13.3.5 Recruitment, Selection and Placement

When the personnel department recruits people to perform jobs, it takes several actions that are part of a continuous process. These actions include recruitment, selection, placement and probation. The recruitment program must reach out and attract the best minds and skills without discrimination. The department may develop and implement affirmative action recruitment programs.

The department then screens applicants for jobs, most frequently by examination and/or interview, and develops lists of eligible candidates. It must plan selection programs carefully so that they include the following kinds of measurements about applicants: skills, knowledge, abilities, personality traits, interests, physical traits (where relevant) and medical conditions.

Working from the eligible list established by the selection process, the department then certifies to the appointing authority the top ranking candidates most qualified for the job. After an individual is appointed, most agencies require a probationary period and provide for periodic performance evaluation. Newly hired employees should participate in an effective orientation and training program during their probation.

The activities composing a municipal personnel program must take place within the limitations and requirements of the state's Human Rights Law as it applies to public employment. This law recognizes as a civil right the opportunity to obtain employment, including public employment, without discrimination because of race, creed, sex, color, age, disability, marital status or national origin. The following practices are among those considered unlawful and discriminatory:

- for an employer to refuse to hire or to discriminate against the employment of an individual or to discharge an employee because of the above factors;
- for an employment agency to discriminate against any individual for these reasons in receiving, classifying, disposing of, or otherwise acting on applications for services;
- for a labor organization to expel or deny membership to an individual for those reasons;
- for an employer or employment agency to promote any advertisement or publication which expresses, directly or indirectly, any prohibited limitations, specifications or discriminations; and
- for an employer, labor organization or employment agency to discharge or expel or otherwise discriminate against any person who has filed complaints pursuant to the Human Rights Law.

In addition, this law specifies that it is an unlawful discriminatory practice for an employer, labor organization or employment agency to control the selection of applicants for apprentice training programs. Numerous other discriminatory practices are listed, but those mentioned above are most specifically related to municipal personnel and training practices.

13.3.6 Performance Appraisal

Every supervisor in a municipal government should conduct a continuous evaluation of an employees' development and whether they utilize their abilities most effectively. Periodic employee performance appraisal promotes the effective operation of an organization. A performance appraisal system:

- informs employees of what is expected of them;
- informs employees of how they are performing;
- recognizes and rewards good work;
- determines employee weaknesses and suggests alternatives for improvement;
- identifies employee training needs;
- maintains a continuing record of employee performance;
- guides promotions, transfers and appropriate placement; and
- checks the reasonableness of performance standards, the accuracy of job descriptions and classification, and the effectiveness of recruitment procedures.

There is no standard method for performance evaluation. Numerous techniques are utilized and each requires a different degree of detail. The organization's objectives and management's concerns usually determine the techniques chosen.

13.3.7 Fringe Benefits and Working Conditions

Personnel administration must also be concerned with working conditions and fringe benefits, as specified in labor agreements. Such items are over and above salaries and wages; they include vacation arrangements, sick leave, insurance policies, retirement plans, physical working facilities, hours of work, and employee safety and health programs.

13.3.8 Training and Development

Recruiting, selecting and placing employees are only the beginning of the personnel program. One of the most important aspects of personnel administration is employee training and development. Every employee must learn certain skills, new techniques, appropriate procedures, etc. Employees must be trained - they must be given the opportunity to learn how to effectively perform their present and future work. Training programs can:

- orient employees to a new job;
- assist employees to acquire specific skills or knowledge required to perform their jobs;
- increase the scope of the employees' experiences and prepare them for greater responsibilities;
- encourage employees to take pride in their work;
- promote concern among employees for their own personal and career development; and
- increase worker safety.

The area of employee training and development has been drawing increased concern and interest over the past several years. Many municipalities are establishing separate training units to plan and administer total training programs. Training is integral to the total personnel process; it influences productivity, morale, motivation and realization of organization goals.

13.3.9 Separation

Another aspect of the personnel process is the development of appropriate procedures for separation. These include such activities as reduction in work force, disciplinary suspensions, terminations and separation during the probationary period. Such procedures as required by the Civil Service Law, the Human Rights Law and several court decisions specify due process must rights be granted to employees.

Civil Service Law specifies the procedures for the discipline and discharge of public employees who: hold competitive class appointments, are veterans or exempt volunteer fire fighters, or have completed five years of continuous service as non-competitive employees. However, local governments may negotiate alternative disciplinary procedures to replace or modify those procedures.

Similarly, Civil Service Law governs the separation due to a reduction in work force of competitive class employees and those who are veterans and volunteer firefighters. In addition, local governments may agree to establish specific layoff procedures for noncompetitive and labor class employees through collective bargaining.

13.4 Federal Acts Affecting Personnel Administration

13.4.1 The Americans With Disabilities Act

The Americans With Disabilities Act, commonly referred to as the ADA (42 U.S.C. section 12101 et seq.), became law in 1990. It is intended to eliminate discrimination against people with qualifying disabilities in all areas of life including employment opportunities, access to governmental services, architectural barriers and telecommunications. Title I of the ADA, Employment, is of importance to local government personnel administration since it makes significant changes to all employment related activities, from recruitment and on the job performance, to attendance at work related social functions. Since its enactment, hundreds of cases concerning the ADA have been decided in the Federal Courts. These, along with implementing regulations promulgated by the United States Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) and United States Attorney General, provide guidance for compliance with the Act.

Under Title I of the ADA, no employer, including local governments, may discriminate against an individual with a qualifying disability in the terms and conditions of employment. Under the ADA, an individual is disabled primarily if they have a physical or mental impairment (or are regarded as having such an impairment) which substantially limits one or more of the individual's major life activities, such as caring for oneself, performing manual tasks, walking, seeing, hearing, speaking, breathing, learning, working and moving. The term "qualified individual with a disability" is defined in section 12111(8) of the Act as:

> "…an individual with a disability who, with or without a reasonable accommodation, can perform the essential functions of the employment position that such individual holds or desires. For purposes of this title, consideration shall be given to the employer's judgment as to what functions of a job are essential, and if an employer has prepared a written description before advertising or interviewing applicants for the job, this description shall be considered evidence of the essential functions of the job."

Section 12111(9) provides with regard to the term "reasonable accommodation":

> The term "reasonable accommodation" may include:
>
> A. making existing facilities used by employees readily accessible to and useable by individuals with disabilities; and

B. job restructuring, part-time or modified work schedules, reassignment to vacant positions, acquisition or modification of equipment or devices, appropriate adjustment or modifications of examinations, training materials or policies, the provision of qualified readers or interpreters, and other similar accommodations for individuals with disabilities.

In essence, once a local government has made a determination that an applicant for employment or an existing employee is a qualified individual with a disability; the employer may be obligated, through an interactive process with the employee, to provide the employee with a reasonable accommodation. While there are many rules and nuances to the ADA, some key points to remember are: the employer, not the employee, makes the final decision on what the reasonable accommodation will be; pre-job offer and post-job offer questions and medical examination requirements are dictated by the Act; and if the employee cannot perform the essential duties of the job, even with a reasonable accommodation, the employer need not hire them or may take appropriate steps to separate the employee from service.

Because of the ADA's complexities, it is recommended that local governments confer with knowledgeable counsel, affirmative action officers, and other available sources when confronted with issues arising under the Act.

13.4.2 The Family Medical Leave Act

The Family Medical Leave Act, or FMLA, (29 U.S.C. section 2601 et seq.) became law in 1993. It is intended to balance the demands of the work place with the needs of families. By providing workers faced with family obligations or serious family or personal illness with reasonable amounts of leave, the FMLA encourages stability in the family and productivity in the workplace.

The FMLA gives eligible employees of covered employers the right to take unpaid leave, or paid leave charged to appropriate leave credits under certain circumstances, for a period of up to 12 work weeks in a 12 month period due to: 1) the birth of a child or the placement of a child for adoption or foster care; 2) the employee's need to care for a family member (child, spouse or parent) with a serious health condition; or 3) the employee's own serious health condition which makes the employee unable to do his or her job. Under certain circumstances, FMLA leave may be taken on an intermittent basis. Employees are also entitled to continuation of health and certain other insurances, provided the employee pays his or her share of the premiums during the period of leave.

The employer has a right of 30 days advance notice from the employee, where practicable. In addition, the employer may require the employee to submit certification from a health care provider to substantiate that the leave is due to the serious health condition of the employee or a member of the family. The employer may also require, as a condition of return to work, medical documentation from an employee absent due to personal illness.

13.4.3 The Immigration and Naturalization Act

In 1990, the Immigration and Naturalization Act (Title 8 of the United States Code) provides the foundation for immigration law. It was passed in 1952 and has been amended several times. Section 1324a of Title 8 imposes requirements on employers to attest their examination of certain documents produced by employees that verify employment authorization and identity.

13.5 State Assistance and Training

A number of state agencies and other organizations, offer assistance to local governments in specific areas of staff development or personnel program administration. Training and technical assistance provided by state agencies is intended primarily to improve the capability of local employees whose activities help meet program objectives of those agencies. Summarized below are some of the kinds of training and other assistance available to local governments.

13.5.1 Department of Civil Service

The Department of Civil Service is the primary source of technical assistance to local governments assisting with setting up and operating local personnel programs. Local officials can obtain a variety of specific administrative and operational assistance from the Municipal Services Division of the department. For instance, if a municipality does not have an appropriate eligible list for a position, the department can provide names from appropriate state eligible lists. The list may be limited to residents from the locality or civil division in which the appointments are to be made, and may be used until it runs out or is superseded by a list established by the municipality.

On request, the Department of Civil Service also provides on-site advice and technical assistance concerning the following:

- the State Civil Service Law and municipal rules and regulations;
- job classification systems, job standards and specifications;
- the development of procedural and training manuals;
- the establishment of salary plans and fringe benefits;
- surveys of local civil service or personnel agencies;
- training in municipal personnel practices;
- setting up and conducting examination programs; and
- minority group training and placement.

13.5.2 Other State Agencies

The following list indicates the scope and range of the type of local government training that is offered by other state agencies:

The Education Department provides training for local school superintendents and members of local boards of education.

The Department of Environmental Conservation (DEC) provides in-house training, invests in information management, and partners with universities and other state agencies and professional organizations. These initiatives are designed to help specialized staff, such as wastewater treatment plant operators and air pollution control engineers, meet professional requirements.

The Department of Health provides training to help specialized local government staff, including water treatment plant operators, meet certification requirements.

The Office of Real Property Tax Services provides training to help local assessment officials perform their functions and duties effectively and meet certification requirements.

The Office of the State Comptroller offers training for fiscal officers of local governments.

The Office of Mental Health offers program-related training to staffs of local mental health agencies.

The Office for People with Developmental Disabilities makes its own staff training programs available to appropriate local employees.

The Department of Labor makes available to appropriate local government employees, where possible, its in-service training programs on such matters as placement, supervision and unemployment insurance.

The New York State Office of Children and Family Services (OCFS) makes appropriate training available for local social services program staff and others, including case workers, supervisors, day care workers, parent aides, foster parents and investigators.

The Office of Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services offers training in such topics as counseling, program development and prevention to staffs of local agencies it funds and other appropriate agencies.

The Office of Fire Prevention and Control of the Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Services offers training for local fire fighters about fire services and prevention and hazardous materials.

The State Emergency Management Office (SEMO) of the Division of Military and Naval Affairs provides training for local government emergency management staff on such matters as emergency planning, communication, creative financing, decision making, hazardous materials and legal issues.

13.5.3 Department of State

The Department of State offers certain kinds of technical assistance and training to promote effective local government operations. The department makes available training in enforcement of the Uniform Fire Prevention and Building Code, State Energy Code, land use planning and regulation, management of community action programs, and in specific areas of municipal management. Technical assistance is also provided in the above areas, as well as in municipal law, intergovernmental cooperation, local government organization and operations, sources of financial assistance and local waterfront revitalization.

13.5.4 Other Organizations

Assistance with staff development and training is offered to local governments through a number of non-state organizations. Statewide, these include the municipal associations (NYS Association of Counties, NYS Conference of Mayors and Other Municipal Officials, Association of Towns of the State of New York and the NYS School Boards Association), their affiliate groups, and such specialized organizations as the New York Planning Federation. These organizations often provide training at their annual meetings or through special seminars, and they frequently accommodate training sessions of state agencies and other organizations at their meetings.

13.6 Summary

Effective personnel administration at the local government level requires:

- compliance with New York State Civil Service and Human Rights laws, Federal laws and local civil service rules and regulations;
- formalized personnel policy;
- strong but flexible legal framework;
- organized activities;
- clearly defined goals and objectives;
- concern for human factors as well as for operational results;
- positive personnel activities to stimulate and motivate employees;
- concern for employee development; and
- awareness of the need for, and benefits of, training and education.

Chapter 14

Labor-Management Relations

Collective bargaining became a legal right of public employees at all levels in New York State in 1967. Unionization of public employees spread rapidly the state. A set of procedures developed within the provisions of the Taylor Law, which now regulates labor-management relations in government at the local as well as the state level.

All local governments in the State of New York are public employers. Local Government officials need to be aware of and understand the rules and procedures that apply to relations between the governmental unit and its employees.

14.1 Historical Background

Prior to 1967, public employees in New York State did not have a statutory right to bargain collectively. The only statute regulating conditions of employment for public employees, the Condon-Wadlin Act of 1947, did not give public employees any rights to participate in decisions regarding such conditions. This act, passed following labor disputes among public employees in Rochester, Buffalo and New York City, prohibited strikes by public employees and established severe penalties for violation of its provisions.

The Condon-Wadlin Act failed to make any provision for the amelioration of conditions which led to strikes. The growing realization that the Condon-Wadlin Act did not deter strikes, combined with an increasing demand by public employees for bargaining rights, generated pressure for amendment or replacement of the act. Several bills to do so were introduced in the State Legislature between 1960 and 1963, but none passed. They generally provided for some modification of penalties for striking and for the establishment of various forms of grievance procedures for public employees.

Several events in the 1950's and early 1960's encouraged employees of state and local governments had been to assert their desires for collective negotiations. In 1950, Governor Thomas E. Dewey guaranteed to state employees the right to join employee organizations and created a grievance procedure. In 1954, Mayor Robert Wagner of New York City issued an interim Executive Order that granted limited collective bargaining rights to New York City transit workers. In later years, other employee groups were also granted these rights.

Interest in collective bargaining for public employees was also stirring in the State Legislature. In 1962, a staff report to the Joint Legislative Committee on Industrial and Labor Conditions stressed the need for a "more rational labor relations program for public employees."

The strike penalties of the Condon-Wadlin Act were softened for a period between 1963 and 1965. However, the original act was restored, when two work stoppages occurred in New York City in the following year. When the penalties prescribed by the Condon-Wadlin Act were once again circumvented, Governor Rockefeller responded by appointing a blue ribbon committee on public employee relations. The legislation proposed by this committee, and enacted in 1967, came to be known as the Taylor Law (named for its chairman, George Taylor). The Taylor Law thus became the first comprehensive labor relations law for public employees in New York State and was among the first in the country. The Taylor Law applies to the State of New York, its counties, cities, towns, villages, public authorities, school districts, and certain of its special service districts.

The Taylor Law:

- grants public employees the right to organize and negotiate collectively with their employers;
- gives public employees the right to be represented by employee organizations of their own choice;
- requires public employers to negotiate with their employees and enter into written agreements with public employee organizations representing specific negotiation units of workers;
- establishes impasse procedures for the resolution of deadlocks in negotiations;
- mandates binding arbitration of disputes in police and fire negotiations;
- prohibits as “improper practices” certain acts by employers and employee organizations;
- prohibits strikes by public employees; and
- establishes a neutral agency — the Public Employment Relations Board (PERB) to administer the law and “referee” public sector labor relations.

14.2 The Public Employment Relations Board

The Public Employment Relations Board (PERB) is an integral part of the Taylor Law’s philosophy of labor relations. This board was created to serve as an independent, neutral agency to administer the provisions of the Taylor Law and to promote cooperative relationships between public employers and their employees. To this end, PERB has the following functions and powers:

- administration of the Taylor Law statewide within a framework of policies set by the Legislature;
- adoption of rules and regulations;
- resolution of representation disputes;
- provision of conciliation service to assist contract negotiations;
- adjudication of improper practice charges;
- determination of culpability of employee organizations for striking and order of forfeiture of dues and agency shop fee check-off privileges as a penalty; and
- recommendation of changes in the Taylor Law.

Although the Taylor Law provides local governments with the option of handling their own public employment relations matters, few have chosen to do so. At one time, there were 34 local boards, but only five remain in existence. These local boards exercise most of the responsibilities of the state PERB, but have no jurisdiction over improper practice charges and do not perform research.

In New York City, the Office of Collective Bargaining (OCB) fulfills PERB functions. For several years, authority over improper practice cases in New York City resided with PERB, but in 1979 the Legislature returned this responsibility to OCB.

14.3 Elements in the Bargaining Process

14.3.1 The Negotiating Unit

A negotiating unit is a group of employees who are held by PERB to constitute a body appropriate for bargaining purposes, or who are voluntarily recognized as such by a public employer. All employees of the jurisdiction may be joined into a single unit for purposes of collective bargaining, or they may be divided into several separate units which negotiate independently. The latter is more common.

When the employer "recognizes" the unit, no legal proceedings are necessary to determine the unit's composition. However, when the employer does not recognize the unit, PERB must determine its appropriateness. The Taylor Law specifies that PERB must apply certain standards in determining negotiating units.

PERB also may exclude management/confidential personnel from negotiating units. Management personnel are employees who formulate policy, are directly involved in collective bargaining, or have a major role in administering a collective bargaining agreement or personnel administration. Confidential employees are those who assist or act in a confidential capacity to management personnel who are directly involved with labor relations, contract administration or personnel administration. Both the state and local governments that wish to exclude management/confidential personnel from existing negotiating units may apply to PERB for such exclusions. Negotiating units may also apply to PERB to have management/confidential positions reclassified as negotiating unit positions.

14.3.2 The Bargaining Agent

After the appropriate negotiating unit is defined by employer recognition or by PERB, employees in the unit may exercise the right to be represented by an employee organization of their choice. The chosen organization, once it is recognized or certified, is known as the "bargaining agent" and serves as the exclusive representative of all workers in the negotiating unit, whether or not they are members of the union.

Public employers may voluntarily recognize a particular employee organization as the bargaining agent for a specific negotiating unit. This action is called "recognition." If, however, the employer does not voluntarily recognize the employee organization, the union must petition PERB for certification, which designates the union as the exclusive bargaining agent for all employees in the negotiating unit for a fixed period of time.

PERB may conduct an election among the members of the negotiating unit to determine which bargaining agent should be certified. Employees face different choices in different elections: they may be asked to choose between competing employee organizations or between an organization and no bargaining agent. After an election, PERB certifies the winner as the bargaining agent. In most cases where only one union seeks bargaining agent status, an election is not held. Rather, PERB grants certification upon a showing by the employee organization that the majority of members in the negotiating unit have signed cards — generally dues check-off cards — indicating their support for the organization seeking certification.

Once certified, the union has the right to represent the employees in the bargaining unit without challenge by the employer or another organization until seven months before the expiration of the collective agreement between the union and the employer. One month earlier, a "window period" opens. During this period, petitions may be filed to change the negotiating unit.

Changes in the certification itself may also occur during the window period. For example, a challenging employee organization may launch a petition drive at this time to force an election against the incumbent bargaining agent. If the challenger demonstrates sufficient support (30 percent of the members of the unit), PERB will schedule an election giving employees a choice between the challenger, the incumbent bargaining agent, and no representative.

14.3.3 Contract Bargaining

Once the bargaining agent has been certified, the Taylor Law requires a public employer negotiate with the bargaining agent over the wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment for employees in the negotiating unit. The Taylor Law charges both employers and employee organizations to bargain in good faith. Generally, public employers should be aware that for them good faith means:

- bargaining with employee organizations at reasonable times and places;
- listening to and considering bargaining positions put forth by employee groups with respect to terms and conditions of employment; and
- working positively toward a settlement.

Good-faith bargaining does not require employers to agree to specific union proposals, either in whole or in part, nor does it require employers to make counter proposals to specific union demands. However, good faith does require that both parties negotiate with the intention of concluding an agreement.

14.3.4 Scope of Bargaining

The scope of negotiations — the actual subject matter that management and labor may negotiate at the bargaining table — is broad. As the New York State Court of Appeals noted in its landmark Huntington decision:

> "Under the Taylor Law, the obligation to bargain as to all terms and conditions of employment is a broad and unqualified one, and there is no reason why the mandatory provision of that act should be limited in any way except in cases where some other applicable statutory provision explicitly and definitively prohibits the public employer from making an agreement as to a term or condition of employment." [1]

PERB categorizes subjects of negotiations as mandatory, non-mandatory or prohibited.[2]

The parties must, upon demand, negotiate mandatory subjects of collective negotiations, and the employee bargaining agent and the employer must jointly reach a decision. Examples of mandatory subjects are:

- wages — all compensation paid to public employees;
- fringe benefits — sick and personal leave time, vacation time, and medical insurance;
- hours of work — the amount of time spent on the job;
- seniority — preference accorded employees on the basis of length of service;
- grievance procedure;
- subcontracting — a decision to let out to a private contractor services currently being performed by public employees; and
- impact on unit members of a reduction in work force.

[1] Board of Education of UFSD No. 3, Town of Huntington v. Associated Teachers of Huntington, 30 N.Y. 2d 122, 331 N.Y.S. 2d 17 (1972).

[2] The lists of mandatory, nonmandatory and prohibited subjects in this section are drawn from PERB case law and court decisions. PERB provides full summaries on request.

Non-mandatory — permissive — subjects of negotiation are those issues which are negotiable on a voluntary basis. These issues do not involve working conditions and are management prerogatives. A management prerogative is an act or a decision which relates directly to the authority of a public employer to establish government policy in accordance with its public mission. Examples of non-mandatory subjects of negotiation include:

- overall policies and mission of government;
- residency requirements for future employees;[3]
- employment qualifications; and
- filling of vacancies.

Non-mandatory subjects which have been voluntarily agreed upon and incorporated into a collective bargaining agreement are deemed converted into mandatory subjects of collective negotiations.[4]

Prohibited subjects may not be negotiated under any circumstances. As noted earlier, a public employer's obligation to bargain terms and conditions of employment is broad.

Prohibited subjects of negotiation are few, but include: retirement benefits, except the negotiation of improved retirement benefits among the options offered by the state, and subjects void as against public policy.

Local governments should recognize that they may be bound not only by the terms which are spelled out in their negotiated agreements but also by practices that have developed in the workplace over a period of years. These work conditions are called "past practices," and if they constitute terms and conditions of employment they generally may not be changed without negotiation.

14.3.5 Resolution of Bargaining Deadlocks

Strikes or lockouts are sometimes invoked to break bargaining deadlocks in the private sector. The Taylor Law, which prohibits strikes, prescribes several forms of third-party intervention to resolve bargaining deadlocks. The Taylor Law also allows negotiating parties to develop jointly their own procedures for breaking deadlocks. Either bargaining party, or PERB, may declare an impasse at anytime within 120 days before the date the contract expires. Table 14.1 [157] illustrates the sequence of the three different impasse procedures in the law.

Table 14.1: Steps to Resolve Bargaining Deadlock

Step	Police and Firefighters, New York City Transit and Miscellaneous other Public Safety Personnel	Educational Personnel	All Others
I	Impasse declared by PERB	Impasse declared by PERB	Impasse declared by PERB
II	Mediation	Mediation	Mediation
III	Binding arbitration	Fact finding	Fact finding
IV		Continued negotiations until agreement is reached	Legislative hearing
V			Legislative settlement

[3] Residency requirements for current employees are a mandatory subject of negotiations.
[4] City of Cohoes, 31 PERB 3020 (1998).

14.3.5.1 Mediation

A mediator, appointed by PERB, acts in a confidential capacity to each side. While acting as a buffer between the parties, the mediator attempts to revive the bargaining process. If the mediator effects an agreement, the result is the same as if the bargaining parties had successfully completed negotiations on their own.

14.3.5.2 Fact Finding

PERB may appoint a fact finder who: takes evidence; may hold hearings; receive data, briefs and other supporting information; and then makes public recommendations for a settlement. Only mandatory subjects of negotiations may be taken to fact finding, unless the parties agree mutually to do otherwise. PERB encourages fact finders to mediate after they issue their reports to help reconcile remaining differences.

14.3.5.3 Legislative Hearing and Settlement

One or both parties may reject the fact finder's recommendations. The legislative body may, after a hearing required by the law, "…take such action as it deems to be in the public interest, including the interest of the public employees involved." While the Taylor Law is silent with respect to the length of a legislatively imposed settlement, PERB has determined that one-year terms are appropriate. Legislatively imposed settlements are, in fact, extremely rare since the parties in most cases reach settlement through negotiations. A resolution imposed by the legislative body may not change the terms of an expired collective bargaining agreement without the union's consent. It may, without the union's consent, reimpose the terms of the expired agreement or impose new terms which do not change any of the terms of the expired agreement.

14.3.5.4 Board Meeting

In education disputes the Taylor Law provides that PERB may give the parties a chance to explain their positions on the fact finder's report at a meeting at which the legislative body (i.e., the school board) or its committee is present. However, PERB views the law to mean that there is no final resolution in educational unit disputes except through agreement between the bargaining parties. In cases where the fact finder's report does not result in agreement, PERB will make further mediation efforts at its discretion. This assistance is called "conciliation."

14.3.5.5 Binding Arbitration

In police, fire fighter and other miscellaneous disputes, a three-member tripartite panel chosen by the parties hold hearings and decide each issue by majority vote. Only mandatory subjects may be taken to binding arbitration. Issues may be returned to the parties for further negotiation. A panel's determination is final and binding on the employer and employees, subject to appropriate judicial review.

Strikes

The Taylor Law expressly prohibits "…any strike or other concerted stoppage of work or slowdown by public employees." In the event of a strike:

- PERB may order the suspension of the dues and agency shop fee check-off privileges of the employee organization upon its own finding that a strike has occurred;

- the employer may initiate disciplinary action against individual employees involved in the strike;
- the public employer is required to deduct two days' pay from each striking employee for each day (or part thereof) on strike. Employees must pay income taxes on the full amount of wages lost; and
- the public employer must seek a court injunction against the striking organization.

If an injunction is ignored, the court may impose fines against the organization and jail terms of up to 30 days against union leaders.

14.3.6 The Agreement

The Taylor Law requires that all negotiated contacts be in writing upon demand. When negotiations are concluded, PERB's role is limited to serving as a repository for the final agreement. A 1977 amendment of the Taylor Law excludes PERB from any role involving enforcement of a negotiated agreement. PERB's authority is limited to review of actions which constitute improper employer or employee practices.

14.4 Improper Practices

The orderly conduct of labor-management relations requires that all participants conform to mutually recognized and equitable standards in fulfilling their obligations under the law. As a result, the Taylor Law prohibits certain practices of management and labor, such as interference with the representation rights of employees or the orderly flow of collective negotiations.

14.4.1 Practices Prohibited

Employers:

- interference with, restraint or coercion of public employees in the exercise of their right to form, join or participate in, or to refrain from forming, joining or participating in, any employee organization, for the purpose of depriving the employees of such rights;
- domination of or interference with the formation or administration of any employee organization, for the purpose of depriving the employees of such rights;
- discrimination against any employee for the purpose of encouraging or discouraging membership in, or participation in, the activities of any employee organization;
- refusal to negotiate in good faith;
- refusal to continue any of the terms of an expired collective bargaining agreement until a new agreement is negotiated; and
- using state funds to discourage union organizing.

Activities Prohibited — Employee Organizations:

- interference with, restraint or coercion of public employees in the exercise of their right to form, join or participate in, or to refrain from forming, joining or participating in, any employee organization;

- causing, or attempting to cause, a public employer to interfere with these employee rights;
- refusal to negotiate in good faith; and
- breach of its duty to fairly represent all employees in the negotiating unit.

A party which believes that one of its rights has been violated may file an improper practice charge with PERB.

The Taylor Law gives PERB broad remedial authority in issues regarding a refusal to negotiate in good faith. For example, if PERB were to find that an employer has increased the hours of work without negotiation upon contract expiration, PERB might order restoration of the old work schedule and award compensation to affected employees. On some rare occasions, PERB has found that improper practices by employers were of such magnitude as to constitute a provocation of a subsequent strike. In these cases, PERB limited the length of time the bargaining agent lost its dues and agency shop fee check-off privileges.

The major purpose of the improper practice procedure is to establish and preserve rules of fair play in the conduct of labor-management relations.

14.5 Contract Administration

It has been said that management is no more than halfway through the labor relations job when a signed agreement is achieved. While negotiation is the more visible phase of collective bargaining, the real payoff is in day-to-day working relationships.[5]

The management task is far easier when contract terms are clear and unambiguous, but even then, certain responsibilities commonly arise in all contract situations. Management shares with union officials the duty to explain and interpret new contract provisions. In addition, government officials should always be available to meet with employee representatives to learn about changing employee attitudes and problems.

Since employee organizations are the chosen representatives of the employees, government officials should take care not to bypass union agents or undermine the union's authority.

Government officials should exercise care in the administration of a contract, because failure to do so may result in employee grievances. For this reason, larger jurisdictions often retain an employee relations staff to provide expert advice in contract administration.

14.5.1 Grievance Procedures

Grievance procedures provide a method for settling disputes that arise concerning the meaning or application of an existing collective bargaining agreement.

The United States Department of Labor has summarized the function of a "grievance procedure" as follows

> "The essence of a grievance procedure is to provide a means by which an employee, without jeopardizing his job, can express a complaint about his work or working conditions and obtain a fair hearing through progressively higher levels of management." [6]

[5] Dale Yader, et al., Handbook of Personnel Management and Labor Relations (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc., 1958), p. 431.

[6] Collective Bargaining Agreements: Grievance Procedures (U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics Bulletin No. 142501, Washington, D.C., 1964), p. 1.

The requirement that public employers in New York State establish grievance procedures predates the Taylor Law. As early as 1962, the General Municipal Law required that all public employers with more than 100 employees provide a grievance procedure conforming to specified statutory standards. Under the Taylor Law, public employers must negotiate a grievance procedure with the recognized or certified bargaining agent.

Most grievance procedures culminate in binding arbitration. This type of arbitration is called "rights arbitration," because it involves resolution of a dispute as to an employee's rights under an existing collective bargaining agreement. It should be distinguished from "interest arbitration" for police and firefighters in New York State, which involves resolution of a dispute over the terms of a new collective agreement. Whether or not a grievance procedure culminates in binding arbitration is a subject of negotiation.

14.5.2 Union Security

Union security arrangements are devices to assure the financial support of employee organizations. Union security arrangements available under the Taylor Law are the right of exclusive representation and membership dues deduction. The Taylor Law entitles all recognized or certified bargaining agents to an automatic deduction of union dues from employees' wages once the agent obtains signed authorization cards. This helps an employee organization in two ways. First, it reduces dues collection expenses significantly. Second, it is easier and more likely for the organization to maintain a large membership because the organization does not have to rely on employees for periodic payment of dues. If an employee organization engages in an illegal work stoppage, PERB may withdraw the dues and agency shop fee check-off privilege for a period of time. However, individual employees may with draw their dues or agency shop fee authorization at any time.

The Taylor Law requires an employer to deduct an agency shop fee deduction from the salary or wages of employees in the unit who decide not to become a member of the union. An agency shop fee requires an employee who does not join a union that represents his bargaining unit to pay a service fee substantially equal to the dues of that union. The employee need not join the union. The principal rationale of the agency shop fee is that all employees should share the costs of representation incurred by the bargaining agent.

14.5.3 Retirement Systems

Among the fringe benefits of public employment are retirement benefits. These are long-term liabilities upon the employer, and they are also a major element of employee concern in labor management relations.

The New York State and Local Employees' Retirement System and the New York State and Local Police and Fire Retirement System serve as the administrators of the pension system for virtually all public employees, except teachers, outside of New York City.

Each jurisdiction participating in these systems was previously able to select from a broad spectrum of retirement plans. However, since 1976, members' benefits generally have been determined by the date the employee becomes a member of the retirement system.

The New York State Teachers' Retirement System covers academics in school districts throughout the state. New York City operates five retirement systems for the benefit of City employees.

The cost of a pension system depends on three variables: the number of employees covered by the plan; the salaries paid these employees; and the specific terms or benefits of the pension plan.

An increase in any of these factors has the effect of creating unfunded pension liabilities which must be amortized by an increase in the amount of money contributed to the pension system and/or increased earnings on invested assets.

While the effect of increasing the number of employees is fairly obvious, the latter two variables have a somewhat different effect. For changes in these it is necessary to increase payments to the pension system in order to compensate for past payments based on the lower previous salary rates or benefits, as well as for future payments. Thus, changes in salaries or pension benefits have a retroactive, as well as prospective effect on the costs of a pension system.

14.6 Summary

The practice of labor-management relations has matured since passage of the Taylor Law in 1967. The Taylor Law's primary purpose was to bring order to public sector labor relations under commonly understood rules of behavior. After a period of hesitancy and confusion this goal has, to a large extent, been achieved. New relationships have developed that previously would have been unimaginable. Future changes in labor-management relations are more likely to be incremental than fundamental.

Chapter 15

Public Services

Local governments provide services essential to daily living. Some services fulfill basic human needs for food, shelter and medical care. Others provide an attractive environment and opportunities for recreational and cultural activities. Since many public services are shared responsibilities among units of government, local officials need to understand the organization, structure and interplay of various government units to achieve better delivery of services.

15.1 State Agency Operations

State agencies are the operating arm of state government. By virtue of their many functions and services, state agencies often are in close contact with local governments. State agencies vary widely in terms of purpose, authority and nature of services. Some agencies, such as the Office of the State Comptroller and the Office of Real Property Tax Services, have functions so extensively related to basic local government operations that they are treated in detail elsewhere in this Handbook. Others, like the Health Department, play highly significant roles in determining how local governments provide certain services. Programs of some agencies, such as the departments of Education, Environmental Conservation, Health, and Motor Vehicles, often touch upon citizens as they go about their daily affairs. Services of these agencies involve or affect many individuals, have an enormous fiscal impact and involve the exercise of authority over local governments which deliver these services. Other agencies, such as the Departments of Labor and Transportation, affect the public directly by channeling funds for local, as well as for state or federal purposes.

Many agencies serve the public directly through the exercise of regulatory authority. The Department of Public Service, through the Public Service Commission, regulates utility rates, and has a role which is almost exclusively regulatory. Many agencies provide services directly to the public and to local governments. Under Article 6-B of the Executive Law, the Department of State is authorized to provide assistance to local governments, and much of this assistance is in the areas of coastal management, community development, economic opportunity, intermunicipal cooperation, labor relations, legal assistance, organization and management improvement, and basic planning and zoning training. Other agencies and departments are primarily service-oriented, and neither regulate local activities nor administer major grant programs. Among these are the Office of General Services and the Department of Financial Services. Such agencies provide help to local governments largely in the form of technical assistance, informational materials, training, inspection services and/or legal advice.

15.2 Social Service and Public Health Programs

15.2.1 Children and Family Services

The Office of Children and Family Services (OCFS) integrates services for children, youth and families, and vulnerable adult populations. OCFS promotes the development of its client population and works to protect them from violence, neglect, abuse and abandonment. OCFS regulates and inspects child care providers and administers funds to child care programs. It supervises and regulates protective services for adults; inspects, supervises and monitors foster care agencies; administers the State Adoption Service; and operates the Statewide Central Register of Child Abuse and Maltreatment (SCR).

The New York State Commission for the Blind (NYSCB) within OCFS administers services to legally blind citizens and assists eligible individuals with job training and placement. The agency also operates a residential care system consisting of five limited-secure facilities, four secure centers, two non-secure centers and one reception center. There are also 15 Community Multi-Services Offices (CMSO) statewide that are responsible for services to youth and families from the first day of placement. OCFS works closely with municipalities, local social services districts and county youth bureaus so that adequate youth development services and programs are available. A plan for youth development services is prepared through the county comprehensive planning process. The county departments of social services and New York City's Administration for Children Services (ACS) administer local foster care programs and child welfare services.

15.2.2 Programs for the Aged

The New York State Office for the Aging plans and coordinates programs and services for more than three million New Yorkers aged 60 and over. As a primary advocate for older New Yorkers, the Office is empowered to review and comment on state agencies' program policies and legislative proposals which may have a significant impact on the elderly. The Office identifies issues and concerns through its two advisory committees --- the Governor's Advisory Committee on Aging and the Aging Services Advisory Committee. In addition, the Office conducts public forums throughout the state.

The Office operates a statewide toll-free Senior Citizens Hot Line at 800-342-9871, which is staffed during normal business hours. Hot Line staff provides information, crisis intervention and problem solving assistance, and maintain current county-by-county resource files of services. Further information is made available through the Office's websites, its quarterly newsletter, and television programs which air on cable-access stations across the state.

The Office for the Aging cooperates with and assists local governments in developing and implementing local programs. With the exception of grants-in-aid the Office's programs are administered through the 59 local offices for the aging which serve the citizens of the state. Such programs include: the Community Services for the Elderly Program (CASE), which provides community-based, supportive services to frail, low-income elderly who need assistance to maintain their independence at home; the Expanded In-home Services for the Elderly Program (AESOP), managed by local offices for the aging, which is a uniform, statewide program of case management, non-medical in-home services, respite and ancillary services for the elderly who need long term care but are not eligible for Medicaid; the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), which provides home-delivered meals and other nutritional services to at-risk elderly; the Retired and Senior Volunteer Program (RSVP), which recruits and places older adults and retirees in volunteer positions tailored to their talents, skills and interests; the Foster Grandparent Program, which provides an opportunity for low-income people aged 60 and over to provide companionship and guidance to children with special or exceptional needs; and the grants-in-aid, through which funds are appropriated by the Legislature to the Office for contracts to public and private not-for-profit agencies to provide a range of locally-determined services for older New Yorkers.

The Office for the Aging also administers statewide plans under the federal Older Americans Act, including: Title III-B, which provides for advocacy, planning and coordination of services including transportation, information and referral outreach, in-home and legal services to meet specific needs of the elderly; Title III-C-1, which provides for nutritious meals and other services to the elderly and their spouses of any age, in congregate settings; Title III-C-2, which provides for nutritious meals to the homebound elderly and their spouses of any age; and Title V, which provides for part-time employment, training and placement assistance for low-income individuals aged 55 and over.

15.2.3 Temporary and Disability Assistance

The State Office of Temporary and Disability Assistance (OTDA) promote personal self-sufficiency through the delivery of temporary assistance, disability assistance, and the collection of child support. OTDA is responsible for providing policy, technical and systems support to the state's 58 social services districts. OTDA provides economic assistance to aged and disabled persons who are unable to work and transitional support to public assistance recipients while they are working toward self-sufficiency. The Division for Disability Determinations evaluates the medical eligibility of disability claimants for the federal Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and Social Security Disability Insurance. The ODTA's programs include Family Assistance, Safety Net Assistance, Supplemental Security Income, Food Stamps, Home Energy Assistance (HEAP), Child Support Services, Housing Services, and Refugee and Immigration Services. The State has been divided into 57 county and one city (New York City) social services districts for purposes of providing public assistance and care. A Commissioner heads each of the local social services districts. This official has responsibility for administration of public assistance, medical assistance and social services, and must implement the policies and programs which the OTDA, Department of Health (DOH), OCFS, Department of Labor (DOL) and the federal government formulate. The Commissioner also supervises the expenditure of public funds allocated to his or her district.

15.2.4 Community Services Block Grants

Created in 1981 by the federal Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act, this program was reauthorized by the "Community Opportunities Accountability, and Training and Educational Services Act of 1998" for the purpose of reducing poverty, revitalizing low-income communities, and empowering low income families and individuals in rural and urban areas to become fully self-sufficient. Federal funds are allocated to provide direct services, mobilize resources and organize community activities to assist low-income and poor individuals. Grantees provide comprehensive services to solve problems that block the achievement of self-sufficiency, helping to secure employment, attain an adequate education, maintain a suitable living environment, and meet emergency needs.

Most of the Community Services Block Grant (CSBG) funds allocated to New York are awarded as a statutory allocation to designated eligible entities, which include community action agencies (CAAs) serving every county in the state and organizations serving migrant and seasonal farm workers. Also funded are four Indian tribes and tribal organizations. At the state level, funds are set aside to be used by grantees in the event of a disaster and to provide professional development opportunities to the staff and board members of grantee agencies. Under state and federal law, one-third of the members of CAA boards of directors must be elected local officials. The local government/CAA partnership is strengthened by the direct appropriation of non-federal funds to assist in the delivery of comprehensive human services by CSBG grantees.

15.2.5 Public Health Programs

15.2.5.1 Shared Responsibilities

The State and local governments share responsibility for public health. As of 2007, two cities and 33 counties maintain full-time health agencies. In the absence of a local health department, the district office of the State Department of Health (DOH) provides appropriate services.

15.2.5.2 Regulatory Functions

DOH oversees and regulates all of New York's residential health facilities, adult homes, emergency medical services providers, managed-care organizations, hospitals, diagnostic and treatment centers (clinics), and home-care providers. DOH's Office of Health Systems Management ensures that providers render services in accordance with state and federal standards. The Office also reviews and certifies health-provider applications to construct, renovate, add or delete beds or services, and purchase major new equipment. Other regulatory activities relate to adequate water supply, the avoidance and/or elimination of environmental health problems and the control of sanitation in food establishments.

15.2.5.3 Direct Services

DOH works closely with local health and social services agencies to provide funding and assistance in a variety of direct services to families and individuals. These include communicable disease control, child health, nutrition, dental health and handicapped children's programs.

15.2.6 Mental Hygiene Programs

Scope of Programs: The State's mental hygiene programs are overseen by three autonomous agencies that together constitute the State Department of Mental Hygiene: the Office of Mental Health (OMH), the Office for People With Developmental Disabilities (OPWDD), and the Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services (OASAS). OMH provides special care and treatment to approximately 772,000 individuals per year through the direct provision of services in State-operated programs, and indirectly through the regulation and funding of voluntary-operated community-based services. OMH also performs research through two State-operated research institutes. OPWDD currently provides services to more than 136,000 individuals with intellectual and developmental disabilities. While some services are provided directly by the State, private not-for-profit agencies provide approximately eighty percent of the services for people with developmental disabilities. This service system has evolved from one which was institutionally-based to one which is now community-based with an emphasis on person-centered approaches. OPWDD also performs research through a State-operated research institute. All services are certified and regulated by OPWDD. OASAS oversees one of the largest chemical dependence service systems in the nation, which includes a full array of services to address prevention, treatment, and recovery. OASAS is also responsible for the prevention and treatment of problem gambling. During 2015, the OASAS chemical dependence treatment system served approximately 234,000 individuals through crisis, inpatient, residential, outpatient, and opioid treatment programs. These individuals were served in 12 State-operated programs and over 900 OASAS-certified community-based programs. Approximately 336,000 youth received a direct prevention service during the 2015-16 school year.

15.2.7 The Local Role

The Mental Hygiene Law (Section 41.13) requires local governments - specifically, counties and the City of New York - "to direct and administer the development of a local comprehensive plan for all [mental hygiene] services," which must be submitted to the respective mental hygiene agencies on an annual basis. These local plans consequently inform the respective State mental hygiene agencies' statewide comprehensive plans, pursuant to Section 5.07 of NYS Mental Hygiene Law.

15.2.8 Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Programs

The Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services (OASAS) is responsible for licensing and evaluating service providers, and for advocating and implementing policies and programs for the prevention, early intervention, and treatment of alcoholism and substance abuse. In cooperation with local governments, service providers and communities, OASAS works to ensure that a full range of necessary and cost-effective services are provided for addicted persons and those at risk of addiction.

15.2.8.1 The Federal Role

Federal funding is provided to the State under the Substance Abuse Prevention and Treatment (SAPT) Block Grant. Block grant funds are made available to localities in accordance with OASAS funding policies and procedures.

15.2.9 The State Role

OASAS directly operates 13 Addiction Treatment Centers, which provide inpatient rehabilitation serves to approximately 7,000 patients annually. It also licenses, regulates and funds over 1, 200 private, non-profit, local government and school district prevention and treatment service providers.

15.2.10 The Local Role

Local Governmental Units (LGU) are responsible for assessing local needs and developing necessary resources. Service providers, counties, and the City of New York, develop Local Services Plans, which form the basis for the Office's Comprehensive Five-Year Plan.

15.3 Community Development

15.3.1 Affordable Housing

15.3.1.1 Housing and Community Renewal====

The Division of Housing and Community Renewal's (DHCR) mission is to make New York a better place to live by supporting community efforts to preserve and expand affordable housing, home ownership and economic opportunities, and by providing equal access to safe, decent and affordable housing. The DHCR is responsible for the supervision, maintenance and development of affordable low and moderate-income housing. The Division performs a number of activities in fulfillment of this mission, including: oversight regulation of the state's public and publicly-assisted rental housing; administration of housing development and community preservation programs, including state and federal grants and loans to housing developers to partially finance construction or renovation of affordable housing; and administration of the rent regulation process for more than one million rent-regulated apartments in New York City and in those localities in the counties of Albany, Erie, Nassau, Rockland, Schenectady, Rensselaer and Westchester subject to rent laws.

15.3.1.2 Housing Finance Agency

The New York State Housing Finance Agency (HFA) was created as a public benefit corporation in 1960, under Article III of the Private Housing Finance Law, to finance low-income housing by raising funds through the issuance of municipal securities and the making of mortgage loans to eligible borrowers. In recent years, HFA has also financed federally subsidized low-income housing developments. The Agency's employees are specialists in real estate finance and law, capital market financing, asset management, construction and program development. Together, they encourage and assist in the creation of affordable housing to meet the needs of the state's residents.

Housing Trust Fund Chapter 67 of the Laws of 1985 created the Housing Trust Fund Corporation (HTFC), a public benefit corporation which administers the Low-Income Housing Trust Fund Program (HTF). The Housing Trust Fund Program was established under Article XVIII of the Private Housing Finance Law to help meet the critical need for decent, opportunities for low-income people. HTF provides funding to eligible applicants to construct low-income housing, to rehabilitate vacant or underutilized residential property, or to convert vacant non-residential property to residential use for occupancy by low-income homesteaders, tenants, tenant-cooperators or condominium owners.

15.3.1.3 Affordable Mortgages

The State of New York Mortgage Agency (SONYMA) is a public benefit corporation created by statute in 1970. The purpose of SONYMA is to make mortgages available to low and moderate income first-time buyers and to other qualifying home buyers. Under its various programs, SONYMA purchases new mortgages from participating lenders across the state. Funds for SONYMA's low interest mortgages are derived primarily from the sale of tax-exempt bonds although some funding has come from the sale of taxable bonds. Since its inception through October 31, 1998, SONYMA has issued approximately $9.7 billion in mortgages.

15.3.1.4 Municipal Housing

Through a special act of the State Legislature, any city, village or town may create a housing authority. As of the end of the 1998 session, 186 municipal housing authorities had been created. A municipal housing authority has the power to investigate living conditions in the municipality and determine where unsanitary or substandard housing conditions exist. The authority may construct, improve or repair dwelling units for persons of low income. In addition, an authority can construct and revitalize stores, offices and recreational facilities in a depressed neighborhood. A municipal authority may undertake projects with funds obtained solely from the sale of its bonds to private individuals, firms or corporations, provided that the municipality approves the project. Authorities may also receive assistance from the state and federal government.

15.3.2 Appalachian Regional Development

The Appalachian Regional Development program, administered at the federal level by the Appalachian Regional Commission (ARC) and in New York by the New York State Department of State, is a joint federal/state/local program which seeks to improve the economy and quality of life in a region covering parts of 13 states. In New York, 14 counties are eligible for assistance: Allegany, Broome, Cattaraugus, Chautauqua, Chemung, Chenango, Cortland, Delaware, Otsego, Schoharie, Schuyler, Steuben, Tioga and Tompkins. The Department of State prepares an annual State Strategy Statement which guides the Appalachian Regional Investment package for submission by the Governor to ARC. This package includes local and regional projects in any of the five Strategic Goal areas: (1) skills and knowledge—which includes projects for basic skills, educational excellence, child care programs and telecommunications; (2) physical infrastructure; (3) community capacity—which includes leadership and local assistance demonstration projects; (4) dynamic local economies—which includes business development and assistance projects focusing on local development, and recapitalization of existing regional revolving loan funds; and (5) health care projects—which includes telemedicine and rural health projects.

15.3.3 The Arts

Established in 1960, the New York State Council on the Arts is a funding agency that provides support towards the activities of nonprofit organizations in the state and helps to bring artistic performances and high quality programs to the state's residents. The Council invites nonprofit organizations that meet eligibility requirements to apply for local assistance funds to provide cultural services to the people through Cultural Services contracts. These services cover a broad range of activities. The State and Local Partnership Program (SLP) fosters the growth and development of the arts and culture at the local level. SLP primarily supports multi-arts organizations that are committed to the long-term cultural development of their communities or regions. Financial support is currently available in 16 program areas including architecture, planning and design, arts in education, capital projects, dance electronic media and film, folk arts, literature, museum, music, theater and visual arts, and state and local partnerships.

15.3.4 Business Development

The State Department of Economic Development/ Empire State Development (ESD) Corporation is dedicated to creating jobs and encouraging prosperity by strengthening and supporting businesses in New York. The agency maintains regional and international offices to provide one-stop access to the state's products and services for business. It also provides direct services ranging from financial incentives for joint ventures to technical expertise in site selection and development. The agency works in partnership with local governments and regional organizations which desire to attract business.

ESD assists local governments in establishing industrial development agencies. As the State's primary agency in the development of tourism, ESD works with counties and their designees to administer a tourism matching fund program. State funds appropriated for this program by the Legislature are apportioned to support local and regional tourism advertising according to guidelines set by state law.

State-local efforts to help distressed communities achieve economic growth have been intensified under the New York State Economic Development Zones Act, Chapter 686 of the Laws of 1986. Empire State Development administers this program in cooperation with other agencies and participating counties, cities, towns and villages. Nineteen such zones may be designated over the first three years of the program by the State Zone Designation Board, and provided with special incentives to spur economic growth. The incentives offered include assistance with financing and business permits, as well as various tax and local incentives.

15.3.5 Campus and Institutional Housing

The State Dormitory Authority is a public corporation established in 1944 to finance and construct dormitories for state teachers' colleges. Its functions have since been expanded to include design, financing and construction project management services for a wide range of higher education, healthcare and public-purpose facilities. The authority serves the State University of New York; the City University of New York; independent colleges and universities; community colleges; special education schools; court facilities for cities and counties; facilities for the State Departments of Health and Education and for the Offices of Mental Health, Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities, and Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services; the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation; long-term health care facilities; independent hospitals, primary care facilities, diagnostic and treatment centers, medical research centers; and public-purpose institutions authorized by statute. The Authority is also authorized to provide tax-exempt equipment leasing.

15.3.6 Office of Planning and Development

Administered by the Department of State with federal and state funding, this program guides and coordinates local, state and federal development and preservation decisions for the state's 3,200 miles of coastline. Specific guidance is provided by the program's coastal policies addressing a variety of concerns and issues. Funding through the Environmental Protection Fund and technical assistance are offered to help coastal municipalities prepare and implement Local Waterfront Revitalization Programs (LWRP). Through local programs, municipalities may refine and supplement state coastal policies to reflect local conditions and needs. Chapter 366 of the Laws of 1986 extended the LWRP concept to inland waterways in the state, including the Barge Canal System and major lakes and rivers.

15.3.7 Community Development Block Grants

The Federal Community Development Act of 1974, as amended, established the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) Program. The program provides annual grants on a formula basis to eligible metropolitan cities, towns with populations of at least 50, 000, and urban counties. Program funds may be used for housing activities, economic development, public facilities (such as day care centers or health centers), public improvements (such as street improvements), public services (such as social programs for the elderly, youth or abused persons), and planning and administration. Funds must primarily benefit low and moderate-income persons, although grantees may also fund activities which aid in the prevention or elimination of slums or blight or address an urgent community development need.

The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) also awards annual grants to 48 states and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, which in turn award and administer grants to small cities and counties not covered by the regular CDBG eligibility standards. The Department's Buffalo office awards non-entitlement grants annually to small cities and counties in New York.

15.3.8 Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation

New Yorkers enjoy a rich heritage of parks and historic and cultural resources that contribute to the quality of their communities. Responsibility for developing and carrying through statewide plans for the use of recreational and historical assets rests with the Office of Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation (OPRHP). OPRHP coordinates state and federal aid for parks, recreation and historic preservation programs. It serves as the state's liaison with the federal government for matters relating to preservation provisions of the Federal Tax Reform Act of 1976 and the National Historic Preservation Act. OPRHP administers three major pass programs allowing discounts in the use of state park and recreational facilities. In cooperation with local education systems, OPRHP operates outdoor learning programs at parks in most regions. It also administers state planning efforts for the Urban Cultural Park Program and sponsors various athletic programs including: the Empire State Games, the Games for the Physically Challenged, and the Senior Games. In addition, OPRHP administers the State Navigation Law and conducts the Marine and Recreational Vehicles program. This effort includes the Law Enforcement Subsidy, the Safety and Education programs and the Marine Services Program. These provide local law enforcement agencies with assistance in the education and training of youths regarding boat and snowmobile safety, in public facilities inspection and in the placement of buoys in the state's inland waterways.

Regional park, recreation and historic preservation commissions advise the OPRHP Commissioner on the promulgation of rules and regulations for park regions to ensure they are consistent with state policies and regulations. The State Council of Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation aids the Commissioner by reviewing and making recommendations on policy, budget and state aid plans. The Council serves as the central advisory board on all matters affecting parks, recreation and historic preservation. The State Board of Historic Preservation advises the Commissioner and the Council on policy matters affecting historic preservation and the historic sites system and on priorities among historic preservation opportunities. The Board also reviews and makes recommendations to the Commissioner on the nomination of properties to the National or State Registers. At the local level counties, cities, towns and villages have concurrent powers to establish and maintain parks. They may acquire and dedicate land for park and recreational purposes and can utilize zoning powers to plan and set aside land for park purposes to meet the needs of local residents.

15.3.9 Weatherization Assistance

This federally-funded program, administered in New York by DHCR, funds the installation of energy conservation measures to reduce the energy costs of low-income families and individuals. It has been credited with significantly reducing energy costs and increasing the health and comfort of low-income participants. Funding is provided by the U.S. Department of Energy and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Under the Program, DHCR funds local sub-grantees under contract to perform the work. These local sub-grantees, which deliver services on a statewide basis, include community action agencies, community-based organizations, counties, and Indian tribal organizations. Since the program commenced in 1977, over 385,000 dwelling units in the state have been weatherized.

15.4 Public Safety

Protection of life and property is one of the oldest functions of local government. In New York State most of the early municipal incorporations were little more than efforts to provide fire and/or police services to built-up areas. Today, public safety represents the third largest expense of local government. Only education and social services command a larger share of the local dollar.

15.4.1 Correctional Programs

Four state entities share with local governments certain responsibilities for caring for offenders and restoring them to society.

The Department of Correctional Services (DOC) is primarily responsible for the institutional care and confinement of 72, 000 felons housed in 69 correctional facilities across New York State. Its 32, 500 employees provide for the safety and security of the system. DOC's also interacts with communities, sending supervised work crews out into the community for nearly two million hours each to perform public service projects for governments and not-for-profit organizations. Staff is responsible for the operation of an array of academic, vocational, drug treatment and work programs designed to provide all offenders with the basic skills they will need to function as responsible and law-abiding citizens upon their release from custody. The Department also operates a 900-bed drug treatment campus that serves parole violators as well as felons newly-sentenced by the courts to a drug treatment program.

The State Commission of Correction is charged with general oversight responsibility for all prisons, jails and lock-ups throughout the state. This mandate is aimed at improving the administration of correctional facilities, and the conditions which affect the lives and safety of inmates and staff. The Commission consists of three members appointed by the Governor. One member serves as Chairperson, while each of the others serves, respectively, as Chairperson of the Medical Review Board and Chairperson of the Citizens' Policy and Complaint Review Council. The Commission establishes minimum standards for care, custody, treatment, and supervision of all persons confined in State and local correctional facilities. It inspects facilities to ensure adherence to these standards and handles grievances filed with respect to those standards. The Commission's Medical Review Board investigates and issues a report on all in-custody deaths.

The Division of Probation and Correctional Alternatives (DPCA) exercises general supervision over the administration of local probation agencies and in the use of correctional alternative programs. The DPCA promotes and facilitates probation and other community corrections programs through funding and oversight. It administers a program of state aid funding for approved local probation services and for municipalities and private non-profit agencies which have approved alternative-to incarceration service plans that enable localities to maintain inmates in local correctional facilities more efficiently. It also funds designated demonstration and other specialized programs.

The State Director of Probation also adopts rules concerning methods and procedure used in the administration of local probation services, and develops standards for the operation of alternative-to incarceration programs. The State Director also serves as the Chair of the State Probation Commission. The Commission members, appointed by the Governor, provide advice and consultation to the State Director on all matters relating to probation. The State Board of Parole, an administrative body within the Division of Parole, is responsible for the release of certain prisoners in State correctional institutions. The Division is responsible for community protection and offender risk control through the administration of parole services.

15.4.2 Criminal Justice

The Division of Criminal Justice Services (DCJS) seeks to increase the effectiveness and vitality of the criminal justice system in New York State. It's Identification and Criminal History Operation, a data bank of criminal records, gives even the smallest department's access to a massive record system. Through DCJS, local police may also obtain criminal information from the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Division's Bureau for Municipal Police advises all municipal police agencies in the state.

15.4.3 Emergency Medical Services

Both the public and private sectors provide pre-hospital emergency medical services. In some cities, a single commercial ambulance service provides paramedic-level services. In other cities, the fire department provides paramedic services while commercial ambulance service provides basic life support and transportation services. In small communities and suburban and rural areas, voluntary ambulance services predominate. These voluntary services are under the auspices of fire departments or districts, independent squads or (in a few cases) hospitals. Voluntary services are sometimes supported by fire or special improvement district taxes, but more often rely upon donations from the public and/or fees under contract from local governments. All commercial as well as volunteer ambulance services must now be certified by the State Health Department. To receive certification, ambulance services must meet specific training and equipment requirements and quality assurance mandates.

15.4.4 Fire Protection

Firefighting service in New York State is provided through a variety of municipal and intermunicipal arrangements. About 19,000 full-time career firefighters and over 110,000 volunteer firefighters work in more than 1,800 fire protection/prevention organizations (federal, state, and local) across the state.

In cities and villages, firefighting is commonly provided by a municipal fire department, composed either of career or volunteer firefighters or a combination of the two. In larger communities that utilize volunteers, the local department generally contains several independent fire companies. Each has its own officers, buildings and apparatus. The fire chief is usually appointed by the local chief executive upon nomination by members of the fire company. In instances where a village maintains no fire department, it contracts with a neighboring community or fire district for fire protection services.

Unlike villages and cities, towns are not legally empowered to provide direct firefighting services. Generally, town boards create one or more fire districts or fire protection districts to cover all or part of a town. A few areas have no fire service protection. These arrangements are more fully described in Chapter 7 [69] and Chapter 9 [91]. Although towns do not directly provide firefighting services, they do provide valuable fire protection services. Many larger towns have a fire prevention and inspection staff. Others, particularly those with a large number of fire districts or fire protection districts, provide central dispatching and training facilities.

15.4.4.1 County Role

Counties, guided by their Fire Advisory Boards, provide valuable services for fire protection, including the maintenance of specialized firefighting equipment for departments within their jurisdiction. Most counties have a fire coordinator, who is a key link between state and local activities. Appointed by the county's legislative body under section 225-a, of the County Law, the coordinator has the responsibility of coordinating mutual aid responses by fire departments within the county and of administering education and training programs. To improve fire department response efficiency, many coordinators have developed countywide radio communication systems.

15.4.4.2 State Role

The State does not generally provide fire services directly to the public except at certain State-owned institutions and, in the case of forest fires, where the Division of Forest Protection and Fire Management in the Department of Environmental Conservation coordinates responsibility for fire protection. The State does, however, provide technical assistance to municipalities in arson investigation and hazardous materials control. Otherwise, the State provides direct support to local fire service units through its command function in activating the State Fire Mobilization and Mutual Aid Plan to cope with major disasters. The plan is administered through the Office of Fire Prevention and Control (OFPC) in the Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Services.

Through OFPC, headed by the State Fire Administrator, the State provides training and specialized services to deal with arson and other fire protection issues at all levels of state and local government. The Office makes training available top aid and volunteer firefighters, other government officials, and emergency response personnel, on an in-residence basis at its State Academy of Fire Science in Montour Falls and at the Academy's Camp Smith Annex in Peekskill, as well as on a commuter basis at remote locations across the state.

15.4.4.3 Fire Boards and Commissions

The Fire Safety Advisory Board, a 12-member unpaid body appointed by the Governor, assists the Secretary of State and State Fire Administrator in all aspects of fire protection and legislation. A 15-member Arson Board has been established to advise and assist the Secretary of State and State Fire Administrator on arson problems. The New York State Emergency Services Revolving Loan Board reviews and makes recommendations to the Secretary of State for low-interest loans to municipalities and fire districts that meet specific criteria.

The Fire Fighting and Code Enforcement Personnel Standards and Education Commission recommend training standards to the Governor which establishes minimum qualifications for firefighters and code enforcement personnel. The Commission consists of the Secretary of State, State Fire Administrator, and five members appointed by the Governor with the consent of the Senate.

15.4.4.4 Building Code Administration and Enforcement

The New York State Uniform Fire Prevention and Building Code (Uniform Code), which became effective January 1, 1984, superseded all existing local fire and building codes except in New York City, which has its own code in effect. Municipalities may, however, adopt and enforce more stringent local provisions with State approval.

Except in a minority of localities, administration and enforcement of the Uniform Code are carried out directly by local governments through local laws, and in accordance with minimum standards promulgated by the Secretary of State. Those municipalities must enforce the Code through locally-appointed officers, although support services may be (and often are) contracted out to private organizations. Some municipalities have entered into cooperative agreements under Article 5-G of the General Municipal Law. Such a pooling of resources has been attractive in rural areas. A municipality or a county may choose not to enforce the Uniform Code by enacting a local law providing that it will “opt out” of enforcement. Responsibility for enforcement is then automatically transferred to the county, or, where the county has “opted out”, to the State.

The Department of State’s Division of Code Enforcement and Administration is charged with administration of the Uniform Code to local governments, state agencies, and the public. Effective July 13, 1996, additional responsibilities were transferred to the Department of State from the Division of Housing and Community Renewal, including interpretation of the Uniform Code, providing staff to the Code Council, a HUD sponsored mobile home oversight and complaint program, approval of modular home construction plans and a third party plant inspection program, issuance of Certificates of Acceptability for construction materials, methods and devices, and other associated functions. Effective January 1, 1999, the Department assumed responsibility for the State Energy Conservation Construction Code.

The Department has eleven regional field service offices providing technical assistance and coordinating variance requests with local government officials. Through its regional field service offices, the Department of State conducts reviews of local code enforcement programs and administers a complaint resolution program. The regional field service offices employ State code enforcement officers in municipalities or counties where the State has code enforcement responsibility. Municipalities and counties may regain their local enforcement authority by repealing their opt-out enactment. The Secretary of State is also empowered to investigate local administration and enforcement of the code and take remedial actions as warranted.

Responsibility for formulating and amending the Uniform Code rests with the State Fire Prevention and Building Code Council, a 17-member body chaired by the Secretary of State, and composed of the State Fire Administrator, Commissioner of Health, Commissioner of Labor and 13 members appointed by the Governor (seven with the consent of the Senate).

The Department of State’s Educational Services Unit provides a statewide code enforcement training program, having as its priority the basic training and continuing education of code enforcement officers. The Department’s services are available to elected and appointed officials, the general public, contractors, architects, engineers, and manufacturers.

15.4.5 Emergency Management

An integrated emergency management system is the legal responsibility of the State and local governments, pursuant to Article 2-B of the Executive law and the New York State Defense Emergency Act.

The State Role The State Disaster Preparedness Commission, through the New York State Emergency Management Office (SEMO), is responsible for coordinating and implementing emergency management programs, financial assistance and work plans at the state and local levels of government. This includes provision for hazard identification and analysis, coordination and conduct of emergency and disaster management training programs, comprehensive emergency management planning, and statewide communications and warning systems.

The Local Role The responsibility for disaster preparedness rests with the chief executive of each county, city, town and village. Every county and city should develop comprehensive emergency management plans. In the event of a disaster or emergency, the local chief executive may declare a local state of emergency, which permits the use of wide-ranging emergency powers as long as the procedures governing their declaration are followed. A local chief executive may also request that the Governor declare a state disaster emergency, which would result in implementation of the State Comprehensive Emergency Management Plan to support county response and recovery operations. Before such a request is made, all county resources must be fully involved with the disaster and considered insufficient to cope with it. Cities, towns and villages should first request aid from their counties before approaching the State.

15.4.6 Police Services

Over 400 separate county, city, town and village police agencies share responsibility for the enforcement of state and local laws in New York. These range in size from New York City's Department, with over 37,000 sworn officers, to 11 agencies with only one or two part-time police officers. Communities in New York State employ over 55,000 full-time and over 1,800 part-time municipal police personnel at a cost of almost five billion dollars annually.

State Police The New York State Police was established by Executive Law on April 11, 1917. Its goal at that time was, and continues to be, to provide effective, cost-efficient police service to the people of New York State. Its members strive to preserve peace, enforce laws, protect life and property, detect and protect against crime and arrest violators.

For the purpose of administration, the state is divided into eleven geographical areas (Troops), each of which is further divided into zones, stations and satellite offices. Special detail offices are located in many cities. The Uniform Trooper is the field officer who most frequently comes into direct contact with the citizens. State Troopers work closely with the Division's Bureau of Criminal Investigation (BCI) as well as other state, county, local and federal law enforcement agencies. A number of specialized support groups also operate within the State Police. In many areas, State Police have the primary responsibility for law enforcement, as many municipalities have only small or no police forces. Even communities with a full-time police agency must frequently call upon the BCI to provide investigative and technical expertise which is lacking in many small departments. The State Police Laboratory often provides its services to larger departments.

15.5 Environmental Protection

15.5.1 Conservation Councils,Commissions and Boards

Volunteer environmental management councils (EMCs) support county governments through environmental analysis at the state level. Volunteer citizen advisory commissions (CACs) perform a similar function at the town, village and municipal level. The New York State Conservation Fund Advisory Board (CFAB), makes recommendations to state agencies on state government plans, policies, and programs that specifically affect fish and wildlife.

15.5.2 Flood Control, Water Resources and Wastewater Programs

DEC assists localities with their efforts to mitigate flooding, helps obtain funds for flood-control measures, coordinates the National Flood Insurance Program, and works with SEMO to assist communities in preparing for flood emergencies. DEC also helps local governments develop small projects for watershed protection, and assists them in planning and implementing strategies for protecting, developing and using local water. DEC issues general wastewater and storm water permits and, with partners, identifies funding sources for sustainable wastewater infrastructure programs. DEC also enforces standards for sewage treatment, and tests and certifies operators for municipal wastewater treatment plants.

15.5.3 Environmental Facilities

The Environmental Facilities Corporation (EFC) is a public benefit corporation that promotes environmental quality by providing low-cost capital and expert technical assistance to municipalities, businesses and state agencies for environmental projects throughout New York State. Its purpose is to help public and private entities comply with federal and state environmental requirements.

EFC oversees several major programs designed to promote environmental quality at an affordable cost. The EFC currently has two Revolving Loan Funds. The Clean Water State Revolving Loan Fund is used to make low-interest loans to municipalities to help pay for water pollution control facilities, such as wastewater treatment plants, and for water quality remediation measures associated with landfill closures. The Drinking Water State Revolving Loan Fund is operated jointly by the EFC and the Department of Health to provide low-interest loans to public and private water systems to undertake needed drinking water infrastructure improvements. Grants are available for drinking water projects in communities facing financial hardship.

The Technical Advisory Services program helps business and government understand and comply with state environmental requirements, and provides services for protecting the New York City Watershed and helping small businesses comply with air pollution standards. The Industrial Finance Program provides low-cost loans to private entities seeking to borrow for capital facilities that deal with solid waste, sewage treatment, drinking water, limited hazardous waste disposal and site remediation. The Financial Assistance to Business program helps businesses comply with air and water quality environmental regulations and provides grants to small businesses for specific pollution control or prevention projects.

15.5.4 Forest Resources

15.5.5 Programs

DEC gathers, analyzes and reports on tree pest and disease information for private and public forest landowners and managers. It places the highest priority on early detection and rapid response to high-impact invasive species that threaten forests. For private forest management, DEC foresters provide expert advice and technical assistance on managing timber products, improving wildlife habitat, controlling erosion, planting trees, enhancing recreation and managing sugar bushes.

15.5.6 Air Resources Programs

DEC's Division of Air Resources (DAR) works to improve and maintain air quality throughout New York. It collaborates with academic institutions on various air pollution research projects, and is actively involved with national and regional air pollution/air quality management associations.

15.5.7 Marine Resources Programs

Both salt and freshwater estuaries and ocean coastal waters, where marine species live, feed and reproduce, are managed by DEC's Division of Marine Resources (DMR) and Hudson River Estuary Program (HREP). Other state, local and federal agencies, the scientific community, and private citizens work cooperatively with DEC in managing New York's Marine District.

15.5.8 Plant and Animal Protection

Among DEC's main responsibilities is to manage and protect New York State's wild animal and plant populations. To do this, DEC conserves crucial habitats and establishes and enforces regulations and policies to support plants and animals.

15.5.9 Climate Smart Communities Program

DEC's Office of Climate Change (OCC) was created to build a climate resilient future for the state by working to reduce atmospheric greenhouse gases (GHGs) and developing market-based solutions to climate-change. OCC works with local governments through its Climate Smart Communities Program, a network of New York State communities engaged in reducing GHG emissions, improving climate resilience, and adapting to changing climate.

15.5.10 Oil and Chemical Spill Response Program

About 16,000 oil and chemical spills are reported to DEC annually and about 90 percent involve petroleum products. Before staff from DEC's Spill Response Program take action, they assess spill content, potential environmental damage, and any threats to public safety.

15.5.11 SEQRA Assistance Services

New York's Environmental Quality Review Act (SEQRA) requires all state and local government agencies to assess environmental impacts equally with social and economic factors during discretionary decision-making on proposed activities and projects. DEC is charged with issuing regulations regarding the SEQR process, and may provide technical assistance when needed.

15.5.12 Waste Management and Recycling Program

DEC provides technical and regulatory assistance to communities regarding waste management. In addition, the agency uses inspections to assess the operational compliance of solid waste management facilities (SWMF). DEC's Hazardous Waste Management Program helps prevent and manage the generation of industrial hazardous wastes. DEC issues permits, conducts inspections, signs consent orders, and gathers and processes data. DEC administers state assistance grants for waste reduction, recycling and household hazardous waste (HHW) programs. Funding is provided on a 50% reimbursement rate for eligible costs.

15.5.13 Water and Wastewater Services

Water and sewerage services have long been available in urbanized areas and are also available in many suburban areas. The extension of these facilities has a major impact on the extent direction of development.

Localities utilize several kinds of organizational mechanisms to provide sewage and water services. The most prevalent are the municipal water or sewer departments in cities and villages and the water or sewer districts in towns. Most cities and many villages have developed their own sources of water supply and have constructed sewage treatment plants. While some town districts have developed these capital facilities, many purchase the services from adjoining localities. Town districts frequently purchase water or sewage treatment services as a part of a growing regionalization of water and sewage services. In the sewage area, state and federal grant requirements often dictate intermunicipal action. County sewer districts frequently provide major capital facilities for a multi-municipal sewage treatment project. These county districts and other intermunicipal arrangements allow the use of sophisticated techniques, often at considerably lower unit costs than a number of smaller, independent facilities could obtain.

In addition to county districts, local governments have occasionally established authorities to provide water or sewage service over a wide area. An example is the Monroe County Water Authority, which serves a large area around the city of Rochester.

In some areas the private sector plays a large role in the delivery of water and sewage service. Even in an urban area such as New York City, the Borough of Queens is served by a private water company. In a number of suburban developments, the developer often creates small water or sewage companies. Towns or villages control the rates private companies charge for sewage service. The State Public Service Commission regulates the price private water firms charge for their services.

The State plays a role in the regulation of municipal water and sewer agencies. The Department of Health enforces water supply standards and the Department of Environmental Conservation enforces sewage treatment standards. Both departments, through their use of aid programs, strongly encourage an intermunicipal approach to water and sewage services.

15.6 Transportation

15.6.1 Aviation

Many counties, cities, towns and villages in New York State own and operate airports that provide a variety of air services to their communities. The Department of Transportation (DOT) coordinates the state's overall aviation improvement program with local communities. In addition to providing state funds for capital improvements for local airports and aviation facilities, DOT provides guidance and assistance to local communities in obtaining federal aid for airport improvements.

15.6.2 Mass Transit

DOT is concerned with the provision of local, regional and intercity public transportation at reasonable cost, while conserving energy and attending to the needs of such groups as commuters, the elderly, young people, the needy and the disabled. DOT's role in local public mass transit activities encompasses short-range mass transit planning, as well as the provision of state aid for capital and operating costs to local governments and other entities operating local transit service.

15.6.3 Railroads

DOT has general statutory authority over all railroads, except the Metropolitan Transportation Authority. The DOT Commissioner is empowered to examine railroad facilities and operations and to order compliance with the Railroad Law. The Railroad Law allows municipalities which have jurisdiction over a highway to petition the DOT Commissioner for the replacement or reconstruction of an existing bridge that separates a non-state public highway and a railroad. If DOT determines that the bridge should be replaced or reconstructed, plans are developed and a contract prepared, with costs shared on a percentage basis. The Transportation Law permits the governing body of any municipality in which a highway-railroad at-grade crossing is located to petition the DOT Commissioner to institute procedures for the elimination of the crossing at grade. If DOT determines that the crossing should be eliminated, plans are prepared and a contract is let, with the State bearing all costs. Localities may apply to DOT for funding from the federal Active Grade Crossing Improvement Program. This program identifies projects for grade-crossing safety improvements, including the installation of flashing lights, protective gates and smoother, more reliable crossing surfaces. Since 1974 over 500 grade-crossing sites in need of improvement have been identified, and approximately half have been improved. DOT administers capital programs for rail improvements and oversees intercity passenger service provided by Amtrak.

15.6.4 State Programs

As of the printing of this publication, the state transportation network includes: a state and local highway system which annually handles over 100 billion vehicle miles, encompassing over 110,000 miles and 17,000 bridges; a 5,000-mile rail network over which 42 million tons of equipment, raw materials, manufactured goods and produce are shipped each year; a 524-mile canal system; 484 public and private aviation facilities through which more than 31 million people travel each year; five major ports, which annually handle 50 million tons of freight; and over 130 public transit operators, serving over 5.2 million passengers each day.

DOT focuses on the state's growing transportation needs and is responsible for developing and coordinating statewide transportation policy. To carry out that responsibility, DOT develops strategic transportation plans to enhance the state's economy, preserve the transportation infrastructure and ensure basic personal mobility for New Yorkers. It coordinates this planning activity with those of federal, state and local entities and other organizations.

DOT coordinates and helps develop and operate transportation facilities and services, and plans for the development of commuter and general transportation facilities. It also administers public safety and regulatory programs for rail and motor carriers in intrastate commerce, and oversees the safe operation of bus lines and commuter rail and subway systems which are subsidized with state funds.

DOT certifies municipal applications for the State funding of local highway improvements under the Consolidated Local Street and Highway Improvement Program (CHIPS), and coordinates with Metropolitan Planning Organizations (MPOs) to administer the Federally-funded Safe, Accountable, Flexible, Efficient, Transportation Equity Act: A Legacy for Users (SAFETEA-LU). There are currently 13 MPOs across the state. Each is responsible for developing, in cooperation with the State and affected transit operators, a long-range transportation plan and a Transportation Improvement Program (TIP) for its area.

15.6.5 Streets and Highways

The State has responsibility for the state and interstate highway systems. It does not, however, maintain those portions of state highways within cities. Within towns, state highways are a State responsibility, although counties and towns may provide snow and ice control under contract.

County governments maintain a county road system that is designated by the county's legislative body. Like the State, counties do not maintain roadways within cities. The degree to which counties actually perform maintenance on the county road system varies. Some counties maintain large and well-equipped maintenance organizations and perform most of the needed work. Others maintain only a small work force and contract with towns for much of the maintenance.

15.6.6 State Canals

The New York State Canal System serves the people of the state in many ways: as a means for transportation, a water source for industry and agriculture, a source of hydroelectric power, an outdoor recreation resource and as a water control mechanism for much of New York. The New York State Canal Corporation within the State Thruway Authority operates and maintains the 524-mile system, which consists of the Champlain, Erie, Oswego and Cayuga/Seneca Canals. The Corporation is implementing a $32.3 million, five-year Canal Revitalization Program to help develop the recreational potential of the System. The Department of Transportation assists public ports, and works with the Council of Upstate Ports of New York to ensure adequate port facilities for shippers and consignees.

15.7 Consumer Protection Services

New York State and its local governments work together to protect consumers from questionable or illegal practices in certain business and occupations. Many state agencies which have regulatory responsibilities operate consumer protection programs to assist citizens and local officials. Coordination for consumer protection at the state level is provided by the Division of Consumer Protection. At the local level, many counties and some cities, towns and villages have established agencies for consumer protection. These local agencies look to the Division of Consumer Protection for support. The Division is empowered to conduct investigations, receive and refer consumer complaints, intervene in proceedings before the Public Service Commission and other agencies, and coordinate the consumer protection activities of state agencies. In addition, the Division recommends new legislation for consumer protection, initiates and encourages consumer protection programs, conducts outreach activities, surveys significant consumer issues and distributes publications on consumer matters including the New York State Consumer Law Help Manual.

Among state agencies' consumer protection programs are the following: The Department of Agriculture and Markets, in cooperation with county and city officials, enforces the law relating to weights and measures. In 1995 the Public Service Commission (PSC) took over regulatory authority of cable television from the former Cable TV Commission. The PSC responds to complaints by cable television consumers, and provides information and technical assistance to local officials concerning cable television franchise questions. Cities, towns and villages have the responsibility of granting franchises to cable television companies and monitoring their operations, but PSC sets standards and provides assistance to local franchising authorities. PSC also regulates other modes of communications as well as electric, gas and water utilities. It operates a consumer outreach and education program, and responds to consumer complaints concerning the regulated entities.

The State Board of Regents and State Education Department license and/or regulate practitioners in a number of professions, including architecture, dentistry, engineering, land surveying, medicine, nursing, occupational therapy, optometry, pharmacy, physical therapy, psychology, public accountancy, social work, speech pathology and veterinary medicine. Regulation is carried out through the Office of Professional Discipline and the respective licensing boards. Regulation of physicians and their assistants is carried out jointly with the State Health Department.

The Department of Health regulates the delivery of health care by institutions and individual providers, and responds to consumer complaints. Its Professional Medical Conduct Unit investigates complaints about physicians and their assistants. The Department of Financial Services licenses and regulates insurers, agents, brokers, bail bondsmen, adjusters and others. Its Consumer Services Bureau responds to consumer questions and complaints. The Office of the Attorney General offers, through its Consumer Frauds and Protection Bureau, help for consumers in the form of public education and mediation, as well as legal action in cases of repeated fraud. The Attorney General prosecutes criminal violations by licensed or registered professionals, fraudulent sales of stocks and securities, frauds against consumers, and monopolies in restraint of trade. Major charities which solicit in the state are registered by the Attorney General's Charities Bureau.

The Department of State licenses and/or regulates certain nonprofessional businesses and occupations. Its Division of Licensing Services regulates armored car carriers and guards, barbers, estheticians, natural hair stylists, cosmetologists, waxing practitioners, nail specialists, bedding manufacturers, coin processors, hearing aid dispensers and dealers, notaries public, private investigators, watch, guard and patrol agencies, real estate brokers and salespersons, and apartment information vendors. Nonsectarian cemeteries as well as pet cemeteries are regulated by its Division of Cemeteries.

15.8 Labor and Working Conditions

The Department of Labor ensures the safety and health of all public and many private employees in the workplace, and administers unemployment assistance. The Department also serves as the principal source of labor market information in the state, including current and predicted economic trends affecting the state's economy. The Department also enforces state labor laws and federal laws relating to working conditions and compensation.

The Division of Employment Services administers job placement assistance, skill assessment and career counseling services. Local and state agencies and not-for-profit organizations are encouraged by the Division to co-locate and coordinate services provided by on-site staff assistance to customers. The Unemployment Insurance Division provides unemployment insurance benefits funded by a tax paid by employers.

The Department administers the worker-protection provisions of the State Labor Law. The Labor Standards Division administers the provisions of the Labor Law concerning minimum wage, hours of work, child labor, payment of wages and wage supplements, industrial homework, farm labor and the apparel industry. The Division of Safety and Health enforces occupational safety and health standards for employees of the state and local governments. The Bureau of Public Work enforces the payment of prevailing wages and supplements on public construction projects and building service contracts. The Welfare-to-Work Division oversees state and local programs under the Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program (TANF), the Food Stamp Employment and Training Program (FEST), the Welfare-to-Work Block Grant program and the Safety Net program. Oversight includes policy development, technical assistance to local social services districts and provider agencies, contract reporting and monitoring, program oversight of state level programs and supervision of local social services districts. The Workforce Development and Training Division administer federal and state funds for programs that offer employment and training services to youth and adults.

15.9 Other Services

State-local partnerships are also involved in the following services and programs areas:

The Office of Advocate for the Disabled works with local governments to ensure that the state's estimated 2.5 million disabled citizens have access to public services and equal opportunity. The Office, established by Executive Order and given a legislative base by Chapter 718 of the Laws of 1982, provides technical assistance and information to help local governments, service providers and others integrate disabled residents into all facets of community life. The Office also keeps the Governor, Legislature and agencies informed about the needs of the disabled; promotes cooperative efforts to develop employment opportunities; helps develop innovative strategies to meet special needs; and operates an information and referral service.

Local governments control dogs pursuant to a combination of state and local laws and in accordance with regulations of the Department of Agriculture and Markets, which maintains a master list of licensed dogs. The Department also promulgates and maintains a uniform code of weights and measures for use in commerce throughout the state. Counties, cities, towns and villages are authorized to establish commissions on human rights, and many have done so. They work closely with the State Division of Human Rights in eliminating and preventing discrimination based on race, creed, color, national origin, sex, age, disability, marital status, or arrest and/or conviction record; in credit transactions, employment, housing and public accommodations.

The New York State Energy Research and Development Authority (NYSERDA) develops innovative energy-efficient technologies to help enhance environmental quality. The Authority assists businesses, residents, municipalities and institutions to be more energy-efficient by investing funds into cost effective energy efficiency deployment strategies, renewable energy sources and clean-fuel technologies.

The State Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) shares responsibility with county clerks for the issuance of drivers' licenses and registration of motor vehicles. Under the Vehicle and Traffic Law, cities, towns and villages are required to issue handicapped parking permits to eligible individuals. The DMV also registers and regulates motor vehicle repair shops. Its Division of Vehicle Safety Services responds to consumer complaints.

Chapter 16

Land Use Planning and Regulation

One of the most powerful tools in the local government arsenal is the power to regulate the physical development of the municipality. This power is exercised through a variety of available authorizations and regulatory mechanisms. Through control of land use and development, each municipality is able to develop and display the most desirable physical features of the community.

16.1 The Police Power

Police power is the power government has to provide for public order, peace, health, safety, morals and general welfare. It resides in the sovereign state, but may be delegated by the State to its municipalities. Land use controls are an exercise of the police power long recognized by the United States Supreme Court. In New York, the power to control land use is granted to each municipal government by reference in Article IX, section 2, of the State Constitution and by the various state enabling statutes.

With few exceptions, the exercise of the police power to control land use is a city, town or village function in New York State. This includes the decision whether to control land use, and, if so, to determine the nature of the controls. When exercised, the power to control land use is governed by the state enabling statutes which have granted the power to local governments:..the General City Law, the Town Law, the Village Law, the General Municipal Law, the Municipal Home Rule Law and its companion Statute of Local Governments.

16.2 The Planning Board

The local legislative bodies of cities, towns and villages may create planning boards in a manner provided for by state statute or municipal charter, and may grant various powers to the planning board (General City Law section 27; Town Law section 271; Village Law section 7-718). The statutes authorize municipal legislative bodies to provide for the referral of any municipal matter to the planning board for its review and report prior to final action. While the functions of a planning board may extend beyond land use, in most municipalities the planning board performs primarily a land use control function. Many local zoning laws or ordinances establish a procedure for referral to the local planning board of all applications for rezoning, variances and special use permits. Such planning board reports and recommendations are often of vital importance in deciding these matters. In addition, the local planning board can have an advisory role in preparing and amending comprehensive plans, zoning regulations, official maps, long-range capital programs, special purpose controls and compliance with the State Environmental Quality Review Act (SEQRA). Further, the local legislative body may grant the planning board such regulatory functions as control of land subdivision, site plan review and issuance of special use permits. Where these and related functions are effectively administered, the local planning board can do much to advance the land use and development policies of the local legislative body.

16.3 Comprehensive Planning

Comprehensive planning may be performed by all municipalities, whether or not it results in a set of land use controls. Comprehensive planning logically forms the basis of all efforts by the community to guide the development of its governmental structure as well as its natural and built environment. Nonetheless, the most significant feature of comprehensive planning in most communities is its foundation for land use controls. Most successful planning efforts begin with a survey of existing conditions and a determination of the municipality's vision for the future. This process should not be confused with zoning or other land use regulatory tools. Instead, the comprehensive plan should be thought of as a blueprint on which zoning and other land use regulations are based.

The state statutes define a comprehensive plan as "the materials, written and/or graphic, including but not limited to maps, charts, studies, resolutions, reports and other descriptive material that identify the goals, objectives, principles, guidelines, policies, standards, devices and instruments for the immediate and long-range protection, enhancement, growth and development" of the municipality (General City Law section 28a(3)(a); Town Law section 272-a(2)(a); Village Law section 7-722(2)(a)). While the use of the state comprehensive plan statutes is optional, they can guide boards through the comprehensive plan process (General City Law section 28-a; Town Law section 272-a; Village Law section 7-722). An important component of the process is public participation. Under the statutes, this occurs both formally, through mandatory hearings held by the preparing board and by the legislative body prior to adoption of the plan, and informally, through the participation of the public at workshops and informational sessions.

Municipalities that do not have professional planners on staff to assist in the preparation of a comprehensive plan have several resources available to them. They may be able to receive assistance from their county or regional planning agency. They may also be able to contract with a professional planning or engineering firm which provides planning services. Also, municipal residents may possess expertise in planning or other environmental or design disciplines. However long or detailed the plan is, its real value is in how it is used and implemented. Since each municipality that has the power to regulate land use has a different set of constraints and options, the final form of each comprehensive plan will be unique. The size and format of the comprehensive plan will vary from municipality to municipality (and possibly from consultant to consultant). It may consist of a few pages, or it may be a thick volume of information.

16.4 County Planning

New York's counties have the statutory power to create planning boards (General Municipal Law section 239-c). The county legislative body may prepare a county comprehensive plan or delegate its preparation to the county planning board or to a "special board" (General Municipal Law section 239-d). Prior to adopting or amending a county official map, the county legislative body must refer the proposed changes to the county planning board and other municipal bodies (General Municipal Law section 239-e). In addition, the county legislative body may authorize the county planning board to review certain planning and zoning actions, including certain subdivision plats, by municipalities within the county (General Municipal Law section 239-c(3)).

State laws require that any city, town or village located in a county possessing a "county planning agency" or "regional planning council" must refer to that agency certain zoning matters before taking final action on those matters. In addition, where authorized by the county legislative body, certain subdivision plats must be referred to the county by the town, village or city planning board before taking final action. Generally, referral must be made where a proposed zoning matter or subdivision plat affects real property within 500 feet of one or more enumerated geographic features, such as a municipal boundary. Referral to the county planning agency or regional planning council is an important aid to the local planning and zoning process. It provides local planning and zoning bodies with advice and assistance from professional county and regional staff and can result in better coordination of zoning actions among municipalities by inter-jecting inter-community considerations. In addition, it allows other planning agencies (county, regional and state) to better orient studies and proposals for solving local as well as county and regional needs.

16.5 Zoning and Related Regulatory Controls

16.5.1 Zoning

Zoning regulates the use of land, the density of land use, and the siting of development. Zoning is a land use technique that operates prospectively to help implement a municipality's comprehensive plan. It is the most commonly and extensively used local technique for regulating use of land as a means of accomplishing municipal goals. According to a 2008 survey by the Legislative Commission on Rural Resources, 100 percent of cities, 71 percent of towns and 89 percent of villages in New York had adopted zoning laws or ordinances.

Zoning commonly consists of two components: a zoning map and a set of zoning regulations. The zoning map divides a municipality into various land use districts, such as residential, commercial, or industrial. The land use districts that a municipality establishes can be even more specific, such as high, medium and low density residential, neighborhood commercial, central business district, or highway commercial, light industrial, heavy industrial, or agriculture. Mixed-use districts may also be appropriate, depending upon local planning and development goals as set forth in a comprehensive plan. Zoning regulations commonly describe the permissible land uses in each of the various zoning districts identified on the zoning map. They also include dimensional standards for each district, such as the height of buildings, minimum distances (setbacks) from buildings to property lines, and the density of development. These are referred to as "area" standards, as opposed to "use" standards. Zoning regulations will also set forth the steps necessary for approval by the type of use, the zoning district involved, or by both. For example, a single-family home is often permitted "as-of-right" in a low-density residential zoning district. "As-of-right" uses, if they meet the dimensional standards, require no further zoning approvals, and need only a building or zoning permit in order for construction to begin.

16.5.2 The Zoning Board of Appeals

Zoning boards of appeal (ZBAs) are an essential part of zoning administration. The state zoning enabling statutes prescribe that zoning boards of appeals must be created when a municipality enacts zoning (General City Law section 81; Town Law section 267; Village Law section 7-712). ZBAs serve as "safety valves" in order to provide relief, in appropriate circumstances, from overly restrictive zoning provisions. In this capacity, they function as appellate entities, with their powers derived directly from state law. In addition to their inherent appellate jurisdiction, municipal legislative bodies may give ZBAs "original" jurisdiction over other specified matters, such as special use permits and site plan reviews.

By state law, the ZBA must serve to provide for relief from the strict application of regulations that may affect the economic viability of a particular parcel or that may obstruct reasonable dimensional expansion. The state statutes give two varieties of appellate jurisdiction to ZBAs. An appeal seeking an interpretation of provisions of the zoning regulations is an appeal claiming that the decision of the administrative official charged with zoning enforcement is incorrect. It is a claim that the zoning enforcement officer misapplied the zoning map or regulations, or wrongly issued or denied a permit. By contrast, in an appeal for a variance, there is no dispute over the enforcement officer's application of zoning provisions. Instead, the applicant feels there should be an exception made in his or her case, and that some of the zoning rules should not apply in a particular circumstance. A ZBA must then apply the criteria set forth in the state statutes in determining whether to grant the requested variance.

Board of appeals members are appointed by the municipality's legislative body in a manner provided for by state statute or municipal charter. ZBAs function free of any oversight by the municipal legislative body. Where the zoning board of appeals has final decision-making authority, the legislative body may not review the grant or denial of variances, special use permits, or any other decisions; the statutes provide for review of ZBA decisions by the state courts in Article 78 proceedings.

For more information on the zoning board of appeals, please see the New York Department of State publication "Zoning Board of Appeals" at https://www.dos.ny.gov/lg/publications/Zoning_Board_of_Appeals.pdf.

16.5.3 Related Controls

In some communities, the basic use and density separation provided by traditional zoning is all that is necessary to achieve municipal development goals and objectives. Many communities desire, however, development patterns which may be only partially achieved through basic zoning. For example, a municipality may wish to strongly encourage a particular type of development in a certain area, or may wish to limit new development to infrastructure capacity. There are other land-use regulatory techniques available to address those objectives. Use of one or more particular techniques can serve to encourage and "market" the type of development and growth a municipality desires, more closely linking a municipality's comprehensive plan with the means to achieve it. Six of these techniques (special use permits, site plan review, subdivision review cluster, incentive zoning, and transfer of development rights) are provided for in the enabling statutes and briefly discussed below.

16.5.4 Special Use Permits

In most municipal zoning regulations, many uses are permitted within a zoning district as-of-right, with no discretionary review of the proposed project. On the other hand, municipalities may require a closer examination of certain designated uses. The special use permit zoning technique (sometimes referred to as conditional uses, special permits or special exceptions) allows a board discretionary authority to review a proposed development project in order to assure that it is in harmony with the zoning and will not adversely affect the neighborhood. A special use permit is applied for and granted by the reviewing board if the proposal meets the special use permit standards found in the zoning regulations. Typically, the standards are designed to avoid possible negative impacts of the proposed project with adjoining land uses or with other municipal development concerns or objectives, such as traffic impacts, noise, lighting, or landscaping. State statutes prescribe the procedure for all special use permit applications.

16.5.5 Site Plan Review

Site plan review is concerned with how a particular parcel is developed. A site plan shows the arrangement, layout and design of the proposed use of a single parcel of land. Site plan review can include both small and large-scale proposals, ranging from gas stations, drive-through facilities and small office buildings, to shopping centers, apartment complexes, and industrial parks. Site plan review can be used as a regulatory procedure standing alone, but is also often required in connection with other needed zoning approvals such as special use permits. The authority to require site plan review is derived from the state enabling statutes (General City Law section 27-a; Town Law section 274-a; Village Law section 7-725-a). A local site plan review requirement may be incorporated into the zoning law or ordinance, or may be adopted as a set of separate regulations. As in the case of special use permits, the local legislative body has the power to delegate site plan review to the planning board, zoning board of appeals, or another board. Alternatively, the legislative body may retain the power to exercise such reviews.

The local site plan review regulations or local zoning regulations determine what uses require site plan approval. Uses subject to review may be (1) identified by the zoning district in which they are proposed; (2) identified by use, regardless of the zoning district or proposed location within the community; or (3) located in areas identified as needing specialized design restrictions by way of an overlay zone approach, such as a flood zone or historic district.

Site plan issues should be addressed through a set of general or specific requirements included in the local site plan review regulations. As an alternative to the installation of required infrastructure and improvements, the site plan statute allows a municipality to require the applicant to post a performance guarantee to cover their cost.

16.5.6 Subdivision Review

There is probably no form of land use activity that has as much potential impact upon a municipality as the subdivision of land. The subdivision process controls the manner by which land is divided into smaller parcels. While a subdivision is typically thought of as the division of land into separate building lots that are sold to individual buyers, subdivision provisions may also apply to a simple division of land offered as a gift or which changes lot lines for some other reason. Subdivision regulations should ensure that when development does occur, streets, lots, open space and infrastructure are properly and safely designed, and the municipality's land use objectives are met.

Planning boards, when authorized by local governing bodies, may conduct subdivision plat review. A "plat" is a map prepared by a professional that shows the layout of lots, roads, driveways, details of water and sewer facilities, and, ideally, much other useful information regarding the development of a tract of land into smaller parcels or sites. The state enabling statutes contain specific procedures for the review of both preliminary and final plats (General City Law sections 32, 33; Town Law sections 276, 277; Village Law sections 7-728, 7-730). Most municipalities use the two-step (preliminary and final plat) process.

Subdivision review is a critical tool in a municipality's land use management scheme and has important consequences for overall municipal development. The subdivision of large tracts may induce other related development in the neighborhood, produce demands for rezoning of neighboring land, or trigger the need for additional municipal infrastructure.

For more information about subdivision review and procedure, please see the New York Department of State publication "Subdivision Review in New York State" at https://www.dos.ny.gov/lg/publications/Subdivision_Review_in_NYS.p

16.5.7 Cluster Development

Cluster development is a technique that allows flexibility in the design and subdivision of land (General City Law section 37; Town Law section 278; Village Law section 7-738). By clustering a new subdivision, certain community planning objectives can be achieved. The use of cluster development can greatly enhance a municipality's ability to maintain its traditional physical character while at the same time providing (and encouraging) new development. It also allows a municipality to achieve planning goals that may call for protection of open space, scenic views, agricultural lands, woodlands and other open landscapes, and may limit encroachment of development in, and adjacent to, environmentally sensitive areas. Cluster development is also attractive to developers because it can result in reduced development expenses relating to roadways, sewer lines, and other infrastructure, as well as lower costs to maintain that infrastructure.

When it is used according to the enabling statutes, cluster development is a variation of conventional subdivision plat approval. Cluster development concentrates the overall maximum density allowed on property onto the most appropriate portion of the property for development. The maximum number of units allowed on the parcel is no greater than would be allowed under a conventional subdivision layout for the same parcel.

16.5.8 Incentive Zoning (Bonus Zoning)

The authority to incorporate incentive zoning into a municipality's zoning regulations is set forth in the state planning and zoning enabling statutes (General City Law section 81-d; Town Law section 261-b; Village Law section 7-703). Incentive zoning is an innovative and flexible technique that can be used to encourage desired types of development in targeted locations. Conceptually, incentive zoning allows developers to exceed the dimensional, density, or other limitations of zoning regulations in return for providing certain benefits or amenities to the municipality. A classic example of incentive zoning would be an authorization to exceed height limits by a specified amount, in exchange for the provision of public open space, such as a plaza.

If a municipality desires a certain type of development in particular locations, it can usually only wait to see if a developer will find it economical to build. Incentive zoning changes this dynamic by providing economic incentives for development that otherwise may not occur. Incentive zoning is also a method for a municipality to obtain needed public benefits or amenities in certain zoning districts through the development process. Local incentive zoning laws can even be structured to require cash contributions from developers in lieu of physical amenities, under certain circumstances.

16.5.9 Transfer of Development Rights (TDR)

Transfer of Development Rights (TDR) is a complex growth management technique. It is based on the real property concept that ownership of land gives the owner a "bundle of rights," each of which may be separated from the rest. For example, one of these rights is the right to develop land. With a TDR system, landowners are able to retain their land, but sell the development rights for use on other properties.

Under the state zoning enabling statutes (General City Law section 20-f; Town Law section 261-a; Village Law section 7-701), areas of the municipality that have been identified through the planning process as in need of preservation (e.g., agricultural land) or areas where development should be avoided (e.g., municipal drinking water supply protection areas) are established as "sending districts." Development of land in such districts may be heavily restricted, but owners are granted rights under the TDR regulations to sell the rights to develop their lands. Those development rights may thereby be transferred to lands located in designated "receiving districts."

Transferable development rights usually take the form of a number of units per acre, or gross square footage of floor space, or an increase in height. The rights are used to increase the density of development in a receiving district. Receiving districts are established after the municipality has determined that they are appropriate for increased density, based upon a study of the effects of increased density in such areas. Such a study is best incorporated within the municipality's comprehensive plan.

The state zoning enabling statutes require that lands from which development rights are transferred are subject to a conservation easement, limiting the future development of the property. The statutes also require that the assessed valuation of properties be adjusted to reflect the change in development potential for real property tax purposes. For more on transfer of development of rights and their application, please see the New York Department of State publication "Transfer of Development Rights" at https://www.dos.ny.gov/lg/publications/-Transfer_of_Development_Rights.pdf.

16.6 Other Land Use Controls

In addition to the six techniques described above, four others are often employed: overlay zoning, performance zoning, and floating zones and planned unit development. They are not treated specifically in the enabling statutes, but have been considered to be lawful within the general statutory grants of zoning power.

16.6.1 Overlay Zoning

The overlay zoning technique is a modification of the system of conventionally-mapped zoning districts. An overlay zone applies a common set of standards to a designated area that may cut across several different conventional or "underlying" zoning districts. The standards of the overlay zone apply in addition to those of the underlying zoning district. Some common examples of overlay zones are the flood zones administered by many communities under the National Flood Insurance Program, historic district overlay zones, areas of very severe slopes, waterfront zones and environmentally sensitive areas. The state enabling statutes do not contain provisions dealing with overlay zoning, but it is employed most often in conjunction with special use permits.

16.6.2 Performance Zoning

Some municipalities have enacted zoning regulations that establish performance standards, rather than strict numerical limits on building size or location, as is the case with conventional zoning. Performance zoning, as it is commonly called, regulates development based on the permissible effects or impacts of a proposed use, rather than by the traditional zoning parameters of use, area and density. Under performance zoning, proposed uses whose impacts would exceed specified standards are prohibited unless the impacts can be mitigated.

Performance zoning is often used to address municipal issues concerning noise, dust, vibration, lighting, and other impacts of industrial uses. It is also used by municipalities to regulate environmental impacts, such as stormwater runoff, scenic and visual quality impacts, and defined impacts on community character. The complexity and sophistication of these performance standards vary widely from one municipality to another, depending on the objectives of the program and the capacity of the locality to administer it.

16.6.3 The Floating Zone

Floating zones allow municipalities flexibility in the location of a particular type of use and allow for a use of land that may not currently be needed, but which may be desired in the future. The floating zone is also a way of scrutinizing significant projects for municipal impacts. The local legislative body must approve floating zones. The standards and allowable uses for a floating zone are set forth in the text of the municipality's zoning regulations, but the actual district is not mapped; rather, the district "floats" in the abstract until a development proposal is made for a specific parcel of land and the project is determined to be in accordance with all of the applicable floating zone standards. At that time, the local legislative body maps the floating zone by attaching it to a particular parcel or parcels on the zoning map. Because the floating zone is not part of the zoning map until a particular proposal is approved, the establishment of its boundaries on the zoning map constitutes an amendment to the municipal zoning regulations.

16.6.4 Planned Unit Developments (PUDs)

Planned Unit Developments (PUDs) describe the development of a tract of land (usually a large tract of land) in a comprehensive, unified manner where the development is planned to be built as a "unit." As a mapping designation, they are also known as Planned Development Districts (PDD), and are often a form of floating zone; they are not made a part of the zoning map until a PUD project is approved. The PUDs that are shown on a zoning map may require approval by special use permit.

The PUD concept allows a combination of land uses, such as single and multiple-family residential, industrial, and commercial, on a single parcel of land. It also may allow a planned mix of building types and densities. For example, a single project might contain dwellings of several types, shopping facilities, office space, open areas, and recreation areas. In creating a PUD, a municipal legislative body would need to follow the procedure for amending zoning to create a new zoning district or to establish special use permit provisions. An application for a PUD district is typically reviewed by the planning board, and a recommendation is made to the legislative body, which may then choose to rezone the parcel.

16.7 Supplementary Controls

The following is a discussion of "stand alone" laws that are commonly adopted to address specific municipal concerns, although they may also be usefully incorporated into zoning, site plan review or subdivision regulations.

16.7.1 Official Map

For any municipality to develop logical, efficient and economical street and drainage systems, it must protect the future rights-of-way needed for these systems. Such preventive action saves a municipality the cost of acquiring an improved lot and structure at an excessive cost or resorting to an undesirable adjustment in the system. To protect these rights-of-ways, state statutes allow a municipality to establish and change an official map of its area, showing the streets, highways, parks and drainage systems (General City Law sections 26, 29; Town Law sections 270, 273; Village Law section 7-724; General Municipal Law section 239-e). Future requirements for facilities may be added to the official map. Without the consent of the municipality, the reserved land may not be used for other purposes.

The official map is final and conclusive in respect to the location and width of streets, highways and drainage systems, and locations of parks shown on it. Streets shown on an official map serve as one form of qualification for access requirements which must be met prior to the issuance of a building permit (General City Law sections 35, 35-a, 36; Town Law sections 280, 280-a, 281; Village Law sections 7-734, 7-736; General Municipal Law section 239-f).

16.7.2 Sign Control

The use and location of signs are typically subject to municipal regulation, either as part of a zoning law or as a separate regulation. Attention is focused on the number, size, type, design and location of signs.

The issues a municipality considers important can be brought together in a sign control program. Without a program, signs can overwhelm a municipality, damaging its character and reducing the effectiveness of communication, including traffic safety messages. With an effective program, signs can aesthetically enhance community character.

A municipality is generally free to prescribe the location, size, dimensions, and manner of construction and design of signs. However, the U.S. Supreme Court has examined the constitutional questions concerning freedom of speech with respect to sign controls, and has placed limits on the authority of municipalities to control the content of the message conveyed on signs.

For more information about the aspects of signage municipalities may regulate, please see the New York Department of State publication "Municipal Control of Signs" at https://www.dos.ny.gov/lg/publications/Municipal%20Control%20of

16.7.3 Historic Preservation

A community policy to protect historic resources and an identification of the particular resources to be protected in the community are the first steps to providing recognition of the historic value of a property or collection of buildings. Once a municipality has established a policy of historic preservation, it can seek to formally recognize individual historic structures or groups of structures.

The historical importance of a building can be recognized at the state or national level through listing on the State or National Register of Historic Places. These listings are managed, respectively, by the state [Office of Parks, Recreation, and Historic Preservation], and the federal Department of the Interior, in cooperation with the property owner and local municipality. The National Register listing includes recognition of the historical importance of a single property, a group of properties, or a set of properties related by a theme.

Listing on the National Register of Historic Places is an important recognition of a property or an area's historic and cultural significance. Designation can make the property eligible for tax credits and sometimes grants. Additionally, any federal action that might impact such property must undergo a special review that is designed to protect the property's integrity. Similarly, listing on the State Register of Historic Places means that state agency actions that effect a designated property are subject to closer review, and makes the property eligible for grant assistance. Neither a listing on the National nor State Register of Historic Places will protect a structure from the owner's interest in redesigning or demolishing the historic structure. Only a locally-adopted historic preservation law can control such actions.

In adopting a local historic preservation law, the municipality designates individual properties as local historic landmarks, or groups of properties as local historic districts. Such a local law is also likely to provide standards for protection of these designated properties.

If a municipality does not wish to adopt a local historic preservation law, it may want to consider a demolition law. Such a law could require review or a delay before demolition of a historically significant building. This allows time for a community to examine alternatives to demolition, such as purchase of the property by a government or not-for-profit group.

16.7.4 Architectural Design Control

Many aspects of a building's design are regulated through standards for siting, orientation, density, height and setback in a municipality's zoning ordinance or law. Some municipalities wish to go beyond dealing with the general size and siting of a building and its physical relationship with adjacent properties, to dealing with the appropriateness of the architectural design of the building. The review may include examining such design elements as facades, roof lines, window placement, architectural detailing, materials and color.

Architectural review generally requires a more subjective analysis of private development proposals than is possible within most zoning regulations. To do this, municipalities often establish an architectural review board, which should be able to offer guidance on design issues to other boards, such as the planning board or zoning board of appeals. Where authorized, an architectural review board may conduct an independent review of the architectural features of a proposed project. Often, a community chooses to link design review to historic preservation controls, with a focus on the design of new buildings and alterations to existing buildings within historic districts.

16.7.5 Junk Yard Regulations

If a municipality does not have its own junk yard regulations or zoning regulations addressing the siting of junk yards, it must apply the standards set forth in General Municipal Law section 136 for automobile junk yards. This law regulates the collection of junk automobiles, including the licensing of junk yards and regulation of certain aesthetic factors. The application of this state law is limited to sites storing two or more unregistered, old or secondhand motor vehicles which are not intended or in condition for legal use on public highways. The law also applies to used motor vehicle parts, which, in bulk, equal at least two motor vehicles. A municipality may expand the state definition of "junk yard" to encompass other types of junk, such as old appliances, household waste, or uninhabitable mobile homes, in order to regulate aspects of junk not covered by state law and to ensure greater compatibility with surrounding land uses.

16.7.6 Control of Mining

The New York State Mined Land Reclamation Law (Environmental Conservation Law section 23-2703 et seq.) regulates mining operations which remove more than one thousand tons or 750 cubic yards (whichever is less) of minerals from the earth annually. Mines that meet or exceed such thresholds require approval by the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation (DEC). Smaller mines may be regulated by a local mining or zoning regulation. However, even though DEC regulates larger mines, a municipality may regulate the location of all mines through its zoning regulations or prohibit mining altogether from the municipality.

When a municipality permits state-regulated mining to occur within its borders through a special use permit process, conditions placed on the permit may pertain to entrances and exits to and from the mine on roads controlled by the municipality, routing of mineral transport vehicles on roads controlled by the municipality, enforcement of the reclamation conditions set forth in the DEC mining permit, and certain other requirements specified in the state permit (ECL section 23-2703).

16.7.7 Scenic Resource Protection

Scenic resources are important in defining community character. Policies to protect scenic resources may be included in a municipality's comprehensive plan, along with maps illustrating the scenic resource. Once this has been done, it is important to integrate policies into regulations. Appropriate use, density, siting and design standards can protect scenic resources by such methods as limiting the height of buildings or fences in important scenic areas.

16.7.8 Open Space Preservation

Many communities recognize the value of "open space", i.e. vacant land and land without significant structural development. A good way for a municipality to assess the importance of its open space resources is to produce an open space plan or to include an assessment of open space resources as part of its comprehensive plan. Here, a municipality decides how to categorize its open space resources, examine their use and function in the municipality, identify priority areas to be protected, and consider the best means of land conservation. When a municipality has identified its open space resources, it can develop policies to protect them. Those policies should be expressed in the open space plan and/or in the municipality's comprehensive plan, along with the maps showing open spaces. Once this has been done, it is important to ensure the open space policies of the comprehensive plan are implemented through the municipality's land use controls.

16.7.9 Protection of Agricultural Land

One of the critical issues involved in land use planning decisions for agricultural uses is to ensure that agriculture protection deals primarily with the preservation of agriculture as an economic activity and not just as a use of open space. Traditionally, agricultural uses are part of large lot, low density, residential zoning districts.

Article 25-AA of the Agriculture and Markets Law is intended to conserve and protect agricultural land for agricultural production and as a valued natural and ecological resource. Under this statute, collections of parcels can be designated as an agricultural district. To be eligible for designation, an agricultural district must be certified by the county for participation in the state program. Once a district is designated, participating farmers within it may receive reduced property assessments and relief from local nuisance claims and certain forms of local regulation.

Agricultural district designation under Article 25-AA does not generally prescribe land uses. However, under section 305-a of Article 25-AA, municipalities are restricted from adopting regulations, applicable to farm operations in agricultural districts, which unreasonably restrict or regulate farm structures or practices, unless such regulations are directly related to the public health or safety (Agriculture & Markets Law, section 305-a(1); Town Law section 283-a; Village Law section 7-739). The law also requires municipalities to evaluate and consider the possible impacts of certain projects on the functioning of nearby farms.

Projects that require "agricultural data statements" include certain land subdivisions, site plans, special use permits, and use variances.

Farm operations within agricultural districts also enjoy a measure of protection from proposals by municipalities to construct infrastructure such as water and sewer systems, which are intended to serve nonfarm structures. Under Agriculture and Markets Law, section 305, the municipality must file a notice of intent with both the state and the county in advance of such construction. The notice must detail the plans and the potential impact of the plans on agricultural operations. If, on review at either the county or state levels, the Commissioner of Agriculture and Markets determines that there would be an unreasonable adverse impact, he or she may issue an order delaying construction, and may hold a public hearing on the issue. If construction eventually goes forward, the municipality must make adequate documented findings that all adverse impacts on agriculture will be mitigated to the maximum extent practicable.

"Right-to-farm" is a term that has gained widespread recognition in the state's rural areas within the past several decades. Section 308 of the Agriculture and Markets Law grants protection from nuisance lawsuits to farm operators within agricultural districts or on land outside a district subject to an agricultural assessment under section 306 of the Law. The protection is granted to the operator for any farm activity that the Commissioner has determined to be a "sound agricultural practice." Locally, many rural municipalities have used their home rule power to adopt local "right-to-farm" laws. These local laws commonly grant particular land-use rights to farm owners and restrict activities on neighboring non-farm land that might interfere with agricultural practices.

A purchase of development-rights (PDR) system involves the purchase by a municipal or county government of development rights from private landowners whose land it seeks to preserve in its current state without further development. The PDR system, which has been used extensively in Suffolk County to preserve farmland, can also protect ecologically important lands or scenic parcels essential to rural character of the community. Under PDR, the land remains in private ownership and the government acquires non-agricultural development rights. These development rights, once purchased, are held and remain unsold. The farmer receives payment equal to the development value of the farmland. In return, the farmer agrees to keep the land forever in agriculture. The owner typically files property covenants similar to a conservation easement limiting the use of the property to agricultural production. The nation's first purchase of development rights program to preserve farmland was the Suffolk County in 1974.

The Commissioner of the Department of Agriculture and Markets is authorized to administer two matching grant programs focused on farmland protection. One assists county governments in developing agricultural and farmland protection plans to maintain the economic viability of the state's agricultural industry and its supporting land base; the other assists local governments in implementing their farmland protection plans and has focused on preserving the land base by purchasing the development rights on farms (Article 25-AA of the Agriculture and Markets Law).

The PDR system may have advantages over the TDR system, in that there is a ready market for the purchase and sale of development rights at all times. In addition, the prices of various categories of development rights may be more easily maintained at or near market value, and kept uniform under the PDR system.

16.7.10 Floodplain Management

Floodplain regulations govern the amount, type and location of development within defined flood-prone areas. Federal standards, applicable to communities that are eligible for federal flood insurance protection, include identification of primary flood hazard areas, usually defined as being within the 100-year floodplain. Within flood hazard areas, certain restrictions are placed on development activities. Such restrictions include a requirement that buildings be elevated above flood elevations or be flood-proofed, and also include prohibitions on the filling of land within a floodplain. Municipalities can adopt their own floodplain regulations, which may be more stringent than the federal standards. Local floodplain regulations can identify a larger hazard area (such as a 500-year floodplain), and may prohibit certain types of construction within flood hazard areas. Municipalities must adopt local floodplain regulations to be eligible for participation in the National Flood Insurance Program.

16.7.11 Wetland Protection

"Wetlands" are areas that are submerged much of the time in either fresh or salt water. In state regulations, they are defined chiefly by the forms of vegetation present. Wetlands provide a number of benefits to a community. Besides providing wildlife habitat, wetlands also provide habitat protection, recreational opportunities, water supply protection, and provide open space and scenic beauty that can enhance local property values. Wetlands also serve as storage for storm water runoff, thus reducing flood damage and filtering pollutants. In coastal communities, they also serve as a buffer against shoreline erosion. The preservation of wetlands can go a long way toward protecting water quality; increasing flood protection; supporting hunting, fishing and shell fishing; providing opportunities for recreation, tourism and education; and enhancing scenic beauty, open space, and property values.

State wetland regulations protect freshwater wetlands greater than 12.4 acres, and 1 acre in the Adirondack Park, freshwater wetlands of unusual local importance, and tidal wetlands. The state has established adjacent wetland buffer zones, prohibiting or restricting certain activities within such areas, and has established standards for permit issuance. Under the Environmental Conservation Law (ECL), DEC shares concurrent jurisdiction with local governments to regulate tidal wetlands.

With respect to freshwater wetlands, three regulatory possibilities are present:

1. All wetlands smaller than 12.4 acres and not deemed of "unusual importance," are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the municipalities where the wetlands are located (ECL section 24-0507).
2. Under ECL, section 24-0501, a local government may enact a freshwater wetlands protection law to fully assume jurisdiction over all freshwater wetlands within its jurisdiction from DEC, provided its law is no less protective of wetlands than Article 24 of the ECL and provided that DEC certifies that the municipality is capable of administering the Act. There is also a limited opportunity for counties to assume wetlands jurisdiction if the local government declines.
3. Under ECL, section 24-0509, local governments can now adopt freshwater wetland regulations applying to wetlands already mapped and under the jurisdiction of DEC, provided that the local regulations are more protective of wetlands than the state regulations in effect. No pre-certification by DEC is required.

The United States Government, through the Army Corps of Engineers, also regulates federally defined wetlands. The Corps does not, however, map wetlands in advance of development proposals. When a proposal is made which may impact a wetland falling within federal definitions, the Corps will make a permit determination and impose appropriate conditions to protect the wetland.

16.7.12 Water Resource Protection

One of New York's greatest resources is its abundant water supply, which is safeguarded to protect municipal and private drinking water supplies from disease-causing microorganisms, protect fishery resources, enhance recreational opportunities, prevent erosion and harmful sedimentation, and to protect the environmental quality of adjacent land. Failure to adequately protect drinking water supplies can result in public health hazards and lead to the need for treatment of drinking water at great expense to municipalities.

Municipalities may adopt laws to protect groundwater recharge areas, watersheds and surface waters. Local sanitary codes can be adopted to regulate land use practices that have the potential to contaminate water supplies. Sanitary codes may address the design of storm water drainage systems, the location of drinking water wells, and the design and placement of on-site sanitary waste disposal systems. Water resources can be further protected through the adoption of land use laws that prohibit certain potentially polluting land uses in recharge areas, watersheds and near surface waters. Site plan review laws and subdivision regulations may also be used to minimize the amount of impervious surfaces, and to require that storm water systems be designed to protect water supplies.

Municipalities also have authority under the Public Health Law (PHL) to enact regulations for the protection of their water supplies, even if located outside of the municipality's territorial boundaries. Such regulations must be approved by the New York State Department of Health. Also, under state statutes, "realty subdivisions" – those containing five or more lots that are five acres or less in size – must undergo approval of their water supply and sewerage facilities by the county health department. (This requirement is under Public Health Law, Art. 11, Title II and Environmental Conservation Law, Art. 17, Title 15.)

The Federal Safe Drinking Water Act (SDWA) Amendments of 1996 established stringent water-supply capacity and quality standards for all public drinking water sources eligible for Federal assistance or otherwise coming within Federal regulatory jurisdiction. Originally the SDWA focused primarily on treatment as the means of providing safe drinking water at the tap. The 1996 amendments greatly enhanced the existing law by recognizing source water protection, operator training, funding for water system improvements, and public information as important components of safe drinking water. This approach ensures the quality of drinking water by protecting it from source to tap.

16.7.13 Erosion and Sedimentation Control

Development, earth-moving and some agricultural practices can create significant soil erosion and the sedimentation that frequently follows. Through the adoption of proper erosion, sedimentation, and vegetation-clearing controls, a municipality can protect its land and infrastructure and private property from costly damage, retain valuable soils, protect water quality, and preserve aesthetics within the municipality. Such regulations can be specifically directed at grading, filling, excavating and other site preparation activities, such as the clear-cutting of trees or the removal of vegetation. Local regulations may require the use of particular methods and compliance with minimum standards when carrying out construction and other activities.

New York State has a program for the control of waste-water and storm water discharges in accordance with the Federal Clean Water Act, known as the State Pollutant Discharge Elimination System (SPDES). Article 17 of the Environmental Conservation Law (ECL), entitled "Water Pollution Control", authorized creation of the SPDES program to maintain New York's waters with reasonable standards of purity. The program is designed to eliminate the pollution of New York waters and to maintain the highest quality of water possible, consistent with public health, public enjoyment of the resource, protection and propagation of fish and wildlife, and industrial development in the state. New York State's law is broader in scope than that required by the Clean Water Act in that it controls point-source discharges to groundwater as well as surface water.

16.7.14 Environmental Review

The State Environmental Quality Review Act (SEQRA) was established to provide a procedural framework whereby a suitable balance of social, economic, and environmental factors would be incorporated into the community planning and decision-making processes. SEQRA applies to all state agencies and local governments when they propose to undertake an "action" such as constructing a public building, or approving or funding projects proposed by private owners. (Environmental Conservation Law Article 8; Title 6, NY Codes, Rules & Regulations, Part 617). The intent of SEQRA is to review the environmental impacts of a proposed project and to take those impacts into account when deciding whether to undertake or allow the project to proceed. Impacts that cannot be avoided through modification of the project should be mitigated by conditions imposed on it.

State regulations categorize all actions as either “Type I” (more likely to have a significant environmental impact), “Type II” (no significant impact), or “Unlisted”, with differing procedural requirements applicable to each. SEQRA review can serve to supplement local controls when the scope and environmental impacts of a project exceed those anticipated by existing land use laws. SEQRA is a far-reaching statute that can provide a municipality with critical information about the impacts of a land development project, so that a more informed decision may be made on the project. The SEQRA process also helps to establish a clear record of decision-making should the municipality ever have to defend its actions. Several publications available from the Department of Environmental Conservation thoroughly explain the SEQRA process.

16.7.15 Moratoria

A moratorium is a local law or ordinance used to temporarily halt new land development projects while the municipality revises its comprehensive plan, its land use regulations, or both. In some cases, moratoria are enacted to halt development while a municipality seeks to upgrade its public facilities or its infrastructure. Moratoria, or interim development regulations, are designed to restrict development for a limited period of time. The courts have placed strict guidelines on the enactment and content of moratorium laws.

16.8 Conclusion

It is apparent from the foregoing discussion that a panoply of land use techniques are available to local governments to assist them in carrying out their comprehensive planning goals to enhance community development and character.

Chapter 17

Public Authorities, Regional Agencies, and Intergovernmental Cooperation

Historically, New York has been and continues to be a true defender of home rule. Under certain conditions and situations, however, there have been issues which are of a statewide concern that cannot be managed under the narrow view of local authority and financial capability in order to bring forward a regional solution.

17.1 The Era of the Authority

New York State has a complex system of public authorities that are formed to achieve public or quasi-public objectives, including financing, building and managing public projects or improving a variety of governmental functions. There are both state and local public authorities in New York. A state authority is a public authority or public benefit corporation established by the State Legislature, with one or more of its members appointed by the governor or who serve as members by virtue of holding a civil office of the state. A local authority is: a public authority or public benefit corporation created by the State Legislature whose members do not hold a civil office of the state, are not appointed by the governor or are appointed by the governor specifically upon the recommendation of the local government; or a not-for-profit corporation affiliated with, sponsored by, or created by a county, city, town or village government; or a local industrial development agency or authority or local public benefit corporation; or an affiliate of such local authority; or a land bank corporation created pursuant to not-for-profit corporation law.

There are also interstate or international authorities in New York State, which are created pursuant to agreement or compact with another state or with a foreign power.

Most public authorities have the power to incur debt and collect user charges, but not to levy taxes or benefit assessments on real estate. While many public authorities have officials who are appointed or serve virtue of another office, the public authority is to act independently and autonomous and has legal flexibility not otherwise permitted to a state department or agency.

Public authorities often raise money through the sale of bonds and operate on little or no state dollars. In theory, a public authority must be self-supporting and able to meet debt obligations through revenues obtained from its own valuable assets, such as fares and user fees. To prevent the State from assuming public authority debt as a moral obligation, the present New York State Constitution explicitly empowers public authorities to issue bonds and incur debt but prevents the State from assuming that liability. (New York Constitution, Art X, section 5)

In Schulz v. State of New York, 84 NY2d 231, 616 NYS2d 343, 350 (1994), the Court of Appeals held that the state is not legally or technically liable on authority bonds nor for authority debt. The state may, however, choose to honor a public authority liability as a moral obligation.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey was the first public authority having a regional or statewide purpose, and it was the first of its kind in the Western Hemisphere. It was created under a clause of the United States Constitution permitting compacts between states and approved by the United States Congress. In 1960, only 13 authorities existed in the state which, for the most part, focused upon the construction or management of facilities which had regional significance or were of high economic importance such as ports, bridges, tunnels and highways. The ensuing years, however, might be called "the era of the authority" during which many authorities, having a variety of functions were created. As of June 30th, 2016 there were approximately 577 statewide authorities in existence in New York.[1]

Table 17.1: State, International, and Interstate Public Authorities by Date Created

Name	Year
1920's
The Port Authority of New York & New Jersey(5 subsidiaries)	1921
Albany Port District Commission	1925
1930's
Buffalo and Fort Erie Public Bridge Authority	1933
Industrial Exhibit Authority	1936
NYS Bridge Authority	1939
Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority[2]	1939
Power Authority of the State of NY	1939
1940's
Dormitory Authority of the State of New York (2 subsidiaries)	1944
1950's
NYS Thruway Authority (1 subsidiary)	1950
Ogdensburg Bridge and Port Authority	1950
New York City Transit Authority and Manhattan & Bronx Surface Transit Operating Authority[2]	1953
Port of Oswego Authority	1955
Hudson River-Black River Regulating District	1959
1960's
NYS Housing Finance Agency (3 subsidiaries)	1961
New York Job Development Authority D/B/A Empire State Development Corp. (1 subsidiary)[3]	1961
State University Construction Fund	1962
Metropolitan Transportation Authority (10 subsidiaries)	1965
Metropolitan Suburban Bus Authority1[2]	1965
Metro-North Commuter Railroad1	1965
Staten Island Rapid Operating Authority[2]	1965
Long Island Railroad[2]	1965
City University Construction Fund	1966
Niagara Frontier Transportation Authority (1 subsidiary)	1967
Battery Park City Authority	1968
NYS Urban Development Corporation (107 subsidiaries)[3]	1968
Natural Heritage Trust	1968
Facilities Development Corporation - part of Dormitory Authority	1968
United Nations Development Corporation	1968
Community Facilities Project Guarantee Fund	1969
Rochester-Genesee Regional Transportation Authority (11 subsidiaries)	1969
State of New York Mortgage Agency	1970

[1] 2006 Comptroller's Report on the Financial Condition of New York State, Office of the State Comptroller.

Table 17.1: (continued)

Name	Year
1970's
Central New York Regional Transportation Authority (7 subsidiaries)	1970
Capital District Transportation Authority (5 subsidiaries)	1970
NYS Environmental Facilities Corp.	1970
Municipal Bond Bank Agency (1 subsidiary)	1972
NYS Medical Care Facilities Finance Agency - part of Dormitory Authority[4]	1973
NYS Project Finance Agency	1975
NYS Energy Research and Development Authority	1975
Municipal Assistance Corporation for the City of New York	1975
Jacob Javits Convention Center Operating Corporation	1979
Jacob K. Javits Convention Center Development Corporation	1979
NAR Empire State Plaza Performing Arts Center Corporation	1979
1980's
NYS Science and Technology D/B/A Empire State Development Corp.	1981
NYS Olympic Regional Development Authority	1981
NYS Quarterhorse Breeding and Development Fund Corporation[5]	1982
NYS Thoroughbred Breeding and Development Fund Corporation	1983
Agriculture and NYS Horse Breeding and Development Fund	1983
NYS Thoroughbred Racing Capital Investment Fund	1983
Roosevelt Island Operating Corp.	1984
Development Authority of the North Country	1985
Housing Trust Fund Corporation[6]	1985
NYS Affordable Housing Corporation[6]	1985
Long Island Power Authority (1 subsidiary)	1986
1990's
Homeless Housing Assistance Corp.	1990
New York Local Government Assistance Corp.	1990
NYS Theatre Institute Corporation	1992
Executive Mansion Trust	1993
Municipal Assistance for the City of Troy	1995
Nassau Health Care Corporation	1997
Roswell Park Cancer Institute Corporation	1997
Westchester County Health Care Corporation	1997
Hudson River Park Trust	1998
2000's
Nassau County Interim Finance Authority	2000
Buffalo Fiscal Stability Authority	2003
Erie County Medical Center Corporation	2004
New York State Foundation for Science Technology and Innovation	2005
Erie County Fiscal Stability Authority	2005

[2] Subsidiary of MTA or an agency under its jurisdiction

[3] UDC, JDA, and part of NYS Science & Technology Foundation operate under a joint business certificate (D/B/A) using the name Empire State Development Corporation

[4] Dormitory Authority took over operation of MCFFA and FDC, but they retain their separate legal status.

[5] Inactive

[6] Subsidiary of Housing Finance Agency

17.1.1 Establishment of Authorities

State authorities and local authorities, with the exception of not-for-profits, are created by special acts of the legislature that gives the entities explicit powers and limitations. Not-for-profit entities that are determined to be a local authority, based on being affiliated, sponsored or created by a municipality are not created by a special act of legislature, but are organized pursuant to not-for-profit law. As a result, authorities display wide variation with respect to their powers and limitations. The Public Authorities Accountability Act (PAAA) of 2005 and Public Authorities Reform Act (PARA) of 2009 established general provisions in Public Authorities Law that apply to state and local authorities.

17.1.2 Advantages and Disadvantages

The growth in the number and power of public authorities resulted in the creation of the Public Authorities Control Board (PACB) in 1976.[7]

PACB has approval authority over the financing, acquisition or construction commitments of a number of state public authorities, including the Dormitory Authority, Housing Finance Agency, Urban Development Corporation, Job Development Authority and Environmental Facilities Corporation. The Public Authorities Control Board consists of five members appointed by the Governor, four of whom are recommended by the Senate and Assembly leadership. The Governor appoints the Chair.

A 2006 Report by the Office of the State Comptroller found that the State's largest public authorities had outstanding debt of over $124 billion, including more than $42 billion in State-supported debt.[8]

Although debt service on State-supported debt is paid by taxpayers, such debt has not been approved by voters. Additionally, another report by the Office of the State Comptroller noted that only 11 of the state's public authorities have their borrowing reviewed by the Public Authorities Control Board.

17.1.3 Recent Oversight Changes

The Public Authorities Accountability Act (PAAA) (Chapter 766 of the Laws of 2005) and the Public Authorities Reform Act of 2009 (PARA) represent reforms that recognize the differences between state agencies and public authorities and the importance of those distinctions. At the same time, the Reform Act acknowledges that public authorities are created by, and would not exist but for their relationship with, New York State. As a result of this relationship with state government, public authorities must exhibit a commitment to protecting the interests of New York taxpayers and meet the highest standards of effective and ethical operation.

Accordingly, with the enactment of PAAA, the Authorities Budget Office (ABO) was first created in unconsolidated law as the Authority Budget Office. The ABO was re-established as an independent office when PARA took effect on March 1, 2010. From its inception, the ABO's mission has been to make public authorities more accountable and transparent and to act in ways consistent with their governing statutes and public purpose. The ABO carries out its mission by: collecting, analyzing and disseminating to the public information on the finances and operations of state and local public authorities; conducting reviews to assess the operating and governance practices of public authorities and compliance with state laws; promoting good governance principles through training, policy guidance, the issuance of best practices recommendations and assistance to public authority staff and board members; and investigating complaints made against public authorities for noncompliance or inappropriate conduct.

[7] Laws of 1976, Chapter 39, as amended

[8] 2006 Comptroller's Report on the Financial Condition of New York State, Office of the State Comptroller.

The legislation also established an inspector general, banned procurement lobbying, strengthened provisions for public access to information; provided new rules for the disposing of public authority property, and established codes of ethical conduct for authority directors, officers and employees. PARA includes the following provisions:

- Identification of Public Authorities
  - defines public authorities as state, local, interstate or international, and affiliates or subsidiaries thereof.
- Improved Governance
  - requires board members to sign an acknowledgement of fiduciary duty
  - requires independent board members on State and local authorities and finance committees for those authorities that issue debt;
  - establishes roles and responsibilities of board members for State and local authorities;
  - mandates audit and governance committees for all State and local authorities;
  - mandates training for board members;
  - bans personal loans to board members, officers and employees; and
  - requires financial disclosure.
- Improved Independent Audit Standards
  - requires independent audits;
  - requires rotation of auditors every five years;
  - prohibits non-audit services, unless receiving previous written approval by the audit -committee; and
  - prohibits a firm from performing an authority audit if any executive officer was employed by that firm and participated in any capacity in the audit of such authority during the one-year period preceding the date of the initiation of the audit.
- Increased Transparency
  - continues reporting requirements for state authorities and local authorities.

Table 17.2: Revised Breakdown of Public Authorities By Class

Class	Description	Number
A	Major public authorities with statewide or regional significance and their subsidiaries	190
B	Entities affiliated with a State agency, or entities created by the State that have limited jurisdiction but a majority of Board appointments made by the Governor or other State officials	68
C	Entities with local jurisdiction	474
D	Entities with interstate or international jurisdiction and their subsidiaries	8
Total		740

17.2 Regional Agencies

In the course of the state's population growth and the expansion of towns, cities and villages there arose concern among the population that some of the state's natural resources could be threatened. There also arose a concern that under certain circumstances, nature itself would unleash its destructive power upon the urbanizing areas of the state. In response to these concerns, the state established a number of agencies with a regional focus to the issues which transcended political boundaries. Regional authorities now carry out such diverse functions as operating regional transportation systems, managing airports, regulating rivers, constructing facilities for colleges and hospitals, developing and operating ports and carrying out urban and economic development activities.

17.2.1 Port Authority of New York and New Jersey

Several interstate regional authorities exist in the New York metropolitan area, including the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey. This authority is operated by a 12 member board of commissioners, half of whom are appointed by the State of New York and half by the State of New Jersey. The Port Authority is responsible for all aspects of port commerce in and around New York City, the Hudson River bridges and tunnels, as well as for the operation of Kennedy, LaGuardia and Newark Airports and numerous other transportation facilities. In addition, the Port authority operates the Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corporation Rapid Transit system (PATH) under the Hudson River between the two states.

17.2.2 Adirondack Park Agency

The https://www.ny.gov/agencies/adirondack-park-agency [Adirondack Park Agency] is an independent, bipartisan state agency responsible for developing long-range park policy in a forum that balances statewide concerns and the interests of local governments in the Park. It was created by New York State law in 1971. The legislation defined the makeup and functions of the agency and authorized the agency to develop two plans for lands within the Adirondack Park. The approximately 2.5 million acres of public lands in the Park are managed according to the Adirondack Park State Land Master Plan. The Adirondack Park Land Use and Development Plan regulates land use and development activities on the 2.9 million acres of privately owned lands in the park.

The agency also administers the Adirondack Park Agency State Wild, Scenic and Recreational Rivers System Act for private lands adjacent to designated rivers in the park, and the State Freshwater Wetlands Act within the Park.

The Agency Board is composed of 11 members, eight of whom are New York State residents nominated by the Governor and approved by the State Senate. Five of the appointed members must reside within the boundaries of the Park. In addition to the eight appointed members, three members serve ex-officio. These are the Commissioners of Departments of Environmental Conservation and Economic Development, and the Secretary of State. Each member from within the Park must represent a different county and no more than five members can be from one political party.

The agency provides several types of service to landowners considering new land use and development within the Park which include:

- Jurisdictional advice: The agency will provide a letter informing a landowner whether a permit is needed for a new land use and development or subdivision, or whether a variance is needed from the shoreline standards of the agency. In many cases the letter advises that no permit or variance is needed. This determination is often helpful in completing financing and other arrangements related to new development in the park.

- Wetland advice: The agency will determine the location of regulated wetlands on a property or the need for a wetland permit.
- Permit application: A landowner proposing new land use or development who knows an agency permit is required may initiate a permit application without first receiving jurisdictional advice.
- Changes to the Park Plan Map: agency staff will advise on criteria, boundaries, and the process for amendment of the Official Map.

17.2.3 Tug Hill Commission

The Tug Hill Region lies between Lake Ontario and the Adirondacks. Larger than the states of Delaware or Rhode Island, its 2,100 square miles comprise one of the most rural and remote sections of New York State and the Northeast. A scattering of public lands covers a tenth of the region, with most of that land used extensively for timber production, hunting, and recreation. The rest is privately owned forest, farms, and homes.

Tug Hill's total population is just over 100,000, two-thirds of which is concentrated in villages around its edge. Its densely forested core of about 800 square miles is among New York's most remote areas, with a population of just a few thousand and few public roads.

The uniqueness of the Tug Hill region and its natural resources were recognized by New York State in 1972 when it created the Temporary Commission on the Tug Hill, a non-regulatory state agency charged with helping local governments, organizations, and citizens shape the future of the region, especially its environment and economy. In 1992, the state legislature passed the Tug Reserve Act, further recognizing the statewide importance of the region's natural resources. Congress has recognized the region as an integral part of the Northern Forest Lands area.

In 1998, new state legislative authorization for the Tug Hill Commission (permanently establishing the Commission within New York State's Executive Law, Article 37, section 847) noted Tug Hill's "lands and waters are important to the State of New York as municipal water supply, as wildlife habitat, as key resources supporting forest industry, farming, recreation and tourism and traditional land uses such as hunting and fishing." Other legislation in 1998 (Chapter 419, Laws of 1998) supported the State's purchase of conservation easements in the Tug Hill region, adding it to similar provisions that apply in New York's Adirondack Park, Catskill Park and watershed of the City of Rochester.

The nine members of its governing body are all residents of the region.

17.2.4 Lake George Park Commission

The Lake George Park and the Lake George Park Commission are established by Article 43 of the Environmental Conservation Law. The purpose of the Commission generally is to preserve, protect, and enhance the unique natural, scenic and recreational resources of the Lake George Park, which consists of Lake George and its land drainage areas. It is entirely within the Adirondack Park. The Commission has specific regulatory and enforcement powers relating to activities on the lake, along the shoreline and within the land drainage basin.

Among other duties, the commission: operates the Lake George Park Commission Marine Patrol (a law enforcement and public safety function); administers regulations governing wharfs, docks and moorings, marinas, navigation, and recreational activities; and administers regulations for the preparation of local storm water management plans and storm water regulatory programs for areas within the park where development is occurring. It must also develop and administer regulations for the discharge of treated sewage effluent, conduct a water quality monitoring program and investigate, identify and abate sources of ground and surface water contamination.

17.2.5 Hudson River Valley Greenway

The Hudson River Valley Greenway is a unique state-sponsored program established by the Greenway Act of 1991. The program is designed to encourage projects and initiatives related to the intersecting goals of natural and cultural resource protection, regional planning, economic development, public access, and heritage and environmental education. It provides technical assistance and catalytic grant funding for planning, water and land trails, and other projects that reinforce these goals. The legislatively defined Greenway area includes all of the municipalities within these counties: Albany, Columbia, Dutchess, Orange, Putnam, Rensselaer, Rockland, Saratoga, Ulster, Washington, Westchester, municipalities in Greene County outside of the Catskill Park, and those portions of New York and Bronx counties adjacent to the Hudson River and within the city's waterfront revitalization program. In keeping with the New York tradition of home rule, the Greenway program has no regulatory authority and participation by municipalities in Greenway programs and projects is entirely voluntary. The Greenway also manages the Hudson River Valley National Heritage Area in partnership with the National Park Service.

17.2.6 Central Pine Barrens Commission

New York's most southeastern county, Suffolk County, occupies the eastern end of Long Island, and comprises over 900 square miles of terrestrial and marine environments. Three of Suffolk County's ten towns are host to a 105,000+ acre, New York State-designated region known as the https://pb.state.ny.us/ (Central Pine Barrens).

A rich concoction of terrestrial and aquatic ecosystems, interconnected surface and ground waters, recreational niches, historic locales, farmlands, and residential communities, this region contains the largest remnant of a forest thought to have once encompassed over a quarter million acres on Long Island. New York State and Suffolk County recognized a need to protect groundwater quality because it is the sole source of drinking water. The region lies over an underground drinking water aquifer known as a "deep recharge area" which supplies much of the area's public water supply. In addition, the Central Pine Barrens region contains fire-dependent, fire-adapted ecosystem and landscape, found in only a few locations in the United States, which contains one of the greatest concentrations of rare, endangered and threatened plans and animals in New York State.

In 1993, New York State's Long Island Pine Barrens Protection Act officially defined this region at the junction of the Towns of Brookhaven, Riverhead, and Southampton, and started a process for regional planning and permitting which continues today. The 1993 Act created a five member Central Pine Barrens Joint Planning and Policy Commission, an Advisory Committee, and a "planning calendar" (now completed), which led to the June 1995 adoption of the Central Pine Barrens Comprehensive Land Use Plan.

The Commission possesses the combined duties of a state agency, a planning board and a park commission and has joint land use review and regulation, permitting, and enforcement authority along with local municipalities. The implementation of the land use plan is overseen and managed by the Commission. In addition, the Commission operates a transfer of development rights and conservation easement program and also engages in a number of stewardship and ecological management activities.

17.3 The Regional Planning Councils

Unlike state-created regional agencies, regional planning councils are locally formed by the agreement of adjoining counties. The primary function of regional planning councils is to study the needs and conditions of an entire region and to develop strategies that enhance the region's communities. Recognition was given to the regional council concept when the federal government authorized the establishment of area-wide planning agencies. These agencies were permitted to receive federal planning funds. The federal government then required proposals for federal funding to be reviewed on a regional level to determine district-wide significance and potential conflict with master planning. This review was undertaken by the regional planning councils. The federal government later rescinded this requirement, but in the interest of regional planning, New York State continued the program.

Regional councils were created to provide a regional approach to concerns that cross the lines of local governments' jurisdictions. Nationwide, there are over 670 of these regional councils, representing almost all 50 states. These councils are a vehicle for local governments to share their resources, and to make the most of funding, planning, and human resources.

Most are voluntary associations, and do not have the power to regulate or tax. They are primarily funded by local governments, as well as by state and federal funds. The councils are responsible to the representatives of the communities in their regions.

The regional view encourages an impartial, bipartisan conduit for the exchange of information. This exchange allows for objective recommendations for the resolution of problems, including the ability to interrelate many key areas such as housing, transportation, and economic development. Joint municipal presentation also gives local governments more influence with funding sources and legislative bodies.

Planning services provided by regional councils include transportation, housing and community development, groundwater protection, water resource management, wastewater treatment, solid waste disposal, land use, and rural preservation planning. Information services provided by regional councils include the operation of regional data centers, public education and information, and maintenance of regional Geographic Information Systems (GIS). Other services provided by regional councils may include special services for low-income and aging populations, job training and employment services, economic development activities, and small business promotion.

Technical assistance to local governments may also be offered, and can include supplementation of local planning efforts, preparations of grant applications and coordination, cost effective regional purchasing, public administration, financial expertise, and information systems.

17.3.1 Legislation

Articles 12-B and 5-G of the New York State General Municipal Law give affiliated municipalities the legal authority to create regional or metropolitan planning boards and joint-purpose municipal corporations. Programs

New York's regional planning councils provide comprehensive planning for the coordinated growth and development of their regions. This involves conducting regional studies to assess needs, promoting the region's economic climate, environmental health, recreational opportunities, etc., and providing technical assistance to communities within the region.

By presenting a regional perspective on issues, regional councils promote intergovernmental cooperation and serve as a liaison between the State and federal governments and municipalities.

Regional Councils in New York State consist of nine locally created regional planning boards in New York State, and represents 45 of the State's 62 counties. The regional councils in New York are as follows:

Table 17.3: Regional Planning Commissions and Councils

Council	Participating Counties
Capital District Regional Planning Commission	Albany, Rensselaer, Saratoga, & Schenectady
Central New York Regional Planning & Development Board	Cayuga, Madison, Onondaga, & Oswego
Genesee/Finger Lakes Regional Planning Council	Genesee, Livingston, Monroe, Ontario, Orleans, Seneca, Wayne, Wyoming, & Yates
Herkimer-Oneida Counties Comprehensive Planning Program	Herkimer & Oneida

Table 17.3: (continued)

Council	Participating Counties
Hudson Valley Regional Council	Dutchess, Orange, Putnam, Rockland, Sullivan, Ulster, & Westchester
Lake Champlain-Lake George Regional Planning Board	Clinton, Essex, Hamilton, Warren, & Washington
Southern Tier Central Regional Planning & Development Board	Chemung, Schuyler, & Steuben
Southern Tier East Regional Planning Development Board	Broome, Chenango, Cortland, Delaware, Otsego, Schoharie, Tioga, & Tompkins
Southern Tier West Regional Planning & Development Board	Allegany, Cattaraugus, & Chautauqua

17.3.2 Metropolitan Planning Organizations

Federal highway and transit statutes require, as a condition for spending federal highway or transit funds in urbanized areas, the designation of MPO's which have responsibility for planning, programming and coordination of federal highway and transit investments.

While the earliest beginnings of urban transportation planning go back to the post-World War II years, the federal requirement for urban transportation planning emerged during the early 1960's. The Federal Aid Highway Act of 1962 created the federal requirement for urban transportation planning largely in response to the construction of the Interstate Highway System and the planning of routes through and around urban areas. The Act requires, as a condition attached to federal transportation financial assistance, that transportation projects in urbanized areas of 50,000 or more in population be based on a continuing, comprehensive, urban transportation planning process undertaken cooperatively by the states and local governments — the birth of the so-called 3C, "continuing, comprehensive and cooperative" planning process.

In New York State there are twelve MPO's as follows:

- Adirondack-Glens Falls Transportation Council
- Binghamton Metropolitan Transportation Study
- Capital District Transportation Committee
- Executive Transportation Committee for Chemung County
- Genesee Transportation Council
- Greater Buffalo Niagara Regional Transportation Council
- Herkimer-Oneida Transportation Study
- Ithaca Tompkins County Transportation Council
- Newburg-Orange County Transportation Council
- New York Metropolitan Transportation Council
- Poughkeepsie-Dutchess County Transportation Council
- Syracuse Metropolitan Transportation Council

17.3.3 Regional Solutions through Intergovernmental Cooperation

Voter approval in 1959 of an amendment to the New York Constitution's prohibition on gifts and loans of credit by one local government to another paved the way for general legislative authorization for local governments to participate in a wide variety of intermunicipal endeavors.[9] Article 5-G of the General Municipal law was soon enacted to provide municipal corporations and districts with the power to enter into cooperative or joint agreements between or among them to provide any function, power or duty that each has authority to undertake on its own.

The term "municipal corporation" includes counties (outside of New York City), cities, towns, villages, boards of cooperative educational services, fire districts and school districts. The term "district" includes certain county and town improvement districts;[10] therefore, a very large number and broad range of local government entities are authorized to undertake cooperative activities. Since these local governments are empowered to undertake together any activity each may undertake alone, the opportunity to use an intergovernmental agreement to provide services or projects is only limited by the powers of each participant.[11]

Undertaking a cooperative or joint venture is essentially a business arrangement, and Article 5-G provides substantial leeway for contracting parties to address the many issues that typically are addressed in a business arrangement. Generally, an intermunicipal agreement may contain "any matters as are reasonably necessary and proper to effectuate and progress the joint service" [12] and typically include:

- a description of the joint service or project, an identification of the participants and the authority pursuant to which each will be undertaking the service or project;
- descriptions of the roles of each of the participating entities, and the identification of the managing participant, if any;
- fiscal matters, such as the method for allocating costs;
- the manner for employing and compensating employees;
- timetables and processes for contract review and renegotiation;
- methods for dispute resolution during a contract term; and
- responsibility for liabilities.

Agreements entered into pursuant to Article 5-G require the approval of a majority vote of the full strength of the governing body of each participating municipal corporation or district, unless the governing bodies have adopted mutual sharing plans which allow their respective officers or employees to undertake or authorize the receipt of a joint service in accordance with the plan. A mutual sharing plan can anticipate the potential need to obtain assistance from another eligible local government, either on a routine or extraordinary basis. It contemplates the "handshake" deal between cooperating local governments. Fashioning a cooperative agreement frequently necessitates the identification and resolution of many, sometimes complex, issues. Water, sewer and other joint construction projects will require resolution of design issues and permitting needs in addition to fiscal and operational matters. Participating local governments may choose to form joint committees charged with developing preliminary consensus through the development of recommendations to the involved governing bodies.

Some intermunicipal agreements require implementation through the adoption of complementary local laws. When a joint planning board is created, for instance, the participating local governments will need to adopt, in [9] Amendment to Article VIII, §1 of the New York State Constitution, approved by the electors in 1959; chapter 102 of the Laws of 1960 implemented this change.

[10] General Municipal Law, §119-n(a) and (b).

[11] General Municipal Law, §119-n(c).

[12] General Municipal Law, section 119-o(2).

addition to the cooperative agreement, compatible local laws that reflect the existence of the joint planning board and provide its authority and responsibilities.

Intermunicipal agreements allow local governments to seek regional, and sometimes creative, solutions to common problems without giving up their underlying authority or jurisdiction. For this reason, they are popular vehicles for achieving cost savings or service improvements in a wide variety of ways. The following is a partial list of examples of topics that may be the subject of Intermunicipal agreements:

- joint water and sewer projects;
- garbage collection;
- recycling centers;
- highway maintenance;
- snowplowing;
- shared recreational and cultural facilities;
- shared government offices;
- computer/data processing;
- joint purchasing;
- shared code compliance personnel;
- joint zoning boards;
- joint land use planning activities;
- joint economic development planning
- coordinated assessment services; and
- shared public safety functions.

Index

Legislation (/keywords/legislation)

JUNE 20, 2022 | Albany, NY

Governor Hochul Signs Landmark John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York Into Law

Legislation S.1046-E/A.6678-E Establishes the Most Expansive State Level Voting Rights Act in the Country

Expands Access to Voting by Prohibiting Voter Dilution, Suppression, Intimidation, Deception, or Obstruction

Requires Jurisdictions with a History of Civil or Voting Rights Violations to Seek Preclearance for Changes to Important Election Policies and Practices

Governor Kathy Hochul today, at Medgar Evers College in Brooklyn, signed the landmark John. R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York (S.1046-E/A.6678-E) into law cementing New York State's place as a national leader on voting rights and fulfilling a key part of the Governor's 2022 State of the State agenda. The Governor signed the bill alongside Senate Majority Leader Andrea Stewart-Cousins, State Senator Zellnor Myrie, Assemblymember Latrice Walker, President of the NAACP New York State Conference Dr. Hazel N. Dukes and key voting rights advocates.

"At a time when the very foundation of our democracy is under threat, New York is leading the nation with new laws protecting the fundamental right to vote," Governor Hochul said. "Today, we honor the work of the late Congressman John Lewis and activists like Medgar Evers as we make meaningful changes to our laws that enfranchise voters and ensure the voices of the people are heard in our democracy. Where the federal government fails to act, New York will continue to step up and lead the way: we did it with abortion protections, we did it with gun safety reforms, and I'm so proud to say we are doing it again with voting rights."

https://www.youtube.com/embed/vI0d-sizTu4

AUDIO

PHOTOS

"As a black man who represented a district in Congress that is nearly 90 percent white, in one of the most rural parts of the country, and as the first person of color to ever represent upstate New York in Congress, my experience is proof that voting can bring about change that once might have seemed out of reach," said Lieutenant Governor Antonio Delgado. "By amending the voter laws in New York State, we are providing all people, regardless of the color of their skin or where they live, with an equal opportunity to have their voices heard at the polls."

Senate Majority Leader Andrea Stewart-Cousins said, "The John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York will expand and codify voter protections, empower citizens at the ballot box, and promote accountability among elected officials. I am proud that New York is standing as a true bastion of voting rights despite the anti-democratic rollbacks being set forth by Republicans across the nation."

Assembly Speaker Carl Heastie said, "Voting rights are under attack across the nation and New York must protect this sacred constitutional right. While other states work to disenfranchise voters and dilute votes, I want to thank the Chair of the Elections Committee Latrice Walker, our Assembly and Senate colleagues, and Governor Hochul for their commitment to passing the strongest voting rights protections in the nation."

> Today, we honor the work of the late Congressman John Lewis and activists like Medgar Evers as we make meaningful changes to our laws that enfranchise voters and ensure the voices of the people are heard in our democracy.
>
> Governor Kathy Hochul

Legislation S.1046-E/A.6678-E will encourage participation in voting by all eligible voters by ensuring that barriers to accessing the polls are removed. In particular, members of racial, ethnic, and language-minority groups will now be protected by new measures that will ensure they have an equal opportunity to vote in the State of New York. This legislation does so by addressing:

- Voter Dilution. Prohibits methods of election that eliminate the voting strength of a protected class and establishes legal protections for violations.
- Voter Suppression. Prohibits election-related laws and practices from being implemented in ways that deny members of a protected class the right to vote and establishes legal protections for violations.
- Voter Intimidation, Deception or Obstruction. Prohibits acts of intimidation, deception, or obstruction that impact the ability of New Yorkers to access their right to vote and establishes legal protections for violations.
- Expanded Language Assistance. Requires election-related language assistance beyond what is required by the federal Voting Rights Act.
- Preclearance. Establishes a state analogue to the now dormant "section 5 preclearance" of the federal Voting Rights Act, requiring covered jurisdictions to "preclear" any changes to certain important election-related laws and policies before they can implement them. Under the new law, covered jurisdictions seeking to make a change to a range of election measures will first need to have those changes reviewed to ensure they will not violate the voting rights of a protected class. Covered jurisdictions are those with a history of civil or voting rights violations.

State Senator Zellnor Myrie said, "By enacting the strongest voter protection law of any state in the country, New York is sending a powerful message: every voter counts and every vote should be counted. I'm grateful to Governor Hochul for signing the VRA today and to my partner Assemblymember Latrice Walker for getting this bill over the finish line. We must always continue to defend and strengthen voting rights: our democracy depends on it."

Assemblymember Latrice Walker said, "The John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York is one of the most important bills to be signed into law in recent history and it will deliver the strongest and most comprehensive voter protections of any state In America. It will codify the very cornerstone of our democracy — the right to vote. At the same time, we have honored the legacy of the late Representative John R. Lewis, who once said, "The vote is precious. It is almost sacred. It is the most powerful nonviolent tool we have in a democracy." Thank you to all the tireless advocates, my colleagues, Governor Hochul, and organizations like the NAACP and the NYCLU. As the Assembly sponsor of the bill, I could not be more proud."

President of the NAACP New York State Conference Dr. Hazel N. Dukes said, "For too long our communities have suffered injustices, but were unable to vote to change them because of suppression at the polls. Today, New York leads the way, yet again, to right the wrongs of our past and ensure that the voices of all can be heard. I applaud Assemblymember Latrice Walker and Senator Zellnor Myrie, the sponsors of this historic legislation, for expanding voter protections for New Yorkers across the state. Thank you Governor Hochul, Leader Andrea Stewart-Cousins, and Speaker Carl Heastie for working together on this landmark legislation."

New York Civil Liberties Union Executive Director Donna Lieberman said, "Amidst a backdrop of nationwide attacks on voting and a lack of federal leadership, New York just enacted one of the strongest voting rights laws in the nation. Today, Governor Hochul made an enormous stride toward ensuring communities that have historically been denied an equal opportunity to participate in the political process can cast a meaningful ballot without obstruction, interference, or discrimination. As we work to implement the John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act — from challenging racial gerrymandering and voter intimidation to expanding language assistance and polling access — we must ensure its protections remain strong. Lawmakers must resist any attempt to walk back our progress and must fight to protect the right to vote."

Medgar Evers College President Dr. Patricia Ramsey said, “The signing into law of the John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York, by Governor Kathy Hochul, was a historic day for the people of New York and for Medgar Evers College; a College birthed out of the Central Brooklyn Community, with social justice in its DNA and named for civil rights leader Medgar Wiley Evers, field secretary for the NAACP who was slain because of his advocacy for the rights of Blacks in Mississippi to vote. As President of Medgar Evers College, I am extremely proud that Dr. Hazel Dukes and members of the NAACP advocated for this historic signing to take place at our college, in honor of Medgar Wiley Evers. I’m grateful to Governor Kathy Hochul, Majority Leader Stewart-Cousins, Senator Myrie, Assemblymember Walker and all involved in bringing this to fruition. Juneteenth 2022 will be in the annals of history as the day that the John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York was signed into law, at Medgar Evers College.”

Center for Law and Social Justice at Medgar Evers College Executive Director Lurie Daniel Favors Esq. said, "The signing of the New York State John R Lewis Voting Rights Act today at Medgar Evers College was an historic and momentous occasion that solidifies New York's position as an emerging leader when it comes to protecting voting rights. As voting rights protections fall across the nation and in light of the Supreme Court's willingness to align with the retrenchment of voter protections, it is imperative that organizers, activists and elected officials at the state and local level work to protect voters. This legislation includes a preclearance provision, it expands protections for language minorities, and incorporates a democracy canon that ensures the legislation is interpreted in a way that centers the needs of voters. New York has now set a model for how to protect voters and it is one that the rest of the nation should follow."

LatinoJustice PRLDEF Associate Counsel Fulvia Vargas-De Leon said, "Signing the John R. Lewis Voting Rights Act of New York into law places our state at the forefront of protecting communities of color from discriminatory actions that limit equal participation in our democracy. This right should not be controversial or political. Our fight for full and equitable access to the ballot is far from over, but this law gives us a strong tool to come one step closer to a democracy representative and inclusive of all voters."

Contact the Governor's Press Office

Contact us by phone:

Albany: (518) 474 - 8418
New York City: (212) 681 - 4640

Contact us by email:

Press.Office@exec.ny.gov

Translations

Arabic Translation
الترجمة إلى العربية

DOWNLOAD

Bengali Translation

বাংলা অনুবাদ

DOWNLOAD

Chinese Translation
中文翻譯

DOWNLOAD

Haitian-Creole Translation
Tradiksyon kreyòl ayisyen

DOWNLOAD

Italian Translation
Traduzione italiana

DOWNLOAD

Korean Translation
한국어 번역

DOWNLOAD

Polish Translation
Polskie tłumaczenie

DOWNLOAD

Russian Translation
Перевод на русский язык

DOWNLOAD

Spanish Translation
Traducción al español

DOWNLOAD

Yiddish Translation
אידישע איבערטייטשונג

DOWNLOAD

Translate

McKinney's Consolidated Laws of New York Annotated
Constitution of the State of New York (Refs & Annos)
Article I. Bill of Rights (Refs & Annos)

McKinney's Const. Art. 1, § 11

§ 11. [Equal protection of laws; discrimination in civil rights prohibited]

Effective: January 1, 2002 to December 31, 2024
Currentness

No person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws of this state or any subdivision thereof. No person shall, because of race, color, creed or religion, be subjected to any discrimination in his or her civil rights by any other person or by any firm, corporation, or institution, or by the state or any agency or subdivision of the state.

Credits
(Adopted Nov. 8, 1938, eff. Jan. 1, 1939. Amended Nov. 6, 2001, eff. Jan. 1, 2002.)

McKinney's Const. Art. 1, § 11, NY CONST Art. 1, § 11
Current through L.2024, chapters 1 to 545. Some statute sections may be more current, see credits for details.

End of Document